<sup>61</sup> Nittan UK Ltd v Solent Steel Fabrications Ltd [1981] 1 All E.R. 633; Porteus v Element Books Ltd [1996] C.L.Y. 1029; or even to treat the document as rectified (above p.296).

<sup>62</sup> cf. Mangistaumunagaz Oil Production Association v United World Trade Inc [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 617.

may be convenient<sup>63</sup>); but even if B succeeds on the issue of construction, rectification will be available to A if the case was one of the exceptional ones (described above<sup>64</sup>) in which the remedy can be granted in spite of the fact that the mistake was that of one party only.<sup>65</sup>

(c) PRIOR CONTRACT NOT NECESSARY. The court can rectify a document which was preceded by a concluded agreement or (still less stringently) a “continuing common intention”<sup>66</sup> even though there was no prior binding contract,<sup>67</sup> for example, because the prior agreement was binding in honour only.<sup>68</sup> In Joscelyne v Nissen<sup>69</sup> an agreement for the transfer of a business and premises was negotiated between a father and daughter, it being understood that the father should continue to live in the premises and that the daughter should pay his gas and electricity bills. No provision for such payments was made in the formal contract finally executed. Rectification was ordered even though, before execution of the document, the agreement between the parties had no contractual force. It was enough that there was “some outward expression of accord” and that this was “adhered to in intention by the parties to the subsequent written contract”.<sup>70</sup> On the other hand, a document cannot be rectified to bring it into line with mere steps in the antecedent negotiations,<sup>71</sup> for these may not have led to a concluded agreement on the particular point, or, if they did, that agreement may not have been maintained till the execution of the document.

(d) DOCUMENT ACCURATELY RECORDING PRIOR AGREEMENT. It follows from the principle that equity rectifies instruments and not contracts<sup>72</sup> that a document which accurately records a prior agreement cannot be rectified merely because that agreement was made under some mistake. In F E Rose (London) Ltd v W H Pim, Jnr & Co Ltd<sup>73</sup> the claimants had received an order from a customer for “Moroccan horsebeans described here as feveroles” and asked the defendants (their suppliers) what “feveroles” were. The defendants replied that feveroles were just horsebeans and orally agreed to sell “horsebeans” to the claimants. When this contract was reduced to writing, the goods were again described as “horsebeans.” In fact there were three types of Moroccan horsebeans: feves, feveroles and fevettes. The defendants supplied feves, which were less valuable than feveroles. It was held that the written contract could not be rectified by inserting

<sup>63</sup> See above, after n.55.

<sup>64</sup> At nn.43–46.

<sup>65</sup> Commission for the New Towns v Cooper (Great Britain) Ltd [1995] Ch. 259.

<sup>66</sup> The Olympic Pride [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 67 at 72; The Pina [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 246 at 250, affirmed [1992] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 103 on the ground that there was no need to rectify the prior non-contractual document as it had no legal force; Grand Metropolitan plc v William Hill Group plc [1997] 1 B.C.L.C. 390.

<sup>67</sup> For the now rejected contrary view, see Mackenzie v Coulson (1869) L.R. 8 Eq. 369 at 375.

<sup>68</sup> Eagle Star, etc., Insurance Co v Reiner (1927) 43 T.L.R. 259; cf. Symington & Co v Union Insurance Society of Canton (1928) 34 Comm.Cas. 233.

<sup>69</sup> [1970] 2 Q.B. 86; Bromley, 87 L.Q.R. 532; Kavanagh, 34 M.L.R. 102; cf. Wilson v Wilson [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1470; Michael Richards Properties v St Saviour’s Parish [1975] 3 All E.R. 416 at 423; The Olympic Pride, above n.66, at 72.

<sup>70</sup> [1970] 2 Q.B. 86 at 99; Shipley Urban DC v Bradford Corp [1936] Ch.375 at 396; cf. Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc [1939] 1 All E.R. 662 at 664–665; criticised in F E Rose (London) Ltd v W H Pim, Jnr, & Co Ltd [1953] 2 Q.B. 450 at 461; distinguished in Ashville Investments Ltd v Elmer Contractors Ltd [1989] Q.B. 488 at 516, and in Ethiopian Oilseeds & Pulses Corp v Rio del Mar Foods Inc [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 86; approved in Joscelyne v Nissen [1970] 2 Q.B. 86; Earl v Hector Whaling [1961] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 459 at 470. The requirement of “outward expression of accord” is inappropriate where the mistake is that of the common agent of the parties in drawing up the instrument in such a way as to fail to give effect to the common intention of the parties: Mace v Rutland House Textiles Ltd, The Times January 11, 2000.

<sup>71</sup> Lovell & Christmas Ltd v Wall (1911) 104 L.T. 85 at 88.

<sup>72</sup> See above, p.321.

<sup>73</sup> [1953] 2 Q.B. 450; cf. The Ypatia Halcoussi [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 364 at 371.

"feveroles" after "horsebeans," as it accurately recorded the previous oral agreement.<sup>74</sup>

(e) CLEAR EVIDENCE. When rectification is claimed, the court has to guard against two dangers. The first is that the remedy may result in imposing on a party terms to which he might not in fact have agreed. The second is that the "certainty and ready enforceability [of written agreements] would be hindered by constant attempts to cloud the issue by reference to precontract negotiations".<sup>75</sup> For these reasons, rectification will be ordered only if there is strong and convincing evidence that the document failed accurately to record the intention of the parties.<sup>76</sup> The court is, in particular, reluctant to rectify a contract solely on the oral evidence of the party claiming rectification<sup>77</sup> but there is no absolute rule against rectification on such evidence.<sup>78</sup> The requirement of clear evidence seems to be less strict when rectification is sought of a voluntary deed, or of a voluntary provision in a deed.<sup>79</sup>

(f) EXECUTED CONTRACTS. Although the contrary has been suggested<sup>80</sup> execution (i.e., performance) of a contract is no bar to rectification. Thus leases and conveyances can be rectified on the ground that they are inconsistent with the contracts which preceded them.<sup>81</sup> Any other view would conflict with the whole concept of rectification, for the formal document which it is sought to rectify often is the execution of the prior contract.

(g) RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM IMPOSSIBLE. Impossibility of restoring the parties to the position in which they were before the contract is, in general, no bar to rectification. For example, a marriage settlement can be rectified after the marriage has taken place.<sup>82</sup>

(h) LIMITATIONS ON THE REMEDY.

(i) Lapse of time. A claim for rectification is barred by lapse of time. It is not clear whether time begins to run when the contract was made<sup>83</sup> or when the mistake is discovered<sup>84</sup> or when it should by the exercise of reasonable diligence have been

<sup>74</sup> The contract was not void for mistake: above, p.290. Nor could the claimants rescind for misrepresentation as they had resold the horsebeans: cf. below, p.378, but they might now be able to claim damages under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(1) (below, p.350). They might also (as Denning L.J. suggested) be able to claim damages for breach of a collateral warranty, if the necessary animus contrahendi on the part of the seller could be shown (above, p.149, below, pp.356–357).

<sup>75</sup> The Olympic Pride [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 67 at 73.

<sup>76</sup> Fowler v Fowler (1859) 4 D. & J. 250 at 265; Fredensén v Rothschild [1941] 1 All E.R. 430 at 436; Joscelyne v Nissen [1970] 2 Q.B. 86; Ernest Scragg & Sons Ltd v Perseverance Banking & Trust Co [1973] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 101; The Olympic Pride, above, n.75, at 73; Blacklocks v J B Developments (Godalming) Ltd [1982] Ch. 183 at 191; Cambro Contractors Ltd v John Kennedy Sales Ltd, The Times, April 14, 1994. On the question whether the evidence must come up to the standard required in criminal cases contrast Earl v Hector Whaling [1961] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 459 at 468, 470; and Mangistaumunaigaz Oil Production Association v United Trade Inc [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 617 at 621 with The Pinu [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 246 at 250, affirmed on other grounds [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 103; Pappadakis v Pappadakis [2000] W.T.L.R. 719; Luk Leamington Ltd v Whitmarsh plc [2002] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 6 at 18–19.

<sup>77</sup> Tucker v Bennett (1887) 38 Ch.D. 1; Fredensén v Rothschild, above; Thomas Bates & Son Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd [1981] 1 W.L.R. 505 at 514, 521.

<sup>78</sup> Cook v Fearn (1878) 48 L.J.Ch. 63.

<sup>79</sup> See Hanley v Pearson (1879) 13 Ch.D. 545.

<sup>80</sup> e.g. in May v Platt [1900] 1 Ch. 616, criticised in Thompson v Hickman [1907] 1 Ch.550.

<sup>81</sup> e.g. Murray v Parker (1854) 19 Beav. 305; Cowen v Truefitt Ltd [1899] 2 Ch.309; Stait v Fenner [1912] 2 Ch. 504.

<sup>82</sup> Cook v Fearn (1878) 48 L.J. Ch. 63; Johnson v Bragge [1901] 1 Ch.28.

<sup>83</sup> Bloomer v Spittle (1872) L.R. 13 Eq. 427.

<sup>84</sup> Beale v Kyte [1907] 1 Ch. 564.

discovered. The last view probably applies in cases of innocent misrepresentation<sup>85</sup>; and there seems to be no good reason for applying a different rule where rectification is claimed.

(ii) Third party rights. The right to claim rectification, like the other equitable rights, can be asserted against a purchaser with notice of the mistake,<sup>86</sup> but not against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.<sup>87</sup>

(iii) Judgment. A claim for rectification is barred by a judgment in proceedings in which the issue of rectification could have been (though it was not) raised.<sup>88</sup> But judgment in proceedings in which the question of rectification could not have been raised is no bar to a later claim for rectification.<sup>89</sup>

(iv) Assignment. It has been suggested that, even where a contracting party can claim rectification, a person to whom he assigns his rights cannot do so.<sup>90</sup> The basis for this suggestion seems to be that in such circumstances rectification might produce an undeserved windfall for the assignee.

(v) Instruments which cannot be rectified. The articles of association of a company cannot be rectified once they have been registered, even if they contain a simple clerical error.<sup>91</sup> To allow rectification would cut across the scheme laid down by the Companies Acts for the registration and alteration of such documents.

In Phillipson v Kerry<sup>92</sup> it was held that a deed poll cannot be rectified, though, if executed under a mistake, it can be set aside. One possible reason for this rule, given in the judgment, is that a voluntary gift cannot be rectified. But as it is now clear that a voluntary deed inter partes can be rectified,<sup>93</sup> there does not seem to be any convincing reason for the rule.

The court cannot rectify a settlement which is binding, not as a contract, but by virtue of a court order.<sup>94</sup> If a mistake is made in drawing up such an order, it is more appropriate to ask the court which made the order to vary it than to ask another court to rectify it.

SECTION 4. DOCUMENTS MISTAKENLY SIGNED

1. Development

As a general rule, a person is bound by his signature to a document whether he reads it or understands it, or not. But at the end of the sixteenth century an exception to this rule was established. It was held in Thoroughgood's Case<sup>95</sup> that if a person who could not read executed a deed after it had been incorrectly read over to him, he was not bound by it. He could plead non est factum: it is not my deed.

<sup>85</sup> See below, p.385.

<sup>86</sup> Craddock Bros. v Hunt [1923] 2 Ch. 136; Blacklocks v J B Developments (Godalming) Ltd [1982] Ch. 183.

<sup>87</sup> Smith v Jones [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1089; cf. Garrard v Frankel (1862) 30 Beav. 445.

<sup>88</sup> Caird v Moss (1886) 33 Ch.D. 22.

<sup>89</sup> Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc [1939] 4 All E.R. 68 (above, p.321, n.36).

<sup>90</sup> Napier v Williams [1911] 1 Ch. 361; the actual decision would now be different because of Law of Property Act 1925, s.82. Where the assignment forms part of a conveyance, the assignee can claim rectification by virtue of Law of Property Act 1925, s.63(1): Boots the Chemist v Street (1983) 268 E.G. 817; Berkley Leisure Group Ltd v Williamson [1996] E.G.C.S. 18.

<sup>91</sup> Scott v Frank F Scott (London) Ltd [1904] Ch. 794.

<sup>92</sup> (1863) 32 Beav. 628.

<sup>93</sup> Bonhote v Henderson [1895] 1 Ch.742; Re Butlin's S.T. [1976] Ch.251; Re Slocock's Will Trust [1979] 1 All E.R. 359.

<sup>94</sup> Mills v Fox (1887) 37 Ch.D. 153.

<sup>95</sup> (1584) 2 Co.Rep. 9a; cf. Hitchman v Avery (1892) 8 T.L.R. 698; Lloyds Bank plc v Waterhouse [1993] 2 F.L.R. 97 at 108.

In the nineteenth century, it was settled that this doctrine was no longer confined to persons who were unable to read. The reason for this extension of the doctrine was the insistence on the requirement of consensus ad idem in contract. A person who signed a document without being aware of its nature was not bound because "the mind of the signer did not accompany the signature".<sup>96</sup> But if too wide a scope were given to this reasoning, it could lead to results that were inconsistent with the objective principle<sup>97</sup> and with the general common law requirement that a mistake must be fundamental if it is to negative consent.<sup>98</sup>

The objective principle does not operate in favour of a person who knows of the mistake of the signer<sup>99</sup>; and if that person has induced the mistake by some misrepresentation about the document which is alleged to contain the contract between him and the signer, then the signer will be entitled to avoid the contract on that ground.<sup>1</sup> Often, however, the document purports to be a contract between the signer and someone other than the fraudulent party. For example, A may induce B to sign a guarantee of A's bank overdraft by representing that it is an insurance proposal. Here the document is an apparent contract, not between A and B, but between B and the bank, which may reasonably believe that B has assented to the terms of the document. As the bank is not responsible for the fraud of A, B's only hope is to plead non est factum; but success of the plea would deprive the bank of the protection of the objective principle.

Even if the document is an apparent contract only between A and B, the latter may try to invoke the doctrine of non est factum because it may provide a better remedy for him than rescission on the ground of A's fraud. This will be the position where B has under the contract parted with property and an innocent third party has later acquired an interest in that property for value.<sup>2</sup> If the doctrine of non est factum applies, the contract will be void so that B will be entitled to the return of the property; while if the contract is only voidable for A's fraud the third party will be protected. In cases of mistaken identity, the courts have in many cases protected such innocent third parties by a strict insistence on the requirement that the mistake must be fundamental<sup>3</sup>; and a similar requirement has restricted the scope of the non est factum defence.<sup>4</sup>

2. Scope of the Doctrine

(1) Persons to whom the plea is available

The nineteenth century extension of the doctrine to persons who could read has been called "one of the less happy developments in our law"<sup>5</sup> and it has been suggested that the doctrine should not apply in favour of such persons if they were of full age and capacity.<sup>6</sup> But this very narrow view has not prevailed. In Gallie v Lee Lord Reid said that the doctrine may apply to "those who are permanently or temporarily unable through no fault of their own to have without explanation any real understanding of the purport of a particular document, whether that be from defective education, illness or

<sup>96</sup> Foster v Mackinnon (1869) L.R. 4 C.P. 704 at 711; cf. (in criminal law). R. v Davies [1982] 1 All. E.R. 513 at 516.

<sup>97</sup> See above, p.306.

<sup>98</sup> See above, p.299, but see p.304.

<sup>99</sup> See above, p.307.

<sup>1</sup> See below, p.369; Lloyds Bank plc v Waterhouse (above n.95) at 111.

<sup>2</sup> As in Gallie v Lee [1971] A.C. 1004, below, p.328.

<sup>3</sup> See above, pp.299 et seq.

<sup>4</sup> Normich and Peterborough BS v Steeds (No.2) [1993] 1 All E.R. 330 at 337.

<sup>5</sup> Gallie v Lee [1969] 2 Ch.17 at 43 per Salmon L.J.

<sup>6</sup> ibid. at 36-37.

innate incapacity",<sup>7</sup> and to these must be added persons who have been tricked into signing the document.<sup>8</sup> The doctrine may thus apply not only to the blind or illiterate but also to persons who are senile, of very low intelligence or ignorant of the language in which the document is expressed. But it will not normally protect literate persons of full capacity.<sup>9</sup>

(2) Serious mistake required

In their desire to restrict the scope of the doctrine, the courts have insisted that the plea of non est factum is available only where the mistake of the signer was a serious one. Formerly, they gave effect to this policy by drawing a distinction between the "character"<sup>10</sup> of a document and its "contents".<sup>11</sup> But in Gallie v Lee<sup>12</sup> the House of Lords rejected this distinction as unworkable,<sup>13</sup> and put in its place the requirement that the difference between the document as it was and as it was believed to be must be radical or substantial or fundamental.<sup>14</sup> Under this test, the seriousness of the mistake is to be judged by "difference in practical result" rather than by "difference in legal character".<sup>15</sup> The facts of the case were that a widow of 78 wanted to help her nephew Parkin to raise money on the security of her leasehold house, provided that she could continue to live there rent free for the rest of her life. Parkin did not want the loan to be in his own name, or to become owner of the house as he feared that this would enable his wife (from whom he was separated) to enforce her claim for maintenance against him. He therefore arranged that the money should be raised through an intermediary called Lee on a mortgage of the house; and as a first step in this scheme a document was prepared which was in fact an assignment on sale of the lease to Lee for £3,000. The widow did not read this document as her glasses were broken, but she signed it after being told by Lee that it was a deed of gift to Parkin (who witnessed the document). Lee mortgaged the house to a building society, but did not pay over the money so raised either to Parkin or to the widow. It was held that the widow was not protected by the doctrine of non est factum as her mistake was not sufficiently serious. She believed that the document would enable her nephew to raise money on the security of the house, and the document was in fact designed to achieve this purpose, though by a different process from that contemplated by her.<sup>16</sup>

(3) Mistake as to identity

We have seen that consent may be negated, so as to make a contract void, where A deals with B in the mistaken belief that B is C.<sup>17</sup> But if A signs a document expressed to be in favour of B, the defence of non est factum is not open to A merely because A thought that the party named in the document was C. Thus in Gallie v Lee<sup>18</sup> the defence failed

<sup>7</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004 at 1016.

<sup>8</sup> ibid. at 1025.

<sup>9</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004 at 1016, 1025.

<sup>10</sup> e.g. Foster v Mackinnon (1869) L.R. C.P. 704.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. Howatson v Webb [1907] 1 Ch. 537; affirmed [1908] 1 Ch. 1.

<sup>12</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004.

<sup>13</sup> Muskham Finance Ltd v Howard [1963] 1 Q.B. 904 is, for example, hard to reconcile with Howatson v Webb, above. See also Gallie v Lee [1969] 2 Ch. 17 at 31–32, per Lord Denning M.R.

<sup>14</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004 at 1017, 1019, 1021, 1026, 1034.

<sup>15</sup> ibid. at 1017.

<sup>16</sup> cf. Mercantile Credit Ltd v Hamblin [1965] 2 Q.B. 242; Avon Finance Co v Bridger [1985] 2 All E.R. 281. For a difference of judicial opinion on a similar point, see Lloyds Bank plc v Waterhouse [1993] 2 F.L.R. 97.

<sup>17</sup> e.g. Cundy v Lindsay (1873) 3 App.Cas. 459; above, p.299.

<sup>18</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004; cf. Howatson v Webb [1907] 1 Ch. 535; affirmed [1908] 1 Ch. 1. For discussion of the mistaken identity point, see Gallie v Lee [1969] 2 Ch. 17 at 44.

even though the widow thought that she was making a gift to Parkin when in fact she was making a conveyance to Lee. The reason for this rule may be that the mistaken party can discover the mistake by reading the document.

(4) Ignorance

The plea of non est factum is not normally open to a person who is merely ignorant of (as opposed to mistaken about) what he is signing<sup>19</sup>: for example, to one who signs a document in the belief that it is “only a form” without having any precise idea as to its nature.<sup>20</sup> Similarly, in Gillman v Gillman<sup>21</sup> a wife, shortly before her husband left her, signed a document which was in fact a separation deed. She did not know this when she signed it, but neither had she any definite idea as to what it was that she was signing. It was held that she was bound by the deed.

(5) Mistake as to capacity

The rule just stated is subject to an exception where a person signs a document under a mistaken belief as to the capacity in which he signs. Thus in Lewis v Clay<sup>22</sup> the defendant was induced to sign two promissory notes by the fraudulent representation that his signature was required as a witness and that the documents were of a private nature. The plea of non est factum succeeded even though the defendant could not say precisely what type of document he thought he had signed.

(6) Carelessness

Carelessness of the signer excludes the doctrine of non est factum. This was a second ground for the decision in Gallie v Lee<sup>23</sup>: the widow could not rely on the doctrine as she had been careless in signing the document without reading it. For the same reason, a person cannot rely on the doctrine if he signs a document containing blanks which are later filled in otherwise than in accordance with his instructions.<sup>24</sup>

In this context, the standard of care cannot be that of the reasonable person, for such a person will not normally be able to rely on the doctrine of non est factum at all.<sup>25</sup> One has to assume that the person relying on the doctrine falls within the class of persons to whom it is available, and then to ask whether that person took such care as one so disadvantaged could have been expected to take. In Gallie v Lee itself, this test was not satisfied; for, although the widow could not be expected to follow the intricacies of conveyancing, she could at least be expected to make sure that the person named in the document as transferee was the person intended by her. It does not follow that failure to read the document will exclude the plea of non est factum in all cases: the plea might, for example, still be available if reading the document would not have revealed its true character to a person of the signer's limited capabilities.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>19</sup> Normich and Peterborough BS v Steeds (No.2) [1993] 1 All E.R. 330 at 338–339.

<sup>20</sup> Hunter v Walters (1871) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 75; cf. National Provincial Bank of England v Jackson (1886) 33 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>21</sup> (1946) 174 L.T. 272; cf. Mercantile Credit Co Ltd v Hamblin [1965] 2 Q.B. 242 (but in that case the signer escaped liability on another ground).

<sup>22</sup> (1897) 67 L.J.Q.B. 224.

<sup>23</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004; overruling Carlisle & Cumberland Banking Co v Bragg [1911] 1 K.B. 489. See also Vorley v Cooke (1857) 1 Giff. 230 at 236, Hunter v Walters (1871) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 75 at 87; Lewis v Clay (1897) 67 L.J.Q.B. 224 at 226; Howatson v Webb [1908] 1 Ch. 1; Crédit Lyonnais v F T Barnard & Associates [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 557; Avon Finance Co v Bridger [1985] 2 All E.R. 281; PB Leasing Ltd v Patela Patel [1995] C.C.L.R. 82.

<sup>24</sup> United Dominion's Trust Ltd v Western [1976] Q.B. 513; Marston, [1976] C.L.J. 218.

<sup>25</sup> See above, pp.327–328.

<sup>26</sup> [1971] A.C. 1004 at 1023; cf. Lloyd's Bank plc v Waterhouse [1993] 2 F.I.R. 97.

MISREPRESENTATION<sup>1</sup>

OUR concern in this Chapter is with the remedies available to a person who has been induced to enter into a contract by a statement which is misleading. These remedies are available only if the statement is of a kind which the law recognises as giving rise to liability, and if certain general conditions of liability are satisfied. The representee may then be able to claim damages or to rescind the contract or to do both these things. Similar remedies may also in certain cases be available where there has been mere non-disclosure of material facts, as opposed to active misrepresentation.

SECTION 1. MEANING OF "REPRESENTATION"<sup>2</sup>

The general rule is that no relief will be given for a misrepresentation as such unless it is a statement of existing fact. There may, therefore, be no remedy if the statement falls into one of the following categories.

1. Mere Puffs

These are statements which are so vague that they have no effect at law or in equity. To describe land as "fertile and improvable" is mere sales talk which affords no ground for relief.<sup>3</sup> But there is a liability for more precise claims, e.g. that use of a carbolic smoke-ball will give immunity from influenza.<sup>4</sup> The distinction is between indiscriminate praise, and specific promises or assertions of verifiable facts.

2. Statements of Fact and of Opinion or Belief

Even where a statement is not so vague as to be a mere puff, it may nevertheless have no legal effect because it is not a positive assertion that the fact stated is true, but only a statement of the maker's opinion or belief. Assertions that an anchorage was safe and that a piece of land had the capacity to support 2,000 sheep have been held to be of this character<sup>5</sup>; for in each case, the party making the statement had (as the other party knew) no personal knowledge of the facts on which it was based: it was understood that he could only state his belief. If that party has or professes to have some special knowledge or skill as to the matter stated, the statement is likely to be treated as one of fact.<sup>6</sup> A statement that the representor had been informed of a particular fact has also been held

<sup>1</sup> Allen, Misrepresentation; Cartwright, Misrepresentation.

<sup>2</sup> Our concern is with the common law meaning of this expression. For the wider meaning of "representation" in Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.67, see Moorgate Services Ltd v Kabir, The Times, April 25, 1995.

<sup>3</sup> Dimmock v Hallett (1866) 1 L.R. 2 Ch.App. 21; cf. above, p.162.

<sup>4</sup> Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co [1893] 1 Q.B. 256.

<sup>5</sup> Anderson v Pacific Fire & Marine Insurance Co (1872) 1 L.R. 7 C.P. 65; Bissett v Wilkinson [1927] A.C. 177.

<sup>6</sup> e.g. Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801, below, p.338; Box v Midland Bank Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 391 (reversed as to costs only [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 434); Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 594–595; Parks v Esso Petroleum Co Ltd [1999] C.M.L.R. 455, affirmed on other grounds [2000] Eu.L.R. 25.

to be a representation, not merely that the representator had been so informed, but that the fact existed.<sup>7</sup>

A statement may, in terms, be one of opinion or belief, but by implication involve a statement of fact. Thus it is a misrepresentation of fact for a person to say that he holds an opinion which he does not hold, e.g. to say that he thinks a picture is a Rembrandt when he thinks it is a copy.<sup>8</sup> And if the facts on which an opinion is based are particularly within the knowledge of the person stating the opinion, he may be taken to have represented that those facts exist. For example, where the vendor of a house describes it as "let to a most desirable tenant", when the tenant has for long been in arrears with his rent, he misrepresents a fact, "for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion".<sup>9</sup> The same principle applies where a person honestly makes a statement of belief but fails to check the facts on which it appears to be based, when he could easily have done so.<sup>10</sup>

3. Representations as to the Future

A representation as to the future does not, of itself, give rise to any cause of action<sup>11</sup> unless it is binding as a contract. Thus if A induces B to lend him money by representing that he will not borrow from anybody else, and then does borrow elsewhere, he is not liable to B unless the representation is a term of the contract of loan or amounts to a collateral contract.<sup>12</sup>

A person who promises to do something may simply be making a statement as to his future conduct; if so, he does not misrepresent a fact merely because he fails to do what he said he would do.<sup>13</sup> But he may also be making a statement of his present intention; if so, he does misrepresent a fact if, when he made the statement, he had no such intention. The courts tend to construe statements as to the future in the second of these two ways in order to protect the interests of persons deceived by them.<sup>14</sup> In Edgington v Fitzmaurice<sup>15</sup> the directors of a company procured a loan of money to their company by representing that the money would be used to improve the company's buildings and to expand its business. In fact the directors intended to use the money to pay off the company's existing debts. They were held liable to the lender in deceit. Bowen L.J. said: "There must be a mis-statement of an existing fact; but the state of a man's mind is as

<sup>7</sup> Sirius International Ins Corp v Oriental Assurance Corp [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 699; presumably the latter representation arose by implication from the former.

<sup>8</sup> Jendwine v Slade (1797) 2 Esp. 571 at 573; Brown v Raphael [1958] Ch. 636 at 641; contrast Harlingdon and Leinster Enterprises Ltd v Christopher Hull Fine Art Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 564.

<sup>9</sup> Smith v Land & House Property Corp (1884) 28 Ch.D. 7 at 15.

<sup>10</sup> Brown v Raphael [1958] Ch. 636; contrast Humming Bird Motors v Hobbs [1986] R.T.R. 276 and William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016, where the sellers were not negligent in stating their (mistaken) beliefs.

<sup>11</sup> It may be a ground for refusing specific performance: below, p.957. It may also, in combination with other circumstances, give rise to a proprietary estoppel: see above, pp.134-149.

<sup>12</sup> cf. Ex p. Burrell (1876) 1 Ch.D. 537 at 552; Strachan & Henshaw Ltd v Stein Industrie (UK) Ltd (No.2) (1998) 87 B.L.R. 52. Failure to perform a promise is, similarly, not a false "statement" for the purpose of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968: Beckett v Cohen [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1593; R. v Sunair Holidays Ltd [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1105; unless the promise also contains a statement of present intention: see n.16, below.

<sup>13</sup> The Seaflower [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 42; but the eventual outcome was that the representee was entitled to rescind for breach: The Seaflower [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 341, below, p.798.

<sup>14</sup> cf. Theft Act 1968, s.15(4); Theft Act 1978, s.5(1); R. v Gilmartin [1983] Q.B. 953; R. v Grantham [1984] Q.B. 675.

<sup>15</sup> (1885) 29 Ch.D. 459.

much a fact as the state of his digestion. . . . A misrepresentation as to the state of a man's mind is, therefore, a mis-statement of fact".<sup>16</sup>

This principle is not restricted to statements of intention. A person may misrepresent a fact if he states an expectation or a belief which he does not hold as to some future event. The Marine Insurance Act 1906 provides that a marine policy can be avoided for an untrue representation of expectation or belief<sup>17</sup>; but that such a representation "is true if it be made in good faith".<sup>18</sup> These rules apply also to other types of insurance and under them a person would be guilty of misrepresentation if he stated a belief which he did not in fact hold. But the standard imposed by them is no more than one of honesty, so that where a representor made an honest statement of his knowledge and belief (which turned out to be wrong) as to the value of the contents of a house it was held that he was not guilty of misrepresentation: he was not required to show that he had reasonable grounds for making the statement.<sup>19</sup> In contexts other than that of insurance, however, a statement of expectation or belief may be held to contain an implied assertion that the representor did have reasonable grounds for making it. For example, a shipowner who in a charterparty says that his ship is "expected ready to load" at a particular port on or about a specified date impliedly represents that he honestly holds that belief, and that he does so on reasonable grounds. If he has no reasonable grounds for holding the belief, he misrepresents a fact.<sup>20</sup>

A person may similarly state his intention of doing something and thereby impliedly assert that he has reasonable grounds for thinking that he has the capacity to do it. There is no logical reason why such an implied assertion should not also be regarded as one of fact. It could further be argued that a person who incurs a debt may impliedly represent that he has reasonable grounds for thinking that he will be able to pay it<sup>21</sup>; and that, if he had no such grounds, the creditor should be able to rescind the contract. But the common understanding is that the creditor's only remedy (in the absence of fraud, such as an express misrepresentation as to solvency) is an action to recover the debt; and the whole scheme set up by the law of bankruptcy for the distribution of an insolvent debtor's estate would be seriously disrupted if some creditors could rescind (and so regain title to goods with which they had parted) on the ground that the debtor had, by merely incurring the debt, impliedly asserted that he had reasonable grounds for thinking that he would be able to pay. An implied assertion of this kind will not be a sufficient ground for rescinding a contract.<sup>22</sup>

A statement of intention may also be coupled with an express statement of existing fact. Thus a statement by A that he had sold flour and would pay over the proceeds to B is a misrepresentation of fact if A had made no such sale.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>16</sup> ibid. at 482; cf. British Airways Bd v Taylor [1976] 1 W.L.R. 13; Smith Kline & French Laboratories Ltd v Long [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1; Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Malaysian Mining Corp [1989] 1 W.L.R. 379 at 396; East v Maurer [1991] 1 W.L.R. 461 at 463; Tudor Grange Holdings Ltd v Citibank N.A. [1992] Ch. 53 at 67–68; Goff v Gauthier (1991) 62 P. & C.R. 388; St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins v McConnell Dowell Contractors Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 116 at 125.

<sup>17</sup> s.20(1) and (3).

<sup>18</sup> ibid. s.20(5); The Zephyr [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 529 at 538.

<sup>19</sup> Economides v Commercial Union Assurance plc [1998] Q.B. 587 rejecting (at 599, 606) so far as contra, dicta in Highlands Insurance Co v Continental Insurance Co [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 109.

<sup>20</sup> The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 164 at 194, 205.

<sup>21</sup> See the authorities cited in n.14, above.

<sup>22</sup> Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v DTI, The Times, March 21, 1989.

<sup>23</sup> Babcock v Lawson (1880) 5 Q.B.D. 284; cf. Ismail v Polish Ocean Lines Ltd [1976] Q.B. 893: statement that goods were so packed that they would withstand the voyage; The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 (representation that property was or would be acquired without encumbrance).

4. Statements of Fact and Law<sup>24</sup>

(1) Effect of the distinction

The traditional view is that a misrepresentation of law gives rise at common law neither to a right to rescind nor to a right to damages.<sup>25</sup> In equity, too, a money claim cannot be based on a misrepresentation of law<sup>26</sup>; and the same is probably true of claims for damages under the Misrepresentation Act 1967.<sup>27</sup> It is sometimes assumed that a misrepresentation of law is not even a ground for rescission in equity.<sup>28</sup> But this is more doubtful. It has been said that wilful misrepresentation of law is ground for equitable relief.<sup>29</sup> And equity gives relief for misrepresentation as to private rights<sup>30</sup> whether or not these are rightly called misrepresentation of fact.

The distinction between representations of fact and representations of law is (as the following discussion will show) sometimes hard to draw and its effects are hard to justify.<sup>31</sup> The House of Lords has held that mistakes of law, no less than mistakes of fact, can give rise to a claim for the return of money paid under a mistake.<sup>32</sup> Such a claim is analogous to one for the return of payments made under a contract which has been rescinded for misrepresentation, so that there is now a strong case for reconsidering the effects of the distinction in the context of restitution claims based on misrepresentation. The relationship between such restitution claims and claims for damages for misrepresentation is, perhaps, more distant; but even in the context of such a claim it is arguable that a person who has acted to his prejudice in reliance on a misrepresentation of law has as strong a claim for relief as one who is entitled to restitution because he has spontaneously made a mistake of law. The rules on this topic therefore seem to be ripe for reconsideration; but until this takes place<sup>33</sup> an account must still be given of the cases which analyse the distinction on the assumption that the representee's remedies are (to say the least) more restricted where the representation is one of law than where it is one of fact.

(2) Illustrations of the distinction

(a) POWERS OF COMPANIES. A number of cases deal with the question whether a misrepresentation by a director of a company as to its powers is one of law or one of fact. In one case directors represented that they had power under the private Act incorporating the company to issue new preference shares ranking pari passu with an existing issue. This was held to be a representation of law.<sup>34</sup> But in another case directors who had

<sup>24</sup> Hudson, 1958 S.L.T. 16.

<sup>25</sup> This is implicit in the authorities discussed below which illustrate the distinction.

<sup>26</sup> See Rashdall v Ford (1866) L.R. 2 Eq. 750; Beattie v Ebury (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 777; Eaglesfield v Londonderry (1876) 4 Ch.D. 693.

<sup>27</sup> André & Cie SA v Els Michel Blanc & Fils [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 432, 434–435.

<sup>28</sup> e.g. in Wauton v Coppard [1899] 1 Ch. 92 and Mackenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] A.C. 468. But in each of these cases the representation was held to be one of fact.

<sup>29</sup> West London Commercial Bank v Kitson (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 360 at 362–363; this formulation appears to exclude the possibility of relief for negligent misrepresentation of law. For certain purposes in the law of theft, a deliberate or reckless deception as to fact or law is sufficient: Theft Act 1968, s.15(4); Theft Act 1978, s.5(1).

<sup>30</sup> See below, p.336. André & Cie SA v Els Michel Blanc & Fils, above, n.27, at 431, 432.

<sup>31</sup> See André & Cie. SA v Els Michel Blanc [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 431.

<sup>32</sup> Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 A.C. 349; below, p.1059; cf. above, p.313.

<sup>33</sup> cf. above, p.314, n.57.

<sup>34</sup> Beattie v Ebury (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 777.

power to borrow with the consent of the shareholders borrowed without such consent. It was held that they had impliedly made a representation of fact, viz., that they had obtained the shareholders' consent.<sup>35</sup>

(b) EFFECT OF A DOCUMENT. A representation as to the effect of a document may be one as to its contents or one as to its meaning. In the former case, the representation is clearly one of fact.<sup>36</sup> A representation as to the meaning of a document whose contents are known may be one of law since for many purposes the construction of a document is a question of law<sup>37</sup>; but for the present purpose it is more likely to be treated as a representation of private right, and hence as one of fact.<sup>38</sup>

(c) EFFECT OF A STATUTE. A representation as to the meaning of an Act of Parliament is clearly one of law.<sup>39</sup> The same, it is submitted, is generally true of a representation as to the contents. One nineteenth century case<sup>40</sup> gives some support to the view that a representation as to the contents of a private Act is one of fact. But it is submitted that there is no longer any ground for distinguishing between private and public Acts for this purpose<sup>41</sup>; and that a representation as to the contents of any Act of Parliament would, like a representation as to its effects, be one of law.

(d) APPLICABILITY OF A RULE OF LAW. A statement that a statute or rule of common law applies to a known state of facts may be one of fact or of law according to the circumstances. Thus a statement that the Rent Acts applied to a house which was known to be in the occupation of the Crown was a misrepresentation of law, for it involved the erroneous proposition of law that the Rent Acts bound the Crown.<sup>42</sup> But a statement that the Rent Acts did not apply to a flat because its identity was wrongly thought to have been changed by work done to it was a misrepresentation of fact.<sup>43</sup> The proposition of law involved in this statement—that the Rent Acts did not apply where the identity of the flat had changed—was accurate. The only misrepresentation was one of fact, viz., as to the change of identity.

(e) PRIVATE RIGHT. A representation as to private right is for the present purpose treated as one of fact.<sup>44</sup> Thus representations that A's shares are pledged to B, that C has

<sup>35</sup> Cherry v Colonial Bank of Australasia (1869) L.R. 3 P.C. 24; cf. Firbank's Executors v Humphreys (1886) 18 Q.B.1D. 54. Now that a company incorporated under the Companies Acts is liable, to a person dealing with it in good faith, on a contract even though it is ultra vires (below, pp.561–563), the need for a remedy for misrepresentation is less acute; but the recipient may still prefer rescission to enforcement.

<sup>36</sup> Wauton v Coppard [1889] 1 Ch. 92; cf. Carmichael v National Power plc [1999] 1 W.L.R. 2042 at 2050 (ascertainment of terms a question of fact).

<sup>37</sup> Carmichael v National Power plc, above, at 2049.

<sup>38</sup> See above, p.313; below, at n.44; Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 417; Cornish v Midland Bank plc [1985] 3 All E.R. 513; in National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 no claim based on misrepresentation was made.

<sup>39</sup> cf. National Pari-Mutuel Association v R (1930) 47 T.L.R. 110 (mistake of law).

<sup>40</sup> West London Commercial Bank v Kitson (1884) 13 Q.B.1D. 360.

<sup>41</sup> Such a distinction may formerly have been based on the lack of publicity for private Acts; but it cannot be maintained after Interpretation Act 1889, s.9 (now Interpretation Act 1978, s.3). The question whether a representation as to the contents of a subordinate law is one of "law" might similarly depend on the question whether the law has been published under the Statutory Instruments Act 1946; but there seems to be no authority on the point.

<sup>42</sup> Territorial & Auxiliary Forces Association v Nichols [1949] 1 K.B. 35; see now Rent Act 1977, s.154. cf. Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co [1904] 1 K.B. 558, below, p.493.

<sup>43</sup> Sulle v Butcher [1950] 1 K.B. 671; above, p.316.

<sup>44</sup> cf. above, p.313 André & Cie SA v Els Michel Blanc & Fils [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 431, 432.

a patent in a certain invention and that D's product embodies E's invention have all been treated as representations of fact.<sup>45</sup>

(f) STATEMENTS OF LAW AND FACT. A statement may contain a misrepresentation of law and one of fact. If so, the availability of relief seems to depend on which part of the statement provided the representee's major inducement to enter into the contract.<sup>46</sup>

Sometimes the same statement may be one of law or fact, according to the circumstances. Thus the statement that A is unmarried is one of fact if it amounts to an assertion that A had never gone through a ceremony of marriage. If it amounts to an assertion that a ceremony in which A is known to have taken part was invalid, the following distinction has been drawn by Jessel M.R.: if the person making the statement tells "the whole story and all the facts" and concludes that A is still unmarried, the statement is one of law but if he simply says that A is single, he states a fact.<sup>47</sup> But it is hard to see the force of this distinction,<sup>48</sup> unless statements of the latter kind are regarded as analogous to statements as to private rights. The fact that in such borderline cases "representations of fact shade into representations of law"<sup>49</sup> gives further support to the view that the distinction between them is hard to justify on grounds of policy.

(g) REPRESENTATION OF FOREIGN LAW. In an English court, foreign law is a matter of fact.<sup>50</sup> A representation of foreign law is therefore regarded as one of fact.<sup>51</sup>

SECTION 2. GENERAL CONDITIONS OF LIABILITY

Where a representation does not have contractual force, it will give rise to the remedies discussed in Sections 3 and 4 of this Chapter only if it is unambiguous and material and if the representee has relied on it.

1. Unambiguous

A statement may be intended by the representor to bear a meaning which is true, but be so obscure that the representee understands it in another sense, in which it is untrue. In such a case the representor is not liable if his interpretation is the correct one<sup>52</sup>; and even if the court holds that the representee's interpretation was the correct one, the representor is not guilty of fraud.<sup>53</sup> This is so in spite of the fact that the representor's interpretation was an unreasonable one, so long as he honestly believed in it.<sup>54</sup> A fortiori the representee has no remedy in deceit if the representation is ambiguous and he did not in fact understand it in a different sense from that intended by the representor.<sup>55</sup> But

<sup>45</sup> Mackenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] A.C. 468; Begbie v Phosphate Sewage Co Ltd (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 491; Lyle-Mellor v Lewis [1956] 1 W.L.R. 29; cf. Taylor's Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustee Co Ltd [1982] Q.B. 133 (note), 158.

<sup>46</sup> cf. Holt v Markham [1923] 1 K.B. 504.

<sup>47</sup> Eaglesfield v Londonderry (1876) 4 Ch.D. 693 at 702–703.

<sup>48</sup> The Court of Appeal disagreed with Jessel M.R.'s conclusion that the mistake in Eaglesfield's case was one of law; but how much of his reasoning was disapproved is not clear.

<sup>49</sup> Brikom Investments Ltd v Seaford [1981] 1 W.L.R. 863 at 869; cf. Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] Q.B. 84 at 122.

<sup>50</sup> Dicey and Morris, The Conflict of Laws, (12th ed.) Rule 18.

<sup>51</sup> André & Cie. S.A. v Els. Michel Blanc & Fils [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 431, 432.

<sup>52</sup> McInerney v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 246 at 254; contrast Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [67], where there was held to be no ambiguity in the representation.

<sup>53</sup> Akerhielm v De Mare [1959] A.C. 789; Gross v Lewis Hillman Ltd [1970] Ch. 445; and cf. below, p.394.

<sup>54</sup> Quære whether it could make him liable in negligence: do Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] A.C. 465 and s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 apply to bad drafting?

<sup>55</sup> Smith v Chadwick (1884) 9 App.Cas. 187.

it does not follow from the fact that the representor was not guilty of fraud that the representee has no remedy at all. If he reasonably understood the ambiguous statement in a sense in which the representor did not mean it, and which was untrue, he can rely on it as a defence to specific performance.<sup>56</sup>

A representor is guilty of fraud if he makes an ambiguous statement intending it to bear a meaning which is to his knowledge untrue,<sup>57</sup> and if the statement is reasonably understood in that sense by the representee. In such a case it is no defence for the representor to show that, on its true construction, the statement bore a meaning that was in fact true.<sup>58</sup>

2. Material

A misrepresentation generally has no legal effect unless it is material.<sup>59</sup> That is, it must be one which would affect the judgment of a reasonable person in deciding whether, or on what terms, to enter into the contract; or one that would induce him to enter into the contract without making such inquiries as he would otherwise make.<sup>60</sup> Thus in a contract of insurance it is material that the subject-matter has been grossly overvalued<sup>61</sup> or that a previous proposal for insuring it has been declined<sup>62</sup>; in a contract for a loan of money it is material that the lender is a notoriously ruthless money-lender<sup>63</sup>; and in an auction sale of a house it is material who owns the house "as it was, to a certain extent, a guarantee as to the character of the sale".<sup>64</sup> Conversely, a representation as to the identity of the purchaser may be material where the vendor is willing to sell to X but not to Y. In such a case the vendor can rescind if the purchaser knows that the representation is material, even though he does not know why it is so regarded by the vendor.<sup>65</sup> A misrepresentation may be material although the representor in good faith thinks that it is not material.<sup>66</sup>

There are two exceptions to the requirement of materiality. First, a person who has successfully perpetrated a fraud cannot be heard to say that the representation which he used to achieve this end was immaterial.<sup>67</sup> Secondly, every representation is material if

<sup>56</sup> New Brunswick & Canada Ry v Muggeridge (1860) 1 Dr. & Sm. 363, 382; and see below, p.394.

<sup>57</sup> Henry Ansbacher & Co Ltd v Binks Stern, The Times, June 26, 1997.

<sup>58</sup> The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293 at 318.

<sup>59</sup> McDowell v Fraser (1779) 1 Dougl. 247 at 248, per Lord Mansfield; Lonrho plc v Fayed (No.2) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1, 6; cf. (in cases of non-disclosure) below, pp.394–395.

<sup>60</sup> Truill v Baring (1864) 4 D.J. & S. 318 at 326; Dimmock v Hallett (1866) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 21 at 29, 30; Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.20(2), expressing the general law: Locker & Woolf Ltd v W. Australian Insurance Co Ltd [1936] 1 K.B. 408 at 414; Industrial Properties Ltd v A E I Ltd [1977] Q.B. 580 at 597, 601; Highland Ins Co v Continental Ins Co [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 109; Pan Atlantic Ins Co Ltd v Pine Top Ins Co Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 501; St Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co (UK) Ltd v McConnell Dowell Contractors Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 116 at 121; cf. Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495 at 503; Geest plc v Fyffes plc [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 672 at 686; The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563, at [26].

<sup>61</sup> Ionides v Pender (1874) 1 L.R. 9 Q.B. 531.

<sup>62</sup> Locker & Woolf Ltd v W. Australian Insurance Co Ltd, above, n.60.

<sup>63</sup> Gordon v Street [1899] 2 Q.B. 641.

<sup>64</sup> Whurr v Devenish (1904) 20 T.L.R. 385.

<sup>65</sup> Lonrho plc v Fayed (No.2) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1 at 5–6.

<sup>66</sup> Lindenau v Desborough (1828) 8 B. & C. 586; Joel v Law Union & Crown Insurance Co [1908] 2 K.B. 863 at 883; cf. (in criminal law) R. v Millward [1985] Q.B. 519.

<sup>67</sup> Smith v Kay (1859) 7 H.L.C. 750; cf. Gordon v Street, above, n.63; Rafsanjan Pistachio Producers Co-operative v Bank Leumi (UK) plc [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 514 at 542; Agapitos v Agnew [2002] EWCA Civ 247; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 714, at [32, 33]. Quere whether this strict rule would be applied to a negligent misrepresentation. A dictum in Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 345 at 351 applies the requirement of materiality even in a case of fraud, but is obiter since it was not there suggested that the representation was not material.

the contract so provides. Thus if a policy of insurance provides that statements by the assured in the proposal form shall be the basis of the contract, or are warranted to be true, such statements are material,<sup>68</sup> however unimportant they may be in themselves.

It has also been said that materiality was not relevant where the claim was "not for misrepresentation" but for "negligence only".<sup>69</sup> This distinction was drawn in a case in which solicitors were held liable for failure to provide accurate information to a client who, in consequence, made a mortgage loan on a security which turned out to be inadequate. What the distinction seems to mean is that the client's claim was for breach of a contractual duty of care<sup>70</sup> and not for inducing the claimant by misrepresentation to enter into a contract with the defendant; and that materiality is not relevant to a claim of the former kind. It should not be taken to mean that "misrepresentation" and "negligence" are mutually exclusive categories<sup>71</sup> or that materiality is irrelevant to claims for negligent misrepresentation inducing a contract, whether with the representor or with a third party.

The requirement of materiality has been doubted<sup>72</sup>; but in evaluating these doubts a distinction should, it is submitted, be drawn between two reasons why the misrepresentation would not affect the judgment of a reasonable person. This may be the position either because of the circumstances in which the representation was made, or because of its contents. The first possibility is illustrated by Museprime Properties Ltd v Adhill Properties Ltd,<sup>73</sup> where a purchaser by auction of commercial property was allowed to rescind for a representation by the auctioneer that higher rents could still be negotiated, when in fact the rents had been fixed for the next rent review period. The court held that it was sufficient for the purchaser to show that his bid had actually been affected by the representation: he did not have to show that a reasonable bidder would have allowed it to affect his bid. The representation could certainly have affected the value of the property and was in this sense material. The only sense in which it was not material was that the representee had (and did not take) the opportunity of discovering the truth; but even though a reasonable person might have made use of such an opportunity, it is settled that a representee's failure to do so is no bar to relief for misrepresentation.<sup>74</sup> The case is, in other words, concerned with the question whether the representee could be taken to have relied on the representation (or had been induced by it to enter it into the contract); and this is distinct from the question of materiality.<sup>75</sup> The second of the two possibilities mentioned above arises where the matter misrepresented is not "material" because it had little (or only a trivial) effect on the value of the subject-matter. What is an "immaterial" representation (in this sense) can be illustrated by supposing that the auctioneer in the Museprime case had represented the tenant to be 40 years old when actually he was 39 or 41, that this representation had (for some reason) been a factor inducing the representee's successful bid, and that its falsity had caused no, or no substantial, loss to the representee. If the representor has made such a representation in good faith it is hard to see why a representee should be entitled to any relief when,

<sup>68</sup> Andersen v Fitzgerald (1853) 4 H.L.C. 484; London Assurance v Mansel (1879) 11 Ch.D. 363 at 368; and see below, p.396. Such clauses are not affected by the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977: above, p.264; nor (semble) by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999: above, p.271.

<sup>69</sup> Bristol & West B S v Mothew [1998] Ch. 1 at 10–11.

<sup>70</sup> See below, p.890.

<sup>71</sup> See Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] A.C. 465; below p.344.

<sup>72</sup> Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (5th ed.), pp.272–273; Chitty on Contracts, (27th ed.), Vol.1, §6–022.

<sup>73</sup> [1990] 2 E.G.L.R. 196.

<sup>74</sup> See below, p.340.

<sup>75</sup> The Mercadian Continent [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563, [2001] EWCA Civ 1275 at [26].

by definition, the representation would not have influenced a reasonable person. Damages would be no more than nominal, and a claim to rescind for such a misrepresentation has been rejected as totally unmeritorious.<sup>76</sup> This conclusion could also be justified on the analogous ground that, in the example given above, the representation was “substantially correct”; and in determining whether it has this quality, the law applies the same test as that which determines whether a representation is material.<sup>77</sup>

3. Reliance

The person to whom the misrepresentation was made must have relied on it<sup>78</sup> in the sense that it must have induced him to enter into the contract.<sup>79</sup> He therefore cannot rescind, or claim damages, for misrepresentation if the representation did not come to his notice,<sup>80</sup> if he knew the truth,<sup>81</sup> if he took a deliberate risk as to the truth of the matter stated, if he would have entered into the transaction even though he had known the truth,<sup>82</sup> or if he relied on his own information.<sup>83</sup> If, however, a fraudulent representation has induced the representee to enter into the transaction, then it is no bar to a claim for damages that he would have acted in the same way even if the representation had not been made.<sup>84</sup>

(1) Truth known to agent

A person cannot get relief for misrepresentation if the truth, though not known to him, was known to his agent while acting within the scope of his authority.<sup>85</sup> But the principal

<sup>76</sup> Industrial Properties Ltd v A E I Ltd [1977] Q.B. 580; Re a Company (No.001946 of 1991) Ex p. Fin Soft Holdings S.A [1991] B.C.L.C. 737 at 748; cf. Restatement 2d. Contracts §162, Ill. 4.

<sup>77</sup> See Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.20(4); Avon Insurance plc v Swire Fraser Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 573 at 579.

<sup>78</sup> Pan Atlantic Insurance Co Ltd v Pine Top Insurance Co Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 501; Skipskreditsforeningen v Emperor Navigation [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 67 at 73; J. Jarvis & Sons Ltd v Castle Wharf Developments Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 19; [2001] Lloyd's Rep. P.N., at [62, 68]. Our concern in this Chapter is with representations inducing contracts. There is no requirement of reliance by the injured party where the misrepresentation is made about that party, so that he suffers loss as a result of the act or omission of a third party, as in Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1995] 2 A.C. 296.

<sup>79</sup> Pan Atlantic Insurance Co Ltd v Pine Top Insurance Co Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 501; Avon Insurance plc v Swire Fraser Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 573 at 633; cf. Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [68–72]. In Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426 at 433. Hobhouse L.J. puzzlingly says that “reliance is not the correct criterion” (apparently of inducement) in “the tort of deceit” but later on the same page when dealing with “the tort of negligence”, he states the test as one of “reliance”. This distinction is accepted in Bristol and West BS v Mothem [1996] 4 All E.R. 698 at 705, where the test in a negligence case is said to be “not inducement but reliance”; for the view that the claim in that case was “not for misrepresentation”, see above, p.317 at n.69; cf. also Swindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All E.R. 705 at 727 (stating the test of “inducement” in deceit).

<sup>80</sup> Ex p. Biggs (1859) 28 L.J.Ch. 50.

<sup>81</sup> Eurocopy v Teesdale [1992] B.C.L.C. 1067.

<sup>82</sup> J E B Fasteners Ltd v Marks Bloom & Co [1983] 1 All E.R. 583 (as to which see below, p.343); The Lucy [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 188; cf. Beaumont v Humberts [1988] 2 E.G.L.R. 171. Chase Manhattan Equities Ltd v Goodman [1991] B.C.L.C. 897 at 930 (as to which see also below, p.488).

<sup>83</sup> Jennings v Broughton (1854) 5 D.M. & G. 126; cf. Cooper v Tamms [1988] 1 E.G.L.R. 257; The Morning Watch [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 547 at 556; Goodwill v Pregnancy Advisory Service [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1397, below, p.617 (claimant relying on own doctor's advice); Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [29].

<sup>84</sup> UCB Corporate Services Ltd v Williams [2002] EWCA Civ 555, The Times, May 5, 2002.

<sup>85</sup> Banden v London Assurance [1892] 2 Q.B. 534; Strover v Harrington [1988] Ch. 390; contrast El Ajou v Dollar Holdings plc [1994] 2 All E.R. 685 at 689, 702–705.

may get such relief if the agent found out the truth while acting for the other party,<sup>86</sup> or in fraud of the principal,<sup>87</sup> or in any way outside the scope of his authority.

(2) Testing accuracy

A person who himself tests the accuracy of the representation can be said to rely on his own judgment, rather than on the representation. Accordingly, he cannot obtain relief for innocent<sup>88</sup> (or probably for negligent<sup>89</sup>) misrepresentation. But this rule does not apply in cases of fraud. In S. Pearson & Son Ltd v Dublin Corporation<sup>90</sup> the claimants undertook to execute works for the corporation on the faith of plans supplied by it. The contract provided that the claimants should satisfy themselves of the accuracy of the plans.<sup>91</sup> It was held that this provision would not protect the corporation if the plans were fraudulent. It is not clear what steps, if any, the claimants took to test the accuracy of the plans. But it is submitted that if, in spite of taking some such steps, they had failed to discover the truth, the corporation should still have been liable on proof of fraud.

(3) Opportunity to find out the truth

A person may be entitled to relief even though he had, but did not take, the opportunity to test the accuracy of the representation.<sup>92</sup> This rule is most frequently applied to cases of fraud,<sup>93</sup> but Smith v Eric S Bush<sup>94</sup> shows that it can also apply where the misrepresentation was negligent. The claimants in that case had bought a house with the aid of a mortgage, relying on a valuation which had been negligently conducted by a surveyor engaged by the lender. Their claim against the surveyor succeeded in spite of the fact that they might have discovered the truth if they had conducted their own independent survey; for it was neither reasonable to expect them to take this step, nor likely that they would do so, since the house in question was one of modest value. But the House of Lords indicated<sup>95</sup> that the position might be different on the purchase of commercial or industrial premises, or even of residential property of high value. The principle appears to be that failure to make use of an opportunity to discover the truth

<sup>86</sup> Newsholme v Road Transport Insurance Co Ltd [1929] 2 K.B. 356; The Hellespont Ardent [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 547 at 596.

<sup>87</sup> Wells v Smith [1914] 3 K.B. 722; Group Josi Re v Wallbrook Insurance Co Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1152.

<sup>88</sup> Clarke v Mackintosh (1862) 4 Giff. 134; Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1, 14, discussing Attwood v Small (1838) 6 Cl. & F. 232.

<sup>89</sup> McInerney v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 246 at 254.

<sup>90</sup> [1907] A.C. 351.

<sup>91</sup> For such provisions, see below, p.385.

<sup>92</sup> Dobell v Stevens (1825) 3 B. & C. 623; Reynell v Sprye (1852) 1 D.M. & G. 660; Central Ry of Venezuela v Kisch (1867) L.R. 2 H.L. 99; Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1; Smith v Land & House Property Corporation (1884) 28 Ch.D. 7; Aaron's Reefs Ltd v Twiss [1896] A.C. 273; cf. The Arta [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 534; Rignal Developments Ltd v Halil [1988] Ch. 190 at 199, aliter, if a person reads a document revealing the truth, but simply fails to understand it: Ex p. Briggs (1866) L.R. 1 Eq. 483.

<sup>93</sup> e.g. Gordon v Selico Ltd (1986) 278 E.G. 53 at 61; Strover v Harrington [1988] Ch. 390 at 410; cf. Commission for the New Towns v Cooper (Great Britain) Ltd [1995] Ch. 259 at 282. Horsfall v Thomas (1862) 1 H. & C. 90, so far as contra, was doubted in Smith v Hughes (1871) L.R. 6 Q.B. 597 at 605; Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] EWCA Civ 55; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 55 at [52].

<sup>94</sup> [1990] 1 A.C. 831; Allen, 105 L.Q.R. 511; Horton Rogers [1989] C.L.J. 366; cf. Halifax B S v Edell [1992] Ch. 426 at 454.

<sup>95</sup> cf. pp.854, 872 (dealing with the issue of reasonableness under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977); Kijowski v New Capital Properties (1990) 15 Con.L.R. 1; McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners [1996] E.G.L.R. 35.

may defeat a claim for negligent misrepresentation where, but only where, it is reasonable to expect the representee to make use of the opportunity. An express warning to the representee not to rely on the representation could also negate liability for negligent misrepresentation.<sup>96</sup>

In Redgrave v Hurd,<sup>97</sup> it was held that an opportunity to discover the truth was no bar to relief even where the misrepresentation was innocent. In that case, a person was induced to buy a solicitor's practice and house by an innocent misrepresentation as to the value of the practice. He was allowed to rescind even though he had the opportunity of examining the accounts of the practice and so discovering the truth. It should, however, be noted that, when Redgrave v Hurd was decided, all misrepresentations which were not fraudulent were described as "innocent".<sup>98</sup> Now, the law distinguishes between negligent and wholly innocent misrepresentations<sup>99</sup>; and it further distinguishes between cases in which it was, and those in which it was not, reasonable for the representee to make use of an opportunity to discover the truth.<sup>1</sup> Where it is reasonable to expect the representee to make use of such an opportunity, and he fails to do so, the reasoning of Smith v Eric S Bush<sup>2</sup> indicates that a claim based on negligent misrepresentation will fail; and the position should, a fortiori, be the same where the misrepresentation is wholly innocent.<sup>3</sup> To this extent, it is submitted that the rule in Redgrave v Hurd no longer applies.<sup>4</sup> Where it is not reasonable to expect the representee to make use of the opportunity to discover the truth, and he fails to do so, the actual decision in Smith v Eric S Bush shows that a claim based on negligent misrepresentation can nevertheless succeed; but it is less clear whether the same result should follow where the misrepresentation was wholly innocent, so that both parties were equally innocent. Redgrave v Hurd stands as an authority for the proposition that, in the case last put, failure to make use of the opportunity to discover the truth is no bar to relief. It can be supported on the ground that there is actual, and reasonable, reliance on the misrepresentation in such a case.

(4) Representation addressed to another

A person may rely on a representation even though it was not made directly to him: e.g. where A makes a misrepresentation to B which later comes to the notice of C and

<sup>96</sup> Hemmens v Wilson Browne [1993] 4 All E.R. 826 at 839; McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners, above. Such reasoning can also prevent a representation from being included in the contract as one of its terms: below, pp.353–354.

<sup>97</sup> (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1; Laurence v Lexcourt Holdings Ltd [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1128.

<sup>98</sup> Now that damages can be recovered for negligent misrepresentation the carelessness of the representee may be a ground for reducing the damages under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 (below, p.668): this possibility was recognised in Gran Gelato Ltd v Richcliff (Group) Ltd [1992] Ch. 560 at 573–574, where, however, the court refused to exercise its discretion under the 1945 Act. This Act would not apply where the misrepresentation was fraudulent: Alliance & Leicester BS v Edgestrop [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1462; KCB Bank v Industrial Steels (UK) Ltd [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370 at 377; Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co [2002] UKHL 43, [2003] 1 All E.R. 173; cf. Corporacion Nacional del Cobre de Chile v Sojemin Metah Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1369. Nor would the 1945 Act affect a right to rescind for misrepresentation.

<sup>99</sup> See below, pp.350–351, 357.

<sup>1</sup> See above at n.88.

<sup>2</sup> ibid.

<sup>3</sup> cf. McInerney v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 246 at 254 and The Nai Genova [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 353 at 365 (where the claimant's carelessness prevented him from relying on an estoppel).

<sup>4</sup> cf. Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 416 (doubting Redgrave v Hurd on another point).

induces C to contract with A. If A intended to bring about this result he is liable to C.<sup>5</sup>

A representation made by A to B may also make A liable to C where it was reasonable for A to anticipate that the representation would be passed on to C and that C would act on it in some way other than by entering into a contract with A.<sup>6</sup> This possibility is illustrated by cases such as Smith v Eric S Bush,<sup>7</sup> where a representation in a report as to the value or condition of a house was made by A to B, was then passed on by B to C, and induced C to buy the house from X. Where the contract induced by the misrepresentation is not made between A and C, it may be difficult to determine whether A owed any duty of care to C. This question is discussed later in this Chapter<sup>8</sup>; the present point is simply that the requirement of reliance on the representation may be satisfied even though the representation is not made directly by the representor to the representee.

Where A by misrepresentation induces B to buy something from him, he will not be liable to C merely because B repeats the misrepresentation when later reselling the subject-matter to C. In one such case it was held that the misrepresentation was “spent”<sup>9</sup> when the contract was made between A and B, so that C could not rely on it against A. He might, however, be able to do so if he could show that A knew that B intended to resell and was likely to repeat the misrepresentation on the occasion of the sale to C.<sup>10</sup>

(5) Other inducements

A person who relies on a misrepresentation can get relief although he also relied on other inducements. Thus in Edgington v Fitzmaurice<sup>11</sup> a lender was induced to lend money to a company by (i) the misrepresentations which have already been discussed,<sup>12</sup> and (ii) his mistaken belief that he would have a charge on the assets of the company. He was entitled to damages for deceit<sup>13</sup> even though he admitted that he would not have lent the money,

<sup>5</sup> Pilmore v Hood (1838) 5 Bing.N.C. 97; cf. Langridge v Levy (1837) 2 M. & W. 519; Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] Q.B. 467 at 485; Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 365 at 378 (as to which see above, n.98); Possfund Custodian Trustees Ltd v Diamond [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1351. Contrast Peek v Gurney (1873) L.R. 6. H.L. 377 (but see Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.90 and 86); and, in another context, R. v Jockey Club, Ex p. R A M Racecourses Ltd [1993] 2 All E.R. 225 at 228–239.

<sup>6</sup> But not in the absence of such circumstances: The Zephyr [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 529 at 539 (and see below, p.608); Bank Leumi Le Israel B M v British National Insurance Co [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 71 at 77; cf. Beaumont v Humberts [1988] 2 E.G.L.R. 171; Goodwill v National Pregnancy Advisory Service [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1397.

<sup>7</sup> [1990] 1 A.C. 831; Yianni v Edwin Evans & Sons [1982] Q.B. 438.

<sup>8</sup> See above, pp.345 et seq.

<sup>9</sup> Gross v Lewis Hillman Ltd [1970] Ch. 445 at 461.

<sup>10</sup> ibid. cf. The Sennar (No.2) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 490. cf. Clef Aquitaine S.A.R.L. v Laporte Materials (Barrow) Ltd [2001] Q.B. 485, where the subject-matter was transferred by B to C by novation. A was a necessary party to this transaction (below, p.673) and knew that his representation would be passed on by B to C, those entities being under the same control.

<sup>11</sup> (1885) 29 Ch.D. 459; The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293 at 324; Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 417 at 422; KCB Bank v Industrial Steels (UK) Ltd [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370 at 377; BP Operating Co Ltd v Chevron Transport (Scotland) [2001] UKHL 50; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 1 at [105]; Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [70]; UCB Corporate Services Ltd v Williams [2002] EWCA Civ 555; The Times, May 27, 2002; cf. (in cases of duress) Barton v Armstrong [1976] A.C. 104; St Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co (UK) Ltd v McConnell Dowell Contractors Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 116 at 125; and above, p.109.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.331.

<sup>13</sup> See Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co [2002] UKHL 43, [2003] 1 All E.R. 173 at [17] for the view that the rule is “probably restricted” to cases of fraud.

had he not held this mistaken belief. The victim of a fraud can likewise recover damages in respect of his full loss even though that loss was caused partly by the deceit and partly by his own decision (not based on any mistaken belief by him) to take the course of action which led to his suffering the loss.<sup>14</sup> This rule has been applied even where the victim's motive for taking this course of action was his wish to deceive a third party.<sup>15</sup> It is an open question whether, in such a case, the loss so suffered should be apportioned between the victim and the original perpetrator of the fraud.<sup>16</sup>

But if a person to whom two statements, one true and one untrue, are made relies exclusively on the true one, he has no right to relief. Thus in Heilbut, Symons & Co v Buckleton<sup>17</sup> a person bought shares in a company after being told (i) that it was a rubber company (which was untrue), and (ii) that the defendants were "bringing it out" (which was true). One reason given by Lord Atkinson for dismissing the buyer's claim for damages was that he had relied on the second statement to the exclusion of the first.

(6) Distinguished from materiality

The rule that the representee must rely on the representation is distinct from the requirement of materiality. Whether a representation is material depends, in general,<sup>18</sup> on the significance which a reasonable person would have attached to it. Whether the representee has relied on the representation depends on his actual state of mind. The mere fact that a representation is material gives rise to no "inference of law" that the representation was relied on.<sup>19</sup> For example, in JEB Fasteners Ltd v Marks Bloom & Co<sup>20</sup> the plaintiffs took over a company after seeing its accounts, which were inaccurate, having been negligently prepared by the defendants (a firm of accountants). A duty of care seems to have arisen because the accounts had been "impliedly confirmed directly to the plaintiff . . . with a particular transaction in contemplation",<sup>21</sup> and the misrepresentation was clearly material; but the plaintiffs' claim for damages was dismissed as they had placed no reliance on the accounts. Their object in taking over the company was to secure the services of two of its directors and they would have proceeded with the transaction even if the accounts had shown the company's true financial state. The distinction between the two requirements of materiality and reliance is further supported by the rule that the representee must show, not only that the representation was material, but also that it induced him to enter into the contract.<sup>22</sup>

The distinction is sometimes obscured by the use of the word "material" to mean "material to the representee". Thus in Smith v Chadwick<sup>23</sup> the representee bought shares in a company on the faith of a prospectus which contained the untrue statement that one Grieve was a director of the company. The representee's claim for damages was dismissed: the statement was "immaterial" as the representee had never heard of Grieve. It is more accurate to say that for this reason the representee did not rely on the

<sup>14</sup> Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.2) [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218, reversed on another point [2002] UKHL 43 [2003] 1 All E.R. 173.

<sup>15</sup> ibid.

<sup>16</sup> [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218 at 230, 236.

<sup>17</sup> [1913] A.C. 30; above, p.162.

<sup>18</sup> See above, p.337.

<sup>19</sup> Smith v Land & House Property Corp (1884) 28 Ch.D. 7 at 16.

<sup>20</sup> [1983] 1 All E.R. 583, affirming [1981] 3 All E.R. 289. The question whether the defendants owed any duty to the plaintiffs was only discussed at first instance; on this point see below, p.347.

<sup>21</sup> Al Saudi Banque v Clark Poxley [1990] Ch. 313 at 335.

<sup>22</sup> Pan Atlantic Ins Co Ltd v Pine Top Ins Co Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 501, disapproving Container Transport International v Oceanus Mutual, etc., Insurance [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 476 on this point.

<sup>23</sup> (1884) 9 App.Cas. 187.

statement, which was clearly material in the sense that it could influence a reasonable person.

(7) Burden of proof

For the purpose of the requirement of reliance, the representee need only show that the representation was made and that it was capable of inducing the contract. The burden then passes to the representor to show that the representee would have entered into the contract anyway, even if the misrepresentation had not been made.<sup>24</sup>

SECTION 3. DAMAGES FOR MISREPRESENTATION<sup>25</sup>

In this Section, we shall discuss the five grounds on which damages can be recovered for misrepresentation, consider the relationship between them; and refer, in the context of misrepresentation, to the power of criminal courts to make compensation orders in criminal cases.

1. Fraud

At common law a person who suffers loss as a result of acting in reliance on a fraudulent statement can recover damages in an action of deceit. He can generally do this whether he rescinds the contract or not<sup>26</sup> though he cannot pursue both remedies if this results in his recovering twice over for the same loss.<sup>27</sup>

In Derry v Peek<sup>28</sup> the House of Lords held that a statement is fraudulent only if made (i) with knowledge of its falsity, or (ii) without belief in its truth, or (iii) recklessly,<sup>29</sup> not caring whether it is true or false. Fraud is a serious charge which must be clearly and distinctly proved.<sup>30</sup> A person who negligently makes a false statement will now often be liable in damages, but it may still be important that he is not guilty of fraud at common law. One reason for this is that the damages for fraud may not be the same as damages for negligence.<sup>31</sup> Another is that certain special rules may apply to rescission for fraud.<sup>32</sup>

A statement may be fraudulent although it was made without bad motive and without intention to cause loss: an "intention to deceive" suffices even though there is no

<sup>24</sup> Smith v Chadwick (1884) 9 App.Cas. 187 at 196.

<sup>25</sup> Greig, 87 L.Q.R. 179.

<sup>26</sup> Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch.D. 582 at 592; Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 415; Tang Man Sit v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] A.C. 514 at 521. cf. Companies Act 1985, s.111A (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.131) overriding the former rule in Houldsworth v City of Glasgow Bank (1880) 5 App.Cas. 317 "at least in part": Soden v British & Commonwealth Holdings plc [1998] A.C. 298 at 327.

<sup>27</sup> Archer v Brown, above, at 415.

<sup>28</sup> (1889) 14 App.Cas. 337 (actual decision was reversed by the Directors Liability Act 1890; see now Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.90, 86); Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp (No.2) [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218; and see n.33, below.

<sup>29</sup> Recklessness goes beyond mere carelessness: see Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 587; the statement made ibid. that "dishonesty" is a requirement of fraud, must be read subject to the qualification discussed at nn.33 and 34, below.

<sup>30</sup> Wallington v Mutual Society (1880) 5 App.Cas. 685; for the standard of proof of fraud in civil cases, see Hornal v Neuberger Products [1957] 1 Q.B. 267; Rafsanjan Pistachio Producers Co-operative v Bank Leumi plc [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 513 at 525 ("very heavy burden"); Nsuga v Commercial Union Co plc [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 682 at 686, 690; The Grecia Express [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 88 at 98.

<sup>31</sup> See below, p.362.

<sup>32</sup> See below, pp.372–373, 379, 384; cf. p.358.

“intention to defraud”.<sup>33</sup> Thus in Polhill v Walter<sup>34</sup> an agent purported to accept a bill of exchange on behalf of his principal, knowing that he had no authority to do so but believing that his principal would ratify. He was held liable in deceit. This case should be contrasted with Angus v Clifford.<sup>35</sup> The directors of a company which had bought a gold mine issued a prospectus containing extracts from an engineer’s report said to have been “prepared for the directors”. It had in fact been prepared for the sellers of the mine. The directors knew this, but were held not liable for fraud as they did not at the time of issuing the prospectus appreciate the importance of the words “prepared for the directors”. Thus it seems that a person is not guilty of fraud if he knows that his statement is false but does not appreciate its materiality.

Responsibility for a statement may be divided between principal and agent or between several agents of the same principal. If an agent within the scope of his authority makes a statement which he knows to be false, the principal is liable for the fraud of the agent<sup>36</sup>; the agent is also liable for his own fraud.<sup>37</sup> If the agent who made the statement did not know that it was false, but the principal, or another agent did know this, the principal is in general not liable for fraud.<sup>38</sup> The mens rea required for fraud cannot be established by adding together the states of mind of several persons, each of whom is innocent. But if the principal or the second agent stood by, knowing that the representation was being made and that it was false, the principal would be guilty of fraud or liable for the fraud of the second agent.<sup>39</sup> In such a case the principal or second agent has mens rea, though he made no representation. The same rule should apply where the representation is innocently made by the principal, and the agent, acting within his authority, stands by knowing that the representation is going to be made and that it is false.

2. Negligence at Common Law

(1) Duty of care

A misrepresentation is negligent if it is made carelessly and in breach of a duty owed by the representor to the representee to take reasonable care that the representation is accurate. It used to be thought that such a duty could arise only where the relationship between representor and representee arose out of a pre-existing contract between them, or where it was “fiduciary”.<sup>40</sup> But this narrow view was rejected in Hedley Byrne & Co

<sup>33</sup> Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Corp [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 365 at 375; see further [1998] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 656; Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.2) [2000] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 218 at 221, 224 (reversed on another point [2002] UKHL 43, [2003] 1 All E.R. 173); KCB Bank v Industrial Steels (UK) Ltd [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 370 at 374. “Dishonesty” seems to be used to mean no more than “intention to deceive” in Armitage v Nurse [1998] Ch. 241 at 251.

<sup>34</sup> (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 114; cf. Foster v Charles (1830) 6 Bing. 396; Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch.D. 459 at 481; Watts v Spence [1976] Ch. 165 at 176 (where fraud was not alleged).

<sup>35</sup> [1891] 2 Ch. 449.

<sup>36</sup> S. Pearson & Son Ltd v Dublin Corporation [1907] A.C. 351; Briess v Woolley [1954] A.C. 333; cf. Rignal Developments Ltd v Halil [1988] Ch. 190 at 198.

<sup>37</sup> Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co [2002] UKHL 43, [2003] 1 All E.R. 173; Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2002] EWHC 1425; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 701 at [53].

<sup>38</sup> Cornfoot v Fowke (1840) 6 M. & W. 358; Gordon Hill Trust Ltd v Segall [1941] 2 All E.R. 379; Armstrong v Strain [1952] 1 K.B. 232; Devlin, 53 L.Q.R. 344; Gower, 15 M.L.R. 232. For liability in negligence, see below.

<sup>39</sup> London County Freehold v Berkeley Property Co Ltd [1936] 2 All E.R. 1039; The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 293 at 321.

<sup>40</sup> Nocton v Ashburton [1914] A.C. 932.

Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd.<sup>41</sup> The claimants in that case suffered loss as a result of having given credit to a firm called Easipower Ltd, in reliance on a reference carelessly given by Easipower's bank, who knew of the purpose for which the reference was required. The actual decision was that the bank was not liable because the reference had been given "without responsibility".<sup>42</sup> But the House of Lords made it clear that, had there been no such disclaimer, the bank would have owed to the claimants a duty to take reasonable care in the making of the statements contained in the reference.

(2) Relationships giving rise to the duty

(a) SPECIAL RELATIONSHIPS. A duty of the kind just described can arise at common law if there is a "special relationship" between the parties. The crucial question, therefore, is when such a relationship will come into existence; and two at first sight divergent approaches to this question are taken by the authorities.

(i) The "threefold test". Under this test, there is a "special relationship" when three conditions are satisfied: it must be reasonably foreseeable by the representor that the representee will rely on the statement; there must be sufficient "proximity" between the parties; and it must be just and reasonable for the law to impose the duty.<sup>43</sup> It is obvious that these requirements are closely related, so much so that it has been said that they are "at least in most cases, merely facets of the same thing".<sup>44</sup> In the context of misrepresentation, foreseeable reliance by the representee on the representor's statement or advice is the single most important requirement of the special relationship.<sup>45</sup> But while it is a necessary condition of liability in tort for misrepresentation inducing a contract,<sup>46</sup> it is not a sufficient one. Thus a purely social relationship will not normally suffice to give rise to a duty, so that no action normally lies at common law where a person suffers loss as a result of acting on careless friendly advice,<sup>47</sup> even if it is given by a professional person.<sup>48</sup> In such a case, it would not normally be just and reasonable to impose a duty. This would also be true where the representor had expressly warned the representee not to rely on his representation but to seek independent advice.<sup>49</sup>

On the other hand, there was a "special relationship" between the claimants and the bank in Hedley Byrne's case,<sup>50</sup> and it is clear from dicta in that case, from earlier

<sup>41</sup> [1964] A.C. 465; cf. White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 274; Stevens, 27 M.L.R. 121; Payne, 6 Univ. of W. Australia L. Rev. 467; Honoré, 8 J.S.P.T.L. 284; Craig, 92 L.Q.R. 213.

<sup>42</sup> Such a provision would now be subject to the requirement of reasonableness by virtue of Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, ss.2(1) and 13(1); see Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 875-876; cf. McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners Ltd [1996] 1 E.G.L.R. 35; above, p.248. The Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 would not have applied to the disclaimer in the Hedley Byrne case as these Regulations apply only to contract terms in consumer cases (above, p.267).

<sup>43</sup> Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 865; Al Saudi Banque v Clark Pixley [1990] Ch. 313; Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 617-618; cf. Yuen Kun Yeu v Attorney-General of Hong Kong [1988] A.C. 175; Davies v Radcliffe [1990] 1 W.L.R. 821; T v Surrey CC [1994] 4 All E.R. 577; Law Society v KPMG Peat Marwick [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1921.

<sup>44</sup> Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 632.

<sup>45</sup> Murphy v Brentwood D C [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 480, 486-487.

<sup>46</sup> Though not of liability for negligence arising in other ways: see White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 268, 275; Spring v Guardian Royal Insurance plc [1995] 2 A.C. 296 at 344.

<sup>47</sup> [1964] A.C. 465 at 482; see ibid. p.531 for possible exceptions. In Chaudhry v Prabakar [1989] 1 W.L.R. 29 (above, p.144) the existence of a duty was conceded; this concession was approved by two members of the Court, who, however, also recognised (at 36 and 34) that advice given in "family, domestic or social relationships" would not normally be actionable.

<sup>48</sup> Mutual Life and Citizens' Assurance Co Ltd v Evans [1971] A.C. 793 at 806.

<sup>49</sup> Hemmens v Wilson Browne [1993] 4 All E.R. 826 at 839. But such a warning would not exclude liability for fraud: see above, p.339.

<sup>50</sup> [1964] A.C. 465 at 494, 502, 538, 539.

decisions which were overruled<sup>51</sup> or rehabilitated<sup>52</sup> by it, and from later cases, that a duty of care will often arise where the representor makes the representation while acting in some professional capacity. If he makes the representation to his own client, his duty of care with respect to its accuracy will generally be imposed by his contract with that client,<sup>53</sup> though a duty of care imposed by the general law (and giving rise to liability in tort) may exist side by side with such a contractual duty.<sup>54</sup> The more important point to be made here is that such a duty of care may also arise under the law of tort even though there is no contract between representor and representee. Thus the duty may be owed by accountants,<sup>55</sup> surveyors and valuers<sup>56</sup> even to persons other than their immediate clients who rely on their statements, where the conditions (stated above) which give rise to a duty of care are satisfied. A duty is more likely to arise in cases of this kind where the statement was made for the purpose of the transaction which it induced than where it was not so made. There was accordingly sufficient proximity between a surveyor and the prospective purchaser of a house, where the surveyor had been commissioned by a building society to report on the value of that house, knowing that his report would be passed on to the purchaser, where it was so passed on, and the house was bought in reliance on it.<sup>57</sup> Similarly, an accountant's report on the financial state of a company can give rise to liability to an intending lender to, or investor in, the company if it was made for the purpose of providing such a person with the information on which his decision whether to make the loan or investment is likely to be, and is in fact, based.<sup>58</sup> But the position is different where auditors are appointed by a company to enable the company to perform its statutory obligation to produce audited annual accounts. In such a case there is no sufficient proximity between those auditors and prospective lenders to, or investors in, the company, or even between the auditors and shareholders in the company

<sup>51</sup> Candler v Crane, Christmas & Co [1951] 2 K.B. 164.

<sup>52</sup> Cann v Willson (1883) 39 Ch.D. 39.

<sup>53</sup> See below, p.840.

<sup>54</sup> cf. Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145; and see below, pp.608, 986. This case was one of liability, not for negligent statements, but for negligently rendered services: below, p.348.

<sup>55</sup> See the overruling in Hedley Byrne's case, above, of Candler v Crane, Christmas & Co, above.

<sup>56</sup> Yianni v Edwin Evans & Son [1982] Q.B. 438; Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831; above, pp.339-340. For the personal liability of an employee of a firm of surveyors, see Merrett v Babb [2001] EWCA Civ 214; [2001] Q.B. 1174. For the liability in negligence of architects and valuers issuing certificates on which their clients pay, see Sutcliffe v Thackrah [1974] A.C. 727; Campbell v Edwards [1976] 1 W.L.R. 403; Arenson v Arenson [1977] A.C. 405. For similar liability of auditors, cf. Burgess v Purchase & Sons Ltd [1983] Ch. 216.

<sup>57</sup> e.g. Yianni v Edwin Evans and Sons [1982] Q.B. 438; Davies v Parry (1988) 20 H.L.R. 452; Roberts v J Hampson & Co [1990] 1 W.L.R. 94; Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831, (where Yianni's case is cited with approval at 852-853, 864, 875); contrast Beaumont v Humberts [1990] 2 E.G.L.R. 166.

<sup>58</sup> See n.55, above, J E B Fasteners Ltd v Marks Bloom & Co [1981] 3 All E.R. 583 (affirmed [1983] 1 All E.R. 583 on other grounds) is now explicable (if at all) only on the ground stated at p.342, above; cf. J Jarvis & Sons Ltd v Castle Wharf Developments Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 19, [2001] Lloyd's P.N. 308 at [53] (duty owed by member of property developer's professional team to building contractor, but claim failed for want of reliance); Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605, 625, 647-648; Morgan Crucible Co plc v Hill Samuel Bank Ltd [1991] 1 All E.R. 148; Barings plc v Coopers & Lybrand [1997] 1 B.C.L.C. 427; Bank of Credit and Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd v Price Waterhouse, The Times, March 4, 1998; Law Society v KPMG Peat Marwick [2000] 1 W.L.R. 921: auditors engaged by a firm of solicitors held to owe a duty of care to the Law Society (as trustee of its compensation fund) in respect of reports by statute to be sent to the Society and to be in breach of that duty in consequence of their failure to draw attention to the solicitors' failure to comply with the Society's account rules. Contrast James McNaughton Paper Group v Hicks Anderson & Co [1991] 1 All E.R. 134, where the circumstances in which the report was prepared negated the duty; Anthony v Wright [1996] 1 B.C.L.C. 238 (auditor owing no such duty to a person who had invested money in the company).

who, in reliance on the accounts, buy additional shares.<sup>59</sup> The reason why no duty is owed to these persons is that the audited accounts are produced simply for the purpose of satisfying the statutory obligation described above, and not to induce the transactions in question. The same principle may limit the scope of the duty to the particular transaction for the purpose of which the statement was made. Thus where auditors employed by a company produced accounts which, as they knew, were to determine the price at which the claimants were to acquire a substantial shareholding in the company, the auditors were held to owe a duty to the claimants in respect of that purchase but not in respect of loans of money made to the company nor in respect of a further purchase of shares in the company made by the claimants over three years after the original transaction.<sup>60</sup>

(ii) “Assumption of responsibility”. In many of the relationships described above, the representor can be said to have voluntarily assumed responsibility, in the sense of having undertaken (though not contracted) to exercise care with regard to the accuracy of the representation. This factor of assumption of responsibility was referred to in Hedley Byrne’s case<sup>61</sup> and is mentioned in a number of later cases as an ingredient of liability for negligent misrepresentation at common law.<sup>62</sup> Such references to assumption of responsibility are found also in cases in which liability in tort for economic loss was alleged to have arisen, not from negligent misrepresentation inducing the representee to enter into a contract, but in some other way: e.g. from the negligent performance of services,<sup>63</sup> or from negligently making a false statement about (rather than to) the person who suffers loss in consequence of its falsity.<sup>64</sup> Cases of this kind have been said to fall “within the extended Hedley Byrne principle”,<sup>65</sup> and in them “assumption of responsibility” is both a necessary,<sup>66</sup> and (it seems) normally<sup>67</sup> a sufficient, condition of liability, displacing the

<sup>59</sup> e.g. Al Saudi Banque v Clark Pixley [1990] Ch. 313; Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605; Fleming, 106 L.Q.R. 349; Esanda Finance Corp Ltd v Peat Marwick Hungerford (Reg) [2000] Lloyd’s P.N. 684 (High Court of Australia); cf. Huxford v Stoy Hayward & Co (1989) 5 B.C.C. 421 (auditors called in by company’s bank held to owe no duty to shareholders); The Morning Watch [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 547 (no duty owed to buyer of a yacht in respect of certificate issued by Lloyd’s); Berg Sons & Co Ltd v Adams [1993] B.C.L.C. 1045; The Sundancer [1994] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 183; Peach Publishing Ltd v Slater & Co [1997] C.L.Y. 3 (purchaser advised by own solicitors and accountants); cf. Abbott v Strong, The Times, July 9, 1998 (no duty owed in respect of statements not known by plaintiff to have been made by defendant). Contrast Law Society v KPMG Peat Marwick, above, n.58, where the duty was owed to, and the loss suffered by, the very body to which the defendants’ report was, by the statute, required to be made.

<sup>60</sup> Galoo Ltd v Bright Grahame Murray [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1360. cf., in relation to false statements in a company prospectus, Al Nabih Investments (Jersey) Ltd v Longcroft [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1390; contrast Possfund Custodian Trustees Ltd v Diamond [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1351, where it was arguable such statements were intended to induce “after-market” purchases. These cases concerned common law liability, as opposed to liability under the statutory provisions now contained in Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.90 and 86.

<sup>61</sup> [1964] A.C. 494 at 529. The test of such assumption of responsibility is objective: Electra Private Equity Partners v KPMG Peat Marwick [1999] Lloyd’s Rep. P.N. 670.

<sup>62</sup> Yuen Kun-yeu v Attorney-General of Hong Kong [1988] A.C. 175 at 196; Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758 at 784; Chaudhry v Prabakar [1989] 1 W.L.R. 29 at 34; Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 570, 636; First National Commercial Bank v Loxleys, The Times, November 14, 1996.

<sup>63</sup> Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 180, 181, 205; White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 256, 268–269; cf. ibid. 273 (“assumption of responsibility for the task”). The former immunity of advocates from liability for negligence in the conduct of litigation no longer exists: see Arthur J S Hall & Co v Simons [2002] 1 A.C. 615.

<sup>64</sup> Spring v Guardian Insurance plc [1995] 2 A.C. 296 at 324.

<sup>65</sup> Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 1 W.L.R. 830 at 835.

<sup>66</sup> Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd, above.

<sup>67</sup> i.e. unless displaced by contractual arrangements between the parties: below p.608. cf. Sumitomo Bank Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 487, treating “assumption of responsibility” as one basis of liability.

“threefold” test, so that this test need not be satisfied where there is such an assumption.<sup>68</sup> But opinion is divided as to the significance of “assumption of responsibility” in cases of the kind with which we are here concerned, that is, in cases of liability for alleged negligent misrepresentation inducing contracts and so causing loss to the representee.

One view is that the reference to such an assumption in Hedley Byrne’s<sup>69</sup> case and in later cases<sup>70</sup> makes it an essential ingredient of liability for negligent misrepresentation<sup>71</sup>; but this view makes it hard to explain the fact that the “threefold test” (which is said to be displaced where there is an assumption of responsibility)<sup>72</sup> has been applied and developed precisely in a number of such cases.<sup>73</sup> A second view is that references to assumption of responsibility in some of the misrepresentation cases are merely descriptive of the relationships which have been held to give rise to the duty of care in them. Some of the misrepresentation cases can be reconciled with the first of these views only by a process of ex post facto rationalisation<sup>74</sup>; and it is submitted that the weight of authority favours the second view.<sup>75</sup> It should be added that, in a significant number of cases, the two views would lead to the same result<sup>76</sup> and can be regarded as alternative ways of reaching it: for example, it would be hard to establish that the representor had assumed responsibility where it would not be just and reasonable (within the “threefold test”) to impose liability on him.<sup>77</sup>

(b) PROFESSIONAL SKILL. One feature of the relationships discussed above, in which the representor was held to owe a duty of care, was that he made the statement in the exercise of some professional skill. The absence of this factor was held to negative liability in Mutual Life and Citizen’s Insurance Co Ltd v Evatt,<sup>78</sup> where a company carelessly gave misleading information about an associated company to a prospective investor in the latter company. As a result the investor suffered loss, but the majority of the Privy Council held that the first company was not liable in negligence as it was not and did not purport to be engaged in the business of giving skilled advice on investments.<sup>79</sup> The majority regarded this as an essential ingredient of liability<sup>80</sup>; but the

<sup>68</sup> Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 181; Williams v Natural Life Health Foods [1998] 2 All E.R. 577 at 581.

<sup>69</sup> See above, n.61.

<sup>70</sup> See above, n.62.

<sup>71</sup> e.g. McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners Ltd [1996] 1 E.G.L.R. 35 at 41, per Hobhouse L.J. relying on Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 (though that was not a case of negligent misrepresentation).

<sup>72</sup> See above, at n.68.

<sup>73</sup> See above, p.346 n.43.

<sup>74</sup> e.g. Anderson & Son Ltd v Rhodes (Liverpool) Ltd [1967] 2 All E.R. 850; Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801.

<sup>75</sup> Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 862, 871 and (semble); Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 623, 628, 637; The Morning Watch [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 547; John W Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 602 at 616; Reid v Rush and Tompkins Group plc [1990] 1 W.L.R. 212 leaves the point open.

<sup>76</sup> See Bank of Credit and Commerce International Ltd v Price Waterhouse, 1998 P.N.L.R. 564; cf. Weldon v GRE Linked Life Assurance Ltd [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 914 at 917, stating both tests; and (in another context) Parkinson v St James & Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530; [2002] Q.B. 266 at [17].

<sup>77</sup> cf. The Nicholas H [1996] A.C. 211 at 241–242, where Lord Steyn, having held that it was not just and reasonable to impose a duty of care, went on to say that the facts could not be “forced into even the most expansive view of the doctrine of voluntary assumption of responsibility”.

<sup>78</sup> [1971] A.C. 793; A.I.L.G., 87 L.Q.R. 147; Rickford, 34 M.L.R. 328. The case is viewed with some scepticism in Spring v Guardian Insurance plc [1995] 2 A.C. 296 at 320.

<sup>79</sup> [1971] A.C. 793 at 809.

<sup>80</sup> ibid. at 805, 809.

prevailing view is that, so long as other conditions of liability are satisfied, the representor may be liable even though he was not in the business of giving advice<sup>81</sup> and even though the representee did not seek his advice (but only asked for information).<sup>82</sup> Thus in Anderson & Sons Ltd v Rhodes (Liverpool) Ltd<sup>83</sup> a commission agent made a representation to a seller of potatoes about the solvency of his principal, the buyer. It was held that the agent owed a duty of care to the seller.

(c) COMMERCIAL RELATIONSHIPS. A duty of care may exist at common law even in a purely commercial relationship, such as that of buyer and seller or landlord and tenant. For example, in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon<sup>84</sup> a tenant was induced to take a lease of a petrol station from an oil company by a statement made by an experienced salesman on the company's behalf, as to the potential future turnover of the premises. As the tenant had relied on the salesman's superior knowledge and experience, it was held that the company was under a duty of care at common law. On the other hand there are many commercial relationships in which each party consciously relies on his own skill or judgment<sup>85</sup> or where it is reasonable for the representor to assume that the representee will be advised by his own experts.<sup>86</sup> In such cases there would be no duty of care at common law; though, even in the absence of a "special relationship", there can be liability in damages under the Misrepresentation Act.<sup>87</sup>

(3) Effects of negligence on other rules

The main importance of Hedley Byrne's case lies in its recognition of liability in damages in tort for negligent misrepresentation; but it may also have a further, less easily predictable, impact on the law of misrepresentation. Before the decision, there was, for most purposes, no separate legal category of negligent misrepresentation. This state of affairs had an important influence on the development of the law relating to the effect of misrepresentation on contract. Many of the rules on this topic provided that one result should follow if the representation was fraudulent, and another if it was innocent.<sup>88</sup> For these purposes, "innocent" simply meant "not fraudulent".<sup>89</sup> The development which began with the Hedley Byrne case makes it necessary to accommodate

<sup>81</sup> The views of the minority in Evatt's case were preferred to those of the majority by Ormrod L.J. in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801 at 827 and by Lord Denning M.R. (dissenting) and Shaw L.J. in Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A. Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574 at 591, 600. The point was left open in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 637. The need for a professional relationship was emphasised in Nitrigin Eirann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Inc [1992] 1 W.L.R. 498 at 503 (not a case of misrepresentation.)

<sup>82</sup> Box v Midland Bank Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 391 (reversed as to costs only [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 434). Contrast Royal Bank Trust Co (Trinidad) v John Robert Pampellone [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218; Civic Structures v Clark Quinney & Co [1991] 2 E.G.L.R. 165: no liability for merely passing on information.

<sup>83</sup> [1967] 2 All E.R. 850; Dias [1967] C.L.J. 155; Dean, 31 M.L.R. 322; contrast Jones v Still [1965] N.Z.L.R. 1071; McKenzie, 29 M.L.R. 337.

<sup>84</sup> [1976] Q.B. 801; Gravells, 39 M.L.R. 462; cf. dicta in Hedley Byrne's case [1964] A.C. 465 at 486, 514, 528–529; Gran Gelato Ltd v Richcliff (Group) Ltd [1992] Ch. 560 (claim against first defendant); McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners [1996] 1 E.G.L.R. 35 at 42.

<sup>85</sup> Olificio Zucchi SA v Northern Sales Ltd [1965] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 496 at 519; cf. Jones v Still [1965] N.Z.L.R. 1071; Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v DTI, The Times, March 31, 1989.

<sup>86</sup> McInerny v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 246.

<sup>87</sup> S.2(1), below; on the facts of Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon, above, n.84, there would now be liability under this provision, as well as at common law.

<sup>88</sup> See above, pp.334, 337, 339, 340; below, pp.364, 372, 373, 378.

<sup>89</sup> cf. above, p.340; below, p.357.

negligent misrepresentation within this scheme, and to ask whether, for the purpose of any given rule, negligence is to be treated in the same way as fraud, or in the same way as innocence, or in some third way. There is as yet little guidance as to how questions of this kind are going to be answered. The only thing that is certain is that a negligent misrepresentation resembles a fraudulent one in giving rise to a claim for damages.

3. Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(1)

This subsection creates a statutory liability for misrepresentation. It provides: "Where a person has entered into a contract after a misrepresentation has been made to him by another party thereto and as a result thereof he has suffered loss, then, if the person making the misrepresentation would be liable to damages in respect thereof had the misrepresentation been made fraudulently, that person shall be so liable notwithstanding that the misrepresentation was not made fraudulently, unless he proves that he had reasonable ground to believe and did believe up to the time the contract was made that the facts represented were true".

(1) Scope of the subsection

The statutory liability differs from common law liability for negligent misrepresentation in two ways.

First, it is not necessary under the subsection to ask whether there was a "special relationship", giving rise to a duty of care, between the parties<sup>90</sup>: it is enough if the representation is made by one contracting party to the other. For this reason, it has been said that the subsection imposes an "absolute obligation"<sup>91</sup>; but these words cannot be taken to refer to the standard of liability. This is far from "absolute", for under the concluding words of s.2(1), the representor can escape liability by proving that his belief in the truth of the facts stated was not formed carelessly. Liability under the subsection is in this respect "essentially founded on negligence".<sup>92</sup>

Secondly, the subsection reverses the burden of proof. At common law, the representee must prove negligence, while under the subsection the representor is liable "unless he proves that he had reasonable ground to believe and did believe up to the time the contract was made that the facts represented were true". The difficulty of discharging this burden is illustrated by a case in which, during negotiations for the hire of barges, the owner's agent mis-stated their deadweight capacity, relying on an erroneous statement in Lloyd's Register. It was held that the burden had not been discharged since the owner could have discovered the true state of affairs by looking at documents in his possession.<sup>93</sup> But where the representator had no such means of discovering the truth, the burden would probably be discharged if he could show that he was himself the victim of an earlier fraud and that he had innocently repeated a representation previously made

<sup>90</sup> Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574 at 596; Sills, 96 L.Q.R. 15; Sealy [1978] C.L.J. 229; Cemp Properties (UK) v Dentsply Research & Developments Corp [1991] 2 F.G.I.R. 197.

<sup>91</sup> The Skopas [1983] 1 W.L.R. 857 at 861; cf. the Howard Marine case, above, at p.647.

<sup>92</sup> Gran Gelato Ltd v Richcliff Group Ltd [1992] Ch. 560 at 573; cf. South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 216; HIH Casualty & General Insurance v Chase Manhattan Bank [2001] E.W.C.A. Civ 1250; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 483, at [117]; but see HIH Casualty & General Insurance v New Hampshire Insurance Corp [2001] E.W.C.A. Civ 735; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 39 at [137] (negligence said not to be part of the cause of action, but lack of negligence a defence).

<sup>93</sup> Howard Marine case, above; cf. Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495 at 509.

to him,<sup>94</sup> or that he had reasonably relied on an expert's report on the point in question,<sup>95</sup> or that he had made due enquiries before making the statement.<sup>96</sup> The subsection requires him to prove only that he had reasonable ground for his belief, so that his actual means of knowledge are relevant: accordingly, a layman may succeed in discharging the burden where an expert would fail.

Under the subsection, a contracting party can be held liable for a representation made on his behalf by his agent.<sup>97</sup> But the agent himself is not liable under the subsection,<sup>98</sup> though he will be liable in negligence at common law if the representee can establish that there was a "special relationship" between himself and the agent, and that the agent was in breach of the resulting duty of care; but the agent would not be so liable where the only special relationship was between his principal and the representee.<sup>99</sup> There are two further situations in which the subsection does not apply, though there may be liability in negligence at common law: namely, where (as in Hedley Byrne's<sup>1</sup> case) the representation is made by a stranger to the contract; and where the negotiations between representor and representee do not reach the stage of a concluded contract.

(2) The fiction of fraud

S.2(1) has the effect of imposing liability in damages for careless misrepresentation; but instead of simply providing that the representor shall be liable in damages<sup>2</sup> it says that he shall be so liable if he "would be liable to damages . . . had the misrepresentation been made fraudulently". This fiction of fraud seems to be quite unnecessary; and it may lead the courts to extend to cases within s.2(1) rules which have been developed in the context of fraudulent misrepresentation and which are wholly inappropriate where there is no actual fraud.<sup>3</sup> In the Parliamentary debates on the Act, Lord Reid suggested that the effect of the fiction might be to apply to the new cause of action the extended period of limitation which applies where an action is "based upon"<sup>4</sup> fraud. But he added that this result would be "rather unreasonable"<sup>5</sup> and a more recent dictum indicates that the fiction of fraud would not be applied to this situation.<sup>6</sup> Further support for the view that the fiction is not to be literally applied is provided by a case in which the Court of Appeal has held<sup>7</sup> that a principal may be liable under the subsection for his agent's misrepresentation even though there is no such shared responsibility for the statement as is required to make the principal liable in cases of fraud.<sup>8</sup> It is to be hoped that the courts

<sup>94</sup> As in Oscar Chess Ltd v Williams [1957] 1 W.L.R. 370; below, p.354; cf. Humming Bird Motors v Hobbs [1986] R.T.R. 276 below, p.356.

<sup>95</sup> Cooper v Tamms [1988] 1 E.G.L.R. 257.

<sup>96</sup> William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016.

<sup>97</sup> Gosling v Anderson (1972) 223 E.G. 1743; Howard Marine case, above.

<sup>98</sup> The Skopas [1983] 1 W.L.R. 857; Owen [1984] C.L.J. 27.

<sup>99</sup> Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 1 W.L.R. 835; J Jarvis & Sons Ltd v Castle Wharf Development Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 19; [2001] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 308 (where the claim failed for want of reliance by the representee).

<sup>1</sup> See above, p.345; Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Malaysian Mining Corp [1989] 1 W.L.R. 379 at 386.

<sup>2</sup> cf. Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.90 ("is liable to pay compensation").

<sup>3</sup> See Royscot Trust Ltd v Rogerson [1991] 2 Q.B. 297 (below, p.362), where the court seems to have viewed such a result with equanimity.

<sup>4</sup> See now Limitation Act 1980, s.32(1).

<sup>5</sup> 274 H.L. 936.

<sup>6</sup> Garden Neptune Shipping Ltd v Occidental Worldwide Investment Corp [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 330 at 335; cf. (in another context) Mander v Evans [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2378.

<sup>7</sup> Gosling v Anderson (1972) 223 E.G. 1743.

<sup>8</sup> See above, p.345.

will similarly reject certain other consequences<sup>9</sup> which could be deduced from the fiction of fraud.

(3) Effect of affirmation

The right to rescind a contract for misrepresentation can be lost by affirmation<sup>10</sup>; but affirmation does not deprive the representee of his right to damages under s.2(1). Such damages can therefore in principle be recovered if, after having entered into the contract, the representee discovers the truth and nevertheless performs the contract.<sup>11</sup> Of course the right to damages may be limited in such cases: e.g. if the matter to which the misrepresentation relates was so serious that the representee's performance with knowledge of the truth amounts to failure by him to mitigate his loss.<sup>12</sup>

4. Contractual Statements

So far, in this Section, we have assumed that the misrepresentation induces the representee to enter into the contract, but that it has not become a term of the contract or otherwise acquired contractual force. If the misrepresentation does have contractual force, the representee is entitled to recover damages for breach of contract. He may also be entitled to rescind the contract for breach or for misrepresentation. The relation between these various rights will be considered below<sup>13</sup>; our only concern here is with the right to damages. This differs in two ways from the rights to damages previously considered in this Section: it can arise without fraud or negligence, and it is governed by different rules as to assessment of damages and remoteness.<sup>14</sup> It also differs in a number of ways from the power of the court to award damages in lieu of rescission, which will be considered below.<sup>15</sup> That power is discretionary, while damages for breach of contract can be recovered as of right; a representee cannot rescind for misrepresentation and claim damages in lieu of rescission, while (if the misrepresentation has become a term of the contract) he may be able to rescind and claim damages for breach of contract<sup>16</sup>; a party who once had the right to rescind, but has lost it, may not be able to recover damages in lieu of rescission,<sup>17</sup> though he can clearly recover damages for breach of contract; and the two causes of action are, once again, governed by different rules as to assessment of damages and remoteness.

---

<sup>9</sup> e.g. the rule that a fraudulent statement need not be material (above, p.311), the rule in S Pearson Ltd v Dublin Corp [1907] A.C. 351 (above, p.339), and the rule that a person cannot exclude liability for his own fraud (above, p.242): see the Garden Neptune case, above, n.96. On the other hand the rule that a representation as to a third person's credit must be in writing to give rise to liability under Statute of Frauds Amendment Act 1828, s.6 applies only to fraudulent misrepresentation: Banbury v Bank of Montreal [1918] A.C. 626; and in The Pacific Colocotronis [1984] Q.B. 713 at 718–719 it seems to have been thought that the fiction of fraud applied in this context, for it was “common ground” that the requirement of writing equally applied for the purpose of an action under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(1). And see below, p.335 as to damages under s.2(1).

<sup>10</sup> See below, p.383.

<sup>11</sup> Production Technology Consultants v Barlett [1986] 1 E.G.L.R. 82: cf. at common law Arnison v Smith (1889) 41 Ch.D. 348 (where, however, the claimants did not have full knowledge of their right to rescind and so could not be said to have affirmed).

<sup>12</sup> See below, p.980.

<sup>13</sup> See below, pp.359–361, 375–376.

<sup>14</sup> See below, pp.359–363.

<sup>15</sup> See below, pp.357–359.

<sup>16</sup> See below, p.375.

<sup>17</sup> See below, p.359.

For all these reasons it is still necessary to distinguish between contractual statements and “mere” representations inducing a contract,<sup>18</sup> though the provisions of the Misrepresentation Act as to damages will probably reduce the practical importance of the distinction. A contractual statement may either be a term of the main contract or a collateral contract.

(1) Term of main contract

Where a contract is in writing, a descriptive statement may actually be made in the contractual document. Such a statement will clearly be a contractual term if it is said to be the basis of the contract.<sup>19</sup> Subject to such express provisions, the question whether the statement is a term or a mere representation is one of construction.<sup>20</sup> The same is true where the statement is contained in a written offer, the acceptance of which concludes the contract.<sup>21</sup> Where a descriptive statement is contained in a contractual document it may<sup>22</sup> be a term even though it did not induce the party complaining of its untruth to enter into the contract,<sup>23</sup> and, indeed, even though he was at the time of contracting unaware of its existence.<sup>24</sup>

Often a statement inducing a contract will not be set out in the contractual document, but will be made during the negotiations leading up to the contract. The question whether such a statement was a mere representation or a term of the contract used to be treated as one of fact and left to the jury.<sup>25</sup> Cases of this kind are no longer tried by jury, but the orthodox view is that the question remains one of fact: with what intention was the statement made?<sup>26</sup> This intention would, in general, be objectively ascertained.<sup>27</sup> It is impossible to lay down any strict rules for determining when such an intention can be said to exist. But a number of guiding principles can be deduced from the cases.

(a) VERIFICATION. A statement is unlikely to be a term of the contract if the person making it expressly asks the other party to verify its truth. In Ecay v Godfrey<sup>28</sup> the seller of a boat said that it was sound but advised the buyer to have it surveyed. This advice negated any intention to warrant the soundness of the boat. The same principle applies where the circumstances are such that the person to whom the statement was made would normally be expected to verify it. This is the reason traditionally given for the view that statements made by sellers of houses in pre-contract negotiations do not normally have contractual force: the buyer is expected to rely on a survey, commissioned by himself or his building society, for information with regard to the state of the premises.<sup>29</sup> It has indeed been held that, if the buyer relies on a survey negligently conducted by a surveyor commissioned by the building society he may have a right of action in tort against that surveyor, in spite of the fact that he might have discovered the

<sup>18</sup> Atiyah, 1971 Alberta L.Rev. 347, and Essays in Contract 275.

<sup>19</sup> e.g. London Assurance v Mansel (1879) 11 Ch.D. 363.

<sup>20</sup> Behn v Burness (1863) 1 B. & S. 751 at 754 (statement in charterparty as to position of ship).

<sup>21</sup> The Larissa [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 325 at 330.

<sup>22</sup> Though reliance may be relevant in determining whether the statement was intended as a term: see Harlingdon & Leinster Enterprises Ltd v Christopher Hull Fine Art Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 564.

<sup>23</sup> ibid. at 574, 579, 584.

<sup>24</sup> cf. above, p.216: the principle of incorporation by signature can here work in favour of the signer.

<sup>25</sup> e.g. Pomer v Burham (1836) 4 A. & E. 473; Miller v Cannon Hill Estates Ltd [1931] 2 K.B. 113.

<sup>26</sup> Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A. Ogden & Son (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574 at 595.

<sup>27</sup> See above, pp.1, 11.

<sup>28</sup> (1947) 80 Ll.L.R. 286; cf. Mahon v Ainscough [1952] 1 All E.R. 337; Eustace v Kempe-Roberts [1964] C.L.Y. 3280.

<sup>29</sup> See Longman v Blount (1896) 12 T.L.R. 520; Green v Symons (1897) 13 T.L.R. 301; cf. Terence Ltd v Nelson (1937) 157 L.T. 254. Proposals for modifying this practice are under discussion.

truth by commissioning his own survey.<sup>30</sup> But that does not affect the present point, which is that the buyer normally has no cause of action in contract against the seller in respect of statements made by the latter about the condition of the property.

On the other hand, a statement is likely to be a term of the contract if it is intended to prevent the other party from finding out the truth, has this effect, and induces him to contract in reliance on it. This was, for example, said to be the position<sup>31</sup> where a buyer of a horse was about to examine it but was induced to buy without examination by the seller's statement that "You need not look for anything; the horse is perfectly sound. If there was anything the matter with the horse I should tell you". An earlier case,<sup>32</sup> in which a similar statement by a seller was held not to have contractual force, turns on the special facts that the sale was at Tattersall's and that sales there were known by both parties to be without warranty unless the contrary was expressly stated in the catalogue.

(b) IMPORTANCE. A statement is likely to be a term of the contract where its importance is such that, if it had not been made, the representee would not have entered into the contract at all.<sup>33</sup> Such a statement can be a term of the contract even though it conflicts with a previous written statement. Thus in Couchman v Hill<sup>34</sup> a heifer was put up for auction under printed conditions of sale which provided that no warranty was given. A bidder asked whether the heifer was in calf, adding that, if she were, he would not bid. He bought the heifer after being assured that she was not in calf, and it was held that this assurance was a term of the contract. On the other hand, in Oscar Chess Ltd v Williams,<sup>35</sup> where the defendant sold a car for £280 honestly describing it as a 1948 Morris 10 when it was in fact a 1939 model worth £175. The statement that the car was a 1948 model was held not to be a term of the contract. If in this case, the buyers had known the truth, they might still have bought the car (though for less money)<sup>36</sup> but if the buyer in Couchman v Hill had known the truth, he would not have bought at all.

(c) SPECIAL KNOWLEDGE. The question whether a statement is a contractual term or a mere representation may turn on the relative abilities of the parties to ascertain the truth of what was stated.<sup>37</sup> In Oscar Chess Ltd v Williams the seller was a private person to whom the car had been previously sold as a 1948 model, with a forged logbook. The main reason why his statement as to the age of the car was not a term of the contract was that he had no special knowledge as to the age of the car, while the buyers were car dealers, and so in at least as good a position as the seller to know whether the statement was true.<sup>38</sup> The case may be contrasted with Dick Bentley Productions Ltd v Harold Smith (Motors) Ltd<sup>39</sup> where a dealer sold a Bentley car, representing that it had only done

<sup>30</sup> Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831; above, p.340.

<sup>31</sup> Schwamel v Reade [1913] 2 I.R. 64, H.L.

<sup>32</sup> Hopkins v Tanqueray (1854) 15 C.B. 130.

<sup>33</sup> Bannerman v White (1861) 10 C.B.(N.S.) 844.

<sup>34</sup> [1947] K.B. 554. Alternatively, the statement was said to be a collateral contract: below, p.329; see also Otto v Bolton [1936] 2 K.B. 46.

<sup>35</sup> [1957] 1 W.L.R. 370.

<sup>36</sup> cf. Moore v Khan Ghauri [1991] 2 F.G.J.L.R. 9.

<sup>37</sup> cf. Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801, where this test was applied to determine the existence of a collateral contract (below, p.356).

<sup>38</sup> cf. Routledge v McKay [1954] 1 W.L.R. 615; Hummingbird Motors v Hobbs [1986] R.T.R. 276 (below, p.356), where the seller was not a dealer, though he occasionally sold cars; and see Harrison v Knowles & Foster [1918] 1 K.B. 608; The Larissa [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 325 at 330. Contrast Beale v Taylor [1967] 1 W.L.R. 1193; Koh, [1968] C.L.J. 11; this case is hard to reconcile with the Oscar Chess case, which was not cited to the court (the seller conducted his own case).

<sup>39</sup> [1965] 1 W.L.R. 623.

20,000 miles since being fitted with a replacement engine, when in fact it had done nearly 100,000 miles since then. He was clearly in a better position than the buyer to know whether the representation was true, and it was held to be a warranty. Salmon L.J. based this conclusion on the orthodox test of contractual intention,<sup>40</sup> while Lord Denning M.R. took the different view, that any inducing representation was prima facie a warranty, though the representor could “rebut this inference if he can show that it really was an innocent misrepresentation, in that he was in fact innocent of fault in making it, and that it would not be reasonable for him in the circumstances to be bound by it”.<sup>41</sup> But the view that an inducing misrepresentation has contractual force unless the misrepresenter can disprove “fault” is hard to reconcile with cases in which representors have escaped liability for breach of contract without having disproved “fault”; and in some of these the representors were clearly careless.<sup>42</sup> The representor will often be careless where he is in a better position than the representee to know the truth, but Gilchester Properties Ltd v Gomm<sup>43</sup> shows that this fact is not, for the present purpose, decisive.<sup>44</sup> In that case, a statement by the vendor of a block of flats as to the rent at which the flats were let was held to have no contractual force, though obviously the vendor was in a better position than the purchaser to know the truth. Of course a representor who is guilty of “fault” may be liable for damages in tort at common law or under the Misrepresentation Act<sup>45</sup>; but such liability may differ in extent from liability for breach of contract.<sup>46</sup>

(d) OPINION. Statements of opinion which are so vague that they cannot be verified are mere puffs and have no legal effect. But a statement which is one of opinion in the sense that it states a fact which is difficult, but not impossible, to verify may be a term of the contract. In Jendwine v Slade<sup>47</sup> Lord Kenyon held that statements that two pictures were respectively by Claude Lorrain and Teniers were not warranties: the authenticity of pictures painted “some centuries back” could only be a matter of opinion. But later cases show that this is not an inflexible rule. In Power v Barham<sup>48</sup> it was held that a statement that certain pictures were by Canaletto could be a warranty, Jendwine v Slade being distinguished on the ground that Canaletto was “not a very old painter”.<sup>49</sup> Similarly, in Leaf v International Galleries<sup>50</sup> the Court of Appeal indicated that a representation made in 1945 that a picture was a Constable could be a warranty; though the position will be different where the seller of a picture makes an attribution but expressly disclaims expert knowledge.<sup>51</sup> Nor will a statement be a warranty as to a quality if the statement is expressly one of opinion or belief. Thus where the seller of a car said that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the odometer reading was correct,

<sup>40</sup> ibid. at 629.

<sup>41</sup> ibid. at 627–628. Contrast his dissenting judgment in Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A Ogden & Son (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574 at 591, applying the test of whether the statement was “intended to be binding”.

<sup>42</sup> e.g. Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1; above, p.340.

<sup>43</sup> [1948] 1 All E.R. 493.

<sup>44</sup> See criticisms in Heilbut, Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] A.C. 30 at 50 of De Lassalle v Guildford [1901] 2 K.B. 215 on this point.

<sup>45</sup> See above, pp.343–352.

<sup>46</sup> See below, pp.359–363; the claim in the Dick Bentley case was limited to £400.

<sup>47</sup> (1797) 2 Esp. 571; cf. Gee v Lucas (1867) 16 L.T. 357.

<sup>48</sup> (1836) 4 A. & E. 473.

<sup>49</sup> ibid. at 476. He had died in 1768.

<sup>50</sup> [1950] 2 K.B. 86. Quacre, however, whether there was such a warranty; above, p.293, n.63.

<sup>51</sup> Harlingdon and Leinster Enterprises Ltd v Christopher Hull Fine Art Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 564.

it was held that he had not given a warranty of such correctness, and that he was not liable merely because, unknown to him, the odometer had been tampered with before he had acquired the car.<sup>52</sup>

(2) Collateral contract<sup>53</sup>

It may not be possible for a statement made during the negotiations leading up to the contract to take effect as one of its terms. The contract may be in writing, so that extrinsic evidence cannot be used to add to it, or to vary it<sup>54</sup>; or the statement may be oral and the contract one which the law requires to be in, or evidenced in, writing.<sup>55</sup> In such cases<sup>56</sup> the oral statement may nevertheless be enforceable as a "collateral contract". There are then two contracts between the parties: the main (written) contract and the collateral (oral) contract, both relating to the same subject-matter. Thus in De Lassalle v Guildford<sup>57</sup> the intending lessee of a house refused to execute the lease unless the landlord first assured him that the drains were in good order. The landlord gave this assurance, which was not incorporated in the lease. He was nonetheless held liable, when the drains were found to be defective, for breach of a collateral contract. The statement made on behalf of the landlord in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon,<sup>58</sup> was similarly held to amount to a collateral contract.

A statement can, it seems, take effect as a collateral contract only if two conditions are satisfied. First, it must have been intended to have contractual effect; and secondly there must be some indication that the parties intended it to take effect as a collateral contract and not simply as a term in the main contract. These requirements have already been discussed<sup>59</sup> and it will suffice here to recall the statement of principle by Lord Moulton in Heilbut, Symons & Co v Buckleton<sup>60</sup>: "There may be a contract the consideration for which is the making of some other contract. . . . Such collateral contracts, the sole effect of which is to vary or add to the terms of the principal contract, are therefore viewed with suspicion by the law. . . . Not only the terms of such contracts but the existence of an animus contrahendi on the part of all the parties to them must be clearly shown".<sup>61</sup> It follows that statements made during negotiations leading up to the contract will not amount to a collateral contract if the main contract provides that they are not to have this effect.<sup>62</sup> Contractual intention may also be negated by the fact that there was a

<sup>52</sup> Humming Bird Motors v Hobbs [1986] R.T.R. 276. Liability in negligence was also excluded; and the seller had not misrepresented his knowledge or belief: cf. above, p.331.

<sup>53</sup> Wedderburn [1959] C.L.J. 58.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.192, et seq., especially at pp.199–200.

<sup>55</sup> Angell v Duke (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 174; Jameson v Kinnell Bay Land Co Ltd (1931) 47 T.L.R. 593; Hill v Harris [1965] 2 Q.B. 601; Law Com. No.164, paras 5.7–5.8; above, pp.179–180.

<sup>56</sup> See J Evans & Son (Portsmouth) Ltd v Andrea Merzario Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1078 at 1083.

<sup>57</sup> [1901] 2 K.B. 215; cf. Wake v Renault (UK) Ltd, The Times, August 1, 1996.

<sup>58</sup> [1976] Q.B. 801; above, p.349.

<sup>59</sup> See above, pp.179–180, 199–200.

<sup>60</sup> [1913] A.C. 30 at 47; above, p.162. In J. Evans & Son (Portsmouth) Ltd v Andrea Merzario Ltd [1976] W.L.R. 1078 at 1081 Lord Denning M.R. described "much of what was said in that case as entirely out of date"; cf. his dissenting judgment in Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574 at 590. But, though damages may be recoverable under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2 for statements which do not satisfy Lord Moulton's test, that test remains good law so far as contractual liability is concerned: IBA v EMI (Electronics) Ltd (1980) 14 Build.L.R. 1 (below, p.584).

<sup>61</sup> cf. Hill v Harris [1965] 2 Q.B. 601.

<sup>62</sup> Intrepeneur Pub Co (GL) v East Crown Ltd [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 611 at 614 ("entire agreement" clause).

considerable interval of time between the making of the statement alleged to constitute the collateral contract and the conclusion of the main contract.<sup>63</sup>

In one respect a person who relies on a statement as a collateral contract is at first sight in a worse position than one who relies on it as a term of the main contract: since a collateral contract exists apart from the main contract, it must be supported by separate consideration. But this requirement would usually be satisfied by entering into the main contract. The only cases in which this analysis could give rise to difficulty are those in which the party relying on the collateral contract was already bound to enter into the main contract; e.g. where a lease was executed in performance of an agreement to enter into it.<sup>64</sup> Even in such cases, however, the act of entering into the main contract (i.e. the execution of the lease) would constitute consideration for the collateral contract if that act in fact conferred a benefit on the other party.<sup>65</sup>

The question whether evidence of a collateral contract is admissible if it actually contradicts the main written contract has been discussed in Chapter 6.<sup>66</sup>

5. Damages in Lieu of Rescission

(1) Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(2)

Before the Misrepresentation Act, damages could not be awarded for a wholly innocent misrepresentation (i.e. for one that was neither fraudulent nor negligent<sup>67</sup>) if it did not have contractual force.<sup>68</sup> The principal remedy for innocent misrepresentation was rescission, though when a contract was rescinded, the court could make some form of monetary adjustment by granting an “indemnity”.<sup>69</sup> This position was unsatisfactory since, in cases of wholly innocent misrepresentation, the entire transaction would have to be set aside (even though the misrepresentation related to a matter of relatively minor importance), if any remedy at all were to be given to the representee. S.2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act partly cures this defect<sup>70</sup> by giving the court a discretionary power to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission. It provides: “Where a person has entered into a contract after a misrepresentation has been made to him otherwise than fraudulently, and he would be entitled, by reason of the misrepresentation, to rescind the contract, then, if it is claimed, in any proceedings arising out of the contract, that the contract ought to be or has been rescinded, the court or arbitrator may declare the contract subsisting and award damages in lieu of rescission, if of opinion that it would be equitable to do so, having regard to the nature of the misrepresentation and the loss that would be caused by it if the contract were upheld, as well as to the loss that rescission would cause to the other party”.

<sup>63</sup> ibid., at 617 (five years).

<sup>64</sup> See the discussion of Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] Q.B. 467, above, p.102.

<sup>65</sup> Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 1; above, p.95.

<sup>66</sup> See above, pp.199, 200.

<sup>67</sup> See above, pp.340, 350.

<sup>68</sup> Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1, where the representor would now almost certainly be liable in damages for negligence at common law, or under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(1): see Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 416; cf. above, p.340.

<sup>69</sup> See below, pp.366–368.

<sup>70</sup> See Thomas Witter Ltd v BTP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 589: the subsection “comes into play” where there is no right to damages either at common law (because the misrepresentation is not negligent) or under Misrepresentation Act 1967 (because the representor has discharged the burden of proof under s.2(1): above, p.351).

(2) Scope of the subsection

(a) DISCRETIONARY. The power to uphold the contract and to award damages in lieu of rescission is discretionary: neither party has a right to require its exercise. The concluding words of the subsection specify the factors which the court is to consider in deciding whether to exercise the power. It seems that the court can take into account the contents of the representation, and balance the interests of the parties in on the one hand seeking and on the other resisting rescission. Usually the representor will want to resist rescission and a number of factors are likely to affect the exercise of the discretion. On the one hand, the court is likely to uphold the contract (and so leave the representee to his remedy in damages) if the representation related to a relatively minor<sup>71</sup> matter and if the representor was not guilty of fault.<sup>72</sup> On the other hand, the “policing function”<sup>73</sup> of the remedy of rescission may also be taken into account: this was the ground on which the court refused to uphold a contract of reinsurance which had been induced by a broker’s material misrepresentation.<sup>74</sup>

(b) IN LIEU OF RESCISSION. Damages under the subsection can be awarded only “in lieu of rescission”, so that the representee cannot rescind and claim such damages.<sup>75</sup> If he rescinds on account of a wholly innocent misrepresentation<sup>76</sup> which has no contractual force,<sup>77</sup> any claim for monetary compensation will continue to be governed by the principles which determine the extent of an indemnity.<sup>78</sup> The misrepresentee can, however, still rescind and claim damages for fraud, since fraudulent misrepresentation is expressly excepted from the subsection; and there is nothing in the subsection to prevent him from rescinding and claiming damages for negligence at common law or under s.2(1).<sup>79</sup> The suggestion that the victim of an “innocent” misrepresentation can now rescind and claim damages under “section 2”<sup>80</sup> cannot, it is submitted, be interpreted to mean that the representee can rescind and claim damages under s.2(2) in spite of the fact that the representor was not negligent and has succeeded in discharging the burden of proof under s.2(1). Such an interpretation would be plainly inconsistent with the words of s.2(2), that the damages which can be awarded under it are “in lieu of rescission”.

A further consequence of the rule that damages under the subsection are “in lieu of rescission” is more controversial. Such damages are available where a person “would be entitled, by reason of the misrepresentation, to rescind the contract”. It is not clear from these words whether the court can award damages if the representee once had the right to rescind but had lost it<sup>81</sup> before the claim under s.2(2) was made; and conflicting views on the point have been expressed in decisions at first instance. On the one hand, the fact that the court’s power is to award damages “in lieu of rescission”, and the description of the factors to which the court is to have regard in determining whether to exercise its discretion, suggest that the court must have some real choice in the matter and therefore

<sup>71</sup> William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016 at 1036, 1043.

<sup>72</sup> See The Lucy [1983] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 188 at 202.

<sup>73</sup> Highlands Ins Co v Continental Ins Co [1987] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 109 at 118.

<sup>74</sup> ibid. cf. TSB v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430 at 439.

<sup>75</sup> ibid.; HHH Casualty & General Insurance v Chase Manhattan Bank [2001] EWCA Civ 1250; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 483 at [51].

<sup>76</sup> See above, at n.67.

<sup>77</sup> For “incorporated misrepresentations” see below, pp.359, 375–376.

<sup>78</sup> See below, pp.366–368.

<sup>79</sup> As in F & H Entertainments v Leisure Enterprises (1976) 240 E.G. 445; cf. Atlantic Estates v Ezekiel [1991] 2 F.G.I.R. 202 at 204.

<sup>80</sup> Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 415; the suggestion is obiter as the case was one of fraud, and “innocent” may have been intended simply to mean “not fraudulent”.

<sup>81</sup> See below, pp.377–378.

support the view that damages in lieu cannot be awarded where the right to rescind has been lost.<sup>82</sup> On the other hand it is hard, as a matter of policy, to see why the factors which bar the right to rescind should limit the discretion to award damages. The intervention of third party rights, for instance, may make it highly inappropriate to rescind the contract,<sup>83</sup> but it does not follow that it should prevent the court from awarding monetary compensation to the representee.<sup>84</sup>

(c) INCORPORATED MISREPRESENTATION. A representation originally made to induce a contract may become a term of the contract by being subsequently incorporated in it; and this does not affect the right to rescind for misrepresentation.<sup>85</sup> In such cases the representee is entitled as of right to damages for breach of contract; this right is not subject to the discretion of the court. The question whether his right to “rescind” for breach of contract is affected by s.2(2) will be discussed below.<sup>86</sup>

6. Basis of Assessment and Remoteness

Where a representee claims damages, questions may arise as to the basis of assessment and remoteness. These questions are discussed generally in Chapter 21,<sup>87</sup> but some special factors relating to misrepresentation must be considered here.

(1) Basis of assessment

Liability for misrepresentation may arise in tort (where the representation is made fraudulently or negligently) or in contract (where the representation has contractual force). This distinction affects the assessment of damages in the most common case of misrepresentation: namely, where a seller represents that the subject-matter of a contract has a quality which in fact it lacks. The general principle is that in tort the claimant is entitled to such damages as will put him into the position in which he would have been if the tort had not been committed; while in contract he is entitled to be put into the position in which he would have been if the contract had been performed.<sup>88</sup> It is thought to follow that in tort the claimant is entitled to be put into the position in which he would have been if the representation had not been made, while in contract he is entitled to be put into the position in which he would have been if the representation had been true.<sup>89</sup> If the representation induces the claimant to buy something which, but for the misrepresentation, he would not have bought at all, it follows that the damages in tort are prima facie<sup>90</sup> the amount by which the actual value of the thing bought is less than

<sup>82</sup> Zanzibar v British Aerospace (Lancaster House) Ltd [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2333; Floods of Queensferry Ltd v Shand Construction Ltd (No.3) [2000] B.L.R. 81 at 93; the same assumption seems to underlie The Lucy [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 188 at 201–202. But the right to damages under s.2(1) survives loss of the right to rescind by affirmation: above, p.352.

<sup>83</sup> The third party cannot invoke s.2(2): see TSB Bank plc v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430.

<sup>84</sup> See Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 589–590.

<sup>85</sup> See below, p.375.

<sup>86</sup> See below, p.376.

<sup>87</sup> See below, pp.944–974.

<sup>88</sup> McGregor on Damages (16th ed.), §11.

<sup>89</sup> Smith Kline French Laboratories Ltd v Long [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1 at 6; East v Maurer [1991] 1 W.L.R. 461 at 464, 467, 468 (below, p.937); Gran Gelato Ltd v Richcliff (Group) Ltd [1992] Ch. 570 at 575; Thomas Witter Ltd v BTP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 606; South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 216; Avon Insurance plc v Swire Fraser Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 573 at 577–578.

<sup>90</sup> The value of an illegal part of the thing bought is not taken into account: The Sibon [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 at 63–64.

the price paid for it.<sup>91</sup> In contract, on the other hand, the damages are prima facie the amount by which the actual value of the thing bought is less than the value which it would have had if the representation had been true<sup>92</sup>; and this value is not relevant to the assessment of damages in tort for deceit.<sup>93</sup>

There is some conflict in the authorities as to which of these bases of assessment is to be adopted for the purpose of s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967. One view is that damages under the subsection are to be assessed on a contractual basis<sup>94</sup>; but the more generally held view is that such damages are “the same as in an action of deceit”,<sup>95</sup> i.e. that they are to be assessed on a tortious basis. It is submitted that the latter is the correct view since the reference to fraud in s.2(1) indicates that the statutory cause of action is tortious in nature. Accordingly, the tortious basis of assessment applies where the representee has received something which lacked a quality that it was represented to have.

A representation may have contractual force, but the contract may be to the effect, not that the representation is true, but that the representor has taken due care in making it. This was the position in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon<sup>96</sup> where a tenant was induced to take a lease of a petrol station by a statement made on behalf of the landlord that the future annual turnover could be estimated at 200,000 gallons. The estimate had been carelessly made and the actual turnover was much lower. The landlord was held liable both for negligence at common law and for breach of collateral warranty.<sup>97</sup> But even on the latter basis the tenant did not recover damages for loss of his bargain<sup>98</sup> (i.e. for loss of the profit that he would have made if the turnover had been 200,000 gallons); for the warranty was not that 200,000 gallons would be sold but only that the estimate had been <sup>91</sup> This rule is stated in many cases: see, for example, Davidson v Tulloch (1860) 3 Macq. 783 at 790; Peek v Derry (1887) 37 Ch.D. 541 at 578 (reversed on liability 14 App.Cas. 337); Tyncross v Grant (1877) 2 C.P.D. 496 at 504; Cackett v Keswick [1902] 2 Ch. 456 at 468; McConnel v Wright [1903] 1 Ch. 546 at 554; Broome v Speake [1903] 1 Ch. 586 at 605, 623 (affirmed [1904] A.C. 342); Stevens v Hoare (1904) 20 T.L.R. 407; Heineman v Cooper [1987] H.L.R. 262; Saunders v Edwards [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1116 at 1121; Sirover v Harrington [1988] Ch. 390 at 411; Westgate v Brucknell DC (1987) 19 H.L.R. 735; Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 851; Hussey v Eels [1990] 2 Q.B. 227 at 241; the assessment in Roberts v J Hampson & Co [1990] 1 W.L.R. 94 is (if correctly reported) hard to reconcile with the normal basis of assessment. The damages awarded “for loss of an expectation” in White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 269 would not extend to expectations created only by a misrepresentation of the kind here under discussion: see below, p.616. See McGregor on Damages (16th ed.), §1970; Spencer Bomer and Turner on Actionable Misrepresentation (3rd ed.), pp.237–258.

<sup>92</sup> See, for example, Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3); an alternative measure is the cost of making the defect good (below, p.944). For the measure of a price reduction under s.48c of the Act, as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045, reg.5, see below, p.952.

<sup>93</sup> Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1997] A.C. 254 at 267 (per Lord Browne-Wilkinson) and 283 (per Lord Steyn) disapproving Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426 at 444 on this point; see also South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 215–216 (per Lord Hoffmann) expressing no concluded view on the point.

<sup>94</sup> Davis & Co (Wines) Ltd v Afa Minerva (E M I) Ltd [1974] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 27 at 32.

<sup>95</sup> F & H Entertainments Ltd v Leisure Enterprises Ltd 240 E.G. 455 (the reference is simply to s.2, but it is clear from the context that subs. (1) is meant); André & Cie SA v Els Michel Blanc & Fils [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 166 at 181 (affirmed, without reference to this point [1979] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 427); Cemp Properties (UK) v Dentsply Research & Development Corp [1991] 2 E.G.L.R. 197; Naughton v O’Callaghan [1990] 3 All E.R. 191 at 196; The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 35 at 63. cf. Box v Midland Bank Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 (reversed as to costs only [1981] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 334); Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 426–427 (denying an item of loss of bargain damages); Sharneyford Supplies Ltd v Edge [1987] Ch. 305 at 303, disapproving a contrary dictum in Watts v Spence [1975] Ch. 165, 175 (the actual reasoning of these last two cases has been made obsolete by Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.3, below, p.999); Taylor, 45 M.L.R. 139; Cartwright [1987] Conv. 423; Wadley, 54 M.L.R. 698.

<sup>96</sup> [1976] Q.B. 801.

<sup>97</sup> See above, pp.349, 356.

<sup>98</sup> [1976] Q.B. 801 at 820.

prepared with due care.<sup>99</sup> In tort, the claimant clearly cannot recover damages for loss of his bargain, though he may be entitled to damages for loss of the chance of making profits out of another business in which he would have invested his money, had he not been induced by the misrepresentation to enter into the contract with the defendant.<sup>1</sup>

The distinction between the two bases of assessment can be hard to draw: where a seller's misrepresentation relates, not to some quality of the goods, but to the terms on which he deals with other customers. In the Clef Aquitaine case<sup>2</sup> the fraudulent representation by which A was induced to enter into a long-term distributorship with B (a manufacturer of damp-proofing materials) was that B did not sell goods of the same kind to other customers for prices lower than those payable by A under the agreement. As the goods had no readily ascertainable "particular value",<sup>3</sup> the normal deceit measure of damages (price less value) could not be applied. But it was held that A could recover, as damages for deceit, the difference between the prices payable by A under the agreement and the prices that A would have been able to negotiate for the purposes of that agreement, if the misrepresentation had not been made. If the representation had had contractual force, A could in contract have recovered damages in respect of lost or reduced profit on resales; and to the extent that A's tort damages reflected the fact that his profit margins on sales actually achieved were reduced by the fact that he had paid higher prices to B by reason of the misrepresentation, the tort damages that A recovered can be said to resemble contract damages.<sup>4</sup> But the latter would have included damages in respect of a reduction in the volume of A's resales by reason of the falsity of B's statement (if it had had contractual force) and such damages would not be recoverable under the tort formula applied in the Clef Aquitaine case. Moreover, under that formula, A recovered damages even though the transaction induced by the fraud did not cause him any overall loss<sup>5</sup>: the transaction remained profitable to A but he suffered loss because it was less profitable than it would have been, but for the representation. The same can, in theory, be true where the normal deceit formula of the "price less value" can be applied to goods bought for resale,<sup>6</sup> though in practice the representee is in such a case unlikely to be able to resell the goods for more than the price paid by him without being himself guilty of a further misrepresentation.

In the cases so far discussed, the misrepresentations were made by the seller and affected the price paid by the buyer. They may also be made to the seller and affect his willingness to contract with a particular buyer.<sup>7</sup> In one case,<sup>8</sup> manufacturers of pharmaceuticals were induced to sell tablets to a company by the defendant's representation that the company intended to resell them in Central Africa; in fact they were resold in Holland. If the sellers had known the truth, they would not have sold to the company; but that sale did not affect their capacity to supply other customers. In these circumstances, the proper way of putting the sellers into the position in which they would have been, if the representation had not been made, was to ensure that they should receive the market value of the tablets. As this value was not shown to exceed the contract price, the

<sup>99</sup> Contrast Lion Nathan v CC Bottlers Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1438 where the price of a business was based on the vendor's warranty that its achievable profits had been "calculated in good faith and on a proper basis".

<sup>1</sup> East v Maurer [1991] 1 W.L.R. 461, below p.938.

<sup>2</sup> Clef Aquitaine SARL v Laporte Materials (Barrow) Ltd [2001] Q.B. 488.

<sup>3</sup> ibid., at 500; the reference seems to be to market value: cf. ibid., at 513 and below, p.953.

<sup>4</sup> cf. ibid., p.513 ("mimic reasoning more familiar in contract").

<sup>5</sup> This was the position in the Clef Aquitaine case, above, n.2.

<sup>6</sup> In the Clef Aquitaine case, the normal tort measure could not be applied for the reason given at n.3, above.

<sup>7</sup> cf. above, pp.274–278.

<sup>8</sup> Smith Kline & French Laboratories Ltd v Long [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1.

defendant was liable for no more than the contract price, less that part of it which had already been paid by the company.

There is, finally, the possibility that a misrepresentation relating to the value of the subject-matter may be made by a third party. For example, A may lend money to B on the security of B's property in reliance on a valuation of that property negligently made by C. Here the damages for which C is liable to A are based, not on the interest which B should have paid on the loan, but on the position in which A would have been if C had made the valuation with due care.<sup>9</sup> If on that assumption A would not have made the loan to B, he can recover from C not only loss of principal but also damages for loss of use of the money: i.e. what he would have earned by putting the money on deposit elsewhere, or by using it to enter into other transactions.<sup>10</sup> But C is not liable for any interest above normal market rates which B may have undertaken to pay to A.<sup>11</sup> This is so whether A's claim is brought in contract<sup>12</sup> or in tort since C in such case undertakes only to make the valuation with due care: he makes no promise or representation that B will perform his contractual obligations to A.<sup>13</sup>

(2) Remoteness

The fact that the subject-matter lacks a quality which it was represented to have may, apart from affecting its value, also cause the representee to suffer consequential loss. For example, where diseased cows are sold under representations of soundness and infect the buyer's other animals, he may be able to recover for the loss of those animals<sup>14</sup>; and where a business is sold under misrepresentations as to its profitability the buyer may be able to recover damages for losses suffered in the course of running the business.<sup>15</sup> Consequential losses can, however, be recovered only if they are not too remote<sup>16</sup>; and the rules as to remoteness are more favourable to the claimant in actions of deceit than they are in actions for breach of contract.<sup>17</sup> Lord Denning M.R. has said that "In contract the damages are limited to what may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties. In fraud they are not so limited. The defendant is bound to make reparation for all the actual damage directly flowing from the fraudulent inducement. . . . It does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent person to say that they could not reasonably have been foreseen".<sup>18</sup> A number of later dicta in the House of Lords similarly regard foreseeability as irrelevant in actions for deceit<sup>19</sup>; though it may,

<sup>9</sup> Not on the position in which A would have been had C's valuation been correct: cf. above at n.99.

<sup>10</sup> First National Commercial Bank plc v Humberts [1995] 2 All E.R. 673 at 677.

<sup>11</sup> Swingcastle Ltd v Gibson [1991] 2 A.C. 223.

<sup>12</sup> See below, pp.938–939 for the scope of C's duty where this arises under a contract between A and C.

<sup>13</sup> Swingcastle v Gibson, above, at 238. For the time at which the loss is suffered, see First National Commercial Bank plc v Humberts [1995] 2 All E.R. 673.

<sup>14</sup> Mullett v Mason (1866) L.R. 1 C.P. 559 (fraud); Smith v Green (1875) 1 C.P.D. 92 (breach of contract).

<sup>15</sup> Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 Q.B. 158; Treitel, 32 M.L.R. 526; Hornal v Neuberger Products [1957] 1 Q.B. 247 at 259; cf. Naughton v O'Callaghan [1990] 3 All E.R. 191. As to punitive damages, see below, p.937.

<sup>16</sup> See below, pp.965–974.

<sup>17</sup> Especially after The Heron II [1969] 1 A.C. 350, below, p.966. In Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 417–418 both tests were satisfied.

<sup>18</sup> [1969] 2 Q.B. 158 at 167; cf. Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 606 (where no consequential loss was claimed); KCB Bank v Industrial Steels (UK) Ltd [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370 at 377.

<sup>19</sup> Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1997] A.C. 254 at 265, 267, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson, 269 per Lord Mustill, accepting "the irrelevance of foreseeability" though not regarding Lord Denning's judgment (above, n.18) as "an invariable guide". cf. also South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 215; Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Corp [2002] UKHL 19; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 843 at [100].

with respect, be doubted whether a defendant would be liable, even in such an action, for loss of a kind that was totally unforeseeable.<sup>20</sup> The statement that “a wider test [of remoteness] applies in an action for deceit”<sup>21</sup> (than in one for negligence) carries with it the implication that some test of remoteness applies even in deceit.

In an action based on negligent misrepresentation at common law, the loss must be reasonably foreseeable, that being the general rule applied in actions for negligence.<sup>22</sup> This rule may be less favourable to the claimant than the rule in deceit but it is probably more favourable than the rule in a contractual action.<sup>23</sup> Where the action is brought under s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act, one possible view is that the deceit rule applies by virtue of the fiction of fraud.<sup>24</sup> Support for this view is provided by Royscot Trust Ltd v Rogerson,<sup>25</sup> where a car-dealer induced a finance company to enter into a hire-purchase agreement by misrepresenting the amount of the deposit paid by the customer, who later defaulted and sold the car to a third party.<sup>26</sup> The dealer was held liable to the finance company under s.2(1) for the balance due under the agreement on the ground that “the plain words”<sup>27</sup> of the subsection required the court to apply the deceit rule, under which the dealer was liable for “all the losses” suffered by the finance company “even if those losses were unforeseeable, provided that they were not otherwise too remote”.<sup>28</sup> Later discussions of the Royscot case in the House of Lords somewhat pointedly refrain from expressing any concluded view as to its correctness<sup>29</sup>; and in one of these discussions the question whether the fraud rule should be applied to cases of “innocent misrepresentation under the Misrepresentation Act 1967”<sup>30</sup> is expressly left open by Lord Browne-Wilkinson. It is submitted that the words of the subsection are not so “plain”<sup>31</sup> as to compel the court to apply the fraud rule in the present context. We have seen that there are other contexts<sup>32</sup> in which the courts have not given a similar literal effect to the fiction of fraud, which could be interpreted to refer to the existence of liability, rather than to its extent. This view derives some support from the legislative history of the subsection.<sup>33</sup> It can also be supported on the policy ground that the

<sup>20</sup> cf. Mullen v Mason (1866) L.R. 1 C.P. 559 at 564; Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 Q.B. 158 at 169.

<sup>21</sup> Smith New Court case, above, at 852.

<sup>22</sup> The Wagon Mound [1961] A.C. 388; cf. Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801 at 822. For a possible alternative explanation of the rule, see below, p.939.

<sup>23</sup> See The Heron II [1969] 1 A.C. 350; below, pp.966–969.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.351.

<sup>25</sup> [1991] 2 Q.B. 297; Hooley, 107 L.Q.R. 547; cf. Cooper v Tamms [1988] 1 E.G.L.R. 256, 263; Cemp Properties (UK) v Dentsply Research and Development Corp [1991] 2 E.G.L.R. 97; William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016 at 1037, 1043.

<sup>26</sup> Who obtained good title to the car.

<sup>27</sup> [1991] 2 Q.B. 297 at 306; cf. p.309.

<sup>28</sup> ibid. at 307. The concluding words of the quotation may refer to cases in which the loss is wholly different in kind from that which could have been foreseen.

<sup>29</sup> Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1997] A.C. 254 at 267, 283. A dictum in South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 216 states the fraud rule as applicable to claims under Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(1) but expresses no concluded view on the relevance of foreseeability (of whatever degree) and makes no reference to the Royscot case; that case is also viewed with considerable scepticism in Avon Insurance plc v Swire Fraser Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 573 at 576; cf. ibid. at 633.

<sup>30</sup> Smith New Court case, above, at 267; the reference seems from the context to be to s.2(1), which imposes a species of liability for negligence (above, p.351).

<sup>31</sup> [1997] A.C. 254 at 283, referring to “the rather loose wording” of the 1967 Act.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.352.

<sup>33</sup> ibid.; the Court of Appeal in the Royscot Trust case was not at liberty to consider this piece of legislative history, and even now it would not seem to be admissible under the rules laid down in Pepper v Hart [1993] A.C. 593 since the statement in question was not that of the promoter of the legislation.

severity of a rule which is justified in cases of actual fraud will often be inappropriate where the defendant is merely negligent.<sup>34</sup>

(3) Fluctuations in value

Some of the nineteenth century cases which had established the principle that damages in tort for misrepresentation were based on the difference between the price paid by the injured party and the actual value of the subject-matter<sup>35</sup> also supported the so-called “date of transaction”<sup>36</sup> rule, by which for this purpose the relevant value of the subject-matter was its value at the time of its transaction.<sup>37</sup> Thus if the claimant had been induced by fraud to pay £15 each for shares which at that time were worth no more than £10, the defendant was liable for £5 per share, but not for further loss suffered by reason of any later fall in the market value of the shares. Such further loss was irrecoverable because it was assumed either that it had not been caused by the wrong, or that the claimant’s retention of the shares on a falling market amounted to a failure on his part to take reasonable steps to mitigate his loss.<sup>38</sup> The “date of transaction” rule continues to be recognised as the general rule<sup>39</sup>, but its inflexible application could lead to injustice where the defrauded party had acted reasonably in retaining the subject-matter after that date. Recent cases have therefore created exceptions to the general rule where the assumptions on which it is based are not in fact true. This may be so for a variety of reasons: the subject-matter may suffer from some hidden flaw, not known to the market,<sup>40</sup> so that its market value at the time of the transaction does not reflect its true value; or the plaintiff may “by reason of the fraud, [be] locked into the property”<sup>41</sup>; or the decline in value may have taken place before the plaintiff discovered the truth, so that the misrepresentation “continued to operate . . . so as to induce the plaintiff to retain”<sup>42</sup> the subject-matter. In such cases, his damages for deceit will be based on the difference between the price which he paid for the subject-matter and either the proceeds of his actual disposal of it,<sup>43</sup> or the proceeds which would have been realised by an earlier disposal of it which he should, acting reasonably, have made.<sup>44</sup> In a case of the latter kind, he will be compensated for loss due to the fall in the value of the subject-matter up to the time when it was reasonable for such a disposal to have been made, but not for loss due to any further fall in its market value after that time.<sup>45</sup> These rules resemble those which govern the time for assessment of damages and mitigation in cases of breach of contract.<sup>46</sup>

When the general “date of transaction” rule was first developed, liability in damages for misrepresentation existed only in cases of fraud,<sup>47</sup> and that rule must therefore have <sup>34</sup> cf. Shepherd v Broome [1904] A.C. 342 at 345, 346, where the House of Lords protested against being compelled by statute to treat a person who was morally innocent as if he were guilty of fraud.

<sup>35</sup> See above, p.360.

<sup>36</sup> Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1997] A.C. 254 at 283.

<sup>37</sup> e.g. Tinycross v Grant (1877) 2 C.P.D. 469; Peek v Derry (1887) 37 Ch.D. 541; and (in the 20th Century) McConnell v Wright [1903] 1 Ch. 546.

<sup>38</sup> cf. see below, p.977 (mitigation by means of a substitute transaction).

<sup>39</sup> Smith New Court case, above, n.36, at 267, 284.

<sup>40</sup> ibid. at 267 (“pregnant with disaster”).

<sup>41</sup> ibid. per Lord Browne-Wilkinson; Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] EWCA Civ 55; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 822, at [37].

<sup>42</sup> Smith New Court case, above, at 267.

<sup>43</sup> As in the Smith New Court case, above, n.36; cf. Naughton v O’Callaghan [1990] 3 All E.R. 191.

<sup>44</sup> Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426 (as to which see also above, p.360, n.84).

<sup>45</sup> Downs v Chappell, above.

<sup>46</sup> See below, pp.957–960; cf. Lord Browne-Wilkinson’s reference in the Smith New Court case [1997] A.C. 254 at 266 to Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 401, cited on p.958, below.

<sup>47</sup> See above, p.345.

been restricted to such cases. The recent cases which have established exceptions to the general rule have likewise been cases in which the purchase of assets was induced by fraud<sup>48</sup>; and they do not settle the question how damages are to be assessed where the inducing representation is merely negligent. There is no doubt that the general "date of transaction" rule applies to such cases; the more difficult question is whether this is also true of the recently established exceptions to it. The answer to this question depends in part on the legal nature of the exceptions and in part on wider policy considerations. So far as the legal nature of the exceptions is concerned, they can be regarded as dealing either (like the general principle) with the issue of quantification or with the issue of remoteness.<sup>49</sup> If they deal with quantification, they should logically apply in cases of negligent, no less than in cases of fraudulent, misrepresentation. Quantification is simply the process of putting a monetary value on a loss in respect of which the defendant is found or admitted to be liable and for this purpose it is irrelevant to ask whether that loss arose as a result of fraud or of negligence. If, on the other hand, the exceptions deal with the issue of remoteness, (or, in other words, with the question, what limits the law should impose on the items of loss in respect of which the wrongdoer is to be held responsible) then there is (as our foregoing discussion of remoteness shows<sup>50</sup>) certainly support for the view that a person guilty of fraudulent misrepresentation is liable for a wider range of consequences than one who is merely negligent; and some reliance is placed on this distinction in one of the recent cases<sup>51</sup> in which it was held that a fraudulent defendant was not entitled to limit his liability by reference to the "date of transaction" rule. But it scarcely follows from such reasoning that the liability of a misrepresenter will necessarily be limited by that rule merely because he is guilty only of negligence and not of fraud. Some support for the view that it is not so limited is provided by another of the recent cases which have established the exceptions to the rule. In that case,<sup>52</sup> the representee alleged fraud against the seller of a business but only negligence against his accountants, and both these defendants were held liable for an amount by which the value of the business had fallen by reason of a general market decline between the time of the sale induced by the misrepresentation and the time when the representee, acting reasonably, should have disposed of the business. The case does not, however, conclude the issue since the accountants were "recklessly negligent"<sup>53</sup>; and recklessness suffices to give rise to liability in deceit even though it does not amount to actual dishonesty.<sup>54</sup> It remains, therefore an open question whether a representor who was merely negligent, but not reckless, would be liable for a fall in the value of the subject-matter due to factors (such as market movements) other than those to which the misrepresentation related. It is submitted (with some hesitation) that, since such loss of value is a kind of consequential loss,<sup>55</sup> the question should be treated as one of remoteness<sup>56</sup> rather than as one of quantification; and that the answer to it should depend on whether representor could

<sup>48</sup> This was true in Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426 even though fraud was alleged against only one of the defendants: see below, at n.52.

<sup>49</sup> For the difference between these two issues, see below, pp.944, 964, 973–974.

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.362.

<sup>51</sup> Smith New Court case [1997] A.C. 254 at 279; cf. South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 215.

<sup>52</sup> Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426.

<sup>53</sup> ibid. at 431, 445. In contribution proceedings between the seller and the accountants, the degree of responsibility of these parties was held at 445 to be equal since, though the fault of the accountants was "less serious" than that of the seller, their misrepresentation "had a greater causative impact".

<sup>54</sup> See above, p.317.

<sup>55</sup> Downs v Chappell [1997] 1 W.L.R. 426 at 438.

<sup>56</sup> In Downs v Chappell, above, at 434 it was said that "No question of remoteness arises". This seems to mean that the test of remoteness was satisfied.

reasonably have foreseen that the representee would suffer a loss of value of the kind which in fact occurred after the time of the transaction.

(4) Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(2)

Under this subsection "damages" may be awarded in lieu of rescission even though the misrepresentation is wholly innocent<sup>57</sup> and even though it has no contractual force. There is, therefore, no reason for regarding these damages as being either tortious or contractual. They are really sui generis, and the subsection gives no clue as to the basis of assessment or as to the rules as to remoteness that govern an award under it. The legislative history gives some slight support to the view that the contractual basis was not to be applied<sup>58</sup>; and indeed it seems unreasonable to make a person who has not guaranteed the truth of his representations liable as if he had. On the other hand, a person should not actually profit from even a wholly innocent non-contractual misrepresentation; and accordingly he should be liable for the amount by which the actual value of what he has transferred is less than the price received by him.

So far as remoteness is concerned, there is nothing in the wording of the subsection<sup>59</sup> to suggest that the strict deceit rule applies, nor (as a matter of policy) should it apply against a misrepresentor who is wholly innocent; and it may be doubted whether he should be liable for consequential loss at all. The view that he should not be so liable can perhaps be supported by reference to s.2(3) which provides that damages may be awarded under subs.(2) against a person who is also liable under subs.(1), "but where he is so liable any award under the said subsection (2) shall be taken into account in assessing his liability under the said subsection (1)". It can be inferred from these words that damages under subs.(2) are meant to be less than damages under subs.(1). One possible explanation for this may be that remoteness is governed by the deceit rule under subs.(1) while under subs.(2) damages are limited by the contract rule of remoteness, which is more restrictive even than that applicable in tort to cases of negligence.<sup>60</sup> Dicta which support this view of the damages recoverable under s.2(2)<sup>61</sup> do not, however, rule out the possibility that such damages may be less than those recoverable in contract,<sup>62</sup> and they could be less if, under the subsection, consequential loss were not recoverable at all. If this view were to be accepted, a wholly innocent misrepresentor would be liable only for the amount by which the actual value was less than the price; while a negligent misrepresentor could be made liable for this amount under subs.(1) or (2), and, in addition, for consequential loss under subs.(1).<sup>63</sup>

7. Limit of the Right to Damages

(1) Cases in which damages cannot be recovered

Although the availability of damages for misrepresentation has been greatly extended by Hedley Byrne's case and the Misrepresentation Act, there is still no right to damages for <sup>57</sup> i.e. even though it is neither fraudulent nor negligent and even though the representor has discharged the burden of proof under s.2(1).

<sup>58</sup> At one stage an amendment was introduced to apply the contractual basis to actions under s.2(2): Standing Committee G, February 23, 1966. But it was withdrawn without discussion. The point made in n.33 above on p.363 applies here.

<sup>59</sup> i.e. there is no fiction of fraud so that the reasoning of the Royscot case [1991] 2 Q.B. 297, above, pp.362–363, (even if sound) does not apply.

<sup>60</sup> See below, pp.965–968.

<sup>61</sup> William Sindall v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016 at 1038, 1044.

<sup>62</sup> ibid. p.1038 ("not necessary . . . to discuss the circumstances in which they may be less").

<sup>63</sup> See Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 591.

a wholly innocent misrepresentation which has no contractual force. In the case of such a misrepresentation, the court has a discretionary power to award damages in lieu of rescission; but it cannot rescind the contract, or regard it as rescinded and award damages. If the representee wishes to rescind for a wholly innocent non-contractual misrepresentation, and if the court does not think it equitable to declare the contract subsisting and award damages in lieu of rescission, the old rule that damages cannot be recovered for innocent misrepresentation<sup>64</sup> will continue to apply. In such a case the representee may, however, have a remedy by way of an indemnity.

(2) Indemnity

In rescinding a contract, equity will so far as possible order each party to restore benefits received under the contract from the other. In the simplest case, the seller will have to restore the price and the buyer the thing sold. It is sometimes necessary, as part of the process of rescission, to go further and to order one party to "restore" a benefit not received directly by him. Suppose, for example, that a buyer rescinds after having, under the terms of the contract, paid the price to a third party. There is little doubt that in such a case rescission would entitle the buyer to recover the money so paid from the seller.<sup>65</sup>

On the same principle, the buyer can sometimes recover an "indemnity" in respect of certain expenses; while other expenses are regarded as damages and may therefore be irrecoverable in cases of wholly innocent non-contractual misrepresentation. The distinction can be illustrated by reference to Whittington v Seale-Hayne.<sup>66</sup> A tenant had taken a lease of premises for the purpose of breeding poultry; he had done so in reliance on a representation that the premises were in good sanitary condition. In fact the water supply was poisoned so that the tenant's manager became ill and most of the birds died. The landlord submitted to rescission and agreed to repay £20 in respect of rent and rates paid, and repairs done, by the tenant under the lease. On the other hand, claims for loss of profits and loss of stock were disallowed as they were clearly claims for damages. Further claims for removal expenses<sup>67</sup> and medical expenses were rejected on the same ground: they were not claims for an indemnity, since such claims could be allowed only in respect of expenses incurred in discharging obligations created by the contract.<sup>68</sup> The important distinction is that between the money spent on rates and repairs on the one hand, and the removal and medical expenses on the other. It is that the lease obliged the tenant to pay rates and to do repairs, but not to move in and employ a manager. The tenant's undertaking to pay rates and to do repairs was really part of the price for the lease of the premises. If the lease had provided that the landlord should do these things, he would no doubt have charged a higher rent, which he would clearly have had to restore. He was under a similar liability in respect of part of the price not paid directly to him, or not paid in cash. The tenant's removal and medical expenses could not be regarded in this way. On the facts of the case a claim for damages under s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act would now almost certainly succeed<sup>69</sup>; but if the defendant could discharge the burden of proof under that subsection<sup>70</sup> the representee would still be

<sup>64</sup> See above, p.357.

<sup>65</sup> Any question between seller and third party would not be the concern of the buyer.

<sup>66</sup> (1900) 82 L.T. 49; 16 T.L.R. 181; 44 S.J. 229.

<sup>67</sup> On this point, cf. Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>68</sup> For a possible extension of the right to necessary maintenance costs, see Lagunas Nitrate Co v Lagunas Syndicate [1899] 2 Ch. 392.

<sup>69</sup> cf. above, p.357, n.60.

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.351.

restricted to a claim for an indemnity. He could not rescind and get damages under s.2(2) of the Act.

The distinction between indemnity and damages, it is submitted, is that stated in the preceding paragraph, but there is thought to be some conflict of opinion on the point in Nembigging v Adam.<sup>71</sup> The representee was induced by the defendants' fraud to enter into a partnership with them and another person. On rescinding the contract of partnership he was clearly entitled to get back the money which he had paid for his share. The Court of Appeal held that he was also entitled to be indemnified against his liability to pay debts incurred by the partnership.<sup>72</sup> The crucial point is that it is a term of a contract of partnership, or a legal incident of it,<sup>73</sup> that each partner is liable for the partnership debts. Hence any partner who pays such debts performs an obligation under that contract, though it is also true that the debts arise under another contract (i.e. that with the creditor of the partnership). Accordingly Cotton L.J. said that the representee was entitled to an indemnity "against the obligations which he has contracted under the contract which is set aside".<sup>74</sup> Bowen L.J. similarly said that he was entitled to be restored to his original position "so far as regards the rights and obligations created by the contract into which he has been induced to enter".<sup>75</sup> Only Fry L.J. appears to state a broader view when he says that the representee is entitled to an indemnity not only against obligations "created by" the contract but also against such "obligations entered into under the contract as are within the reasonable expectation of the parties to the contract".<sup>76</sup> What seems to have troubled Fry L.J. is that the debts of the partnership were not "created by" the contract of partnership. But the representee's liability to contribute to the payment of those debts clearly was "created by" or "contracted under" that contract. In the context of Nembigging v Adam, it is submitted that Fry L.J.'s statement does not conflict with the distinction drawn above between indemnity and damages. The point can be illustrated by supposing that the tenant in Whittington v Seale-Hayne<sup>77</sup> had employed a builder to do the repairs and a furniture remover to move in his furniture. The debt to the builder would not of course have been "created by" the lease, but the tenant's obligation to repair was so created, thus entitling him to an indemnity against the cost of its performance: this would amount, prima facie, to the sum due to the builder. The debt to the furniture remover would simply have been incurred in reliance on the lease: it would obviously not have been "created by" the lease; nor even would it have been "entered into under" the lease within Fry L.J.'s formulation.

The grant of an indemnity amounts only to "working out the proper result of setting aside a contract in consequence of misrepresentation".<sup>78</sup> It is ancillary to rescission. It follows that, if the right to rescind is barred, the court cannot grant an indemnity unless the misrepresentor consents to rescission.<sup>79</sup> Where the right to rescind is barred, the court may<sup>80</sup> have no power to award damages in lieu of rescission; and if this is the position the victim of a wholly innocent misrepresentation might still be left, in such a case, without any remedy.

<sup>71</sup> (1886) 34 Ch.D. 582.

<sup>72</sup> In the House of Lords it was held that the question of indemnity did not arise because the debt in question was not enforceable against the firm: Adam v Nembigging (1888) 13 App.Cas. 308.

<sup>73</sup> cf. Partnership Act 1890, s.41.

<sup>74</sup> (1886) 34 Ch. 582 at 589 (italics supplied).

<sup>75</sup> ibid. at 592–593 (italics supplied).

<sup>76</sup> ibid. at 596 (italics supplied).

<sup>77</sup> See above, p.367.

<sup>78</sup> Nembigging v Adam, above, at 589.

<sup>79</sup> As in Whittington v Seale-Hayne (1900) 16 T.L.R. 181, where the right to rescind was probably barred by the execution of the lease; see now below, pp.376–377.

<sup>80</sup> See above, p.359.

8. Compensation Orders in Criminal Cases

Misrepresentation may involve criminal liability, for example, where a person obtains property, services or a pecuniary advantage by deception,<sup>81</sup> or where, in the course of a trade or business, he applies a false trade description to goods or makes a false statement as to the provision of services or accommodation.<sup>82</sup> The court by or before which such a person is convicted may order the offender to pay compensation “for any . . . loss or damage resulting from that offence . . . ”.<sup>83</sup> Such an order may be made even though the conduct constituting the offence does not give rise to any civil liability in damages<sup>84</sup>: for example where a person is convicted under the Theft Act 1968 or 1978 on account of a misrepresentation of law.<sup>85</sup> In the more common case where the criminal conduct also involves civil liability, the making of a compensation order is no bar to later civil proceedings. The damages in those proceedings will be assessed on normal principles, without reference to the order; but, to prevent double recovery, the sum so assessed will be reduced by the amount paid under the compensation order.<sup>86</sup>

SECTION 4. RESCISSION FOR MISREPRESENTATION

1. Introduction

It is impossible to understand the authorities on this subject without referring to the difference between the rules of common law and equity before the Judicature Acts 1873–1875.

At common law the general rule was that a contract could be rescinded for misrepresentation only on the ground of fraud; but this requirement of fraud was subject to several qualifications. If an innocent misrepresentation became a term of the contract, it might give rise to a right to rescind the contract for breach.<sup>87</sup> If it led to a fundamental mistake it might make the contract void so that each party could, on returning what he had got under the contract, recover back what he had given. This was sometimes called “rescinding” the contract, though strictly there was no need to rescind since the contract was void ab initio.<sup>88</sup> Rescission was also available at common law in certain cases of non-disclosure.<sup>89</sup>

In equity, on the other hand, there was a general rule that a contract could be rescinded for “innocent misrepresentation”<sup>90</sup>; this phrase covered every misrepresentation which was not fraudulent, and so included negligent misrepresentation.<sup>91</sup> Now that

<sup>81</sup> Theft Act 1968, ss.15, 16; Theft Act 1978, ss.1, 5.

<sup>82</sup> Trade Descriptions Act 1968, ss.1, 14.

<sup>83</sup> Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.130(1)(a). The power to make “reparation orders” against young offenders under s.73 of the 2000 Act does not appear to envisage the making of orders for monetary compensation. See also Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.397.

<sup>84</sup> R. v Chappell, The Times, May 26, 1986.

<sup>85</sup> Theft Act 1968, s.15(4); Theft Act 1978, s.5(1). For possible civil liability for such misrepresentations, see above, pp.332–335. For the court’s power to make restitution orders in respect of goods which have been stolen, see Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.148.

<sup>86</sup> Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.134.

<sup>87</sup> See below, pp.758 et seq.

<sup>88</sup> See Kennedy v Panama, etc. Royal Mail Co Ltd (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 580 at 587, stating the common law position before the Judicature Acts.

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.401; see, for example, Ionides v Pender (1874) L.R. 9 Q.B. 531; the distinctions formerly drawn between various kinds of insurance are no longer of importance now that all policies can be rescinded in equity for innocent misrepresentation and non-disclosure: see London Assurance v Mansel (1879) 11 Ch.D. 363 at 367.

<sup>90</sup> See Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>91</sup> See above, pp.340, 350.

the equitable rule prevails, the distinction between rescission at common law and in equity is of small (if any) importance; but the fact that the distinction once existed may account for some of the surviving differences between rescission for fraudulent and for innocent misrepresentation.

2. Various Meanings of “Rescission”

Bowen L.J. once said that “A fallacy may possibly lurk in the use of the word ‘rescission’”<sup>92</sup>; and it is a great pity that subsequent lawmakers have not taken this observation to heart. The Misrepresentation Act, in particular, uses the expressions “rescind”, “rescinded” and “rescission” without attempting to define them. They have in the past been used in a number of senses, and it is impossible to say that one of these rather than another is the “correct” one: “there is no primary meaning”.<sup>93</sup> The following distinctions, in particular, are relevant in this Chapter.

(1) Rescission for misrepresentation and for breach

Where a misrepresentation is not a term of the contract, the process which may be referred to as “rescission for misrepresentation” amounts to setting the contract aside for all purposes,<sup>94</sup> so as to restore, as far as possible, the state of things which existed before the contract.<sup>95</sup> Where, on the other hand, a misrepresentation has become a term of the contract<sup>96</sup> the victim of the misrepresentation may seek “rescission for breach”, and this may also result in a restoration of the state of things which existed before the contract.<sup>97</sup> But there is a crucial difference between the two processes.<sup>98</sup> Rescission for misrepresentation involves an allegation that there was a defect in the formation of the contract; and if this allegation is substantiated it follows that the contract is avoided ab initio. Rescission for breach, on the other hand, involves an allegation that there was a defect in the performance of the contract; and the existence of such a defect does not lead to the conclusion that the contract should be treated as if it had never existed. It follows that a party who rescinds for breach can also claim damages for breach of the contract<sup>99</sup>; while one who rescinds for misrepresentation has, by treating the contract as if it never existed, prima facie lost the right to claim damages for its breach.<sup>1</sup> If such a conclusion were to cause hardship to the representee the court could exercise its discretion under s.2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act to declare the contract subsisting.<sup>2</sup>

(2) Rescinding and pleading misrepresentation as a defence

A party who “rescinds” a contract (whether for misrepresentation or for breach) may take active steps to this end: e.g. by seeking the cancellation of the contract, or a

<sup>92</sup> Mersey Steel and Iron Co v Naylor Benzon & Co (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 648 at 671.

<sup>93</sup> Buckland v Farmar & Moody [1979] 1 W.L.R. 221 at 232.

<sup>94</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 at 398 (“wipe it out altogether”); cf. TSB Bank plc v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430 (no partial rescission); contrast Bank Melli Iran v Samadi-Rad [1995] 1 F.C.R. 465.

<sup>95</sup> A duty to restore a loan of money obtained by fraud may arise even before rescission: Stanlake Holdings Ltd v Tropical Capital Investments Ltd, Financial Times, June 25, 1991.

<sup>96</sup> See below, p.375.

<sup>97</sup> See below, p.1052.

<sup>98</sup> Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 392–393; cf. Buckland v Farmar & Moody [1979] 1 W.L.R. 221, 232; Eagle Star Ins Co Ltd v Provincial Ins plc [1994] 1 A.C. 130 at 140; and, in cases of non-disclosure, The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193 at [52].

<sup>99</sup> See below, p.851.

<sup>1</sup> cf. the rule that a party cannot rescind in part while affirming some particular term of the contract: below, p.384.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.358. See further below, p.377.

declaration of its invalidity, or the return of money or property with which he has parted under the contract, on restoring what he obtained under it. Alternatively he may simply rely on the misrepresentation (or breach) as a defence to an action on the contract; and this process is not necessarily governed by the same rules as the active process of rescission.<sup>3</sup>

3. Rescission for Misrepresentation

(1) Contract voidable

The general rule is that misrepresentation makes the contract voidable at the option of the representee.<sup>4</sup> In Redgrave v Hurd,<sup>5</sup> for instance, the defendant was induced to buy a solicitor's house and practice by an innocent misrepresentation as to the value of the practice. It was held that he could rescind the contract and so get back the deposit he had paid.

Misrepresentation makes a contract voidable but not void<sup>6</sup>; and this has important effects on property rights in the subject-matter,<sup>7</sup> both as between the parties and between one of them and a third party. When the contract is one involving the transfer of property in its subject-matter, then between the parties such property is transferred to the representor to the extent that the representee intended it to be so transferred<sup>8</sup>; and if the entire property has been so transferred, then it remains in the representor until rescission.<sup>9</sup> So far as third parties are concerned, we have seen that if a person obtains goods under a contract which is void for mistake, property in the goods may not pass to him so that the goods can be recovered by the owner from a third person into whose hands they have come.<sup>10</sup> But if a person obtains goods under a contract which is only voidable for misrepresentation, a voidable title passes to him and the former owner's right to avoid it is lost when an innocent third party for value acquires an interest in the goods.<sup>11</sup>

The position of the third party in such cases should be contrasted with that of a third party to whom a chose in action<sup>12</sup> is assigned. The assignee takes "subject to equities"<sup>13</sup> and one such "equity" is the possibility of rescission for misrepresentation. Thus if A induces B to sell him a gold watch on credit by some fraud (not giving rise to a fundamental mistake) and pledges the watch to C, C's right to retain the watch is not affected by A's fraud. But if A by fraud induces B to buy a worthless watch, said to be of gold, and assigns the benefit of B's promise to pay for it to C as security for a loan,

<sup>3</sup> See below, pp.372–373.

<sup>4</sup> Clough v L & NW Ry (1871) L.R. 7 Ex. 26 at 34; Urquhart v Macpherson (1878) 3 App.Cas. 831 at 838; cf. Whittaker v Campbell [1984] Q.B. 319 (where, however, the distinctions drawn in the law of contract were said at 329 not to be decisive in criminal law); Killick v Roberts [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1146.

<sup>5</sup> (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>6</sup> See the authorities cited in n.11 below; for a contrary dictum, see Pilgrim v Rice-Smith [1977] 1 W.L.R. 671 at 675; Phillips, 93 L.Q.R. 497; Lonrho plc v Fayed (No.2) [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1 at 7.

<sup>7</sup> Lonrho plc v Fayed (No.2), above.

<sup>8</sup> See Collings v Lee [2001] 2 All E.R. 332 (legal title, but not equitable interest, transferred by house-owners to their agent who had fraudulently claimed to have found a purchaser for the house).

<sup>9</sup> Before rescission, the representor therefore does not hold the property as trustee for the injured party: Bristol & West BS v Mothew [1998] Ch. 1 at 22–23.

<sup>10</sup> e.g. Cundy v Lindsay (1878) 3 App.Cas. 459; above, p.299.

<sup>11</sup> White v Garden (1851) 10 C.B. 919; Stevenson v Newnham (1853) 13 C.B. 285; the third party must give value: Scholefield v Templer (1859) 4 D. & J. 429; and see generally above, pp.299–304.

<sup>12</sup> For the meaning of "chose in action", see below, p.671.

<sup>13</sup> See below, p.689; cf. Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.50(2); William Pickersgill & Sons Ltd v London & Provincial Marine, etc. Insurance Co Ltd [1912] 3 K.B. 614 (non-disclosure).

C's right to sue B is affected by A's fraud.<sup>14</sup> It looks at first sight strange that the third party's position should depend on whether the fraudulent person was buyer or seller. One reason for treating the two cases differently may be that the law gives greater protection to proprietary than to contractual rights; and this distinction could be justified by saying that the assignee of a chose in action takes a greater business risk than the pledgee of a chattel. But some cases will still cause difficulty. For example, a person may fraudulently induce a company to allot shares to him and then sell them to an innocent third party. It is disputed whether shares are to be regarded as choses in action or as property in possession,<sup>15</sup> and it is therefore not clear whether the third party would take subject to the company's "equity" of rescission, or whether the company's right to rescind would be barred by the third party's acquisition of a proprietary interest.

(2) Mode of rescission

A contract may be rescinded by bringing legal proceedings, or simply by giving notice to the other party, though, even in the latter case, legal proceedings may be necessary to work out the consequences of rescission. This is most obviously true where, as a result of rescission, a sum of money becomes due to the representee and the representor refuses to pay it. It may also be desirable to have a court order stating that a formal transaction (such as a lease or a transfer of shares) has been or ought to be set aside. Even in such a case rescission is the act of the representee and not that of the court, so that the time at which it takes effect is when the representee gives the notice or commences legal proceedings—not the time of the court's order.<sup>16</sup> In other cases no legal proceedings are necessary to give effect to the consequences of rescission: thus where goods have been obtained by fraud rescission can be effected by simply taking them back.<sup>17</sup>

All these modes of rescission involve some degree of notice to the representor; but it has been held that this is not always necessary. In Car & Universal Finance Co Ltd v Caldwell<sup>18</sup> the owner of a car was induced by fraud to sell it to a rogue who absconded and could not be traced. On discovering the fraud, the owner notified the police and the Automobile Association and asked them for help in recovering the car. It was held that these acts were enough to rescind the contract, so that an innocent third party who later bought the car got no title to it. It would no doubt be hard on the owner to hold that he could only rescind by communicating with the rogue, for this would deprive him of the right to rescind whenever the rogue disappears. But the actual decision is equally hard on the third party<sup>19</sup>; and the Law Reform Committee has recommended that it

<sup>14</sup> Good faith on the part of C is assumed in both examples.

<sup>15</sup> See Gower, Modern Company Law (6th ed.), pp.357–361. In MCC Proceeds Inc v Lehman Bros International Europe [1998] 4 All E.R. 675 at 686 share certificates were treated as chattels for the purpose of a claim in conversion (which failed) but Hobhouse L.J. said at 699 that the shares themselves were, for that purpose, choses in action.

<sup>16</sup> Reese Silver Mining Co v Smith (1869) L.R. 4 H.L. 64.

<sup>17</sup> Re Eastgate [1905] 1 K.B. 465, doubted but semble not on this point in Re Goldcorp Exchange Ltd [1995] 1 A.C. 74 at 103.

<sup>18</sup> [1965] 1 Q.B. 525.

<sup>19</sup> Such a third party may, in appropriate circumstances, be protected by s.25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979: Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1965] 1 Q.B. 560; but the scope of this protection is limited: see Thornley [1965] C.L.J. 24. The Law Reform Committee has recommended that the rule in Caldwell's case should be reversed: 12th Report (1966) Cmnd. 2958, para.16; this is already the position in Scots Law: see MacLeod v Ker, 1965 S.C. 253, where (without mentioning Caldwell's case) the Court of Session decided a very similar case in favour of the third party, saying at 257: "By no stretch of imagination could we treat an intimation to the police as of any materiality to found a plea of rescission of contract". See also Young v D S Dalgleish & Son (Hawick) 1994 S.C.L.R. 696.

should be reversed. It applies only where the representor has disappeared or for some other reason cannot be reached.<sup>20</sup>

The general principles governing the mode of rescission apply whether the representation is fraudulent or negligent or innocent. But in Caldwell's case the Court of Appeal left open the question whether the rule there laid down applies where the misrepresentation is negligent. The question is perhaps academic since negligent representors are not likely to go into hiding; but it is submitted that the rule can be justified, if at all, only by the strong need to protect victims of fraud and that it should not be applied in cases of negligent or wholly innocent misrepresentation. It is also questionable whether the rule that a contract can be rescinded by simply taking back goods delivered under it should be applied except in cases of fraud.

(3) Misrepresentation as a defence

The operation of misrepresentation as a defence to an action to enforce the contract is illustrated by further reference to Redgrave v Hurd.<sup>21</sup> The purchaser there successfully relied on the misrepresentations as to the value of the practice by way of defence to the vendor's claim for specific performance.

Since this process of pleading misrepresentation as a defence is a form of "rescission"<sup>22</sup> it is, in general, subject to the requirement that the representee must return what he got under the contract.<sup>23</sup> But this requirement does not always apply where the representor is guilty of actual fraud. For example where a ship was insured after she had, to the knowledge of the assured, been lost, it was held that the insurer could repudiate liability under the policy on the ground of fraud, and also keep the premiums.<sup>24</sup> The result is to leave the insurer with a windfall; but the rule may perhaps be justified by the strong need to discourage fraud.<sup>25</sup> Even this justification is, however, hard to square with the further rule that, if the insurer takes the initiative by suing for rescission, he does have to return the premiums.<sup>26</sup> This is also the position where he relies on a negligent or wholly innocent misrepresentation as a defence<sup>27</sup>; unless the policy provides for forfeiture of premiums if any false statement is made in the proposal form.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Empresa Cubana de Fletes v Lagonisi Shipping Co Ltd [1971] 1 Q.B. 488 at 505 (actual decision overruled in The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850).

<sup>21</sup> (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>22</sup> See above, p.370.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.370; below, p.378.

<sup>24</sup> See Tyler v Horne (1785) and Chapman v Fraser (1795), related in Park on Marine Insurance (8th ed.), pp.455, 456; Feise v Parkinson (1812) 4 Taunt. 639 at 641; Anderson v Thornton (1853) 8 Exch. 425 at 428. Contra, Fowkes v Manchester, etc. Assurance (1863) 3 B. & S. 917, 929, where Blackburn J. is reported to have said that in cases of fraudulent misrepresentation the premiums could be recovered back. But the corresponding passages in 11 W.R. 622, 623 and 8 L.T. 309, 311 refer to innocent misrepresentation; and these reports are to be preferred as they make the statement consistent with the earlier authorities, from which Blackburn J. showed no intention of departing. See also Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.84(1) and (3), restating the common law rule.

<sup>25</sup> If the assured could recover back the premiums, the only risk to which he would be exposed under the civil law would be that of not being able to sue on the policy; and where he had already lost the property this would be no risk at all.

<sup>26</sup> Barker v Walters (1844) 8 Beav. 92 at 96; London Assurance v Mansel (1879) 11 Ch.D. 363; cf. The Litsian Pride [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437 at 515 (disapproved on another point in The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1, [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193; at [71]). Quaere whether an insurer who only claims a declaration that he is entitled to avoid the policy on the ground of fraud (as in Fire, etc., Insurance v Greene [1964] 2 Q.B. 687) must return the premiums.

<sup>27</sup> Feise v Parkinson (1812) 4 Taunt. 639; Anderson v Thornton (1853) 8 Exch. 425.

<sup>28</sup> Kumar v Life Insurance Corp of India [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 147; Hasson, 38 M.L.R. 93. If the insured was a consumer, such a term might not bind the consumer if it was "unfair" within Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, above, pp.271, 274.

A further situation in which a person can plead fraud as a defence without restoring what he has obtained under the contract is illustrated by Berg v Sadler & Moore.<sup>29</sup> The claimant was a retail tobacconist, and knew that the defendants (who were wholesalers) would not supply him as he had been put on a stop-list<sup>30</sup> for price-cutting. He therefore sent one Reece to the defendants to buy cigarettes, ostensibly in his own name. Reece paid with money supplied by the claimant but when the defendants discovered the true facts they refused to deliver the cigarettes or to pay back the price. It was held that the claimant was not entitled to the return of the price, so that (as in the insurance cases discussed above) the defendants were left with a windfall. The court justified this result on the ground that the claimant had been engaged in an attempt to perpetrate a criminal fraud; and the rule seems to be based on the supposed need to deter such fraud,<sup>31</sup> though it is far from clear why adequate deterrence is not provided by the criminal law. The rule would probably not apply where the fraud was not criminal: e.g. where a statement was made with knowledge of its falsity but without dishonest intent.<sup>31a</sup> The rule should certainly not apply where the misrepresentation was only negligent or where it was innocent.

(4) Application to sale of goods

It has been doubted whether the equitable remedy of rescission for innocent misrepresentation applies at all to a contract for sale of goods.<sup>32</sup> The remedy is not mentioned in the Sale of Goods Act 1979, and in Re Wait Atkin L.J. said that "the total sum of legal relations (meaning by the word 'legal' existing in equity as well as in common law) arising out of the contract for the sale of goods may well be regarded as defined by the Code".<sup>33</sup> S.62(2) of the Act indeed saves the rules of "common law so far as they are not inconsistent with the Act, but it has been held in other jurisdictions that "common law" here does not include equity, and that the equitable right to rescind a contract for the sale of goods for innocent misrepresentation has not (if it ever existed) survived the Act.<sup>34</sup> But it is submitted that this view should be rejected for the following reasons.

First: the Act plainly does not deal with every aspect of a contract for the sale of goods. It does not, for example, deal with assignment but clearly the benefit of a contract for the sale of goods can be assigned.<sup>35</sup> The Act can only deal exhaustively with the topics to which its enacting sections refer. One of those topics, admittedly, is remedies and Atkin L.J. has said that the rules contained in the Act as to (inter alia) the "remedies" of the parties appear to be "complete and exclusive statements of the legal relations both at law and in equity".<sup>36</sup> Even this may, with respect, be doubted. Breach of a contract for the sale of goods may be restrained by injunction,<sup>37</sup> and such a contract

<sup>29</sup> [1937] 2 K.B. 158; Allen, 54 L.Q.R. 201; Goodhart, ibid. 216; Treitel in Essays in Memory of Sir Rupert Cross, pp.107–108.

<sup>30</sup> This practice was made unlawful by Resale Prices Act 1976, Pt I, but that Act has (subject to transitional provisions) been repealed by Competition Act 1998, s.1.

<sup>31</sup> South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 215; Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1997] A.C. 254 at 279; cf. Direct Line Insurance v Khan [2001] N.L.J. 485 (fraud relating to part of an insurance claim held to make insured liable to return the whole of the sum paid by the insurers); and see below, pp.438–439.

<sup>31a</sup> See Polhill v Walter (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 114, above, p.343.

<sup>32</sup> Atiyah, 22 M.L.R. 76; but see his Sale of Goods (10th ed.), pp.529–530.

<sup>33</sup> [1927] 1 Ch. 606 at 635.

<sup>34</sup> Riddiford v Warren (1901) 20 N.Z.L.R. 572; followed in Watt v Westhoven [1933] V.L.R. 458.

<sup>35</sup> Re Wait [1927] 1 Ch. 606 at 636.

<sup>36</sup> ibid.

<sup>37</sup> See below, p.1046.

may be rectified,<sup>38</sup> although these remedies are not mentioned in the Act. In any event, it seems that Atkin L.J. used the word “remedies” in the sense in which it is used in Pt VI of the Act, i.e. to mean remedies for breach of contract<sup>39</sup>; and rescission for misrepresentation is not such a remedy.<sup>40</sup> In an earlier case, Atkin J. himself had said that, if the seller had made a misrepresentation, the buyer “would be entitled to rescind the contract”.<sup>41</sup>

Secondly: it is submitted that in s.62(2) “common law” does include equity. The subsection saves the rules of “common law . . . relating to the law of principal and agent and the effect of fraud, misrepresentation, duress or coercion, mistake, or other invalidating cause”. Misrepresentation is here regarded as an invalidating cause distinct from fraud and mistake. But at common law an innocent misrepresentation did not invalidate a contract for the sale of goods,<sup>42</sup> unless it induced a fundamental mistake. Hence the saving of the rules as to the effect of misrepresentation can refer only to the rules of equity. Moreover, it would be strange if the Act saved the rules of common law, but not those of equity, relating to mistake and agency.

Thirdly: the authorities support the view that a contract for the sale of goods can be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation. In Leaf v International Galleries<sup>43</sup> and Long v Lloyd<sup>44</sup> the right to rescind such contracts for innocent misrepresentation was held to be barred—in the first case by lapse of time and in the second by acceptance.<sup>45</sup> The decision in each case was that the right to rescind had been lost: not that it never existed. In Goldsmith v Roger<sup>46</sup> a contract for the sale of a boat was induced by an innocent<sup>47</sup> misrepresentation of the buyer; and it was held that the seller could “rescind” in the sense of being able to rely on the misrepresentation as a defence.

Fourthly: if a contract for the sale of goods could not be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation the injured party would have no remedy at all for an innocent misrepresentation not incorporated in the contract. Such an unjust result ought not to be reached in the absence of a clear statutory provision to that effect.

4. Incorporated Misrepresentation

(1) Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.1(a)

S.1(a) provides that a person who has entered into a contract after a misrepresentation has been made to him shall be entitled to rescind notwithstanding that “the misrepresentation has become a term of the contract” if he would otherwise be entitled to rescind without alleging fraud. This right to rescind therefore survives<sup>48</sup> when a statement of fact (as opposed to a promise<sup>49</sup>) is made to induce a contract and later

<sup>38</sup> e.g. Caraman, Rowley & May v Aperghis (1928) 40 T.L.R. 124; the same assumption was made (though the claim for rectification failed) in F E Rose (London) Ltd v W H Pim Jr & Co Ltd [1953] 2 Q.B. 450, above, p.324.

<sup>39</sup> See the title of Pt VI of the Act and the sub-headings before ss.49 and 51.

<sup>40</sup> Unless Atkin L.J.’s remarks are interpreted in this way the first three sections of the Misrepresentation Act would not apply to contracts for the sale of goods; but obviously no court would reach this conclusion.

<sup>41</sup> Re Harrison & Micks, Lambert & Co [1917] 1 K.B. 755 at 761.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.369. Negligent misrepresentation was not recognised as a separate category in 1893, when the Sale of Goods Act was originally passed.

<sup>43</sup> [1950] 2 K.B. 86.

<sup>44</sup> [1958] 1 W.L.R. 753.

<sup>45</sup> cf. below, pp.383–384.

<sup>46</sup> [1962] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 249.

<sup>47</sup> i.e. not fraudulent: cf. above, pp.340, 350, 369.

<sup>48</sup> For doubts on this point before the Act, see Cie Française de Chemin de Fer Paris-Orléans v Leeston Shipping Co (1919) 1 L.L.R. 235; Pennsylvania Shipping Co v Cie Nationale de Navigation (1936) 155 L.T. 294.

<sup>49</sup> See above, p.331.

becomes one of its terms. But s.1(a) does not take away any remedies for breach of contract; and the relation between these remedies and the statutory right to rescind is obscure.

Apart from the Misrepresentation Act, breach of contract gives rise sometimes to a right to damages for breach only, and sometimes to a right to damages and also to a right to “rescind for breach”.<sup>50</sup> Where an incorporated misrepresentation gives rise to both these rights, they can presumably still be exercised independently of s.1 (and the right to rescind for breach is probably unaffected by s.2(2)).<sup>51</sup> Where the incorporated misrepresentation gives rise (apart from the Act) to a right to damages for breach only, the representee can ignore his right to rescind under the Act and claim damages for breach of contract. But it is not clear whether he can still claim such damages if he does “rescind” under s.1(a). If “rescind” here refers to “rescission for misrepresentation” it is arguable that such rescission destroys all outstanding liabilities under the contract, including liability in damages for its breach. This view might cause hardship where a representee had rescinded out of court (e.g. by returning defective goods) but the court could probably come to his rescue by declaring the contract subsisting under s.2(2) of the Act. It is true that damages in lieu of rescission under that subsection may be less than damages for breach of contract<sup>52</sup>; but one effect of declaring the contract subsisting might be to revive the right to damages for breach of contract, i.e. for the untruth of the incorporated misrepresentation.<sup>53</sup>

(2) Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(2)

This subsection, which gives the court a discretion to declare the contract subsisting, and award damages in lieu of rescission,<sup>54</sup> may limit the right to rescind for an incorporated misrepresentation. Where the representee does not rescind but simply claims damages for breach of contract, the subsection clearly has no effect, for the court’s discretion depends on a claim having been made “that the contract ought to be or has been rescinded”. Where the representee does claim “rescission” it is first necessary to ask what would be the effect of the incorporated misrepresentation viewed purely as a breach of contract. If its only effect as a breach would be to give rise to a right to damages, any claim to “rescind” must be a claim to “rescind for misrepresentation” which is subject to the discretion of the court, so that the court could refuse to allow rescission and confine the claimant to a claim for damages. If on the other hand, the effect of the incorporated misrepresentation as a breach would be to give rise to a right to damages and also to a right to “rescind for breach”, the position is less clear. One view is that a representee who treats the contract as repudiated thereby claims “that the contract ought to be or has been rescinded”; and this view has the attraction that it enables the court to restrict the right to “rescind for breach” which has sometimes been exercised by parties who have not suffered any appreciable loss as a result of the breach.<sup>55</sup> On the other hand there is no hint in the legislative history of the Act that any such reform was intended; and if such a change in the law has been made it would be an extraordinarily partial one, for it would apply only to breaches resulting from representations of fact made before the contract (and not to breaches of promises). The better view

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.370; below, pp.758 et seq. For further remedies in consumer sales, see Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.48A to 48F, as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045, reg.5.

<sup>51</sup> See the discussion under heading (2), below.

<sup>52</sup> See above, pp.365–366.

<sup>53</sup> A possibility which was overlooked in 30 M.L.R. at 372.

<sup>54</sup> See above, p.357.

<sup>55</sup> See, for example, below, pp.779, 794–795.

seems to be that “rescinded” in s.2(2) refers only to “rescission for misrepresentation” as the subsection deals with the case of a person “who is entitled, by reason of the misrepresentation to rescind the contract”; and that, accordingly, the right to “rescind for breach” is not subject to the discretion of that court.

SECTION 5. LIMITS TO THE RIGHT TO RESCIND

The right to rescind a contract may be barred by a number of factors. Before these are considered, two points must be made with regard to the effects of the Misrepresentation Act 1967.

1. Effects of Misrepresentation Act 1967

First, the Act has abrogated one restriction on the right to rescind. Before the Act, it had been held that certain contracts could not be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation after they had been “executed” (i.e., performed). This rule applied, in particular, where a contract for the disposition of an interest in land was performed by execution of the conveyance or lease<sup>56</sup>; and where a contract for the sale of shares was performed by transfer of the shares.<sup>57</sup> Many applications<sup>58</sup> of the rule were hard to justify, and its scope was uncertain. It was reversed by s.1(b) of the Act, which provides that a person who would otherwise be entitled to rescind a contract for misrepresentation without alleging fraud<sup>59</sup> shall be so entitled notwithstanding that “the contract has been performed”. The buyer of a house can therefore rescind for misrepresentation even after conveyance and even though the misrepresentation was wholly innocent.

Secondly, the right to rescind a contract for misrepresentation is now subject to the discretion of the court under s.2(2) of the Act.<sup>60</sup> In the case just put, of a house-purchaser claiming rescission for wholly innocent misrepresentation, the court might prefer to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission. For if (as would often be the case) the vendor had used the purchase-money to buy another house, rescission might cause him severe hardship. This would be a factor which the court could take into account under s.2(2), so that rescission would probably be allowed only where the buyer had suffered serious prejudice as a result of the misrepresentation. S.2(2) may, similarly, operate in cases which are not precisely covered by the bars to rescission but in which the court nevertheless considers that damages would be a more appropriate remedy than rescission. It is, however, still necessary to define the bars to rescission because if one of them has arisen the court has no discretion to allow rescission and, on one possible interpretation of s.2(2),<sup>61</sup> cannot award damages either.

<sup>56</sup> Angel v Jay [1911] 1 K.B. 666 (lease).

<sup>57</sup> Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co [1905] 1 Ch. 326.

<sup>58</sup> e.g. in the cases cited in the last two notes. The rule may have served some useful purpose in relation to contracts for the sale of land and to long leases: cf. Law Reform Committee 10th Report Cmnd. 1782 (1962) paras 6 and 7.

<sup>59</sup> The rule that an executed contract could not be rescinded never applied to cases of fraudulent misrepresentation, so that it was not necessary to change the law in such cases.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.358. Rescission was said to be a discretionary remedy even before the 1967 Act: see Spence v Crawford [1939] 3 All E.R. 271 at 288; but this principle would be hard to apply to rescission by some extra-judicial act of the representee (above, pp.371–372); cf. TSB Bank plc v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430 at 438.

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.359.

2. Bars to Rescission

(1) Restitution impossible

Normally, a party who wishes to rescind a contract for misrepresentation is required to restore to the other any benefits which he has obtained under the contract: for example, a buyer who wants to rescind with a view to getting back the price must give back the goods. If the benefit obtained is a sum of money<sup>62</sup> there is never any difficulty in complying with this requirement: the representee restores an equivalent sum. But, where he has obtained a benefit other than money, he may for some reason be unable to restore it; and this inability will sometimes bar his right to rescind.

(a) CHANGES MADE BY MISREPRESENTEE. Where a contract of sale has been induced by a misrepresentation of the seller, the buyer may lose the right to rescind if he has so changed the subject-matter that he can no longer restore what he obtained under the contract: for example, the buyer of an animal who has slaughtered it cannot rescind on returning the corpse.<sup>63</sup> Similarly, the purchaser of a business cannot get back his purchase-money after carrying on the business for four months and disposing of some of its assets,<sup>64</sup> or after changing a partnership into a limited company<sup>65</sup>; nor can the purchaser of a mine rescind after he has worked it out.<sup>66</sup> On the same principle a person cannot rescind after he has disposed of the subject-matter of the contract unless, perhaps, he has been able to get back that subject-matter or its substantial equivalent.<sup>67</sup>

(b) DETERIORATION OR DECLINE IN VALUE. In the cases discussed above, deterioration or decline in value barred the right to rescind because it was due to the acts of the representee. Where it is due to other causes, different rules apply. The right to rescind is clearly not barred where the subject-matter deteriorates precisely because it lacks a quality that it was represented to possess. Thus a person who is induced to enter into a partnership by a misrepresentation as to its solvency can still rescind after the bankruptcy of the firm.<sup>68</sup> The position is the same where the deterioration or decline in value is not related to the misrepresentation but is due to some external cause. In Armstrong v Jackson<sup>69</sup> a broker purported to buy shares for a client, but in fact sold his own shares to the client. Five years later, when the shares had fallen in value from nearly £3 to 5s., it was held that the client could rescind on account of the broker's breach of duty.<sup>70</sup> He still had the identical shares and was able to return them, together with the

<sup>62</sup> Or the release of an obligation to pay money, as in The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293; see esp. p.337.

<sup>63</sup> Clarke v Dickson (1858) E.B. & E. 148 at 155.

<sup>64</sup> Sheffield Nickel Co Ltd v Unwin (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 215; cf. Thomas Witter Ltd v BTP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 588.

<sup>65</sup> Clarke v Dickson (1858) E.B. & E. 148; quaere whether this is per se decisive; Western Bank of Scotland v Addie (1867) L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 145 at 159.

<sup>66</sup> Clarke v Dickson, above; Lagunas Nitrate Co v Lagunas Syndicate [1899] 2 Ch. 392.

<sup>67</sup> e.g. where a buyer of shares has sold them but can re-acquire an equivalent quantity in the market. In Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd the Court of Appeal seems to have taken the view that the buyer could not rescind in such a case: [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1271 at 1280; but on appeal Lord Browne-Wilkinson said that the law on the point would have to be "closely looked at hereafter:" [1997] A.C. 254 at 264. Some difficulty might arise where the representee had bought the subject matter back for less than the amount for which he had previously sold it, so that he would make an actual profit out of rescission: see Marr v Tumulty 175 N.E. 356 (1931). Perhaps he could be required to account for any such profit as part of the process of rescission.

<sup>68</sup> Adam v Newbigging (1886) 34 Ch.D. 582; (1888) 13 App.Cas. 308.

<sup>69</sup> [1917] 2 K.B. 822.

<sup>70</sup> See below, p.745.

dividends he had received. McCardie J. said: "It is only . . . where the plaintiff has sustained loss by the inferiority of the subject-matter or a substantial fall in its value that he will desire to exert his power of rescission. . . . If mere deterioration of the subject-matter negated the right to rescind, the doctrine of rescission would become a vain thing".<sup>71</sup>

Similarly, a contractual right to reject is not lost simply because the subject-matter deteriorates without the fault of the party claiming to rescind. In Head v Tattersall<sup>72</sup> the buyer of a horse was allowed to return it for breach of "warranty"<sup>73</sup> although it had been seriously injured through no fault of his. Bramwell B. added that the right to reject would not be lost if "the injury were caused by reason of a trial necessary to test the warranty".<sup>74</sup> It is submitted that these rules also apply where the buyer is induced to buy by a misrepresentation which has been incorporated in the contract.<sup>75</sup>

(c) CHANGES MADE BY MISREPRESENTOR. Where the misrepresentation is that of the seller, the question is whether the buyer (i.e. misrepresentee) can rescind even though he cannot restore the subject-matter in its original state. A sale may also be induced by a misrepresentation on the part of the buyer, e.g. as to his solvency or as to the value of the subject-matter. The question then arises whether the seller's right to rescind is affected by some dealing with the subject-matter by the buyer (who in such a case is the misrepresentor). Obviously, the right may be so affected in a practical sense where the buyer consumes the property or so alters it that the seller has no interest in getting it back. As a matter of law, however, a buyer who is guilty of fraud cannot rely on his own dealings<sup>76</sup> with the subject-matter as a bar to the seller's right to rescind. In Spence v Crawford<sup>77</sup> A was induced by the fraud of B to enter into a contract by which (i) A sold to B shares in a company, and (ii) B undertook to relieve A of his liability under a guarantee of the company's bank overdraft, and to procure the release of securities deposited by A with the bank. A duly transferred the shares, while B relieved A of his liability to the bank and freed the securities by giving his own personal guarantee to the bank. The constitution of the company was later altered and some of the shares in it were sold. It was held that this dealing with the shares did not bar A's right to rescind. The question whether it would have had this effect if B's misrepresentation had been innocent was left open.<sup>78</sup>

(d) BENEFIT TO MISREPRESENTEE. The mere fact that the misrepresentee has received a benefit under the contract does not bar his right to rescind, if the misrepresentor has not been put to any expense in conferring that benefit. Thus in Spence v Crawford the fact that B had relieved A of his liability to the bank and freed his securities did not bar A's right to rescind. B was not put to any expense by merely giving the guarantee to the bank, nor was he ever asked to pay anything under it, as the company prospered. We shall see that B did suffer some loss as a result of giving his guarantee, but this did not bar A's claim to rescind as he was able to make allowance for it.<sup>79</sup>

<sup>71</sup> [1917] 2 K.B. 822 at 829.

<sup>72</sup> (1871) L.R. 7 Ex. 7.

<sup>73</sup> i.e. a "condition" in the modern terminology used at below, p.788.

<sup>74</sup> (1871) L.R. Ex. 7 at 12.

<sup>75</sup> cf. Long v Lloyd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 753 at 760.

<sup>76</sup> Nor on the other party's dealings at his request: cf. Hulton v Hulton [1917] 1 K.B. 813 (destruction of letters).

<sup>77</sup> [1939] 3 All E.R. 271.

<sup>78</sup> ibid. at 281. The effect of negligence in such a situation is also unclear.

<sup>79</sup> See below, p.381.

Conversely, if no benefit has been received by the representee, the right to rescind is not lost merely because the representor has acted on the contract to his prejudice. In Mackenzie v Royal Bank of Canada<sup>80</sup> a wife was induced by misrepresentation to deposit share certificates with a bank as security for the overdraft of a company controlled by her husband. She was able to rescind although the bank had, after the deposit, advanced further money to the company, for she had received no benefit from this payment. It is sometimes said that the object of rescission is to restore the parties to the situation in which they would have been if the contract had never been made,<sup>81</sup> but in the light of Mackenzie's case such statements are not quite accurate. The essential point is that the representee should not be unjustly enriched at the representor's expense<sup>82</sup>; that the representor should not be prejudiced is a secondary consideration.

(c) PRECISE RESTITUTION IMPOSSIBLE. The general rule that a representee had to restore what he had got under the contract was very strictly applied at common law where a person sought the return of his money on rescission for breach. The rule was so strict that a person who had agreed to buy an interest in land lost the right to get his money back merely by going into possession under the contract. The benefit of even such temporary possession was thought to make restitution impossible.<sup>83</sup> The authorities supporting this rule were sometimes cited in cases of rescission for misrepresentation<sup>84</sup>; though it is by no means clear whether the strict common law rule ever extended to such cases. The point is no longer of any importance, since a more flexible rule was developed by equity in cases of misrepresentation, and this rule now prevails.

In equity a representee who is able to make substantial, though not precise, restitution can rescind if he returns the subject-matter of the contract in its altered state, accounts for any profits derived from it and makes allowance for deterioration caused by his dealing with it. Thus a person who has gone into possession under a contract to buy, or take a lease of, land can rescind<sup>85</sup> on terms of paying rent for the period of his occupation.<sup>86</sup> The court can also set off benefits received by one party against those received by the other.<sup>87</sup> Similarly, in Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co<sup>88</sup> a company bought and worked a phosphate mine, but did not so work it out as to make restitution utterly impossible. It was held that the company could rescind the sale for breach of fiduciary duty by one of its promoters on terms of returning the mine and accounting for the profits of working it. Lord Blackburn said that equity could "take account of profits and make allowance for deterioration."<sup>89</sup> And I think the practice has always been for a court of equity to give this relief whenever, by the exercise of its powers, it can do

<sup>80</sup> [1934] A.C. 468; cf. TSB Bank v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430.

<sup>81</sup> e.g. Gillett v Peppercorne (1840) 3 Beav. 78 at 81.

<sup>82</sup> Bouygues Offshore v Utilisol Transport Contractors [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 153 at 159.

<sup>83</sup> Hunt v Silk (1804) 5 East 449; Blackburn v Smith (1848) 2 Ex. 783 (both cases of pure breach); below, p.1061.

<sup>84</sup> e.g. in Clarke v Dickson (1858) E.B. & E. 148.

<sup>85</sup> Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch.D. 1.

<sup>86</sup> Hulton v Hulton [1917] 1 K.B. 813 at 826. It seems that no such terms were imposed in Redgrave v Hurd, above, where the buyer got back the whole of his deposit in spite of having been in possession for a short time.

<sup>87</sup> Hulton v Hulton [1917] 1 K.B. 813.

<sup>88</sup> (1878) 3 App.Cas. 1218; cf. Gillett v Peppercorne (1840) 3 Beav. 78; The Lucy [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 188 at 202.

<sup>89</sup> cf. Cheese v Thomas [1994] 1 W.L.R. 129, where rescission of a joint house purchase was claimed, not against the vendor, but by one of the joint purchasers against the other. The case was one of presumed undue influence (below, p.419) but the court relied on misrepresentation cases, such as Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch.D. 582.

what is practically just, though it cannot restore the parties precisely to the state they were in before the contract".<sup>90</sup>

These powers of adjustment are normally exercised where the misrepresentee is a buyer who claims back his money. They may also be available in the converse case where the misrepresentee is a seller who claims back his property, as in Spence v Crawford.<sup>91</sup> The fraudulent buyer in that case had performed his contractual undertaking to relieve the seller of certain obligations to a bank. He was asked by the bank to sell some stock to maintain his liquidity, and the sale resulted in a loss to him of £1,000. The final order made in that case was that the seller should recover back his shares plus the dividends received by the buyer; but that he should repay the purchase price plus interest, and make allowance in respect of part<sup>92</sup> of the £1,000 lost by the buyer on the sale of his stock.

(f) NATURE OF SUBJECT-MATTER. Restitution by the representee may be possible but the court may be unwilling to order it on account of the nature of the property. This was the position in The Siben<sup>93</sup> where a contract for the sale of property included an escort agency, the employees of which provided "sexual favours" for its clients. The sale had been induced by the vendor's fraudulent misrepresentations unrelated to this point; and a claim to rescind the contract was rejected on the ground that the court should not "make an order which would in principle have the effect of transferring an illegal business from one party to another".<sup>94</sup> This reasoning is not easy to reconcile with the principle that rescission is the act of the representee, not that of the court<sup>95</sup>; and the return of the illegal business would, moreover be merely a condition of any judgment which might have been given for the return of the price, so that there would have been no need to make an actual order for the return of that business.

(g) IMPROVEMENTS IN THE SUBJECT-MATTER. Two problems arise where dealings with the subject-matter have not decreased its value, but have improved it. The first is whether such dealings bar the right to rescind; the second is what allowance (if any) is to be awarded in respect of the improvements. These may be made either by the misrepresentee or by the misrepresenter.

(i) Made by the misrepresentee. One illustration of this possibility is provided by Boyd & Forrest v Glasgow & SW Ry.<sup>96</sup> Contractors alleged that they had been induced to enter into a contract to build a railway by misrepresentations as to the strata. After the railway had been built, they claimed to rescind, with a view to recovering a quantum meruit (exceeding the contract price) for the cost of the work. The claim failed on a number of grounds, one of which was that the right to rescind was barred since it was no longer possible to restore the railway company to its original position. This is an unusual application of the requirement of restoration, which normally prevents the representee from rescinding unless he can give back benefits that he has received. In this case, the requirement prevented rescission because the representee could not take back benefits that he had conferred.<sup>97</sup> The decision can be explained on the ground that it was not practicable to restore the parties to their pre-contract position, so that "rescission"

<sup>90</sup> (1878) 3 App.Cas. 1218 at 1278–1279; approved in Guinness plc v Saunders [1990] 2 A.C. 663 at 698, but distinguished as the agreement in the latter case was not voidable but void.

<sup>91</sup> [1939] 3 All E.R. 271; above, p.380.

<sup>92</sup> This seems to have been a compromise, adopted to avoid the need to take complicated cross-accounts.

<sup>93</sup> [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35; for further proceedings see [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 667.

<sup>94</sup> [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 at 62.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.372.

<sup>96</sup> 1915 S.C.(H.L.) 20.

<sup>97</sup> For the suggestion that, in such cases, the representee may be able to "waive restitution due to him", see Bouygues Offshore v Ultisol Transport Contractors [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 153 at 159.

made no practical sense. The more convenient remedy is damages and on such facts this would now generally be available under s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act.<sup>98</sup>

A second, and perhaps more common, illustration of this situation is provided by the case of a person who is induced by misrepresentation to buy something which he improves before discovering the truth. In such a case, the improvements probably do not bar the right to rescind; and their cost can often be claimed as damages.<sup>99</sup> Where the representation is wholly innocent and the contract has been rescinded, there will be no such claim<sup>1</sup>; but the representee might be able to set off the cost of the improvements against his liability<sup>2</sup> to make allowance for benefits received by him under the contract.<sup>3</sup>

(ii) Made by the misrepresenter. In Spence v Crawford<sup>4</sup> the fraudulent buyer was granted an allowance in respect of his loss on sale of stock. This loss did not produce any directly corresponding increase in the value of what he had bought; and it was incurred in consequence of something that he was obliged under the contract to do. It does not follow from the decision that a buyer who obtains property by misrepresentation can, if the seller claims rescission, insist on an allowance for improvements which he has made without being contractually bound to do so. It can be argued on the one hand that the seller would get a windfall if he did not have to pay anything for the improvements<sup>5</sup>; and on the other that he should not be forced to pay for improvements (which he may not want or be able to afford) as a condition of getting back his property. The better view, probably, is that if the seller claims rescission, he should have to make some allowance (based on increase in value rather than the cost of work to the buyer).<sup>6</sup> If the seller is unwilling or unable to pay the allowance he can generally fall back on his alternative remedy of damages.<sup>7</sup>

(2) Third party rights

The right to rescind a contract may be barred by the intervention of third party rights. For example, a person who has been induced by fraud to sell goods cannot rescind after the goods have been bought by an innocent third party, that is, by one without notice of the fraud.<sup>8</sup> On the same principle, a person cannot rescind an allotment of shares in a company after the company has gone into liquidation. At that point the rights of third parties intervene in that the assets of the company have to be collected for distribution among the company's creditors.<sup>9</sup> This should be contrasted with the rule in the bankruptcy of an individual that the trustee in bankruptcy takes the property "subject to equities", including the right of rescission. Thus in Load v Green<sup>10</sup> a seller was by fraud induced to sell goods to one Bannister, who became bankrupt. It was held that the seller could disaffirm the contract and recover the value of his goods from Bannister's trustee in bankruptcy. It is difficult to find any convincing reason for this distinction between winding up of insolvent companies and individual bankruptcy. It seems to be

<sup>98</sup> See above, p.350.

<sup>99</sup> See above, pp.345 et seq.

<sup>1</sup> See above, pp.366 et seq.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.378.

<sup>3</sup> cf. Cooper v Phibbs (1867) L.R. 2 H.L. 149, above, pp.320–321.

<sup>4</sup> [1939] 3 All E.R. 271; above, pp.380, 381.

<sup>5</sup> e.g., Williams v Logue, 122 So. 490 (1929).

<sup>6</sup> cf. Walker v Galt, 171 F. 2d 613 (1948); Cheese v Thomas [1994] 1 W.L.R. 129 at 137.

<sup>7</sup> See above, pp.344 et seq.

<sup>8</sup> See above, p.371; and see below, p.424. cf. Society of Lloyd's v Lyon, The Times, August 11, 1997.

<sup>9</sup> Re Scottish Petroleum Co (1883) 23 Ch.D. 413.

<sup>10</sup> (1846) 15 M. & W. 216.

based on the assumption that third parties place greater reliance on a company's nominal share capital (especially if the company is a new one, or has just raised new capital) than on an individual's appearance of wealth.

A similar principle to that here under consideration can apply where a misrepresentation induces the representee to enter into a contract with a third party; for example, where A, by a misrepresentation addressed to B, induces the B to guarantee A's overdraft with the C bank. The bank's ability to enforce such a transaction depends on whether it is "put on enquiry"<sup>11</sup> as to the circumstances in which it was concluded. As in most of the recent cases of this kind the alleged vitiating factor has been undue influence (sometimes together with misrepresentation), a full discussion of the effect of such factors on the rights of the third party will be found in Chapter 10.<sup>12</sup>

(3) Affirmation

A contract cannot be rescinded for misrepresentation if the representee expressly or by conduct affirms it after discovering the truth.<sup>13</sup> Thus a person who is induced by misrepresentation to buy goods cannot rescind if, after discovering the truth, he uses them<sup>14</sup>; a person who is induced by misrepresentation to subscribe for shares in a company cannot rescind if, after discovering the truth, he accepts dividends, votes at meetings or tries to sell the shares<sup>15</sup>; a person who is induced by misrepresentation to take a lease cannot rescind if, after discovering the truth, he stays on and pays rent<sup>16</sup>; a fortiori a mining lease cannot be rescinded if, after discovering the truth, the lessee continues to work the mine.<sup>17</sup> Use of the subject-matter for the sole purpose of testing the accuracy of the representation does not, however, amount to affirmation.<sup>18</sup>

Affirmation may be inferred even from failure to rescind: for example, where a person wishes to rescind an allotment of shares in a company on the ground of misrepresentation. Such a person is not allowed to wait and see whether the company will prosper: he must not only tell the company that he rescinds but must also take steps to remove his name from the register of shareholders.<sup>19</sup>

On a principle analogous to affirmation<sup>20</sup> a person cannot set aside one term of a contract on the ground of fraud while affirming the rest. For example, a person who has been induced to enter into an agreement to take a lease by a misrepresentation relating to one of its terms cannot repudiate that term while affirming the rest of the lease.<sup>21</sup> Similarly, an insurance company can rescind a policy for non-disclosure, but it cannot repudiate a particular claim while purporting to recognise that the policy is still in force.<sup>22</sup> Nor is it open to the court at the request of the representor to restrict rescission

<sup>11</sup> Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773, at [44].

<sup>12</sup> Below, pp.424–427..

<sup>13</sup> cf. the loss of the right to rescind for breach on similar grounds: below, p.811.

<sup>14</sup> United Shoe Machinery Co of Canada v Brunet [1909] A.C. 330; cf. Long v Lloyd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 753; Skipskreditforeningen v Emperor Navigation [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 67 at 73–74.

<sup>15</sup> Western Bank of Scotland v Addie (1867) L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 145; Scholey v Central Ry of Venezuela (1870) L.R. 9 Eq. 266n.; Ex. p. Briggs (1866) L.R. 1 Eq. 483.

<sup>16</sup> Kennard v Ashman (1894) 10 T.L.R. 213.

<sup>17</sup> Vigers v Pike (1842) 8 Cl. & F. 562.

<sup>18</sup> Long v Lloyd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 753 (first trip); cf. Lindsay Petroleum Co v Hurd (1874) L.R. 5 P.C. 221 (sinking exploratory well no bar to rescission).

<sup>19</sup> First National Reinsurance Co Ltd v Greenfield [1921] 2 K.B. 260; for a qualification of this principle, see Pawle's Case (1869) L.R. 4 Ch.App. 487.

<sup>20</sup> Urquhart v Macpherson (1878) 3 App.Cas. 831.

<sup>21</sup> Inntrepreneur Pub Co v Sweeney [2002] EWHC 1060; [2002] E.G.L.R. 132.

<sup>22</sup> West v National Motors & Accident Insurance Union Ltd [1955] 1 W.L.R. 343. It is not clear why the company adopted this ambivalent attitude: see p.347 of the report. The result might have been different had fraud been alleged; above, p.373.

to the part of the contract to which the representation relates. If, for example, a guarantee is procured by a representation that it relates only to future debts, when in fact it relates to past and future debts, then the guarantee cannot be rescinded with regard to the past, but upheld with regard to the future debts: such a course would amount to remaking, not to rescinding the contract.<sup>23</sup>

A person can affirm only after he has discovered the truth. To hear rumours that the representation may be untrue is not, for this purpose, discovery of the truth.<sup>24</sup> But if the representee knows all the facts from which a reasonable person would deduce the truth, he may be taken to know it.<sup>25</sup>

Affirmation as a bar to the right to rescind for misrepresentation must be compared with certain bars to a buyer's right to rescind for breach of condition.<sup>26</sup> In Leaf v International Galleries<sup>27</sup> Denning L.J. said: "An innocent misrepresentation is much less potent than a breach of condition; and a claim to rescission for innocent misrepresentation must at any rate be barred when the right to reject for breach of condition is barred". The latter is barred by (inter alia) "acceptance", and this takes place (a) when the buyer intimates that he accepts the goods; or (b) when the goods have been delivered to him and he does any act inconsistent with the ownership of the seller; or (c) when after lapse of a reasonable time he retains the goods without intimating that he has rejected them.<sup>28</sup> In the first two cases, the buyer is not deemed to have accepted the goods until he has had a reasonable opportunity of examining them, and in the third the question whether he has had such an opportunity is material in determining whether a reasonable time has elapsed.<sup>29</sup> But in all three cases it is the opportunity of discovering the defect, rather than its actual discovery, which is the crucial factor, so that a buyer may "accept" without discovering the truth,<sup>30</sup> and a literal reading of Denning L.J.'s dictum would suggest that acceptance will always deprive him of the right to rescind for innocent misrepresentation. But it is submitted that the dictum must be read, according to its context, to refer to cases in which a claim to rescission is resisted on the ground of lapse of time. In other words, it means only that, where lapse of time amounts to acceptance, then it will also bar the right to rescind for misrepresentation. If the buyer, in ignorance of the true facts, "accepts" in some other way he may nevertheless be able to rescind for misrepresentation; and he may, by virtue of s.1(a) of the Misrepresentation Act, be able to do this even where the misrepresentation had been incorporated in the contract.

(4) Lapse of time

In cases of fraud or breach of fiduciary duty, lapse of time does not itself bar rescission. It is simply evidence of affirmation.<sup>31</sup> This view is supported by the rule that time begins

<sup>23</sup> TSB plc v Camfield [1995] 1 W.L.R. 430, citing Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 199; De Molestina v Ponton [2002] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 271 at 286–288 rejecting (as inconsistent with the above authorities) the contrary view taken in the Australian case of Vadasz v Pioneer Concrete (SA) Pty Ltd (1995) 184 C.L.R. 182; the conflict was left unresolved in Far Eastern Shipping Co Public Ltd v Scales Trading Ltd [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 315.

<sup>24</sup> Central Ry of Venezuela v Kisch (1867) L.R. 2 H.L. 99.

<sup>25</sup> Scholey v Central Ry of Venezuela (1870) L.R. 9 Eq. 266n.; Long v Lloyd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 753 at 760. Contrast, in cases of breach, below, pp.814 et seq.

<sup>26</sup> See below, p.816.

<sup>27</sup> [1950] 2 K.B. 86, 90.

<sup>28</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.35(1) and (2), as substituted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.2.

<sup>29</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.35(4) and (5), as substituted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.2.

<sup>30</sup> e.g. where he has a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods but does not discover the truth.

<sup>31</sup> Clough v LNW Ry (1871) L.R. 7 Ex. 26, 35; cf. (in cases of breach) below, pp.814–815.

to run only from the discovery of the truth<sup>32</sup>; and by the rule that time spent in negotiations to settle the dispute does not bar rescission.<sup>33</sup>

In Leaf v International Galleries<sup>34</sup> the claimant was induced to buy a picture by the innocent misrepresentation that it was "by J. Constable".<sup>35</sup> Five years later he sought to rescind but it was held that his right to do so was barred by lapse of time. As rescission was sought promptly on discovery of the truth, the lapse of time was not evidence of affirmation, so that, even in the absence of such evidence, lapse of time is a bar to the right to rescind for innocent misrepresentation. The length of time required for this purpose seems to be such as would enable a reasonably diligent inquirer to discover the truth. This rule probably applies to a negligent misrepresentation in the same way as to a wholly innocent one.

SECTION 6. EXCLUDING LIABILITY FOR MISREPRESENTATION

The common law starts with the principle that contract terms which exclude liability for misrepresentation (including those which exclude the right to rescind)<sup>36</sup> are valid. Their effectiveness may, indeed, be limited by the general rules relating to exemption clauses, discussed elsewhere in this book.<sup>37</sup> In addition, s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967<sup>38</sup> provides: "If a contract contains a term which would exclude or restrict (a) any liability to which a party to a contract may be subject by reason of any misrepresentation made by him before the contract was made; or (b) any remedy available to another party to the contract by reason of such a misrepresentation, that term shall be of no effect except in so far as it satisfies the requirement of reasonableness as stated in section 11(1) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977; and it is for those claiming that the term satisfies that requirement to show that it does".

1. Scope of the Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.3

(1) Excluding or restricting liabilities or remedies

The section covers not only clauses excluding or limiting a party's liability but also certain analogous terms: for example clauses which impose a short time limit within which claims must be brought, or which exclude a particular remedy (such as rescission or set-off<sup>39</sup>) without affecting another (such as damages).<sup>40</sup> On the other hand, it probably does not cover a valid agreed damages clause, since this might in some circumstances extend rather than restrict liability.<sup>41</sup> Some terms which purport to define a duty rather than to exclude or restrict a liability<sup>42</sup> are probably outside the scope of the section: e.g. a term which indicates that the representor is in good faith passing on

<sup>32</sup> Gillett v Peppercorne (1840) 3 Beav. 78; Armstrong v Jackson [1917] 2 K.B. 822; Lindsay Petroleum Co v Hurd (1874) L.R. 5 P.C. 221 at 241; Aaron's Reefs Ltd v Tiviss [1896] A.C. 273 at 287.

<sup>33</sup> Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App.Cas. 1218 at 1252.

<sup>34</sup> [1950] 2 K.B. 86.

<sup>35</sup> See above, p.294.

<sup>36</sup> Toomey v Eagle Star Insurance Co [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 89.

<sup>37</sup> See especially above, p.242.

<sup>38</sup> As substituted by Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.8(1). No attempt to invoke this section was made in Toomey's case, above, n.36.

<sup>39</sup> Skipskreditforeningen v Emperor Navigation [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 67 at 74.

<sup>40</sup> cf. above, p.248 for a similar definition in s.13 of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. That definition only applies in terms for the purposes of Pt I of 1977 Act, which is not considered to include (though it amends) s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967: see s.11(1) of the 1977 Act. An arbitration clause is excluded from the definition in s.13 of the 1977 Act, but may be covered by s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act.

<sup>41</sup> cf. above, p.248; below, pp.999–1007.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.249.

information supplied to him by a third party, or (probably) one which indicates that a written document formed an exclusive record of the terms of the contract.<sup>43</sup> The same may be true of certain other terms which do not exclude or restrict liability but prevent it from arising. It seems, for example, that the section would not apply to a term in a contract made through an agent negating his ostensible authority to make representation as to the subject-matter.<sup>44</sup> But it would be comparatively easy to evade s.3 if the courts were not to some extent prepared to look behind clauses purporting to “prevent liability from arising”. It has therefore been held that a statement can take effect as a misrepresentation in spite of the fact that it is made in a document expressly warning the representee to make his own enquiries into its accuracy.<sup>45</sup> Similarly, a clause in an auctioneer’s catalogue might provide that all representations in it were statements of opinion only. If the court, on applying the tests stated earlier in this Chapter,<sup>46</sup> concluded that such a representation would, but for the clause, be one of fact, it might well hold that the clause was within s.3.

The section applies to terms excluding or restricting “any remedy”. This phrase obviously covers the normal remedies of damages and rescission. It probably also covers terms restricting or excluding the right to plead misrepresentation as a defence,<sup>47</sup> for this could be described as a “remedy” in a broad sense. Similarly, a term excluding or restricting the right to retake goods obtained by fraud<sup>48</sup> would be within the section.

(2) “Party to a contract”

The section applies only to provisions excluding or restricting the liability of a “party to a contract”, and the subsequent words of the section show that this means the contract induced by the misrepresentation. The section therefore would not apply to disclaimers of liability in cases such as Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd<sup>49</sup> and Smith v Eric S Bush<sup>50</sup> since the contracts induced by the misrepresentations in those cases were not made with the representor but with a third person. Such disclaimers of liability for negligence in giving advice in the course of a business would, however, be subject to the test of reasonableness under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.<sup>51</sup> The scope of that test is, however, as will be seen below, in several ways significantly narrower than that of s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967.

<sup>43</sup> McGrath v Shaw (1989) 57 P. & C.R. 452. For further discussion of the question whether s.3 applies to such “entire agreement” clauses, see Government of Zanzibar v British Aerospace Ltd [2000] 1 W.L.R. 2333 at 2344–2347; White v Bristol Rugby Club Ltd [2002] I.R.L.R. 204 at [34, 35].

<sup>44</sup> See Overbrooke Estates Ltd v Glencombe Properties Ltd [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1335; Coote, [1975] C.L.J. 17; the amendments to s.3 made by the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.8(1) appears not to affect the point. cf. Museprime Properties Ltd v Adhill Properties Ltd [1990] 2 E.G.L.R. 196 at 200.

<sup>45</sup> Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495; cf. Crendean Properties Ltd v Nash (1977) 244 E.G. 547; South Western General Property Co Ltd v Marton (1982) 263 E.G. 1090. The reasoning of Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 (above, p.250) might also be applied by analogy, even though it is not directly applicable to cases falling within s.3 of the 1967 Act since (i) it is based on the definition exemption clauses in s.13(1) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, and this definition does not apply for the purpose of 1967 Act; and (ii) the misrepresentation in that case did not induce any contract between misrepresenter and misrepresentee: cf. below, after n.49.

<sup>46</sup> See above, pp.330–331.

<sup>47</sup> See above, p.372.

<sup>48</sup> See above, p.372.

<sup>49</sup> [1964] A.C. 465; above, p.345. Nor would non-contractual disclaimers, such as that in Hedley Byrne’s case, be affected by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999: see above, p.347.

<sup>50</sup> [1990] 1 A.C. 831; above, p.249.

<sup>51</sup> i.e. under s.2(2) (above, p.252) and possibly under s.3(2) (above, pp.252–253).

(3) "By reason of any misrepresentation made"

The first requirement under this heading is the obvious one that there must be a representation; and this requirement may not be satisfied where a contractual document contains (1) a statement that would, standing alone, amount to a representation but (2) words denying that the maker of the statement represents the fact so (apparently) stated. This was, for example, the position where in a bill of lading the carrier stated the weight of goods shipped to be "11,000 tons" but also qualified this statement with the words "weight unknown". It was held that the carrier had not represented 11,000 to have been shipped<sup>52</sup>; and it seems to follow that the "weight unknown" provision would not be subject to the reasonableness test under s.3 of the 1967 Act.<sup>53</sup>

Where a misrepresentation has been made, s.3 clearly applies to terms excluding or restricting liability for mere misrepresentations.<sup>54</sup> It equally clearly does not apply to terms which exclude or restrict liability only for breaches of pure promises (as opposed to statements of fact) or for breaches of implied terms not dependent on statements of fact. Terms which exclude or restrict liability only for such breaches may be subject to the test of reasonableness under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. But the scope of the test under that Act is limited<sup>55</sup>; it does not, for example, generally apply where the party relying on the clause has made the contract otherwise than in the course of a business, nor does it apply to certain specified contracts, such as contracts for the sale of houses.<sup>56</sup> The scope of s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act is not so limited; and the difference in the scope of the two Acts gives rise to two problems. In discussing these, we shall assume that the case is one in which the reasonableness test under the 1977 Act does not apply.

(a) INCORPORATED MISREPRESENTATION. Where a misrepresentation is incorporated in the contract, the right to rescind for misrepresentation is preserved by s.1(a), and a term purporting to exclude or restrict that right would be within s.3. But a term may purport to exclude or restrict liabilities or remedies available only because the representation has been incorporated in the contract: for example, it may provide that the representee is to recover no more than out-of-pocket expenses and is not to have damages for loss of his bargain.<sup>57</sup> It seems that such a term would not be within s.3, for the liability which it purported to exclude would arise, not by reason of the making of the representation, but by reason of its incorporation into the contract. This conclusion is, however, subject to the point next to be discussed.

(b) PROVISION APPLICABLE TO MISREPRESENTATION AND BREACH. A single term may exclude liability for misrepresentation and for breach of contract. A clause excluding liability "for all defects" would have this effect where some defects were merely represented not to exist while others amounted to breaches of contract. S.3 provides that where a term would exclude or restrict any liability for misrepresentation "that term shall be of no effect except in so far as" the test of reasonableness is satisfied. It seems to follow that the whole term may be subject to the reasonableness test and not only the part of it which excludes liability for misrepresentation, unless that part is severable,<sup>58</sup> in

<sup>52</sup> The Mata K [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 614 (discussing earlier authorities on such "unknown" provisions).

<sup>53</sup> Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001) §2-004.

<sup>54</sup> For the possible application of the section to cases of non-disclosure, see below, p.373.

<sup>55</sup> See above, pp.264-267.

<sup>56</sup> If the sale were a private sale, it would be completely outside the scope of the 1977 Act: above, p.264. Even if the seller acted in the course of a business, and the buyer dealt as consumer, the reasonableness test would not apply to the contract "so far as it relates to" the transfer of an interest in land: above, p.264.

<sup>57</sup> cf. above, pp.359-361.

<sup>58</sup> cf. above, pp.255-256.

which case the reasonableness of the part relating to breach would, if it fell within relevant provisions of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977,<sup>59</sup> have to be determined under that Act.<sup>60</sup> An unseverable term excluding liability for “misrepresentation” generally could be ineffective (if unreasonable) to exclude contractual liability for an incorporated misrepresentation.

(4) “Before the contract was made”

S.3 applies to terms excluding or restricting liability for misrepresentations made before the conclusion of the contract. It does not apply to terms excluding or restricting liability for misrepresentations made in the course of performing a contract. However, in general<sup>61</sup> such liability is likely to be incurred only by a person who acts in the course of a business and is negligent: e.g. by a negligent surveyor or valuer. In such a case, a term excluding or restricting liability is subject to the test of reasonableness under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.<sup>62</sup> If the representation was fraudulent, a clause excluding liability for it is probably void at common law.<sup>63</sup>

2. The Reasonableness Test

S.3 applies “the test of reasonableness as stated in section 11(1) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977” to terms excluding or restricting liability for misrepresentation. S.11(1) provides that, in order to determine whether the test of reasonableness is satisfied, regard is to be had to the time of contracting; this rule is expressly stated in s.11(1) to apply for the purposes of s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967. The 1977 Act also lays down guidelines for determining reasonableness; these take effect under s.11(2) and 11(4) of that Act.<sup>64</sup> At first sight, none of these guidelines apply for the purpose of s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act, since s.3 of that Act refers only to s.11(1) of the 1977 Act, while s.11(2) of that Act contains no words that could be taken to refer to s.3 of the 1967 Act. However, the guidelines contained in s.11(4) are there said to apply where “the question arises (under this or any other Act) whether the term . . . satisfies the test of reasonableness”. In view of the italicised words, those guidelines<sup>65</sup> are, it is submitted, applicable for the purpose of s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act. Even the guidelines referred to in s.11(2) apply by analogy to contracts which are not literally within the wording of the subsection<sup>66</sup>; and they could by a process of further analogous extension be applied to cases in which the reasonableness test applies by virtue only of s.3 of the 1967 Act. The statutory guidelines are, moreover, not exhaustive for the purpose of s.3: in this respect their position under this section is indistinguishable from that under the 1977 Act.<sup>67</sup>

A clause which had been “freely negotiated . . . between banks”, excluding liability for non-disclosure has been held to satisfy the reasonableness test under s.3.<sup>68</sup> On the

<sup>59</sup> See above, pp.251–255.

<sup>60</sup> Skipstekreditorforeningen v Emperor Navigation [1998] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 67 at 75.

<sup>61</sup> For an exception, see Chaudhry v Prabhakar [1989] 1 W.L.R. 29. Seemle, a disclaimer of liability in such a situation would not be subject to the reasonableness test under either Act.

<sup>62</sup> i.e. s.2(2) (above, p.231) and possibly s.3(2) (above, pp.251–253).

<sup>63</sup> See above, p.242; the point might be of some importance if the liability were not a “business liability” within the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

<sup>64</sup> See above, pp.258–259.

<sup>65</sup> See above, p.259.

<sup>66</sup> See above, pp.259–260.

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.260.

<sup>68</sup> National Westminster Bank v Utrecht-American Finance Co [2001] EWCA Civ 658; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 7, at [59].

other hand, that test was not satisfied by a clause which, on its true construction, excluded liability for fraudulent representations.<sup>69</sup>

Under s.3 (as under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977)<sup>70</sup> the court will generally hold the term to be either wholly ineffective<sup>71</sup> or fully valid; but it can also, if the clause is severable, uphold it in part, i.e. "in so far as" it satisfies the test of reasonableness.<sup>72</sup>

3. Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999<sup>73</sup>

These Regulations have in some respects a narrower scope than s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act, 1967. They apply only where the party relying on the term is a seller or supplier acting for purposes relating to his trade, business or profession, where the other party is a consumer, and where the term in question is not individually negotiated.<sup>74</sup> None of these limitations applies to s.3 of the 1967 Act. For example, an individually negotiated term by which a private seller of land to a property developer excluded liability for misrepresentation could fall within s.3; but it would not fall within the Regulations because, (i) the seller did not act for purposes relating to any trade, etc., (ii) the buyer did so act, (iii) the term was individually negotiated and (possibly) (iv) the contract was one for the sale of land. On the other hand, s.3 applies only to terms "which would exclude or restrict" liability for misrepresentation, i.e. to exemption clauses; while under the Regulations terms other than exemption clauses may be struck down as unfair. Terms which are outside the scope of s.3 because they purport to define a duty, rather than to exclude or restrict a liability,<sup>75</sup> can therefore fall within the Regulations. Whether the Regulations do indeed apply to such terms, the effect of which is to protect the seller or supplier from liability for misrepresentation, is an open question. Such terms are not included in the list of prima facie unfair terms given in the Regulations,<sup>76</sup> but this point is not decisive as that list is "indicative and non-exhaustive".<sup>77</sup> In principle there is, it is submitted, no reason why terms of the present kind should not be regarded as "unfair" and hence not binding on the consumer.<sup>78</sup> There is also the point that some of the guidelines for determining the issue of reasonableness under the Act have no counterpart in the Regulations: this is, for example, true of the guidelines which apply under the Act to terms limiting liability to a specified sum of money.<sup>79</sup> It is therefore possible (if unlikely) for a term to be reasonable under the Act but nevertheless unfair under the Regulations, or conversely. The clause will protect the party guilty of the misrepresentation only if both sets of requirements are satisfied.<sup>80</sup>

<sup>69</sup> Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries Ltd [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 598; South West Water Services Ltd v International Computers Ltd [1999] B.L.R. 420; contrast Zanzibar v British Aerospace (Lancaster House) Ltd [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2333 (clause on its true construction not covering fraud held to satisfy reasonableness test).

<sup>70</sup> See above, pp.252–254.

<sup>71</sup> See Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495; cf. Howard Marine & Dredging Co Ltd v A Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd [1978] Q.B. 574.

<sup>72</sup> See above, p.258.

<sup>73</sup> See above, pp.267–283.

<sup>74</sup> See above, p.267, n.2b.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.386.

<sup>76</sup> Sch.2, above, pp.273–277.

<sup>77</sup> reg. 5(5), above, p.273.

<sup>78</sup> reg. 8(1), above, p.280.

<sup>79</sup> Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.11(4), applicable for the purposes of Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.3; above, p.388.

<sup>80</sup> cf. above, p.282.

SECTION 7. NON-DISCLOSURE

1. General Rule

(1) No duty of disclosure

As a general rule, a person who is about to enter into a contract is under no duty to disclose material facts known to him but not to the other party.<sup>81</sup> Thus it has been held that a landlord is not liable in deceit if before letting his house he fails to tell the tenant that it is in a ruinous condition<sup>82</sup>; and that a person who applies for the post of governess is not bound to divulge the fact that she is a divorcee.<sup>83</sup> Sometimes the rule may appear to operate harshly; but if a general duty of disclosure did exist it would be very hard to say exactly what must be disclosed in any particular case.

(2) Representation by conduct

A person may make a representation by conduct<sup>84</sup> and, if he fails to correct the impression given by his conduct, he cannot rely on the general rule that there is no duty of disclosure.<sup>85</sup> Active concealment of a defect amounts to misrepresentation<sup>86</sup>; and even conduct falling short of this may suffice. In the words of Blackburn J.: "The defendant, by taking the cow to a public market to be sold . . . thereby furnishes evidence of a representation that, so far as his knowledge goes, the animal is not suffering from any infectious disease. . . . The case might be different where the sale takes place privately."<sup>87</sup>

(3) Latent defects

It has been said that a person must disclose latent defects in the subject-matter of the contract which are known to him.<sup>88</sup> But cases which may appear to support this view are best explained on the ground of active misrepresentation<sup>89</sup> by words or by conduct and the preferable view is that English law does not recognise any general duty to disclose known latent defects. In the dictum quoted above,<sup>90</sup> Blackburn J. based liability, not on any general duty to disclose latent defects, but on the defendant's conduct in taking the cow to market. The dictum was cited without comment in Ward v Hobbs<sup>91</sup> where pigs were taken to Newbury market and sold there "with all faults". The seller knew that the pigs were diseased but he did not disclose this fact to the buyer. It was held that the buyer had no remedy as there was no general duty to disclose known latent defects and as any representation which might be inferred from the seller's conduct in taking the

<sup>81</sup> Normich Union Life Insurance Co Ltd v Qureshi [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 707 at 717.

<sup>82</sup> Keates v Cadogan (1851) 10 C.B. 591.

<sup>83</sup> Fletcher v Krell (1872) 42 L.J.Q.B. 55; cf. The Unique Mariner [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 438 at 449; Lloyds Bank v Egremont [1990] 2 F.L.R. 351; Suriya & Douglas v Midland Bank plc, The Times, March 29, 1999.

<sup>84</sup> Curtis v Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co Ltd [1951] 1 K.B. 805 at 808; contrast Geest plc v Fyffes plc [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 672 at 686 (where the conduct gave rise to no such inference).

<sup>85</sup> Walters v Morgan (1861) 3 D.F. & J. 718 at 723; Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [61–63].

<sup>86</sup> Schneider v Heath (1813) 3 Camp. 506; Sybron Corp v Rochem Ltd [1984] Ch. 112 at 130 ("covering up and deliberately concealing"); Gordon v Selico Ltd (1986) 278 E.G. 53.

<sup>87</sup> Bodger v Nicholls (1873) 28 L.T. 441, 445.

<sup>88</sup> Horsfall v Thomas (1862) 1 H. & C. 90 at 100.

<sup>89</sup> e.g. Hill v Gray (1816) 1 Stark. 434, as explained in Keates v Cadogan (1851) 10 C.B. at 600.

<sup>90</sup> See above, at n.87.

<sup>91</sup> (1878) 4 App.Cas. 13.

pigs to market was negated by the words "with all faults". These words might, on such facts, now protect the seller only if they satisfied the legislative requirements of reasonableness or fairness.<sup>92</sup> Moreover, if the thing sold suffers from a latent defect of which the seller knows, and if that defect causes injury to the buyer, or harm to other property belonging to him, then the seller's failure to warn the buyer of the defect may make him liable in negligence; and it has been suggested that Ward v Hobbs may require reconsideration in the light of this possibility.<sup>93</sup> But there is such liability where the defect caused no loss to the buyer except in making the thing sold less valuable than he had supposed it to be.<sup>94</sup> Cases of this kind continue to be governed by the general rule that there is no duty of disclosure.

That general rule has been applied where land sold was subject to a latent physical defect<sup>95</sup>; and it has similarly been held that a vendor of a leasehold interest was not bound to disclose the fact that the organisation to which the premises were let had only a limited "life".<sup>96</sup> There is some support for the view that on a sale of land latent defects of title must be disclosed<sup>97</sup> but even here it seems that there is no general duty of disclosure,<sup>98</sup> and that an undisclosed defect of this kind is a ground for relief only if it is unusual,<sup>99</sup> or if it leads to a breach of contract<sup>1</sup> or to an operative mistake.<sup>2</sup> It can also, if known to the vendor, prevent him from relying on a term of the contract under which the purchaser is deemed to have made enquiries relating to the matter in question and to have knowledge of it.<sup>3</sup>

The general rule that there is no duty of disclosure also applies where the buyer knows (but the seller does not) of some latent quality which makes the subject-matter of the contract more valuable. Thus a contract for the sale of land is binding even though the buyer, but not the seller, knew that it contained valuable minerals.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>92</sup> See above, pp.252–253, 244 et seq.

<sup>93</sup> Hurley v Dyke [1979] R.T.R. 265 at 303. For a similar duty to disclose one's own breach where it may lead to danger, see below, p.400.

<sup>94</sup> cf. below, p.612. There is no such liability in tort even where (exceptionally) there is a duty of disclosure because the contract is uberrimae fidei (below, p.366): Banque Keyser Ullmann S.A v Skandia (UK) Insurance Co Ltd [1990] 1 Q.B. 665 at 798–800; [1991] 2 A.C. 249 at 282 (where the decision was affirmed on other grounds). A fortiori there should be no liability in tort for mere non-disclosure where there is no duty of disclosure; and this is the situation under discussion at this point.

<sup>95</sup> Shepherd v Croft [1911] 1 Ch. 521.

<sup>96</sup> Safehaven Investments Ltd v Springbok Ltd (1996) 71 p.& C.R. 59.

<sup>97</sup> Selkirk v Romar Investments Ltd [1963] 1 W.L.R. 1415 at 1423; F & H Entertainments Ltd v Leisure Enterprises Ltd (1976) 120 S.J. 331, 240 E.G. 455; Faruqi v English Real Estates [1979] 1 W.L.R. 963; William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016 at 1023.

<sup>98</sup> Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property (5th ed.), p.622, n.75. For criticisms, see Let the buyer be well informed: recommendations of the Conveyancing Standing Committee of the Law Commission.

<sup>99</sup> Molyneux v Hamtreay [1903] 2 K.B. 487; cf. Carlisch v Salt [1906] 1 Ch. 335; Celsteel Ltd v Alton House Holdings Ltd (No.2) [1986] 1 All E.R. 598 at 607 (not reported on this point in [1986] 1 W.L.R. 666).

<sup>1</sup> e.g. Flight v Booth (1834) 1 Bing. N.C. 370; Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch. 457 at 496. Certain covenants for title are implied under Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1994, Pt I.

<sup>2</sup> See above, Chap.8.

<sup>3</sup> Rignall Developments Ltd v Halil [1988] Ch. 190.

<sup>4</sup> Smith v Hughes (1871) L.R. 6 Q.B. 587 at 604; quere whether the contract would be specifically enforced: below, p.1028. cf. also Phillips v Homfray (1871) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 770. For a statutory exception, see Criminal Justice Act 1993, Pt V, giving effect to E.C. Council Directive 89/592 EEC, and imposing criminal penalties on "insider dealing"; and see Insider Dealing (Securities and Regulated Markets) Amendment Order 1996 (SI 1996/1561). But the validity or enforceability of the resulting transaction is not affected: 1993 Act, s.63(2), the wording of which appears to reverse this aspect of Chase Manhattan Equities Ltd v Goodman [1991] B.C.L.C. 897; for the effect of this provision see further p.488 n.27 below. See also the powers to impose penalties for "market abuse" under Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.118 and 123.

2. Exceptions

There are many important exceptions to the rule that there is no liability for non-disclosure. In these exceptional cases, a person is, in general, bound to disclose only facts which he knew (or which he would have known if he had not "wilfully shut his eyes" to them).<sup>5</sup> A person may, however, be under a duty to disclose facts which, though not known to him, were known to his agent, if that knowledge had been acquired within the scope of the agent's authority and if it was the agent's duty to communicate it to the principal.<sup>6</sup> He may also be under a duty to disclose facts which he ought to have known, if there is a "special relationship" between the parties within Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd.<sup>7</sup>

Where a duty of disclosure exists, it generally continues until the contract becomes legally binding.<sup>8</sup> But where a contract is regarded as binding as a matter of business the duty to disclose may cease at that point even though the contract is not yet binding in law. Thus in contracts of insurance the duty ceases when the insurer initials a slip saying that he will accept the risk, even where there is no legally binding contract until a policy is executed.<sup>9</sup> Conversely the duty may in a sense continue even after the conclusion of the contract. For example, a person who takes a fidelity bond for the honesty of one of his servants is under a continuing duty to disclose to the surety any acts of dishonesty on the part of the servant<sup>10</sup>; and the express or implied terms of a contract may impose a contractual duty of disclosure to be further discussed below.<sup>11</sup> Once the parties become engaged in hostile litigation, however, any continuing duties of disclosure are superseded by the rules of procedure which govern such litigation.<sup>12</sup> Failure to perform a continuing (post-contractual) duty of disclosure does not, moreover, vitiate the formation of the contract but amounts to a breach of one of its express or implied terms<sup>13</sup>; and this distinction has significant effects, to be discussed below,<sup>14</sup> on the remedies for this type of non-disclosure. In insurance contracts, the duty of disclosure also continues after the making of the original contract in the sense that its performance is a prerequisite to any renewal of the insurance.

The duty of disclosure exists in the following cases.

<sup>5</sup> Blackburn, Low & Co v Vigors (1887) 12 App.Cas. 531; Economides v Commercial Union Assurance Co plc [1998] Q.B. 587 at 602; cf. William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016, (where the contract expressly restricted the duty in this way); Simner v New India Assurance Co Ltd, The Times, July 21, 1994; Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.18(1).

<sup>6</sup> Proudfoot v Montefiore (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 511; Joel v Law Union and Crown Insurance Co [1908] 2 K.B. 863.

<sup>7</sup> [1964] A.C. 465; above, p.345.

<sup>8</sup> Container Transport International Inc v Oceanus Mutual, etc., Association [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 476 at 486, disapproved on another point in Pan Atlantic Ins Co v Pine Top Inc Co [1995] 2 A.C. 501 (below, pp.394–395, above, p.343).

<sup>9</sup> Cory v Patton (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 304; Citadel Insurance Co v Atlantic Union Insurance Co [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 543 at 548. S.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act (requiring belief in the truth of the "facts represented" up to the time that the contract was made) would not apply to pure non-disclosure: cf. below, pp.372–373.

<sup>10</sup> Phillips v Foxall (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 666; cf. Roadworks (1952) Ltd v Charman [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 99 at 107–108.

<sup>11</sup> Below, p.400.

<sup>12</sup> The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193, at [73–78]; The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563 at [22]; Agapitos v Agnew [2002] EWCA Civ 247; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 714 at [52].

<sup>13</sup> cf. above, p.370.

<sup>14</sup> See below, pp.401–402.

(1) Representation falsified by later events

A person may have to disclose material facts which come to his notice<sup>15</sup> before the conclusion of a contract if they falsify a representation previously made<sup>16</sup> by him. In With v O'Flanagan<sup>17</sup> negotiations for the sale of a medical practice were begun in January, when the practice was said to be worth £2,000. A contract of sale was made on May 1, by which time the practice had become worthless because of the intervening illness of the vendor. The contract was set aside on the ground that the vendor ought to have communicated this change of circumstances to the purchasers. But there would probably be no need to disclose minor variations in the income of the practice.<sup>18</sup> And there are obvious limitations on the scope of any duty of disclosure which may arise from a statement such as one as to a person's financial position, which can influence a series of transactions extending, perhaps, over many years. A time must come when the representation loses its force and the representee begins to rely rather on his own judgment.<sup>19</sup>

There are conflicting decisions on the question whether a duty of disclosure arises where during negotiations a party makes a representation as to his present intention but changes his mind before the conclusion of the contract. In Traill v Baring<sup>20</sup> an insurance company made a proposal for reinsurance to a second company, stating that it would retain part of the risk. This was its intention when it made the representation but before the proposal was accepted it disposed of that part of the risk. It was held that the "change of intention"<sup>21</sup> of the first company should have been disclosed to the second company. On the other hand, in Wales v Wadham<sup>22</sup> a husband who had left his wife made her an offer of financial provision after she had declared her intention of not remarrying. She accepted the offer after having decided to marry again. If the husband had known this, he would have made a lower offer; but it was held that the wife was not bound to disclose her change of mind. The duty of disclosing changed circumstances was said only to apply where the original representation was one of fact: not where it was one of intention.<sup>23</sup> The view that the wife was not bound to disclose her decision to remarry was disapproved by the House of Lords in Jenkins v Livesey,<sup>24</sup> but only on the ground that the agreement for financial provision had been embodied in a consent order made in matrimonial proceedings; and that parties seeking such an order were, by statute,<sup>25</sup> under a duty to make full and frank disclosure to the court which made the order. So far as common law liability for fraud and non-disclosure was concerned, Wales v Wadham was approved, though without any reference to Traill v Baring. It may be

<sup>15</sup> Or, which, if there is a "special relationship", should have come to his notice, had he exercised reasonable care.

<sup>16</sup> For this requirement, see English v Dedham Vale Properties Ltd [1978] 1 W.L.R. 93 at 104.

<sup>17</sup> [1936] Ch. 575; cf. Traill v Baring (1864) 4 D.J. & S. 318; British Equitable Insurance Co v Great Western Ry (1869) 38 L.J.Ch. 132; Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch.D. 469; Brownlie v Campbell (1880) 5 App.Cas. 925 at 950; Zamir v S of S for the Home Dept. [1980] A.C. 730 at 750; Spice Girls Ltd v Aprilia World Service BV [2002] EWCA Civ 15 at [51, 58]. In view of these authorities, Turner v Green [1895] 2 Ch. 205, where this point was not argued, cannot be supported. Contrast also Thomas Witter Ltd v TBP Industries [1996] 2 All E.R. 573 at 587 where there appears to have been no change in the facts but only one in their evaluation by the allegedly fraudulent party. And see Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.81, 86.

<sup>18</sup> For the possible application of the Misrepresentation Act 1967, see below, p.401.

<sup>19</sup> cf. Argy Trading Development Co Ltd v Lapid Developments Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 444 at 461–462.

<sup>20</sup> (1864) 4 D.J. & S. 318.

<sup>21</sup> ibid. at 326, 330.

<sup>22</sup> [1977] 1 W.L.R. 199.

<sup>23</sup> ibid. at 211.

<sup>24</sup> [1985] A.C. 424.

<sup>25</sup> Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, ss.23–25 (as amended by Family Law Act 1996, s.15 and Sch.2).

possible to reconcile these two decisions by saying that in Traill v Baring the first company had, before acceptance of its offer, not merely changed its mind but acted accordingly, while the wife in Wales v Wadham had not actually remarried when she accepted the husband's offer; or by saying that the wife's statement in the latter case was as to an intention so intrinsically likely to be changed that the husband should not have relied on the statement. Subject to these possible distinctions, it is submitted that the principle in Traill v Baring is to be preferred; for, in cases of this kind, what was originally a misrepresentation of intention becomes by the time of contracting one of fact, viz. as to the representor's state of mind at that time.<sup>26</sup> And there is no difficulty in specifying exactly what should be disclosed, so that the reason for the general rule against imposing a duty of disclosure does not apply.

(2) Statement literally true, but misleading

A person is guilty of misrepresentation, though all the facts stated by him are true, if his statement is misleading as a whole because it does not refer to other facts affecting the weight of those stated. In Notts Patent Brick and Tile Co v Butler<sup>27</sup> a purchaser of land asked the vendor's solicitor whether the land was subject to restrictive covenants. The solicitor replied that he was not aware of any, but failed to add that this was because he had not troubled to read the relevant documents. The solicitor's reply, though literally true, amounted to a misrepresentation entitling the purchaser to rescind.

The duty of disclosure in cases of this kind is narrower than that which exists in contracts uberrimae fidei.<sup>28</sup> The maker of a statement which is literally true but on the whole misleading is required to disclose only such facts as affect the weight of those stated<sup>29</sup>; he need not disclose further facts merely because they might reasonably be regarded by the representee as material.<sup>30</sup>

(3) Custom

In Jones v Bowden<sup>31</sup> pimento was sold after having been damaged by sea water. It was usual in the trade, when pimento had been so damaged, to declare this, but the seller failed to make such a declaration. He was held liable in deceit as, in view of the custom, his silence amounted to misrepresentation.

(4) Contracts uberrimae fidei

There is a duty to disclose material facts in contracts uberrimae fidei (i.e., of "utmost good faith"<sup>32</sup>), in which one party is in a particularly strong position, and the other in a particularly weak one, to know the material facts.

<sup>26</sup> See above, p.331.

<sup>27</sup> (1886) 16 Q.B.D. 778; cf. Tapp v Lee (1803) 3 B. & p.367; R. v Kylsant [1932] 1 K.B. 442; Farugi v English Real Estates [1979] 1 W.L.R. 963; The Lucy [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 188 (where relief was denied as the requirement of reliance was not satisfied: above, p.340); Cemp Properties (UK) Ltd v Dentsply Research & Development Corp [1991] 2 E.G.L.R. 197; Henry Ansbacher & Co Ltd v Binks Stern, The Times, June 26, 1997.

<sup>28</sup> See below, pp.394–397.

<sup>29</sup> See the common law position with regard to company prospectuses, as stated in New Brunswick and Canada Ry v Mugggeridge (1860) 1 Dr. & Sm. 363 at 381; approved in Central Ry of Venezuela v Kisch (1867) L.R. 2 H.L. 99; cf. Dimmock v Hallett (1866) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 21 at 28; Oakes v Turquand (1867) L.R. 2 H.L. 325. For statutory duties of disclosure in such cases, see below, p.399.

<sup>30</sup> Aaron's Reef's Ltd v Twiss [1896] A.C. 273 at 287.

<sup>31</sup> (1813) 4 Taunt. 847.

<sup>32</sup> Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.17.

(a) INSURANCE. "It has been for centuries in England the law in connection with insurance of all sorts, marine, fire, life, guarantee and every kind of policy, that, as the underwriter knows nothing and the man who comes to him to ask him to insure knows everything, it is the duty of the assured . . . to make a full disclosure to the underwriters, without being asked, of all the material circumstances".<sup>33</sup>

(i) Material facts to be disclosed. The assured must disclose all such facts as a prudent insurer would take into account in deciding whether or at what premium or on what conditions he would take the risk.<sup>34</sup> It is not necessary to show that, if such facts had been disclosed, the insurer would have declined to take the risk, or that he would have increased his premium<sup>35</sup>; but the non-disclosure must have been one of the factors which induced him to enter into the contract.<sup>36</sup> A policy of marine insurance can therefore be avoided if the assured conceals the real value of the cargo<sup>37</sup>; or if he fails to declare that it may be carried on deck (thus increasing the risk),<sup>38</sup> that the ship carrying the cargo had already been stranded,<sup>39</sup> or that she had been engaged in smuggling, so that those operating her faced criminal charges.<sup>40</sup> Similarly a policy of life insurance can be avoided if the assured fails to disclose a medical condition material to the risk,<sup>41</sup> or the fact that a number of other insurance offices had declined proposals to insure his life,<sup>42</sup> or that there was a doubt as to his mental health<sup>43</sup>; a policy of insurance on jewellery can be avoided if the insurer is not told that jewellery had on several occasions been stolen from the assured<sup>44</sup>; and a home contents insurance policy can be avoided by reason of the insured's failure to disclose that he had been convicted of obtaining money by deception.<sup>45</sup> A policy can also be avoided on the ground of non-disclosure of facts material to

<sup>33</sup> Rozanes v Bowen (1928) 32 Ll.L.R. 98 at 102.

<sup>34</sup> Lambert v Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 485; Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.18(2); Woolcott v Sun Alliance, etc. Insurance Ltd [1978] 1 W.L.R. 493 at 498; Woolcott v Excess Insurance Co Ltd [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 231, [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 210; Container Transport International v Oceanus Mutual, etc., Association [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 476, disapproved on the point stated at n.36 in Pan Atlantic Insurance Co Ltd v Pine Top Insurance Co Ltd [1995] 1 A.C. 501; Fraser Shipping Ltd v Cotton [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 565 at 589; Road Traffic Act 1988, s.152, as amended by Road Traffic Act 1991, s.48 and Sch.4, para.66. For criticism and proposals for reform, see Law Com. 104 paras 3.17–3.19, 4.43–4.53; Pan Atlantic case, above, at 528.

<sup>35</sup> Pan Atlantic Insurance Co Ltd v Pine Top Insurance Co [1995] 1 A.C. 501; Aneco Reinsurance Underwriting v Johnson & Higgins [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 565 at 589.

<sup>36</sup> [1995] 1 A.C. 501 at 517–518, 549, 570, 571; St Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co (UK) Ltd v McConnell Dowell Contractors Ltd [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 116.

<sup>37</sup> Ionides v Pender (1874) L.R. 9 Q.B. 531.

<sup>38</sup> Hood v West End Motor Car Packing Co [1917] 2 K.B. 38.

<sup>39</sup> Proudfoot v Montefiore (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 511.

<sup>40</sup> Inversiones Mannia SA v Sphere Drake Ins Co plc [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 69; cf. The Moonacre [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 501 (failure to disclose forgery of insured's signature by broker, though this was done simply to save time).

<sup>41</sup> Winter v Irish Life Assurance plc [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 274.

<sup>42</sup> London Assurance v Mansel (1879) 11 Ch.D. 363.

<sup>43</sup> Lindenau v Desborough (1828) 8 B. & C. 586.

<sup>44</sup> Rozanes v Bowen (1928) 32 Ll.L.R. 98; cf. Pan Atlantic case, above, n.35 and Marc Rich & Co AG v Portman [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 225.

<sup>45</sup> Galloway v Guardian Royal Exchange (UK) Ltd [1999] L.R.L.R. 209 (where an additional ground for the decision was that the insured had made a fraudulent claim).

the risk<sup>46</sup> by the insurer,<sup>47</sup> e.g. if he accepts a premium for insuring a voyage which he knows to have been safely accomplished.

(ii) Facts which need not be disclosed. The assured need not disclose facts which the insurer himself knows or ought to know,<sup>48</sup> facts which diminish the risk, facts which both parties have equal means of knowing, "general topics of speculation",<sup>49</sup> and facts the disclosure of which is waived by the insurer.<sup>50</sup>

(iii) Basis of contract clauses. The duty of disclosure gives a generous measure of protection to insurers, but they often add that the accuracy and completeness of the answers given by the assured to questions in the proposal form shall be the basis of the contract.<sup>51</sup> The result is that quite unimportant misstatements or failure to disclose some quite trivial matter can vitiate a policy<sup>52</sup>; and this position has drawn strong judicial criticism<sup>53</sup> and the Law Commission has recommended that basis of the contract clauses should cease to have this effect.<sup>54</sup> Meanwhile, the courts do their best to protect policyholders by construing the basis of the contract clauses strictly against insurers.<sup>55</sup>

(iv) Insurance distinguished from suretyship or guarantee. A contract of insurance must be distinguished from a contract of suretyship or guarantee, since it is disputed whether the latter type of contract is uberrimae fidei.<sup>56</sup>

A promise to pay another person's debt if he fails to pay it is normally a contract of guarantee, but it is possible to insure against non-payment of a debt, or against some other breach of contract. In Seaton v Heath<sup>57</sup> A guaranteed a loan of £15,000 made by B to X. B then obtained a promise from C "in consideration of a premium of 50s. per cent". to "guarantee" A's solvency. The contract between B and C was held to be one of insurance. But in Trade Indemnity Co Ltd v Workington Harbour Board<sup>58</sup> A agreed to

<sup>46</sup> See Banque Keyser Ullmann S.A v Skandia (UK) Insurance Co Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 249 and Normich Union Life Insurance Co v Qureshi [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 707 at 714, 716 (where the facts in question were not so material).

<sup>47</sup> Carter v Boehm (1766) 3 Burr. 1905, 1909 and Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.17 ("either party"). No such duty is owed to, or by, an assignee of the policy: The Good Luck [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 238 (reversed on other grounds [1992] 1 A.C. 233) or by a third party entitled to the benefit of the policy under the principle stated at 615, below: Sumitomo Bank Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487.

<sup>48</sup> Not facts coming to the notice of his agent while acting in fraud of the principal: PCW Syndicates v PCW Reinsurers [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1136.

<sup>49</sup> Carter v Boehm, above, at 1910.

<sup>50</sup> Roberts v Plaisted [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 341; "waiver" here refers to failure to enquire into circumstances material to the risk when a reasonable insurer would make such enquiries: see Container Transport International v Oceanus Mutual, etc., Association [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 476; Marc Rich & Co AG v Portman [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 430 at 442, affirmed [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 225.

<sup>51</sup> Hasson, (1971) 34 M.L.R. 29.

<sup>52</sup> Dawsons Ltd v Bonnin [1922] 2 A.C. 413.

<sup>53</sup> Joel v Law Union & Crown Insurance Co [1908] 2 K.B. 863 at 885; cf. West v National Motor & Accident Insurance Union Ltd [1955] 1 W.L.R. 343, 348; The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193 at [50], quoted below, p.401 at n.8.

<sup>54</sup> Law Com. 104, para.7.4; cf. Law Reform Committee Fifth Report, Cmnd. 63 (1957). Contracts of insurance are excepted from the relevant provisions of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977: above, p.242. For the question whether "basis of contract" clauses are open to challenge under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1994. The possibility is, in any event, restricted to consumer contracts.

<sup>55</sup> Joel's case, above, n.53.

<sup>56</sup> See below, p.397.

<sup>57</sup> [1899] 1 Q.B. 782; reversed on another ground [1900] A.C. 135.

<sup>58</sup> [1937] A.C. 1; Trufolgar House Construction (Regions) Ltd v General Surety & Guarantee Co Ltd [1996] A.C. 199.

build a dock for B. C gave B a “guarantee” of £50,000 that A would complete the work, and it was held that this was not a contract of insurance.

The distinction between the two types of contract is that a guarantor is usually provided by the debtor,<sup>59</sup> while an insurer is usually sought out by the creditor. Thus the creditworthiness of the debtor is a matter about which a guarantor is likely to know at least as much as the creditor<sup>60</sup>; while an insurer is likely to know less about it than the creditor, having probably had no previous dealings with the debtor. Hence a higher duty of disclosure is owed to the insurer.<sup>61</sup>

(v) Source of duty of disclosure in insurance contracts. In William Pickersgill & Sons Ltd v London, etc., Insurance Co<sup>62</sup> Hamilton J. said: “The rule imposing an obligation to disclose upon the intending assured does not rest upon a general principle of common law, but arises out of an implied condition, contained in the contract itself, precedent to the liability of the underwriter to pay”. One possible interpretation of this dictum is that, in contracts of insurance, there is a contractual duty of disclosure based on an implied term in the contract. This duty, being mutual,<sup>63</sup> would rest on the underwriter no less than on the insured; and failure to perform it would amount to a breach of contract, giving rise to a right, not only to rescind the contract, but also to recover damages for its breach. But the prevailing view is that the duty “derives from a rule of law, not from the parties’ agreement”,<sup>64</sup> and that the “condition precedent” to which it gives rise is contingent only and not promissory.<sup>65</sup> That is, the party who fails to make the disclosure required of him cannot enforce the contract, but is not, merely on account of the non-disclosure, liable in damages for breach of the contract.<sup>66</sup> Nor does the non-disclosure give the other party a right to claim damages in tort for negligence. It has been said that the effect of allowing such a claim would be to undermine the general common law principle that there is no duty of disclosure in the negotiations leading to the conclusion of a contract.<sup>67</sup> That general principle is attenuated in insurance contracts only to the extent that the law provides a remedy by way of rescission for non-disclosure of material facts.

(b) FAMILY ARRANGEMENTS. There is a duty to make full disclosure in certain family arrangements, e.g. in agreements between members of a family for settling disputes as to the family property. Thus parties to an agreement for the division of the property of a

<sup>59</sup> The Zuhul K [1987] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 151 at 155.

<sup>60</sup> e.g. where the debtor is a company and the guarantor is one of its directors.

<sup>61</sup> cf. Re Denton’s Estate [1904] 2 Ch. 178 at 188.

<sup>62</sup> [1912] 3 K.B. 614 at 621.

<sup>63</sup> See above, p.395.

<sup>64</sup> The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193, at [46]; Banque Keyser Ullmann S.A v Skandia (UK) Insurance Ltd [1988] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 513 at 549, affirmed [1991] 2 A.C. 249; John W Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 602 at 615; The Grecia Express [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 88.

<sup>65</sup> See above, p.62 for the distinction between contingent and promissory conditions.

<sup>66</sup> Banque Keyser Ullmann SA v Skandia (UK) Insurance Co Ltd [1990] 1 Q.B. 665 at 779–781; approved on this point [1991] 2 A.C. 249 at 288, where the case was affirmed on other grounds. cf. March Cabaret Club & Casino Ltd v London Assurance [1975] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 169 at 175; The Good Luck [1990] 1 Q.B. 818 at 888 reversed, on other grounds [1992] 1 A.C. 233; Clarke [1989] C.L.J. 363; Davenport [1989] L.M.C.L.Q. 251; John W Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 602, 615; Agnew v Landsförsäkringsbolagens AB [2001] A.C. 223 at 246; Norwich Union Life Insurance Co Ltd v Qureshi [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 707 at 716; quære whether there is such liability where the non-disclosure is fraudulent: see HIH Casualty & General Insurance v Chase Manhattan Bank [2001] EWCA Civ 1250; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 483 at [52], [74] and [164].

<sup>67</sup> Banque Keyser Ullmann SA v Skandia (UK) Insurance Co Ltd [1990] 1 Q.B. 665, 801–802, as to which see above, n.66.

deceased member of the family must disclose to each other all facts known to them which bear on their rights to the estate, or on its value.<sup>68</sup>

(5) Contracts in which there is a limited duty of disclosure

In some cases there is a duty to disclose certain specified facts, or to disclose unusual facts.

(a) SURETYSHIP OR GUARANTEE. Contracts of suretyship or guarantee are sometimes said to be uberrimae fidei<sup>69</sup>; but the better view is that they do not fall into this category.<sup>70</sup> The creditor is bound only to disclose unusual circumstances, which the surety would not commonly expect.<sup>71</sup> A somewhat higher duty rests on an employer who takes a fidelity bond, by which the honesty of one of his employees is guaranteed, is under a somewhat higher duty: he must disclose to the surety any acts of dishonesty by the employee of which he has notice<sup>72</sup>; even if such acts occur after the execution of the bond.

(b) SALE OF LAND. Contracts for the sale of land are not uberrimae fidei,<sup>73</sup> so that there is in general no duty on a seller of land to disclose latent physical defects, but there may be a duty to disclose unusual defects of title which a reasonably prudent purchaser could not be expected to discover.<sup>74</sup>

(c) COMPROMISES. There can be a valid compromise of a claim which is bad in law if it is believed to be valid and is made in good faith. But the compromise is valid only if the person making the claim discloses to the other party all facts known to him which affect the validity of the claim.<sup>75</sup> Conversely, the party released may know that there are circumstances making the claim more valuable than the party granting the release believed to it to be, and that the latter party was unaware of those circumstances. Failure by the former party to disclose those circumstances may then be a ground on which the latter party can set the release aside.<sup>76</sup>

(d) EXEMPTION CLAUSES. In some cases failure to disclose or draw attention to the terms of a contractual document may (without affecting the validity of the contract as a whole) deprive one party of the benefit of an exemption clause.<sup>77</sup>

<sup>68</sup> Gordon v Gordon (1817) 3 Swan. 400; Greenwood v Greenwood (1863) 1 D.J. & S. 28. cf. Tennent v Tennents (1870) 1 L.R. 2 Sc. & Div. 6. Contrast Wales v Wadham [1977] 1 W.L.R. 199, 218, above, p.393, where the rule did not apply as the parties bargained at arm's length, and Cromden v Aldridge [1993] 1 W.L.R. 433 at 442-443, where no dispute between members of a family existed before execution of the document in question.

<sup>69</sup> Railton v Matthews (1844) 10 Cl. & F. 934, 943; March Cabaret Club & Casino Ltd v London Assurance [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 169 at 175; Wales v Wadham [1977] 1 W.L.R. 199 at 214.

<sup>70</sup> Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch.D. 469 at 475; LGOC Ltd v Holloway [1912] 2 K.B. 72 at 81, 83; John W Pryke case, above, n.66; Geest plc v Fyffes plc [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 672 at 683; Royal Bank of Scotland v Edridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [114]. The point was left open in Mackenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] A.C. 468 at 475 and in Trade Indemnity Co Ltd v Workington Harbour & Dock Board [1937] A.C. 1 at 18.

<sup>71</sup> National Provincial Bank of England Ltd v Glanusk [1913] 3 K.B. 335 at 338; Cooper v National Provincial Bank [1946] K.B. 1 at 7; Levett v Barclays Bank plc [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1260.

<sup>72</sup> LGOC Ltd v Holloway, above.

<sup>73</sup> Safehaven Investments Ltd v Springbok Ltd (1996) 71 P. & C.R. 59 at 66.

<sup>74</sup> See above, p.392.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.90.

<sup>76</sup> Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Ali [2001] UKHL 8; [2001] I.C.R. 337, at [32]; above, p.88.

<sup>77</sup> See above, p.241.

(6) Fiduciary relationship

A duty of disclosure may arise from the relationship of the parties. There is clearly such a duty where the relationship is one to which the equitable doctrine of undue influence applies.<sup>78</sup> The duty in such cases is indeed not discharged by mere disclosure; more stringent conditions must be satisfied before a person who is under the duty can take the benefit of a transaction with the person to whom the duty is owed.<sup>79</sup> But there are other cases in which a person is under a fiduciary duty which he can discharge merely by making full disclosure. This is the position between principal and agent,<sup>80</sup> partners,<sup>81</sup> and between a company and its promoters.<sup>82</sup> A company promoter owes no such common law duty to persons who subscribe for shares in the company on the faith of a prospectus or listing particulars issued by him,<sup>83</sup> but he does owe them an extensive statutory duty of disclosure.<sup>84</sup>

(7) Legislation

Under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, extensive duties of disclosure are imposed on persons who apply for an official listing of securities on the Stock Exchange, and on those who issue a prospectus inviting subscriptions for unlisted securities.<sup>85</sup>

Parties to matrimonial proceedings who seek a consent order from the Family Division for the settlement of their financial and proprietary arrangements must make full and frank disclosure of relevant circumstances to the court that is asked to make the order.<sup>86</sup>

(8) Duty to clarify legal relationship

A duty of disclosure may arise where A sees B acting in reliance on a view of a legal relationship between them which is to A's knowledge false.<sup>87</sup> In the authorities which support the existence of such a duty, the effect of its breach has simply been to give rise to an estoppel<sup>88</sup>; but it is conceivable that such a breach might also invalidate a contract.

<sup>78</sup> See below, pp.408–420.

<sup>79</sup> See below, p.420.

<sup>80</sup> e.g. Armstrong v Jackson [1917] 2 K.B. 822.

<sup>81</sup> Pollock, Law of Partnership (15th ed.), p.8.

<sup>82</sup> Gower, Modern Company Law (6th ed.), pp.133 et seq.; Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1879) 3 App.Cas. 1218.

<sup>83</sup> Heyman v European Central Ry (1868) L.R. 7 Eq. 154.

<sup>84</sup> Below. Breach of this duty gives rise to a right to damages against those responsible for the prospectus, but not to a right to rescind an allotment of shares: Re South of England Natural Gas Co [1911] 1 Ch. 573. This position seems to be unaffected by the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.90, 86.

<sup>85</sup> ss.80, 86; and see Chase Manhattan Equities Ltd v Goodman [1991] B.C.I.C. 897 for a discussion of the question to whom such a duty is owed. And see Public Offers of Securities Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/1537); Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Offer of Securities) Order 2001 (SI 2001/2598); above p.392 n.4.

<sup>86</sup> Jenkins v Livesey [1985] A.C. 424.

<sup>87</sup> Bell v Marsh [1903] 1 Ch. 528 at 541; Spiro v Lintern [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1002 at 1010–1011, quoted above, p.34; The Henrik Sif [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 456; The Lutetian [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 140 at 158; The Stolt Loyalty [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 281 at 289 (affirmed without reference to this point [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 599). Contrast The Tatra [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 51 (where A had no such knowledge); Rafsanjan Pistachio Producers Co-operative v Bank Leumi (UK) plc [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 513 at 542.

<sup>88</sup> See below, p.402. cf. also the cases of “estoppel by convention” discussed at p.110, above. In those cases, the mistake is shared by both parties, so that it is inappropriate to talk of a duty of disclosure: cf. above, p.392 at n.5.

(9) Duty of disclosure in performance of contract

So far, our main concern<sup>89</sup> has been with the exceptional cases in which a duty of disclosure may exist in the negotiations leading to the conclusion of a contract. The further question is whether a duty of disclosure can arise in the performance of an already concluded contract. At common law, there is no general duty of disclosure in cases of this kind: for example, a bank which has entered into a contract to provide banking services is under no duty to disclose to its customer (A) that it has made later contracts with other customers for the provision of substantially similar services on terms more favourable to the customers than those of its contract with A.<sup>90</sup> But there are many situations (which may be regarded as exceptions to the general principle) in which a duty of disclosure does arise in the course of the performance of an already existing contract.<sup>91</sup> For example, an employee may be bound to disclose breaches of duty of fellow-employees who have defrauded the employer<sup>92</sup>; though he is not normally bound to disclose his own breaches of duty,<sup>93</sup> let alone his intention to commit breaches of duty in the future.<sup>94</sup> A contracting party may, however, be under a duty to disclose his own breaches of the contract on the ground that they may lead to danger of physical injury to persons or to property.<sup>95</sup> A professional person may be under certain duties of disclosure towards the person who has engaged his services; but again these duties arise out of the contract (or relationship giving rise to liability in tort)<sup>96</sup> between them: their performance is not a prerequisite for its creation. Sometimes, failure to perform a duty of disclosure imposed by one contract may vitiate a second contract between the same parties: thus in one case it was held that an employee's failure to perform his duty under his contract of employment to disclose frauds being perpetrated by his subordinates on his employers entitled the employers to rescind an arrangement with the employee under which he had obtained considerable benefits on "early retirement".<sup>97</sup> Similarly, it has been suggested that, where a bank lends money on a mortgage to one of its customers, it is under a duty "to proffer to her some adequate explanation of the nature and effect of the document which she had come to sign".<sup>98</sup>

<sup>89</sup> Except on p.393 above, at nn.10 to 13.

<sup>90</sup> Suriya & Douglas v Midland Bank plc [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 612.

<sup>91</sup> The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193, at [50].

<sup>92</sup> Sybron Corp v Rochem Ltd [1984] Ch. 112 at 126–127, 129; Kerr L.J. treated the case as one of "covering up and deliberately concealing": ibid. at 130.

<sup>93</sup> Bell v Lever Bros [1932] A.C. 161; Nottingham University v Fischel [2000] I.C.R. 1462 ("moonlighting" in breach of contract of employment).

<sup>94</sup> Horcal v Gatland [1984] I.R.L.R. 288; cf. Balston v Headline Filters [1990] F.S.R. 385.

<sup>95</sup> The Zimnia [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 211 at 218.

<sup>96</sup> See the discussion of the extent of a surgeon's duty of disclosure before carrying out an operation: Sidaway v Bethlehem Royal Hospital [1985] A.C. 871; and the duty of a doctor carrying out a vasectomy to warn the patient that sterility might not be permanent: Thake v Maurice [1986] Q.B. 644. Cases in which solicitors acting both for mortgage lender and borrowers were held liable to the lender for failing to disclose facts coming to their notice in the course of the transaction fall into the present category: see, for example, Bristol & West Building Society v May, May & Merrimans [1996] 2 All E.R. 801; Mortgage Express Ltd v Bowerman [1996] 2 All E.R. 836; contrast National Home Loans Corp v Giffen Couch & Archer [1997] 3 All E.R. 808 (where no duty of disclosure arose).

<sup>97</sup> Sybron Corp v Rochem Ltd [1984] Ch. 112; Honeyball [1983] C.L.J. 218.

<sup>98</sup> Cornish v Midland Bank plc [1985] 3 All E.R. 513 at 523, where the bank was found to be guilty of active misrepresentation. Contrast Barclays Bank plc v Khaira, The Times, December 19, 1991 (no such duty owed to a person who was not a customer of the bank).

3. Effects of Non-disclosure

(1) In general

In discussing the effects of non-disclosure two preliminary distinctions must be drawn. The first relates to what may be called the nature of the non-disclosure; the second relates to the time when the facts which were not disclosed should have been disclosed.

(a) NATURE OF NON-DISCLOSURE. Cases of liability for non-disclosure can be divided into two kinds. First, there are cases in which no misrepresentation has been made in so many words, but one can be inferred from conduct or from the surrounding circumstances, e.g. where a representation is falsified by later events, or where a statement is literally true but misleading, or where disclosure is required by custom.<sup>99</sup> Secondly, there are cases of what may be called “pure” non-disclosure, in which no such inference can be drawn, but the law nevertheless gives a remedy for non-disclosure, e.g. in contracts of insurance, or by statute.<sup>1</sup>

In the first of the above groups of cases, non-disclosure can give rise to the same remedies as active misrepresentation, that is, to a right to rescind the contract (in the sense of setting it aside ab initio for all purposes<sup>2</sup>) and to a common law right to damages for deceit, or for negligence (but not for breach of the rescinded contract). The position is more complex in the second group of cases, i.e. in those of “pure” non-disclosure. We have seen that failure to perform the duty of disclosure in contracts uberrimae fidei gives rise to a right to rescind, but not to one to damages either for breach of contract or for negligence at common law.<sup>3</sup> Conversely, breach of the statutory duty of disclosure imposed on persons issuing a company prospectus has been held to give rise to a right to damages, but not to one to rescind.<sup>4</sup> General statements about the effects of “pure” non-disclosure are best avoided: the effects depend on the purpose of the rule of law by which the duty of disclosure is imposed.

(b) PRE- AND POST-CONTRACT NON-DISCLOSURE. The remedy of rescission for non-disclosure, in the sense of setting the contract aside ab initio,<sup>5</sup> sometimes operates harshly: for example where this remedy is available to an insurer in respect of non-disclosure by the insured, which may be quite innocent. The courts have therefore mitigated the severity of the remedy by distinguishing between cases in which the non-disclosure occurred before, and induced the formation of, the contract, and those in which it occurred after the contract had been made and amounted to a breach of one of its terms.<sup>6</sup> Rescission ab initio (as for misrepresentation) is available (if at all)<sup>7</sup> only in cases of the former kind. Where the non-disclosure is post-contractual and amounts to a breach of the contract, the drastic effects of rescission ab initio would be “disproportionate” and “penal”<sup>8</sup>; and the injured party’s remedies in respect of it depend on the rules relating to the effects of breach,<sup>9</sup> to be discussed later in this book.<sup>10</sup> These

<sup>99</sup> See above, pp.393–394.

<sup>1</sup> See above, pp.394, 399.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.343 at n.94; the contract is voidable, not void: Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.17 (“may be avoided”); The Grecia Express [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 88 at 127–128.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.398.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.399, n.84.

<sup>5</sup> See above, at n.2.

<sup>6</sup> See above, p.400 under heading (9).

<sup>7</sup> It may not be available even in such cases: see above, at n.4.

<sup>8</sup> The Star Sea [2001] UKHL 1; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 193, at [51].

<sup>9</sup> ibid., at [50], [52].

<sup>10</sup> See below, pp.759 et seq., 849 et seq.

remedies are in one respect more extensive than those for pre-contractual non-disclosure: rescission for breach does not deprive the injured party of the right to damages for breach of the contract.<sup>11</sup> On the other hand, while the effect of rescission for pre-contractual non-disclosure is to “wipe [the contract] out altogether,<sup>12</sup> with retrospective effect, rescission for breach operates only with prospective effect<sup>13</sup>; and the remedy is, as a general rule,<sup>14</sup> available only in respect of a breach which causes serious prejudice to the injured party.<sup>15</sup> The rule that post-contractual non-disclosure has no retrospective effect is, however, subject to an exception in cases of fraud: if an insured person makes a fraudulent claim,<sup>16</sup> the insurer is entitled to reject not only that claim but also any lesser claim which the insured might honestly have made.<sup>17</sup> The exception has been explained on the ground that, if it did not exist, the insured would have nothing to lose (though he would incur the risk of a criminal penalty)<sup>18</sup> by putting forward a fraudulent claim.<sup>19</sup>

(2) Effects of Misrepresentation Act 1967

The Misrepresentation Act repeatedly uses the expression “misrepresentation made”. This refers primarily to active misrepresentation and not to “pure” non-disclosure,<sup>20</sup> as described above. The Act therefore does not impose liability for such non-disclosure where none existed before.<sup>21</sup> Nor does it affect any liability for, or defence based on, such non-disclosure which did exist before the Act. It follows that liability in damages for “pure” non-disclosure could not arise under s.2(1); that the court has no discretion in cases of such non-disclosure to award damages in lieu of rescission under s.2(2); and that a term whose sole effect was to exclude or restrict liability for such non-disclosure is not affected by s.3.

On the other hand, the distinction between cases of “pure” non-disclosure, and those in which a misrepresentation, though not made in so many words, can be inferred from conduct, probably applies for the purposes of the Act. It is submitted that the Act would apply to cases of the latter kind,<sup>22</sup> e.g. where a representation had been made by conduct,<sup>23</sup> and where a representation had been made which was literally true but misleading because it was obscure or only told part of the truth.<sup>24</sup> It seems probable that the Act would also apply where the representation was true when it was made but was falsified by later events.<sup>25</sup> S.2(1) in particular might be thought to apply to such a case

<sup>11</sup> See below, p.851.

<sup>12</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 398, above, p.370.

<sup>13</sup> See below, p.850; The Star Sea, above, n.8, at [50].

<sup>14</sup> See below, p.778 et seq. for exceptions.

<sup>15</sup> See below, p.748; The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563 at [14].

<sup>16</sup> i.e. one of the validity of which depends on the false statement. The exception does not apply to false statements relating to other, and relatively minor, matters; e.g. in The Mercadian Continent, above n.15 it did not apply to a false statement affecting only the jurisdiction of the court called on to determine the validity of the claim, rather than that validity itself.

<sup>17</sup> The Star Sea, above, n.8, at [62].

<sup>18</sup> cf. above, p.374.

<sup>19</sup> The Star Sea, above, n.8, at [62].

<sup>20</sup> HIH Casualty & General Insurance v Chase Manhattan Bank [2001] EWCA Civ 1250; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 483, at [51]. The 1967 Act has not altered the common law meaning of “misrepresentation”: André & Cie SA v Ets Michel Blanc & Fils [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 435.

<sup>21</sup> Banque Keyser Ullmann SA v Skandia (UK) Ins Co Ltd [1990] 1 Q.B. 665 at 789–790, affirmed [1991] 2 A.C. 249.

<sup>22</sup> See Hudson, 85 L.Q.R. 524.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.390.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.394.

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.393.

as it requires the representor to show that he believed “up to the time the contract was made that the facts represented were true”. It could be said that there was no “misrepresentation made” if the facts originally stated were then true; but the answer to this point may be that the representation can be treated as a continuing one and that it would become a misrepresentation when the falsifying event occurred. S.3 could also apply to a term which by general words excluded liability for all non-disclosure, since such words could cover cases in which a representation was inferred from conduct or the surrounding circumstances. In one case<sup>26</sup> a term containing such general words was assumed to be covered by s.3 but was held to satisfy the requirement of reasonableness. The question whether the section would apply to a term excluding liability only for “pure” non-disclosure was not discussed.

SECTION 8. MISREPRESENTATION AND ESTOPPEL

Under the doctrine of estoppel by representation<sup>27</sup>; a person who makes precise and unambiguous<sup>28</sup> representation<sup>29</sup> of fact<sup>30</sup> may be prevented from denying the truth of the statement if the person to whom it was made was intended to act on it, and did act on it to his detriment.<sup>31</sup> It is generally said that the doctrine does not give rise to a cause of action<sup>32</sup> but only to a defence. Thus if A agrees to let a house to B, representing that the drains are sound when they are not, B cannot rely on the doctrine of estoppel to found a claim for damages against A.<sup>33</sup> But the doctrine could provide B with a defence: for example, if A, immediately after the execution of the lease, brought an action for breach of covenant to repair.<sup>34</sup> Such a defence would be available even though B had affirmed (and not rescinded) the lease.

In addition to providing a defence to the representee, estoppel may remove one that would otherwise be available to the representor. Thus it may help a claimant no less than a defendant.<sup>35</sup> In Burrowes v Lock<sup>36</sup> a beneficiary under a trust fund proposed to assign

<sup>26</sup> National Westminster Bank v Utrecht-American Finance Co, [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 7; [2001] EWCA Civ 658 at [59].

<sup>27</sup> In this Chapter our only concern is with this kind of estoppel. Estoppel by negligence is beyond the scope of this book. For the distinction, see Moorgate Mercantile Co v Twitchings [1977] A.C. 890. For promissory estoppel, estoppel by convention and proprietary estoppel, see above, pp.105–125, 130–149.

<sup>28</sup> See Low v Bouverie [1891] 3 Ch. 82, Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co [1972] A.C. 741 and Phillip Collins Ltd v Davis [2000] 3 All E.R. 808 at 805, where this requirement was not satisfied; cf. The Junior K [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 583 at 589; The Zhi Jiang Kou [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 493. It has been said that “reasonable clarity is sufficient”: The Shackleford [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 155 at 159.

<sup>29</sup> Non-disclosure or inaction will not normally suffice: Laurie & Morewood v Dudin & Sons [1926] 1 K.B. 223; Moorgate Mercantile Co v Twitchings, above, n.27; The Nai Genova [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 353 at 363; Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong Hing Bank [1986] A.C. 80 at 110, 392; The Leonidas D [1985] 1 W.L.R. 925; The Tatra [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 51; The Zhi Jiang Kou [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 493; Orion Finance Ltd v J D Williams & Co Ltd [1997] C.L.Y. 983.

<sup>30</sup> As distinct from one of law: see Territorial & Auxiliary Forces Association v Nichols [1949] 1 K.B. 35; The Argo Hellas [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 296 at 304; (for this distinction, see further pp.333–335 above); and from a representation as to the future (or a promise): see above, pp.118, 331–332.

<sup>31</sup> e.g. Lombard North Central plc v Stobart [1990] Tr.L.R. 105. There is no further requirement that the reliance must be reasonable: Downready Construction Ltd v S of S for Transport, etc. [2002] N.I.J. 108.

<sup>32</sup> Low v Bouverie, above, n.28; The Anemone [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 546 at 557.

<sup>33</sup> Of course, there might be a claim for damages under one of the five heads discussed at pp.343–359 above.

<sup>34</sup> cf. Oades v Spafford [1949] 1 K.B. 74.

<sup>35</sup> e.g. Cotterell v Leeds Day [2001] W.T.L.R. 435 (estoppel depriving defendant of defence that claim was time-barred); Shah v Shah [2001] EWCA Civ 537; [2002] Q.B. 35 at [31] (defendant estopped from relying on fact that witness to a deed had not signed in his presence); Aker Oil & Gas Technology UK Plc v Sovereign Corporate Ltd [2002] C.L.C. 557; Jackson, 81 L.Q.R. 223; cf. above, p.115.

<sup>36</sup> (1805) 10 Ves. 470, as explained in Low v Bouverie, above; see Sheridan, Fraud in Equity, pp.31–36.

his share for value to a prospective lender, who, before advancing any money, asked the trustee whether the beneficiary had previously encumbered his share. The trustee replied that there was no encumbrance, having forgotten that 10 years earlier the beneficiary had in fact encumbered his share. It was held that the trustee was estopped from denying the truth of his statement. Thus he was liable to pay the assigned share to the assignee, free from the earlier encumbrance. The assignee here had an independent cause of action against the trustee based on the assignment; and the trustee was, by his representation, deprived of the defence that he was already bound to pay part of the fund to the previous encumbrancer. Similarly, a warehouseman may make a contractual promise to deliver goods out of his warehouse; and if the promise is coupled with an untrue statement about the goods (e.g. that they are in good condition, or in the warehouse, when they are not), he may be estopped from denying the truth of the statement.<sup>37</sup> The cause of action is based on the contractual promise, and the effect of the estoppel is simply to remove a defence.<sup>38</sup> And a person who has entered into a voidable contract may indicate that he is not going to exercise his power to avoid it. The effect of such a representation will be that he is bound by the contract without any power of avoidance<sup>39</sup>; and this result may be explained on the ground of either affirmation or estoppel. If the second explanation is adopted, it is again not the estoppel, but the contract, which constitutes the cause of action: the effect of the estoppel is simply to remove the power of avoidance.

---

<sup>37</sup> See Coventry Shepherd & Co v GE Ry (1883) 11 Q.B.D. 76; cf. Alicia Hosiery Ltd v Brown Shipley & Co Ltd [1970] 1 Q.B. 195, 206; Grismold v Haven, 25 N.Y. 595 (1862).

<sup>38</sup> e.g. European Asian Bank v Punjab & Sind Bank [1983] 2 All E.R. 508; The Uhenbels [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 294 at 300.

<sup>39</sup> Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444.

CHAPTER TEN

DURESS AND UNDUE INFLUENCE<sup>1</sup>

THE consent of a contracting party may have been obtained by some form of pressure which the law regards as improper. The victim of such pressure may be entitled to relief under the common law of duress, and under the equitable rules of undue influence. He is also protected by certain special statutory provisions.

SECTION 1. DURESS AT COMMON LAW

A contract is voidable<sup>2</sup> at common law if it was made under duress. At one time the common law concept of duress was a very narrow one. It was restricted to actual or threatened physical violence to, or unlawful constraint of, the person of the contracting party<sup>3</sup> or of his employees for whom he is responsible.<sup>4</sup> This view was open to the objection that it failed to give due weight to the coercive effect of other illegitimate conduct or threats.<sup>5</sup> It was therefore rejected in The Siboen and the Sibotre,<sup>6</sup> where Kerr J. said that a plea of “compulsion or coercion” would also be available in other circumstances: e.g. where a person had been forced to enter into a contract under an imminent threat of having his house burnt down, or a valuable picture slashed.<sup>7</sup> His views have been accepted in later cases, so that the question is no longer what was threatened, but whether the effect of the threat was to bring about a “coercion of the will, which vitiates consent”.<sup>8</sup> The view that consent is “vitiating” has been criticised<sup>8a</sup> but the criticism appears to be based on a misinterpretation of it: what it seems to mean is, not that consent is negated, but that it has been improperly obtained.<sup>9</sup> In The

---

<sup>1</sup> Winder, 3 M.L.R. 97; 4 Conv. (N.S.) 274; Capper, 114 L.Q.R. 479.

<sup>2</sup> In Barton v Armstrong [1976] A.C. 104 certain deeds were declared “void” for duress; cf. Lanham, 29 M.L.R. 615. But the general view is that a contract procured by duress is only voidable: Pau On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] A.C. 614 at 634; The Universe Sentinel [1983] 1 A.C. 366 at 383, 400; The Evia Luck (No.2) [1992] 2 A.C. 152 at 168; Deputy v Stapleford 19 Cal. 302 (1861) (contract procured by flogging, etc., held “voidable”). A marriage is voidable for duress: Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s.12(c).

<sup>3</sup> Cumming v Ince (1847) 11 Q.B. 112 at 120; the violence threatened had to be unlawful: Biffin v Bignell (1862) 7 H. & N. 877; Smith v Monteith (1844) 13 M. & W. 427. cf. Latter v Bradell (1880) 50 L.J.C.P. 166; (1881) 50 L.J.Q.B. 448.

<sup>4</sup> cf. Gulf Azov Shipping Co Ltd v Idisi [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 727.

<sup>5</sup> Admiralty took a broader view in cases concerning salvage agreements: see The Port Caledonia [1903] p. 184.

<sup>6</sup> [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 293. Beatson, 92 L.Q.R. 496; Beatson, The Use and Abuse of Unjust Enrichment, Chap.5.

<sup>7</sup> At p.335.

<sup>8</sup> Pau On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] A.C. 614 at 636; cf. The Atlantic Baron [1979] Q.B. 705; The Piondas C [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 390 at 393; Coote [1980] C.L.J. 40; Re T [1993] Fam. 95 at 115–116.

<sup>8a</sup> Atiyah, 98 L.Q.R. 197; Beatson, The Use and Abuse of Restitution, pp.113 et seq.; Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp (1989–1990) 19 N.S.W.L.R. 40. The point is left open in The Evia Luck (No.2) [1992] 2 A.C. 152, 166.

<sup>9</sup> cf. Huyton SA v Peter Cremer GmbH [1999] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 620, at 638 (will said to be “deflected”; and ibid. at 642: same factors said to be relevant to “deflection” as to “coercion”). See also the reference, in the analogous case of undue influence, to an “overbearing” of the injured party’s will: Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2001] 4 All E.R. 449 at [103] and [162].

Universe Sentinel,<sup>10</sup> for example, trade union officials threatened to induce the crew of a ship to break their contracts of employment and so to prevent the ship from leaving port. In view of the "catastrophic"<sup>11</sup> financial consequences which the shipowners would suffer if these threats were carried out, it was conceded that they constituted "economic duress",<sup>12</sup> vitiating the shipowners' consent to an agreement to make certain payments to the union. To be capable of giving rise to such duress, the threat must be illegitimate<sup>13</sup> either because what is threatened is a legal wrong<sup>14</sup> (as in the examples so far given) or because the threat itself is wrongful (as in the case of the blackmailer's threat to disclose his victim's conduct to third parties<sup>15</sup>) or because it is contrary to public policy.<sup>16</sup> Whether the threat actually gives rise to duress must then be considered by reference to its coercive effect in each case: no particular type of threat is regarded either as ipso facto having such an effect, or as being incapable, as a matter of law, of producing it.

Even under this more flexible test, mere "commercial pressure"<sup>17</sup> will not suffice: it is, for example, not duress for a supplier of goods to refuse to continue to give credit to his customer unless the latter complies with a demand for payment made in good faith, even though the demand turns out to be unjustified.<sup>18</sup> Nor is a contract voidable for duress merely because a party is induced to enter into it by a threat to break an earlier contract.<sup>19</sup> The question whether a threat amounts to duress depends on its coercive effect in each case. Thus cases such as D & C Builders v Rees<sup>20</sup> have been explained<sup>21</sup> on the ground that the creditor's promise to accept part payment in full settlement had been obtained by duress. Similarly, in B & S Contracts and Designs Ltd v Victor Green Publications Ltd<sup>22</sup> a contractor who had undertaken to erect stands for an exhibition told his client, less than a week before the exhibition was due to open, that the contract would be cancelled unless the client paid an additional sum to meet claims which were being made against the contractor by his workforce. The consequence of not having the stands available in time would have been disastrous for the client in that it would have gravely damaged his reputation and might have exposed him to heavy claims for damages from exhibitors to whom space on the stands had been let. In these circumstances it was held

<sup>10</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 366; Napier, [1983] C.L.J. 43; Jones, ibid. 47.

<sup>11</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 366 at 383.

<sup>12</sup> ibid. cf. The Evia Luck [1992] 2 A.C. 152; Woolwich Equitable BS v IRC (No.2) [1993] A.C. 70 at 164; Huyton S.A. v Peter Cremer GmbH [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 620 at 635.

<sup>13</sup> ibid., at 636–638, 642.

<sup>14</sup> Hence a threat merely to exercise one's rights under a contract is not illegitimate: The Olib, [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 108. cf. Alf Vaughan & Co Ltd v Royscot Trust Ltd [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 856 (threat to recover goods from hirer not "illegitimate").

<sup>15</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 366 at 401.

<sup>16</sup> The Evia Luck (No.2) [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 319 at 329, affirmed [1992] 2 A.C. 152 (where the illegitimacy of the threat was no longer in dispute); cf. The Evia Luck [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 165 at 178.

<sup>17</sup> The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293 at 336; cf. Leyland Daf Ltd v Automotive Products [1993] BCC 389.

<sup>18</sup> CNT Cash & Carry Ltd v Gallagher Ltd [1994] 4 All E.R. 714. There may have been an element of compromise in this case; cf. above, pp.87, 90; if so, the suggestions that the payment might have been recoverable on the ground that it was paid under a "mistaken belief" that it was legally due (at 720) is, with respect, open to doubt. cf. also Smith v Charlick (1923–24) 34 C.L.R. 38.

<sup>19</sup> The Siboen and The Sibotre, above, at 335; cf. below, p.575.

<sup>20</sup> [1966] 2 Q.B. 617; above, p.114. cf. The Atlantic Baron [1979] Q.B. 705, above, p.97; Nixon v Furphy (1925) 25 S.R. (N.S.W.) 151; T. A. Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd (1956) 56 S.R. (N.S.W.) 323; contrast Smith v Charlick (1923–24) 34 C.L.R. 38 (payment to avoid threat not to enter into future contracts); Williams v Raffey Bras & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 1 (where no threat was made and duress was not pleaded).

<sup>21</sup> In The Siboen and The Sibotre, above, at 335.

<sup>22</sup> [1984] I.C.R. 419; Palmer and Catchpole, 48 M.L.R. 102; cf. The Alev [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 138; Atlas Express Ltd v Kafco (Importers & Distributors) Ltd [1989] Q.B. 833; Chandler, [1989] L.M.C.L.Q. 270; Flemming, [1989] C.L.J. 362; Phang, 53 M.L.R. 107.

that the payment had been made under duress and that the client was entitled to recover it back. Such cases must be contracted with Pao On v Lau Yiu Long,<sup>23</sup> where the claimants threatened to break a contract with a company unless the defendants, who were shareholders in the company, gave them a guarantee against loss resulting from the performance of that contract. The defendants, thinking that the risk of such loss was small, gave the guarantee in order to avoid the adverse publicity which the company might suffer if the contract were not performed. In these circumstances, it was held that there was no "coercion of the will", so that the guarantee was not voidable for duress. In deciding whether the threat actually coerced the person to whom it was addressed, the court will also consider what other courses of action (than submission to the threat) were reasonably available to that person: for example there will be no economic duress if it would have been reasonable for him to have resisted the threatened wrong by taking legal proceedings.<sup>24</sup>

The view that unlawful violence to the person was necessary to constitute duress had led in a number of nineteenth century cases to the conclusion that a contract could not be invalidated by "duress of goods". This meant that an agreement to pay money for the release of goods unlawfully detained, or to prevent their unlawful seizure, was valid.<sup>25</sup> But it had also been held that money which had actually been paid for such a purpose could be recovered back.<sup>26</sup> Parke B. in several cases stated this strange distinction with apparent complacency.<sup>27</sup> Its effect was not wholly clear. It could hardly have meant that a person who was successfully sued for money which he had agreed to pay for the release of his goods could then recover back what he had been compelled to pay in the first action. It seems to have meant that money which was simply paid for the release of the goods could be recovered back; while money to be paid under an agreement for their release could be sued for and could not (if paid) be recovered back. But if it meant this it was inconsistent with at least one case<sup>28</sup> in which money paid under such an agreement was recovered back; and if this was right it would have been very strange if the agreement to pay the money had been enforceable.<sup>29</sup> The authorities now support the view that the "duress of goods" cases are governed by the modern, flexible, test of duress, so that the question in each case is whether there had in fact been "coercion of the will"<sup>30</sup>; and that this test governs both the validity of the contract and the right to recover back money paid under it.<sup>31</sup>

The rule that money extorted by duress can be recovered back also applies where an unlawful charge is levied by unlawful threats, for example, where a carrier refuses to

<sup>23</sup> [1980] A.C. 614; cf. Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 87.

<sup>24</sup> e.g. Hennessy v Craigmyle & Co [1986] I.C.R. 461.

<sup>25</sup> Skate v Beale (1841) 11 A. & E. 983; and see below, n.27. It is assumed that the seizure is not known to be unlawful, for, if this was known, there would be no consideration for the promise to pay: above, p.88, and see Atlee v Backhouse (1836) 3 M. & W. 633 at 650.

<sup>26</sup> Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str. 915; Valpy v Manley (1845) 1 C.B. 594; Green v Duckett (1883) 11 Q.B.1D. 275; Maskell v Horner [1915] 3 K.B. 106; T D Keegan Ltd v Palmer [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 449 at 457.

<sup>27</sup> Atlee v Backhouse (1836) 3 M. & W. 633 at 650; Oates v Hudson (1851) 6 Ex. 346; Parker v Bristol & Exeter Ry (1851) 6 Ex. 702 at 705.

<sup>28</sup> Tamvaco v Simpson (1866) L.R. 1 C.P. 363, where the only question discussed by the Exchequer Chamber was whether the detention was lawful.

<sup>29</sup> cf. Beatson [1974] C.L.J. 97, The Use and Abuse of Unjust Enrichment, Chap.5, suggesting that the cases of valid agreements should be explained as compromises (above pp.88–89) or on similar grounds.

<sup>30</sup> Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] A.C. 614 at 636; Royal Boskalis Westminster NV v Mountain [1997] 2 All E.R. 929.

<sup>31</sup> The Universe Sentinel [1983] 1 A.C. 366; cf. The Atlantic Baron [1979] Q.B. 705, (where the claim there failed on the ground of affirmation); Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 337; The Alev [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 138.

carry goods unless he is paid more than he is legally entitled to charge.<sup>32</sup> Money paid by a citizen under an ultra vires demand for a tax or similar levy is also recoverable by the payor, irrespective of whether the demand amounts to duress<sup>33</sup>: this rule can be explained as resting either on the general principles of unjust enrichment<sup>34</sup> or on “common justice”<sup>35</sup> or on the ground that a payment made in response to such an invalid demand is analogous to one made for a consideration which has failed.<sup>36</sup> But where the demand is not of this kind, so that the only ground for recovery is duress, the claim for the return of the money will fail if the demand for the payment was not backed by any threat<sup>37</sup>; or where it is backed only by a threat to take legal proceedings<sup>38</sup>: if such a payment could be recovered back, no compromise would be secure.

As in the case of misrepresentation, it is not necessary to show that duress was the sole cause inducing the contract.<sup>39</sup> It is enough if it was an inducement; and once the fact of duress is established the burden is on the party exerting the duress to show that it did not in fact induce the contract.<sup>40</sup>

SECTION 2. UNDUE INFLUENCE IN EQUITY

A transaction can be set aside in equity if, because it has been procured by undue influence exerted by one party (A) on the other (B), it cannot “fairly be treated as the expression of [B’s] free will.”<sup>41</sup> The cases in which such relief is given are commonly divided into the two main groups to be discussed below; the second of these groups must, or may, have to be, further divided into two sub-groups. The law on this topic was extensively reviewed by the House of Lords in Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2)<sup>42</sup> (“the Etridge case”) and the following discussion attempts the far from easy task of stating the effects of that review.

1. Actual Pressure

The first group of cases in which equity gave relief on the ground of undue influence are those in which one party had induced the other to enter into the transaction by actual pressure which equity regarded as improper but which was formerly thought not to amount to duress at common law because no element of violence to the person was involved.<sup>43</sup> For example, a promise to pay money can be set aside if obtained by a threat

<sup>32</sup> Parker v Bristol & Exeter Ry, above. n.26; Great Western Ry v Sutton (1869) L.R. 4 H.L. 226; Winfield, 60 L.Q.R. 341.

<sup>33</sup> Woolwich Equitable BS v IRC (No.2) [1993] A.C. 70.

<sup>34</sup> ibid. at 197.

<sup>35</sup> ibid. at 172.

<sup>36</sup> ibid. at 197, 198.

<sup>37</sup> Twynford v Manchester Corp [1946] Ch. 236; discussed by Marsh, 62 L.Q.R. 333, and see next note.

<sup>38</sup> Brown v M'Kinally (1795) 1 Esp. 279; William Whiteley Ltd v McGregor (1910) 101 L.T. 741. The Twynford and William Whiteley cases were doubted in the Woolwich Equitable case [1993] A.C. 70, but only in so far as they concerned unlawful demands for taxes and similar levies by public officials.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.340.

<sup>40</sup> Barton v Armstrong [1976] A.C. 104.

<sup>41</sup> Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773, at [7]. cf. ibid. at [162]: no relief where B’s “will had not been overborne”.

<sup>42</sup> See above.

<sup>43</sup> Turnbull & Co v Duvall [1902] A.C. 429 at 434; but there seems to have been no actual pressure in that case: Barclays Bank v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 191–192. Chaplin & Co v Brammal [1908] 1 K.B. 233; Avon Finance Co v Bridger [1985] 2 All E.R. 281 at 285.

to prosecute the promisor,<sup>44</sup> or his close relative, or his spouse, for a criminal offence.<sup>45</sup> Such threats might now constitute duress, but the equitable concept of “pressure” is still wider than that of duress at common law, for undue influence can be exercised without making illegitimate threats or indeed any threats at all.<sup>46</sup> The party who claims relief on the ground of actual undue influence must show that such influence existed and had been exercised,<sup>47</sup> and that the transaction resulted from that influence. There is no further requirement in cases of this kind that the transaction must be shown to be to the manifest disadvantage of the party seeking to set it aside<sup>48</sup> or that the transaction must be one that “calls for explanation”<sup>49</sup> by the other party.

2. Special Relationships: Presumed Undue Influence

The second group of cases in which equity gives relief for undue influence is that in which the relationship between the parties is such as to give rise to what has been called a “presumption of undue influence”.<sup>49a</sup> This phrase contains an unfortunate element of ambiguity: it can mean either that such influence is presumed to exist or that it is presumed to have been exercised. It might be better if use of the phrase were abandoned; but as there is little prospect of such a development, we shall here continue to use it, drawing attention from time to time to its different shades of meaning.<sup>50</sup> At this stage, it suffices to say that, where the presumption applies, it is not necessary for the party claiming relief to show that the impugned transaction was in fact procured by undue influence.

Relief can be given on the ground of undue influence even though the person to whom the gift or promise was made obtained no personal benefit from it. Thus the rule applies where the head of a religious order uses a gift wholly for the purposes of the order and where a trustee extracts a promise from one beneficiary solely for the benefit of another.<sup>51</sup>

(1) Types of presumptions<sup>52</sup>

A presumption is a rule of law by which, on proof of a specified fact or facts (the basic fact(s)) another fact (the presumed fact) is taken to exist. There are many classifications of presumptions; for the present purposes it suffices to distinguish between so-called irrebuttable presumptions and rebuttable ones. Irrebuttable (or conclusive) presumptions are rules of substantive law which have nothing to do with ways of proving facts.<sup>53</sup> If the law says that, on proof of the basic fact, the presumed fact is irrebuttably taken to exist, this means that proof of the basic fact produces the same legal consequence as proof of the presumed fact, even though the latter fact may be shown not to exist. A

<sup>44</sup> Such a threat was formerly thought to be incapable of giving rise to duress at common law: Flower v Sadler (1882) 10 Q.B.D. 572.

<sup>45</sup> Williams v Bayley (1866) L.R. 1 H.L. 200; Kaufman v Gerson [1904] 1 K.B. 591; Société des Hôtels Réunis (S.A.) v Hawker (1913) 29 T.L.R. 578; Mutual Finance Ltd v Wetton [1937] 2 K.B. 389.

<sup>46</sup> e.g. CIBC Mortgages v Pitt [1994] 1 A.C. 200, where the claim failed for reasons stated on p.427 below.

<sup>47</sup> Howes v Bishop [1909] 2 K.B. 390; Bank of Montreal v Stuart [1911] A.C. 120 at 127.

<sup>48</sup> CIBC Mortgages v Pitt [1994] A.C. 200, disapproving Bank of Credit & Commerce International S.A. v Aboudy [1990] 1 Q.B. 923 on this point; Cretney, 105 L.Q.R. 169; Dixon, [1989] C.L.J. 359.

<sup>49</sup> cf. below, p.410 at n.62.

<sup>49a</sup> Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 189; Etridge case, above n.41 at [16].

<sup>50</sup> See further below, p.413 at nn.3 and 4.

<sup>51</sup> Allcard v Skinner, above n.48; Ellis v Barker (1871) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 104; cf. Bullock v Lloyds Bank [1955] Ch. 317.

<sup>52</sup> For a full discussion, see Cross on Evidence (1st ed.), pp.86–91.

<sup>53</sup> Cross and Tapper on Evidence (9th ed.), p.66.

rebuttable presumption, by contrast, is a rule of law by which, on proof of the basic fact(s), the presumed fact is assumed to exist in the absence of evidence negating (or “rebutting”) its existence. Such presumptions may be subdivided into (i) those which require the person against whom the presumption operates to show (on a balance of probabilities) that the presumed fact does not exist; and (ii) those which merely require that person to introduce some evidence to that effect, leaving it up to the proponent of the presumption to show that (on a balance of probabilities) that fact does exist. Presumptions of the latter kind are sometimes called “evidential presumptions,”<sup>54</sup> though this phrase has no generally accepted technical meaning.

(2) The presumption of undue influence

(a) REQUIREMENTS. To give rise to the “presumption of undue influence”,<sup>55</sup> two basic facts must be established by the party claiming relief.<sup>56</sup> The first is the existence of a relationship between A and B by virtue of which B either in fact reposed trust and confidence in A or is taken as a matter of law to have done so; the kinds of relationship which are capable of producing these effects are discussed below. The second basic fact relates nature of the impugned transactions; and conflicting views have been expressed on the question whether it was necessary for B to show that the transaction was “disadvantageous” or “manifestly disadvantageous” to him. The original view appears to have been that there was no such requirement and that, once a relationship of trust and confidence was established, the transaction could be set aside on grounds of public policy, even though it was not in fact disadvantageous to B.<sup>57</sup> Later it was said that the ground for relief was “not a vague ‘public policy’ but specifically the victimization of one party [B] by the other [A]” and that B had to show that the transaction was to his “manifest disadvantage”.<sup>58</sup> But this view was later doubted,<sup>59</sup> especially on the ground that, where A stood in a fiduciary position to B, the impugned transaction would (on grounds of public policy) not be allowed to stand unless its fairness was affirmatively proved by A<sup>60</sup>; the requirement of “manifest disadvantage” also does not apply in cases of actual pressure.<sup>61</sup> In the Etridge case, the use of the words “manifest disadvantage” to describe the second requirement of the presumption was therefore discouraged and the requirement was restated in the form that the transaction must be one which “calls for explanation”<sup>62</sup> or that it must be one which “is not readily explicable by the relationship between the parties.”<sup>63</sup> This formulation of the requirement differs significantly from that in terms of “manifest disadvantage” since a substantial transaction may call for an explanation from A even though B may benefit from it indirectly (so that the disadvantage, if any, to B would not be “manifest”). On the other hand, an ordinary (or moderate) Christmas or birthday gift from B to A would not (even where there was a

<sup>54</sup> This usage is adopted in the Etridge case, n.41 above, e.g. at [16].

<sup>55</sup> See above, at n.49.

<sup>56</sup> Etridge case, above, n.41, at [13].

<sup>57</sup> Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch.D. 145 at 171; Lloyd's Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 342; cf. Hylton v Hylton (1745) 2 Ves. Sen. 547 at 549 (“public utility”).

<sup>58</sup> National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 at 706; cf. Hart v O'Connor [1985] A.C. 1000 at 1024.

<sup>59</sup> CIBC Mortgages plc v Pitt [1994] 1 A.C. 200 at 209.

<sup>60</sup> ibid.; see the authorities cited in n.81 below and in n.182 on p.419, below, and the reference to “public policy” in Hammond v Osborn [2002] EWCA Civ 885, [2002] W.T.L.R. 1125.

<sup>61</sup> CIBC Mortgages plc v Pitt [1994] 1 A.C. 200, disapproving Bank of Credit & Commerce International SA v Abouody [1990] 1 Q.B. 923 on this point.

<sup>62</sup> [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [14] per Lord Nicholls, with whose speech Lords Bingham and Clyde agreed; cf. ibid. at [156], [158] per Lord Scott.

<sup>63</sup> ibid., at [21].

relationship of trust and confidence between them) “call for explanation” and so could not be set aside for presumed undue influence.<sup>64</sup>

(b) EFFECT AND NATURE. Once the basic facts of the presumption (i.e., a relationship between A and B of trust and confidence, and a transaction calling for explanation) are established, then the presumed fact is that “the transaction can only have been procured by undue influence.”<sup>65</sup> This presumption has been described as “a rebuttable evidential presumption of undue influence”.<sup>66</sup> As the first of the phrases just quoted shows, the presumed fact is that such influence has been exercised (or that the trust and confidence has been abused). In this respect, the present presumption differs from another presumption, to be discussed below,<sup>67</sup> which merely establishes (or dispenses with the need to establish) that a relationship of trust and confidence exists. The statement that the presumption with which we are here concerned is “rebuttable” refers to the point that it can be displaced in one of the ways to be more fully discussed below<sup>68</sup>: e.g. that B took independent legal advice before entering into the transaction; or by other evidence that the transaction was the “expression of [B’s] free will”.<sup>69</sup> The meaning of the statement that the presumption is “evidential”<sup>70</sup> seems to be that if, after proof of the basic facts the presumption, A introduces evidence which, on a balance of probabilities, makes it doubtful whether the transaction was procured by undue influence, then B will not be entitled to relief unless he can introduce further evidence, showing, on balance of probabilities, that the transaction was so procured.<sup>71</sup>

(c) RELATIONSHIPS IN WHICH THE PRESUMPTION APPLIES. These relationships have traditionally been divided into two categories which became known as “class 2A” and “class 2B” cases.<sup>72</sup> Considerable difficulty arises in determining whether this classification has survived (at all or in a modified form) after, the Etridge case. It will be convenient first to describe the traditional categories under headings (i) and (ii) below and then to consider the effect on the classification of that case. It should be emphasised that this discussion is concerned with only one of the basic facts which must be established before it can be presumed that the transaction “can only have been procured by undue influence”.<sup>73</sup> Even if the requisite relationship is established, this presumption will arise only if it is also shown that the impugned transaction is one “which calls for explanation”.<sup>74</sup>

(i) Relationships of presumed trust and confidence (class 2A). Where one of the types of relationships to be listed below exists, it is settled by law or (what amounts to the same thing),<sup>75</sup> “the law presumes, irrebuttably, that [A] had influence over [B]”.<sup>76</sup> This presumption has been held to apply where the relationship between A and B is that of

<sup>64</sup> ibid., at [24], [156]; cf. ibid., at [104] (reasonable fee paid to solicitor).

<sup>65</sup> ibid., at [14].

<sup>66</sup> ibid., at [16], [153], [194].

<sup>67</sup> Under heading (c)(i).

<sup>68</sup> See below, p.419.

<sup>69</sup> Etridge case [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [7].

<sup>70</sup> See above, at n.66.

<sup>71</sup> See ibid., at [158].

<sup>72</sup> This terminology goes back to Bank of Credit & Commerce International S.A v. Abouody [1990] 1 Q.B. 923 at 953 and was approved in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 189–190. “Class 1” (not relevant to the present discussion) comprises cases of actual pressure (above, p.408; Etridge case, above, n.69, at [14]).

<sup>73</sup> Etridge case, above n.69, at [14].

<sup>74</sup> ibid.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.409.

<sup>76</sup> Etridge case, above n.69, at [18]; cf. ibid. at [104].

parent and child,<sup>77</sup> guardian and ward,<sup>78</sup> religious adviser and disciple,<sup>79</sup> doctor and patient,<sup>80</sup> solicitor and client<sup>81</sup> and trustee and cestui que trust.<sup>82</sup> It applies to some, but not all, transactions between fiancé and fiancée: thus it has been applied to a settlement made before marriage by which the wife agreed, in return for a small immediate payment, to give up large sums which were to accrue to her as a widow; but it would not apply to the gift of an extravagant engagement ring.<sup>83</sup> The present presumption does not apply between husband and wife,<sup>84</sup> or between employer and employee.<sup>85</sup> Nor does it apply to all relationships which are fiduciary in the sense that they give rise to a duty of disclosure: thus it does not apply between agent and principal.<sup>86</sup> The presumption may apply even after the relationship has ceased if the influence continues, for example, between solicitor and ex-client<sup>87</sup>; and between parent and child for a "short" time<sup>88</sup> after the child has come of age, but not once the child is "emancipated" from parental control.<sup>89</sup> Even the marriage of a child does not invariably have this effect.<sup>90</sup>

The present presumption must be "distinguished sharply"<sup>91</sup> from the "evidential presumption"<sup>92</sup> described above. The first distinction between them is that the present presumption is irrebuttable, while the "evidential presumption" is rebuttable. Since an irrebuttable presumption is (as was pointed out above)<sup>93</sup> a rule of substantive law, rather than a means of establishing facts, the effect of the present presumption is that proof of the relationship (e.g. of parent and child) becomes, in cases of alleged undue influence, a substitute for the need to prove that B reposed trust and confidence in A. It is then, on the one hand, unnecessary for B to show that (s)he actually reposed trust and confidence in A and, on the other,<sup>94</sup> irrelevant for A to show that this was not the case. The second is that the presumed fact the "irrebuttable" presumption is quite different from that of

<sup>77</sup> Bullock v Lloyds Bank, above; Cocking v Pratt (1749) 1 Ves.Sen. 400; Powell v Powell [1900] 1 Ch. 243; cf. Re T [1993] Fam. 95.

<sup>78</sup> Hylton v Hylton (1754) 2 Ves.Sen. 547; Hatch v Hatch (1804) 9 Ves. 292; the de facto relation of guardian and ward suffices: Archer v Hudson (1846) 15 L.J.Ch. 211.

<sup>79</sup> Allcard v Skinner, above p.410 n.57; Nottidge v Prince (1860) 2 Giff. 246; cf. Tufon v Sperti [1952] 2 T.L.R. 516; Roche v Sherrington [1982] 1 W.L.R. 599 at 606.

<sup>80</sup> Dent v Bennett (1839) 4 My. & Cr. 269; Radcliffe v Price (1902) 18 T.L.R. 466; cf. Re CMG [1970] Ch. 574 (authorities in charge of mental hospital and patient residing there); Cloughton v Price [1997] E.G.C.S. 51.

<sup>81</sup> Wright v Carter [1903] 1 Ch. 27; cf. Wintle v Nye [1959] 1 W.L.R. 284.

<sup>82</sup> Ellis v Barker (1871) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 104; Thomson v Eastwood (1877) 2 App.Cas. 215.

<sup>83</sup> Zamet v Hyman [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1442; qualifying Re Lloyds Bank Ltd [1931] 1 Ch. 289.

<sup>84</sup> Homes v Bishop [1909] 2 K.B. 390; Bank of Montreal v Stuart [1911] A.C. 120; Mackenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] A.C. 468; Gillman v Gillman (1946) 174 L.T. 272. National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 at 703; Kings North Trust Ltd v Bell [1986] 1 W.L.R. 119 at 127; Coldunell Ltd v Gallon [1986] 1 All E.R. 429 at 437; Andrews, [1986] C.L.J. 195; Midland Bank plc v Shephard [1988] 3 All E.R. 17; Barclays Bank plc v Khaira [1992] 1 W.L.R. 623 at 632.

<sup>85</sup> Matthew v Bobbins (1980) 256 E.G. 603.

<sup>86</sup> Re Coomber [1911] 1 Ch. 723.

<sup>87</sup> McMaster v Byrne [1952] 1 All E.R. 1362; cf. Longstaff v Birtles [2002] EWCA Civ 1219; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 470 (a case, not of presumed undue influence, but of breach of fiduciary duty: see at [40]); Allison v Clayhills (1907) 97 L.T. 709 at 711.

<sup>88</sup> See Re Pauling's Settlement Trusts [1964] Ch. 303 at 337.

<sup>89</sup> Bainbrigge v Brown (1881) 18 Ch.D. 188.

<sup>90</sup> Lancashire Loans Ltd v Black [1934] 1 K.B. 380.

<sup>91</sup> Etridge case [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [18].

<sup>92</sup> ibid., at [16], [18] and above p.410 at nn.54, 411, n.70.

<sup>93</sup> See above, p.409 at n.53.

<sup>94</sup> Etridge case, above, at [18].

the “evidential” presumption: the former is that A “had influence over”<sup>95</sup> B; the latter is that “the transaction can only have been procured by undue influence”.<sup>96</sup> The third difference relates to the respective legal consequences of the two presumptions. The “irrebuttable” presumption is not itself a ground for relief<sup>97</sup>: it is merely a way of establishing one of the basic facts of the “evidential” presumption. An ordinary or moderate Christmas or birthday present can no more be set aside where it is made by a child to a parent or by a client to his solicitor than where it is made by a wife to her husband.<sup>98</sup> It follows that even where the “irrebuttable” presumption applies, B will be entitled to relief only if he shows that the transaction was also one that called for explanation; and if this further fact is established, then the “evidential” presumption comes into operation. Thus the two presumptions will operate in the same case and the “evidential” presumption remains rebuttable<sup>99</sup> (e.g. by evidence that B was independently advised) even where the relationship between A and B was such as to give rise to the “irrebuttable” presumption. There is, therefore, no inconsistency between saying, on the one hand, that, in the special relationship cases, “the law presumes, irrebuttably, that [A] had influence over [B]”<sup>1</sup> and, on the other, that if (even in such cases) B in addition showed that the impugned transaction called for explanation, then a “rebuttable evidential presumption”<sup>2</sup> arises that the transaction was “procured by” that influence. The irrebuttable presumption relates to the existence<sup>3</sup> of the influence, the rebuttable evidential presumption to its exercise.<sup>4</sup> The distinction is obscured by the unfortunate use of the ambiguous phrase “presumption of undue influence”,<sup>5</sup> which is capable of referring to either or both of these operations.

(ii) Relationships of actual confidence (class 2B). In this group of cases, the relationship between A and B must be one in which B has in fact reposed trust and confidence in A. It is necessary for B to establish this fact, or that A has acquired “domination” over him.<sup>6</sup> If B shows this, and that the transaction which B seeks to avoid was such as to call for explanation, then the rebuttable presumption will arise, that the transaction was procured by undue influence.<sup>7</sup>

It follows from the nature of the present group of cases that the question in each such case will be whether the party seeking to set the transaction aside has reposed sufficient trust and confidence in the other, rather than whether the relationship between the parties belongs to a particular type.<sup>8</sup> For example, the relation of banker and customer will not normally give rise to a presumption of undue influence,<sup>9</sup> but it can do so in exceptional cases if the customer has placed himself entirely in the hands of the bank (in

<sup>95</sup> ibid.

<sup>96</sup> ibid., at [14].

<sup>97</sup> ibid. at [104] (“no presumption properly so called that the confidence has been abused”).

<sup>98</sup> ibid., at [24], [156]; cf. [104].

<sup>99</sup> This point accounts for the discussion by Lord Nicholls ibid. at [15] of Bainbrigge v Brown (1881) 18 Ch.D. 188 in the context of the “evidential” presumption, even though the relationship of the parties was that of father and “unemancipated” children (above, p.380) so that the “irrebuttable presumption”; would also have operated between them.

<sup>1</sup> ibid., at [18].

<sup>2</sup> ibid., at [219].

<sup>3</sup> ibid., at [18].

<sup>4</sup> ibid., at [14].

<sup>5</sup> See above, p.378 at nn.49 and 50.

<sup>6</sup> Goldsmorthy v Brickell [1987] CL 378 at 404.

<sup>7</sup> Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] A.C. 180 at 189–190; Etridge case [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [14].

<sup>8</sup> Cited with approval in the Etridge case at [10]; cf. ibid. at [80] (“cannot be exhaustively classified”).

<sup>9</sup> National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686; Andrews, [1985] C.L.J. 192; Tiplady, 48 M.L.R. 579; Bank of Baroda v Panessar [1987] Ch. 335; Lloyd's Bank v Egremont [1990] 2 FLR 351.

giving the bank a guarantee secured on his home) and has not been given any opportunity to seek independent advice.<sup>10</sup>

The flexible character of the present group of cases is illustrated by Tate v Williamson,<sup>11</sup> where the defendant became financial adviser to an extravagant Oxford undergraduate who sold him his estate for half its value and then drank himself to death at the age of 24. His executors successfully claimed that the sale should be set aside. Lord Chelmsford said: "The jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity over the dealings of persons standing in certain fiduciary relations has always been regarded as one of the most salutary description. . . . The courts have always been careful not to fetter this jurisdiction by defining the exact limits of its exercise."<sup>12</sup> A modern illustration of the principle is provided by O'Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd<sup>13</sup> where the relationship between the claimant (then a young and unknown composer and performer of music) and his manager was held to be such as to give rise to a presumption of undue influence; and transactions which turned out to be unfair to the claimant when he later became a celebrity were accordingly set aside. On the other hand, it has been held that no such presumption arose on the score of "family loyalty"<sup>14</sup> between brothers trading in partnership, nor on the ground that one of them suffered from alcohol or drug addiction, unless perhaps the other had assumed the role of guardian or adviser to the former party.<sup>15</sup>

(iii) Effects of the Etridge Case. It will be recalled that, before the Etridge case,<sup>16</sup> cases of presumed undue influence had been divided into two categories (discussed above) called "class 2A" and "class 2B."<sup>17</sup> This classification was adopted by the House of Lords in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien where Lord Browne-Wilkinson, giving the leading speech, said that, where the relationship between A and B was such as to fall into class 2A, then a presumption arose "that undue influence had been exercised"<sup>18</sup> while if that relationship fell into class 2B, then proof of it raised "the presumption of undue influence".<sup>19</sup> Reference has already been made to the ambiguity of the latter phrase,<sup>20</sup> but, from the context, the two phrases (quoted above) in Lord Browne-Wilkinson's speech seem to mean the same thing—i.e., that, on proof of the relationship, it was presumed that undue influence had been exercised. If the phrases mean this, they must be qualified in the light of the Etridge case: as already noted,<sup>21</sup> the existence of the relationship between the parties (whether in a class 2A or class 2B case) is only one of

<sup>10</sup> Lloyd's Bank Ltd v Bundy [1955] Q.B. 326, esp. at 342; Carr, 38 M.L.R. 463; Sealy [1975] C.L.J. 17. The case was said in National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 at 698 to turn on its "very special facts." See also ibid. 709 approving the ratio of the majority, based on the presumption of undue influence in Lloyd's Bank Ltd v Bundy. cf. Cornish v Midland Bank plc [1985] 3 All E.R. 513 at 518.

<sup>11</sup> (1866) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 55. For similar relationships between the aged and their advisors or companions, see Inche Noriah v Shaik Allie bin Omar [1929] A.C. 127; Re Craig [1971] Ch. 95; contrast Hunter v Atkins (1834) 3 My. & K. 113; Re Brocklehurst [1978] 1 Ch. 14.

<sup>12</sup> At p.60; cf. Tufton v Sperni [1952] 2 T.L.R. 516; National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 at 708–709; Goldsworthy v Brickell [1987] Ch. 378; Cheese v Thomas [1994] W.L.R. 129; Simpson v Simpson [1992] 1 F.L.R. 601.

<sup>13</sup> [1985] Q.B. 428; Elton John v Richard Leon James [1991] F.S.R. 397; cf. also Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 417; Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All E.R. 61; Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Burch [1997] 1 All E.R. 144 (employer and employee) (approved in the Etridge case [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [83], [86]).

<sup>14</sup> Irvani v Irvani [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 425.

<sup>15</sup> ibid.

<sup>16</sup> Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2002] 2 A.C. 773, above p.411.

<sup>17</sup> See above, p.411 at n.72; the classes are discussed under headings (i) and (ii) at pp.411 to 413 above.

<sup>18</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 489.

<sup>19</sup> ibid.

<sup>20</sup> See above, pp.409 at nn.49a and 50; p.413 at n.5.

<sup>21</sup> See above, p.413 at nn.95–97.

the basic facts of the presumption that undue influence has been exercised. That presumption arises only if it is also shown that the transaction is one which “calls for explanation”.<sup>22</sup>

In the Etridge case, the leading speech was given by Lord Nicholls. Lords Bingham and Clyde expressed their agreement with this speech, Lord Bingham also saying that it commanded “the unqualified support of all members of the House”.<sup>23</sup> At the same time, Lord Clyde questioned “the wisdom . . . of attempting to make classifications of cases of undue influence”<sup>24</sup> while Lords Hobhouse and Scott appeared, at least at first sight, to reject or doubt the “class 2B” category.<sup>25</sup> The question thus arises whether that category has survived the Etridge case.

Lord Nicholls’ speech in that case does not make any express reference to the distinction between class 2A and class 2B cases. But he does distinguish between cases in which there is “[p]roof that [B] has placed trust and confidence in [A]”<sup>26</sup> and those in which B “need not prove he actually reposed trust and confidence in” A because their relationship is such that “the law presumes, irrebuttably, that [A] had influence over [B]”<sup>27</sup>: e.g. where their relationship is that of parent and child. This distinction appears to resemble<sup>28</sup> the substance (though not the nomenclature) of the distinction between class 2A and class 2B cases. Lord Hobhouse, on the other hand, says that “the so-called class 2B presumption ought not to be adopted”<sup>29</sup> while Lord Scott says that he “doubt[s] the utility of the class 2B classification”.<sup>30</sup> The question arises how these statements are to be reconciled with the distinction drawn by Lord Nicholls in the terms just quoted.<sup>31</sup>

One possible answer to this question is to say that in a class 2B case no presumption arises merely on proof that B has reposed trust and confidence in A since this is only one of the basic facts of the presumption that the transaction has been procured by undue influence,<sup>32</sup> the other basic fact being that the transaction was one that called for an explanation. But this is also true of class 2A cases,<sup>33</sup> the existence of which is recognised by Lords Hobhouse and Scott,<sup>34</sup> so that this reasoning can scarcely account for their apparent rejection of the class 2B category.

It is submitted that a preferable way of reconciling the apparent conflict of opinion is to have regard to the exact context in which it arose in the Etridge case. The appeals there before the House of Lords concerned a group of cases in which wives had provided security for their husbands’ business debts, usually by means of a guarantee by the wife of those debts, supported by a charge on the matrimonial home owned either by the wife alone or by her and the husband jointly. On the principal debtor’s default, the lender (usually a bank) would seek to enforce the security, typically by sale of the house. The question to what extent and in what circumstances such a third party is adversely affected by actual or presumed undue influence between husband and wife will be

<sup>22</sup> Etridge case, above, n.16 at [14].

<sup>23</sup> ibid., at [4].

<sup>24</sup> ibid., at [92].

<sup>25</sup> See below, at nn.29 and 30.

<sup>26</sup> Etridge case at [14].

<sup>27</sup> ibid., at [18].

<sup>28</sup> Lord Nicholls’ distinction only resembles, and is not identical with, that drawn in earlier cases between class 2A and class 2B: see below at nn.32 and 33 and p.417 at n.53.

<sup>29</sup> Etridge case, above, at [107].

<sup>30</sup> ibid., at [161]; cf. McGregor v Taylor [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 468 at [16] (but see also ibid. at [93]).

<sup>31</sup> At nn.26 and 27, above.

<sup>32</sup> cf. Etridge case, above, at [158].

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.413 at n.97.

<sup>34</sup> Etridge case, above, at [104], [107], [108].

discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>35</sup> Our present concern is with the question to what extent the presumption of undue influence operates in such cases between husband and wife. This way of putting the question assumes that the interests of these parties are opposed to each other; but in practice this may well not be true in the present context. In a realistic sense, husband and wife in the situations under discussion may well make common cause against the bank since, if this wife's case of undue influence succeeds against the husband, then the bank may not be able to evict the couple from their home. There is little doubt that this aspect of such cases has influenced the development of the branch of the law.

It has long been settled and is accepted in the Etridge case<sup>36</sup> that the relationship of husband and wife does not give rise to the class 2A or "irrebuttable" presumption described under heading (i) above.<sup>37</sup> The question then arises whether that relationship can nevertheless give rise to the "rebuttable evidential presumption"<sup>38</sup> that can arise in cases of the kind described under heading (ii) above, i.e. in cases formerly regarded as falling within the class 2B presumption. It is clear from the Etridge case that no such presumption (that the transaction was procured by undue influence) arises merely because the wife has reposed trust and confidence in her husband: this is, as we have seen, only one of the basic facts of the presumption; and so the statement that B (the wife) "will succeed in setting aside the transaction merely by proof that [she] reposed trust and confidence in the wrongdoer"<sup>39</sup> (i.e. A, the husband) would no longer be accepted.

To the extent that the class 2B presumption was previously thought to arise on proof of this one basic fact alone, it must be taken to have been rejected in all the speeches in the Etridge case,<sup>40</sup> which has made it clear that any such presumption arises only if it is also shown that the transaction is one which "calls for explanation"<sup>41</sup>; indeed (as noted above) this is true also in class 2A cases.<sup>42</sup> But the rejection in some of the speeches of the class 2B category may go further since the transactions under consideration in the Etridge case, being guarantees of substantial business debts, did call for explanation. The second basic fact of the rebuttable evidential presumption was therefore also satisfied; but that presumption nevertheless did not arise in a number of the cases there under appeal. The reason why it did not arise in those cases lies, it is submitted, in certain features of the relationship of husband and wife which are of special significance in the present context. These features are referred to by Lord Scott when he says that he is unable to accept "The proposition that, if a wife, who generally reposes trust and confidence in her husband, agrees to become surety to support his debts or business enterprises a presumption of undue influence arises"<sup>43</sup>; on the contrary, in such a "surety wife" case, "undue influence, though a possible explanation for the wife's agreement to become surety, is a relatively unlikely one".<sup>44</sup> Lord Nicholls seems to have

<sup>35</sup> See below, p.424. One of the cases under appeal concerned a different kind of dispute, i.e. one between the wife and her solicitor.

<sup>36</sup> Etridge case, at [19].

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.412 at n.84.

<sup>38</sup> Etridge case at [16].

<sup>39</sup> See ibid. at [105] citing Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 189–190.

<sup>40</sup> Etridge case, above n.16, at [14], [104], [158]. Quaere whether it may have been this point that Lord Hobhouse had in mind at [104].

<sup>41</sup> ibid., at [14].

<sup>42</sup> See above, at n.33.

<sup>43</sup> Etridge case, above, n.16, at [159]; Lord Hobhouse's statement ibid. at [106] that "there is no legal relationship of trust and confidence" may be a reference to the fact that the relations between spouses does not give rise to the "irrebuttable" (or class 2A) presumption.

<sup>44</sup> ibid., at [162].

much the same point in mind when he says that “there is nothing unusual or strange in a wife, from motives of affection or for other reasons, conferring substantial financial benefits on her husband”<sup>45</sup>; and that same is true “in the ordinary course”<sup>46</sup> where she guarantees and provides security for, her husband’s business debts: she may well do this because she has, in practice, a common interest with her husband in the success of his business ventures.<sup>47</sup> In such cases, it is therefore arguable that, even though there is both a relationship of trust and confidence and a transaction calling for explanation, no presumption arises that the transaction has been procured by undue influence. The reason for this view is that the nature of the relationship between the husband and the wife provides an alternative and more plausible explanation for the transaction, namely that the wife entered into it from motives of common interest or affection or both. The statements of Lord Hobhouse and Lord Scott,<sup>48</sup> rejecting, or doubting the utility of, the class 2B presumption are therefore, with respect, entirely appropriate (and are indeed reflected in the speech of Lord Nicholls)<sup>49</sup> in the context in which they occur: that is, where the relationship of the relevant parties is that of spouses in an on-going marriage and the wife alleges that a guarantee by her of her husband’s business debts has been procured by undue influence exercised by him. In such cases, it would normally be inappropriate to apply the class 2B presumption; and the same is probably true of the closely analogous situation of parties living together in a quasi-marital relationship without being married.<sup>50</sup> But it is submitted that the same reasoning does not apply to other situations in which there is a relationship of trust and confidence, a transaction calling for explanation, and no explanation more plausible than that it was procured by undue influence: e.g., in cases such as Tate v Williamson.<sup>51</sup> In such cases, there is still scope for the presumption that the transaction was procured by undue influence, even though the relationship of the parties is not one in which (in Lord Nicholls’ words) “the law presumes, irrebuttably, that one party had influence over the other”.<sup>52</sup> To this extent, the structure of Lord Nicholls’ speech recognises the continued existence in the law of undue influence of two distinct categories of cases and of two different kinds of presumptions which resemble the former classes 2A and 2B. But the division into two classes by Lord Nicholls is not identical with the former classification since under that classification the presumed fact in both classes was thought to be the same, i.e. “the undue influence has been exercised”.<sup>53</sup> This is, indeed, also the effect of Lord Nicholls’ “rebuttable evidential presumption”<sup>54</sup>; but, as already noted,<sup>55</sup> the effect of his irrebuttable presumption is merely that, by virtue of one of the specified relationships (such as that between parent and child) influence (which may be undue) is taken to exist<sup>56</sup> and this fact is not of itself a ground for relief. The most probable conclusion to be drawn from speeches which are not easy to reconcile is that the distinction between the two classes of presumptions survives, but with two significant modifications: first, that the class 2A presumption is no longer that undue influence is taken to have been exercised;

<sup>45</sup> ibid., at [19].

<sup>46</sup> ibid., at [30].

<sup>47</sup> cf. National Westminster Bank plc v Legatt, The Times, November 16, 2000.

<sup>48</sup> See above, p.415 at nn.29 and 30.

<sup>49</sup> Etridge case above, n.16 at [30].

<sup>50</sup> cf. ibid., at [47].

<sup>51</sup> (1866) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 55 above p.414 and other cases there cited.

<sup>52</sup> Etridge case above, n.16, at [18].

<sup>53</sup> Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] A.C. 180 at 189.

<sup>54</sup> Etridge case at [14], [17].

<sup>55</sup> See above, pp.412, 413.

<sup>56</sup> Etridge case, at [18].

and, secondly, that the class 2B presumption will not normally (i.e. “in the ordinary course”)<sup>57</sup> apply between spouses or parties in closely analogous relationships.

In discussing the husband and wife cases, Lord Nicholls distinguished between “the ordinary course” of cases<sup>58</sup> (in which there was no scope for the rebuttable evidential presumption) and cases falling outside this “ordinary course” in which the wife’s giving of the guarantee “does call for explanation”<sup>59</sup>; e.g. where one party takes “advantage of the other’s vulnerability”.<sup>60</sup> In this “minority of cases”<sup>61</sup> the law does provide protection for the latter party (usually the wife). This was, for example, said to be the case where a wife was “in a position of subservience and obedience to the wishes of her husband”<sup>62</sup> in relation to financial and other matters by virtue of the culture of the religious community to which both belonged. It seems that in such cases the wife’s protection is based on actual rather than on presumed undue influence.<sup>63</sup> In one of the cases under appeal in the Etridge case,<sup>64</sup> the wife was in a position of such subservience and could therefore have set the transaction aside against her husband; but her claim for relief against the bank whose loan to him she had guaranteed failed on grounds to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>65</sup>

(iv) Actual pressure and presumed undue influence. A case for relief may be based in the alternative on (a) actual pressure<sup>66</sup> or (b) presumed undue influence. If the court finds as a fact that B was not the victim of actual undue influence, then B cannot succeed on the ground of presumed undue influence; for the former finding rebuts the presumed fact.<sup>67</sup> The position may be compared with the operation of the presumption of death<sup>68</sup>: if the person alleged to be dead is in fact proved to be alive, proof of the basic facts of the presumption (roughly, seven years’ absence, unheard of) becomes irrelevant. Conversely, if actual undue influence is established, the presumption becomes irrelevant: in this sense “a finding of actual undue influence and a finding that there is a presumption are not alternatives to each other”.<sup>69</sup> Allegations of actual and of presumed undue influence are alternative ways of presenting B’s case; the same is not true (as the dictum just quoted states) of findings and presumptions since the effect of a presumption is to lead to a finding of such influence.

(d) BURDEN OF PROOF. Where the necessary relationship is alleged to exist, the burden of proving that it does exist is on the party seeking to set the transaction aside.<sup>70</sup> Once this burden has been discharged, it is up to the party benefiting from the transaction to rebut the presumption of undue influence<sup>71</sup> in one of the ways to be discussed below.

<sup>57</sup> ibid., at [30].

<sup>58</sup> ibid.

<sup>59</sup> ibid., at [31].

<sup>60</sup> ibid., at [36]; cf. [163].

<sup>61</sup> ibid., at [37].

<sup>62</sup> ibid., at [283].

<sup>63</sup> ibid., at [130] (“actual undue influence”); cf. ibid. at [36] (“such abuse does occur”); but contrast ibid. at [291] (“the presumption arose”).

<sup>64</sup> Barclays Bank plc v Coleman.

<sup>65</sup> See below, p.427.

<sup>66</sup> See above, p.408.

<sup>67</sup> Etridge case above, n.16, at [281].

<sup>68</sup> Phipson on Evidence (15th ed.), §4.23.

<sup>69</sup> Etridge case, above, n.16 at [291].

<sup>70</sup> Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 342; cf. Re Craig [1971] Ch. 95; Coldunell Ltd v Gallon [1986] Q.B. 1184; Allied Irish Bank v Byrne [1995] 1 F.C.R. 430.

<sup>71</sup> Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch.D. 145; Re Craig, above n.70.

(e) SCOPE OF THE PRESUMPTION. The presumption does not apply, even though one of the special relationships exists, if it cannot possibly have influenced the particular transaction. Thus it has been suggested that the presumption would not apply if a solicitor bought a horse from a client who had retained him to conduct an action for slander.<sup>72</sup>

(f) REMEDY. The normal remedy in cases of undue influence is to set the impugned transaction aside; but subsequent events, such as dealings with the subject-matter, may make this process impossible. The court then has (as in cases of misrepresentation<sup>73</sup>) a wide discretion to do what is practically just. It can, for example, make an award in the nature of damages giving the victim of the undue influence the difference between the amount for which he parted with the subject-matter and its fair value at the time of the transaction.<sup>74</sup>

(2) Rebutting the presumption

The presumption of undue influence is rebutted if the party benefiting from the transaction shows that it was “the free exercise of independent will”.<sup>75</sup> The most usual way of doing this is to show that the other party had independent advice before entering into the transaction.<sup>76</sup> But the mere fact that independent advice was given will not of itself save the transaction. The advice must be competent and based on knowledge of all the relevant facts.<sup>77</sup> It has been suggested that the independent adviser must also approve the transaction, and that his advice must be followed.<sup>78</sup> This may be necessary where the influence is particularly strong, or where a very large gift is made; but it is not necessary in every case.<sup>79</sup> There is indeed no invariable rule that independent advice is necessary to save the transaction<sup>80</sup>; but the beneficiary would lack elementary prudence if he did not ensure that such advice was given.

Particularly stringent rules apply where a solicitor buys from or sells to his client.<sup>81</sup> The solicitor must show that the client was fully informed of all the relevant facts; (generally) that the client was separately advised; and that the transaction was a fair one: thus a sale to the solicitor can be set aside simply on the ground of undervalue.<sup>82</sup> A solicitor must make full disclosure even where the presumption of undue influence has been rebutted.<sup>83</sup>

<sup>72</sup> Allison v Clayhills (1907) 97 L.T. 709 at 711.

<sup>73</sup> See above, p.380.

<sup>74</sup> Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All E.R. 61.

<sup>75</sup> Inche Noriah v Shaik Allie bin Omar [1929] A.C. 127 at 136; Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All E.R. 61 at 85; Naidoo v Naidu, The Times, November 1, 2000; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773; [2001] 4 All E.R. 44, at [7] (“expression of . . . free will”); cf. ibid., at [162] (“will . . . not . . . overborne”); Hammond v Osborn [2002] EWCA Civ 865, [2002] W.T.L.R. 1125.

<sup>76</sup> Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch.D. 145 at 190; Bullock v Lloyds Bank [1955] Ch. 317; Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 417 at 421; Cloughton v Price [1997] E.G.C.S. 51.

<sup>77</sup> Inche Noriah v Shaik Allie bin Omar [1929] A.C. 127.

<sup>78</sup> Powell v Powell [1900] 1 Ch. 243 at 246; Wright v Carter [1903] 1 Ch. 27; Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland v Burch [1997] 1 All E.R. 144 at 155–156.

<sup>79</sup> Re Coomber [1911] 1 Ch. 723 at 730; Banco Exterior Industrial S.A v Thomas [1997] 1 All E.R. 46.

<sup>80</sup> Inche Noriah v Shaik Allie bin Omar [1929] A.C. 127 at 135; Re Brocklehurst [1978] Ch. 14.

<sup>81</sup> cf. also the provisions of the Solicitors Act 1974, ss.56 at 57, for regulating the remuneration of solicitors.

<sup>82</sup> Wright v Carter [1903] 1 Ch. 27; Longstaff v Birtles [2001] EWCA Civ 1129; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 470 (a case of breach of fiduciary duty rather than of undue influence: see at [40]); the same rule applies where a trustee buys from his cestui que trust: Thomson v Eastwood (1877) 2 App.Cas. 215. Manifest disadvantage was never considered to be a necessary condition for relief in cases of this kind. cf. above, p.378 at n.49; Bank of Credit & Commerce International SA v Aboudy [1990] 1 Q.B. 923 at 962.

<sup>83</sup> Moody v Cox & Hatt [1917] 2 Ch. 71.

The above discussion assumes that the dispute is between the person who has (or is presumed to have) exercised the undue influence and the victim of that influence. Further problems which arise where the dispute is between the victim and a third party will be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>84</sup>

3. Unconscionable Bargains

Equity can give relief against unconscionable bargains<sup>85</sup> in certain cases in which one party is in a position to exploit a particular weakness of the other. The burden of justifying such a transaction is on the former party.<sup>86</sup>

(1) Catching bargains<sup>87</sup>

Equity can set aside or modify an agreement with an "expectant heir" made in anticipation of his expectations. The transaction need not amount to a sale of or charge on the expectation.<sup>88</sup> Thus equity can relieve against a post-obit bond, by which a debtor promises his creditor a certain sum if the debtor survives a named person and becomes entitled to a share in his estate.<sup>89</sup> Nor is the equitable jurisdiction confined to "heirs": relief can be given to a young man whose sole expectation of wealth is from his father, who is still alive.<sup>90</sup>

A person who sold a reversionary interest could at one time obtain relief by proving only that the sale was at an undervalue. The law was changed by the Sales of Reversions Act 1867, now re-enacted in s.174 of the Law of Property Act 1925. This provides that no sale of a "reversionary interest" (which includes a mere expectancy) shall be opened or set aside merely on the ground of undervalue; but the section expressly preserves the jurisdiction of the court to set aside or modify unconscionable bargains. Undervalue remains "a material element in cases in which it is not the sole equitable ground for relief",<sup>91</sup> and may form the sole ground for relief if it is "so gross as to amount of itself to evidence of fraud".<sup>92</sup> Fraud is not here used in its common law sense<sup>93</sup> but means "an unconscientious use of the power arising out of" the relative positions of the parties.<sup>94</sup>

(2) Dealing with poor and ignorant persons

In Evans v Llewellyn<sup>95</sup> a poor man became entitled to a share of an estate worth £1,700. He sold it for 200 guineas cash, and was later able to set the transaction aside as it was "improvidently obtained". A modern illustration of the principle may be provided by a case in which an employee of modest financial means guaranteed her employer's overdraft for up to £270,000. The transaction was described as "harsh and unconscionable"<sup>96</sup> and set aside; but the actual ground for the decision was that the relationship

<sup>84</sup> See below, pp.423-427.

<sup>85</sup> Not against gifts, though these can be set aside for undue influence: Langton v Langton [1995] FLR 890.

<sup>86</sup> Aylesford v Morris (1873) 1 L.R. 8 Ch.App. 484.

<sup>87</sup> Dawson, 45 Mich.L.Rev. 267-279.

<sup>88</sup> Aylesford v Morris (1873) 1 L.R. 8 Ch.App. 484.

<sup>89</sup> See Chesterfield v Janssen (1750) 2 Ves.Sen. 125.

<sup>90</sup> Nevill v Snelling (1880) 15 Ch.D. 679.

<sup>91</sup> O'Rorke v Bolingbroke (1877) 2 App.Cas. 814 at 833.

<sup>92</sup> Fry v Lane (1888) 40 Ch.D. 312, 321.

<sup>93</sup> See above, p.343.

<sup>94</sup> Aylesford v Morris (1873) 1 L.R. 8 Ch.App. 484, 491.

<sup>95</sup> (1787) 1 Cox C.C. 333; mentioned with approval in Fry v Lane, above; Longmate v Ledger (1860) 2 Giff. 157; Clark v Malpas (1862) 4 D.F. & J. 401; Baker v Monk (1864) 4 D.J. & S. 338; Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 337; Watkin v Watson-Smith, The Times, July 3, 1986.

<sup>96</sup> Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Burch [1997] 1 All E.R. 144 at 151.

between employer and employee was such as to give rise to a presumption of undue influence. It seems that equity may, even in the absence of such influence, give such relief when unfair advantage is taken of a person who is poor, ignorant or weak-minded, or is for some other reason in need of special protection.<sup>97</sup> Specific performance may be refused on similar grounds.<sup>98</sup> The equitable rule is based on unconscionable conduct by the stronger party: relief will not be granted merely because the transaction is unfair<sup>99</sup> or improvident.<sup>1</sup> A fortiori, mere inadequacy of consideration is not a ground for relief where the parties have bargained on equal terms.<sup>2</sup>

(3) Inequality of bargaining power<sup>3</sup>

A number of judicial statements give some support to the view that one party to a contract may be entitled to relief if the other has taken unfair advantage of the fact that there is a marked inequality of bargaining power between them.

One group of such statements is concerned with the special problem of the validity of covenants in restraint of trade.<sup>4</sup> This depends on whether the covenant is “reasonable”, and the adequacy of consideration is taken into account in determining the issue of reasonableness.<sup>5</sup> The fairness of the bargain (which to some extent depends on the relative bargaining positions of the parties) is therefore relevant to the validity of the restraint; but the fact that it is taken into account for this purpose scarcely supports a general principle of relief against harsh bargains on the ground of inequality of bargaining power.

Such a principle was, however, stated (as an alternative ground of decision) by Lord Denning M.R. in Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy.<sup>6</sup> He referred to a number of rules (discussed earlier<sup>7</sup> in this Chapter) under which relief was given against harsh or unfair contracts; and he derived from them the generalisation that “. . . English law gives relief to one who, without independent advice, enters into a contract upon terms which are very unfair or transfers property for a consideration which is grossly inadequate, when his bargaining power is grievously impaired by reason of his own needs or desires, or by his own ignorance or infirmity, coupled with undue influence or pressures brought to bear on him by or for the benefit of the other”.<sup>8</sup> The other members of the Court of Appeal based their decision solely on the equitable doctrine of undue influence.<sup>9</sup> Thus, while

<sup>97</sup> e.g. Creswell v Potter (1968) [1978] 1 W.L.R. 255n. (wife in course of divorce proceedings transferring her share in the matrimonial home to husband without getting independent advice and for inadequate consideration); cf. Backhouse v Backhouse [1978] 1 W.L.R. 243. Mere unfamiliarity with the English language is not a ground for relief: Barclays Bank plc v Schwartz, The Times, August 2, 1995.

<sup>98</sup> e.g. Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew. 651: see below, p.1028.

<sup>99</sup> Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173; Hart v O'Connor [1985] A.C. 1000; Boustany v Pigott (1995) 69 P.& C.R. 298. Irvani v Irvani [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 425.

<sup>1</sup> Kalsep v X-Flow BV, The Times, May 3, 2001.

<sup>2</sup> See Collier v Brown (1788) 1 Cox C.C. 428; Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves. 234 at 246; Western v Russell (1814) 3 v & B. 187.

<sup>3</sup> Cartwright, Unequal Bargaining; Thal, 8 O.J.L.S. 17.

<sup>4</sup> A. Schroeder Music Publishing Co v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1315; cf. Clifford Davis Management v WEA Records [1975] 1 W.L.R. 61; Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187 at 1197; Wooldridge, [1977] J.B.L. 312; Panayiotou v Sony Music Entertainment (UK) Ltd, The Times, June 30, 1994.

<sup>5</sup> See below, p.462.

<sup>6</sup> [1975] Q.B. 326; above, p.419.

<sup>7</sup> See above, pp.408–421.

<sup>8</sup> [1975] Q.B. 326 at 339. cf. the rules against “collateral advantages” in mortgages: Megarry and Wade, Law of Real Property (5th ed.), pp.968–971. And see Beatson, 1 O.J.L.S. 426.

<sup>9</sup> See above, p.419; cf. Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 417 at 422.

expressing "some sympathy"<sup>10</sup> for Lord Denning's principle, they did not find it necessary to express a concluded opinion on it. It follows that the principle does not form the ground for the decision.<sup>11</sup>

In a number of later cases, Lord Denning has nevertheless repeated his view that the law recognised a principle of "inequality of bargaining power".<sup>12</sup> The scope of the alleged principle seems to be very wide: it can apparently apply to such disparate transactions or terms as the contract in Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy,<sup>13</sup> the renegotiation of a contract,<sup>14</sup> the settlement of a tort claim,<sup>15</sup> and the inclusion of an exemption clause in a cleaning contract made in standard form.<sup>16</sup> No clear limit to the principle is stated except that a bargain will not be upset if it is "the result of the ordinary interplay of forces".<sup>17</sup> Reference by Lord Denning to "the American policy of inadequate bargaining power"<sup>18</sup> is from his point of view scarcely reassuring; for the lengths to which American courts have gone in implementing this policy would hardly be acceptable in England without express legislative authority. It is, for example, hard to imagine an English court holding that a consumer could keep goods after paying only part of the price simply because the seller's profit on the full contract price would be excessive.<sup>19</sup> The regulation of these and similar matters is in England, by general consent, left to legislation.<sup>20</sup>

For these reasons, Lord Denning's principle has little judicial<sup>21</sup> support in England. On the contrary, in Pao On v Lau Yiu Long<sup>22</sup> the Privy Council, having held that the contract was not voidable for duress,<sup>23</sup> also rejected the argument that it was invalid as having been procured by "an unfair use of a dominant bargaining position".<sup>24</sup> To treat this as a ground of invalidity distinct from duress would, in Lord Scarman's words, "be unhelpful because it would render the law uncertain".<sup>25</sup> In National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan Lord Scarman again expressed similar views when questioning "whether there is any need in the modern law to erect a general principle of relief against inequality of bargaining power".<sup>26</sup> Legislation having dealt with a number of specific instances in which superior bargaining power might be abused,<sup>27</sup> he doubted "whether the courts should assume the burden of formulating further restrictions"<sup>28</sup>; and the need for them

<sup>10</sup> [1975] Q.B. 326 at 347 (Sir Eric Sachs, with whom Cairns L.J. agreed); cf. Backhouse v Backhouse [1978] 1 W.L.R. 243 at 251; Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Burch [1997] 1 All E.R. 144.

<sup>11</sup> National Westminster Bank Ltd v Morgan [1985] A.C. 686 at 708–709.

<sup>12</sup> Arrale v Costain Civil Engineering Ltd [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 98 at 102; Levison v Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co Ltd [1978] Q.B. 69 at 78.

<sup>13</sup> [1975] Q.B. 326; above, p.419 at n.10.

<sup>14</sup> D & C Builders v Rees [1966] 2 Q.B. 617.

<sup>15</sup> Arrale v Costain Civil Engineering Ltd [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 98.

<sup>16</sup> Levison v Patent Steam Carpet Cleaning Co Ltd [1978] Q.B. 69.

<sup>17</sup> Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 336.

<sup>18</sup> ibid. at 333 (during argument).

<sup>19</sup> Jones v Star Credit Corp 298 N.Y.S. 2d 264 (1969).

<sup>20</sup> See Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. at p.336; cf. below, at n.27 and pp.440–441.

<sup>21</sup> Inequality of bargaining power may also be relevant to the exercise of discretions conferred by legislation to control contract terms: see, for example Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, Sch.2 para.(a) (above, p.259); Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.138(3)(b) and (4)(b) (below p.428); Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s.23 (now amended by Family Law Reform Act 1996 Sch.2, para.4), as interpreted in Edgar v Edgar [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1410; Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (above, p.273 at n.33a). But such discretions do not seem to provide any basis for a general common law principle: see below at n.35.

<sup>22</sup> [1980] A.C. 614.

<sup>23</sup> See above, pp.406–407.

<sup>24</sup> [1980] A.C. 614 at 634.

<sup>25</sup> ibid.

<sup>26</sup> [1985] A.C. 686 at 708.

<sup>27</sup> See, n.21, above.

<sup>28</sup> [1985] A.C. 686 at 708; cf. Lloyds Bank Ltd v Bundy [1975] Q.B. 326 at 336.

to do so has also been reduced by the widening of the scope of duress.<sup>29</sup> Decisions of the lower courts have similarly rejected the argument that inequality of bargaining power is, of itself, a ground of invalidity<sup>30</sup>; and this is true even in the restraint of trade cases, in which the courts have traditionally taken the “fairness” of the bargain into account.<sup>31</sup>

4. Bars to Relief

The right to rescind<sup>32</sup> for undue influence is barred on grounds similar to those which limit the right to rescind for misrepresentation.

(a) IMPOSSIBILITY OF RESTITUTION. The party seeking rescission must restore benefits that he has obtained under the contract, and he may be allowed to rescind in spite of the fact that he cannot make precise restitution, so long as equity can achieve a result that is “practically just”.<sup>33</sup> The point is illustrated by O’Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd<sup>34</sup> where the claimant sought to set aside for undue influence a number of management, sole agency, recording and publishing agreements and transfers of copyrights. On the one hand the defendants argued that rescission should not be allowed as they could no longer be restored to their pre-contract position in view of the work which they had done to promote the claimant’s success; on the other hand the claimant argued that rescission for undue influence was (unlike rescission for misrepresentation) not subject to any requirement of restitution at all. The court rejected both arguments, holding that, even though precise restitution was not possible, rescission could be ordered so long as the court could do substantial justice. This could be done by upholding the claim for rescission while allowing the defendants a reasonable remuneration for their work on behalf of the claimant.<sup>35</sup>

(b) AFFIRMATION. A claim to relief on the ground of undue influence is barred by affirmation<sup>36</sup> of the transaction after the influence (or the relationship giving rise to a presumption of influence) has ceased. It has been held that affirmation is effective though made without independent advice and in ignorance of the right to have the transaction set aside.<sup>37</sup> It is submitted that the law on this point should (as in cases of misrepresentation and breach) require the injured party to know, or to have obvious means of knowing, of the right to rescind.<sup>38</sup>

Where a wife had, under her husband’s undue influence, joined him in charging the matrimonial home to a bank and later affirmed the transaction as against the husband, it was held that she had also lost the secondary right of avoidance against the bank.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.405.

<sup>30</sup> Burmah Oil Co v Bank of England, The Times, July 4, 1981; Horry v Tate & Lyle Refineries Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 417 at 422; Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173; CNT Cash & Carry Ltd v Gallagher Ltd [1994] 4 All E.R. 714 at 717.

<sup>31</sup> The Alec Lobb case, above, concerned restraint of trade.

<sup>32</sup> Where rescission is no longer possible, an alternative remedy by way of equitable compensation may be available, as in Longstaff v Birtles [2001] EWCA Civ 1219; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 470 at [36] (a case of breach of fiduciary duty).

<sup>33</sup> Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App.Cas. 1218 at 1279; above, p.379; Cheese v Thomas [1994] 1 W.L.R. 129; cf. Dunbar Bank plc v Nadeem [1998] 3 All E.R. 876 (where the claim based on undue influence failed).

<sup>34</sup> [1985] Q.B. 428; above, p.419.

<sup>35</sup> cf. above, pp.397, 380 for similar relief in cases of misrepresentation.

<sup>36</sup> cf. (in cases of duress) The Atlantic Baron [1979] Q.B. 705.

<sup>37</sup> Mitchell v Homfray (1882) 8 Q.B.D. 587.

<sup>38</sup> See above, p.382; below, pp.814–815.

<sup>39</sup> First National Bank plc v Walker [2001] 1 F.L.R. 505.

which would, but for the affirmation, have been available to her under the rules stated later in this Chapter.<sup>40</sup>

(c) DELAY. The victim of undue influence must “seek relief within a reasonable time after the removal of the influence under which the gift was made”.<sup>41</sup> If with knowledge or obvious means of knowledge of his rights he fails to seek relief he is assumed to have affirmed the transaction.

(d) THIRD PARTY RIGHTS. Two types of cases call for discussion. In the first, A acquires property from B under a transaction procured, or presumed to have been procured, by undue influence; and A then transfers that property to C. In the second, A by undue influence, or in circumstances in which undue influence may be presumed, induces B to enter into a contract with C. The question in each case is to what extent C is adversely affected by the undue influence exerted, or presumed to have been exerted, by A on B.

(i) Property acquired by undue influence transferred to third party. In this type of case, B can set the transaction aside if C did not give value for the transfer from A or if he took it “with notice of the equity . . . or with notice of the circumstances from which the court infers the equity”.<sup>42</sup> In this context, “notice” refers not only to actual knowledge of those circumstances but also to cases in which it is alleged that C ought to have known of them, or (in other words) where he had constructive notice of them. The “circumstances,” notice of which will prejudicially affect C are those that would, but for the transfer to him, have entitled B to relief against A on the ground of undue influence.<sup>43</sup> But B will not be entitled to set the transaction aside against C on this ground if C has in good faith (i.e., without notice, actual or constructive) and for value acquired an interest for value in the subject-matter. For example, in O’Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd<sup>44</sup> relief was not available against a company which had acquired some of the claimant’s copyrights and tapes in good faith and for value.

(ii) Undue influence inducing contract with third party. Our concern here is with the situation in which A is alleged to have induced B to deal directly with C. The most common (though not the only)<sup>45</sup> illustration of this situation is provided by a large group of recent cases in which a loan was made by C (a bank or building society) to A for the purposes of A’s business<sup>46</sup> and B (usually A’s wife) guaranteed the loan and provided security for it, e.g. by a charge on the matrimonial home owned by B or by A and B jointly. On A’s default, the question would arise whether C was adversely affected by undue influence exerted or presumed to have been exerted by A or B (or by some other vitiating factor, such as misrepresentation, that would have operated between A and B, had the impugned transaction been between them). Before the Etridge case, the answer to this question had been said to depend on whether C had “constructive notice”<sup>47</sup> of the circumstances that would (or would be presumed to have) vitiated the transaction between A and B. It followed that B could set the transaction with C aside if C had such

<sup>40</sup> See below, under heading (d).

<sup>41</sup> Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch.D. 145 at 187.

<sup>42</sup> Bainbridge v Browne (1881) 18 Ch.D. 188 at 197.

<sup>43</sup> See above, pp.409–419.

<sup>44</sup> [1985] Q.B. 428 at 459–460; above, at n.34.

<sup>45</sup> See Naidoo v Naidoo, The Times, November 1, 2000.

<sup>46</sup> The business may for this purpose be A’s even though it is run through a company controlled by A and in spite of the fact that B also holds shares in, or is a director of, the company: see, for example, Bank of Cyprus v Markou [1999] 2 All E.R. 707; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44, [2002] 2 A.C. 773 at [49].

<sup>47</sup> Barclays Bank plc v O’Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 186.

notice<sup>48</sup>; but that C could enforce the transaction against B if C had no such notice<sup>49</sup> and had taken steps (of the kind to be described later in this Chapter) to protect B.<sup>50</sup> In the Etridge case,<sup>51</sup> however, the House of Lords discouraged this use, in the present context, of the concept of “constructive notice” (which normally operates in the context of transfers of property by persons with a defective title).<sup>52</sup> Instead, the test is whether C, the bank, is “put on inquiry.”<sup>53</sup> Even this is “strictly a misnomer”<sup>54</sup> since C is not bound to investigate the state of the relationship between A and B; but the phrase is a convenient one to indicate that C must take reasonable steps to reduce the risk of B’s entering into the transaction as a result of undue influence (or other similar vitiating factor) exerted by A on B.<sup>55</sup> The circumstances in which such steps must be taken go far beyond those in which the vitiating factor actually exists or is presumed to exist. Thus “a bank is put on inquiry whenever a wife offers to stand surety for her husband’s debts”<sup>56</sup> even though (as the discussion in an earlier part of this Chapter shows) in many such cases the wife will not be able to show that the guarantee was actually procured by undue influence or to rely on the presumption that it was so procured.<sup>57</sup> The law as to when C is “put on inquiry” or (in other words) required to take steps to protect B against the risk of B’s consent having been improperly obtained) was extensively reviewed in the Etridge case, from which it appears that C’s duty in this respect depends primarily on two factors.

The first is the nature of the impugned transaction. Thus C’s duty will arise where B guarantees business debts incurred by A or by a company through which A runs his business.<sup>58</sup> But a bank is not “put on inquiry” where it makes a joint loan to a husband and wife (even if the loan is secured on their matrimonial home) “unless the bank is aware that the loan is being made for the husband’s purposes, as distinct from their joint purposes.”<sup>59</sup> The reason for the distinction is that a wife’s guarantee of her husband’s business debts is, on its face, disadvantageous to her (in the sense of her not deriving any direct benefit from it) and so “calls for explanation”,<sup>60</sup> while this is not true of a joint loan to her and her husband.

The second is the relationship between A and B. In most of the reported cases, B was A’s wife; but C’s duty applies equally in the converse case where “the husband stands <sup>48</sup> See above, n.47; an alternative ground for allowing B to set the transaction aside was that C had constituted A as his agent for the purpose of concluding the transaction with B, so that A’s knowledge of the relevant circumstances was attributed to C: e.g. Chaplin and Co Ltd v Brammall [1908] 1 K.B. 223; Avon Finance Co v Bridger [1985] 2 All E.R. 281. But the reasoning has been described as “artificial” (Barclays Bank plc v O’Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 195) and is now unlikely to be followed unless A had acted as C’s agent “in a real sense”: CIBC Mortgages plc v Pitt [1994] 1 A.C. 200 at 211.

<sup>49</sup> e.g. Bainbridge v Broome (1881) 18 Ch.D. 188; this was also the outcome in Barclays Bank plc v O’Brien, above n.48, where the vitiating factor was misrepresentation by A.

<sup>50</sup> See below, p.426.

<sup>51</sup> Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773.

<sup>52</sup> ibid., at [39].

<sup>53</sup> ibid., at [44].

<sup>54</sup> ibid.

<sup>55</sup> ibid., at [41].

<sup>56</sup> ibid., at [44], [46]. The burden of proof is on B to show that C knew her to be A’s wife living with him (or that there was an analogous relationship between them) and that the transaction was one calling for an explanation; it is then up to C to show that it took reasonable steps to ensure that B’s consent was properly obtained: Barclays Bank plc v Boulter [1999] 1 W.L.R. 1919.

<sup>57</sup> See above, p.416.

<sup>58</sup> Etridge case, above n.51 at [48].

<sup>59</sup> ibid., citing CIBC Mortgages v Pitt [1994] 1 A.C. 200; contrast Goode Durrant Administration v Biddulph [1995] F.C.R. 196 (loan made jointly to husband, wife and a company owned largely by husband); Allied Irish Bank v Byrne [1995] 2 F.L.R. 325 (joint loan to husband and wife for purposes of husband’s business).

<sup>60</sup> Etridge case, above n.51, at [47]; above, p.378 at n.62.

surety for his wife's debts"<sup>61</sup> and to "the case of unmarried couples, whether heterosexual or homosexual".<sup>62</sup> It can apply even where the relationship is neither a marital nor a quasi-marital one but is one in which trust and confidence is in fact reposed by B in A.<sup>63</sup> According to a "wider principle" approved by Lord Nicholls in the Etridge case,<sup>64</sup> the bank's duty extends to all cases in which the relationship between the surety (B) and the principal debtor is a non-commercial one.<sup>65</sup> The advantage of this formulation of the principle is that it promotes certainty in the sense that the creditor's duty to take steps to protect the surety against the risks described above will arise in all such suretyship cases and will not depend on any investigation by the bank of the actual state of the relationship between A and B. The principle would not, on the other hand, apply where the relationship between A and B was a commercial one: e.g. where they were associated companies or where A paid B a fee for acting as surety.<sup>66</sup>

The steps that C (the bank) is required to take in performance of its duty were also reviewed in the Etridge case. As the duty is no more than one to take reasonable care to protect B (the surety) against the risk of undue influence, C is not required itself to investigate the question whether B was in fact subjected to such influence.<sup>67</sup> Nor is it necessary<sup>68</sup> for C to arrange for one of its representatives to hold a personal meeting with B.<sup>69</sup> It will (in future cases)<sup>70</sup> suffice for C to communicate directly<sup>71</sup> with B to the effect that C will require a solicitor acting for B<sup>72</sup> (who may also act for A or C (or both of them) in the transaction<sup>73</sup> to confirm to C in writing that the solicitor has explained to B the nature and effects of the documents to be signed by B, containing the transaction<sup>74</sup>; this explanation must be given in a face to face meeting between the solicitor and B, conducted in the absence of A.<sup>75</sup> The solicitor must also be supplied by C with the financial information that he needs for the purpose of this explanation.<sup>76</sup> If these steps are taken, C will normally be entitled to rely on the solicitor's confirmation that he has "advised the wife [B] appropriately".<sup>77</sup> The word "advised" here refers to the solicitor's duty to explain the transaction: it is no part of his duty "to veto the transaction"<sup>78</sup> merely because he thinks it is not in B's best interests.<sup>79</sup> If, indeed, it is "glaringly

<sup>61</sup> Etridge case, above n.51 at [47].

<sup>62</sup> ibid., Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] A.C. 180 at 198; Massey v Midland Bank plc [1995] 1 All E.R. 929 at 933.

<sup>63</sup> e.g. Acon Finance Co v Bridger [1985] 2 All E.R. 281, approved in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien, above, n.62; Credit Lyonnais Bank Nederland NV v Burch [1997] 1 All E.R. 144. cf. Wright v Cherrytree Finance Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 449; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 877 (widow and her son-in-law); part of the reasoning of this case would no longer be acceptable after the Etridge case.

<sup>64</sup> Etridge case, above n.51, at [82], citing Birks in Rose (ed.), Restitution and Banking Law, p.185.

<sup>65</sup> Etridge case, above n.51, at [87].

<sup>66</sup> ibid., at [88].

<sup>67</sup> ibid., at [53].

<sup>68</sup> Though such a step may be sufficient if the required explanation and recommendation to seek independent legal advice are given: ibid., at [50].

<sup>69</sup> ibid., at [55].

<sup>70</sup> See the reference in ibid. [50] to "the future".

<sup>71</sup> ibid., at [79].

<sup>72</sup> See National Westminster Bank plc v Amin [2002] UKHL 9; [2002] 1 F.L.R. 735, where it was not clear that this requirement had been satisfied.

<sup>73</sup> Etridge case, above n.51, at [74].

<sup>74</sup> ibid., at [79].

<sup>75</sup> ibid., at [76].

<sup>76</sup> ibid., at [79].

<sup>77</sup> ibid., at [56]; Barclays Bank plc v Goff [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 847, [2001] EWCA Civ 634.

<sup>78</sup> Etridge case, above, n.51, at [61].

<sup>79</sup> ibid.

obvious that the wife (B) is being grievously wronged”<sup>80</sup> he should decline to act further; and it seems that, if he did not so decline, his confirmation would not protect C. But in cases falling outside this extreme range, C is not precluded from relying on the solicitor’s confirmation merely because the solicitor is not satisfied that the transaction was one into which [B] “could sensibly be advised to enter”<sup>81</sup> nor even because the transaction was “one into which no competent solicitor could have advised the wife [B] to enter”.<sup>82</sup> If C takes the required steps (outlined above), it will normally<sup>83</sup> be entitled to rely on the solicitor’s confirmation that the solicitor has “advised the wife [B] appropriately.”<sup>84</sup> If C fails to take the required steps, C runs the risk of not being able to enforce the transaction against B.

The above steps are designed to protect B against the risk of undue influence (or similar vitiating factors). The mere fact that they were not taken does not therefore provide grounds on which B will be entitled to set the transaction aside for undue influence. B will be so entitled, even if C has not taken the required steps, only if B can also establish either that the transaction was procured by undue influence or that the basic facts of the “evidential presumption”<sup>85</sup> that it was so procured exist and if the presumption is not otherwise rebutted. According to some of the older authorities, indeed, C was unable to enforce the transaction whenever the relationship between A and B was one of those giving rise to the irrebuttable presumption described in above<sup>86</sup> (e.g. that of parent and child) and if C knew, or ought to have known, of that relationship.<sup>87</sup> But these cases seems to have been based on the view that the mere existence of such a relationship gave rise to a presumption that undue influence had been exercised.<sup>88</sup> This view can no longer stand after the Etridge case, according to which the effect of the irrebuttable presumption is merely to dispense with the need that such influence exists,<sup>89</sup> and this is not, of itself, enough to entitle B to set the transaction aside.<sup>90</sup>

SECTION 3. MONEYLENDING AND CONSUMER PROTECTION

1. Extortionate Credit Bargains

The rate of interest which could be charged by moneylenders was at one time regulated by statute. After the Usury Laws Repeal Act 1854, the lender was free to charge such interest as he could get, and for nearly 50 years the activities of moneylenders were subject only to the equitable rules as to unconscionable bargains.<sup>91</sup> Statutory powers to control moneylending contracts were, however, given to the courts by the Moneylenders Acts 1900 and 1927, and are now contained in the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Under that Act, the court has power to “reopen” any “extortionate credit bargain”.<sup>92</sup> The Act provides that a credit bargain is extortionate if the payments to be made under it are at

<sup>80</sup> ibid., at [62] italics supplied.

<sup>81</sup> ibid., at [58]–[59].

<sup>82</sup> ibid., at [63].

<sup>83</sup> ibid., at [61]; but not if C knows that the solicitor “has not duly advised” B: ibid., at [57]; cf. National Westminster Bank plc v Breeds [2001] N.L.J. 170.

<sup>84</sup> ibid., at [56]; cf. ibid., at [292] where this requirement was held to have been complied with in Barclays Bank plc v Coleman, one of the cases under consideration in the Etridge case, above, n.62.

<sup>85</sup> See above, p.411.

<sup>86</sup> See above, p.411.

<sup>87</sup> Maitland v Irving (1846) 15 Sim. 437; Lancashire Loans Ltd v Black [1934] 1 K.B. 380.

<sup>88</sup> See above, p.414.

<sup>89</sup> Etridge case, above n.51 at [18].

<sup>90</sup> See above, p.413.

<sup>91</sup> See Nevill v Snelling (1880) 15 Ch.D. 679.

<sup>92</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.137(1); cf. Insolvency Act 1986, ss.244, 343.

the time of contracting<sup>93</sup> “grossly exorbitant” or if it “otherwise grossly contravenes the ordinary principles of fair dealing”.<sup>94</sup> These are stringent requirements: a bargain is not “extortionate” merely because it is harsh or even unconscionable.<sup>95</sup> Factors to be taken into account in determining whether a credit bargain is extortionate include the prevailing level of interest rates; matters affecting the debtor (such as his age and business capacity, and the degree to which he was under financial pressure when he made the bargain); and the degree of risk accepted by the creditor.<sup>96</sup> Under these provisions, it has been held that payments were not “grossly exorbitant” where interest at an annual rate of 48 per cent was charged on a loan which was made with little security, and on the very day on which the borrower applied for it, so as to enable him to complete the purchase of a house already heavily encumbered with other charges<sup>97</sup>; and that a bargain did not “grossly contravene the principles of fair dealing” where (in accordance with the principles already discussed<sup>98</sup>) the lender’s conduct was not affected by the exercise of undue influence over the borrower by a third person.<sup>99</sup>

In “reopening” the transaction, the court has a wide discretion “to do justice between the parties.”<sup>1</sup> It can alter the terms of the bargain in order to relieve the debtor “from payment of any sum in excess of that fairly due and reasonable”; order repayment of excessive sums paid; and grant various other forms of relief to the debtor or to a surety.<sup>2</sup>

2. Consumer Trade Practices

Reference has been made in Chapter 7 to legislation which provides for administrative control of exemption clauses and of other unfair terms in consumer contracts.<sup>3</sup> It can also be argued that much legislation protects the consumer against a form of economic duress. A similar policy against such duress appears to underlie the statutory provisions giving consumers a “cooling-off” period in certain cases. For example a person who is induced to sign a regulated consumer credit agreement<sup>4</sup> at home is entitled to cancel it within such a period.<sup>5</sup> And the policy of protecting consumers against certain exemption clauses and unfair terms has been an important influence on the legislative controls of such terms which have been discussed in Chapter 7.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>93</sup> Paragon Finance plc v Staunton [2001] EWCA Civ 1466; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 1025 at [66]; Broadwick Financial Services Ltd v Spencer [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 466, at [56, 57].

<sup>94</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.138(1); if the debtor or any surety alleges that a credit bargain is extortionate, the burden is on the creditor to prove the contrary: ibid. s.171(7).

<sup>95</sup> Davies v Directloans Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 823. Nor does it seem that such a term would be affected by Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999: see reg.4(2)(a) and reg.6(2)(a), above, pp.248, 253.

<sup>96</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.138(2)–(4); Davies v Directloans Ltd, above.

<sup>97</sup> Ketley v Scott [1981] I.C.R. 241; cf. Petrou v Woodstead Finance Ltd [1986] F.L.R. 158 (42.5 per cent not extortionate on short term loan).

<sup>98</sup> See above, pp.386–389.

<sup>99</sup> Coldunell Ltd v Gallon [1986] Q.B. 1184.

<sup>1</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.137(1).

<sup>2</sup> ibid. s.139(2).

<sup>3</sup> Above, p.283.

<sup>4</sup> See above, pp.177–178.

<sup>5</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, ss.67–68; cf. Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334, reg.10; Consumer Protection (Cancellation of Contracts concluded away from Business Premises) Order 1987 (SI 1987/2117); Timeshare Act 1992, ss.2–4.

<sup>6</sup> See above, pp.246–283.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

ILLEGALITY<sup>1</sup>

THE law may refuse to give full effect to a contract on the ground of illegality, i.e. because the contract involves the commission of a legal wrong or is in some other way contrary to public policy.

SECTION 1. THE PROBLEM OF CLASSIFICATION

English writers commonly divide the cases in which contracts are affected by illegality into a number of classes.<sup>2</sup> One object of this classification is to make it possible to generalise about the effects of illegality; but it is doubtful whether any of the suggested classifications achieve this object to any considerable extent. Another object of classification is purely expository, and this does no harm so long as it is not actually misleading.

One classification is based on the nature of the objectionable conduct. Thus Sir Frederick Pollock divided the cases into those where the contract was contrary to (1) positive law, (2) morals or good manners, and (3) public policy; but he admitted that this classification was “only approximate”.<sup>3</sup> The main difficulty with it is that the second category is hard to define and that it may overlap with the third. For this reason the second category is not used in the present Chapter. It can also be argued that public policy is the ground for invalidating all contracts affected by illegality, so that the third category includes the other two. But if all illegal contracts fell into a single category, there would be no point in attempting to classify them, even for purposes of exposition.

A second classification is based on the source of the rule infringed. Thus it is sometimes said that a contract is more likely to be invalid for violation of a statute than for violation of a rule of common law. The distinction is appropriate where a statute expressly prohibits or invalidates a contract.<sup>4</sup> But it is not decisive where the statute contains no such express prohibition and the illegality consists only in the method of making or performing the contract.<sup>5</sup> In St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd<sup>6</sup> a shipowner committed a statutory offence by overloading his ship while performing a number of contracts for the carriage of goods. Devlin J. held that he was nonetheless entitled to freight, because the object of the statute was to prevent overloading and not to prohibit contracts. This object was to be achieved by imposing a fine, and not by subjecting the shipowner to the additional financial loss which would result from invalidating the contracts of carriage. It is submitted that this approach should not be

---

<sup>1</sup> Enonchong, Illegal Transactions; Buckley, Illegality and Public Policy; Furmston (1966) U. of Tor.L.J. 267.

<sup>2</sup> The fashion seems to have been started by Sir Frederick Pollock (below, n.3). It has not spread to the United States. Williston, Contracts (rev. ed.), s.1628, says: “There seems to be no importance to these distinctions.”

<sup>3</sup> Principles of the Law of Contract, (13th ed.), Chap.8, p.261.

<sup>4</sup> e.g. Fair Trading Act 1973, Pt XI, as extended by Trading Schemes Act 1996 (pyramid selling). cf. below, pp.487, 513.

<sup>5</sup> See Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 Q.B. 540; London & Harrogate Securities Ltd v Pitts [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1063.

<sup>6</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. 267.

confined to cases in which the offence is statutory.<sup>7</sup> It would have been just as appropriate, and would probably have led to the same result, had the shipowner been convicted of manslaughter committed in the course of the voyage.

Classification may proceed, thirdly, by the legal consequences of the contracts concerned. Thus Sir John Salmond distinguished between “illegal” and “nugatory” contracts<sup>8</sup>; and the same classification has been adopted by later writers who distinguish between “illegal” and “void” contracts. This classification cannot, of course, lead to any deductions about the legal effects of the contracts in question as it assumes that those consequences are already known. Unfortunately, those who use the classification cannot always agree on this vital point. Thus some regard an agreement by a married person to marry as “illegal”,<sup>9</sup> while others regard it as “void”.<sup>10</sup> Moreover, the classification tries to do the impossible. The nature of the illegality which may affect a contract varies almost infinitely in seriousness.<sup>11</sup> To classify these contracts by their effects into only two groups is likely to result in a misleading degree of oversimplification.

In Section 2 of this Chapter, 22 types of illegal contracts are listed; for purposes of exposition they are divided into two groups, namely contracts involving the commission of a legal wrong and contracts contrary to public policy. The second group includes one particularly important type of contracts, those in restraint of trade. Because of the complexity of the law relating to such contracts, they will be discussed under an independent heading. The exact effects of illegality should ideally be discussed separately in relation to each type of contract, but such treatment would be inordinately long. An attempt will therefore be made in Section 3 of this Chapter to provide a general discussion of the effects of illegality. This approach can be justified on the ground that many of the relevant rules apply to all types of illegal contracts; but it is also often true that the effects vary with the type of illegality. Where this is the case, the general propositions in Section 3 will be qualified accordingly.

SECTION 2. TYPES OF ILLEGALITY

1. Contracts Involving the Commission of a Legal Wrong

(1) Contracts amounting to a legal wrong

A contract is illegal<sup>12</sup> if the mere making of it is a legal wrong: e.g., if legislation prohibits the making of the contract.<sup>13</sup> At common law, a contract to “rig the market” by offering inflated prices for shares in a particular company is similarly illegal as it is a criminal conspiracy.<sup>14</sup> A contract by which one person agrees to finance another’s litigation in return for a share in the proceeds, the former having no genuine or substantial interest in the outcome,<sup>15</sup> used to amount to the crime and tort of champerty; and accordingly

<sup>7</sup> Wetherell v Jones (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 221, 225–226; Coral Leisure Group v Barnett [1981] I.C.R. 503 at 509.

For a similar approach in case of a civil wrong, see The Ypatianna [1988] Q.B. 345 at 369–370.

<sup>8</sup> Salmond and Winfield, Law of Contracts, Chap.7; Salmond and Williams, Law of Contracts, Chap.14.

<sup>9</sup> Salmond and Winfield, above; Salmond and Williams, above. An agreement to marry is no longer a contract, but may have other legal consequences: below, p.441.

<sup>10</sup> Cheshire, Fifoot and Furmston, The Law of Contract (14th ed.), p.449.

<sup>11</sup> Corbin, Contracts, s.1373.

<sup>12</sup> Except to the extent that a statute provides the contrary: e.g. Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.77; (as amended by Sex Discrimination Act 1986, s.6 and Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.39(2) and Sch.2); Race Relations Act 1976, s.72, as amended by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993 s.39(2) and Sch.6.

<sup>13</sup> See Mohamed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815; Hughes v Kingston upon Hull CC [1999] Q.B. 1193; see now n.29 below.

<sup>14</sup> Scott v Brown [1892] 2 Q.B. 724; cf. Harry Parker Ltd v Mason [1940] 2 K.B. 590.

<sup>15</sup> See below, pp.697–698.

the contract was illegal.<sup>16</sup> Although criminal and tortious liability for champerty have been abolished<sup>17</sup> a champertous agreement remains, as a general rule, illegal<sup>18</sup>; but the scope of this rule is restricted by the requirement that, to be champertous, the agreement must amount to “wanton or officious intermeddling with the disputes of others”.<sup>19</sup> At common law agreements between a client and his legal advisers in litigation for the payment of either a “contingency” or a “conditional” fee are champertous and illegal.<sup>20</sup> Contingency fee agreements are those by which the legal adviser is remunerated by a share in the amount recovered: these remain illegal. Conditional fee agreements are those which provide that the legal adviser is to be paid his fee if he wins the case but not if he loses it. With respect to such agreements, legislation now provides<sup>21</sup> that, in most cases,<sup>22</sup> an agreement in writing can validly be made<sup>23</sup> by which a client promises to pay a “conditional fee” to a person who provides him with advocacy or litigation services in legal proceedings.<sup>24</sup> The condition may be that the litigation ends in the client’s favour; and the fee may be a “success fee”, that is, one which provides that, in that event, the provider’s fee is to be increased above the amount of normal fee<sup>25</sup> by a percentage (not exceeding that specified by the Lord Chancellor).<sup>26</sup> Conditional fee agreements which are not in terms validated by this legislation are declared by it to be unenforceable<sup>27</sup> and are also illegal at common law<sup>28</sup>; they are also illegal to the extent to which they are prohibited by other legislation.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Re Thomas [1894] 1 Q.B. 747.

<sup>17</sup> Criminal Law Act 1967, ss.13(1), 14(1).

<sup>18</sup> ibid. s.14(2); Trendtex Trading Corp v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679; McFarlane v EE Caledonia (No.2) [1995] 1 W.L.R. 366 at 372. For statutory exceptions (and their limits) in bankruptcy and insolvency cases, see Insolvency Act 1986 ss.165, 166; Grovenood Holdings plc v James Capel & Co Ltd [1995] Ch. 80; Re Oasis Merchandising Services [1998] Ch. 170; Norglen Ltd v Reeds Rains Prudential Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 945; ANC Ltd v Clark Goldring & Page Ltd [2001] B.C.C. 479.

<sup>19</sup> Giles v Thompson [1994] 1 A.C. 142 at 164 (where the decision was expressly restricted at 156 to the terms of the particular agreements under consideration).

<sup>20</sup> Wallersteiner v Moir (No.2) [1975] Q.B. 373; Ammad v Geraghty & Co [2001] Q.B. 570; Callery v Gray [2001] EWCA Civ 1117; [2001] 1 W.L.R. 2212, at [5, 6]; conditional fee agreements with surveyors are valid at common law: Pickering v Sogex Services (1982) 262 E.G. 700; Picton Jones & Co v Arcadia Developments [1989] 1 E.G.L.R. 43; Factortame Ltd v S of S for the Environment, etc. (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 932; [2002] 4 All E.R. 97 (contingency fee agreement with accountants rendering services relating to assessment of damages upheld).

<sup>21</sup> Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, ss.58 and 58A, as substituted by Access to Justice Act 1999, s.27; and see nn.23 and 24 below.

<sup>22</sup> Criminal proceedings and most family proceedings are excluded by s.58A(1) of the 1990 Act, (above, n.21).

<sup>23</sup> ibid., s.58(3)a; for other requirements of such agreements, see Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000, SI 2000/692, as amended by Collective Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/2988).

<sup>24</sup> These need not be court proceedings: Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 s.58A(4) (above, n.21).

<sup>25</sup> Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s.58(2)(a) (above, n.21) i.e., the amount to which he would have been entitled if his right to payment had not been conditional on the success of the client’s claim.

<sup>26</sup> ibid., s.58(4)(c); Conditional Fee Agreements Order 2000, SI 2000/823, reg.4 (up to 100%).

<sup>27</sup> Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s.58(1) (above, n.1).

<sup>28</sup> See the first two cases cited in n.20, above. The point is significant in relation to restitutionary remedies: below, pp.464–465.

<sup>29</sup> British Waterways Board v Norman (1993) 26 H.L.R. 232 and Aratra Potato Co Ltd v Joynson Garrett [1995] 4 All E.R. 695, approved in Hughes v Kingston upon Hull CC [1999] Q.B. 1193, disapproving Thai Trading Co v Taylor [1998] Q.B. as having been decided per incuriam since the Court of Appeal in that case was not made aware of the legislative status of the Solicitors Practice Rules, as established in Swain v The Law Society [1983] 1 A.C. 589; Ammad v Geraghty [2001] Q.B. 570, again disapproving the Thai Trading case but pointing out that the relevant Rule had since been amended: see also Wells v Barnsley MBC, The Times, November 12, 1999.

A contract to stifle a prosecution for treason is illegal as it amounts to compounding. It is also an offence for a person who knows that an arrestable offence has been committed, and that he has information which may help to secure the conviction of the offender, to accept or agree to accept any consideration (other than the making good of the loss or injury caused by the offence) for not disclosing the information.<sup>30</sup> The mere making of some contracts is expressly made criminal by statute: it is, for example, an offence to sell a flick-knife,<sup>31</sup> to agree to indemnify a surety in criminal proceedings against liability to forfeit a recognisance,<sup>32</sup> and to deal for payment in human organs.<sup>33</sup> Such contracts are no doubt illegal. And where the making or variation of a contract is prohibited by a court order, disobedience of the order amounts to contempt of court; and the prohibited contract, or variation, is illegal.<sup>34</sup>

(2) Contracts to commit a crime

A contract for the deliberate commission of a crime is obviously illegal.<sup>35</sup> Such a contract would also amount to conspiracy. But many statutory crimes can be committed without criminal intent<sup>36</sup>; and there are cases in which only one of the parties to a contract has any criminal intent. The exact effects of illegality on such contracts, where one or both parties act in good faith, will be considered later in this Chapter.<sup>37</sup>

(3) Contracts to commit a civil wrong

A contract is illegal where its object is the deliberate commission of a civil wrong. Thus contracts to assault<sup>38</sup> or defraud<sup>39</sup> a third party are illegal: and the same is true of a contract by an insolvent debtor to pay one of his creditors in fraud of the others.<sup>40</sup> Similarly a contract may be illegal if its object is to procure one party to break a contract known by both to be binding on him.<sup>41</sup>

Where a contract involves the unintentional commission of a civil wrong two types of cases call for discussion.

(a) ONE PARTY INNOCENT: One party may know that the performance of the contract will involve the commission of a civil wrong, while the other is innocent. In Clay v Yates<sup>42</sup> the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to print a book with a dedication. He

<sup>30</sup> Criminal Law Act 1967, s.5(1); "arrestable offence" is defined in Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s.24(1) (as amended by Police Reform Act 2000, s.48), which applies by virtue of s.119 and Sch.6, para.17 for the purposes of the 1967 Act.

<sup>31</sup> Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959, s.1(1)(a).

<sup>32</sup> Bail Act 1976, s.9.

<sup>33</sup> Human Organ Transplants Act 1989, s.1.

<sup>34</sup> Clarke v Chadburn [1985] 1 W.L.R. 78.

<sup>35</sup> e.g. Bustel Bros Ltd v Hurlock [1949] 1 K.B. 74 (evasion of building licensing regulations); Bigos v Boustead [1951] 1 All E.R. 92 (evasion of exchange control legislation); cf. Ashton v Turner [1981] Q.B. 137 (agreements, probably not contractual, to commit burglary); Pitts v Hunt [1991] 1 Q.B. 24 (agreement to drive motorcycle so as to frighten others). Ignorance of the law makes no difference: see Belvoir Finance Co Ltd v Stapleton [1971] 1 Q.B. 210.

<sup>36</sup> In such a case there is no criminal liability for conspiracy: Criminal Law Act 1977, s.1(2).

<sup>37</sup> See below, pp.484-490.

<sup>38</sup> Allen v Rescous (1676) 2 Lev. 174.

<sup>39</sup> Begbie v Phosphate Sewage Co Ltd (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 491; cf. Customs & Excise Commissioners v Oliver [1980] 1 All E.R. 355 (sale of goods stolen, or known to have been stolen, by seller); Taylor v Bhail [1995] C.L.C. 337.

<sup>40</sup> Cockshot v Bennett (1788) 2 T.R. 763; Mallalieu v Hodgson (1851) 16 Q.B. 689; cf. Cadbury Schweppes plc v Sumji [2001] 1 W.L.R. 615.

<sup>41</sup> Lauteerpacht, 52 L.Q.R. 494.

<sup>42</sup> (1856) 1 H. & N. 73.

refused to print the dedication on discovering that it was libellous, but claimed the cost of printing the book. The defendant did not plead illegality but argued that the obligation to print the book with the dedication was “entire”,<sup>43</sup> and that the plaintiff could not recover anything as he had performed only in part. In rejecting this argument, Pollock C.B. said that there was an implied undertaking to pay “for so much of the work as is lawful”<sup>44</sup>; while Martin B. said that the defendant was liable “to pay the plaintiff for that part which he has performed”.<sup>45</sup> If the plaintiff had printed the dedication without knowing the facts which made it libellous, it seems that he could not have recovered his charges on Pollock C.B.’s test but that he could have done so under Martin B.’s test; and it is submitted that the latter is the preferable view.<sup>46</sup>

(b) BOTH PARTIES INNOCENT. If neither party knows that performance of the contract involves the commission of a civil wrong the contract is not illegal.<sup>47</sup> A contract for the sale of goods belonging to a third party may make buyer and seller liable to that third party in tort<sup>48</sup> even though they believed that the goods belonged to the seller; but such a contract has never been held illegal.<sup>49</sup>

(4) Use of subject-matter for unlawful purpose

A contract which is in itself lawful may be illegal if its subject-matter is to be used for an unlawful purpose. In Langton v Hughes<sup>50</sup> Spanish juice, isinglass and ginger were sold to a brewer who, as the seller knew, intended to put them into his beer. The contract was held to be illegal because an Act of 1802 made it an offence to use anything except malt and hops to flavour beer. Later cases suggest that this rule applies only if the seller to some extent “participates” in the illegal purpose<sup>51</sup>; but it seems that such participation would readily be inferred if he knew of that purpose and made its achievement possible by delivering the goods.

(5) Unlawful method of performance

A contract which is lawful in itself may be performed in a way which involves one or both parties in criminal liability. It used to be thought that the contract was illegal<sup>52</sup> if its performance involved breach of a statute passed for the protection of the public; but that, if the statute was passed only for the protection of the revenue, the contract was not illegal.<sup>53</sup> But the distinction between these two types of statutes is by no means

<sup>43</sup> See below, p.782.

<sup>44</sup> Clay v Yates, above, at 79.

<sup>45</sup> ibid. at 80.

<sup>46</sup> cf. Williams, 8 C.L.J. at p.54; Martin B.’s view may be reconciled with Frank W Clifford Ltd v Garth [1956] 1 W.L.R. 570; below, p.506, on the ground that the builder in that case took a conscious risk of illegality. cf. ZYX Music GmbH v King [1995] 3 All E.R. 1 at 10.

<sup>47</sup> Clarion Ltd v National Power Association [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1888 at 1908.

<sup>48</sup> See below, p.1055.

<sup>49</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.12 (as amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch.2) assumes that the contract is valid.

<sup>50</sup> (1813) 1 M. & S. 593; cf. Gas Light & Coke Co v Turner (1839) 6 Bing.N.C. 324.

<sup>51</sup> Hodgson v Temple (1813) 5 Taunt. 181; Pellicat v Angell (1835) 2 Cr.M. & R. 311; cf. Foster v Driscoll [1929] 1 K.B. 470; for similar reasoning in a case involving unlawful method of performance, see Ashmore, Benson Pease & Co Ltd v A V Dawson Ltd [1973] 1 W.L.R. 828; below, p.484.

<sup>52</sup> Little v Poole (1829) 9 B. & C. 192; Fergusson v Norman (1838) 5 Bing.N.C. 76; Cundell v Dawson (1847) 4 C.B. 376; Victorian Daylesford Syndicate v Dott [1905] 2 Ch. 624; Brightman & Co v Tate [1919] 1 K.B. 463; Anderson Ltd v Daniel [1924] 1 K.B. 138 (actual decision reversed by Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act 1926, s.1(2)).

<sup>53</sup> Johnson v Hudson (1805) 11 East 180; Brown v Duncan (1829) 10 B. & C. 93; Smith v Mawhood (1845) 14 M. & W. 452; Learoyd v Brucken [1894] 1 Q.B. 114; cf. Wetherell v Jones (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 221.

decisive.<sup>54</sup> Even where the object of the statute is to protect the public (or a section of it) a contract involving a breach of it is not invariably illegal. Thus a contract to grant (or to transfer) a lease is not illegal merely because the landlord has committed a statutory offence by receiving or demanding an illegal premium. The tenant can accordingly enforce the contract, though without having to pay the premium.<sup>55</sup> Similarly, a tenancy is not illegal merely because the landlord has committed a statutory offence by failing to give his tenant a rent-book. Here the illegality relates to a merely collateral matter, so that the contract can be enforced even by the offender: i.e. the landlord can sue for the rent.<sup>56</sup> On the other hand, a contract may be illegal although the statute which it violates was passed for the protection of the revenue.<sup>57</sup> The test for determining whether an otherwise lawful contract is illegal because its performance involved the breach of a statute is that laid down in St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd<sup>58</sup>: did the statute intend only to penalise conduct or also to prohibit contracts? Some statutes expressly solve this problem: a contract for the supply of goods is not, for example, to be void or unenforceable merely because, in performing it, the seller has committed an offence under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.<sup>59</sup>

A statute may subject contracts to a licensing or similar requirement, so that they can be lawfully performed only with the consent of some public body. Such a statute may expressly prohibit (and so render illegal) a contract made in breach of its provisions<sup>60</sup>; and even where the statute does not expressly prohibit the contract, it may do so by implication. Such an implication is most likely to arise where both parties are prohibited from making or performing the contract; but the implication may arise even where the statutory prohibition is directed at only one of the parties. At common law, this was the position where an insurer committed a statutory offence by engaging in certain types of insurance business without government authorisation<sup>61</sup>; by statute, such contracts are no longer illegal, but only unenforceable against the other party.<sup>62</sup>

A licensing or similar requirement may also apply merely to the performance of a particular contract (as opposed to the carrying on of a business): e.g. where a licence is required for the erection of a building or for the export or import of goods. Such a

<sup>54</sup> Cope v Rowlands (1836) 2 M. & W. 149 at 157.

<sup>55</sup> Ailion v Spiekermann [1976] Ch. 158; for enforceability of a contract by an innocent third party (in spite of a formal defect making one of the parties liable to a fine) see OTV Birmelco Ltd v Technical & General Guarantee Co Ltd [2002] FWHC 2240; [2002] 4 All E.R. 668 at [55].

<sup>56</sup> Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 Q.B. 504; cf. London & Harrogate Securities Ltd v Pitts [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1063; The Lion [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 144; Yango Pastoral Co Ltd v First National Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 C.L.R. 410; P & B (Run Off) Ltd v Woolley [2002] EWCA Civ 65; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 577.

<sup>57</sup> e.g., where the object of the contract is to evade or to delay the payment of income tax: Napier v National Business Agency Ltd [1951] 2 All E.R. 264; cf. Miller v Karlinski (1945) 62 T.L.R. 85; below, p.450.

<sup>58</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. 267; above, p.429. Credit Lyonnais v P T Barnard & Associates [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 557; Curragh Investments Ltd v Cook [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1559; Skilton v Sullivan, The Times, March 25, 1994; Hughes v Asset Management plc [1995] 3 All E.R. 669 at 673; Mohammed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815 at 1824, applying the same test to legislation which prohibited the making of a contract.

<sup>59</sup> s.35; cf. Fair Trading Act 1973, s.26; and see below, pp.486–487. Such a legislative provision may also be implied: see Currencies Direct Ltd v Ellis [2002] EWCA Civ 779; [2002] 2 B.C.L.C. 482 (Companies Act 1985, s.341, by making a prohibited loan voidable by the company, by implication entitled company to enforce it).

<sup>60</sup> cf. Re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 K.B. 716, below, p.486.

<sup>61</sup> Bedford Ins Co Ltd v Instituto de Resseguros do Brazil [1985] 1 Q.B. 966; Phoenix General Ins Co of Greece v Halcyon Ins Co Ltd [1988] Q.B. 216, where the statute was not contravened and where Stewart v Oriental Fire & Marine Ins Co Ltd [1986] 1 Q.B. 988 was disapproved; Re Cavalier Ins Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430; Overseas Union Insurance Ltd v Incorporated General Insurance Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 439 at 444–445. Contrast Fuji Finance Inc v Aetna Life Insurance Co Ltd [1997] Ch. 713, where conflicting views were expressed as to the effect on contracts of statutory provisions not giving rise to criminal liability.

<sup>62</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.26(1), 27(1).

contract is not illegal if it is expressly or by implication made subject to the relevant consent.<sup>63</sup> It will be illegal only if it is performed without such licence or consent<sup>64</sup> or if the parties intend to perform it even though no licence or consent is obtained.<sup>65</sup> A party may, however, guarantee that the licence will be obtained; if so, the undertaking can be enforced against him as a collateral contract, even though the main contract is illegal.<sup>66</sup> He may also be liable in damages for failing to perform an express or implied promise to make reasonable efforts to obtain the licence.<sup>67</sup>

A contract which is initially lawful may become illegal if, in the course of performing it, the parties agree deliberately to commit a civil wrong: e.g., to defraud a third person who had undertaken to provide the finance necessary for its performance.<sup>68</sup> But a contract which is in itself lawful does not become illegal merely because in the course of performing it one party commits a fraud on the other.<sup>69</sup> That fraud is, however, likely to be a repudiatory breach, so that the victim of the fraud will be entitled to rescind the contract and so to avoid further liability under it.<sup>70</sup>

(6) Contracts to indemnify against liability for unlawful acts

(a) CRIMINAL LIABILITY. A contract to indemnify a person against criminal liability is illegal if the crime is one which can only be, or in fact is, committed with guilty intent.<sup>71</sup> But the position is less clear where the crime is one of strict liability. In Cointat v Myham & Sons<sup>72</sup> the defendants sold to a butcher the carcass of a pig, which was unfit for food. The butcher innocently exposed it for sale and was consequently convicted and fined £20. It was held that he could recover this sum from the defendants; but the legality of their implied promise to indemnify him was not discussed. The case has been criticised on the ground that "punishment inflicted by a criminal court is personal to the offender" and is fixed "having regard to the personal responsibility of the offender in respect of the offence".<sup>73</sup> One object of imposing strict criminal liability is to make a person take care not to commit the offence; and this object might be defeated by allowing him to recover the fine from a third party. Nonetheless it seems that the courts will allow a person to recover an indemnity against criminal liability if they are satisfied that he is wholly innocent. For example, in Osman v J Ralph Moss Ltd<sup>74</sup> a motorist had been convicted of driving while uninsured. He was morally innocent, having been told by his insurance agent that he was properly insured, and it was held that his fine could be included in the damages recoverable from the agent for breach of contract.

(b) CIVIL LIABILITY. A contract to indemnify a person against civil liability may be illegal if the wrong is intentionally and knowingly committed: for example, a contract to

<sup>63</sup> Michael Richards Properties Ltd v St Saviour's Parish [1975] 3 All E.R. 416;

<sup>64</sup> e.g. J Dennis & Co Ltd v Munn [1949] 2 K.B. 327. For an exception, see S.A. Ancien Maison Marcel Bauche v Woodhouse Drake & Carey (Sugar) Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 516.

<sup>65</sup> e.g. Bigos v Boustead [1951] 1 All E.R. 92.

<sup>66</sup> Peter Cassidy Seed Co Ltd v Osuustukkukauppa [1957] 1 W.L.R. 273, as explained in Walton (Grain and Shipping) Ltd v British Trading Co [1959] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 223 at 236; cf. below, p.489. Both cases concerned foreign licensing requirements.

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.65, below, p.842.

<sup>68</sup> Birkett v Acorn Business Machines Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 429.

<sup>69</sup> Broaders v Kalhare Property Maintenance [1990] I.R.L.R. 421.

<sup>70</sup> See below, p.807.

<sup>71</sup> Colburn v Patmore (1834) 1 C.M. & R. 73; Fitzgerald v Leonard (1893) L.R. 33 Ir. 675.

<sup>72</sup> [1913] 2 K.B. 220; reversed on another ground [1914] W.N. 46.

<sup>73</sup> Askey v Golden Wine Co (1948) 64 T.L.R. 379 at 380; cf. Simon v Pawsons & Leafs Ltd (1932) 38 Com.Cas. 151 at 158; Crage v Fry (1903) 67 J.P. 240; R Leslie Ltd v Reliable Advertising, etc. Agency Ltd [1915] 1 K.B. 652.

<sup>74</sup> [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 313.

indemnify a person against liability for deceit is illegal.<sup>75</sup> Similarly, a person who publishes what he knows to be a libel cannot recover an indemnity from the person who instigated the publication,<sup>76</sup> for the tendency of such an agreement might be to increase the circulation of the libel. On the other hand, a contract to keep a communication confidential, and to indemnify the maker against any liability resulting from its disclosure, has been held valid even where the communication contained a malicious libel<sup>77</sup>—apparently because the tendency of such an agreement is to restrict the circulation of the libel.

A contract to indemnify a person against civil liability is perfectly valid if the liability was incurred innocently or negligently.<sup>78</sup> Indeed, in many such cases promises to indemnify, far from being illegal, are actually implied in law. The general principle is that where A at B's request does an act which is not "manifestly tortious", B must indemnify A for any liability incurred by A if the act turns out to be injurious to C.<sup>79</sup> The cases provide many illustrations of the validity of such express or implied promises to indemnify. Thus the innocent publisher of a libel can recover an indemnity from the person who instigated the publication.<sup>80</sup> An agent can recover an indemnity from his principal if he is made liable in conversion for selling a third person's property on the principal's instructions.<sup>81</sup> An employer can insure himself against civil liability for the tort of his employee; and he may also be entitled to an indemnity against such liability from the employee under the contract of employment.<sup>82</sup> And where A holds property which is claimed by B and C, a promise by one of them to indemnify A against liability to the other if he delivers the property to the promisor is perfectly valid.<sup>83</sup>

(c) CIVIL LIABILITY ARISING OUT OF CRIMINAL ACTS. Where an act amounts both to a crime and to a civil wrong, a promise to indemnify the wrongdoer against civil liability incurred as a result of the act is often illegal. For example, in Gray v Barr<sup>84</sup> a husband shot and killed his wife's lover in circumstances amounting in the view of the Court of Appeal to manslaughter (though in the criminal proceedings he had been acquitted). It was held that the husband could not recover under an insurance policy (even if it covered the occurrence) the damages which he had had to pay to the lover's estate. The decision was based on the public interest in deterring armed violence; but it does not follow that promises to indemnify against civil liability are necessarily invalid merely because the act giving rise to that liability also amounts to a crime. There are, in particular, three situations in which they may be upheld.

First, a promise to indemnify a person against civil liability can be enforced, even though the act giving rise to that liability is criminal, if the crime is one of strict liability or is in fact committed without mens rea. Thus in Gray v Barr the possibility was left open that a person who committed manslaughter in circumstances amounting to little more than an error of judgment might be able to recover an indemnity from his

<sup>75</sup> Brown Jenkinson & Co Ltd v Percy Dalton (London) Ltd [1957] 2 Q.B. 621.

<sup>76</sup> W H Smith & Sons v Clinton (1909) 99 L.T. 840.

<sup>77</sup> Weld-Blundell v Stephens [1919] 1 K.B. 520; Brauestreets British Ltd v Mitchell and Carpanayoti & Co Ltd [1933] Ch. 190; contrast Homard v Odham's Press Ltd [1938] 1 K.B. 1. And see Distillers Co Ltd v Times Newspapers Ltd [1975] Q.B. 613.

<sup>78</sup> Betts v Gibbins (1834) 2 A. & E. 57; cf. Yeung v Hong Kong & Shanghai Banking Corp [1981] A.C. 787.

<sup>79</sup> The Nogar Marin [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 417.

<sup>80</sup> Daily Mirror Newspapers Ltd v Exclusive News Agency (1937) 81 S.J. 924; Defamation Act 1952, s.11.

<sup>81</sup> Adamson v Jarvis (1827) 4 Bing. 66; Betts v Gibbins (1834) 2 A. & E. 57.

<sup>82</sup> Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] A.C. 555; above, p.209.

<sup>83</sup> e.g. Betts v Gibbins (1834) 2 A. & E. 57.

<sup>84</sup> [1971] 2 Q.B. 554; criticised (on another point) in DPP v Newbury [1977] A.C. 500. Fleming, 34 M.L.R. 177; cf. Haseldine v Hosken [1933] 1 K.B. 822; R. v National Insurance Commissioner, Ex p. Connor [1981] 1 Q.B. 758.

insurance company.<sup>85</sup> The view that such an indemnity is recoverable is supported by a dictum in a later case, according to which the test “is not the label which the law applies to the crime which has been committed, but the nature of the crime itself”.<sup>86</sup> Similarly, if the butcher in Cointat v Myham & Son<sup>87</sup> had had to pay damages for breach of contract to a customer who was poisoned by the pork, he should have been able to claim an indemnity against this loss from the defendant.

The second situation arises in the law of motor insurance. In Tinline v White Cross Insurance<sup>88</sup> a motorist, who was insured against liability for “accidental personal injury” to third parties, killed a pedestrian by driving with criminal negligence, and was convicted of manslaughter. He successfully sued the insurers for the damages which he had had to pay to the deceased. The motorist has this right only where the crime is committed negligently—not where it is committed deliberately.<sup>89</sup> But even in the latter case the position of the innocent victim of the motorist’s crime is protected by being given rights in certain circumstances against the insurer<sup>90</sup> or against the Motor Insurers’ Bureau.<sup>91</sup> The existence of such rights is obviously necessary to maintain the effectiveness of the scheme of compulsory motor insurance.

Thirdly, the principle stated in Gray v Barr applies only to contracts to indemnify the wrongdoer himself against civil liability arising out of criminal conduct. That conduct may also make the wrongdoer’s employer civilly liable to the victim; and the employer can validly insure against such liability, even to the extent that the wrong gives rise to a claim against him for exemplary (or punitive) damages.<sup>92</sup>

(7) Promises to pay money on the commission of an unlawful act

A contract may be illegal if it provides for the payment of money to a person in the event of his doing an unlawful act, e.g. if A promises B £5 if B breaks the speed limit. From a legal point of view, such a promise is not easy to distinguish from an insurance policy under which a driver (or the cost of one) is to be made available to a motorist if he should be disqualified for a driving offence. A recommendation that such contracts<sup>93</sup> should be declared by statute to be unenforceable and void<sup>94</sup> has been accepted in principle, but

<sup>85</sup> [1971] 1 Q.B. 544 at 581; cf. Gregory v Ford [1951] 1 All E.R. 121 (employment contract). It has been held that a person convicted of manslaughter cannot at common law take under his victim’s will irrespective of his degree of moral culpability: Re Giles [1972] Ch. 544; Re Royse [1985] Ch. 22; Price 48 M.L.R. 723; Jones v Roberts [1995] 2 FLR 222; but in Re H [1990] 1 FLR 441 the court refused to apply this rule where the person so convicted had, by reason of his diminished responsibility, “no responsibility at all” for the offence. Moreover, the court has power under Forfeiture Act 1982, s.2 to modify the rule: see Re K [1986] Ch. 180; Cretney, 10 O.J.L.S. 289; Dunbar v Plant [1998] Ch. 412; Re S [1996] 1 W.L.R. 235 (discretion exercised in favour of offender’s son).

<sup>86</sup> R. v National Insurance Commissioner, Ex p. Connor [1981] Q.B. 758, 765 (where a claim for widow’s benefit under the Social Security Act 1975 was rejected as the claimant had been convicted of manslaughter by deliberately stabbing her husband to death). Semble, that on such facts the result would not be affected by Forfeiture Act, 1982, s.4. though by Social Security Act 1986, s.76, Social Security Commissioners have the same discretion as the High Court to modify the “forfeiture” rule (above, n.85).

<sup>87</sup> [1913] 2 K.B. 220, above, p.435.

<sup>88</sup> [1921] 3 K.B. 327; followed in James v British General Insurance Co Ltd [1927] 2 K.B. 311; doubted in Haseldine v Hosken [1933] 1 K.B. 822 but approved in Marles v Philip Trant & Sons Ltd [1954] 1 Q.B. 29 at 40, and in Gray v Barr [1971] 1 Q.B. 544 at 568, 581.

<sup>89</sup> Gardner v Moore [1984] A.C. 548, 560; Pitts v Hunt [1991] 1 Q.B. 24 at 30; Charlton v Fisher [2001] E.W.C.A. Civ 112; [2002] Q.B. 578.

<sup>90</sup> See below, p.669.

<sup>91</sup> See below, p.669; Hardy v M.I.B. [1964] 2 Q.B. 743; Gardner v Moore [1984] A.C. 548 at 560–561.

<sup>92</sup> Lancashire CC v Municipal Mutual Insurance Ltd [1997] Q.B. 897; for punitive damages, see below, p.935.

<sup>93</sup> See DTI in St Christopher’s Motorist Association [1974] 1 W.L.R. 99.

<sup>94</sup> Road Traffic Law Report, HMSO 1988 (The North Report) paras 16.32–16.35.

legislation has not been introduced, as the insurance industry has agreed to discontinue the practice of issuing policies of this kind.<sup>95</sup>

A life insurance policy was never wholly illegal merely because it provided that the sum insured was to be paid even if the assured committed suicide (which was formerly a crime). It could clearly be enforced if he died in some other way. But in Beresford v Royal Exchange Assurance<sup>96</sup> it was, however, held that such a policy could not be enforced by the personal representatives of the assured if he did commit suicide; to allow a man, or his estate, to benefit from his own crime was said to be against public policy.<sup>97</sup> But if the assured assigned the policy and then committed suicide, the assignees were entitled to the policy moneys since it was they, and not the assured, who benefited from the crime.<sup>98</sup> It is hard to see the force of this distinction where, as in Beresford's case, the assured was bankrupt, so that the only people who could benefit were his creditors. The actual decision can now be regarded as resting on the alternative ground that, under ordinary principles of insurance law, the assured cannot recover if he by his own deliberate act causes the event on which the insurance money is payable.<sup>99</sup>

(8) Effect of changes in the law

In relation to contracts which involve the commission of a legal wrong it is necessary to consider the effect of changes in the law, both on contracts in existence at the time of the change and on contracts made after the change.

First, the law may change so that previously lawful conduct becomes a legal wrong. The effect of such a change may be to frustrate existing contracts<sup>1</sup> and to make future contracts illegal. Whether it actually has this effect will depend on principles stated in St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd.<sup>2</sup>

A second kind of change is one by which conduct previously amounting to a legal wrong ceases to be so; and prima facie the effect of such a change in the law is that future contracts involving such conduct will be valid. This would be the case where the conduct in question had been criminal under some regulatory statute (for example, one requiring certain work to be licensed) which was then repealed. But there are exceptions to this general rule. First, a statute abrogating a rule of law under which certain conduct was unlawful may expressly preserve a rule under which a contract involving such conduct was previously illegal: this is the position (in general<sup>3</sup>) with regard to champertous agreements.<sup>4</sup> Secondly, it is possible that, even after the conduct in question has ceased to be a legal wrong, a contract involving such conduct would still be contrary to

<sup>95</sup> The Road User and the Law Cm.576 (1989).

<sup>96</sup> [1938] A.C. 586; Goodhart, 52 L.Q.R. 575.

<sup>97</sup> This principle applies even though the contract is not illegal: it has been applied to prevent recovery on a policy of life insurance where the assured was executed for felony though the policy did not in terms refer to this contingency: Amicable Soc v Bolland (1830) 4 Bligh (n.s.) 194, criticised by Devlin, The Enforcement of Morals at p.53 and Furmston (1966) U. of Tor.L.J. at p.274. cf. Davitt v Titcomb [1989] 3 All E.R. 417: murderer not allowed to benefit indirectly from policy on joint lives of victim and himself; Geismar v Sun Alliance [1978] Q.B. 383: insurer not liable to pay for loss of goods smuggled into this country; liability for loss of other goods covered by the policies seems not to have been disputed; contrast Euro-Diam Ltd v Bathurst [1990] Q.B. 1, below, p.511.

<sup>98</sup> White v British Empire, etc. Assurance Co (1868) L.R. 7 Eq. 394; Charlton v Fisher [2001] EWCA Civ 112; [2002] Q.B. 518, at [13].

<sup>99</sup> [1938] A.C. 586 at 595; Reeves v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2000] 1 A.C. 360 at 388 (per Lord Hobhouse, dissenting).

<sup>1</sup> See below, p.887.

<sup>2</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. 267, above, p.429.

<sup>3</sup> For an exception, see Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s2.58 and 58A, above, p.431.

<sup>4</sup> Criminal Law Act 1967, s.14(2), above, p.431.

public policy. Thus a contract to do a homosexual act which was formerly, but is no longer,<sup>5</sup> criminal would probably be regarded as illegal where it promoted sexual immorality,<sup>6</sup> and so fell within one of the established heads of contracts which are against public policy.<sup>7</sup> But where this is not the case it is submitted that contracts should not generally be regarded as contrary to public policy merely because they involve conduct which was formerly criminal. Thus it is submitted that a contract to render services in connection with a lawful abortion is valid even though it would have been a contract to commit a crime before the Abortion Act 1967. Similarly it is submitted that the reasoning of Beresford's case is obsolete now that suicide is no longer a crime.<sup>8</sup>

The effect of this second kind of change in the law on contracts already in existence when the law was changed is more problematical. Changes in the law made after action brought are generally disregarded<sup>9</sup> but there seems to be no authority on the effect of changes in the law between the making of the contract and the commencement of the action. One possible view is that the validity of the contract must be determined, once for all, when it is made. But it is submitted that, so long as the act in question is lawful when it is done, no useful purpose is served by holding the contract invalid. The statute may itself solve the problem by specifying whether, and if so to what extent, the change in the law has retrospective effect.

2. Contracts Contrary to Public Policy: in General<sup>10</sup>

A contract which does not involve the commission of a legal wrong may be illegal because its tendency is to bring about a state of affairs of which the law disapproves on grounds of public policy. A contract is illegal for this reason only if its harmful tendency is clear, that is, if injury to the public is its probable and not merely its possible consequence.<sup>11</sup>

Such contracts are often called "illegal".<sup>12</sup> It is sometimes said that they are only "void" or "unenforceable"<sup>13</sup>; but these statements only emphasise that no specific legal wrong is involved. So long as this point is borne in mind, no harm is done by using the traditional terminology in which these contracts are "illegal".<sup>14</sup>

(1) Agreements by married persons to marry

An agreement to marry was formerly regarded as a contract, the breach of which gave rise to an action for damages. It was, however, thought to be against public policy to allow such actions to be brought on a promise by a married person to marry. Such a promise might be one to commit bigamy, but even where this was not the case the promise was illegal. Thus in Spiers v Hunt<sup>15</sup> a promise by a man to marry the promisee after his wife's

<sup>5</sup> Sexual Offences Act 1967; as amended by Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000, s.1.

<sup>6</sup> cf., in criminal law, R. v Ford [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1083.

<sup>7</sup> See below, p.444; but cf. also below, p.445 (stable relationships not contrary to public policy).

<sup>8</sup> Suicide Act 1961; cf. Gray v Barr [1971] 2 Q.B. 544, 582. In practice, insurers may pay in such circumstances: see Foskett v McKeon [2001] 1 A.C. 102.

<sup>9</sup> Hitchcock v Way (1837) 6 A. & E. 943.

<sup>10</sup> Lloyd, Public Policy; Winfield, 42 Harv.L.R. 76.

<sup>11</sup> Fender v St John Mildmay [1938] A.C. 1, 13; cf. Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden [1979] Ch. 84 at 104.

<sup>12</sup> e.g. Hermann v Charlesworth [1905] 2 K.B. 123 at 136; McEllistrim's Case [1919] A.C. 548 at 571; cf. Criminal Law Act 1967, s.14(2) ("contrary to public policy or otherwise illegal").

<sup>13</sup> e.g. Bennett v Bennett [1952] 1 K.B. 249 at 260; Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] A.C. 614 at 634-635. O'Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd [1985] Q.B. 428 at 447, 448, 469; Watson v Prager [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726 at 742.

<sup>14</sup> cf. Mogul SS Co Ltd v McGregor Gow & Co [1892] A.C. 25 at 46.

<sup>15</sup> [1908] 1 K.B. 720; Wilson v Carnley [1908] 1 K.B. 729.

death was held to be illegal as it had a tendency to break up the marriage, to encourage sexual immorality and even to lead to crime. These arguments are far from convincing and in Fender v St John Mildmay<sup>16</sup> the House of Lords held that they did not apply where the promise was made by a married man after he had obtained a decree nisi of divorce. But the promise was against public policy where, when it was made, a divorce (which later took place) was merely contemplated,<sup>17</sup> and also where the promisor believed that he was entitled to have his marriage annulled because of his wife's impotence.<sup>18</sup>

Actions for breach of promise of marriage were abolished by s.1 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1970,<sup>19</sup> so that the cases just discussed are, strictly speaking, obsolete. However, s.2 of the Act provides that "where an agreement to marry is terminated" the formerly engaged couple is to be treated for the purpose of certain rights<sup>20</sup> in, and disputes about, property as if they had been married. Difficult problems with regard to rights in property can obviously arise when an ex-fiancée makes a claim under s.2 against a man who, when he promised to marry her, was already married to someone else. It has been held that a party to an agreement to marry which is later brought to an end can take the benefit of s.2 even though that party was already married and so before the Act could not have claimed damages for breach of the promise.<sup>21</sup> It seems, a fortiori, to follow that the other (unmarried) party to the dissolved engagement should also be entitled to rely on the section. In such a case care must, however, be taken to safeguard the rights of the other party to the marriage: e.g. where the property in question was a house in which a man had lived first with his wife and then with a fiancée from whom he had later parted.<sup>22</sup>

Under the old law, a promisee who did not know that the promisor was married could take advantage of the general rule allowing innocent parties in certain cases to sue on illegal contracts<sup>23</sup> and so recover damages for breach of promise of marriage.<sup>24</sup> Clearly, this cause of action has been abolished by the 1970 Act. But it was also held before the Act that a woman who had innocently gone through a ceremony of marriage with a man who, unknown to her, was married, could, after his death, recover damages from his estate for breach of an implied warranty that he was single.<sup>25</sup> The 1970 Act makes special provision for this situation by giving the innocent party certain rights against the other party's estate.<sup>26</sup> It does not in terms abolish the action for breach of the implied warranty, and it is arguable that such an action could still be brought by an innocent promisee.<sup>27</sup> But the implied warranty is based on the assumption that, if the promisor had been single, the promise would have been actionable. In destroying this assumption,

<sup>16</sup> [1938] A.C. 1.

<sup>17</sup> Skipp v Kelly (1926) 42 T.L.R. 258.

<sup>18</sup> See Siveyer v Allison [1935] 2 K.B. 403.

<sup>19</sup> Cretney, 33 M.L.R. 534.

<sup>20</sup> Not all: Mossop v Mossop [1989] Fam. 77.

<sup>21</sup> Shaw v Fitzgerald [1992] 1 F.L.R. 357.

<sup>22</sup> cf. Family Law Act 1996 s.33(1)(b)(i) permitting the court to make an order relating to a "matrimonial home" in favour of an "associated" person; persons are "associated" if "they have agreed to marry one another (whether or not that agreement has been terminated)" (s.62(3)(e)). The 1996 Act does not deal with the question whether the validity of the agreement is affected by the fact that one of the parties to it was married when it was made.

<sup>23</sup> See below, pp.484–487.

<sup>24</sup> Wild v Harris (1849) 7 C.B. 999; Millward v Littlewood (1850) 5 Ex. 775.

<sup>25</sup> Shaw v Shaw [1954] 2 Q.B. 429.

<sup>26</sup> s.6.

<sup>27</sup> cf. below, pp.487–488.

the Act has removed the substratum of the implied warranty; and it is submitted that no action could now be brought on it.<sup>28</sup>

(2) Agreements between spouses for future separation

It was at one time thought that all separation agreements between spouses were inconsistent with the duties arising out of marriage and therefore invalid. This rule still applies if the agreement is made while the spouses are living together, or before marriage. In Brodie v Brodie<sup>29</sup> a man felt obliged to marry a woman who shortly afterwards gave birth to a child of which he was the reputed father. An agreement made before the marriage that the parties should not live together was held invalid. The result of the rule is that the husband cannot, while he is living with his wife or before marriage, make a binding promise to provide for her in the event of a separation.<sup>30</sup> But an agreement regulating the rights of spouses who are already separated is valid<sup>31</sup> as it does not encourage any breach of marital duty; at most, it creates favourable conditions for the continuance of a breach which has already taken place. And where spouses who are separated become reconciled, they can validly provide for future separation: the law recognises that, unless they could do this, reconciliation would be less likely.<sup>32</sup>

(3) Agreements in contemplation of divorce

At common law, an arrangement or agreement between parties to divorce proceedings (about such matters as the wife's maintenance) was invalid if it was made with a corrupt intention, for example, if it amounted to a bribe to institute, or carry on, the proceedings,<sup>33</sup> or to a conspiracy to deceive the court. But it was valid if it was an honest attempt to minimise the difficulties which had arisen between the parties.<sup>34</sup> The law on this topic was formerly influenced by the rule that collusion was a bar to divorce; but the abolition of this rule "completely alters the public policy on this point",<sup>35</sup> so that an agreement is no longer invalid merely because it is collusive.<sup>36</sup>

(4) Agreements inconsistent with parental responsibility

At common law a father had the custody of his legitimate child and a contract by which he purported to assign that custody to any person was contrary to public policy as it was "repugnant entirely to his parental duty".<sup>37</sup> By statute, both parents have "parental

<sup>28</sup> For a dispute on this point, see Thomson, (1971) 87 L.Q.R. 159; L.C.B.G., ibid. 314.

<sup>29</sup> [1917] P.271; cf. Scott v Scott [1959] P.103n. (tamquam sororem agreement before marriage invalid); N v N [1999] F.L.R. 745 (antenuptial agreement to submit marital disputes to arbitration invalid); there is no reference to the rule stated in the text above in Uddin v Ahmed [2000] E.W.C.A. Civ 204; [2001] 3 F.C.R. 300, where the claim was dismissed on other grounds: below, pp.582, 587.

<sup>30</sup> The rule does not apply where the marriage is a polygamous one contracted abroad, under which the husband can divorce the wife at will: see Shahnaz v Rizwan [1965] 1 Q.B. 390. The "arrangements for the future" dealt with by Family Law Act 1996, s.9 are arrangements sanctioned by court order as opposed to arrangements made by private agreement. cf. also Xydhias v Xydhias [1999] 2 All E.R. 386.

<sup>31</sup> Wilson v Wilson (1848) 1 H.L.C. 538; Hart v Hart (1881) 18 Ch.D. 670.

<sup>32</sup> Harrison v Harrison [1910] 1 K.B. 35; Macmahon v Macmahon [1913] 1 I.R. 428.

<sup>33</sup> Hope v Hope (1857) 8 D.M. & G. 731; Churchward v Churchward [1895] P. 7.

<sup>34</sup> Scott v Scott [1913] P. 52.

<sup>35</sup> Sutton v Sutton [1984] Ch. 184, 194; cf. N v N [1992] 1 F.L.R. 266.

<sup>36</sup> When Pt II of the Family Law Act 1996 is brought into force, the court will be able to make a divorce order or a judicial separation order only if certain "requirements about the parties' arrangements for the future" (s.3(1)(c)) are satisfied; and one way of satisfying these requirements will be to produce to the court "a negotiated agreement [between the parties] as to their financial arrangements" (s.9(2)(b)).

<sup>37</sup> Vansittart v Vansittart (1858) D. & J. 249, 259; Walrond v Walrond (1858) Johns 18; cf. Cole v Gower (1805) 6 East 110. cf. also Adoption Act 1976, ss.57, 57A and 58, as amended by Children Act 1989, ss.88(1) and 108(7) (prohibition of advertisements and regulation of payments in connection with adoption).

responsibility”<sup>38</sup> for their child if they were married to each other at the time of the child’s birth; if they were not, the mother has parental responsibility.<sup>39</sup> In the latter case, the parents may enter into a “parental responsibility agreement” providing for the father to have parental responsibility for the child<sup>40</sup>; but freedom of contract in making such an agreement, and in bringing it to an end, is severely restricted so as to protect the interests of the child.<sup>41</sup> The effect of such an agreement seems to be that parental responsibility is vested in both parents: the mother does not lose such responsibility since “a person who has parental responsibility for a child may not surrender or transfer such responsibility to another”.<sup>42</sup> This statutory provision resembles the common law principle stated above and seems to be based on similar grounds of public policy. The person with parental responsibility may “arrange for some or all of it to be met by one or more persons acting on his behalf”.<sup>43</sup> In such a case the responsibility is not transferred but vicariously performed.<sup>44</sup>

(5) Agreements in restraint of marriage

A contract may be invalid on the ground that it unjustifiably restricts a person’s freedom to marry. This is, for example, true of a promise by a widow to pay £100 if she remarries,<sup>45</sup> and of a promise not to marry anyone except a specified person (not amounting to a promise to marry that person).<sup>46</sup> It may be that such promises are valid if they are limited in duration or otherwise reasonable: e.g. if a limited restraint is imposed for the sake of a person’s health or (conceivably) of his moral well-being.<sup>47</sup> It is also possible that a promise not to marry anyone except a member of a fairly large group (for example, some religious denomination) might be valid.

The above cases concern actual promises not to marry, or to pay a sum of money on marriage. It seems that a contract is not invalid merely because it may in some other way deter one of the parties from marrying. Thus a promise to pay an allowance, or to permit a person to occupy a house, until the promisee’s marriage, is valid.<sup>48</sup> Such promises may tend to discourage marriage, but they do not impose any contractual liability on a person as a result of marriage.<sup>49</sup>

(6) Marriage brokerage contracts<sup>50</sup>

A marriage brokerage contract is one by which a person promises in return for a money consideration to procure the marriage of another. Until the eighteenth century such contracts were valid at common law, thus making it possible for servants of young

<sup>38</sup> As defined by Children Act 1989, s.3.

<sup>39</sup> ibid. s.2(1); and see s.2(4), abolishing the former common law rule.

<sup>40</sup> ibid. s.4(1)(b).

<sup>41</sup> ibid. ss.4(1) and (3), 1(1).

<sup>42</sup> ibid. s.2(9).

<sup>43</sup> ibid. cf. also Child Support Act 1991, s.9, providing for the legal effects of certain maintenance agreements in favour of children.

<sup>44</sup> cf. below, pp.758–759.

<sup>45</sup> Baker v White (1690) 2 Vern. 215; cf. Hartley v Rice (1808) 10 East 22.

<sup>46</sup> Lowe v Peers (1768) 2 Burr. 2225.

<sup>47</sup> cf. Denny v Denny [1919] 1 K.B. 583; below, p.452.

<sup>48</sup> Gibson v Dickie (1815) 3 M. & S. 463; the same point was assumed in Thomas v Thomas (1842) 2 Q.B. 851.

<sup>49</sup> Contrast the position in the restraint of trade cases, below, pp.463–464. It is perhaps thought that stipulations which deter persons from trading are more likely to prejudice the public than those which deter them from marrying.

<sup>50</sup> Powell, 6 C.L.P. 254.

heiresses to obtain payment for assisting their charges to elope with fortune-hunters.<sup>51</sup> Equity therefore prevented the enforcement of these contracts<sup>52</sup>; and this equitable principle is not restricted to contracts to procure a marriage between one of the contracting parties and a particular third person. Thus a contract by which a marriage bureau simply undertakes to make efforts to find a spouse for a client has been held invalid, because it involved "the introduction of the consideration of a money payment into that which should be free from any such taint".<sup>53</sup> The harmful tendencies of such contracts seem to be no greater than those of contracts between "computer dating" agencies and their clients; and it has not been suggested that such contracts are contrary to public policy.

(7) Contracts promoting sexual immorality

A contract may be illegal if its object is sexually immoral. The common law originally applied this principle to all cases in which a contract could be said to promote such an object. But a distinction is now drawn between contracts with purely meretricious purposes and those which are intended to regulate stable extra-marital relationships.

(a) MERETRICIOUS PURPOSES. A promise by a man to pay a woman money if she will become his mistress is illegal.<sup>54</sup> A promise to pay money to a woman with whom the promisor had illicitly cohabited in the past is not contrary to public policy since it does not promote immorality. It is simply void because the consideration for it is past,<sup>55</sup> and it will be valid if made in a deed.<sup>56</sup> The validity of a promise in a deed made during cohabitation depends on its purpose. If it is simply a gift, or voluntary bond, it is as valid as one given after cohabitation.<sup>57</sup> But if its object is to secure the continuance of cohabitation, it is illegal.<sup>58</sup> A bond given after cohabitation would also be invalid if it were merely given to secure the performance of a promise of payment made before cohabitation. A promise to pay must be distinguished from a completed gift. In Ayerst v Jenkins<sup>59</sup> a man settled property on a woman with whom he was cohabiting. A claim by his personal representatives to have the settlement set aside failed as "the voluntary gift of part of his own property by one particeps criminis to another is in itself neither fraudulent nor prohibited by law".<sup>60</sup>

A contract is also illegal if it indirectly promotes sexual immorality. Thus in Pearce v Brooks<sup>61</sup> a contract to hire out a brougham to a prostitute for the purposes of her profession was held to be illegal. The same would be true of a contract of employment

<sup>51</sup> e.g. Goldsmith v Bruning (1700) 1 Eq.Ca.Abr. 89, pl. 4.

<sup>52</sup> Cole v Gibson (1750) 1 Ves.Sen. 503 at 506.

<sup>53</sup> Hermann v Charlesworth [1905] 2 K.B. 123 at 130; below, p.504.

<sup>54</sup> Franco v Bolton (1797) 3 Ves. 368; Benyon v Nettlefold (1850) 3 Mac. & G. 94.

<sup>55</sup> Beaumont v Reeve (1846) 8 Q.B. 483; Binnington v Wallis (1821) 4 B. & Ald. 650 suggests that such a promise is binding if made by a man who was a seducer, but this is based on the wide view of the "moral obligation" theory of consideration, which no longer prevails: above, p.75 and see Jennings v Brown (1842) 9 M. & W. 496, 501.

<sup>56</sup> Annadale v Harris (1727) 2 P.Wms. 432; affirmed 1 Bro.P.C. 250; Turner v Vaughan (1767) 2 Wils.K.B. 339; Knye v Moore (1822) 1 S. & S. 61. It is stressed in some of the old cases that the promisor was the seducer and that the payment was promised as "praemium pudicitiae." Thus it was doubtful whether the rule applied in favour of a common prostitute: Bainham v Manning (1691) 2 Vern. 242; Whaley v Norton (1687) 1 Vern. 483; contra, Hill v Spencer (1767) Amb. 641, 836.

<sup>57</sup> Gray v Mathias (1800) 5 Ves. 286; Hall v Palmer (1844) 3 Hare 532.

<sup>58</sup> The Lady Cox's Case (1734) 3 P.Wms. 339; Walker v Perkins (1764) 3 Burr. 1568.

<sup>59</sup> (1873) L.R. 16 Eq. 275.

<sup>60</sup> ibid. at 283.

<sup>61</sup> (1866) L.R. 1 Ex. 213; cf. Upfill v Wright [1911] 1 K.B. 506, a case viewed with some scepticism in Heglibison Establishment v Heyman (1977) 36 P. & C.R. 351.

by which the employee undertook to procure prostitutes for the employer's clients.<sup>62</sup> On the other hand, a contract to let a room to a prostitute who practises her profession elsewhere is valid "because persons of that description must have a place to lay their heads".<sup>63</sup> In the somewhat questionable case of Lloyd v Johnson<sup>64</sup> a contract to wash a prostitute's linen was held valid even though the linen included a quantity of gentlemen's nightcaps.

In the cases on this subject "immorality" always means extra-marital sexual intercourse. A contract might promote some other form of activity that could be described as immoral and sexual. For example, a contract might be made to publish an indecent book whose publication did not amount to a crime. Such a contract might formerly have been regarded as invalid on account of its "grossly immoral" tendency.<sup>65</sup> "But at the present day the difficulty is to identify what sexual conduct is to be treated as grossly immoral"<sup>66</sup>; so that it is less likely that such a contract would now be struck down on this ground.

(b) STABLE RELATIONSHIPS. The traditional common law approach to immoral contracts no longer applies to persons live together in a common household as husband and wife without being married. It has for example been held that a licence under which such a couple occupied furnished accommodation was not contrary to public policy.<sup>67</sup> The law also recognises that legal effects can flow from agreements between such persons with respect to the house in which they live. Where the house is owned by one of them, the agreement can confer legally enforceable rights on the other, such as a contractual licence to remain there,<sup>68</sup> or a share in the value of the house in respect of the contribution made by the other to its acquisition, maintenance or improvement.<sup>69</sup> The opening of a bank account by one party to such a relationship with funds intended to belong to both jointly has been held (on proof of the appropriate intention) to amount to a declaration of trust in favour of the other.<sup>70</sup> It seems, although the point has not yet been decided in England, that an express contract between such persons to "pool" their earnings and acquisitions would not be regarded as contrary to public policy.<sup>71</sup> And "when an illegitimate child has been born, there is certainly nothing contrary to public

<sup>62</sup> See Coral Leisure Group v Barnett [1981] 1 C.R. 503 at 508 (where no such undertaking had, on the facts, been established); cf. The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 at 62; R v Registrar of Companies, Ex p. Attorney-General [1991] B.C.L.C. 476 (company formed "to carry on the business of prostitution" ordered to be struck off the register).

<sup>63</sup> Appleton v Campbell (1826) 2 C. & P. 347; cf. Bowry v Bennett (1808) 1 Camp. 348.

<sup>64</sup> (1798) 1 B. & P. 340.

<sup>65</sup> cf. Glyn v Weston Feature Film Co [1916] 1 Ch. 261 (refusal to protect copyright in immoral book) approved in Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers (No.2) [1990] A.C. 109 at 262, 276 (refusal to protect copyright in book written in breach of fiduciary duty); contrast ZYX Music GmbH v King [1995] 3 All E.R. 1 at 10; A v B [2000] F.M.L.R. 1007.

<sup>66</sup> Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch. 449 at 453 (protection of confidential information concerning lesbian relationship); Armhouse Lee Ltd v Chappel, The Times, August 7, 1996 (contract to advertise telephone sex lines held enforceable).

<sup>67</sup> Summa v Hazlehurst [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1014 (disapproved on another point in Street v Mountford [1985] A.C. 809); cf. also Watson v Lucas [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1493.

<sup>68</sup> Tanner v Tanner [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1346; Chandler v Kerley [1978] 1 W.L.R. 693; Tanner v Clerical Medical & General Life Insurance Society [1992] 1 F.L.R. 262 (rights to proceeds of endowment mortgage policy). cf. Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association [2001] 1 A.C. 27 (homosexual partner part of "family" for purposes of Rent Act 1977); and see the court's power under Family Law Act 1996, ss.36 and 38 to exclude a "cohabitant" (as defined by s.62(1)(a)) from a dwelling-house.

<sup>69</sup> Eves v Eves [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1338.

<sup>70</sup> Paul v Constance [1977] 1 W.L.R. 527.

<sup>71</sup> Marvin v Marvin 557 P.2d 106 (1976); and see The Times, August 14, 1981. cf. Latham v Latham 547 P.2d 144 (1975).

policy in the parents coming to an agreement which they intend to be binding in law, for the maintenance of the child and mother".<sup>72</sup>

These illustrations<sup>73</sup> show that the law now recognises that "unmarried cohabitation, whether heterosexual or homosexual, is widespread"<sup>74</sup>; and they suggest that the old common law rule governing immoral contracts will in future be confined to meretricious relationships (of whatever sexual orientation). Where domestic arrangements between parties to the present group of stable relationships satisfy the requirement of contractual intention,<sup>75</sup> they will no longer be struck down on grounds of public policy.<sup>76</sup>

(8) Contracts interfering with the course of justice

A contract may be illegal because the mere making of it amounts to a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice: e.g. where a person promises another money for giving false evidence on his behalf in criminal proceedings<sup>77</sup> or where two men agree to bribe a prosecution witness to withdraw a charge of rape.<sup>78</sup> A contract may also (even though it does not amount to a criminal conspiracy) be illegal if its object is to interfere with the course of public justice. Before the distinction between felonies and misdemeanours was abolished, a contract to stifle a prosecution for a misdemeanour was not itself an offence but such contracts were often held illegal. Thus contracts to stifle prosecutions for perjury, riot, assault on a police officer, interfering with a public road, and obtaining by false pretences were held illegal.<sup>79</sup> But this rule was not applied where the misdemeanour was said to be of a "private" nature. Thus in McGregor v McGregor<sup>80</sup> it was held that a husband and wife who had taken out cross-summonses for assault against each other could validly compromise them in a separation agreement. It has similarly been held that a prosecution for trade-mark offences could be compromised by agreement between the owner and the offender<sup>81</sup>; and it has been said that the same principle applies to criminal libel.<sup>82</sup>

The old cases must now be read in the light of the abolition of the distinction between felonies and misdemeanours and of the creation of the offence of concealing an arrestable offence.<sup>83</sup> A person does not, however, commit this offence if he withholds information which may lead to the conviction of the offender in consideration only of the making good of the loss or injury caused by the offence<sup>84</sup>; and it is doubtful whether an agreement to this effect should now be held illegal.<sup>85</sup> One view is that the agreement may still be illegal, even though it does not itself amount to an offence, for this was precisely

<sup>72</sup> Horrocks v Forray [1976] 1 W.L.R. 230 at 239.

<sup>73</sup> cf. also below, p.711; Heglibiston Establishment v Heyman (1977) 36 P. & C.R. 351.

<sup>74</sup> Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 A.C. 180 at 198; Royal Bank of Scotland v Etridge (No.2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 A.C. 773, at [47].

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.165.

<sup>76</sup> Devlin, 39 M.L.R. 1 at 12; Dwyer, 93 L.Q.R. 386.

<sup>77</sup> R. v Andrews [1973] Q.B. 422.

<sup>78</sup> R. v Panayiotou [1973] 3 All E.R. 112; cf. R. v Ali [1993] Crim.L.R. 396.

<sup>79</sup> Collins v Blanton (1767) 2 Wils.K.B. 341; Keir v Leeman (1846) 9 Q.B. 371; Windhill Local Board of Health v Vint (1890) 45 Ch.D. 351; Clubb v Huston (1865) 18 C.B.(n.s.) 414 (embezzlement); cf. Howard v Odham's Press Ltd [1938] 1 K.B. 42 (contract not to disclose confession of fraud); and cf. below, p.455, n.89. Contracts to stifle a prosecution for a felony were sometimes held illegal on this ground (e.g. Rawlings v Coal Consumers' Association (1874) 43 L.J.M.C. 111; Whitmore v Farley (1881) 45 L.T. 99), but were also illegal as they formerly amounted to compounding.

<sup>80</sup> (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 424.

<sup>81</sup> Fisher & Co v Apollinaris Co (1875) L.R. 10 Ch.App. 297.

<sup>82</sup> ibid., at 303.

<sup>83</sup> Criminal Law Act 1967, ss.1, 5(1), above, p.431.

<sup>84</sup> Criminal Law Act 1967, s.5(1).

<sup>85</sup> Hudson, 43 M.L.R. 532.

the position under the old law where an agreement was made to stifle a prosecution for a misdemeanour. A second view is that, where the only consideration is the making good of the loss, no public interest is harmed by upholding the agreement; and this view can be supported by reference to the old cases concerning misdemeanours of a "private" nature. A third view is that the legality of an agreement to stifle a prosecution (not amounting to a conspiracy to pervert the course of justice or to the offence of concealing an arrestable offence) should depend on the question whether it was in the public interest that the prosecution should be brought; and it is submitted that this is the best view.<sup>86</sup>

The principle of public policy is not confined to contracts to stifle a prosecution: thus a contract to indemnify a surety in criminal proceedings is illegal.<sup>87</sup> Nor is the principle restricted to contracts affecting criminal proceedings. Thus agreements to obstruct bankruptcy proceedings<sup>88</sup> and corrupt agreements relating to matrimonial proceedings<sup>89</sup> are illegal. It has also been said that a contract by which a witness promised one party to a civil dispute not to give evidence for the other would be contrary to public policy.<sup>90</sup> On the other hand, it has been held not to be contrary to public policy for one party to an agreement to undertake that he would not oppose the other's application for planning applications and not give evidence in support of a compulsory purchase order relating to the land in question.<sup>91</sup> An ordinary civil claim can, of course, be validly compromised, even though the facts giving rise to the claim also amount to a crime. But in such a case an agreement to abandon "any legal proceedings" may be illegal, as this phrase is wide enough to refer to possible civil and criminal proceedings.<sup>92</sup>

(9) Contracts purporting to oust the jurisdiction of the courts

A contract is at common law contrary to public policy if it purports to deprive the courts of a jurisdiction which they would otherwise have. For example, a clause in an insurance policy which provides that the policy is in certain events to become "incontestable"<sup>93</sup> does not prevent the court from deciding whether the assured had any insurable interest.<sup>94</sup> Such agreements are contrary to public policy because they would, if valid, make it possible to evade or contravene many peremptory rules of law. It follows that they are invalid only so far as they purport to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts on a point of law. An agreement is not invalid to the extent that it gives a non-judicial body power to make final and binding decisions on questions of fact.<sup>95</sup> Such a provision does not, moreover, normally<sup>96</sup> rule out the possibility of a legal challenge to the decision on the

<sup>86</sup> It might be relevant that the offence was a "serious arrestable offence" as defined by Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s.116 (though the Act does not use the definition for this purpose).

<sup>87</sup> Herman v Feuchner (1885) 15 Q.B.D. 561. It is now an offence to make such an agreement: Bail Act 1976, s.9 (as amended by Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s.44 and Sch.4, para.25).

<sup>88</sup> Elliott v Richardson (1870) 1 L.R. 5 C.P. 744; cf. Murray v Reeves (1828) 8 B. & C. 421; Hall v Dyson (1852) 17 Q.B. 785; Kearley v Thomson (1890) 24 Q.B.D. 742; Coppock v Bower (1838) 4 M. & W. 361 (agreement to abandon election petition on ground of bribery illegal); Norman v Cole (1800) 3 Esp. 253 (money paid for help in procuring a pardon).

<sup>89</sup> See above, p.442.

<sup>90</sup> Harmony Shipping Co SA v Saudi Europe Line Ltd [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1380 at 1386.

<sup>91</sup> Fulham Football Club Ltd v Cabra Estates (1992) 56 P. & C.R. 284.

<sup>92</sup> Lound v Grimwade (1888) 39 Ch.D. 605.

<sup>93</sup> Ancil v Manufacturers' Life Insurance Co [1899] A.C. 604.

<sup>94</sup> But such clauses are effective to prevent the insurer from contesting certain matters of fact, e.g. that statements in the proposal form were true: cf. below at n.95.

<sup>95</sup> The Glacier Bay, [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370; and see below p.449 n.34.

<sup>96</sup> For a common law exception, see below p.450 at n.36.

ground of “unfairness, bad faith or perversity”,<sup>97</sup> so that the provision does not wholly exclude the jurisdiction of the courts even on questions of fact.

(a) ILLUSTRATIONS. The rule against allowing parties by contract to oust the jurisdiction of the courts is further illustrated by the following cases:

(i) Agreements for maintenance. A husband may, as part of a separation agreement or in the course of matrimonial proceedings, promise to pay his wife an allowance in return for the wife’s promise not to apply to the court for maintenance. In Hyman v Hyman<sup>98</sup> the House of Lords held that such an agreement did not prevent the wife from applying to the court for maintenance. The contract was illegal, since “The wife’s right to future maintenance is a matter of public concern which she cannot barter away”.<sup>99</sup> But this rule had one unfortunate result: if the husband failed to pay the promised allowance, the wife could not sue him for it, since a promise cannot be enforced if the sole or main consideration for it is illegal.<sup>1</sup> By statute, the wife can, if such an agreement is in writing, sue the husband for the promised allowance, in spite of the fact that her own promise not to apply to the court is void.<sup>2</sup>

(ii) Arbitration clauses. There is no doubt about the validity of such clauses if they merely provide that the parties are to resort to arbitration before going to court. In Scott v Avery<sup>3</sup> a clause of this kind was upheld as it did not purport to oust the jurisdiction of the court,<sup>4</sup> but simply to lay down at what stage the cause of action arose upon which that jurisdiction might be exercised. At common law such a clause did not prevent the courts from nevertheless determining the dispute, though the party who disregarded the clause and in breach of it brought an action was liable in damages.<sup>5</sup> The courts have, however, an inherent jurisdiction to stay an action brought in breach of an agreement to decide disputes in some way other than by bringing an action.<sup>6</sup> Moreover, the Arbitration Act 1996 provides that, where an arbitration agreement is in writing,<sup>7</sup> the court must stay an action brought in breach of the agreement<sup>8</sup> unless the agreement is “null and void, inoperative or incapable of being performed”. Where the agreement is made

<sup>97</sup> The Glacier Bay, above, at 379.

<sup>98</sup> [1929] A.C. 601. The principle laid down in this case has survived the abolition of collusion as a bar to divorce: cf. Dean v Dean [1978] Fam. 161 at 167.

<sup>99</sup> [1929] A.C. 601 at 629. But such an agreement is not contrary to public policy if it only ousts the jurisdiction of a foreign court: Addison v Brown [1954] 1 W.L.R. 779; nor if it is sanctioned by order of the court: L v L [1962] P. 101; Minton v Minton [1979] A.C. 593. The court can, however, later increase periodical payments due to the wife under such an agreement: Wright v Wright [1970] 1 W.L.R. 1219; Jessel v Jessel [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1148. The court can also take the wife’s promise into account when exercising its discretion whether to make an award in her favour: Edgar v Edgar [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1410.

<sup>1</sup> Bennett v Bennett [1952] 1 K.B. 249; aliter if only a subsidiary part of the consideration was illegal: Goodinson v Goodinson [1954] 2 Q.B. 118; cf. Sutton v Sutton [1984] Ch. 184 (where each party promised not to invoke the jurisdiction of the court); and see below, p.505.

<sup>2</sup> Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s.34. For a dispute on this point, see Dew, 56 Law Soc. Gaz. 365; J. H. H., 101 S.J. 73; 78 Law Notes 177; Treitel, 77 L.Q.R. 93–95. In Sutton v Sutton, above, the agreement was oral, so that s.34 did not apply. Under the Child Support Act 1991, s.9 (as amended by Child Support Act 1995, s.18) similar rules apply to certain maintenance agreements in respect of children.

<sup>3</sup> (1855) 5 H.L.C. 811; cf. Atlantic Shipping & Trading Co Ltd v Louis Dreyfus & Co [1922] 2 A.C. 250; Persson v London County Buses [1974] 1 W.L.R. 569.

<sup>4</sup> See Halifax Financial Services v Intuitive Systems Ltd [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 303 at 310, where the clause in question was a “dispute resolution” clause which failed for lack of certainty: above, p.60.

<sup>5</sup> Doleman & Sons v Ossett Corporation [1912] 3 K.B. 257 at 267.

<sup>6</sup> Channel Tunnel Group Ltd v Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd [1993] A.C. 334; cf. Cott UK Ltd v F E Barber Ltd [1997] 3 All E.R. 540, and T&N Ltd & Sun Alliance plc [2002] EWHC 2420, C.I..C. 1342 where a stay was refused.

<sup>7</sup> For this requirement, see s.5(1).

<sup>8</sup> s.9(4); Halki Shipping Corp v Sopex Oils Ltd [1998] 1 W.L.R. 726; this rule cannot be excluded by contract: see s.4 and Sch.1.

between a party acting in the course of a business and a consumer, it does not bind the consumer if the amount claimed is less than £5,000<sup>9</sup>; but it binds the other party.

The fact that an arbitration clause excluded the jurisdiction of the court might at common law make the clause invalid on one of two grounds. First, such a clause was invalid to the extent that it purported to deprive the parties of the right to go to court to sue on a completed cause of action, or to exclude the power granted to the courts by statute to control the decisions of arbitrators on points of law.<sup>10</sup> This rule was justified by the argument that, if such a clause were valid, an arbitrator who decided a dispute on principles at variance with the general law would be subject to no control at all<sup>11</sup>; and this would be particularly undesirable if he made an award enforcing a wholly illegal agreement.<sup>12</sup> A substantially similar risk could arise where the clause, though not in terms restricting the parties' right to ask the court to control the arbitrator's decision, laid down standards which made such control nugatory. This is a second ground of invalidity at common law, so that "a clause which purported to free arbitrators to decide without regard to law and according, for example, to their own notions of what would be fair would not be a valid arbitration clause".<sup>13</sup> But the parties can validly specify standards which, at least to some extent, guard against the risk of invalidity on this ground: it is, for example, not contrary to public policy to enforce an arbitration award based on "internationally accepted principles of law governing contractual relations".<sup>14</sup> An arbitration clause can also free arbitrators from the need to apply strict legal rules of construction, e.g. by empowering them to interpret a contract "as an honourable engagement rather than in accordance with a literal interpretation of the language".<sup>15</sup> And the courts can to some extent save an arbitration clause which transgresses such limits by striking out such parts of the clause as go "further than the law permits in freeing arbitrators from strict rules of law".<sup>16</sup> The Arbitration Act 1996 provides more generally that "the parties should be free to agree how their disputes are to be resolved",<sup>17</sup> but this general principle is expressly made "subject to such safeguards as are necessary in the public interest".<sup>18</sup> These words seem to leave it open to the courts to continue to apply standards of public policy to such agreements. The Act also provides that the court may refuse to recognise or enforce an arbitral award on grounds of public policy,<sup>19</sup> and this provision could be applied where such an award purported to enforce an illegal agreement.

The invalidity, at common law, of arbitration clauses which purported to exclude the powers of the court to control an arbitrator's decision on points of law was open to a

<sup>9</sup> s.91; Arbitration Agreements (Specified Amounts) Order 1999 (SI 1999/2167).

<sup>10</sup> Czarnikow v Roth Schmidt & Co [1922] 2 K.B. 478. For a different approach in New Zealand, see CBI NZ Ltd v Badger Chiyoda [1989] N.Z.L.R. 669.

<sup>11</sup> Clauses making an arbitrator's decision "final" do not have this effect: see Ford v Clarkson's Holidays Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1412; P & M Kaye v Hosier & Dickinson Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 146; cf. Jones v Sherwood Computer Services [1992] 1 W.L.R. 227 ("final and conclusive" valuation reviewable for error of law).

<sup>12</sup> cf. Soleimany v Soleimany [1999] Q.B. 785 at 799. See now below, after n.20.

<sup>13</sup> Home and Overseas Insurance Co Ltd v Mentor Insurance Co (UK) Ltd [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473 at 485; and see below, n.16.

<sup>14</sup> Deutsche Schachtbau- und Tiefbohrgesellschaft mbH v Ras Al Khaimah National Oil Co [1990] 1 A.C. 295 at 315 (reversed on other grounds ibid. pp.329 et seq.).

<sup>15</sup> Overseas Union Insurance Ltd v AA Mutual International Insurance Ltd [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 63; Home and Overseas Insurance Co Ltd v Mentor Insurance Co (UK) Ltd, above, n.13.

<sup>16</sup> Home Insurance Co v Administrata Asigurarilor [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 674 at 677.

<sup>17</sup> s.1(b).

<sup>18</sup> ibid.

<sup>19</sup> s.81(1)(c); cf. above after n.11.

practical objection: the resulting impossibility of excluding judicial control tended to erode the virtues of speed and cheapness that were supposed to be characteristics of arbitration as a method of settling disputes. The Arbitration Act 1996 therefore, while retaining a degree of judicial control over arbitration proceedings,<sup>20</sup> reduces the scope of such control in two important respects. First, the parties to a written arbitration agreement<sup>21</sup> can exclude such judicial control by agreement.<sup>22</sup> Secondly, the Act imposes strict limits on the scope of judicial control. This will generally be exercised by way of appeal to the court on a question of law.<sup>23</sup> Such an appeal can be brought either with the consent of the parties or with the leave of the court,<sup>24</sup> and such leave can be given only if a number of statutory requirements<sup>25</sup> are satisfied. The point of law must be one which substantially affects the rights of one or more of the parties and which the arbitral tribunal was asked to determine; the decision of that tribunal must either be “obviously wrong” or raise a question of “general public importance” and be “at least open to serious doubt;” and it must, in spite of the parties’ agreement to resolve the dispute by arbitration be “just and proper for the court to determine the question”. These requirements are based on (but go slightly beyond<sup>25a</sup>) tests which had been developed by the courts under earlier legislation.<sup>26</sup> The overriding consideration remains that stated in the course of this judicial development: i.e. whether the decision of the court “would add significantly to the clarity and certainty of English commercial law”.<sup>27</sup> Thus the court is more likely to grant leave if the issue is as to the true construction of a standard form commercial contract in common use,<sup>28</sup> or if it raises an important general question of law,<sup>29</sup> than if it relates merely to the construction of a “one-off” contract specially drafted for a particular transaction.<sup>30</sup> A similar distinction has been drawn in relation to events giving rise to the dispute, or interfering with the performance of a contract. Thus leave is more likely to be given where the event is one that may affect many contracts (such as the hostilities in the Persian Gulf, preventing the movement of shipping there,<sup>31</sup> or an embargo on the export of some commodity from a major exporting country) than where the event is not likely to have this effect (e.g. where it is a strike that affects only the export of goods from a particular port).<sup>32</sup>

An arbitration agreement may, finally, be invalid for illegality at common law on grounds other than its tendency to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts. Such invalidity could arise by reason of the nature of the underlying transaction: for example, the court “would not recognise an agreement between highwayman to arbitrate their differences

<sup>20</sup> See below at n.23.

<sup>21</sup> Arbitration Act 1996 s.5(1).

<sup>22</sup> See the opening words of ss.45(1) and 69(1).

<sup>23</sup> s.69; under s.45 the court also has powers to determine preliminary questions of law, i.e. of the law of England and Wales: s.82(1); Reliance Industries Ltd v Enron Oil & Gas Co [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 59.

<sup>24</sup> s.69(2).

<sup>25</sup> s.69(3).

<sup>25a</sup> CMA CGM SA & Beteiligungs-Kommanditgesellschaft mbH & Co [2002] EWCA Civ 1878, [2003] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 204.

<sup>26</sup> The Nema [1982] A.C. 724 and other cases; for full citations of these cases, see the 9th ed. of this book at pp.408–409.

<sup>27</sup> The Nema, above, at 743. For other grounds of public interest that may lead the court to give leave, see Bulk Oil (Zug) AG v Sun International [1984] 1 W.L.R. 147.

<sup>28</sup> The Rio Sun [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 489; see also [1982] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 404.

<sup>29</sup> The Alaskan Trader [1983] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 315.

<sup>30</sup> The Nema, above, at 743.

<sup>31</sup> The Wenjiang [1982] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 128.

<sup>32</sup> As in The Nema, above.

any more than it would recognise the original agreement to split the proceeds"<sup>33</sup>; and even if an arbitrator made an award in such a case, the court would not enforce it.<sup>34</sup>

(iii) Construction of rules of associations. A clause in the rules of an association such as a trade union may purport to give to the committee of the association exclusive jurisdiction to construe the rules. But, as the construction of the rules is a question of law, it has been held that any attempt to deprive the courts of their jurisdiction over it is invalid.<sup>35</sup> By contrast, the jurisdiction of the Visitor of a University to decide matters governed by the "internal laws" of the University is at common law<sup>36</sup> exclusive, so that his decisions on points of this kind cannot be challenged in the ordinary courts.<sup>37</sup>

(b) SCOPE OF THE RULE. Contracts purporting to exclude the jurisdiction of the courts must be distinguished from promises in honour only.<sup>38</sup> A provision that a promise "shall not be enforced in any court" makes the promise legally unenforceable, but does not purport to oust the jurisdiction of the court to say so. Similar reasoning applies to the compromise of a genuine dispute as to legal rights. Such a compromise may vary or supersede the legal rights of the parties; but it does not prevent the courts from determining what those rights are. It is therefore not contrary to public policy<sup>39</sup>; and this is true even though the public can be said to have some interest in the dispute, e.g. because it relates to the performance of duties under a charitable trust.<sup>40</sup>

(10) Contracts to deceive public authorities

In Alexander v Rayson<sup>41</sup> a landlord let a service flat to the defendant for £1,200. Two documents were executed: in the first the defendant agreed to pay £450 for the flat and certain services; in the second she agreed to pay £750 for the same services, plus the use of a refrigerator. The landlord's object in splitting up the contract in this way was to defraud the rating authorities by showing them the first document only. The contract was therefore held to be illegal. A contract by which an employee gets an expense allowance grossly in excess of the expenses he actually incurs is similarly illegal as a fraud on the Revenue.<sup>42</sup> The same is true where part of the employee's actual pay is

<sup>33</sup> Soleimany v Soleimany [1999] Q.B. 785, 797; [1999] 3 All E.R. at 857; contrast Westacre Investments Inc v Jugoimport-SDPR Holdings Co Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 65; [1999] 3 All E.R. 864; [2000] Q.B. 288 and Omnium de Traitement et de Valorisation SA v Hilmarton Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 222 (contract not illegal by its proper law nor enforcement contrary to English public policy).

<sup>34</sup> Soleimany v Soleimany, above, at 799; and see Arbitration Act 1996, s.81(1)(c), above p.448 at n.19.

<sup>35</sup> Lee v Shommen's Guild of Great Britain [1952] 2 Q.B. 329; Baker v Jones [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1005; cf. Edwards v Aberayron Insurance Soc Ltd (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 563; Re Davstone Estate Ltd's Leases [1969] 2 Ch. 378; Leigh v N.U.R. [1970] Ch. 326; Edwards v SOGAT [1971] Ch. 354. There is no objection to leaving questions of fact to the final determination of a private tribunal: Brown v Overbury (1856) 11 Exch. 715; Cipriani v Burnett [1933] A.C. 83. cf., in the law of trusts, Re Tuck's ST [1976] Ch. 99. See also the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s.63 (right of union members to go to court after six months).

<sup>36</sup> For a statutory exception, see Education Reform Act 1988, s.206; Pearce v University of Aston [1991] 2 All E.R. 461.

<sup>37</sup> Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] A.C. 795 (for subsequent proceedings before the Visitor, see Thomas v University of Bradford [1992] 1 All E.R. 964); R. v Lord President of the Privy Council, Ex p. Page [1993] A.C. 682. Contrast Clark v University of Lincolnshire and Humberside [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1985 (complaint by student at charterless university with no visitor about breach of university rules having contractual force to a limited extent open to adjudication in the courts).

<sup>38</sup> See above, p.164.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.87. For compromise of a claim known by the claimant to be invalid, see above, p.88; below, p.480.

<sup>40</sup> Bradshaw v University College of Wales [1988] 1 W.L.R. 190.

<sup>41</sup> [1936] 1 K.B. 169; cf. Palaniappa Chettiar v Arunasalam Chettiar [1962] A.C. 294; Mitsubishi Corp v Aristidis I Alafouzou [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 191.

<sup>42</sup> Miller v Karlinski (1945) 62 T.L.R. 85; Napier v National Business Agency Ltd [1951] 2 All E.R. 264; cf. Hyland v J Barber (North West) [1985] I.C.R. 861.

fraudulently concealed from the Revenue, with a view to evading tax.<sup>43</sup> But the contract is illegal only if the scheme that it furthers is a fraudulent one. Thus it is perfectly lawful for a contract of employment to provide that the employee is to receive a specified amount “free of tax”, so long as the employer accounts to the revenue authorities for the tax due.<sup>44</sup> And where a seller sent out a false invoice with the intention of merely postponing the payment of VAT, it was held that this did not turn an originally lawful sale into an illegal contract, it having been found as a fact that the seller had acted without dishonest intent.<sup>45</sup>

(11) Sale of offices and honours, lobbying, etc.

Certain contracts for the sale of public offices are prohibited by statute<sup>46</sup> while others are illegal at common law.<sup>47</sup> The same rule applies to contracts for the sale of commissions in the armed forces of the Crown.<sup>48</sup> Exceptionally, commissions in the Army could be sold<sup>49</sup> until this practice was prohibited by Royal Warrant in 1871.<sup>50</sup> Contracts of this kind are contrary to public policy because of their tendency to lead to corruption and inefficiency.

Similarly, it was held in Parkinson v College of Ambulance Ltd<sup>51</sup> that a contract to procure a knighthood was illegal as it might lead to corruption and as it was “derogatory to the dignity of the Sovereign”.<sup>52</sup> It is now an offence to make such a contract.<sup>53</sup> And a contract by a Member of Parliament to vote in accordance with the direction of some body outside Parliament is invalid.<sup>54</sup>

Similar problems can arise from the practice of “lobbying” for government contracts. While in some cases the practice is “recognised and respectable”,<sup>55</sup> it is in others contrary to public policy. This was, for example, held to be the case where the defendant promised large commissions to the claimant for using its influence to secure the renewal of contracts between the defendant and a foreign government. It was essential to the success of the scheme that the government should be kept in ignorance of the claimant’s financial interest in the matter, while the claimant knew that the original contract provided that no commissions should be paid to third parties. The claim for the commission was therefore rejected on grounds of public policy.<sup>56</sup>

<sup>43</sup> cf. Corby v Morrison [1980] I.C.R. 564.

<sup>44</sup> See Newland v Simmons & Willer (Hairdressers) Ltd [1981] I.C.R. 521.

<sup>45</sup> Skilton v Sullivan, The Times, March 25, 1994; see further p.483, below.

<sup>46</sup> Sale of Offices Act 1551, extended by Sale of Offices Act 1809, as amended by Criminal Law Act 1967, s.10 and Sch.3.

<sup>47</sup> Garforth v Fearon (1787) 1 H.B.L. 327; Hannington v Du-Chatel (1781) 1 Bro.C.C. 124; Law v Law (1735) 3 P.Wms. 391; Parsons v Thompson (1790) 1 H.B. 322. cf. the rule against assignment of a public officer’s salary: below, p.698.

<sup>48</sup> Morris v McCulloch (1763) Amb. 432.

<sup>49</sup> Berrisford v Done (1682) 1 Vern. 98.

<sup>50</sup> An attempt to abolish purchase of Army commissions by statute having failed to get a majority in the House of Lords.

<sup>51</sup> [1925] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>52</sup> ibid. at 14.

<sup>53</sup> Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925.

<sup>54</sup> ASRS v Osborne [1910] A.C. 87. The House of Commons has resolved that it is a breach of privilege to make such a contract: (1947) 440 HC Col. 365.

<sup>55</sup> Lemenda Trading Co Ltd v African Middle East Petroleum Co [1988] Q.B. 448 at 458; Collier [1988] C.I.J. 169.

<sup>56</sup> Lemenda case, above.

(12) Trading with the enemy

A contract made during a war to which this country is a party is illegal if it involves commercial intercourse with an enemy.<sup>57</sup> An enemy, for this purpose, is a person voluntarily resident or carrying on business in enemy-occupied territory.<sup>58</sup> Such contracts are illegal as they tend to aid the economy of the enemy country. A contract is not illegal if one of the parties to it is an "enemy" but its performance involves no further commercial intercourse with the enemy<sup>59</sup> and it can be enforced if this does not benefit the enemy.<sup>60</sup> It is a statutory offence to trade or to attempt to trade with an enemy.<sup>61</sup>

(13) Contracts which involve doing an illegal act in a friendly foreign country

In the interests of good foreign relations, the courts will not uphold a contract which involves the performance in a friendly foreign country of an act which is illegal by its law. Thus a loan to support an armed attack on such a country<sup>62</sup> and a contract to smuggle whisky into the USA during the Prohibition period have been held illegal.<sup>63</sup> A contract for the sale of goods was likewise held illegal where it required the goods to be illegally exported from their country of origin.<sup>64</sup> And in Regazzoni v KC Sethia Ltd<sup>65</sup> a contract was made for the export of Indian jute to Italy, with a view to re-export to South Africa. The House of Lords refused to enforce the contract as it contravened an Indian law prohibiting the export of goods produced in India to South Africa, and as it could be performed only by making false declarations in India.

(14) Contracts restricting personal liberty

A contract may be illegal if it so severely restricts the liberty of an individual as to reduce him to a quasi-servile condition. In Horwood v Millar's Timber and Trading Co<sup>66</sup> a clerk borrowed money from a moneylender and agreed that he would not without the lender's written consent leave his job, borrow money, dispose of his property or move house. The contract was held to be illegal as it unduly restricted the liberty of the borrower.

<sup>57</sup> Seefracht (V/O) v Van Udens Scheepvaart en Agentuur Maatschappij (NV Gebr.) [1943] A.C. 203.

<sup>58</sup> Porter v Freudenberg [1915] 1 K.B. 857.

<sup>59</sup> Tingley v Muller [1917] 2 Ch. 144.

<sup>60</sup> Rodriguez v Speyer Bros [1919] A.C. 59.

<sup>61</sup> Trading with the Enemy Act 1939.

<sup>62</sup> De Wutz v Hendricks (1824) 2 Bing. 314.

<sup>63</sup> Foster v Driscoll [1929] 1 K.B. 470; cf. Ralli Bros v Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar [1920] 2 K.B. 287 (supervening illegality of payment); contrast Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] Q.B. 728 at 744–745 (where there was no intention to do or procure an illegal act abroad); Bangladesh Export & Import Co Ltd v Sueden Kerry SA [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 6 (where there was no obligation to do such an act); Royal Boskalis Westminster NV v Mountain [1997] 2 All E.R. 929.

<sup>64</sup> See Soleimany v Soleimany [1999] Q.B. 785 at 797 (refusal to enforce arbitration award based on such a contract).

<sup>65</sup> [1958] A.C. 30. Contrast Fox v Henderson Investment Fund Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 303 (no illegality merely because acts to be done in England in performance of the contract would involve breach of an order made by a foreign court).

<sup>66</sup> [1917] 3 K.B. 305; cf. Hepworth Manufacturing Co v Ryott [1920] 1 Ch. 1; Gaumont-British Picture Corp v Alexander [1936] 2 All E.R. 1686. See also Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App.Cas. 533; King v Michael Faraday & Partners Ltd [1939] 2 K.B. 753 (assignment of salary depriving assignor of his sole means of support invalid), and Syrett v Egerton [1957] 1 W.L.R. 1130 (whether assignment of all an individual's property is contrary to public policy). Under Human Rights Act 1998, s.1 and Sch.1, Pt I, Art.5, contractual restrictions on personal liberty of the kind described in the text above could be unlawful if imposed by a "public authority": see s.6 and p.480, below. Such restrictions do not appear to fall within Art.1 of Sch.1, Pt I.

But a case has to be extreme to fall within this principle. In Denny v Denny<sup>67</sup> a father promised to pay his son's debts and to make him an allowance if the son did not become a bankrupt; became and remained a reformed character; gave up some named associates (who were swindlers); did not go within 80 miles of Piccadilly Circus without his father's previous consent; did not borrow money, or bet or directly or indirectly have any business or personal relations with any moneylenders, bookmakers or turf accountants or their servants. This contract was upheld even though, taken literally, it prevented the son from having personal relations with a bookmaker's clerk, who might be perfectly honest. The court was mainly influenced by the fact that the father had imposed the restrictions for the son's benefit, while the moneylender in Horwood's case had acted from selfish motives.

3. Contracts in Restraint of Trade<sup>68</sup>

Contracts which prevent or regulate business competition were at one time regarded as invariably void<sup>69</sup>; and persons who made them were even threatened with imprisonment.<sup>70</sup> But it came to be recognised that this inflexible attitude might defeat its own ends. A master might be reluctant to employ and train apprentices if he could not to some extent restrain them from competing with him after the end of their apprenticeship. And a trader might be unable to sell the business he had built up if he could not bind himself not to compete with the purchaser. The courts therefore began to uphold contracts in restraint of trade, and in 1711 the subject was reviewed in Mitchel v Reynolds.<sup>71</sup> The effect of that case, as interpreted in later decisions, was that a restraint was prima facie valid if it was supported by adequate consideration and was not general—i.e. did not extend over the whole Kingdom.

Since then, the law has changed in three respects. First, restraints are no longer prima facie valid; they are prima facie void, but can be justified if they are reasonable and not contrary to the public interest.<sup>72</sup> Secondly, it is no longer essential that the consideration should be adequate,<sup>73</sup> "though . . . the quantum of consideration may enter into the question of the reasonableness of the agreement".<sup>74</sup> Thirdly, the rule that a restraint must not be general no longer applies. In Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co<sup>75</sup> the owner of an armaments business sold it to a company and covenanted not to carry on such a business for 25 years except on behalf of the company. The covenant was held valid although it prevented competition anywhere in the world.

Most authorities support the view that the question whether a restraint is valid must be determined once for all by reference to the circumstances in existence when the

<sup>67</sup> [1919] 1 K.B. 583; cf. Upton v Henderson (1912) 28 T.L.R. 398.

<sup>68</sup> Heydon, The Restraint of Trade Doctrine and 50 A.L.J. 290; Trebilcock, The Common Law of Restraint of Trade.

<sup>69</sup> Claygate v Batchelor (1602) Owen 143.

<sup>70</sup> Dyer's Case (1414) Y.B. 2 Hen. V, Pasch. pl. 26.

<sup>71</sup> (1711) 1 P.Wms. 181.

<sup>72</sup> See below, pp.458–463.

<sup>73</sup> Tallis v Tallis (1853) 1 E. & B. 391.

<sup>74</sup> Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co [1894] A.C. 535 at 565; Esso Petroleum Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 300 at 318, 323; Amoco Australia Pty Ltd v Rocca Bros Motor Engineering Pty Ltd (1973) 47 A.L.J.R. 681 (affirmed without reference to this point [1975] A.C. 561); Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173 at 179; Turner v Commonwealth Minerals Ltd [2000] I.R.L.R. 114.

<sup>75</sup> [1894] A.C. 535. For a trace of the older view, see Home Counties Dairies Ltd v Skilton [1970] 1 W.L.R. 526 at 530 ("an agreement in restraint of trade may be upheld if partial").

contract was made.<sup>76</sup> The view that a restraint which satisfies the tests of validity at that time may become invalid or unenforceable in the light of subsequent events<sup>77</sup> has been generally rejected as it would give rise to an unacceptable degree of uncertainty.

Agreements which have been held to be within the doctrine of restraint of trade can be divided into a number of groups or categories which will be discussed below. We shall see that some agreements which are, or may be, within the doctrine do not fall readily within any of these categories; and that other agreements which can in a sense be said to restrain trade are not within the doctrine at all, and are therefore not subject to the conditions on which the validity of covenants in restraint of trade depends.<sup>78</sup> Our main concern will be with the common law rules on this topic. After discussing these rules, we shall consider the relationship between them and the legislation which governs European Community and United Kingdom competition law.<sup>79</sup>

(1) Sale of a business and employment

In this group of cases, a covenant in restraint of trade is invalid unless three conditions are satisfied: there must be an interest meriting protection; the restraint must be reasonable; and it must not be contrary to the public interest.

(a) THE INTEREST. The interest must arise from the relationship of the parties as buyer and seller or as employer and employee. In the absence of such a relationship, freedom from ordinary trade competition is not, of itself, an interest meriting protection.<sup>80</sup> Thus a bare promise to a shopkeeper not to open (or work for) a competing business would be void; such a promise is known as a covenant in gross. Normally the covenant must be contained in a contract of sale or employment, but this is not absolutely necessary. It is enough if the covenant is closely related to such a contract; for example, if it is contained in a contract made (shortly after the termination of an employment contract) to settle outstanding differences.<sup>81</sup>

(i) Sale of a business. Even in the absence of a covenant in restraint of trade, the purchaser of the goodwill of a business can restrain the vendor from canvassing the old customers of the business.<sup>82</sup> This rule would not prevent the vendor from competing in other ways (e.g. from dealing with his old customers if they spontaneously came to him); but the purchaser can validly stipulate against such competition by a covenant in restraint of trade. His right to do so is said to depend on his "proprietary interest" in the goodwill of the business which he has bought.<sup>83</sup>

It follows that the purchaser is entitled to protection only in respect of the business which he has bought, and not in respect of some other business which he already carries on or may carry on in the future. If a company which owns shops in all parts of the

<sup>76</sup> Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623 at 644 (citing earlier authorities); Gledhow Autoparts Ltd v Delancy [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1366 at 1377; A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1309; Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187 at 1203; Briggs v Oates [1991] 1 All E.R. 407 at 417; Watson v Prager [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726 at 738; Rock Refrigeration Ltd v Jones [1997] I.C.R. 938 at 996; TSC Europe (UK) Ltd v Massey [1999] I.R.L.R. 22 at 26; Symbian Ltd v Christensen [2001] I.R.L.R. 77.

<sup>77</sup> Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] W.L.R. 1187 at 1198.

<sup>78</sup> See below, p.474.

<sup>79</sup> See below, p.475.

<sup>80</sup> cf. Vancouver Malt & Sake Brewing Co v Vancouver Breweries Ltd [1934] A.C. 181.

<sup>81</sup> Stenhouse Australia Ltd v Phillips [1974] A.C. 391.

<sup>82</sup> Trego v Hunt [1896] A.C. 7.

<sup>83</sup> There can be such an interest even though the goodwill is inalienable: see Whitehill v Bradford [1952] Ch. 236; Kerr v Morris [1987] Ch. 90; and even though the interest is not purely financial: cf., in an analogous context, Young v Evans-Jones [2002] EWCA Civ 732; [2001] 1 P. & C.R. 176.

country buys a village shop it can restrain the seller from competing in or near that village, but not at other places where it happens to carry on business.<sup>84</sup> Similarly, in the Nordenfelt case<sup>85</sup> the covenant restrained the seller from engaging not only in the manufacture of armaments but also “in any other business competing or liable to compete with that for the time being carried on by” the buyer. The latter part of the covenant was invalid. Its effect would be to restrain the seller from competing with the company if it started to make ploughshares; and he had sold no such business.<sup>86</sup> But a person who buys a business which is about to expand may be able to take a covenant against competition covering the area of the proposed expansion.<sup>87</sup> And the rule that the buyer can restrain the seller from competing only with the business formerly carried on by the seller is subject to a common-sense exception. A person who sells shares in a company which he controls may covenant not to compete in respect of the business carried on by the company. Such a covenant may be valid if it was in substance the seller who, through his control of the company, carried on the business<sup>88</sup>; and even a seller of a minority shareholding can validly covenant with the buyer not to use confidential information which relates to the business of the company.<sup>89</sup> If, however, the business carried on by a company (as opposed to the shares in it) is sold, it may be hard to frame a suitable covenant to protect the buyer from competition by associated companies.<sup>90</sup>

(ii) Employment. Even in the absence of a covenant in restraint of trade, the law gives an employer some degree of protection against his employee. He can restrain the employee from (i) using or disclosing trade secrets (ii) using or disclosing confidential information<sup>91</sup> falling short of a trade secret<sup>92</sup> and (iii) soliciting the employer's customers. The restriction on the use or disclosure of trade secrets applies at any time<sup>93</sup>; that on the solicitation of customers applies only to solicitation during the period of employment<sup>94</sup>; while that relating to confidential information occupies an intermediate position. It is normally limited to the employee's conduct during employment<sup>95</sup>; but it can extend beyond that period: e.g. where, on leaving his job, the employee takes away,

<sup>84</sup> cf. British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Co Ltd v Schellff [1921] 2 Ch. 563.

<sup>85</sup> [1894] A.C. 535.

<sup>86</sup> cf. (between employer and employee) Scully UK Ltd v Lee [1998] I.R.L.R. 259.

<sup>87</sup> Lamson Pneumatic Tube Co v Phillips (1904) 91 L.T. 363; TSC Europe (UK) Ltd v Massey [1999] I.R.L.R. 22 at 27–28.

<sup>88</sup> Connors Bros v Connors Ltd [1940] 4 All E.R. 179; cf. Kirby (Inspector of Taxes) v Thorn EMI [1988] 1 W.L.R. 445 (covenant on sale by company of shares in its subsidiary).

<sup>89</sup> Systems Reliability Holdings v Smith [1990] I.R.L.R. 377.

<sup>90</sup> See Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 Q.B. 158.

<sup>91</sup> Except where disclosure would be in the public interest, e.g. where the employer has been guilty of misconduct which ought to be disclosed: Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 Q.B. 396; North [1968] J.B.L. 32; cf. Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1979] Ch. 344 at 361–362; British Steel Corp v Granada Television Ltd [1981] A.C. 1096 at 1168, 1177, 1201; Lion Laboratories Ltd v Evans [1985] Q.B. 526; Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No.2) [1990] A.C. 109 at 268; Re a Company [1989] 2 All E.R. 248; W v Edgell [1990] Ch. 359. Contrast Distillers Co Ltd v Times Newspapers Ltd [1976] Q.B. 613; Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd [1982] Q.B. 1; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch. 449; Re Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers Ltd [1992] Ch. 208. For proposals to widen the scope of the “public interest” exception see Law Com. No. 110, paras 6.84(i) and 6.134(iii).

<sup>92</sup> See below at n.8.

<sup>93</sup> Printers & Finishers Ltd v Holloway [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1; Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 136; Lock International plc v Beswick [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1268 at 1273; Berkley Administration v McClelland [1990] F.S.R. 565; PSM International v Whitehouse [1992] I.R.L.R. 279. cf. Attorney-General v Barker [1990] 3 All E.R. 257 (express covenant by employee of Royal Household); Poly Lina Ltd v Finch [1995] F.S.R. 751.

<sup>94</sup> Wessex Dairies Ltd v Smith [1935] 2 K.B. 60; cf. Wallace Bogan & Co v Cove [1997] I.R.L.R. 453. If the solicitation occurs during employment it is irrelevant that the actual contract with the customers is made thereafter: Sanders v Parry [1967] 1 W.L.R. 753.

<sup>95</sup> cf. Murray v Yorkshire Food Managers Ltd [1998] 1 W.L.R. 951.

copies or memorises lists of the employer's trade connections.<sup>96</sup> He can then be restrained from using such information for his own benefit (or for that of a third party) for so long as such use would give him (or the third party) an unfair competitive advantage over the employer.<sup>97</sup> A similar restriction may be imposed where the employee sells such information, as opposed to using it to earn his living.<sup>98</sup> Certain confidential information acquired by employees in the public service is also subject to a lifelong duty of confidentiality.<sup>99</sup> All these rights of the employer are once again said to constitute "proprietary interests" which the employer is entitled to protect by a covenant in restraint of trade; and such a covenant may (as in the cases between vendor and purchaser) afford somewhat greater protection<sup>1</sup> than that provided by law in the absence of a covenant. But the employer cannot justify a covenant in restraint of trade simply on the ground that the covenant would protect the business in which the employee has worked.

Thus the interest meriting protection is more narrowly defined between employer and employee than between buyer and seller,<sup>2</sup> and two reasons have been given for this distinction. First, buyer and seller may bargain on a more equal footing than employer and employee. The courts certainly attach importance to disparity of bargaining power in restraint of trade cases.<sup>3</sup> But this factor would scarcely be significant where the terms of employment were settled between an employer and a powerful trade union, or where the restraint was undertaken by a company director who, though technically an employee, was by no means in a weak bargaining position.<sup>4</sup> In such cases, it is better to fall back on the second justification for the distinction between the two types of contract. The buyer of a business pays for freedom from competition and would lose part of what he paid for if the seller began to compete with him.<sup>5</sup> An employer pays for his employee's services and would not be deprived of what he paid for if the employee competed with him after leaving his service.

Unlike the purchaser of a business, an employer cannot protect himself by a covenant in restraint of trade against his former employee's competition as such. He cannot restrain the employee from using his own skill even though that skill was learnt from the employer.<sup>6</sup> To establish that he has an interest meriting protection, the employer must show either that the employee has learnt the employer's trade secrets, or that he has acquired influence over the employer's clients or customers. Trade secrets include secret

<sup>96</sup> Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 139; Miller 102 L.Q.R. 359; cf. Johnson & Blay (Holdings) Ltd v Wolstenholme Rink plc [1989] F.S.R. 135; Universal Thermosensors Ltd v Hibden [1992] 1 W.L.R. 840 at 850.

<sup>97</sup> Roger Bullivant Ltd v Ellis [1987] I.C.R. 464.

<sup>98</sup> Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 139.

<sup>99</sup> Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers (No.2) [1990] A.C. 109 at 264, 284; Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications Ltd [1990] 1 A.C. 812 at 821. Contrast Attorney-General v Blake [1998] Ch. 439 at 454-455 where the information was no longer confidential and an injunction to restrain its use was said to be an unjustifiable restraint of trade; in the House of Lords, the defendant was held liable for breach of his express promise not to disclose the information: [2001] 1 A.C. 268, below, p.930.

<sup>1</sup> See Attorney-General v Blake n.99, above and below, p.458.

<sup>2</sup> Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co [1913] A.C. 724; Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705, 713; Systems Reliability Holdings v Smith [1990] I.R.L.R. 377.

<sup>3</sup> A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308; Clifford Davies Management v WEA Records Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 61; below, p.462.

<sup>4</sup> "A managing director can look after himself": M & S Drapers v Reynolds [1957] 1 W.L.R. 9 at 19.

<sup>5</sup> Attwood v Lamont [1920] 3 K.B. 571 at 590; cf. Leather Cloth Co v Lonsont (1869) L.R. 9 Eq. 345 at 354; Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 A.C. 688 at 701.

<sup>6</sup> Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 A.C. 688; cf. Eastes v Russ [1914] 1 Ch. 468; Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 137; FSS Travel Systems Ltd v Johnson [1998] I.R.L.R. 382. For a proposal to extend this principle to certain persons other than employees, see Law Com. No. 110, para.6.75.

formulae or processes, and certain other similar kinds of highly confidential information<sup>7</sup> (but not information which is merely confidential in the sense that the employee must not disclose it during employment).<sup>8</sup> It used to be thought that “know-how” could not be protected<sup>9</sup> but now that such expertise has become a saleable commodity<sup>10</sup> it is likely that the courts will recognise it as an interest meriting protection.<sup>11</sup> In respect of clients or customers, the employer is entitled to protection only if the nature of the employment was such as to enable the employee to acquire influence over them,<sup>12</sup> e.g. where the employee was a solicitor’s managing clerk,<sup>13</sup> or a hairdresser’s assistant<sup>14</sup> but not where he was a factory worker who never came into contact with customers. If the employee comes into contact with some customers, the employer may be able to protect himself also in respect of some others.<sup>15</sup>

The question whether there is any other interest which an employer can protect by a covenant in restraint of trade was raised in Eastham v Newcastle United Football Club Ltd.<sup>16</sup> The defendant club employed a professional footballer subject to the “retain and transfer” system.<sup>17</sup> Under that system, a player who was “retained”<sup>18</sup> by one club could not be employed by another; nor could he be transferred to another club without the consent of both clubs. The defendant club could not claim that this system protected either of the two traditional interests. But Wilberforce J. said that “it would be wrong to pass straight to the conclusion that no . . . interest . . . exists”.<sup>19</sup> He considered other possible interests, such as the danger that, but for the “retain and transfer” system, all the best players might go to the richest clubs. He found that such consequences would not in fact follow if the system were abandoned; that there was thus no interest to be protected; and that the system was invalid. But his approach suggests that interests other than the traditional ones might be entitled to protection. A covenant by a film actor not to appear on the stage for three months, made with the object of furthering the success of a new film,<sup>20</sup> might be enforceable even though it did not protect either of the orthodox interests. Such new interests would differ from the traditional ones in that they would be protected only if there was a covenant, while the traditional ones are to some extent protected even if there is no covenant. For this reason the new interests may be called “commercial” rather than “proprietary” ones; and we shall see that in some categories of contracts in restraint of trade the law now recognises that such commercial interests may be protected by covenants.<sup>21</sup> It is possible that this recognition will help to

<sup>7</sup> Caribonum Co Ltd v Le Couch (1913) 109 L.T. 587; cf. The Littlewoods Organisation Ltd v Harris [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1472. And see Lansing Linde Ltd v Kerr [1991] 1 W.L.R. 251 at 259, 268, 270; Bulston v Headline Filters [1990] F.S.R. 385 at 417. Trade secrets do not need to be disclosed by public authorities under the Freedom of Information Act 2000: see ss.2 and 43.

<sup>8</sup> Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 136; Brooks v Olchslager Oms (UK) Ltd [1998] I.R.L.R. 590; Intelsec Systems Ltd v Grech-Cini [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1190.

<sup>9</sup> Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby, above; Sir W C Leng & Co v Andrews [1909] 1 Ch. 763 at 768.

<sup>10</sup> Blanco White, 15 Conv. 89; 26 Conv. 366.

<sup>11</sup> In Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623 at 642 Pearson L.J. hints at this possibility.

<sup>12</sup> Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 137.

<sup>13</sup> Fitch v Dewes [1921] 2 A.C. 158; below, p.456.

<sup>14</sup> Marion White Ltd v Francis [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1423.

<sup>15</sup> C W Plowman & Son Ltd v Ash [1964] 1 W.L.R. 568; and see pp.458–459 below.

<sup>16</sup> [1964] Ch. 413; cf. Greig v Insole [1978] 1 W.L.R. 302.

<sup>17</sup> See further p.467 n.6, below.

<sup>18</sup> A player could be “retained” by giving him notice and paying him a reasonable wage (determined, in case of dispute, by the Football Association).

<sup>19</sup> Eastham v Newcastle United Football Club Ltd, above, at p.432.

<sup>20</sup> For this practice, see Higgs v Olivier [1951] Ch. 899; cf. Vaughan-Neil v IRC [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1283 (covenant by a barrister, on becoming an employee of a company, not to practise at the Bar).

<sup>21</sup> See below, pp.465, 470.

modify the strict insistence on the need for a "proprietary" interest in cases between vendor and purchaser, and between employer and employee.

(iii) Doubtful cases. The distinction between vendor-purchaser and employer-employee covenants is by no means exhaustive. Thus a covenant by a retiring doctor or solicitor not to compete with his former partners does not fall precisely into either category<sup>22</sup>; but the courts do not subject it to the strict tests of validity that they apply to employer-employee covenants.<sup>23</sup> Again, a person may sell his business to a company of which he then becomes managing director. It seems that a covenant by such a person not to compete should be treated in the same way as a vendor-purchaser covenant, whether it is contained in the sale agreement or in the service agreement<sup>24</sup> or in both.<sup>25</sup> On the other hand, a covenant by a writer or composer not to dispose of his work except to a particular publisher may for present purposes be treated in the same way as an employer-employee covenant, even though there was never any contract of employment between the parties.<sup>26</sup>

(b) REASONABLENESS. A restraint is valid only if it goes no further than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the covenantee's interest. Reasonableness is determined by looking at the relationship between that interest and the covenant.<sup>27</sup>

(i) Area of restraint. To be reasonable, the restraint need not be precisely co-terminous with the interest.<sup>28</sup> If there were such a requirement, there would be little point in taking a covenant, since a "proprietary interest" is (by definition) protected even in the absence of a covenant.<sup>29</sup> So long as the employer has trade secrets he can take a covenant which to some extent prevents the employee from using his own skill by restraining him from working in competition with the employer. And an employer who has a "proprietary" interest in his relations with clients or customers can restrain his employee from working in the area in which those clients or customers live, even though most of the inhabitants of the area have never dealt with the employer.<sup>30</sup> Such restraints may be necessary for the protection of the employer as the actual infringement of his proprietary interests could be very hard to establish: in particular it would, if the employee were allowed to work for a competitor, be hard to tell whether he was disclosing trade secrets.<sup>31</sup> The covenant may, moreover, be enforced even though the "proprietary interest" infringed is of little value to the employer. Thus a former employee can be restrained from dealing with a client who has decided to deal with the ex-employee, rather than with the

<sup>22</sup> Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705 at 714.

<sup>23</sup> Whitehill v Bradford [1952] Ch. 236; Kerr v Morris [1986] 3 All E.R. 217; Espley v Williams [1997] 1 F.G.J.R. 9; cf. Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Rush [1996] F.S.R. 114 and Convenience Co Ltd v Roberts [2001] F.S.R. 35 (covenants in franchise agreements); contra, Jenkins v Reid [1948] 1 All E.R. 471—but the defendant's covenant seems to have been "in gross".

<sup>24</sup> See Silverman Ltd v Silverman, The Times, July 7, 1969. cf. Blake v Blake (1967) 111 S.J. 715 (restraints imposed, on dissolution of a company, on its major shareholders: these were treated in the same way as vendor-purchaser covenants); Allied Dunbar (Frank Weisinger) Ltd v Frank Weisinger [1988] I.R.L.R. 60; Alliance Property Group plc v Prestwich [1995] I.R.L.R. 25; Damney Day & Co v D'Alphen [1997] I.R.L.R. 442 (so far as it relates to the service agreement).

<sup>25</sup> T & C Europe (UK) Ltd v Massey [1999] I.R.L.R. 22 at 26.

<sup>26</sup> See A. Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308.

<sup>27</sup> Allied Dunbar (Frank Weisinger) Ltd v Frank Weisinger [1988] I.R.L.R. 60, at 65.

<sup>28</sup> cf. Systems Reliability Holdings v Smith [1990] I.R.L.R. 377 at 384; Marshall v NM Financial Management Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1527 at 1533.

<sup>29</sup> See above, pp.454, 455.

<sup>30</sup> Fitch v Dewes [1921] 2 A.C. 158; Scorer v Seymour-Johns [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1419; contrast Fellowes v Fisher [1976] Q.B. 122.

<sup>31</sup> Poly Lina Ltd v Finch [1995] F.S.R. 751; cf. Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Rush [1996] F.S.R. 114 (franchise agreement).

employer, since it is precisely this type of competition “against which the covenant is designed to give protection”.<sup>32</sup>

On the other hand, such “area covenants” may operate to some extent as pure restraints on competition; and in a number of cases<sup>33</sup> the courts have distinguished them from “solicitation covenants” (against soliciting the employer’s old clients or customers). On the facts of those cases the courts have held or said that only “solicitation covenants” would be regarded as reasonable. The cases do not absolutely rule out the possibility that an “area covenant” may be valid between employer and employee<sup>34</sup>; but such a covenant will be void if it covers a much larger area than is needed for the protection of the employer’s interest. Thus in Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co Ltd,<sup>35</sup> a canvasser who was employed to sell clothes in Islington covenanted not to enter into similar business within 25 miles of London. The covenant was held void because the area of the restraint was about 1,000 times as large as that in which the canvasser had been employed. It was said that the employer could have protected himself by a covenant restricted to the area in which the canvasser had worked. But if that area is very large and the employee has only dealt with a small number of customers within it, an area covenant will not,<sup>36</sup> though a solicitation covenant might,<sup>37</sup> be upheld.

Between vendor and purchaser (and in analogous cases<sup>38</sup>) area covenants are commonly enforced; and a restraint may be reasonable even though it is unlimited as to area. In the Nordenfelt case<sup>39</sup> such a restraint was enforced against the vendor of an armaments business since that business extended over the whole world; and where an employer is entitled to protect trade secrets of a business which has no clear geographical limits, a covenant which is unlimited as to area may similarly be enforced against the employee.<sup>40</sup> A “solicitation covenant” in a contract of employment may likewise be enforced though it contains no express limitations as to area,<sup>41</sup> particularly if it is limited to customers with whom the employee came into contact in the course of his employment<sup>42</sup>; but such a limitation is not essential to the validity of the covenant.<sup>43</sup> A worldwide restraint against disclosing confidential information is unlikely to be upheld

<sup>32</sup> John Michael Design plc v Cooke [1987] I.C.R. 445 at 446.

<sup>33</sup> S W Strange Ltd v Mann [1965] 1 W.L.R. 629; Macfarlane v Kent [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1019 at 1024 (doubted on another point in Peyton v Mindham [1972] 1 W.L.R. 8); Gledhow Autoparts Ltd v Delaney [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1366; T Lucas & Co Ltd v Mitchell [1974] Ch. 129; Stenhouse Australia Ltd v Phillips [1974] A.C. 391; Spafax v Harrison [1980] I.R.L.R. 442; Dairy Crest Ltd v Pigott [1989] I.C.R. 92; cf. Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705 (solicitation covenant in partnership agreement between solicitors upheld); Hanover Insurance Brokers v Shapiro [1994] I.R.L.R. 82.

<sup>34</sup> e.g. Anscombe & Ringland v Butchoff (1984) 134 N.I.J. 37.

<sup>35</sup> [1913] A.C. 724; cf. Empire Meat Co Ltd v Patrick [1939] 2 All E.R. 85; Spencer v Marchington [1988] I.R.L.R. 392; Office Angels Ltd v Rainer-Thomas [1991] I.R.L.R. 214; for conflicting dicta in a borderline case, see Lyne-Pirkis v Jones [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1293.

<sup>36</sup> Marley Tile Co Ltd v Johnson [1982] I.R.L.R. 75.

<sup>37</sup> Gledhow Autoparts Ltd v Delaney [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1366. Contrast Office Angels Ltd v Rainer-Thomas, above, n.35 and Laphorne v Eurofi Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 999; [2001] U.K.C.L.R. 999.

<sup>38</sup> e.g. Kerr v Morris, [1987] Ch. 90; cf. Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Bell [1994] F.S.R. 674 (franchisee); Alliance Property Group plc v Prestwich [1996] I.R.L.R. 25.

<sup>39</sup> [1894] A.C. 535; cf. Systems Reliability Holdings v Smith [1990] I.R.L.R. 377 at 382; Dawney Day & Co v D’Alphen [1997] I.R.L.R. 442. Contrast Convenience Co Ltd v Roberts [2001] F.S.R. 35 (one-year covenant in franchise agreement not to compete in UK too wide in area).

<sup>40</sup> Poly Lina Ltd v Finch [1995] F.S.R. 751.

<sup>41</sup> G W Plowman & Son Ltd v Ash [1964] 1 W.L.R. 568; cf. Morris Angel & Son Ltd v Hollande [1993] I.C.R. 71.

<sup>42</sup> As in Stenhouse Australia Ltd v Phillips [1974] A.C. 391; contrast Austin Knight (UK) v Hinds [1994] F.S.R. 52 (covenant invalid as not so limited).

<sup>43</sup> Plowman & Son Ltd v Ash, above n.41.

if the information in question relates only to business done by the employer in a limited geographical area (e.g. to customers in one country).<sup>44</sup>

(ii) Duration of the restraint. The question whether a restraint is invalid for excessive duration depends on the nature of the business to be protected. If it is one to which customers or clients are likely to resort for a long time, a restraint for the lifetime of the covenantor may be valid. Thus in Fitch v Dewes<sup>45</sup> a lifelong restraint on a solicitor's managing clerk not to practise within seven miles of his principal's office was upheld. But in view of the more recently developed distinction between "area" and "solicitation" covenants, it is unlikely that a lifelong restraint in an "area" covenant would now be regarded as valid.<sup>46</sup> A more lenient view was taken of a "solicitation" covenant for a fixed period in Bridge v Deacons<sup>47</sup>: the Privy Council there upheld a covenant by a partner in a firm of solicitors not to act as solicitor in Hong Kong for any client of the firm for five years after ceasing to be a partner; and a one year "area" covenant operating within a 10-mile radius has likewise been enforced against an assistant solicitor.<sup>48</sup> Where the business to be protected is of a more fluctuating nature, long restraints are unlikely to be upheld whether they are contained in "area" or in "solicitation" covenants.<sup>49</sup> A maximum duration of two years is prescribed by legislation in the case of a restraint on a "commercial agent".<sup>50</sup>

An employee's covenant not to disclose confidential information relating to the employer need not be limited as to time: such a covenant has, for example, been upheld where an employee of the Royal Household undertook that he would not either during or after service disclose information concerning any member of the Royal Family (and certain other persons) without written authority.<sup>51</sup> Such a limited restraint does not prevent the former employee from working for others, and is therefore not objectionable on grounds of public policy.

(iii) Scope of restraint. A restraint must not extend to an activity which is irrelevant to the interest to be protected. Thus a restraint in a tailor's service contract against working as a hatter is unreasonable.<sup>52</sup> Nor can an employer use his proprietary interest in trade secrets and confidential information to support a covenant restraining an employee from disclosing any information whatsoever "relating to the company [i.e. the employer] or its customers of which [the employee] becomes possessed while acting as sales director"<sup>53</sup>; for much information of this kind will have nothing to do with the employer's proprietary interest.

(iv) Drafting problems. So long as there is an interest meriting protection, some restraint can be validly imposed, but the draftsman may, by drawing the restraint too widely, wholly fail to achieve his purpose.<sup>54</sup> An attempt to evade this difficulty was made in Davies v Davies,<sup>55</sup> where the covenant simply restrained competition "so far as the law

<sup>44</sup> Lansing Linde Ltd v Kerr [1991] 1 W.L.R. 251 at 259.

<sup>45</sup> [1921] 2 A.C. 158.

<sup>46</sup> See Fellows v Fisher [1976] Q.B. 122.

<sup>47</sup> [1984] A.C. 705; the suggestion made ibid. at 717 that a covenant which is otherwise reasonable will not be struck down "solely because of its duration" is, with respect, hard to reconcile with Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269 (below, p.469), so far as that case related to the 21-year tie; and with Eastes v Russ [1914] 1 Ch. 468. See further Spowart-Taylor and Hough, 47 M.L.R. 745.

<sup>48</sup> Hollis & Co v Stocks [2000] U.K.C.I.L.R. 685.

<sup>49</sup> e.g., M & S Drapers v Reynolds [1957] 1 W.L.R. 9; cf. Eastes v Russ [1914] 1 Ch. 468.

<sup>50</sup> See below, p.709; SI 1993/3053, reg.20(2).

<sup>51</sup> Attorney-General v Barker [1990] 3 All E.R. 257.

<sup>52</sup> Atwood v Lamont [1920] 3 K.B. 571; cf. Scully UK Ltd v Lee [1998] I.R.L.R. 259.

<sup>53</sup> Lawrence David v Ashton [1989] I.C.R. 123; cf. Intelec Systems Ltd v Grech-Cini [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1190.

<sup>54</sup> cf. below, p.508.

<sup>55</sup> (1887) 36 Ch.D. 359.

allows"; but this was held void for uncertainty. The draftsman is therefore forced to use more precise language and this may, if taken literally, impose an excessive restraint even though the parties may not have intended that meaning. For example, in Lyne-Pirkis v Jones<sup>56</sup> a covenant in a partnership agreement between doctors in general practice provided that a retiring partner should not (within certain limits of time and space) "engage in medical practice". The court here refused to construe these words so as to refer only to general practice and held the covenant invalid as it prohibited practice even as a consultant. On the other hand, in Home Counties Dairies Ltd v Skilton<sup>57</sup> a covenant in a milk roundsman's contract provided that he should not serve or sell "milk or dairy produce". It was argued that this would prevent him from serving cheese as a grocer's assistant, but the court refused to invalidate the covenant as the parties clearly did not intend it to bear this meaning. A similar approach was adopted in Rock Refrigeration Ltd v Jones<sup>58</sup> where a sales director's contract of employment contained a covenant which was to take effect on termination of the contract "however occasioned". The contract was in fact terminated as a result of his resignation; but he argued that the words just quoted made the covenant unreasonable as they would also cover the case in which termination occurred as a result of his wrongful dismissal.<sup>59</sup> The argument was rejected, the majority of the Court of Appeal taking the view that the covenant would not as a matter of law operate in such a case since the effect of the employee's acceptance of the employer's repudiation would be to release the employee from further performance of the covenant.<sup>60</sup>

(v) Reasonableness and fairness. The law of restraint of trade has long recognised two principles: that adequacy of consideration is relevant to the validity of a restraint<sup>61</sup> and that the law has regard to the relative bargaining strengths of the parties.<sup>62</sup> This does not mean that a restraint is invalid merely because it was undertaken by the weaker party; for the transaction may be a perfectly fair one, having regard to the benefits obtained by that party under it.<sup>63</sup> It is only where the stronger party makes unconscionable use of his superior bargaining power that the resulting bargain may be struck down on account of its unfairness.<sup>64</sup> To this extent, the fairness of the bargain is a necessary condition of the

<sup>56</sup> [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1293; cf. Peyton v Mindham [1972] 1 W.L.R. 8; J.A. Mont (UK) Ltd v Mills [1993] I.R.I.R. 172.

<sup>57</sup> [1970] 1 W.L.R. 526; cf. G.W. Plowman Ltd v Ash [1964] 1 W.L.R. 568; Marion White Ltd v Francis [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1423; The Littlewoods Organisation Ltd v Harris [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1472; (doubting Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1961] 1 Q.B. 623 on the issue of construction); Edwards v Worboys [1984] A.C. 724, note; Clarke v Newland [1991] 1 All E.R. 397; Alliance Paper Group v Prestwich [1996] I.R.I.R. 25; International Consulting Services (UK) Ltd v Hart [2000] R.I.R. 227; Hollis & Co v Stocks [2000] U.K.C.I.R. 685; Turner v Commonwealth Minerals Ltd [2000] I.R.I.R. 114.

<sup>58</sup> [1997] I.C.R. 938; cf. also Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Rush [1996] F.S.R. 114.

<sup>59</sup> For the invalidity of a covenant operating in such circumstances, see D v M [1996] I.R.I.R. 192.

<sup>60</sup> On the principle of General Billposting Co Ltd v Atkinson [1909] A.C. 118, below p.849; Phillips L.J. based the same conclusion on the different ground that the possibility of the employer's repudiating the contract was no more than a "remote" one (at 960).

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.453.

<sup>62</sup> See above, p.456.

<sup>63</sup> Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173; this case, and those cited in the next note, were concerned with the type of restraint discussed below, pp.468-472.

<sup>64</sup> A Schroeder Music Publishing Co v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1315-1316 (where Lord Diplock did not distinguish between unfairness and unconscionability); Clifford Davis Management Ltd v WEA Records Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 61; Silverstone Records v Mountfield [1993] E.M.L.R. 152. Quaere whether it is up to the stronger party to establish the fairness of the restraint (below, pp.466-467) or to the weaker party to establish its unfairness. The latter view perhaps derives some support from the comparison in Barclays Bank plc v Caplan [1998] F.L.R. 532 at 546 of restraint of trade with undue influence cases, in which the party seeking to impugn the transaction must establish either actual undue influence (above, p.408) or the basic facts of the presumption of undue influence (above, p.410).

validity of the restraint; but it is submitted that it is not a sufficient condition. It has indeed been said that a restraint cannot be unreasonable if the parties have freely agreed to it<sup>65</sup> or if it is to their mutual advantage. This is true in the sense that the agreement of the parties may determine how much the covenantee has bought, and hence how much he can protect. But once the interest has been defined, the restraint will be upheld only if it is necessary for the protection of that interest.<sup>66</sup> This will generally depend on the relation between the restraint and the interest.<sup>67</sup> A world-wide restraint in a contract for the sale of a village shop would not satisfy this test however much both parties wanted to enter into it and even if the buyer had paid a greatly enhanced price to secure the restraint. The same point can be made in relation to a partnership agreement. Thus in Bridge v Deacons one factor emphasised by the Privy Council was “the mutuality of the contract”, by which the five-year restraint “applied equally to all partners”.<sup>68</sup> But while this was relevant to the validity of a five year solicitation covenant it would not, it is submitted, have justified a life-time area covenant covering the whole of Hong Kong since that would have been wholly disproportionate to the interest recognised as meriting protection. The rule that the restraint must not go further than necessary for the protection of the recognised interest of the covenantee is one of public policy and accordingly cannot be excluded merely by the agreement of the parties.

(c) PUBLIC INTEREST. In one sense, the requirement of reasonableness can be said to raise issues of public interest. But even if the restraint is “reasonable” in relation to the interest which the covenantee is entitled to protect, it may still be invalid if it is likely to prejudice the public. Many dicta state this rule,<sup>69</sup> but there is little direct authority to support it. In Wyatt v Kreglinger & Fernau<sup>70</sup> the employers of a wool broker promised to pay him a pension on his retirement provided that he did not re-enter the wool trade and did nothing to their detriment (fair business competition excepted). Nine years later the Court of Appeal rejected his claim for arrears of pension. Three reasons can be found in the judgments: that the employers’ promise to pay the pension was simply a gratuitous promise; that the stipulation against competition was void because it was unreasonable; and that the stipulation against competition was void because it was contrary to the public interest. The view that a restraint imposed on an elderly wool broker at the time of his retirement was likely to injure the public may be regarded with some scepticism,<sup>71</sup> especially in view of the countervailing public interest of encouraging young recruits to the profession.<sup>72</sup> Reaction against it has gone so far that it has sometimes been said that public interest was not an independent ground of invalidity at all.<sup>73</sup> But Wyatt’s case was followed in a later similar case<sup>74</sup>; and it is arguable that a

<sup>65</sup> NW Salt Co v Electrolytic Alkali Co Ltd [1914] A.C. 461 at 471; English Hop Growers Ltd v Dering [1928] 2 K.B. 174 at 185. cf. World Wide Fund for Nature v World Wrestling Federation [2002] EWCA Civ 196; [2002] U.K.C.I.R. 388, at [42], as to which see further below, p.464.

<sup>66</sup> cf. A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay, above at 1316 (“reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of the promisee.”).

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.458; Allied Dunbar (Frank Weisinger) Ltd v Frank Weisinger [1988] I.R.L.R. 60 at 65.

<sup>68</sup> [1984] A.C. 705 at 716.

<sup>69</sup> e.g. Attorney-General for Australia v Adelaide SS Co [1913] A.C. 781 at 796; Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] A.C. 688 at 700; McEllistrim’s Case [1919] A.C. 548 at 562. Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705 at 713; cf. Kerr v Morris [1987] Ch. 90, where the covenant was admitted to be reasonable in area and duration and public interest was discussed as a separate issue.

<sup>70</sup> [1933] 1 K.B. 793.

<sup>71</sup> 49 L.Q.R. 465.

<sup>72</sup> cf. Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705 at 718.

<sup>73</sup> Routh v Jones [1947] 1 All E.R. 179 at 182; cf. Systems Reliability Holdings v Smith [1990] I.R.L.R. 377 at 382; but at p.384 reasonableness and public interest are stated as separate requirements of validity.

<sup>74</sup> Bull v Pitney-Bowes Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 273; Koh, 30 M.L.R. 587.

restraint on persons whose services are in short supply may be contrary to the public interest, even though it is reasonable in relation to the interest which the covenantee is entitled to protect.<sup>74a</sup> This argument is not, it is submitted, inconsistent with cases holding that it was not contrary to the public interest to restrain a solicitor from acting for a particular client or group of clients merely because of the fiduciary relationship between solicitor and client.<sup>75</sup> For the present purpose, the decisive factor is not the nature of the services but the availability of alternative sources of supply: the public interest lies in their general availability and not in their being rendered by a particular individual. Thus a restraint on a former partner in a general medical practice would not be invalid merely because patients wished to continue to be treated by that partner,<sup>76</sup> but such restraint might be contrary to the public interest if there was a shortage of doctors in the area in question.

The principle of public interest may, equally, apply to covenants for the sale of a business. In the Nordenfellt<sup>77</sup> case it was said that, as the business sold was a foreign one, a restraint on the vendor would not injure "the public policy of this country"; and more recently the promotion of export sales has been mentioned as a head of public interest.<sup>78</sup> The principle of public interest has, moreover, become increasingly important in relation to other categories of contracts in restraint of trade<sup>79</sup>; and it now seems to be clear that it can be an independent ground of invalidity.

In the common law relating to restraint of trade, the "public interest" refers to legally recognised interests, and in particular to the interest of the public that a person should not be subjected to unreasonable restrictions on his freedom to work or trade. An agreement is unlikely to be invalidated by a common law court because it is alleged to infringe some wider public interest, e.g. because it might lead to an improper allocation of economic resources, or prove inflationary. Such allegations often lack precision, and courts of law are not well equipped to evaluate them.<sup>80</sup>

(d) NO ACTUAL COVENANT AGAINST COMPETITION. The restraint of trade doctrine may apply where the terms of the contract provide a party with a financial incentive not to compete, even though he makes no actual promise not to do so: this was the position in Waytt v Kreglinger & Fernau where the employee made no promise not to compete, but his right to his pension was conditional on his not doing so.<sup>81</sup> Similarly, in Stenhouse Australia Ltd v Phillips<sup>82</sup> the defendant undertook to pay to his former employers half the gross commission which he might receive in respect of business done with their clients. This was held to be in restraint of trade (though there was no covenant) since it was "in effect . . . likely to cause the employee to refuse business which otherwise he

<sup>74a</sup> cf. Dranez Anstalt v Hayetz [2002] EWCA Civ at [25].

<sup>75</sup> Edwards v Worbys [1984] A.C. 724, n.; Bridge v Deacons [1984] A.C. 705 at 720; disapproving contrary dicta in Oswald Hickson Collier & Co v Carter-Ruck [1984] A.C. 720, n.

<sup>76</sup> Kerr v Morris [1987] Ch. 90, overruling Hensman v Traill (1980) 124 S.J. 776.

<sup>77</sup> [1894] A.C. 535 at 550; cf. ibid. 574.

<sup>78</sup> Bull v Pitney-Bowes Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 273 at 276.

<sup>79</sup> See below, pp.471–472.

<sup>80</sup> Texaco Ltd v Mulberry Filling Station Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 814, 827, a case concerned with the type of restraint discussed at 468–472, below; contrast Bull v Pitney-Bowes Ltd, above, n.74.

<sup>81</sup> [1933] 1 K.B. 793, per Scrutton and Slesser L.J.; Greer L.J. interpreted the correspondence to mean that there was a covenant not to compete. cf. Sadler v Imperial Life Assurance of Canada [1988] 1 R.L.R. 388, where the stipulation by the agent not to compete after the end of his agency was similarly not a promise but his entitlement to future commissions was conditional on his not doing so. This was also the position in Marshall v NM Financial Management Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1527 at 1533.

<sup>82</sup> [1974] A.C. 391.

would take . . . ”<sup>83</sup> On the other hand in Alder v Moore<sup>84</sup> a professional footballer was paid £500 for “permanent total disability”. He made a “declaration” not to play professional football again “and in the event of infringing this condition I will be subject to a penalty of £500”. He did infringe the “condition” and a majority of the Court of Appeal held that he was liable to repay the £500. The sole question discussed was whether the stipulation to repay was a penalty<sup>85</sup>; and no reference was made to the restraint of trade doctrine. Prima facie, the stipulation appears to fall within that doctrine, though it may have been perfectly reasonable and not contrary to the public interest.

(e) RESTRAINT OPERATING DURING EMPLOYMENT: In the employment cases so far discussed, the issue has been as to the validity of covenants operating after the end of the period of service. Restrictions on competition during that period are normally valid,<sup>86</sup> and indeed may be implied by law by virtue of the servant’s duty of fidelity.<sup>87</sup> In such cases the restriction is generally reasonable, having regard to the interests of the employer, and does not cause any undue hardship to the employee, who will receive a wage or salary for the period in question. But the contract may be a long-term one, and the main purpose of the restraint may be, not to secure faithful service, but to protect the employer from competition by sterilising the employee’s working capacity. In such a case the restraint may be invalid even though it operates only during the period in which the employee can be required to serve,<sup>88</sup> and even if it is valid, the court may refuse the remedy of an injunction to the employer.<sup>89</sup>

(f) ESTABLISHING VALIDITY OF RESTRAINT: The reasonableness of the restraint must be established by the person who seeks to enforce the contract; it is then up to the party resisting enforcement to establish that the restraint is contrary to the public interest.<sup>90</sup> Thus in the normal case, in which the covenantee sues to enforce the restraint, he must establish its reasonableness and the covenantor its tendency to injure the public. But where, as in Wyatt v Kreglinger & Fernau<sup>91</sup> the action is brought by the covenantor to enforce the promise for which the restraint constitutes the consideration, the roles are reversed: the person under the restraint must show that it is reasonable and the other party that it is contrary to the public interest. It has further been held that where a stipulation in restraint of trade is contained in an agreement for the settlement of a genuine dispute relating to intellectual property rights, then it is not up to the party seeking to enforce the settlement to show that it is “reasonable”.<sup>92</sup> The public policy against restraint of trade here appears to come into conflict with that in favour of bona

<sup>83</sup> ibid. at 402–403.

<sup>84</sup> [1961] 2 Q.B. 57.

<sup>85</sup> See below, p.1004.

<sup>86</sup> cf. GFI Group v Eaglestone, The Times, October 29, 1993; Credit Suisse Asset Management Ltd v Armstrong [1996] I.C.R. 882 covenant operating during “garden leave” (below, p.833) valid; but see below at n.89.

<sup>87</sup> See above, p.206. Faccenda Chicken Ltd v Fowler [1987] Ch. 117 at 135–136; cf. Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 588; Provident Financial Group plc v Hayward [1989] I.C.R. 160.

<sup>88</sup> cf. A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308; Clifford Davis Management Ltd v WEA Records [1975] 1 W.L.R. 61; Zang Tumb Tuum Records v Johnson [1993] E.M.L.R. 61; Silverstone Records v Mountfield [1993] E.M.L.R. 152. Contrast Greig v Insole [1978] 1 W.L.R. 302 at 326; Panayiotou v Sony Music Entertainment (UK) Ltd, The Times, June 30, 1994.

<sup>89</sup> William Hill Organisation Ltd v Tucker [1998] I.R.L.R. 313; Symbian Ltd v Christenson [2001] I.R.L.R. 37; below, p.1045.

<sup>90</sup> See Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] A.C. 589 at 700, 706–707; Attwood v Lamont [1920] 3 K.B. 571 at 587–588; Kores v Kolok Manufacturing Co Ltd [1959] Ch. 108 at 120.

<sup>91</sup> [1933] 1 K.B. 793; above, p.461.

<sup>92</sup> World Wide Fund for Nature v World Wrestling Foundation [2002] EWCA Civ 196; [2002] U.K.C.L.R. 388 at [42].

fide compromises and the latter prevails so that it is up to the party resisting enforcement of the compromise to show that there was no genuine dispute or claim. It seems that "reasonableness" here refers to the genuineness of the underlying dispute<sup>93</sup>; and this is a different issue from the "reasonableness" which is a requirement of the validity of covenants in restraint of trade.<sup>94</sup>

The questions of reasonableness and public interest are questions of law<sup>95</sup> so that it is strictly inaccurate to say that the party claiming enforcement has the onus of proving that the covenant is reasonable. What he must do is to prove the circumstances from which the court may conclude that the ratio between the restraint and the interest is reasonable.<sup>96</sup> The same principle applies to the question of public interest.

(2) Restrictive trading and similar agreements

Agreements between suppliers of goods or services restricting competition between them are at common law<sup>97</sup> subject to the restraint of trade doctrine, so that they are prima facie void, but valid if reasonable and not contrary to the public interest. They also give rise to a number of special problems.

(a) THE INTEREST. In McEllistrim's case Lord Birkenhead said that "in this class of case the covenantee is not entitled to be protected against competition per se".<sup>98</sup> But he evidently regarded "stability in their lists of customers"<sup>99</sup> as an interest which producers were entitled to protect; and it is not clear how this differs from protection against "competition per se". It seems that in this group of cases, as in another to be discussed below,<sup>1</sup> a "commercial" as opposed to a "proprietary" interest<sup>2</sup> may support a covenant.

(b) CONDITIONS OF VALIDITY. The broad definition of the interest meriting protection by agreements of the present kind made it relatively easier to establish their validity than that of restraints between vendor and purchaser or between employer and employee. In English Hop Growers v Dering,<sup>3</sup> for example, the court upheld an agreement by which hop growers undertook to deliver their crops to a central selling agency in order to avoid cut-throat competition at a time when it was feared that there would be a glut of hops on the market. But even agreements of this kind were held invalid if they were plainly unreasonable or contrary to the public interest: for example, where the effect of the agreement was to force one of the parties to close down his business altogether.<sup>4</sup> Similarly, in McEllistrim's case<sup>5</sup> an association of farmers in Ireland promised to buy all the milk produced by its members in its area; and the members in turn promised not to sell milk there produced by them to anyone except the association. The agreement was held invalid because it provided that no farmer could withdraw without the consent of the committee of the association, and this consent could be arbitrarily withheld. But for this factor, it seems that the agreement would have been valid.

<sup>93</sup> cf. above, pp.89–90.

<sup>94</sup> This difference may account for the fact that none of the authorities cited at nn.90 and 94 above is referred to in the World Wide case, above n.92.

<sup>95</sup> Dowden & Pook Ltd v Pook [1904] 1 K.B. 45.

<sup>96</sup> Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 A.C. 688 at 707 ("no question of onus either way").

<sup>97</sup> For the effect of competition law on some such agreements, see below, pp.475–477.

<sup>98</sup> [1919] A.C. 548 at 564.

<sup>99</sup> ibid.

<sup>1</sup> i.e. at p.470, below.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.454.

<sup>3</sup> [1928] 2 K.B. 174; cf. NW Salt Co v Electrolytic Alkali Co Ltd [1914] A.C. 461.

<sup>4</sup> cf. Joseph Evans & Co v Heathcote [1918] 1 K.B. 418.

<sup>5</sup> [1919] A.C. 548; see also Collins v Locke (1879) 4 App.Cas. 674.

(c) HARDSHIP TO A PARTICULAR GROUP. An agreement may cause hardship to a particular group of persons, without being contrary to the interests of the public at large. In Kores Manufacturing Co Ltd v Kolok Manufacturing Co Ltd<sup>6</sup> two manufacturers of carbon paper and typewriter ribbons agreed not to employ each others' former employees for five years after they had left their original employer. The Court of Appeal held that, although the parties were entitled to protect their trade secrets, the covenant was invalid, as it covered all employees, whether they knew trade secrets or not, and as it was of excessive duration. It was further argued that the parties were entitled to protect their labour supplies, but the court doubted whether "labour supplies" were an interest meriting protection. If they were, employers could, by contracting with each other, achieve what they could not do by contracting directly with the employees themselves. An undertaking by an employee not to work for another employer would be invalid for lack of a proper interest<sup>7</sup> if he knew no trade secrets and had no influence over customers. The same principle should apply where the restraint was contained in a contract between employers and indirectly prejudiced their employees' opportunities of finding work.<sup>8</sup> It seems that the court can take hardship to third parties into account and hold that it invalidates a contract of this kind by making it contrary to the public interest,<sup>9</sup> so that a covenant by which A promised B not to employ or to offer to employ B's employees would be invalid<sup>10</sup> (though one by which A merely promised "not to solicit or entice away" B's employees could be upheld since it would not preclude A from employing them if they came to him of their own accord).<sup>11</sup>

(d) REMEDIES OF THIRD PARTIES. Reasoning of the kind just considered can help a third party only where one of the parties to the agreement has challenged its validity. In practice, these restrictive agreements were rarely broken, because they were usually beneficial to the contracting parties, however much third parties might suffer from them; and at common law the contracting parties are at liberty to give effect to the agreement.<sup>12</sup> If they did so, the third parties could not claim damages for conspiracy at common law<sup>13</sup>; and it used to be thought that they had no standing at all to challenge such agreements. But in Eastham v Newcastle United Football Club Ltd<sup>14</sup> a professional footballer sought a declaration that the "retain and transfer" system was invalid. The remedy was granted, not only against his club, but also against the Football Association and the Football League, with whom the plaintiff had never been in any contractual relationship; and it was said to be available "whether or not the plaintiff has a legal cause of action against the defendants".<sup>15</sup> The weakness of this remedy by way of declaration is that it has no

<sup>6</sup> [1959] Ch. 108; cf. Mineral Water, etc. Trade Protection Soc v Booth (1887) 36 Ch.D. 465; Sales, 104 L.Q.R. 600.

<sup>7</sup> See above, p.456.

<sup>8</sup> See TSC Europe (UK) Ltd v Massey [1999] I.R.L.R. 22 at 29; cf. below, at n.16.

<sup>9</sup> See Esso Petroleum Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269 at 300, 319.

<sup>10</sup> Hanover Insurance Brokers v Shapiro [1994] I.R.L.R. 82; Dannay Day & Co Ltd v D'Alphen [1997] I.R.L.R. 442, so far as it relates to clause 12.1.2 of the service contract: see [1997] I.R.L.R. 285, 296 (contrast Alliance Paper Group plc v Prestwich [1996] I.R.L.R. 25, where the "no poaching" covenant referred only to senior employees).

<sup>11</sup> See the Dannay Day case, above [1997] I.R.L.R. 442 at 448 so far as it relates to clause 12.1.1. of the contract.

<sup>12</sup> Boddington v Lawton [1994] I.C.R. 478.

<sup>13</sup> Mogul S.S. Co v McGregor, Gow & Co [1892] A.C. 25 at 39, 42, 46, 51, 57, 58.

<sup>14</sup> [1964] Ch. 413; above, p.457; cf. Greig v Insole [1978] 1 W.L.R. 302; Newport Association Football Club Ltd v Football Association of Wales Ltd [1995] 2 All E.R. 87. The system has been held to contravene Art.48 (now Art.39) of the European Community Treaty (below, p.477): Union Royale Belge des Sociétés de Football Association ASBL v Bosman [1996] All E.R. (E.C.) 97.

<sup>15</sup> [1964] Ch. 413 at 426; cf. R v Jockey Club, Ex p. RAM Rucecourses [1993] 2 All E.R. 225, 243.

coercive effect: it would not prevent the parties to the invalid agreement from continuing to act in accordance with it. The declaration could help the third party only by giving one of the contracting parties grounds for thinking that he could break the agreement with impunity if it suited him to do so.

Sometimes a third party may, even at common law, have a more effective remedy. There is some support for the view that a person can obtain an injunction against a professional association to restrain it from applying a rule under which he is excluded from membership, and so prevented from exercising the profession,<sup>16</sup> on grounds not relevant to his capacity to do so.<sup>17</sup> Whether such a remedy is available in cases of this kind to a plaintiff who has no "cause of action against the defendants"<sup>18</sup> is, however, open to doubt,<sup>19</sup> for normally an injunction will be granted only where there is such a cause of action.<sup>20</sup> In one case<sup>21</sup> it was held that this requirement was satisfied where football clubs claimed a declaration that a resolution passed by an association from which they had resigned was in restraint of trade. The mere availability of a declaration was said to be a "cause of action", so that an interlocutory injunction could be granted to the clubs to restrain the association from acting on the resolution until the action for a declaration came to trial. This conclusion is, however, hard to reconcile with that part of the reasoning of the Eastham case (quoted above<sup>22</sup>) which assumes that a declaration is available even though the plaintiff has no cause of action against the third party. The possibility of the third party's obtaining injunctive relief appears, in any event, to be restricted to cases in which the right to work (or perhaps the right to trade<sup>23</sup>) is arbitrarily restricted by a contract between others. It seems unlikely that a buyer of goods or services could at common law get an injunction against a price-ring merely because it operated to his prejudice.

(3) Trade unions and employers' associations

At common law the validity of the rules of a trade union depended nominally on the principles which governed other contracts in restraint of trade. But in practice there was at one time a strong judicial tendency to hold such rules illegal. The courts relied in particular on the fact that the rules of a trade union might require an employee to stop work against his will; and they were no doubt also influenced by the fear that they might be called on to enforce a strike by injunction. The common law position was changed by legislation as long ago as 1871<sup>24</sup>; and the matter is now dealt with by the Trade Union

<sup>16</sup> The rule would not be contrary to public policy unless it had this effect: cf. Cheall v. APEX [1983] 2 A.C. 180 at 191 (expulsion from a trade union).

<sup>17</sup> See Nagle v. Feilden [1966] 2 Q.B. 633; A.I.L.G. (1966) 82 L.Q.R. 319; Rideout, (1966) 29 M.L.R. 424. That case concerned discrimination now unlawful under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975; but the same principle might now apply to (for example) discrimination on religious or political grounds; or if there has been a denial of "natural justice": see McInnes v. Omslow-Fane [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1520 (where there was no such denial). In R. v. Jockey Club, Ex p. RAM Racecourses Ltd [1993] 2 All E.R. 225 at 247–248 it was suggested that the more appropriate remedy would be by way of judicial review; but this suggestion was doubted in R. v. Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, Ex p. Aga Khan [1993] 1 W.L.R. 909 at 933 as there was no sufficient "public law" element in cases of the kind here under discussion. Freedom of religion is protected by Human Rights Act 1998, Sch.1, Pt 1, Art.9, but this provision would make unlawful only the acts of a "public authority": s.6, see further p.479, below.

<sup>18</sup> See above, at n.15.

<sup>19</sup> R. v. Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, Ex p. Aga Khan [1993] 1 W.L.R. 909 at 933, where the applicant did have a cause of action in contract.

<sup>20</sup> See below, p.1047.

<sup>21</sup> Newport Association Football Club v. Football Association of Wales Ltd [1995] 2 All E.R. 87.

<sup>22</sup> At n.15, above.

<sup>23</sup> It was this right which was at stake in the Newport case, above n.21.

<sup>24</sup> Trade Union Act 1871, s.3.

and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. A detailed analysis of this complicated Act cannot be attempted in this book; but the main point is that under s.11 the purposes of a trade union<sup>25</sup> are not, by reason only of the fact that they are in restraint of trade, to be unlawful so as to make void or voidable any agreement; nor is any rule of a union to be unenforceable by reason only of its being in restraint of trade.<sup>26</sup> The Act contains similar provisions with regard to the purposes and rules of employers' associations,<sup>27</sup> which are to the same extent excepted from the scope of the restraint of trade doctrine.<sup>28</sup> But an agreement or rule of a trade union may still be invalid for some other reason. In particular, an employee (or person seeking employment) has a statutory right not to be excluded or expelled from a trade union<sup>29</sup> except in certain specified circumstances; and union rules which restrict membership are unenforceable unless they satisfy one or more of a number of criteria laid down by the legislation: e.g., they may validly restrict membership by reference to qualifications for the type of work in question.<sup>30</sup>

(4) Exclusive dealing

The original tendency of the common law was to regard exclusive dealing arrangements as valid. This attitude is illustrated by decisions upholding sole agency and exclusive service agreements,<sup>31</sup> agreements not to buy or sell goods except from or to a particular person,<sup>32</sup> and agreements not to use goods except with others made by the same manufacturer.<sup>33</sup> In other cases, the courts have upheld<sup>34</sup> a covenant on the purchase of land giving the vendor the exclusive right of supplying beer to any public house built on the land; a contract by which the owner of a restaurant agreed to buy all the burgundy sold there from the claimants<sup>35</sup>; and a contract by a purchaser of garage premises to buy from the vendor all petrol used in the business carried on there.<sup>36</sup> Very occasionally, an exclusive dealing agreement was held invalid: for example, where a brassfounder contracted to execute orders only for a particular firm, which did not bind itself to place any orders with him.<sup>37</sup> Where the agreements were upheld, the rules relating to restraint of

<sup>25</sup> As defined by s.1.

<sup>26</sup> The exact scope of s.11 depends on whether or not the union is a "special register body" as defined by s.117.

<sup>27</sup> As defined by s.122(1); semble that two employers who agree not to "poach" on each other's labour force (as in Kores Manufacturing Co Ltd v Kolok Manufacturing Co Ltd [1959] Ch. 108, above, p.466) are not, for that reason alone, an "organisation" within s.122.

<sup>28</sup> s.128: the exact scope of this section depends on whether the association is incorporated.

<sup>29</sup> Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, ss.174 to 177 (as substituted by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.14). cf. also Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s.13.

<sup>30</sup> 1992 Act, above, s.174(3).

<sup>31</sup> See Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269 at 294, 307, 336; the last dictum excepts restrictions which are "purely limitative or sterilising" as in Young v Timmins (1831) 1 C. & J. 331, below n.37 and cf. above, p.464.

<sup>32</sup> Donnell v Bennett (1883) 22 Ch.D. 835; Metropolitan Electric Supply Co v Ginder [1901] 2 Ch. 799; Monkland v Jack Barclay Ltd [1951] 2 K.B. 252; BMTA v Gilbert [1951] 2 All E.R. 641.

<sup>33</sup> United Shoe Machinery Co of Canada v Brunet [1909] A.C. 330, criticised in the Esso case, above, at p.297.

<sup>34</sup> Catt v Tourle (1869) 1 L.R. 4 Ch.App. 654 (the actual decision is no longer law: Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property (5th ed.), p.772).

<sup>35</sup> Bouchard Servais v Prince's Hall Restaurant Ltd (1904) 20 T.L.R. 574; Greenall's Management Ltd v Canavan, The Times, August 20, 1997. See Supply of Beer (Tied Estates) Order 1989 (SI 1989/2390); Supply of Beer (Tied Estates) (Amendment) Order 1997 (SI 1997/1740); Supply of Beer (Loan Ties, etc.) Order 1989 (SI 1989/2258).

<sup>36</sup> Foley v Classique Coaches [1934] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>37</sup> Young v Timmins (1831) 1 C. & J. 331; the reasoning (based on lack of adequate consideration) would no longer be accepted: Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269 at 294; and cf. ibid. 336. The actual decision is also hard to reconcile with the principles stated below, pp.504–505.

trade were in some cases simply not mentioned, while in others the rules were mentioned but the contracts were nevertheless held valid. In these cases, it was not always clear whether the contracts were valid because the restraint of trade doctrine did not apply to them at all or because its requirements were satisfied. The distinction is crucial because if the doctrine did not apply at all it would be unnecessary for the person seeking to enforce the agreement to establish its reasonableness.

The older authorities must now be read subject to a line of cases concerned with the validity of "solus agreements" between oil companies and garage proprietors. These agreements were usually made when an oil company advanced money to help with the purchase or development of garage premises; in return, the garage proprietor would give three undertakings: a "tying covenant", to buy all petrol (and sometimes certain other products) from the oil company; a "compulsory trading covenant", to keep his garage open at all reasonable times for the sale of petrol; and a "continuity covenant", to extract similar undertakings from any person to whom he might sell the garage during the subsistence of the solus agreement. The leading Esso case<sup>38</sup> concerned solus agreements made in respect of two garages. One agreement was to last for about four and a half years, and the other for 21 years. The House of Lords held that the solus agreements were within the restraint of trade doctrine; that the four-and-a-half year agreement was valid; but that the 21 year agreement was invalid as it was unreasonable and contrary to the public interest. Undertakings with regard to solus petrol agreements were later given to the Government by oil companies in consequence of a report by the Monopolies Commission<sup>39</sup>; but the decision in the Esso case gives rise to a number of general problems which still require discussion.

(a) WHETHER SUCH AGREEMENTS ARE WITHIN THE RESTRAINT OF TRADE DOCTRINE. In the Esso case, where Lord Pearce distinguished between "those contracts which are in restraint of trade and . . . those which merely regulate the normal commercial relations between the parties and which are therefore free from the doctrine".<sup>40</sup> He regarded solus agreements as falling within the former class, principally on the ground that the oil company gave no assurance that it would provide a supply of petrol at a reasonable price.<sup>41</sup> Lord Wilberforce said that contracts were not within the doctrine of restraint of trade if they were "such . . . as, under contemporary conditions, may be found to have passed into the accepted and normal currency of contractual or conveyancing relations".<sup>42</sup> The agreements in the Esso case were not of a kind which had in this way "passed into acceptance . . . ; the solus system is both too recent and too variable for this to be said".<sup>43</sup> However, Lord Wilberforce reserved the powers of the court to subject even "accepted" contracts to scrutiny in the light of changing social or economic conditions or of special features in individual transactions.<sup>44</sup> Later decisions have, in particular, made it clear that a contract is not taken out of the restraint of trade doctrine merely because it is in standard form and contains only terms which are usual in that type of transaction.<sup>45</sup> This factor may take contracts out of the restraint of trade doctrine

<sup>38</sup> Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269; Heydon, 85 L.Q.R. 229; P.V.B., 83 L.Q.R. 478; Koh [1967] C.L.J. 151; and see Whiteman, 29 M.I.R. 507.

<sup>39</sup> 1965, House of Commons Paper 264; further undertakings were given in 1976 and 1994: Borrie, L.S.Gaz. Jan. 26, 1977, pp.71-72.

<sup>40</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 327.

<sup>41</sup> ibid. at 329.

<sup>42</sup> ibid. at 332-333.

<sup>43</sup> ibid. at 337.

<sup>44</sup> ibid. at 333; Watson v Prager [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726 at 744.

<sup>45</sup> Watson v Prager, above.

if they have been freely negotiated,<sup>46</sup> but the position is different where there is great disparity of bargaining power and the terms are imposed by the stronger on the weaker party. In A Schroeder Music Publishing Co v Macaulay<sup>47</sup> it was accordingly held that a contract by which an unknown song-writer undertook to give his exclusive services to a publisher who made no promise to publish his work was subject to the doctrine. Lord Reid said: "Normally the doctrine of restraint of trade has no application to such restrictions: they require no justification. But if contractual restrictions appear to be unnecessary or to be reasonably capable of enforcement in an oppressive manner, then they must be justified before they can be enforced".<sup>48</sup> This may be the position even where the contract is made on terms settled by a professional association for the purpose of protecting the party subject to the restraint, and where both parties have no alternative but to make use of such terms.<sup>49</sup>

The tests proposed by Lords Pearce and Wilberforce in the Esso case, and by Lord Reid in the Schroeder case continue to recognise the possibility that some exclusive dealing and exclusive service agreements will not be subject to the doctrine of restraint of trade. Many of the earlier cases which support this view<sup>50</sup> were cited, and none was overruled, in the Esso case. At the same time, the tests are very vague and leave much discretion to the courts in defining the scope of the doctrine in relation to such contracts. It seems probable that in future the doctrine will apply to contracts of this kind if they present any novel or unusual features, or if they contain terms which are likely to operate harshly on a party of weak bargaining power.

(b) REQUIREMENTS OF VALIDITY. Where an exclusive dealing or service contract is subject to the doctrine of restraint of trade, the usual requirements must be satisfied before it can be enforced.

(i) The interest. We have distinguished elsewhere between "proprietary" and "commercial" interests<sup>51</sup>; and the Esso case shows that a "commercial" interest will suffice in the present group of cases. Lord Reid there said that the statement "that a person is not to be protected against mere competition" was "not . . . very helpful in a case like the present"<sup>52</sup> and Lord Pearce, after expressing substantially the same view, seems to have regarded the oil company's "network of outlets"<sup>53</sup> as the interest which they sought to protect. Some difficulty arises from Lord Morris' description of the covenants as "naked covenants or covenants in gross"<sup>54</sup>; but he obviously regarded this, not as a ground of invalidity<sup>55</sup> (for he upheld one of the covenants), but merely as a ground for subjecting the covenants to the doctrine of restraint of trade.

(ii) Reasonableness and fairness. To satisfy the test of reasonableness, the party seeking to enforce the restrictions must show that they were "no more than what was reasonably required to protect his legitimate interest".<sup>56</sup> Here, as elsewhere,<sup>57</sup> relevant factors include the length of the restraint<sup>58</sup> and the adequacy of the consideration provided for it. We have seen that in the Esso case a four-and-a-half year tie was upheld and a 21-year

<sup>46</sup> A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1314.

<sup>47</sup> See above; cf. O'Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd [1985] Q.B. 428; Watson v Prager, above.

<sup>48</sup> [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308, 1314; Watson v Prager, above at p.747.

<sup>49</sup> Watson v Prager [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726.

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.468.

<sup>51</sup> See above, p.457.

<sup>52</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 301.

<sup>53</sup> ibid. at 329.

<sup>54</sup> ibid. at 309.

<sup>55</sup> cf. above, p.454.

<sup>56</sup> A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1310.

<sup>57</sup> See above, pp.458-462.

<sup>58</sup> Watson v Prager [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726 at 748.

one struck down.<sup>59</sup> But in a later case a 21-year tie in a solus agreement contained in a lease was upheld since the premises were already, before the lease, subject to a valid three-year tie, since the tenant had the right to break the lease after seven and 14 years, and since the landlord had paid the tenant £35,000 under a previous transaction leading to the execution of the lease.<sup>60</sup>

The fairness of the contract is also a relevant factor, particularly where the restrictions are imposed on the weaker party to a relationship of unequal bargaining power. The point is well illustrated by agreements between musical performers and recording companies. In one case,<sup>61</sup> a long-term (though not exclusive) contract of this kind was made to settle differences which had arisen under an earlier contract between the parties; when the new contract was made, the performer's reputation was well established and he had the benefit of expert legal advice. In these circumstances, the new contract was regarded as reasonable in view of the benefits which the performer had received under it. By contrast, the restriction imposed on the composer in A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay<sup>62</sup> was neither necessary nor fair. It extended over a period of five years, during which he had to submit all his compositions to the publishers, while they were under no obligation to promote his work and had to make no more than minimal payments if they failed to do so. The restriction was accordingly invalid as it went beyond the protection of the publishers' legitimate interests and operated harshly on the other party: "his work will be sterilised and he can earn nothing from his abilities as a composer".<sup>63</sup>

Terms may also be unfair because the party claiming the benefit of the restriction is under the contract put into a position where his interest conflicts with the duty that he owes to the other party. This was the position in Watson v Prager<sup>64</sup> where, a professional boxer, agreed to be "managed and directed exclusively" by the defendant, who was both a manager and a boxing promoter and who undertook to negotiate terms "as advantageous as possible" for the boxer; the agreement was for an initial period of three years, renewable for a further period of equal length. The main reason why the agreement was held to be contrary to public policy was that it was not fair to hold the boxer to an agreement of such long duration since under it the defendant's duty as manager was to negotiate the highest possible fees for the boxer, and this conflicted with his interest as promoter, since in that capacity he would have to meet the cost of these fees.

(iii) Public interest. Lord Reid in the Schroeder case based his decision partly on the ground that "The public interest requires in the interests both of the public and of the individual that everyone should be free so far as practicable to earn a livelihood and give to the public the fruits of his particular abilities".<sup>65</sup> The Eso case, too, is noteworthy for the stress placed on the element of public interest; indeed Lord Hodson bases the invalidity of the 21-year agreement "on the public interest rather than on that of the parties"<sup>66</sup>; Lord Pearce says that the ultimate ground for interference in all cases is public policy so that there is no real separation between "what is reasonable on grounds of public policy and what is reasonable as between the parties".<sup>67</sup> Lord Wilberforce

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.469.

<sup>60</sup> Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173.

<sup>61</sup> Panayiotou v Sony Music Entertainment (UK) Ltd, The Times, June 30, 1994. cf. the Alec Lobb case, above.

<sup>62</sup> [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308; above, p.470.

<sup>63</sup> ibid., at 1314.

<sup>64</sup> [1991] 1 W.L.R. 726.

<sup>65</sup> [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308 at 1313; Lord Diplock at 1315 seems to view this point with some scepticism.

<sup>66</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 321; and cf. above, p.463.

<sup>67</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 324.

appears to take the same view but adds that it is "important that the vitality of the second limb . . . of the wider aspects of a single public policy rule should continue to be recognised".<sup>68</sup> These statements show that the courts would in these cases reject the once fashionable argument<sup>69</sup> that, if an agreement was shown to be reasonable between the parties, the public interest would also be satisfied.

(5) Covenants affecting the use of land

Such covenants are commonly enforced although they no doubt restrain trade, e.g. by imposing restrictions on building, or on the carrying on of some particular business or trade, or by providing that the land shall be used for residential purposes only. In the Esso case a majority of the House of Lords explained these cases on the ground that "A person buying or leasing land had no previous right to be there at all, let alone to trade there, and when he takes possession of that land subject to a negative restrictive covenant he gives up no right or freedom which he previously had".<sup>70</sup> It has therefore been held that where a person enters into a solus agreement when he acquires land, and that agreement is a term of the conveyance by which the land is transferred, the doctrine of restraint of trade does not apply at all.<sup>71</sup> Nevertheless, it is submitted that the reasoning is hard to reconcile with the emphasis placed in the Esso case itself on the element of public interest<sup>72</sup>; for restrictions on the use of land may cause harm to the public where they are imposed at the time when the land is acquired, no less than where they are imposed later. Of course, generally speaking, the object of a restrictive covenant affecting land is to preserve amenities and not to restrain trade or to prevent competition; and in most cases such a covenant would in any event pass the test of reasonableness because it would affect only a small area. But sometimes covenants of this kind do expressly restrain the carrying on of a particular business on the land acquired<sup>73</sup>; and cases of this kind can be imagined in which the covenant would not be reasonable. A person who owned a garage business on a 1,000-acre estate might sell all the land except for the garage and take a covenant that the purchaser would not carry on a garage business on any part of the land bought. Such a covenant could offend public policy just as much as a covenant not to compete within a given radius of the garage. Moreover, we may vary the example by supposing the original owner sells the garage but keeps the rest of the land, and covenants not to carry on a garage business on it. This covenant would, according to the reasoning of the Esso case, be subject to the doctrine of restraint of trade, for the landowner would be giving up a right which he previously had, to carry on a garage business on the land which he kept.<sup>74</sup> It is hard to see why the doctrine of restraint of trade should not apply to the first as well as to the second of these hypothetical cases. Suppose, further that the owner of a garage sells or leases it to an oil company and then leases it back on terms that include a solus agreement. Here it would seem that he did have a "previous right to be there" so that the doctrine of restraint of

<sup>68</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 341.

<sup>69</sup> See above, p.463.

<sup>70</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 298; cf. ibid. at 309, 316–317, 325.

<sup>71</sup> Cleveland Petroleum Ltd v Daristone Ltd [1969] 1 W.L.R. 116; Korah, 32 M.L.R. 323; below, p.473. See also Re Ravenseft Properties Ltd's Application [1978] Q.B. 52 (where exceptions are envisaged at 67–68).

<sup>72</sup> See above, at n.66.

<sup>73</sup> See, for example, Holloway Bros v Hill [1902] 2 Ch. 612; Newton Abbott Cooperative Society Ltd v Williamson & Treadgold Ltd [1952] Ch. 286; cf. Rother v Colchester Corporation [1969] 1 W.L.R. 720.

<sup>74</sup> cf. Kerrick v Schoenberg, 328 S.W. 2d 595, 602 (1959).

trade would apply.<sup>75</sup> Attempts have, indeed, been made to evade this result by interposing a company controlled by the garage owner into such an agreement. Thus there is some support for the view that, if the land is leased from a garage owner and leased back to a company controlled by him, then the restraint of trade doctrine should not apply because the company had no "previous right to be there".<sup>76</sup> But the distinction between this situation and that in which the two leases are between the same parties can hardly be justified in terms of public policy. Accordingly, it has been held that the restraint of trade doctrine did apply where garage premises were owned by a company controlled by a mother and son, leased by that company to an oil company and then leased back to the mother and son personally.<sup>77</sup> It was said that the court should "pierce the corporate veil" and not give effect to such a "palpable device"<sup>78</sup> for evading the restraint of trade doctrine.

In three further situations the restraint of trade doctrine applies to covenants affecting land. First, it applies where the covenant is given by A to B on the acquisition of land by A, not from B, but from a third party C, e.g. where (as in the Esso case itself) the oil company (B) takes the covenant as one of the terms of a loan to A to enable him to buy a garage from C.<sup>79</sup> Secondly, it applies where the owner of a garage mortgages his existing premises and the mortgage contains a solus agreement.<sup>80</sup> Thirdly, it applies where the restriction is imposed not in the conveyance itself but in a separate contemporaneous agreement: this was the position in Foley v Classique Coaches<sup>81</sup> where it was assumed that the doctrine did apply and this assumption seems to have been accepted in the Esso case.<sup>82</sup> But it is once again by no means clear why, if the doctrine of restraint of trade can apply in these cases, it should not apply to a restrictive covenant forming part of a conveyance between the parties to the covenant. Perhaps similar principles can be applied, if not at common law, then by virtue of s.84 of the Law of Property Act 1925.<sup>83</sup> That section gives the Lands Tribunal a statutory power in certain cases to discharge or modify restrictive covenants affecting land if they have become obsolete by reason of changes in the character of the neighbourhood or because their continued existence "would impede some reasonable user of the land for private or public purposes". This enactment is, in effect, a statutory extension of the doctrine of public policy to these covenants.<sup>84</sup>

<sup>75</sup> e.g. Amoco Australia Pty Ltd v Rocca Bros Motor Engineering Co Pty Ltd [1975] A.C. 561; Bowman, 38 M.L.R. 571.

<sup>76</sup> Cleveland Petroleum Ltd v Dartstone Ltd [1969] 1 W.L.R. 116, where the claim to enforce the restraint was actually made against an assignee of the company's leasehold interest in the garage.

<sup>77</sup> Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173 (where the restraint was held reasonable).

<sup>78</sup> ibid. at 178.

<sup>79</sup> Heydon, 85 L.Q.R. 229 at 233 (and The Restraint of Trade Doctrine, pp.58–59) argues that this makes the reasoning in the Esso case inconsistent with the decision: as A had "no previous right to be there," the restraint of trade doctrine should not have applied. But it is submitted that this part of the reasoning was intended only to apply where the agreement imposing the restriction was between the same parties as the disposition of the land. cf. also Petrofina (Great Britain) Ltd v Martin [1966] Ch. 146, where a solus agreement with an oil company on the purchase of a garage from a third party was also held invalid for restraint of trade.

<sup>80</sup> Texaco Ltd v Mulberry Filling Station Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 814; semble the mortgage in the Esso case was similarly executed after the defendant company had acquired the Corner Garage (though it was executed in pursuance of an earlier agreement).

<sup>81</sup> [1934] 2 K.B. 1; above, p.468.

<sup>82</sup> See [1968] A.C. 269 at 296, 311, 316, 327, 339.

<sup>83</sup> As amended by s.28 of the Law of Property Act 1969.

<sup>84</sup> Under the section, the person seeking modification may be ordered to pay compensation. It is arguable that this practice should be extended to some other cases where a person seeks relief from a promise in restraint of trade for which he has received consideration.

(6) Other agreements

In the past the courts were reluctant to apply the doctrine of restraint of trade to new classes of contracts. Thus at common law price-maintenance agreements are valid,<sup>85</sup> though some such agreements may be void under the rules (to be discussed later in this Chapter) which prohibit certain anti-competitive agreements.<sup>86</sup> So, too, at common law an agreement between two persons not to bid against each other at an auction is not illegal<sup>87</sup> but if at least one of them is a dealer they may be guilty of a statutory offence under the Auctions (Bidding Agreements) Act 1927.<sup>88</sup> This Act also provides that the contract can be set aside by the owner of the property auctioned; and, although it does not explicitly invalidate the agreement not to bid as between the parties to it, such invalidity probably follows at common law from the criminality of the agreement.<sup>89</sup> In these cases legislative intervention has been necessary to extend the scope of the doctrine of restraint of trade, but there are signs that the courts are prepared to resume a more creative role in this field. In the Esso case Lord Wilberforce said that no exhaustive tests could be stated for defining or identifying contracts in restraint of trade<sup>90</sup>, and that, although such contracts might "be listed, provisionally, in categories . . . the classification must remain fluid and the categories can never be closed".<sup>91</sup>

Subsequent cases illustrate a number of new departures. It has, for example, been held that covenants in a joint venture agreement (not amounting to a partnership) were subject to the restraint of trade doctrine and so enforceable only to the extent to which they were reasonable, having regard to the covenantee's interest.<sup>92</sup> It seems that, where a dispute about intellectual property is settled, the doctrine can apply to terms of the settlement which restrict a party's right to make use of the property.<sup>93</sup> A further novel application of the doctrine is illustrated by Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Dickson,<sup>94</sup> where the House of Lords held that a rule of the Society restricting the trading activities of chemists was invalid. One ground for the decision was that the rule was ultra vires<sup>95</sup>; but a majority of the House of Lords also held that it was invalid for restraint of trade.<sup>96</sup> The rule was held invalid on this ground even though it was no more than part of a professional code of ethics which was not legally binding (whether as a contract or otherwise). A fortiori, a rule of a professional association may be in restraint of trade if it is intended to have contractual force. It has, for example, been said that the rule of the International Tennis Federation by which its members are subject to disqualification for taking prohibited drugs is in restraint of trade, though reasonable and hence valid at common law.<sup>97</sup>

<sup>85</sup> Palmolive Co (of England) v Freedman [1928] Ch. 264. cf. Re Dott's Lease [1920] 1 Ch. 281 (covenant to maintain price of tickets at the Garrick Theatre).

<sup>86</sup> See below, p.476, esp. at n.16. Whether the agreement is actually void will depend on (inter alia) the factors referred to on p.476 at n.16.

<sup>87</sup> Rawlings v General Trading Co Ltd [1921] 1 K.B. 635; Harrop v Thompson [1975] 1 W.L.R. 545.

<sup>88</sup> As amended by the Auctions (Bidding Agreement) Act 1969.

<sup>89</sup> See above, p.430.

<sup>90</sup> [1968] A.C. 269 at 332.

<sup>91</sup> ibid. at 337; cf. Petrofina (Great Britain) Ltd v Martin [1966] Ch. 146 at 169.

<sup>92</sup> Dammy Day & Co Ltd v D'Alphen [1997] 1 R.L.R. 422.

<sup>93</sup> World Wide Fund for Nature v World Wrestling Federation [2002] EWCA Civ 196; [2002] U.K.C.L.R. 388 at [40–42], where the agreement was held valid.

<sup>94</sup> [1970] A.C. 403; Koh, 31 M.L.R. 70.

<sup>95</sup> See below, p.560.

<sup>96</sup> Contrast R. v General Medical Council, Ex p. Coleman [1990] 1 All E.R. 489 (refusal to allow advertising of holistic medical practice held not to be open to challenge for restraint of trade as the refusal was authorised by statute).

<sup>97</sup> Wilander and Novacek v Tobin & Jude [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 295 at 297.

The doctrine of restraint of trade does not apply merely because a contract restricts a party's freedom to deal with its particular subject-matter, for every contract "necessarily limits the freedom to enter into another contract".<sup>98</sup> The essential feature of contracts within the doctrine is that of "fettering a person's freedom in the future to carry on his trade, business or profession".<sup>99</sup> Various further kinds of agreements or arrangements can be imagined which might have this effect: for example, an agreement by A not to manufacture a certain product in competition with B<sup>1</sup>; an agreement on the sale of a ship not to operate her on certain routes; an agreement by a buyer not to export goods to a particular country<sup>2</sup>; or an agreement, on the lease of a hall for an exhibition, not to hold a similar exhibition there for six months.<sup>3</sup> It is not suggested that all or any of such agreements will be held invalid; but they may require justification under the doctrine of restraint of trade.

(7) Competition law

Earlier in this Chapter, we saw that the common law relating to restrictive trading agreements<sup>4</sup> gave only limited protection to third parties who might be adversely affected by the willingness of the parties to such agreements to give effect to them. A more comprehensive attack on this problem has, since 1956,<sup>5</sup> been made by legislation. The relevant rules are now contained in the Competition Act 1998 and will be amplified by further rules to be made and decisions to be taken under it.

Chap.I of Pt I of this Act prohibits a number of anti-competitive practices; it does so in words which closely follow those of Art.81<sup>6</sup> of the European Community Treaty.<sup>7</sup> This prohibition (called "the Chapter 1 prohibition"<sup>8</sup>) is to be interpreted in accordance with the extensive case law on the interpretation and effects of that Article<sup>9</sup>; the main difference between the two sets of provisions lies in their geographical scope. The prohibitions apply to agreements<sup>10</sup> between undertakings,<sup>11</sup> decisions by associations of undertakings or concerted practices which (a) may affect trade (under Chap.I) within the United Kingdom or (under Art.81) between Member States, and (b) have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of trade within (under Chap.I) the United Kingdom or (under Art.81) the common market.<sup>12</sup> Prohibited agreements (etc.) are void<sup>13</sup> unless exemption is granted by (under the 1998 Act) the Office of Fair

<sup>98</sup> Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 615.

<sup>99</sup> Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 615.

<sup>1</sup> International Pediatric Products Ltd v Cuddle-King Products Ltd (1964) 46 D.L.R. (2d) 581.

<sup>2</sup> As in National Panasonic (UK) Ltd v Commission of the European Communities [1981] I.C.R. 51.

<sup>3</sup> cf. Modern Exhibition Services v Cardiff Corporation (1965) 63 L.G.R. 316, where restraint of trade was not discussed.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.466.

<sup>5</sup> When the first of the Restrictive Trade Practices Acts (now repealed) was passed.

<sup>6</sup> Formerly Art.85.

<sup>7</sup> Which has the force of law in the United Kingdom by virtue of the European Communities Act 1972, s.2. The European Communities (Amendment) Act 1993 does not affect the rules stated in the text.

<sup>8</sup> Competition Act 1998, s.2(8).

<sup>9</sup> This is the effect of s.60 of the 1998 Act.

<sup>10</sup> It has been held under what is now Art.81 that the agreement need not be legally binding: Italian Flat Glass case [1990] 4 C.M.L.R. 535; Re Northern Europe-USA Freight Lines Agreement [1990] 4 C.M.L.R. 518.

<sup>11</sup> An individual engaged in economic activity can for the purposes of what is now Art.81 be an "undertaking" Re Unitel [1978] 3 C.M.L.R. 306 (opera singers).

<sup>12</sup> Competition Act 1998 s.2(1); European Community Treaty Art.81(1).

<sup>13</sup> 1998 Act, s.2(4); Treaty, Art.81(2).

Trading<sup>14</sup> or (under the Treaty) the European Community authorities.<sup>15</sup> Examples of agreements covered by the prohibition include those which “directly or indirectly fix purchase or selling prices or any other trading conditions”.<sup>16</sup> Under Art.81, this prohibition applies, not only to so-called “horizontal” agreements (i.e. to those between parties operating at the same level of production or supply, such as agreements between manufacturers as to the prices which they will charge for their products), but also to so-called “vertical” agreements (i.e. to those between parties operating at different levels of supply, such as exclusive dealing agreements between producers and dealers<sup>17</sup>). Under the 1998 Act, its provisions (including the Chap.I prohibition) can be made to apply to “vertical” and to “land” agreements by delegated legislation<sup>18</sup> defining these terms,<sup>19</sup> alternatively, such legislation may exclude the application of these prohibitions to such agreements.<sup>20</sup> It is the latter power which has been exercised,<sup>21</sup> so that “vertical” and “land” agreements are in general<sup>22</sup> excluded from the category of agreements prohibited by the 1998 Act.<sup>23</sup> The Act further makes claims for monetary compensation available to persons who have suffered loss or damage as a result of an infringement of these prohibitions.<sup>23a</sup> Where such persons are consumers, such claims can be brought on their behalf by bodies to be specified for this purpose by the Secretary of State.<sup>23b</sup> Such claims could, for example, have been brought on behalf of consumers who had paid prices inflated by price-fixing agreements between suppliers.

No attempt can be made in a book of this nature even to summarise the extremely complex rules which govern the scope of the above prohibitions and of the exemptions from them which have been granted under European Community law<sup>24</sup>; but a number of points must be made about the relationship between the prohibitions and the common law rules relating to restraint of trade. First, an employee is not an “undertaking” within Art.81,<sup>25</sup> so that the prohibitions would not affect the common law rules relating to restraints in employment contracts.<sup>26</sup> Secondly, the Art.81 prohibitions apply only where the agreement (etc.) in question has an “appreciable” effect on competition and not where that effect is “insignificant”.<sup>27</sup> The crucial factor in determining whether the effect is “appreciable” (as opposed to “insignificant”) is the percentage of the share of the market affected by it: for example, the prohibitions have been held not to apply where that share was no more than 0.02 per cent<sup>28</sup>; and it seems that a share of less than

<sup>14</sup> See Enterprise Act 2002, s.2(3).

<sup>15</sup> 1998 Act, ss.4, 6; Treaty, Art.81(3).

<sup>16</sup> 1998 Act, s.2(2)(a); Treaty Art.85(1)(a).

<sup>17</sup> Consten & Gründig v Commission [1966] E.C.R. 299.

<sup>18</sup> s.50(1).

<sup>19</sup> s.50(5).

<sup>20</sup> s.50(2).

<sup>21</sup> Competition Act (Land and Vertical Agreements Exclusion) Order 2000 (SI 2000/310).

<sup>22</sup> The Order cited in n.21 reserves power to withdraw the exclusion from particular agreements.

<sup>23</sup> i.e. by s.2 of the 1998 Act; see above after n.8.

<sup>23a</sup> S.47A, as inserted by Enterprise Act 2002, s.18.

<sup>23b</sup> S.47B, as inserted by Enterprise Act 2002, s.19.

<sup>24</sup> See, e.g. Bellamy and Child, Common Market Law of Competition (4th ed.).

<sup>25</sup> See Suiker Unie v Commission [1975] E.C.R. 1663 at 2007, §539.

<sup>26</sup> See above, pp.455 et seq.

<sup>27</sup> Völk v Verwaeye [1969] C.M.I.R. 273.

<sup>28</sup> ibid.; cf. Passmore v Morland plc [1998] 4 All E.R. 468, affirmed, [1999] 3 All E.R. 1005; Inntrepreneur Pub Co (CPC) Ltd v Price, The Times, December 4, 1998. The question of “appreciable” effect is judged at the time, not of the agreement, but of the proceedings: Passmore v Morland plc [1999] 3 All E.R. 1005, so that an agreement which was invalid under Art.81 when made may become valid in the light of later events, and conversely. Contrast the position under the common law of restraint of trade: above, p.416.

five per cent would be treated in the same way.<sup>29</sup> In determining whether the effect of an agreement is "appreciable," the court can take account of other agreements made (for example) by the supplier with other distributors<sup>30</sup>; but the point remains that many of the agreements dealt with by the common law rules discussed earlier in this Chapter would not have a sufficiently "appreciable" effect to be prohibited by Art.81 or by Chap.I of the Act. The point appears to be that the purpose of the two sets of rules is different: the Art.81 and Chap.I prohibitions are concerned with the effect of agreements (etc.) on the economy as a whole, while under the common law rules an agreement may be void by reason of its adverse effect merely on the party restrained by it.<sup>31</sup> The common law rules therefore continue to operate alongside the Art.81 and Chap.I prohibitions, so that it is perfectly possible for an agreement to fall outside those prohibitions but nevertheless to be invalid for restraint of trade at common law. The same may also be true of agreements which fall outside Art.81 and Chap.I because of their geographical scope as described above<sup>32</sup>; e.g., of an agreement which affected trade only in South America.

Contracts in restraint of trade can also be affected by the prohibition contained in Chap.II of Pt I of the Competition Act 1998 and Art.82<sup>33</sup> of the European Community Treaty against abuse by an undertaking of a "dominant position".<sup>34</sup> Such an abuse can of course occur without any contract being made to give effect to it; but it could also invalidate certain types of contracts,<sup>35</sup> such as contracts obliging a buyer of goods to secure supplies of other goods or services from the same supplier.<sup>36</sup>

(8) Other aspects of European Community law

Other provisions of the European Community Treaty which may be relevant in the context of contracts in restraint of trade include those which relate to the free movement of goods,<sup>37</sup> the free movement of workers,<sup>38</sup> freedom of establishment<sup>39</sup> and freedom to provide services.<sup>40</sup> Discussion of these provisions is beyond the scope of this book; reference should be made to works on European Community law.<sup>41</sup>

4. Scope of the Doctrine of Public Policy<sup>42</sup>

Public policy is a variable notion, depending on changing manners, morals and economic conditions. In theory, this flexibility of the doctrine of public policy could provide a

<sup>29</sup> See, e.g., Miller v Commission [1978] E.C.R. 131; AEG v Commission [1983] E.C.R. 3151. cf. Competition Act 1998 s.39, relating to "small" agreements.

<sup>30</sup> Delimitis v Henninger Bräu [1991] I E.C.R. 935 (tied house beer supplies).

<sup>31</sup> cf. above, p.461 at n.64.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.475 at n.12.

<sup>33</sup> Formerly Art.86.

<sup>34</sup> Competition Act 1998, s.18.

<sup>35</sup> It could also give rise to a remedy for refusal to enter into a contract: see above p.4.

<sup>36</sup> e.g. Hilti v Commission [1991] II E.C.R. 1439; Elopak Italia Srl v Tetra Pak (No.2) [1992] 4 C.M.L.R. 551.

<sup>37</sup> e.g., Art.28 (formerly Art.30), prohibiting quantitative restrictions on imports; this was held not to have been contravened in R. v Royal Pharmaceutical Soc. of G.B. [1989] 2 All E.R. 758.

<sup>38</sup> Art.39 (formerly Art.48); see Union Royale Belge des Sociétés de Football Association ASBL v Bosman [1996] All E.R. (EC) 97.

<sup>39</sup> Art.43 (formerly Art.52).

<sup>40</sup> Art.49 (formerly Art.59); this was held not to have contravened in Wilander and Novacek v Tobin and Jude [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 295 or in Edwards v British Athletics Federation, The Times, June 30, 1997.

<sup>41</sup> e.g., Wyatt and Dashwood, European Community Law (3rd ed.).

<sup>42</sup> Shand [1972] C.L.J. 144.

judge with an excuse for invalidating any contract which he violently disliked. With this danger in mind judges have sometimes criticised the doctrine of public policy. In 1824 Burroughs J. described it as "a very unruly horse, and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you. It may lead you from the sound law".<sup>43</sup> And Lord Halsbury has denied that any court could "invent a new head of public policy".<sup>44</sup>

On the other hand, the law does adapt itself to changes in economic and social conditions, as can be seen particularly from the development of the rules as to contracts in restraint of trade. This point has often been recognised judicially. Thus Lord Haldane has said: "What the law recognises as contrary to public policy turns out to vary greatly from time to time".<sup>45</sup> And Lord Denning has put a similar point of view: "With a good man in the saddle, the unruly horse can be kept in control. It can jump over obstacles".<sup>46</sup>

The present attitude of the courts represents a compromise between the flexibility inherent in the notion of public policy and the need for certainty in commercial affairs.

In the interests of certainty the courts will in general refuse to apply the doctrine of public policy to contracts of a kind to which the doctrine has never been applied before. In Printing & Numerical Registering Co v Sampson,<sup>47</sup> for instance, an inventor assigned a patent to a company and also agreed to assign to the company any patent of a like nature thereafter to be acquired by him. He argued that this agreement was contrary to public policy as it tended to discourage inventors. In rejecting the argument, Jessel M.R. said: "You are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy".<sup>48</sup> The reason why the courts are less ready to apply the doctrine of public policy to new classes of contracts is that Parliament and its delegates have become more active in this field.<sup>49</sup>

But in some cases (particularly "where the subject-matter is 'lawyers' law'"<sup>50</sup>) judicial intervention may still as a last resort be desirable.<sup>51</sup> The courts may occasionally invalidate a contract even though it is of a kind to which the doctrine of public policy has not been applied before. Such novel applications of the doctrine of public policy are illustrated by decisions to the effect that a moneylending contract is illegal if it imposes

<sup>43</sup> Richardson v Mellish (1824) 2 Bing. 229 at 252; McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [2000] 2 A.C. 59 at 100–101.

<sup>44</sup> Janson v Driefontein Consolidated Mines Ltd [1902] A.C. 484 at 491; cf. Texaco Ltd v Mulberry Filling Station Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 814 at 827; Geismar v Sun Alliance & London Insurance [1978] Q.B. 383 at 389; Nickersen v Barraclough [1981] Ch. 426; Deutsche Schachtbau- und Tiefbohrergesellschaft mbH v Ras Al Khaima National Oil Co [1990] 1 A.C. 295 at 316 (reversed on other grounds ibid. at 329 et seq.).

<sup>45</sup> Rodriguez v Speyer Bros [1919] A.C. 59 at 79; cf. Evanturel v Evanturel (1874) L.R. 6 P.C. 1 at 29; Davies v Davies (1887) 36 Ch.D. 359 at 364; Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co [1894] A.C. 535 at 553; Naylor, Benzon & Co v Krainische Industrie Gesellschaft [1918] 1 K.B. 331 at 345, affirmed [1918] 2 K.B. 486; Gray v Barr [1971] 2 Q.B. 554 at 582; Thai Trading Co v Taylor [1998] Q.B. 781 at 786 (as to which see above, p.431); Bevan Ashford v Geoff Yeandle (Contractors) Ltd [1998] [1999] Ch. 239 at 250.

<sup>46</sup> Enderby Town FC Ltd v The Football Association Ltd [1971] Ch. 591 at 606.

<sup>47</sup> (1875) L.R. 19 Eq. 462.

<sup>48</sup> ibid. 465.

<sup>49</sup> See D v NSPCC [1978] A.C. 171 at 235; Johnson v Moreton [1980] A.C. 37 at 67; Cheall v APEX [1983] 2 A.C. 180 at 191; Johnstone v Bloomsbury Health Authority [1992] Q.B. 333 at 347, 349; Lancashire CC v Municipal Mutual Insurance Ltd [1997] Q.B. 897 at 909; cf. Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden [1979] Ch. 84 (Swiss franc uplift clause in mortgage); Nationwide BS v Registry of Friendly Societies [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1226 (index-linked mortgage). For a similar argument in relation to the limit of the courts' power to create new crimes, see DPP v Withers [1975] A.C. 842 at 858.

<sup>50</sup> D v NSPCC, above, at p.235.

<sup>51</sup> cf. Monkland v Jack Barclay Ltd [1951] 2 K.B. 252 at 265.

quasi-servile obligations on the borrower<sup>52</sup>; that a contract by which a trade journal promises not to comment on the affairs of a company is illegal as it may prevent the journal from exposing frauds perpetrated by the company<sup>53</sup>; that an attempt to contract out of certain statutory provisions governing the liquidation of companies is contrary to public policy<sup>54</sup>; and that the same is true of an attempt to deprive an agricultural tenant of security of tenure where he is entitled to it by statute.<sup>55</sup> There are also cases in which attempts to impeach agreements by reference to new heads of public policy have been rejected on the ground that the agreement in question did not in fact have any injurious tendency.<sup>56</sup> It may be possible to infer from this reasoning that, if such a tendency had been established, the attempt would not have failed merely because the alleged head of public policy was a novel one.

There have been occasional hints that the courts might extend the doctrine of public policy to strike down contracts furthering certain kinds of discrimination<sup>57</sup>; but this suggestion now gives rise to a difficult problem with regard to the relative functions of Parliament and the courts in matters of public policy. Parliament has made elaborate provisions against discrimination on grounds of sex, colour, race, nationality, ethnic or national origins and disability in certain carefully defined spheres of activity.<sup>58</sup> Religious discrimination<sup>59</sup> was deliberately omitted from the scope of the Acts<sup>60</sup>; and the courts might hesitate to intervene where Parliament had deliberately decided not to do so.<sup>61</sup> On the other hand the courts can take account of these other forms of discrimination in deciding whether a contract satisfies the requirements of validity laid down under an existing head of public policy. In Nagle v Feilden,<sup>62</sup> for instance, the Court of Appeal appeared to take the view that, even before the Sex Discrimination Act, a contract in restraint of trade would not be regarded as reasonable, or as consistent with the public interest, if its object was to discriminate against women; and the same might now be true if the object of the contract were to discriminate against some religious group.<sup>63</sup> It is also

<sup>52</sup> Horwood v Millar's Timber & Trading Co [1917] 1 K.B. 305; above, p.452.

<sup>53</sup> Neville v Dominion of Canada News Co Ltd [1915] 3 K.B. 556; cf. Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 Q.B. 396 at 410; Slater v Ram, The Times, October 15, 1977.

<sup>54</sup> British Eagle International Airlines Ltd v Cie Nationale Air France [1975] 1 W.L.R. 758.

<sup>55</sup> Johnson v Moreton [1980] A.C. 37; Featherstone v Staples [1986] 1 W.L.R. 861; Gisborne v Burton [1989] Q.B. 390. The statute in question did not specify the legal effects of attempts to "contract out" of its provisions: contrast the provisions of Rent Act 1977 cited on p.3, n.18, above.

<sup>56</sup> e.g. Giles v Thompson [1994] 1 A.C. 142 at 165 rejecting the argument that allegedly champertous car-hire agreements created "a risk of exploitation" of motorists, since no such risk was created.

<sup>57</sup> Nagle v Feilden [1966] 2 Q.B. 633 at 655 ("the colour of his hair"); Edwards v SOGAT [1971] Ch. 354 at 382 ("the colour of his skin"). See generally Garner, (1972) 35 M.L.R. 478.

<sup>58</sup> Sex Discrimination Act 1975, Pts 1, 2, 3 and 4; see also Equal Pay Act 1970, as amended by Employment Protection Act 1975, s.125 and Sch.16, para.13; Sex Discrimination Act 1986 (as amended by Employment Act 1989); Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s.64(1); Race Relations Act 1976, Pts 1, 2, 3 and 4; Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s.64(2); Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

<sup>59</sup> Clauses in wills are not void for religious discrimination: Blathwayt v Cawley [1976] A.C. 397; Re Tuck's ST [1978] Ch. 49. cf. Race Relations Act 1976, s.34(2) and (3), exempting certain charitable instruments and acts done for charitable purposes from the operation of Pts 2, 3 and 4; and see similar provisions in Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.43(1) and (2).

<sup>60</sup> Contrast Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1976, s.16, as substituted by Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1989, s.49 ("religious belief or political opinions"), and cf. s.20 of the 1989 Act.

<sup>61</sup> cf. in another context, La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104, 129; below, p.963.

<sup>62</sup> [1966] 2 Q.B. 633.

<sup>63</sup> The statement in Mandla v Dowell Lee [1983] Q.B. 1, 8, 12 that discrimination on grounds which are not racial is "perfectly lawful" merely means that it does not amount to a contravention of the Race Relations Act 1976; the actual decision was reversed by the House of Lords [1983] 2 A.C. 548 on the ground that the discrimination did contravene the Act.

arguable that the courts might in this context take account of the fact that “freedom of . . . religion”<sup>64</sup> is one of the “freedoms” which have been “incorporated into the law of the United Kingdom”<sup>65</sup> by the Human Rights Act 1998. That Act does not in terms affect the validity of contracts between private persons,<sup>66</sup> but it is at least arguable that its enactment has altered the content of public policy in the United Kingdom and so left it open to the courts to declare that contracts are against public policy where their effects would be to infringe those freedoms.<sup>67</sup>

There are, finally, cases in which the courts may invalidate contracts or contractual provisions on what are essentially grounds of public policy without, as a general rule, making express reference to the doctrine of public policy, or to some established “head” of public policy. Some of the limitations on contractual capacity could be based on public policy: and indeed the former “incapacity”<sup>68</sup> of a barrister to make a contract with his client,<sup>69</sup> have been explained on this ground. At one time the invalidity of promises to pay extra wages to seamen who were already bound to serve<sup>70</sup> and of promises not to enforce claims which were known to be invalid<sup>71</sup> was explained on grounds of public policy; though it is now more common to base these rules on lack of consideration.<sup>72</sup> The rule against the assignment of “mere rights of action”<sup>73</sup> was not usually discussed under the heading of public policy, though it might well be considered to belong there.<sup>74</sup> The same is true of the rules under which penalty clauses are invalid,<sup>75</sup> and of some of the common law rules which limit the operation of exemption clauses.<sup>76</sup> All these rules could be regarded as disguised extensions or applications of the doctrine of public policy.

SECTION 3. EFFECTS OF ILLEGALITY

1. Enforcement

A contract affected by illegality is sometimes unenforceable by one party and sometimes unenforceable<sup>77</sup> by both. Where it is “wholly unenforceable because it is contrary to English law, it may . . . accurately be said to be void as a contract, that is, not to be a

<sup>64</sup> Human Rights Act 1998, Sch.1, Pt I, Art.9.

<sup>65</sup> ibid. s.1.

<sup>66</sup> See the reference to “public authorities” in s.6; and cf. above, p.4 n.31.

<sup>67</sup> The argument accordingly extends to the other freedoms referred to in Sch.1.

<sup>68</sup> Kennedy v Broun (1863) 13 C.B.(N.S.) 667 at 736.

<sup>69</sup> Rondel v Worsley [1969] 1 A.C. 191 at 264. See now Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s.61. The disapproval of Rondel v Worsley in Arthur J.S. Hall Ltd v Simons [2002] 1 A.C. 615 does not affect the present point: see above, p.78, n.2.

<sup>70</sup> Harris v Watson (1791) Peake 102; above, p.94.

<sup>71</sup> Wade v Simcon (1846) 2 C.B. 548; 564 (“almost contra bonos mores”); Edwards v Baugh (1843) 11 M. & W. 641 at 646.

<sup>72</sup> Stilk v Myrick (1809) as reported in 2 Camp. 317; Poteliakhoff v Teakle [1938] 2 K.B. 816; above, pp.89, 94.

<sup>73</sup> See below, p.695.

<sup>74</sup> Trendtex Trading Corp v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679 at 694.

<sup>75</sup> See below, pp.964–972. In Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1428 at 1446 and The Angelic Star [1988] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 122, 127, the rules invalidating penalty clauses are said to be based on public policy.

<sup>76</sup> e.g. above, pp.241–244: see the reference to “public policy” in HIH Casualty & General Insurance v Chase Manhattan Bank [2000] EWCA Civ 1250; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 483, at [103].

<sup>77</sup> Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2001] 1 W.L.R. 225 at 234.

contract at all"<sup>78</sup>, or to be "illegal and void".<sup>79</sup> In the restraint of trade cases, the illegality often affects only the term which imposes the restraint, and generally its effect is not to make the contract wholly void: it only makes the stipulation in restraint of trade unenforceable or "void"<sup>80</sup> in so far as it has not been performed.<sup>81</sup> It follows that, where one party voluntarily performs<sup>82</sup> another term of such a contract by paying money to the other, the payment cannot be recovered back from the payee; nor, if the contract is between more than two parties, can any other party to it prevent the payor from voluntarily making the payment to the payee.<sup>83</sup> A contract in restraint of trade would only be "wholly unenforceable" and "void" (in accordance with the statements quoted above) where the restraint formed the sole or principal subject-matter of the contract<sup>84</sup>; and it would also be appropriate to describe it as void where the law provided a third party with a remedy to prevent the parties to the contract from acting in accordance with it.<sup>85</sup>

A court will never "enforce" an illegal contract in the sense of ordering a party actually to do something that is unlawful or contrary to public policy.<sup>86</sup> But if A promises B £10 in return for B's promise to do such an act the court may sometimes award damages to A if B fails to do the act, or allow B to claim the £10 if he has actually done it. The law on this question is complex and not very satisfactory.<sup>87</sup>

Where, under the rules to be discussed below, the contract is unenforceable by one or both parties, the court "may refuse to enforce it even if illegality is not pleaded or alleged".<sup>88</sup> The unenforceability of illegal contracts rests on overriding grounds of public interest<sup>89</sup> and the present rule ensures that these cannot be circumvented by the litigation tactics of the parties to such transactions.

(1) Position of guilty party

An illegal contract cannot be enforced by a guilty party. Thus a person who hires a hall to deliver blasphemous lectures cannot sue for possession<sup>90</sup>; a landlord who lets premises

<sup>78</sup> Mackender v Feldia [1967] 2 Q.B. 590 at 601; cf. Arnhold Karberg & Co v Blythe, Green, Jourdain & Co [1915] 2 K.B. 379 at 388 ("illegal and void"); affirmed [1916] 1 K.B. 49; Customs & Excise Commissioners v Oliver [1980] 1 All E.R. 353 at 354, 355 ("void"). Clarke v Chadburn [1985] 1 W.L.R. 78, 81 ("void for illegality").

<sup>79</sup> Phoenix General Insurance Co of Greece SA v Halcunon General Insurance Co [1988] Q.B. 216 at 249, 267, 268 (as to which see above, p.434); Harbour Assurance (UK) Ltd v Kansa General International Insurance [1993] Q.B. 701 at 703, 724; Group Josi Re v Walbrook Insurance Co Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1152 at 1172. The assumption that, if the contracts had been held illegal, they would have been void also underlies Hughes v Asset Management plc [1995] 3 All E.R. 996, where the actual decision was that the contracts were not illegal: see above, p.434.

<sup>80</sup> Rock Refrigeration Ltd v Jones [1997] I.C.R. 938 at 948, 953.

<sup>81</sup> O'Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd [1985] Q.B. 428 at 469 at least "where, as here, the restriction is during the pendency of the agreement": ibid. at 447.

<sup>82</sup> See above, p.466.

<sup>83</sup> Boddington v Lattin [1994] I.C.R. 478.

<sup>84</sup> As in Amoco Australia Pty v Rocca Bros. Motor Engineering Pty Ltd [1975] A.C. 561, where acts done under the agreement were accordingly annulled with retrospective effect: below, p.509.

<sup>85</sup> See Newport Association Football Club v Football Association of Wales Ltd [1995] 2 All E.R. 87, above, p.466.

<sup>86</sup> e.g. to perform a contract if to do so would amount to a criminal offence: cf. above pp.432, 434.

<sup>87</sup> For an account of tentative proposals for reform, see below, p.472.

<sup>88</sup> Birkett v Acorn Business Machines Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 429 at 433; Snell v Unity Finance Co Ltd [1964] Q.B. 203; Charlton v Fisher [2001] E.W.C.A. Civ 112; [2002] Q.B. 518 at [80]. But facts giving rise to illegality must be pleaded where the contract is not ex facie illegal: Bank of India v Transcontinental Merchants Ltd [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 427.

<sup>89</sup> Birkett's case, above, at 435 ("the court's overriding duty to the public interest supersedes the interests of the parties in litigation"); Ammad v Geraghty & Co [2000] [2001] Q.B. 570 at 596.

<sup>90</sup> Cowan v Milbourn (1867) L.R. 2 Ex. 230.

with guilty intent cannot sue for rent<sup>91</sup>; and the owner of a brougham knowingly let to a prostitute for the purpose of her profession cannot sue for hire.<sup>92</sup> A guilty party cannot evade the rule by enforcing the contract indirectly.<sup>93</sup> Thus the court will set aside or refuse to enforce an arbitration award enforcing an illegal contract,<sup>94</sup> will refuse to order an account of money due under an illegal contract,<sup>95</sup> and will not administer the funds of an illegal association.<sup>96</sup> Nor, where an illegal contract purports to release rights under an earlier valid contract, will a guilty party be allowed to rely on the illegal contract by way of defence to a claim to enforce those rights.<sup>97</sup>

The traditional justification for the rule is that it exists, "not for the sake of the defendant, but because the courts will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff".<sup>98</sup> Thus it applies even though the defendant shares the plaintiff's guilt and even though its effect may be to allow the defendant to keep a substantial benefit for nothing. For example, where money has been lent under an illegal loan, a guilty lender cannot recover it from the borrower.<sup>99</sup> The rule is capable of producing harsh results,<sup>1</sup> particularly as a party may be "guilty" without being morally to blame<sup>2</sup>; and it has therefore been suggested that the rule should be displaced by a general principle that the courts will refuse to assist the plaintiff only where to do so "would be an affront to the public conscience."<sup>3</sup> This approach, and the difficulties inherent in it, are illustrated by Howard v Shirlstar Container Transport Ltd<sup>4</sup> where the defendants, who owned two aircraft which had been detained in Nigeria after a coup d'état, promised to pay $25,000 to the plaintiff if he flew the aircraft out of that country. The plaintiff did fly the aircraft out of Nigeria and in doing so he committed breaches of Nigerian air traffic control regulations; he did so in order to make good his escape, after he had been warned that his life and that of his wireless operator (who was also his fiancée) would be in danger if they stayed in Nigeria. It was held that the plaintiff's claim under the contract was not barred by illegality since "in the perilous and life-threatening circumstances . . . it would not amount to an affront to the public conscience to afford the plaintiff the relief he sought".<sup>5</sup> But it has been rightly said that such a vague test is "very difficult to apply"<sup>6</sup>; and the House of

<sup>91</sup> cf. Alexander v Rayson [1936] 1 K.B. 169; Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359.

<sup>92</sup> Pearce v Brooks (1866) 1 L.R. 1 Ex. 213; the court stressed that the owner knew of the use to which the brougham was to be put; cf. below, p.484.

<sup>93</sup> The Angel Bell [1981] Q.B. 65 at 72–73.

<sup>94</sup> David Taylor & Sons Ltd v Barnett Trading Co [1953] 1 W.L.R. 562; Soleimany v Soleimany [1999] Q.B. 785; and see above, p.450 at n.33. But this principle does not apply to findings of fact on which the legality of the contract depends: Binder v Alachouzou [1972] 2 Q.B. 151; nor does an arbitrator lack jurisdiction to determine whether a contract is illegal: Harbour Assurance (UK) Ltd v Kansa General International Insurance Co Ltd [1993] Q.B. 701; Arbitration Act 1996, s.30(1)(a); nor is he deprived of such jurisdiction merely because it is alleged that performance of an originally lawful contract subsequently became illegal: Prodeport v E D & F Man Ltd [1973] 1 Q.B. 389; Soleimany v Soleimany above, at 804.

<sup>95</sup> Victorian Daylesford Syndicate Ltd v Dotti [1905] 2 Ch. 624.

<sup>96</sup> Sykes v Beadon (1879) 11 Ch.D. 170; disapproved in Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch.D. 247, but not on this point; Shaw v Benson (1883) 11 Q.B.D. 563. The court can order repayment of such funds to the members or contributors: Barclay v Pearson [1893] 2 Ch. 154; Greenberg v Cooperstein [1926] Ch. 657.

<sup>97</sup> Royal Boskalis Westminster NV v Mountain [1997] 2 All E.R. 929 (Phillips L.J. dissenting on this point).

<sup>98</sup> Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp. 341 at 343; Soleimany v Soleimany [1999] Q.B. 785 at 800.

<sup>99</sup> Boissevain v Weil [1950] A.C. 372; Spector v Ageda [1973] Ch. 30. cf. Shanshal v Al Kishitaini [2001] EWCA Civ 264; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 601, also holding that his position is not affected by Human Rights Act 1998, Sch.1, Pt II.

<sup>1</sup> Birkett v Azon Business Machines Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 429 at 434.

<sup>2</sup> See below, p.484.

<sup>3</sup> Euro-Diam Ltd v Bathurst [1990] Q.B. 1 at 35. cf. (in the context of recovery of property obtained illegally) Thuckwell v Barclays Bank plc [1986] 1 All E.R. 676 at 687.

<sup>4</sup> [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1292.

<sup>5</sup> ibid. at 1301.

<sup>6</sup> Pitts v Hunt [1991] 1 Q.B. 24 at 56.

Lords has accordingly rejected the “public conscience” test as one which can determine whether a guilty party should be allowed to enforce an illegal contract.<sup>7</sup> Howard v Shirlstar Container Transport Ltd has been explained<sup>8</sup> instead as an illustration of the principle of St John SS Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd,<sup>9</sup> i.e. on the ground that the purpose of the legislation was not to invalidate contracts but only to prohibit conduct. In applying this principle, it may be relevant that in Howard’s case there were no passengers on board the aircraft, and that it made its escape by flying low over the sea. A different view might have been taken if an aircraft with passengers on board had (in breach of air traffic regulations) been flown low over a densely populated area. To have allowed the pilot in such circumstances to enforce the contract might well have been thought to contravene the purpose of the legislation. The rule that a guilty party cannot enforce an illegal contract therefore survives; but its severity is mitigated in two ways.

First, the rule only prevents a guilty party from enforcing the contract: it does not prevent him from recovering damages in tort where the other party’s conduct constitutes, not merely a breach of the illegal contract, but also an independent tort.<sup>10</sup> This was the position in Saunders v Edwards,<sup>11</sup> where a contract had been made for the sale of a flat and the furniture in it; the purchasers had been induced to enter into the contract by the vendor’s fraudulent misrepresentation that the premises included a roof-garden. The contract was also illegal<sup>12</sup> in that £5,000 of the agreed price of £45,000 was attributed to the furniture, which was worth no more than £1,000: this was apparently done at the suggestion of the purchasers, with a view to saving them the relatively small sum of £300 in stamp duty. Their claim for damages of over £7,000 for the vendor’s deceit was nevertheless upheld. One reason for this result was that the purchasers were “not seeking to enforce the contract”<sup>13</sup> but only to claim damages in tort.<sup>14</sup> Another was that, in deciding whether to allow the tort claim, the court could, and should, have regard to the “relative moral culpability”<sup>15</sup> of the parties: the purchasers’ fairly moderate tax evasion was outweighed by the vendor’s more serious fraud. It is an open question whether this reasoning can survive the rejection of the “public conscience” test<sup>16</sup>; and, even if it can, there will still be situations in which a guilty party to an illegal contract will not be able to succeed merely by formulating his claim in tort. Thus in Ashton v Turner<sup>17</sup> one of two persons who had agreed (when drunk) to commit burglary together

<sup>7</sup> Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340 at 358–361 and 363–364, per Lord Goff, who dissented in the result but with whose views on the present point all the other members of the House of Lords directly or indirectly expressed their agreement; Webb v Chief Constable of Merseyside Police [2000] Q.B. 427 at 445.

<sup>8</sup> ibid. at 360.

<sup>9</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. 267, above, p.429.

<sup>10</sup> For similar principle governing claims for the recovery of money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract, see below, pp.492–493. cf. Leighton v Michael & Charterhouse [1995] 1 C.L.R. 1091 and Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2001] 1 W.L.R. 225 (illegality of employment contract no bar to claim for unlawful sex discrimination). Cf. Evans v Souls Garages Ltd, The Times, January 23, 2001 (sale of petrol to minor prohibited by statute but seller liable to such a buyer in tort).

<sup>11</sup> [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1116. cf. The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 35 at 63 (“because the plaintiff does not have to rely upon or plead the illegality”).

<sup>12</sup> On the principle of Alexander v Rayson [1936] 1 K.B. 169, above, p.450.

<sup>13</sup> [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1116 at 1125.

<sup>14</sup> cf. the successful tort claim in Elder v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359 in respect of a bath wrongfully removed by the tenant of premises let under an illegal lease.

<sup>15</sup> [1987] 1 W.L.R. at p.1127.

<sup>16</sup> See above, p.482. In Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340 the House of Lords do not refer to Saunders v Edwards, above; while Ralph Gibson L.J. (whose views on this issue eventually prevailed) explained that case as turning on the first of the two reasons stated in the text above: [1992] Ch. 310 at 332. After Tinsley v Milligan dicta in Saunders v Edwards at 1134 cannot stand so far as they relate to the claim in contract.

<sup>17</sup> [1981] Q.B. 137; semble there was no animus contrahendi and hence no contract. cf. Pitts v Hunt [1991] 1 Q.B. 24; Gala v Preston (1991) 172 C.L.R. 243.

sued the other for injuries inflicted by the latter when negligently driving the get-away car. The action failed as it would have been obviously contrary to public policy to allow such a claim.

Secondly, there is some latitude in determining who is a "guilty" party where the illegality lies in the method of performance. For the present purpose, a party is not guilty merely because he performs a contract in an unlawful manner. Thus the shipowner in St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd<sup>18</sup> succeeded in his claim for freight although he had overloaded his ship; but he could not have enforced the contract if he had at the time of contracting intended to overload his ship.<sup>19</sup> Similarly, a seller of fish succeeded in his claim for the price even though, after the contract was made, he committed an offence by sending a false invoice to the buyer with the intention of postponing the payment of VAT on the sale<sup>20</sup>; but it seems that his claim would have failed if at the time of the sale he had already formed the intention of issuing the false invoice. The same rules apply where the offending conduct is not contrary to law, but (for example) immoral. Thus an employee would not be precluded from enforcing a contract of employment which was lawful in itself merely because he had, in the course of performing it, procured prostitutes for his employer's clients<sup>21</sup>; but if he had agreed to do this when entering into the contract he could not have enforced it.<sup>22</sup> Where the intention that one party should do an unlawful (or immoral) act exists at the time of contracting, even the other party may be unable to sue on the contract. In Ashmore, Benson, Pease & Co Ltd v A V Dawson Ltd<sup>23</sup> a contract to carry two 25-ton loads was performed by using lorries which could not lawfully carry loads of more than 20 tons. This was known both to the carrier and to the owner of the goods, whose claim for damage done to them in the course of transit was rejected as he not only knew of the illegality but "participated" in it. "Participation" here means that he assented to a method of performance which he knew to be illegal,<sup>24</sup> and that he hoped to benefit from it by saving the extra expense of having the goods carried on different vehicles.

(2) Position of innocent party

For the present purpose, a person may be "innocent" because he is mistaken, or ignorant, about either the law or the facts.

(a) IGNORANCE OR MISTAKE OF LAW. In general, this does not give a party the right to enforce a contract which is affected by illegality. In Nash v Stevenson Transport Ltd<sup>25</sup> A agreed to allow B to use goods vehicle licences taken out by A in his own name. This arrangement was made in good faith, but by statute it involved both parties in criminal liability. It was held that A could not sue for the money promised to him under the

<sup>18</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. 267; cf. Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 Q.B. 504. S.A. Ancien Maison Marcel Bauche v Woodhouse Drake & Carey (Sugar) Ltd [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 516 at 529; Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First National Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 C.L.R. 410, as explained in Phoenix General Ins Co of Greece SA v Halvanson General Ins Co Ltd [1988] Q.B. 216 (as to which see above, p.434); Euro-Diam Ltd v Bathurst [1990] Q.B. 1.

<sup>19</sup> [1957] 1 Q.B. at p.283; cf. Fielding & Platt Ltd v Najjar [1969] 1 W.L.R. 357. Quaere whether in the St John Shipping case the test of intention would have been strictly subjective. If the shipowner had made a single contract for so much cargo that his ship would inevitably be overloaded, would the court have said that he "must have" intended at the time of contracting to break the law?

<sup>20</sup> Skilton v Sullivan, The Times, March 25, 1994.

<sup>21</sup> Coral Leisure Group v Barnett [1981] I.C.R. 503.

<sup>22</sup> ibid. at 509.

<sup>23</sup> [1973] 1 W.L.R. 828; Hamson [1973] C.L.J. 199.

<sup>24</sup> Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2001] 1 W.L.R. 215 at 234 ("knowingly participated . . .").

<sup>25</sup> [1936] 2 K.B. 128; cf. Corby v Morrison [1980] I.C.R. 218; Mohamed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815 at 1820, 1824, 1827.

contract. Similarly a person could not enforce a contract in restraint of trade merely because he thought that such contracts were valid.

In these cases the performance or enforcement of the contract necessarily involves a breach of the law, or a result which is contrary to public policy. Where this is not the position, the effect of mistake of law is harder to determine. In Waugh v Morris<sup>26</sup> a ship was chartered to carry hay from a French port to London. The cargo was to be taken from the ship “alongside,” and the master was orally instructed to deliver it to a wharf in Deptford Creek. This could not lawfully be done because, before the time of contracting, an order had, unknown to the parties, been made prohibiting the landing of hay from French ports in the United Kingdom. The hay was therefore transshipped and exported. It was held that the shipowner could sue on the charterparty as it could have been, and in fact had been, performed lawfully. But in J M Allan (Merchandising) Ltd v Cloke<sup>27</sup> a roulette wheel was let on hire for the purpose of enabling the hirer to play roulette royale at a country club. Both parties honestly thought that this game was lawful when it was not. It was held that the owner of the wheel could not sue for payment of the agreed hire. One reason for the decision was that the parties had a “common design to use the subject-matter for an unlawful purpose”.<sup>28</sup> But it is equally true that in Waugh v Morris the parties had a common design to land the hay in Deptford, and that this was an unlawful purpose. Alternatively, there was in Cloke’s case an actual contract that the wheel should be used for playing roulette royale<sup>29</sup>: the position was as it would have been in Waugh v Morris, had the contract there been to land the hay at Deptford and not deliver it “alongside”. It is, of course, possible that the hirer could, without committing a breach of contract, have used the wheel to play some other game; but this would not alter the fact that the owner had contracted to provide facilities for playing roulette royale. Thus if one party cannot perform his obligations without committing or abetting a breach of the law he cannot enforce the contract even though he was “innocent” in the sense that he made a mistake of law.

(b) IGNORANCE OR MISTAKE OF FACT. A party may be innocent in the sense of being unaware of, or mistaken about, the facts which give rise to the illegality. The right of such a party to enforce the contract has been upheld in some cases but denied in others; even where it has been denied, other remedies may be available to the innocent party.

(i) Cases upholding the innocent party’s claim. One such case has already been considered: a printer can probably recover his charges for printing a document containing statements which, as a result of facts unknown to him, are defamatory.<sup>30</sup> An actual decision in favour of the innocent party is Bloxsome v Williams<sup>31</sup> where a person sold a horse on a Sunday and thereby committed an offence under the Sunday Observance Act 1677,<sup>32</sup> as he was a dealer. The buyer did not know that the seller was a dealer and recovered the money he had paid for the horse as damages for breach of warranty. Bloxsome v Williams was doubted in the Bedford Insurance<sup>33</sup> case, where a company issued insurance policies in violation of a statutory prohibition against “the effecting and carrying out of [certain] contracts of insurance” without government authorisation. The policies were described as “illegal and void ab initio”; and it was said that the insured

<sup>26</sup> (1873) L.R. 8 Q.B. 202; cf. Hindley & Co Ltd v General Fibre Co Ltd [1940] 2 K.B. 217; Lloyd v Popeley [2001] C.L.Y. 743.

<sup>27</sup> [1963] 2 Q.B. 340.

<sup>28</sup> ibid. at 348.

<sup>29</sup> [1963] 2 Q.B. 340 at 351.

<sup>30</sup> cf. Clay v Yates (1856) 1 H. & N. 73; above, p.433.

<sup>31</sup> (1824) 3 B. & C. 232; cf. Newland v Simons & Willer [1981] I.C.R. 521.

<sup>32</sup> Repealed by Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1969 Sch. Pt IV.

<sup>33</sup> [1985] Q.B. 966.

person, though innocent, acquired no rights under the policies "for it would be an offence for the insurer to pay him."<sup>34</sup> In the case of such contracts, this result has been reversed by statute,<sup>35</sup> and, even if the reasoning is sound as a matter of common law, it does not follow that Bloxsome v Williams was wrongly decided; for the buyer in that case was claiming, not delivery of the horse, but the return of his money. In upholding this claim, the court was not ordering the defendant to do an act prohibited by statute. This was also the position in Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v Spanglett Ltd,<sup>36</sup> where the defendants contracted to carry the claimants' whisky in a van which was not licensed to carry goods belonging to third parties. In carrying the whisky in this van, the defendants committed a statutory offence. The whisky was stolen and the claimants, who did not know that the van was not properly licensed, recovered the value of the whisky as damages for breach of the contract. And in Fielding & Platt Ltd v Najjar<sup>37</sup> an English seller of machinery agreed to give the foreign buyer an invoice in a form requested by the buyer so that he could use it to deceive the authorities in his own country. It was held that the seller could sue on the contract as he did not either know of the illegality or actively participate in it.

(ii) Cases rejecting the innocent party's claim. The leading case in this group is Re Mahmoud and Ispahani,<sup>38</sup> where a contract was made to sell linseed oil at a time when it was (under delegated legislation) an offence to buy or sell such oil without licence. The seller had a licence to sell to other licensed dealers and was induced to enter into the contract by the buyer's fraudulent representation that he also had a licence. The buyer later refused to accept the oil, and it was held that the seller could not claim damages for non-acceptance, even if his lack of mens rea would exonerate him from criminal liability. Similarly, it has been held that builders who did work in the bona fide but mistaken belief that the necessary licences had been obtained could not enforce the contracts under which the work was done.<sup>39</sup> And, although the point has not been decided, it seems that mistake of fact would not entitle an innocent person to enforce a contract in restraint of trade or one to trade with the enemy. Thus the buyer of a shop whose customers all lived within one mile of it could not enforce a covenant against competition within 20 miles merely because he believed that the customers lived within the larger area. And a person who made a contract with a resident of an enemy country could not enforce it merely because he did not know that war had just broken out between the United Kingdom and that country.<sup>40</sup>

(iii) Tests for distinguishing the two groups of cases. Various tests have been suggested for distinguishing between the cases in which the innocent party can, and those in which he cannot, enforce the contract. One is to say that the contract can be enforced by the innocent party so long as it is not ex facie illegal. But if the contract is ex facie illegal and one party is innocent his mistake is almost always one of law; and the mere fact that the contract is ex facie legal is certainly not enough to enable the innocent party to sue.<sup>41</sup>

<sup>34</sup> ibid. p.982; approved in Phoenix General Insurance Co of Greece SA v Halvanon Insurance Co Ltd [1988] Q.B. 216; Re Cavalier Insurance Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430, see above, p.434; see also Fuji Finance Inc v Aetna Life Insurance Co Ltd [1997] Ch. 173 (where conflicting views were expressed on the effects on contracts of the breach of a statute which did not amount to an offence) and Parks v Esso Petroleum Co Ltd [1999] 1 C.M.L.R. 445 (where on appeal it was held that there was no illegality: [2000] Eu.L.R. 25).

<sup>35</sup> See now Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.26(1) and 32; above, p.434; below, p.488.

<sup>36</sup> [1961] 1 Q.B. 374.

<sup>37</sup> [1969] 1 W.L.R. 357.

<sup>38</sup> [1921] 2 K.B. 716; cf. Yin v San [1962] A.C. 304; Williams, 8 C.L.J. 51; Buckley, 38 M.L.R. 535; Treitel, in (ed. Tapper) Essays in Memory of Sir Rupert Cross, pp.96-99.

<sup>39</sup> J Dennis & Co Ltd v Munn [1949] 2 K.B. 327; and see below, p.489.

<sup>40</sup> For discharge by supervening illegality in such cases see below, p.887.

<sup>41</sup> e.g. Re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 K.B. 716.

Another suggestion is that the innocent party can enforce the contract where it is illegal as performed but not where it is illegal as formed. But in Bloxsome v Williams the innocent party's claim was upheld even though the contract was illegal as formed. Moreover, in Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spangle Ltd the Court of Appeal regarded it as irrelevant whether the contract was to carry the whisky in the particular van, and yet this fact would be crucial if enforceability depended on whether the contract was illegal as formed or as performed. A third suggestion is that the innocent party's claim will succeed in cases of common law but not of statutory illegality. But this again does not fit the cases: in Bloxsome v Williams and Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spangle Ltd the innocent party succeeded although the illegality was statutory. And if the suggestions made at the end of the last paragraph are sound there are cases in which the innocent party will fail although the illegality is brought about by common law. It is, moreover, hard to see why the innocent party's rights should depend on the distinction between statutory and common law illegality.

That distinction can, of course, be decisive where the illegality is statutory and the statute expressly or by implication specifies its effect on contracts. On the one hand, the statute may expressly provide that the validity of the contract is not to be affected. It is, for example, an offence under s.65(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 to supply certain vehicles which do not comply with specified safety requirements; and s.65(4) provides that "nothing in subsection (1) . . . shall affect the validity of any contract or any rights arising under or in relation to a contract".<sup>42</sup> On the other hand, the statute may expressly or impliedly provide that even an innocent party is not to be entitled to enforce the contract. This possibility was formerly illustrated by the cases, already mentioned,<sup>43</sup> in which insurance policies were issued in the course of a business carried on without government authorisation, thus making the insurers who had issued them guilty of a statutory offence; the general view was that such policies could not be enforced even by an insured person who was quite innocent of the illegality. This result was thought<sup>44</sup> to follow from the wording of the statute, which was considered to have impliedly invalidated the contract by prohibiting the "carrying out" of the policies. But to deny a remedy to the innocent party certainly did not promote the policy of the statutory requirement,<sup>45</sup> which had been imposed on insurers for the protection of insured persons; and the law in cases of this kind has been changed by the Financial Services and

<sup>42</sup> cf. ibid., s.75(7); Fair Trading Act 1973, s.26; Sex Discrimination Act 1975, ss.62(1), 77; (as amended by Sex Discrimination Act 1986, s.6 and Trade Union Reform and Employment Protection Act 1993 s.32); Race Relations Act 1976, ss.53(1), 72 (as amended by Trade Union Reform and Employment Protection Act 1993, s.39(2) and Sch.6); Energy Conservation Act 1981, s.18; Property Misdescriptions Act 1991, s.1(4); Timeshare Act 1992, s.4(2); Criminal Justice Act 1993, s.63(2), the effect of which appears to be to reverse this aspect of Chase Manhattan Equities Ltd v Goodman [1991] B.C.L.C. 897; Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s.26.

<sup>43</sup> Viz., the Bedford case [1985] 1 Q.B. 966 and the Phoenix case, [1988] Q.B. 216, above, p.434. The statements were strictly obiter since in the Bedford case the action was by a guilty insurer against an innocent reinsurer while in the Phoenix case no offence had been committed. For cases following or approving reasoning of these cases see Re Cavalier Ins Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430; Overseas Union Insurance Ltd v Incorporated General Insurance Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 439 at 444-445; D.R. Insurance Co v Seguros America Banamex [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 120.

<sup>44</sup> Though with evident reluctance: see the Phoenix case [1988] Q.B. 216 at 249, 273; Re Cavalier Ins Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 440 at 443 ("without enthusiasm").

<sup>45</sup> From this point of view, the result in Stewart v Oriental Fire & Marine Ins Co Ltd [1985] 1 Q.B. 988 (giving the innocent party a remedy on the contract against the guilty party) was preferable to the reasoning of the authorities cited in n.43, above. cf. Clarke [1987] L.M.C.L.Q. 201; D.R. Insurance Co Ltd v Central National Insurance Co [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 74.

Markets Act 2000.<sup>46</sup> This lays down the general principle that, where A provides specified financial services to B without A's having the requisite authorisation, then the contract is unenforceable against (not by) B,<sup>47</sup> who is also entitled to the return of money paid or property transferred by him under it, and to compensation for loss suffered by him as a result of having parted with the money or property.<sup>48</sup> However, if A (no less than B) is innocent of the illegality, then the court may exceptionally allow the contract to be enforced and money or property transferred under it to be retained.<sup>49</sup>

Where the statute does not expressly or by implication specify the effects of the illegality on contracts,<sup>50</sup> those effects are, it is submitted, to be determined by reference to the purpose of the statute. This approach is suggested by Devlin L.J. in Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd, where he said: "I think that the purpose of this statute is sufficiently served by the penalties prescribed for the offender; the avoidance of the contract would cause grave inconvenience and injury to members of the public without furthering the object of the statute."<sup>51</sup> Although Devlin L.J. refers only to statutory illegality, it is submitted that the same approach would be appropriate where the illegality was due to a rule of common law<sup>52</sup>: the court has to consider how it would further the object of the relevant rule of law to invalidate the contract. Where the rule exists for the protection of a class of persons, its object will obviously not be promoted by rejecting a claim to enforce the contract made by an innocent member of that class.<sup>53</sup> In other cases, it is more difficult to strike a balance between the interests of the public (which the invalidating rule is meant to protect) and those of the innocent party. Of course specific performance of promise to do an act that is unlawful or against public policy will not be ordered. The questions are whether, if the guilty party has failed to perform such a promise, the innocent party should be entitled to damages; and whether, if the latter party has innocently done such an act, he should be entitled to enforce the guilty party's counter-promise (typically, one to pay the agreed sum<sup>54</sup>). In what way does it ever "further the object" of the invalidating rule to deny the innocent party such a remedy?

One possible answer to this question is that the denial of a remedy may induce the innocent party to take greater care not to enter into an illegal transaction. Another is that a remedy should be refused whenever the contract is executory, since the availability of such a remedy might induce the other (guilty) party to perform. But where these arguments are sound, the innocent party should have no remedy at all, or at least no

<sup>46</sup> For earlier similar provisions, see Financial Services Act 1986, s.132. That Act is repealed by Financial Services and Markets Act (Consequential Amendments and Repeals) Order 2001 (SI 2000/3649), Art.1(c).

<sup>47</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.26(1), 27(1).

<sup>48</sup> ibid., ss.26(2), 27(2); if B elects not to perform or claims restitution he must in turn restore benefits received by him under the contract: s.28(7).

<sup>49</sup> ibid., s.28(3)–(6).

<sup>50</sup> There may be a provision which is incomplete: e.g. Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s.35, which deals only with contracts for the supply of goods and not with contracts for the supply of services, though both types of contracts may be affected by the Act.

<sup>51</sup> [1961] 1 Q.B. 374 at 390.

<sup>52</sup> cf. Cope v Rowlands (1836) 2 M. & W. 149 at 157 ("expressly forbidden by the common law or statute law"), cited in Hughes v Asset Management plc [1995] 3 All E.R. 669 at 674.

<sup>53</sup> See Nash v Halifax Building Society [1979] Ch. 584, so far as it relates to the enforcement of the security; cf. Hughes v Asset Management plc [1995] 3 All E.R. 669 at 674, 675, where, however, the actual decision that the contract was not illegal operated against the innocent party in that it led to the rejection of his claim for the recovery of money paid by him under the contract; if the contract had been illegal, such a claim by a member of the protected class might have succeeded under the rule stated at p.491 below. The contract cannot of course be enforced against a member of the protected class: Johnson v Moreton [1980] A.C. 37.

<sup>54</sup> It is assumed that the making of the payment is not prohibited.

remedy as good as the action on the contract. In fact the innocent party who cannot enforce the contract may have other remedies, and one of these seems to be no worse than an action on the contract. There are three such remedies.

(iv) Other remedies of innocent party. First, the innocent party may be able to recover damages for breach of "collateral warranty." In Strongman (1945) Ltd v Sincock<sup>55</sup> the defendant employed a firm of builders to modernise his house. He promised to get the necessary licences (without which it was illegal to do the work), but he got licences for only part of the work and refused to pay for the rest on the ground that the contract to do it was illegal. The builders could not enforce the contract although they had acted in good faith. But they recovered damages (amounting to the value of the unlicensed work) for breach of the defendant's collateral undertaking to get the necessary licences. This is a useful device for doing justice to the innocent party, and in Strongman (1945) Ltd v Sincock little harm was done to the public interest. For in that case the defendant was an architect so that the builders were not careless<sup>56</sup> in failing to ask to see the licence. And the work had been completed, so that it would have been futile to deny a remedy on the ground that to grant it might induce the performance of an illegal act. But to allow the innocent party to sue on a "collateral warranty" in a case like Re Mahmoud and Isphani<sup>57</sup> would be quite inconsistent with the rationale of the rule denying him a remedy on the contract. It would be mere sophistry to say: we will protect the public interest by denying a remedy on the contract, but we will also protect the innocent claimant by giving him as good a remedy on a collateral warranty. This remedy should be granted only where it will provide no incentive to do the illegal act and where the innocent party was not careless. But if these conditions are satisfied there seems to be no reason why the innocent party should not be able to enforce on the contract itself. Alternatively, the innocent party could be given a restitutionary claim for the reasonable value of his services. This follows a fortiori from the suggestion (to be discussed later in this Chapter)<sup>58</sup> that such a remedy may sometimes be available even to the guilty party.

Secondly, the innocent party may be able to recover damages in tort for misrepresentation. In Shelley v Paddock<sup>59</sup> the claimant was by the fraud of the defendant induced to enter into a contract to buy a house in Spain and to make payments under it which were illegal as they violated exchange control regulations. Since the claimant's breach of the law was innocent and resulted from the defendant's fraud, she was entitled to damages for that fraud. Even where the misrepresentation was not fraudulent, a person who had, as a result of it, innocently entered into an illegal contract might similarly be entitled to damages, either for negligence at common law<sup>60</sup> or under the Misrepresentation Act 1967; and he might also be able to rescind the contract. But these remedies could be less advantageous than an action on the contract as they would not give the innocent party damages for loss of his bargain.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>55</sup> [1955] 2 Q.B. 525.

<sup>56</sup> ibid. at 536.

<sup>57</sup> [1921] 2 K.B. 716; above, p.486.

<sup>58</sup> See below p.503.

<sup>59</sup> [1980] Q.B. 348; cf. Burrows v Rhodes [1899] 1 Q.B. 816 and Saunders v Edwards [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1116 (above, p.483), where even a "guilty" party recovered damages for a fraud unconnected with the illegality.

<sup>60</sup> Mohammed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815 at 1826.

<sup>61</sup> cf. above, p.359, below, p.513. In Shelley v Paddock, above, the damages did not include any element of compensation for loss of the claimant's bargain: see [1979] Q.B. 120. In Mohamed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815 at 1826 Lord Bingham C.J. said that he could not "conceive that the plaintiff could be regarded as recovering anything under this head [i.e., in tort] as damages which he would be debarred from recovering under the contract".

Thirdly, innocence may be material in an action for the recovery of money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract.<sup>62</sup> The object of the invalidating rule is less likely to be defeated by this remedy than by an award of damages for breach of contract since it amounts rather to an undoing<sup>63</sup> than to an enforcement<sup>64</sup> of the contract. The remedy may, however, be less advantageous than any of those so far discussed, for under it the claimant can only get back what he gave: he cannot recover in respect of other losses incurred in reliance on the contract, or for loss of his bargain.

(3) De facto enforcement

A contract which is illegal may be enforced de facto in the sense that one party may secure compliance with its terms by using or threatening to use some form of economic pressure. Such measures may be taken in good faith, and the question then arises whether the party who is thus induced to perform a contract that was not binding on him has any remedy in respect of loss suffered in consequence. In Shell U.K. Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd<sup>65</sup> a garage proprietor was in effect compelled to observe the terms of a solus agreement by the oil company's threats that, if other suppliers were to sell petrol to him, it would sue them for inducing a breach of the solus agreement. Lord Denning M.R. held that the solus agreement was unenforceable and that the garage proprietor was entitled to damages in respect of the loss he had suffered through being nevertheless compelled to observe it.<sup>66</sup> Ormrod L.J. held that no such damages were available,<sup>67</sup> while Bridge L.J. awarded them on the different ground that the oil company was in breach of an implied term of its contract with the garage proprietor.<sup>68</sup> Lord Denning held that no such term could be implied,<sup>69</sup> so that the damages awarded by him cannot have been for breach of contract. His award seems rather to have been based on the novel principle, that the de facto enforcement of an illegal contract can, if it causes loss, give rise to a claim for damages. The correctness of this principle, as well as its extent, await further judicial consideration.

The above discussion is based on the assumption that performance of the illegal contract has actually been secured. Before this has happened, the court may be able to intervene to prevent such performance: e.g. by an injunction to restrain a party from drawing on a letter of credit issued to secure payment under an illegal contract. Since the effect of such a remedy is to prevent illegality, it may be granted even to the guilty party.<sup>70</sup>

2. Restitution

A person who cannot enforce an illegal contract may instead claim restitution in respect of money paid, property transferred or services rendered by him under the contract.

<sup>62</sup> cf. below, pp.492–493.

<sup>63</sup> This was the outcome of Bloxsome v Williams (1824) 3 B. & C. 232 (above, p.485) where the buyer's claim was for "damages" but the amount that he recovered was the price paid by him.

<sup>64</sup> 'This was the nature of the claim unsuccessfully made by the seller in Re Mahmoud and Isphani [1921] 2 K.B. 716 (above, p.486); if he had actually delivered the oil to the buyer he could no doubt have recovered it back: below, p.492.

<sup>65</sup> [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1187.

<sup>66</sup> ibid. at 1200; cf. under Art.81 of the E.C. Treaty, Courage Ltd v Crehan [2002] Q.B. 507.

<sup>67</sup> [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1187 at 1200–1201.

<sup>68</sup> ibid. at 1204.

<sup>69</sup> See above, p.205, Ormrod L.J. agreed with Lord Denning on this point.

<sup>70</sup> Group Josi Re v Walbrook Insurance Co Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1152 at 1164, where the actual decision was that the performance of the contracts was saved from illegality by legislation of the kind described at p.487, above after n.45 so that no injunction was available.

(1) General rule: no recovery of money or property

The general rule is that money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract cannot be recovered back.<sup>71</sup> At one time the rule could be justified by saying that the courts should not give any help to a willing party to an illegal transaction; and by the argument that, by leaving one party at the mercy of the other, the rule had a deterrent effect. The first of these arguments is no longer wholly convincing now that a person may in all innocence make a contract that is technically illegal; and the second overlooks the possibility that sometimes illegality may be more effectively discouraged by allowing than by denying recovery. If, for example, a person receives money in the course of conducting an illegal business, the illegality is more likely to be deterred by making him pay the money back, than by allowing him to rely on the rule of non-recovery.<sup>72</sup> It would be better if the law did not adopt a "general rule" but asked in relation to each type of illegality whether it was recovery or non-recovery that was the more likely to promote the purpose of the invalidating rule. In practice the present general rule is subject to so many exceptions that the law, taken as a whole, comes close to achieving this result.

(2) Exceptional cases: recovery of money or property possible

(a) CLASS-PROTECTING STATUTES. If a contract is made illegal by a statute passed for the protection of a class of persons, a member of that class can recover back money paid or property transferred by him under the contract.<sup>73</sup> Some statutes expressly provide that a member of a protected class shall be entitled to recover back money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract. For example, the Rent Act 1977 contains various provisions entitling a tenant to recover back money which he could not lawfully have been required to pay<sup>74</sup>; and in a case decided under an earlier Act it was held that he could recover back an illegal premium even though he was a willing party to a fraudulent scheme to evade the Act.<sup>75</sup> The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 similarly provides that, where A provides specified financial services to B without A's having the required authorisation, B is prima facie entitled to the return of money paid or property transferred by him under the contract<sup>76</sup>; he is so entitled even though he also has the option of enforcing the contract.<sup>77</sup>

There was at one time some support for the view that the prevalence of such statutory provisions had made the old class-protecting rules obsolete.<sup>78</sup> But this view was rejected

<sup>71</sup> e.g. Scott v Brown [1892] 2 Q.B. 724; Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359; cf. Shaw v Shaw [1965] 1 W.L.R. 537. See generally Grodecki, 71 L.Q.R. 254; Higgins, 25 M.L.R. 598; Rose in (ed. Rose), Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel, p.202.

<sup>72</sup> cf. Hermann v Charlesworth [1905] 2 K.B. 123.

<sup>73</sup> Browning v Morris (1778) 2 Cowp. 790; Barclay v Pearson [1893] 2 Ch. 154; Bonnard v Dott [1906] 1 Ch. 740 (unlicensed moneylender); One Life Ltd v Roy [1996] 2 B.C.I.C. 608 (unlawful lottery). In Lodge v National Union Investment Co [1907] 1 Ch. 300 it was held that the borrower could not recover his securities unless he repaid the money actually lent to him; but this decision has been distinguished out of existence: Chapman v Michaelson [1908] 2 Ch. 612; [1909] 1 Ch. 238; Cohen v J Lester Ltd [1939] 1 K.B. 504; Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] A.C. 539; cf. Barclay v Prospect Mortgages [1974] 1 W.L.R. 837. Under Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.40(1), a regulated agreement with an unlicensed moneylender is not illegal but only unenforceable against the debtor unless the Office of Fair Trading orders otherwise.

<sup>74</sup> e.g. ss.57, 95, 125.

<sup>75</sup> Gray v Southouse [1949] 2 All E.R. 1019. For enforcement of the remainder of the contract by "unwilling victims" see Ailon v Spiekermann [1976] Ch. 158 at 165.

<sup>76</sup> Financial Services Markets Act 2000 ss.26(2), 27(2); above, p.449; and see ibid. for the courts power under s.28(3)–(6) to deny B's claim for restitution.

<sup>77</sup> Under ss.26(1) and 27(1) of the 2000 Act, the contract is only "unenforceable against" (not by) B.

<sup>78</sup> Green v Portsmouth Stadium [1953] 2 K.B. 190, esp. at 195.

in Kiriri Cotton Ltd v Dewani,<sup>79</sup> where a landlord had, by accepting an illegal premium from his tenant, committed an offence under a Rent Restriction Ordinance which did not expressly say that such premiums could be recovered back. The Privy Council held that the tenant could recover back the premium under the old rules relating to class-protecting statutes. Similarly, premiums paid under an illegal insurance policy of the kind described above could be recovered back by the innocent policy-holder at common law,<sup>80</sup> even before such a right of recovery was expressly conferred on him by legislation of the kind described in the preceding paragraph.<sup>81</sup>

(b) OPPRESSION. A person can recover back money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract if he was forced by the other party to enter into that contract. "Oppression" is here used in a somewhat broad sense. In Atkinson v Denby<sup>82</sup> an insolvent debtor offered to pay his creditors a dividend of 5s. in the £. All the creditors were willing to accept the dividend in full settlement of their claims, except the defendant, who said he would accept it only if the debtor first paid him £50. The debtor did so, but was later allowed to recover back the £50 on the ground that he had been forced to agree to defraud the other creditors. To say that the debtor was oppressed may not be very convincing; but it was a convenient way of avoiding the general rule of non-recovery where that rule would have led to the undesirable result of enabling one creditor to keep more than his fair share of the insolvent debtor's assets.

The "oppression" may be due, not to the conduct of the other party, but to extraneous circumstances, and such "oppression" has been recognised as a ground of recovery where the contract is made illegal by a statute passed for the protection of a class. Thus in Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani Lord Denning said that the tenant was not "so much to blame" for evading the Rent Restriction Ordinance as the landlord, who was "using his property rights so as to exploit those in need of a roof over their heads".<sup>83</sup> In an American case oppression not caused by the defendant was recognised as a ground of recovery where a person had paid a bribe to escape from the danger of being imprisoned and put to death by the Nazis.<sup>84</sup> Less extreme forms of pressure have in England not been regarded as a ground for recovery. In Bigos v Boustead<sup>85</sup> a father made an illegal contract to acquire foreign currency in order to send his daughter to Italy as a cure for her recurrent attacks of pleurisy. This "pressure" did not entitle him to recover back property transferred under the contract.

(c) MISREPRESENTATION. A person can recover back money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract if he entered into the contract as a result of the other party's fraudulent misrepresentation that the contract was lawful. Thus in Hughes v Liverpool Victoria Legal Friendly Soc<sup>86</sup> the claimant effected a policy of insurance with the defendants on a life in which he had no insurable interest. The contract was illegal,<sup>87</sup>

<sup>79</sup> [1960] A.C. 192; cf. Nash v Halifax BS [1979] Ch. 584, so far as it relates to the money lent; and see above, p.488.

<sup>80</sup> Re Cavalier Insurance Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430 at 450 (and see above, p.434). For the position where payments had been made by the insurer under the policy, see below, p.495, n.17.

<sup>81</sup> See above at n.76.

<sup>82</sup> (1862) 7 H. & N. 934; cf. Smith v Bromley (1760) 2 Dougl. 696 n.; Smith v Cuff (1817) 6 M. & S. 160; Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch.D. 469. In Osborne v Williams (1811) 18 Ves. 379 it seems even to have been thought that a father "oppressed" a son by offering him the prospect of financial independence.

<sup>83</sup> [1960] A.C. 190 at 205.

<sup>84</sup> Liebman v Rosenthal 57 N.Y.S. 2d 875 (1945).

<sup>85</sup> [1951] 1 All E.R. 92.

<sup>86</sup> [1916] 2 K.B. 482; cf. Reynell v Sprye (1852) 1 D.M. & G. 660.

<sup>87</sup> Life Assurance Act 1774, s.1.

but the claimant was able to recover back the premiums he had paid as he had been induced to make the contract by the fraudulent representation of the defendants' agent that the policy was valid. The decisive factor in such cases is the fraud of the defendant, and not the innocence of the claimant. The claimant would have failed if the representation that the policy was valid had been innocently made.<sup>88</sup> Similarly, where a tenant was induced by the landlord's misrepresentation to enter into an illegal lease, it was held that he could not recover back a payment of rent without alleging and proving fraud.<sup>89</sup>

The cases on this subject suggest that, where recovery is allowed, the basis for it is the invalidity of the contract on the ground of illegality, and not misrepresentation as such. It follows that the right of recovery is not necessarily limited by the bars to rescission for misrepresentation.<sup>90</sup> If no such bar has arisen, it seems that a person who has been induced by even an innocent misrepresentation<sup>91</sup> to enter into an illegal contract can rescind it for misrepresentation and so recover back his money or property.<sup>92</sup> The bars to rescission for misrepresentation will also be relevant where the misrepresentation relates to matters other than those which are the source of the illegality: e.g. where a contract for the sale of property is induced by the vendor's misrepresentations as to his title, and the contract is also illegal by reason of its including an immoral business.<sup>93</sup>

(d) MISTAKE. A party who enters into a contract under a mistake of fact as to its legality can sometimes enforce the contract.<sup>94</sup> In such a situation he should be equally entitled to recover back money paid or property transferred under the contract; for it is inconceivable that this remedy will defeat the object of the invalidating rule where enforcement of the contract is allowed because it will not have this effect. Mistake<sup>95</sup> can also be a ground for recovery of money or property even where it does not give the mistaken party the right to enforce the contract.<sup>96</sup> In Oom v Bruce<sup>97</sup> the claimant, as agent for the Russian owner of goods in Russia, took out a policy of insurance on the goods with the defendant. Neither party knew (or could have known) that Russia had declared war on this country before the contract was made. It was held that the claimant could get back his premium as he was not guilty of any fault or blame in entering into the illegal contract. Here again no useful purpose would be served by applying the general rule of non-recovery.

(e) REPUDIATION OF ILLEGAL PURPOSE.<sup>98</sup> A person may be able to reclaim money paid or property transferred under an illegal contract if he repudiates the illegal purpose

<sup>88</sup> Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co [1904] 1 K.B. 558. Seem, that in such a case the object of the invalidating rule would have been better served by allowing recovery: cf. above, p.491.

<sup>89</sup> Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359.

<sup>90</sup> See above, pp.377–385.

<sup>91</sup> In Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co, above, the misrepresentation was one of law, and (for the reasons given at p.333, above) it is submitted that such a representation could now give rise to a right to rescind for misrepresentation and so to recover back premiums, on the analogy of the similar rule applied in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1999] 2 A.C. 349 to payments made under a mistake of law.

<sup>92</sup> This was assumed in Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359, but in that case the right to rescind for innocent misrepresentation was barred by execution of the lease. This would no longer be a bar: above, p.378.

<sup>93</sup> The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 at 62; above p.381. The purchaser was not left entirely without remedy since his claim for damages succeeded on the ground stated at p.483, n.11 above.

<sup>94</sup> See above, p.485.

<sup>95</sup> For mistake of law, see Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co, and above n.91.

<sup>96</sup> e.g. on facts such as those of Re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 K.B. 716; above p.490, n.64.

<sup>97</sup> (1810) 12 East 225; cf. Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359 at 374–375, where mistake of the payor alone was said to be insufficient; sed quare.

<sup>98</sup> Beatson, 91 L.Q.R. 313; Merkin, 97 L.Q.R. 420.

in time.<sup>99</sup> By giving a party this right, the law tries to encourage him to give up the illegal purpose. Two conditions must be satisfied to bring the rule into operation.

(i) Repudiation in time. A party who repudiates before anything has been done to perform the illegal purpose can recover back his money or property, while one who repudiates after the illegal purpose has been fully carried out cannot recover.<sup>1</sup> The difficult cases are those in which the repudiation takes place after steps have been taken towards the performance of the illegal purpose, but before it has been fully carried out.

One such case was Taylor v Bowers,<sup>2</sup> where a debtor was being pressed by his creditors. To prevent certain machinery from falling into their hands, he transferred it to one Alcock. He then called two meetings of creditors in an attempt to reach a settlement with them, but none was reached. The debtor successfully claimed the machinery back from the defendant, who was one of the creditors and had obtained the machinery from Alcock with notice of the fraudulent scheme and in the hope of benefiting from it. The decision is based on the fact that the illegal purpose had not been carried out: no creditor had been defrauded. A similar result was reached in Tribe v Tribe<sup>3</sup> where a father transferred shares in a company to his son in order to "safeguard his interests"<sup>4</sup> against claims for dilapidations by the lessors of shops of which the father was tenant and in which the company carried on business. The issue of dilapidations was later resolved without the father's having shown the share transfer to the lessors or to any other creditor. It was held that the father was entitled to the return of the shares since the illegal purpose had "not been carried into effect in any way".<sup>5</sup>

In the contrasting case of Kearley v Thomson<sup>6</sup> the friend of a bankrupt paid £40 to the defendants in return for their undertaking not to appear at the bankrupt's public examination and not to oppose his discharge. The defendants duly absented themselves from the public examination, but before any application had been made for the bankrupt's discharge the payor claimed back the £40. His claim failed. Fry L.J. said, first, that the rule permitting recovery on repudiation of the illegal transaction did not exist before Taylor v Bowers and he doubted the correctness of that decision. But the principle was at least twice stated in earlier cases<sup>7</sup> and has since been accepted as good law.<sup>8</sup> Secondly, he said that Taylor v Bowers was distinguishable from Kearley v Thomson, since in the latter case there had been "a partial carrying into effect of an illegal purpose in a substantial manner".<sup>9</sup> This distinction looks at first sight tenuous, but it must be remembered that it is not the transaction but "the [illegal] purpose which has to be carried into effect"<sup>10</sup> to preclude recovery, and that the illegal purposes in the two cases were quite different. The illegal purpose in Taylor v Bowers was to defraud creditors, and no creditor was defrauded; this was also true in Tribe v Tribe. The illegal purpose in Kearley

<sup>99</sup> Harry Parker Ltd v Mason [1940] 2 K.B. 590 at 608.

<sup>1</sup> Palaniappa Chettiar v Arunasalam Chettiar [1962] A.C. 294.

<sup>2</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 291: now a case of "frustration"? cf. below, at n.13; Symes v Hughes (1870) L.R. 9 Eq. 475.

<sup>3</sup> [1996] Ch. 107.

<sup>4</sup> ibid. at 113.

<sup>5</sup> ibid. at 121. For further problems which arose in this case because the relationship of transferor and transferee was that of father and son, see below, pp.500–501.

<sup>6</sup> (1890) 24 Q.B.D. 742.

<sup>7</sup> Hastell v Jackson (1828) 8 B. & C. 221 at 226; Bone v Eckless (1860) 5 H. & N. 925 at 928.

<sup>8</sup> See Hermann v Charlesworth [1905] 2 K.B. 123; Bigos v Bousted [1951] 1 All E.R. 92. In Tribe v Tribe [1996] Ch. 107 at 125 Millett L.J. doubted part of the reasoning, but not the result, in Taylor v Bowers.

<sup>9</sup> (1890) 24 Q.B.D. at 747.

<sup>10</sup> See Tribe v Tribe [1996] Ch. 107 at 122, italics supplied.

v Thomson was to interfere with the course of public justice,<sup>11</sup> and some such interference took place when the defendants stayed away from the bankrupt's public examination. Thus it seems that the repudiation is in time if it takes place after mere preparation to achieve the illegal purpose, but that it is too late if it takes place after performance of the illegal purpose has actually begun.

There is also the more practical point that in Taylor v Bowers the success of the debtor's claim promoted the equal distribution of his property among his creditors; for if the claim had failed, one of the creditors (the defendant) would have benefited at the expense of the others.<sup>12</sup> In Kearley v Thomson, on the other hand, the creditors would not have benefited at all if the claim for repayment had succeeded; for the £40 would then have gone back to the payor, and not to the bankrupt's estate.

(ii) Voluntary repudiation. Repudiation must be voluntary: it must not be forced on the party claiming recovery by the intervention of the police, or of a third person, or by the other party's breach of the contract.<sup>13</sup> This requirement follows from the justification for the present exception to the general rule of non-recovery, which is its tendency to encourage a party to give up the illegal purpose. For this reason it is hard to accept the suggestion<sup>14</sup> that a party to an illegal contract can recover back money paid under it simply because there has been a "total failure of consideration"<sup>15</sup> brought about by the other party's refusal to perform. Where illegality is involved, recovery is often denied (under the general rule of non-recovery) even though there has been a total failure of consideration<sup>16</sup>: and may conversely be allowed (under some of the exceptions to the general rule) even though there is no failure of consideration.<sup>17</sup> In these cases, the need to further the object of the invalidating rule often excludes the ordinary rules that govern recovery on the ground of failure of consideration under lawful contracts.

(f) NO RELIANCE ON ILLEGAL TRANSACTION. A person may be entitled to recover money or property which has been transferred under an illegal contract, if he can establish his right or title to it without relying on the contract or on its illegality.<sup>18</sup> It follows that there are two situations in which the claim may succeed: those in which the claimant does not rely on the illegal contract at all, but claims the property simply because he was already owner of it before that contract was made; and those in which he does rely on the contract (since it was by virtue of that contract that he acquired title) but does not have to rely on the illegality to establish his claim for the recovery of the

<sup>11</sup> cf. above, pp.445–446.

<sup>12</sup> cf. above, pp.492–493.

<sup>13</sup> As in Bigos v Boustead [1951] 1 All E.R. 92.

<sup>14</sup> Made in Shaw v Shaw [1965] 1 W.L.R. 537 at 539.

<sup>15</sup> See below, p.1049.

<sup>16</sup> e.g. Parkinson v College of Ambulance Ltd [1925] 2 K.B. 1; Bigos v Boustead [1951] 1 All E.R. 92. In Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 K.B. 359 at 373–374 recovery was denied on the ground that there was no total failure of consideration; but this aspect of the case is better explained as an application of the general rule of non-recovery.

<sup>17</sup> e.g. Parkinson v Denby (1862) 7 H. & N. 934; Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] A.C. 192. The contrary decision in Re Cavalier Insurance Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430 at 450 scarcely seems to give effect to the object of the legislation which had been contravened but may be explicable on the ground that the "guilty" insurer had not intended to violate the law and was in liquidation (so that the effective contest was between policyholders who had been paid and the insurer's creditors). cf. now Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.26(2) and 27(2); above, p.491, n.76.

<sup>18</sup> For the application of a similar principle to a claim for damages for deceit, see Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.2) [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218 at 232 (reversed on another point [2002] UKHL 43; [2003] 1 All E.R. 173).

property.<sup>19</sup> Some judicial statements of the rule refer to both these possibilities<sup>20</sup>; while others refer only to one<sup>21</sup> but should not, it is submitted, be read as excluding the other.

(i) Recovering back goods transferred under an illegal contract. Where goods are sold under an illegal contract, the property in them can pass (in accordance with the usual rules as to passing of property) notwithstanding the illegality<sup>22</sup>; and it may do so even though the goods have not been delivered to the buyer.<sup>23</sup> If the property has passed and the goods have been delivered to the buyer, the seller will not be entitled to their return—a point of special importance where the sale is on credit and the price has not been paid. Similarly, if property has passed to the buyer and the goods have been delivered to a third party, the seller cannot get them back from the third party, having no longer any title on which he can rely. The extent to which the buyer can rely on the passing of property in goods which have not been delivered to him is discussed below.<sup>24</sup>

If a thing is pledged, hired or lent under an illegal contract, a “special property” (or right to retain possession) passes when possession is transferred. So long as that special property endures, the subject-matter cannot be recovered back by the transferor. Thus in Taylor v Chester<sup>25</sup> half of a £50 Bank of England note was pledged as security for the expenses of a debauch in a brothel. The effect of the pledge was to transfer a special property in the note to the pledgee, with the result that the pledgor could not recover back the note without tendering the amount due. It seems that the effect of such tender would have been to put an end to the pledgee’s special property and to entitle the pledgor to recover back the note on the strength of his title; but before the tender the pledgee would be entitled to take the usual steps to enforce his security against the pledged property.<sup>26</sup> The same principles would apply where a thing is hired under an illegal contract: the owner cannot recover it back while the hirer’s special property lasts, but he can do so after that special property has come to an end, e.g. because the period of hire has run out.

In Bowmakers Ltd v Barnet Instruments Ltd<sup>27</sup> machine tools had been let out under hire-purchase agreements which were illegal<sup>28</sup> as they contravened war-time maximum price and licensing regulations. The hirers failed to pay the instalments due under the agreements, sold some of the goods and kept the rest. The owners successfully claimed damages for the conversion of all the goods. They did not have to “found [their] claim on the illegal contract or . . . plead its illegality in order to support [their] claim,”<sup>29</sup> but

<sup>19</sup> Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340 at 370 (“does not need to rely on the illegal contract for any purpose other than providing the basis of his claim to a property right”); Enonchong, 111 L.Q.R. 135.

<sup>20</sup> e.g. the statement in Bowmakers Ltd v Barnet Instruments Ltd [1945] K.B. 65 at 71 quoted below at n.29.

<sup>21</sup> e.g. Tinsley v Milligan above, at 366 (“provided he does not require to found on the unlawful agreement”); ibid. at 369 (“provided that the plaintiff can establish such title without pleading or leading evidence of the illegality”).

<sup>22</sup> Simpson v Nichols (1838) 3 M. & W. 240 at 244; Scurfe v Morgan (1838) 4 M. & W. 270 at 281; Elder v Kelly [1919] 2 K.B. 179; Singh v Ali [1960] A.C. 167; The Glaxnost [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 483 at 487.

<sup>23</sup> Belvoir Finance Co Ltd v Stapleton [1971] 1 Q.B. 210; cf. Kingsley v Sterling Industrial Securities Ltd [1967] 2 Q.B. 747 at 738; below, p.501.

<sup>24</sup> See below, pp.501–502.

<sup>25</sup> (1869) L.R. 4 Q.B. 309; the same principle would apply to a pledge of goods.

<sup>26</sup> Normich Union Life Ins Co Ltd v Qureshi [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 707 at 709, where no offence had in fact been committed by the pledgee.

<sup>27</sup> [1945] K.B. 65; Hamson, 10 C.L.J. 249; Coote, 35 M.L.R. 38; Stewart, 1 J.C.L. 134.

<sup>28</sup> The owners had acquired the goods from one Smith under a contract which was also illegal; for this aspect of the case, see below p.501, n.73.

<sup>29</sup> At 71.

relied simply on their title. As the period of hire had not run out, it is at first sight hard to see why the hirers could not resist the owners' claim by relying on their special property under the hire-purchase agreements. The reason why they could not do so seems to be that a hirer's right to possession may come to an end otherwise than by lapse of time. First, it can come to an end as a result of a repudiatory breach on the part of the hirer.<sup>30</sup> Since a hirer is guilty of such a breach if he sells the thing hired, the defendants' special property in the goods which they had sold had therefore come to an end.<sup>31</sup> But this does not explain why their special property in the goods which they simply kept had come to an end. Failure to pay instalments is a breach of contract, but it is not normally of itself a repudiatory one. A possible solution of the difficulty is that a hirer's special property may come to an end as a result of any breach because the contract expressly so provides; i.e. because it provides that, on failure by the hirer to pay instalments, the agreement should ipso facto determine and that the owner should be entitled to take back the goods. If the agreements in Bowmakers' case contained some such clause<sup>32</sup> the hirers' right to possess the goods ceased as soon as they defaulted in paying instalments. The case can be reconciled with Taylor v Chester by assuming that the agreements did contain such a clause.

The preceding discussion of Taylor v Chester<sup>33</sup> and Bowmakers Ltd v Barnett Instruments Ltd<sup>34</sup> attempts to analyse these cases in the light of the rules governing the transfer of property (general or special) in the subject-matter of illegal contracts. This approach is however open to the objection that it ignores the crucial question: whether to allow the owner to recover his property would tend to promote or to defeat the purpose of the rule of law which makes the contract illegal.<sup>35</sup> In Taylor v Chester that purpose was presumably to discourage the keeping of brothels; and the decision can perhaps be explained on the ground that it created a stalemate position: the pledge being of half a bank note, neither pledgor nor pledgee could enforce any rights under the note until its two halves were reunited. On the other hand, it can be argued that, by giving the pledgor an incentive to redeem his pledge, the decision made it more, rather than less, likely that the brothel-keeper would be paid, and so tended to defeat the purpose of the invalidating rule. In Bowmakers' case the purpose of the regulations was presumably to prevent profiteering and to regulate the allocation of scarce resources in time of war; and it is unlikely that these purposes were defeated by upholding the owners' claims, particularly in view of the fact that "their error was involuntary".<sup>36</sup> The position would have been different if the owners had been guilty of a deliberate violation of a regulation made for the purpose of protecting hirers. It is submitted that, if this had been the position, the rule in Bowmakers' case should not have been applied; for if it were applied one of the owners' most important remedies for non-payment (that of retaking the goods) would be available irrespective of the legality of the agreement. In the example just given, such a result would defeat, rather than promote, the policy of the invalidating rule.

<sup>30</sup> N Central Wagon & Finance Co v Graham [1950] 2 K.B. 7. Election by the owners to rescind on account of the breach seems to be assumed (cf. below, pp.844-849).

<sup>31</sup> cf. Belvoir Finance Co v Harold G Cole Co [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1877 (where the hirer had sold the entire subject-matter); Union Transport Finance Ltd v British Car Auctions Ltd [1978] 2 All E.R. 385.

<sup>32</sup> The terms of the agreements are not set out in any of the reports of the case, but such provisions were certainly common.

<sup>33</sup> (1869) L.R. 4 Q.B. 309.

<sup>34</sup> [1945] K.B. 65.

<sup>35</sup> Treitel in Essays in Memory of Sir Rupert Cross (Lapper, ed.) pp.99-104.

<sup>36</sup> Bowmakers' case [1945] K.B. 65 at 68. The owners themselves had not attempted to make "excess" profits out of the transactions, having been brought in only to provide finance after the hirers had decided to acquire the goods from their former owners.

Where goods are let out under a regulated agreement,<sup>37</sup> the owner cannot retake them unless he first serves a default notice; and in certain cases he must in addition obtain a court order.<sup>38</sup> Such steps seem to amount to a reliance on the agreement and thus not to be available if the agreement is illegal.

(ii) Recovering back money paid under an illegal contract. A person who pays money under an illegal contract cannot generally recover it back by relying on his title, since the effect of the payment is almost always to transfer the entire property in the notes or coins to the payee. Money can be recovered back under the present rule only in the rare cases in which it is not paid out-and-out, but is paid as a deposit. Thus a person who deposits money with a stakeholder under an illegal wager can recover it back, so long as the stakeholder has not paid it over, in accordance with his instructions, to the other party to the wager.<sup>39</sup>

(iii) Illegal leases. An illegal lease generally vests a term of years in the tenant.<sup>40</sup> Thus if the tenant has gone into possession the landlord cannot rely on his title so as to turn the tenant out during the currency of the lease<sup>41</sup>; but he can do so once the lease has expired. The further question arises whether the landlord could recover possession if the tenant failed to pay rent. If this were possible the rule that a tenant under an illegal lease is not liable for rent<sup>42</sup> would be of small practical importance, for such a tenant, like any other, could be turned out for non-payment of rent. It might be argued that the tenant's right to possession comes to an end if he fails to pay rent, just as the hirers' right to possession in Bowmakers' case came to an end when they failed to pay instalments. But the analogy between illegal leases and Bowmakers' case is imperfect if the explanation of that case was that the hirers' right to possession determined ipso facto on the hirers' breach of contract.<sup>43</sup> For a lease cannot determine ipso facto on the tenant's breach as the law does not recognise such a thing as a lease for an uncertain period.<sup>44</sup> It is possible to have a lease "for five years, subject to forfeiture if the tenant fails to pay rent", but not "for five years, or for so long as the tenant pays rent, whichever is the shorter period". If the tenant fails to pay rent the landlord's right to possession does not automatically revive. He can only attempt to enforce the forfeiture clause. Such an attempt will fail, as it is an attempt to enforce a term of an illegal contract. Hence a landlord cannot recover possession of premises let under an illegal lease simply because the tenant fails to pay rent. A tenancy may also be terminable by notice, quite irrespective of default. If it is determined in this way, it seems that the landlord can recover possession on the strength of his title when the period of notice has expired.<sup>45</sup>

<sup>37</sup> See above, pp.177–178.

<sup>38</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, ss.87, 90.

<sup>39</sup> cf. O'Sullivan v Thomas [1895] 1 Q.B. 698.

<sup>40</sup> The general rule does not apply if on the true construction of the relevant legislation no interest is intended to pass to a person who takes a lease in contravention of it, e.g. where occupation of the land is meant to be restricted to a particular class: Amar Singh v Kulubya [1964] A.C. 142; Hamson [1964] C.L.J. 20; Cornish, 27 M.J.L.R. 225. No legal interest vests in a person occupying land under an agreement amounting, not to a lease but to a licence: Parks v Esso Petroleum Co Ltd [1999] 1 C.M.L.R. 455, affirmed [2000] Eu. L.R. 25, where it was held that there was no illegality.

<sup>41</sup> Feret v Hill (1854) 15 C.B. 207; semble that this case would now be differently decided on the ground of fraud; and see Grace Rymer Investments Ltd v Waite [1958] Ch. 831.

<sup>42</sup> See above, pp.481–482.

<sup>43</sup> See above, at n.32.

<sup>44</sup> Lace v Chandler [1944] K.B. 368; but see Validation of Wartime Leases Act 1944; Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v London Residuary Body [1992] 2 A.C. 386, where Lord Browne-Wilkinson said at 396 that there was no "satisfactory rationale" for the rule.

<sup>45</sup> The contrary assumption seems to have been made in Amar Singh v Kulubya [1964] A.C. 142, but was not necessary for the decision.

(iv) Equitable title. In the cases so far discussed, the claimant succeeded where he was able to establish legal title to the property in question without relying on the illegality. There was formerly some authority for the view that the position was different where the claimant relied on an equitable, rather than a legal title, and that in such cases the claim would be rejected once it appeared, or was admitted, that the equitable title had been acquired under an illegal transaction.<sup>46</sup> But this view was rejected by a majority of the House of Lords in Tinsley v Milligan, where Lord Browne-Wilkinson said that, as a result of later developments in the law relating to illegal contracts, the former equitable principle had “become elided into the common law rule”.<sup>47</sup> The dispute in that case arose out of an agreement between the claimant and the defendant relating to a house in which they lived as lovers and which they jointly ran as a lodging house. The house had been purchased with money provided by both parties; and, although the parties accepted that the house was to be owned by them jointly, it was conveyed into the sole name of the claimant. This was done to enable the defendant to make false claims for social security benefits on the footing that she did not own her home; and such claims were in fact made. The parties later quarrelled and it was held that the defendant was entitled to an order for the sale of the house and to a declaration that it was owned by the parties in equal shares. The defendant was entitled in equity to a half share in the house by virtue of the presumption which normally arises in equity where one party transfers property to another, or provides money for the acquisition of property by another, that the property is held by the latter party (to the appropriate extent) on a resulting trust for the former party. It was this presumption of resulting trust which gave rise to the defendant’s equitable title.<sup>48</sup> To establish that title, she had no need to impeach the transaction by relying on its illegality. It was, on the contrary, the claimant who sought to impeach the transaction by relying on its illegality in order to deprive it of its normal effect of giving the defendant an equitable title. The defendant’s position was in substance the same as that of the buyer of goods under an illegal contract: she had acquired her equitable title, just as such a buyer can acquire a legal title,<sup>49</sup> in spite of the illegality. It was, moreover, undesirable for the present purpose to treat equitable title differently from legal title, since to do so would lead to some entirely capricious distinctions: for example, to the conclusion that the cases on illegal leases<sup>50</sup> would have been differently decided if the contracts had been agreements for leases (which give rise only to an equitable interest<sup>51</sup>) as opposed to executed leases (which give rise to a legal term of years).<sup>52</sup>

The crucial factor in Tinsley v Milligan was that the defendant was able to rely on the normal presumption that property bought in part with her money was to that extent, or to the extent agreed upon by the parties, held in trust for her. That presumption could, of course, have been rebutted by proof that the defendant had intended to make a gift; and if the claimant had proved this, then the defendant’s claim to a share in the property would have failed for it would then have been the defendant who would have relied on the illegality to defeat the gift.<sup>53</sup> In the case of certain relationships between the parties

<sup>46</sup> See Curtis v Perry (1802) 2 Ves. 739 at 744 and other authorities on the point discussed in Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340.

<sup>47</sup> ibid. at 376; Buckley, 110 L.Q.R. 3; Thornton [1993] C.I.J. 394; Stowe, 56 M.I.L.R. 441.

<sup>48</sup> cf. Silverwood v Silverwood (1997) 74 P. & C.R. D9; Lowson v Coombes, The Times, December 2, 1998; Mortgage Express v Robson [2001] EWCA Civ 887; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 886 (equitable title acquired under earlier fraudulent transaction).

<sup>49</sup> See above, p.495.

<sup>50</sup> e.g. Feret v Hill (1854) 15 C.B. 207, above, p.498.

<sup>51</sup> Walsh v Lonsdale (1882) 21 Ch.D. 9; above, p.177.

<sup>52</sup> See the discussion of Feret v Hill, above, in Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340 at 370.

<sup>53</sup> Tribe v Tribe [1996] Ch. 107 at 128–129.

to the transaction, such an intention to make a gift is, moreover, presumed, thus reversing the normal presumption of resulting trust. This is, for example, the position where a father transfers property (or pays for property to be transferred) to his child: in such cases there is said to be a "presumption of advancement",<sup>54</sup> or, in other words, a presumption that the transfer was intended as a gift to the child. It follows that, if the transfer in such a case is alleged to have been made for an illegal purpose, then the general rule will be that the father will not be able to claim the property by relying on his title; and that he will not be able to do so by impeaching the transfer by reference to the illegal purpose, for this would require him to rely on the illegality. This was the position in Chettiar v Chettiar,<sup>55</sup> where a father transferred land to his son by an instrument recording a payment by the son which was not in fact made. The object of the transfer was to deceive the public authorities into thinking that the father held less land than he did, and so to enable the father to evade certain legislative restrictions on the production of rubber. The Privy Council dismissed the father's claim that the son was trustee of the land for him; for in order to rebut the presumption of advancement the father would have had to disclose and to rely on his illegal purpose.

The result in Chettiar v Chettiar<sup>56</sup> amounted to an application of the general rule that property transferred under an illegal contract cannot be recovered back by the transferor.<sup>57</sup> But we have seen that this rule is subject to a number of other exceptions<sup>58</sup> than the one here under discussion (i.e. the one under which the claimant does not need to rely on the illegal transaction); and where one of those other exceptions applied, a claim for the recovery of property was upheld even though the property was transferred in circumstances giving rise to the presumption of advancement. This was the position in Tribe v Tribe,<sup>59</sup> the facts of which have been stated earlier in this Chapter.<sup>60</sup> The shares in that case were transferred from father to son, so that there was a presumption of advancement; but a claim for their return was made before the illegal purpose for which they had been transferred had been "carried into effect in any way".<sup>61</sup> Hence the case fell within the exception to the general rule of non-recovery which applies where the illegal purpose is repudiated<sup>62</sup>; and it was held that the father could invoke this exception so as to recover the shares even though the process of rebutting the presumption of advancement involved his relying on the illegality of the transaction to show that it was not intended to be by way of gift. It is submitted that the same result should have followed if that father had been able to invoke one of the other exceptions, considered earlier in this Chapter, to the general rule of non-recovery: i.e. if the transfer had been procured by oppression or by misrepresentation or made under a mistake,<sup>63</sup> or if the father had been a member of a protected class.<sup>64</sup>

It was suggested above that the analysis of cases involving the transfer of property in goods under illegal contracts was open to the objection that it could lead to results which failed to promote (and might defeat) the purpose of the prohibition giving rise to the <sup>54</sup> A discussion of the relationships giving rise to the presumption of advancement is beyond the scope of this book. For such a discussion, see Snell's Equity (30th ed.) §§9–11 to 9–14.

<sup>55</sup> [1962] A.C. 294.

<sup>56</sup> See above.

<sup>57</sup> See above, p.491.

<sup>58</sup> See above, pp.491–495.

<sup>59</sup> [1996] Ch. 107.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.494.

<sup>61</sup> [1996] Ch. 107 at 121.

<sup>62</sup> See above, p.494.

<sup>63</sup> See above, pp.492–493.

<sup>64</sup> See above, p.491—a perhaps unlikely but not impossible situation.

illegality<sup>65</sup>; and same danger arises in the present group of cases. Suppose, for example, that the transfer in Chettiar v Chettiar had not been from father to son, but from son to father to enable the son to evade the legislative restrictions. There would then have been no presumption to advancement but, on the contrary, a presumption of resulting trust; and it would seem to follow from the reasoning of Tinsley v Milligan that the son could have recovered the land on the strength of his equitable title. Such a conclusion would scarcely have promoted the purpose of the rule of law which was infringed in that case. Reasoning which is based on proprietary concepts no doubt has the advantage of predictability; its disadvantage in the present context is that pays insufficient regard to the policy considerations with which the courts are normally concerned in working out the effects of illegality on contracts. Tribe v Tribe<sup>66</sup> is, with respect, to be welcomed in allowing a policy-based exception to the general rule of non-recovery to prevail over the more abstract application of purely proprietary reasoning.<sup>67</sup>

(v) Special cases. There may be special cases in which a person cannot recover back money or property although his right or title to it can be established without reference to the contract or its illegality. It has been suggested that if the property is such that it is unlawful to deal with it at all (e.g. an obscene book) it cannot be recovered back.<sup>68</sup> There is also some support for the view that the price paid for such a book cannot be recovered back by the buyer,<sup>69</sup> though this is scarcely the best way of discouraging the trade in such things. A further suggestion is that there is no right of recovery if the object of the contract is to enable one party to commit a serious crime,<sup>70</sup> e.g. if a dagger is lent to commit murder. On the other hand, a person who undertakes the safe keeping of a burglar's house-breaking tools is apparently bound to give them up to the burglar on demand.<sup>71</sup>

(vi) Recovery of money or property obtained under an illegal contract. The mere fact that something has been obtained under an illegal contract does not deprive the recipient of the usual remedies for its recovery or protection. Thus if goods are sold and delivered under an illegal contract, and the property in them has passed to the buyer, he can recover them or their value if they are later taken away from him by the seller.<sup>72</sup> Such remedies are also available against third parties,<sup>73</sup> and even (subject to statutory exceptions) against the police.<sup>74</sup> They may, moreover, be available to a buyer who has acquired the property in goods under an illegal sale, even though the goods have never been in his

<sup>65</sup> See above, pp.497–498.

<sup>66</sup> [1996] Ch. 107; above, p.500.

<sup>67</sup> cf., in Australia, Nelson v Nelson (1995) 132 A.L.R. 132.

<sup>68</sup> Bowmakers Ltd v Barnet Instruments Ltd [1945] K.B. 65 at 72; Costello v Chief Constable of Derbyshire Constabulary [2001] EWCA Civ 381; [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1437, at [33]. Aliter if the book is seditious? See Elias v Pasmore [1934] 2 K.B. 164 at 174.

<sup>69</sup> The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35, 62; above, p.381.

<sup>70</sup> Williams, 8 C.L.J. at p.62, n.54. After conviction of the offender, an order to deprive him of "his rights, if any, in the property" may be made by the court under Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.143.

<sup>71</sup> R. v Lomas (1913) 110 L.T. 239, as explained in R. v Bullock [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1.

<sup>72</sup> Singh v Ali [1960] A.C. 167.

<sup>73</sup> See the discussion of Bowmakers Ltd v Barnet Instruments Ltd [1945] K.B. 65 in Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 A.C. 340 at 369: the owners succeeded in spite of the illegality not only of the hire-purchase agreements, but also of the contracts under which they had acquired the goods from their former owner.

<sup>74</sup> Gordon v Chief Commr. of Metropolitan Police [1910] 2 K.B. 1080; Chief Constable of the West Midlands Police v White, (1992) 142 New L.J. 458; Slater v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, The Times, January 23, 1996; Porter v Chief Constable of Merseyside Police [2000] Q.B. 427. For police powers in certain cases to seize and retain property for a limited time, see Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1980] Q.B. 49; Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, ss.19, 22; after the expiry of that time, the property must be returned to the person from whom it was seized: Costello v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2001] EWCA

possession. In Belvoir Finance Co Ltd v Stapleton,<sup>75</sup> Belgravia wanted to acquire cars from Francis, finance being provided by Belvoir. In relation to each car, two contracts were made: a sale by Francis to Belvoir and a letting on hire-purchase by Belvoir to Belgravia. All these contracts were illegal. Belvoir never acquired possession of the cars, which were delivered by Francis straight to Belgravia. It was held that Belgravia's assistant manager was liable to Belvoir for conversion of the cars, since the property in them had passed to Belvoir as soon as the contracts of sale between them and Francis were "executed".<sup>76</sup> The decision is, however, concerned only with the relative rights of the buyer and a third person. The seller had no further interest in the cars and was not in possession of them. The case therefore does not support the proposition that a buyer to whom property in goods has passed under an illegal contract can claim them, or damages for their conversion, from a seller who has never delivered them at all. Such a claim would not differ in substance from a claim for the delivery, or for damages for the non-delivery, of the goods under the illegal contract. Its success would thus defeat the object of the rule against the enforcement of such a contract.

The right to recover money or property obtained under an illegal contract has been extended, sometimes with surprising results, to make an agent employed in an illegal transaction liable to account for its proceeds to his principal. Thus in Tenant v Elliott<sup>77</sup> a broker who effected an illegal insurance and later received the policy moneys was held accountable for them to his principal. Similarly, in Farmer v Russell<sup>78</sup> a carrier received the price of goods on behalf of his principal, to whom he was held liable to account even though the goods were counterfeit halfpence. The same principle was applied in Bone v Eckless,<sup>79</sup> where the captain of a ship was instructed to sell it to the Turkish Government, and told the owner that this could be done only if he paid bribes of £500 to Turkish officials. The owner agreed that the bribes should be paid, and the ship was duly sold for £6,500, of which the captain kept £500 to pay the bribes. He paid away only £300 in bribes, and it was held that the owner could recover the remaining £200 from the captain because he "makes out his title to recover £6,500 by proving the sale of his ship for that sum, and it is the [captain] who is relying on the illegal agreement to justify the non-payment of the money". In all these cases the illegality was in the transaction which the agent was employed to effect. The principle would probably not apply where the agency itself was illegal<sup>80</sup> and more recent authority casts some doubt on its validity in suggesting that a claimant could not recover damages from a third party for conversion

---

Civ 381; [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1437; unless it is of such a nature that it would be unlawful for the police to transfer it to him or for him to be in possession of it, as in the case of controlled drugs: ibid., at [33]. For powers to restrain an offender from dealing with the fruits of his crime, see Chief Constable of Kent v V [1983] Q.B. 34; Chief Constable of Hampshire v A Ltd [1985] Q.B. 132 (where the means of identification had failed); and Attorney-General v Blake [1998] Ch. 439 at 464-465; contrast Chief Constable of Leicestershire v M [1989] 1 W.L.R. 20, 23, and Chief Constable of Surrey v A, The Times, October 27, 1988 (no common law power to prevent a person, who had been charged with obtaining money by deception, from dealing with profits made by use of the money; and see Halfax BS v Thomas [1996] Ch. 217). Many statutes confer powers on the courts to make forfeiture, confiscation or similar orders; a complete discussion or even list of such provisions is beyond the scope of this book. Recent examples include Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.143 and Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, s.1 and Sch.1. Confiscation powers forming part of the criminal justice system are not in conflict with the Human Rights Act: R. v Rezvi [2002] UKHL 1; [2002] 1 All E.R. 801; R. v Benjafield [2002] UKHL 2, [2002] 1 All E.R. 815.

<sup>75</sup> [1971] 1 Q.B. 210; cf. Kingsley v Sterling Industrial Securities Ltd [1967] 2 Q.B. 747 at 783.

<sup>76</sup> [1971] 1 Q.B. 210 at 220.

<sup>77</sup> (1791) 1 B. & P. 3.

<sup>78</sup> (1798) 1 B. & P. 296 (approved in Sykes v Beadon (1879) 11 Ch.D. 170); cf. Bousfield v Wilson (1846) 16 L.J.Ex. 44; Pye v BG Transport Service [1966] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 300; contra, Griffith v Young (1810) 12 East 513 at 514.

<sup>79</sup> (1860) 5 H. & N. 925.

<sup>80</sup> See Booth v Hodgson (1795) 6 T.R. 405; Harry Parker Ltd v Mason [1940] 2 K.B. 590.

of property obtained by fraud where the property was “the very proceeds of the fraudulent conduct”.<sup>81</sup> Protection will not be denied to property rights merely because their acquisition involves the innocent commission of a civil wrong. For example, the copyright in a musical work may be protected even though its creation involved the innocent infringement of copyright in a previous work.<sup>82</sup>

(3) Scope of the general rule

The general rule that property transferred or money paid under an illegal contract is irrecoverable was not settled without a good deal of hesitation; and in particular equity at one time inclined to the opposite view.<sup>83</sup> Traces of the equitable view can be found in Hermann v Charlesworth.<sup>84</sup> The defendant ran a marriage bureau, and the claimant promised to pay him £250 if he could find her a husband. She also paid a “special client’s fee” of £52, of which £47 was to be repaid if no marriage or engagement took place within nine months. After four months she repudiated the contract and claimed back the £52. One reason for allowing her claim was that equity gave relief against marriage brokerage bonds, even after a marriage had taken place,<sup>85</sup> and that, similarly, money actually paid under a marriage brokerage contract could be recovered back: in other words, the general rule of non-recovery does not in equity apply to marriage brokerage contracts. At one time this equitable principle also applied to other types of contract: thus money paid under a contract to get the payor a commission in the marines could be recovered back.<sup>86</sup> There is no good modern authority for applying the equitable principle except to marriage brokerage contracts; but the possibility of its wider application should perhaps not be wholly ruled out. It would enable the courts to allow recovery where this was more likely, than the general rule of non-recovery, to further the policy of the invalidating rule.<sup>87</sup>

(4) Restitution in respect of services

Work done under an illegal contract may (no less than money paid or property transferred) give rise to a restitutionary claim, that is, to one for a reasonable remuneration on a quantum meruit basis. This possibility is illustrated by a case<sup>88</sup> in which the claimant had done work under a contract signed by him on behalf of a company. The contract was void because the company no longer existed<sup>89</sup>; and by trading in the name of a company which no longer existed the claimant had also committed an offence under s.34 of the Companies Act 1985. It was held that his claim was “maintainable on a quantum meruit though not under a supposed contract”.<sup>90</sup> One possible reason for this result is that the policy of s.34 was not contravened by allowing such a claim.<sup>91</sup> Another

<sup>81</sup> Thackwell v Barclays Bank plc [1986] 1 All E.R. 676 at 689.

<sup>82</sup> ZYX Music GmbH v King [1995] 3 All E.R. 1.

<sup>83</sup> Neville v Wilkinson (1782) 1 Bro.C.C. 547 at 548. The same view was sometimes taken at common law; e.g. Munt v Stokes (1792) 4 T.R. 561.

<sup>84</sup> [1905] 2 K.B. 123.

<sup>85</sup> ibid. at 134, 137, 138.

<sup>86</sup> Morris v McCulloch (1763) Amb. 432.

<sup>87</sup> cf. above, p.491.

<sup>88</sup> Cotronic (UK) Ltd v Dezonie/ (t/a Wendland Builders) Ltd [1991] B.C.L.C. 721.

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.736.

<sup>90</sup> [1991] B.C.L.C. 721 at 726.

<sup>91</sup> This is suggested by the reference, ibid., to Sham v Groom [1970] 2 Q.B. 504, above, p.429.

is that (as in the cases allowing recovery of property) the claimant did “not need to rely on any illegality to found a claim in that form”.<sup>92</sup> The reason why he had no such need was that the contract was void for some other reason than the illegality, i.e. on account of the non-existence of the company. Where the only ground of invalidity is illegality, a guilty party who had done work under the contract should not, it is submitted, have a quantum meruit claim merely because of that invalidity. To allow such a claim merely on the ground that the contract was invalid for illegality would, at least in most cases<sup>93</sup> be inconsistent with the policy of the invalidating rule.<sup>94</sup> It follows that a solicitor who cannot enforce a conditional fee agreement, because it is illegal under the rules stated earlier in this Chapter,<sup>95</sup> is also precluded from recovering the reasonable value of services rendered under it on a quantum meruit basis.<sup>96</sup> The same is not, however, necessarily true of a quantum meruit claim made against a guilty party by a party who is innocent of the illegality (in the sense of being unaware of the rule of law making the contract illegal) in respect of services not affected by the illegality. In one case of this kind, the claimant agreed to introduce clients to solicitors who, in return, promised to pay him a share of the fees paid by those clients; he did not know that such an arrangement was prohibited<sup>97</sup> and that the fee-sharing contract was therefore illegal. It was held that he could neither enforce that contract nor bring a quantum meruit claim in respect of the work of introducing clients<sup>98</sup>; but that such a claim was available in respect of other services rendered by him in acting as interpreter between the clients in question and the solicitors.<sup>99</sup>

3. Severance<sup>1</sup>

Where a contract is illegal only in part, two problems can arise. The first is the problem of severance of consideration: can a promise be enforced if it is lawful in itself but is in part supported by illegal consideration? The second is the problem of severance of promises: can a promise be enforced if it is lawful in itself but is coupled with an illegal promise?

(1) Severance of consideration

(a) DEPENDS ON WHETHER ILLEGAL PART IS SUBSTANTIAL OR SUBSIDIARY. A promise cannot be enforced if the whole or substantially the whole<sup>2</sup> of the consideration for it is illegal. In Lound v Grimmade<sup>3</sup> A, who had committed a fraud making him civilly and criminally liable, promised to pay B £3,000 in return for B's promise not to take “any legal proceedings” in respect of the fraud. B's claim for the £3,000 failed as a substantial

<sup>92</sup> [1991] B.C.I.C. 721 at 726, relying on the analogy of Bowmakers' case [1945] K.B. 65; above, p.496.

<sup>93</sup> e.g. in cases such as Ashmore Benson Pease & Co Ltd v AV Dawson Ltd [1973] 1 W.L.R. 828, above, p.484; and cf. the situation discussed below at p.506 at n.17.

<sup>94</sup> cf. Taylor v Bhail (1995) 50 Con. L.R. 70.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.431.

<sup>96</sup> Amwad v Geraghty & Co [2001] Q.B. 570 at 596.

<sup>97</sup> By the Solicitors' Practice Rules, which have the force of law: Smain v Law Society [1983] A.C. 598 at 608.

<sup>98</sup> Mohamed v Alaga & Co [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1815 at 1824–1825.

<sup>99</sup> ibid., at 1825–1827 as explained in Amwad v Geraghty & Co, above, n.96.

<sup>1</sup> Marsh, 64 L.Q.R. 230 at 347.

<sup>2</sup> Marshall v NM Financial Management Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1527 at 1532.

<sup>3</sup> (1888) 39 Ch.D. 605; cf. Walrond v Walrond (1858) Johns. 18.

part of the consideration for A's promise to pay it was B's own illegal promise to stifle a criminal prosecution.<sup>4</sup>

On the other hand, a promise can be enforced if the main consideration for it is lawful, although it is also supported by a subsidiary illegal consideration.<sup>5</sup> For example, an employee who enters into too wide a contract in restraint of trade can recover his wages.<sup>6</sup> The main consideration for the employer's promise to pay is the employee's promise to serve, or the performance of it; his promise not to compete is only subsidiary. The position is similar where an employee as a term of his contract of service enters into a pension scheme which contains an invalid stipulation in restraint of trade. That stipulation forms only a subsidiary part of the consideration which the employee provides for the various promises made by the employer under the contract as a whole; and if the stipulation is invalid it can be severed, so that the pension will be payable although the stipulation is not complied with.<sup>7</sup> But if the sole consideration for the promise to pay the pension is an invalid stipulation in restraint of trade the employee cannot recover the pension. This was the position in Wyatt v Kreglinger & Fernau<sup>8</sup> where the promise was made on the lawful termination of the contract of service and the employee provided no consideration for the promise except his assent to, or performance of, the invalid stipulation in restraint of trade.

Similar principles apply where the vendor of a business enters into too wide a contract in restraint of trade. If the price is promised mainly for the business premises and stock-in-trade, the illegal promise not to compete is only a subsidiary part of the consideration for the promise to pay, so that the vendor can recover the price. But if the purpose of the transaction, viewed objectively,<sup>9</sup> was the elimination of a competitor, rather than the purchase of business, it might be held that the vendor's promise not to compete formed a substantial part of the consideration for the purchaser's promise to pay; and that accordingly the vendor would not be entitled to the price.

The distinction so far drawn may, however, be displaced by the policy of the invalidating rule. In Ailion v Spiekermann<sup>10</sup> the vendor of a leasehold interest required the purchasers to pay an illegal premium. He thereby committed a statutory offence, but the purchasers (who were "unwilling victims"<sup>11</sup>) committed none by promising to pay the premium. It was held that they could specifically enforce the vendor's obligations without having to pay the premium. They were able to do this, whether or not their promise to pay the premium constituted a substantial part of the consideration; for such enforcement by them was the most effective way of promoting the legislative policy against illegal premiums.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.446. For rejection on similar grounds of a claim to rescind a contract, see The Siben [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 35 at 62.

<sup>5</sup> See Goodinson v Goodinson [1954] 2 Q.B. 118 (the actual decision is obsolete: Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s.34, above, p.447); cf. Kearney v Whitehaven Colliery Co [1893] 1 Q.B. 700; Fielding & Platt Ltd v Najjar [1969] 1 W.L.R. 357 at 362.

<sup>6</sup> McFarlane v Daniell (1938) S.R. (N.S.W.) 337, approved in Carney v Herbert [1985] A.C. 301 at 311; cf. Sadler v Imperial Life Assurance Co of Canada [1988] I.R.L.R. 388 and Marshall v N.M Financial Management Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1527 (similar principle applied to agent's claim for commission).

<sup>7</sup> Bull v Pitney-Bowes Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 273; semble the stipulation was not a mere condition but formed part of the consideration for the employer's promise since it was entered into at the employer's request: see above, p.72.

<sup>8</sup> [1933] 1 K.B. 793; above, p.462.

<sup>9</sup> Triggs v Staines Urban DC [1969] 1 Ch. 10; above, p.462.

<sup>10</sup> [1979] Ch. 158.

<sup>11</sup> ibid. at 165.

(b) APPORTIONMENT OF PROMISE TO LEGAL PART. In the cases so far discussed, the claimant has either failed or succeeded in full. The claimant in Lound v Grimwade<sup>12</sup> got nothing, though part of the consideration provided by him was lawful; while an employee who enters into too wide a restraint of trade can recover his entire wages, though the employer loses one of the advantages for which he bargained.<sup>13</sup> It might be thought fairer to make the defendant liable in proportion to the legal part of the consideration. The objection to such a rule is that it would often be hard to apply as the court cannot easily tell what value the parties attributed to the legal and illegal parts of the consideration respectively. But it seems that where the legal and illegal parts can be precisely valued, the claimant can recover so much of the promised payment as can be attributed to the lawful part of the consideration. In Frank W. Clifford Ltd v Garth<sup>14</sup> a builder agreed to do building work for the defendant on a "cost plus" basis, so that the total cost of the work could not be known in advance. The bill for the completed work came to £1,911. The defendant refused to pay anything because work costing more than £1,000 was illegal unless licensed, and no licence had been obtained. But he was held liable to pay £1,000: his promise to pay was enforced to the extent to which it was supported by lawful consideration. A person who has done work under a contract which is only partly illegal may also be awarded a reasonable sum in respect of the lawful part of the work.<sup>15</sup> Such an award is based on restitutionary principles and does not strictly speaking amount to partial enforcement of the contract, but in practical terms the outcome will often quite closely resemble such enforcement.

(c) SPECIAL CASES. It has been said that the doctrine of severance does not apply where part of the consideration is criminal or immoral,<sup>16</sup> e.g. where it is a promise to commit robbery or adultery, or the performance of such a promise. But the fact that part of the consideration is criminal prevents severance only if the party who provides it is guilty of a deliberate violation of the law. Thus in Frank W. Clifford Ltd v Garth the builder recovered £1,000 in spite of the fact that he had committed an offence by doing unlicensed work worth more than £1,000. He would however have recovered nothing if he had agreed to do the work without a licence, knowing from the start that it would cost over £1,000.<sup>17</sup>

(2) Severance of promises

Where the promises of one party to a contract are partly lawful and partly illegal, the court may cut out the illegal promises and enforce the lawful ones alone. It will do this only if the following three conditions are satisfied.

(a) THE PROMISE MUST BE OF SUCH A KIND AS CAN BE SEVERED. It has been said that there can be no severance of a criminal or immoral promise.<sup>18</sup> But although this may be generally true, it seems that a criminal promise could be severed if it was made without guilty intent.<sup>19</sup> It has also been said that there can be no severance of a promise to trade

<sup>12</sup> (1888) 39 Ch.D. 605.

<sup>13</sup> In this respect the analogy drawn in Barclays Bank plc v Caplan [1998] 1 FLR 532 at 536, between illegality and undue influence cases is imperfect since in cases of the latter kind benefits received by the victim must be restored as a condition of rescission.

<sup>14</sup> [1956] 1 W.L.R. 570; cf. Ex p. Mather (1797) 3 Ves. 373; J. Dennis & Co v Munn [1949] 2 K.B. 327; and see The American Accord [1983] 1 A.C. 168.

<sup>15</sup> Mohamed v. Alaga & Co [1999] 3 All E.R. 699 at 707 at 710; above p.504.

<sup>16</sup> Bennett v Bennett [1952] 1 K.B. 249 at 254.

<sup>17</sup> Frank W. Clifford v Garth [1956] 1 W.L.R. at 572; cf. above, p.483.

<sup>18</sup> Bennett v Bennett [1951] 1 K.B. 249 at 254.

<sup>19</sup> As in the case of severance of consideration: above, at nn.16, 17.

with the enemy<sup>20</sup> or of a promise to defraud the Revenue.<sup>21</sup> Promises are most frequently severed in contracts in restraint of trade; and it has been assumed that promises excluding the jurisdiction of the courts can be severed.<sup>22</sup> The question whether other illegal promises can be severed at all is still an open one.

(b) THE "BLUE PENCIL" TEST. Under this test, the court will sever only where this can be done by cutting words out of the contract (or by running a blue pencil through the offending words).<sup>23</sup> The court will not redraft the contract by adding or rearranging words, or by substituting one word for another.<sup>24</sup> Thus in Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co Ltd<sup>25</sup> the House of Lords refused to strike out of the contract the words "within 25 miles of London" and to substitute "in Islington"; to do so would be, not to sever, but to redraft the contract. The test does little to protect the party subject to the restraint since it can easily be satisfied by skilful draftsmanship, while on the other hand it may entirely prevent enforcement of a restraint drawn up by laymen where some degree of enforcement would be reasonable.<sup>26</sup> Where this is the case, the courts will apply the test with some latitude. In T Lucas & Co Ltd v Mitchell<sup>27</sup> a contract provided that a sales representative should not within a certain area "deal in any goods similar to" those allocated to him for sale; or "solicit orders for . . . any such goods". It was held that the area covenant was invalid while the solicitation covenant was valid; and that the area covenant could be severed. Strictly speaking, this left no point of reference for the word "such" in the solicitation covenant, but the deleted area covenant could be looked at to give the word meaning.

It used to be thought that promises could be severed merely because the "blue pencil" test was satisfied<sup>28</sup>; but this view no longer prevails. The test may restrict, but it does not determine, the scope of the doctrine of severance. Even if the legal and illegal promises are actually contained in separate documents,<sup>29</sup> the court will sever only if the third requirement is also satisfied.

(c) SEVERANCE MUST NOT ALTER THE NATURE OF THE COVENANT. The court will not sever if to do so alters the whole nature of the covenant.<sup>30</sup>

In Goldsoll v Goldman<sup>31</sup> the seller of an imitation jewellery business in New Bond Street undertook that he would not for two years deal in real or imitation jewellery in

<sup>20</sup> Kuenigl v Donnersmarck [1955] 1 Q.B. 515; cf. Royal Boskalis Westminster NV v Mountain [1999] Q.B. 674 at 693.

<sup>21</sup> Miller v Karlinski (1945) 62 T.L.R. 85; Corby v Morrison [1980] I.C.R. 564; the contrary was assumed in Napier v National Business Agency [1951] 2 All E.R. 265 but it was held that the contract was not severable as there was only one promise in substance. In the case of long-term employment, the contract is wholly invalid during the period in respect of which the illegal payments are made, but not in respect of the rest of its duration; Hyland v J H Barber (North-West) Ltd [1985] I.C.R. 861.

<sup>22</sup> Re Davstone Estate Ltd's Leases [1969] 2 Ch. 378; but severance failed because the "blue pencil" test (below) was not satisfied; Home Insurance Co v Administratia Asigurarilor [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 674 at 677.

<sup>23</sup> e.g. Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Rush [1996] F.S.R. 114.

<sup>24</sup> Contrast the court's statutory power to revise contracts: in the cases described at p.510 below.

<sup>25</sup> [1913] A.C. 724 (above, p.459).

<sup>26</sup> See Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623 at 647.

<sup>27</sup> [1974] Ch. 129.

<sup>28</sup> Putsman v Taylor [1927] 1 K.B. 637 at 640; the Court of Appeal held the covenant valid in toto, so that severance was not necessary: [1927] 1 K.B. 741.

<sup>29</sup> As in Kenyon v Darwen Cotton Manufacturing Co Ltd [1936] 2 K.B. 193.

<sup>30</sup> Putsman v Taylor [1927] 1 K.B. 637 at 646; cf. Spector v Ageda [1973] Ch. 30 at 45; Silverstone Records v Mountfield [1993] E.M.L.R. 152; Royal Boskalis Westminster NV v Mountain [1999] Q.B. 674 at 693. This requirement does not apply to an agreement partly invalid under the rules of competition law stated at pp.437-439, above; Barrett v Innentrepreneur Pub Co (GL) Ltd [1999] E.G.C.S. 93.

<sup>31</sup> [1915] 1 Ch. 292.

the United Kingdom or certain named places abroad. The covenant was too wide in area as the seller had not traded abroad, and in respect of subject-matter as he had scarcely dealt in real jewellery. But it was held that the references to the foreign places and to real jewellery could be severed, and that the restraint on dealing in imitation jewellery in the United Kingdom could be enforced. The only question discussed by the court was whether the "blue pencil" test was satisfied; but it can be argued that the object of the original covenant was to protect the business which the buyer had bought; that the object of the covenant after severance remained the same; and that severance had thus not altered the nature of the original covenant.

In the contrasting case of Attwood v Lamont<sup>32</sup> the plaintiffs had a general outfitters' business at Kidderminster. It was divided into several departments, each of which was supervised by one of their employees. The head of each department undertook that he would not after leaving the plaintiffs' service "be concerned in any of the following trades or businesses: that is to say, the trade or business of a tailor, dressmaker, general draper, milliner, hatter, haberdasher, gentlemen's, ladies' or children's outfitter" within ten miles of Kidderminster. In an action to enforce this covenant against the head of the tailoring department, the plaintiffs admitted that the covenant was too wide in point of subject-matter, but they argued that everything except the reference to tailoring should be severed, and that part alone enforced. This argument was rejected as severance would have altered the whole nature of the covenant. After severance, the covenant would protect only that part of the business in which the defendant had worked, whereas the original covenant was "part of a scheme by which every head of a department was to be restrained from competition with the plaintiffs, even in the business of departments with which he had no connection".<sup>33</sup> The valid and invalid covenants were thus interdependent and, where this is the relationship between them, the court will not sever the invalid ones.<sup>34</sup>

It was at one time thought that Goldsoll v Goldman and Attwood v Lamont could be reconciled simply on the ground that the covenant in the first case was between vendor and purchaser while that in the second was between employer and employee.<sup>35</sup> This view was supported by a dictum in Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co Ltd that in employment cases the courts should only sever where the excess was trivial,<sup>36</sup> and by the view expressed in Attwood v Lamont that in such cases the courts should be reluctant to sever at all.<sup>37</sup> But if the court is satisfied that there are, as a matter of construction, separate covenants, and that one of them can be removed without altering the nature of the covenant, it can sever a restraint in an employment contract,<sup>38</sup> and it may do so even though the excess was not merely trivial.<sup>39</sup> On the other hand, the court will not sever a covenant between vendor and purchaser merely because the "blue pencil" test is

<sup>32</sup> [1920] 3 K.B. 571.

<sup>33</sup> [1920] 3 K.B. 571 at 579–580.

<sup>34</sup> Scully UK Ltd v Lee [1998] I.R.I.L.R. 259.

<sup>35</sup> Ronbar Enterprises Ltd v Green [1954] 1 W.L.R. 814 at 820.

<sup>36</sup> [1913] A.C. 724 at 745.

<sup>37</sup> [1920] 3 K.B. 571 at 593–596. Contrast the attitude of the court in Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623 at 647 (above, p.507) and in The Littlewoods Organisation Ltd v Harris [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1472 (where no question of severance arose).

<sup>38</sup> T Lucas & Co Ltd v Mitchell [1974] Ch. 129; Stenhouse Australia Ltd v Phillips [1975] A.C. 391; Business Seating (Renovations) Ltd v Broad [1989] I.C.R. 729 at 734–735; Dummay Day & Co Ltd v D'Alphen [1997] I.R.I.L.R. 285, 296; ibid. 422 cf. Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623 at 647. Anscombe & Ringland v Butchoff (1984) 134 New L.J. 37.

<sup>39</sup> Putsman v Taylor [1927] 1 K.B. 637; Scorer v Seymour-Johns [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1419; and see n.38 above.

satisfied. Even between such parties, severance will not be allowed where its effect would be to alter the nature of the covenant.<sup>40</sup>

(d) ALLEGED NECESSITY FOR SEPARATE CONSIDERATION. It is sometimes said that a promise can be severed only if it is supported by separate consideration.<sup>41</sup> But this view is inconsistent with the cases just considered. In Goldsoll v Goldman, for instance, no separate consideration was provided for the valid and the invalid parts of the covenant. Yet the invalid parts were severed.

(e) WHETHER OTHER PROMISES AFFECTED. In the restraint of trade cases discussed above, the covenant not to compete has formed part of a larger transaction; and the effect of holding that excessive parts of the restraint could not be severed was simply that that covenant was wholly void. Other promises or obligations of the covenantor under the contract as a whole may nevertheless be enforceable. For example, an employee who has entered into a wholly void covenant in restraint of trade may still be restrained from breaking his duty of fidelity.<sup>42</sup> And a person to whom money has been lent on terms which include an invalid covenant in restraint of trade is nevertheless liable to repay the loan and to pay interest.<sup>43</sup> In such cases, it can be said that the main purpose of the contract is to create the relationship of employer and employee or of lender and borrower; and the fact that the contract seeks to impose an invalid restraint on the employee or borrower does not vitiate the entire relationship.

On the other hand, where the main purpose of the contract is to impose the restraint, the invalidity of that restraint can lead to the nullity of the whole contract. In such cases, the issue is not whether one part of the restraint can be severed from another without altering the nature of the covenant in restraint of trade; it is, rather, whether the invalidity of the restraint has left the contract as a whole without subject-matter. Two cases which raise the latter question may be contrasted. Both were concerned with solus petrol agreements; in each case the garage proprietor had leased his garage to the oil company which had then leased it back by granting an underlease to the garage proprietor, the solus agreement being contained in the underlease.<sup>44</sup> In the Amoco<sup>45</sup> case, the underlease was at a nominal rent for a period just one day shorter than the original lease: in these circumstances it was held that the solus agreement "constituted the heart and soul of the underlease."<sup>46</sup> As the solus agreement was invalid, it followed that neither the underlease nor the original lease (which was part of the same arrangement) could remain in force. On the other hand, in the Alec Lobb<sup>47</sup> case the original lease was for a period of 51 years; the oil company had paid a premium of £35,000 (the fair market value) for it; the underlease was for only 21 years and yielded a rent of £2,250 per annum. The solus agreement was held valid<sup>48</sup>; but it was said that, even if it had been invalid, the lease and underlease would have remained in force since the transaction as a whole would not, merely because of the invalidity of that one term, have "so changed its character as not

<sup>40</sup> British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Co Ltd v Schellff [1921] 2 Ch. 563, a vendor and purchaser case in which Attwood v Lamont [1920] 3 K.B. 571 was followed on this point.

<sup>41</sup> e.g. in Putsman v Taylor, above n.39, at 640; Kuenigl v Donnersmarck [1955] 1 Q.B. at p.538.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.206; Commercial Plastics Ltd v Vincent [1965] 1 Q.B. 623; Royal Boskalis Westminster N.V. v Mountain [1999] Q.B. 674 at 693.

<sup>43</sup> cf. Cleveland Petroleum Co v Trinity Garage (Bexleyheath), The Times, September 8, 1965.

<sup>44</sup> See above, pp.472-473.

<sup>45</sup> Amoco Australia Pty v Rocca Bros Motor Engineering Pty Ltd [1975] A.C. 561.

<sup>46</sup> ibid. at 578.

<sup>47</sup> Alec Lobb (Garages) Ltd v Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173; cf. the Amoco case, above, at 579.

<sup>48</sup> See above, p.471.

to be the sort of contract that the parties intended to enter into at all.”<sup>49</sup> The contract would have remained one “for letting a petrol station . . . at a rent which was not nominal. It was therefore the sort of contract which the parties intended to enter into”.<sup>50</sup>

The principle just stated is not restricted to cases in which the source of illegality is restraint of trade. In Carney v Herbert<sup>51</sup> a contract was made for the sale of shares by instalments; the sellers asked for security for the payment of these instalments, and the form of security agreed on and given was illegal. It was held that the contract as a whole was not vitiated, so that the buyer remained liable for the price since the illegal security “did not go to the heart of the transaction”.<sup>52</sup> The sellers had only wanted some security and the invalidity of the particular security given did not change the essential character of the contract as one for the sale of the shares.

(3) Statutory severance

Acts of Parliament which make specific terms in certain contracts unlawful sometimes contain provisions which give rise to a kind of statutory severance. Under the legislation against discrimination on grounds of sex, race or disability,<sup>53</sup> for example, the court may make orders for “modifying or removing” certain discriminatory provisions in contracts. Similarly the inclusion of certain terms in a contract may be an offence<sup>54</sup>; but a contract for the supply of goods or services is not to be void or unenforceable “by reason only” of the commission of the offence.<sup>55</sup>

4. Collateral Transactions

Collateral transactions may be infected with the illegality of a principal contract if they help a person to perform an illegal contract, or if they would, if valid, make possible the indirect enforcement of an illegal contract. Thus a loan of money is illegal if it is made to enable the borrower to make or to perform an illegal contract,<sup>56</sup> or to make an illegal payment,<sup>57</sup> or to pay a debt contracted under an illegal contract.<sup>58</sup> Similarly, a policy of insurance on an illegal venture is illegal<sup>59</sup>; a bond, bill of exchange or pledge given to secure an illegal debt is illegal<sup>60</sup>; and a bank is not liable on a letter of credit<sup>61</sup> to the

<sup>49</sup> [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173 at 192, applying the test stated by Buckley L.J. in Chemidus Wavin Ltd v Soc. pour la Transformation et l'Exploitation des Resines Industrielles [1978] 3 C.M.L.R. 514 at 520.

<sup>50</sup> [1985] 1 W.L.R. 173 at 192. An alternative ground for the decision in the Alec Lobb case is suggested by the statement there made at 181 that “The tie provisions . . . were not either the sole consideration for the tie or the sole object of the transaction” (italics supplied). While the second alternative here stated is (with respect) plainly correct, the first is hard to follow: it seems to suggest that the tie could in part be consideration for itself.

<sup>51</sup> [1985] A.C. 301; cf. below, p.511.

<sup>52</sup> [1985] A.C. 301 at 316.

<sup>53</sup> Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.77(5) as amended by Sex Discrimination Act 1996 and by Trade Union and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.32 and Sch.6; Race Relations Act 1976 s.72(5), as amended by Trade Union and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.39(2) and Sch.6; cf. Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s.26(3).

<sup>54</sup> See above, p.284.

<sup>55</sup> Fair Trading Act 1973, s.26.

<sup>56</sup> De Begnis v Armistead (1833) 10 Bing. 107; M’Kinnell v Robinson (1838) 3 M. & W. 434.

<sup>57</sup> Cannan v Bryce (1819) 3 B. & Ald. 179, as explained in Spector v Ageda [1973] Ch. 30.

<sup>58</sup> Spector v Ageda, above.

<sup>59</sup> Toulmin v Anderson (1808) 1 Taunt. 227.

<sup>60</sup> Fisher v Bridges (1854) 3 E. & B. 642 (bond); Clugas v Penaluna (1791) 4 T.R. 466 (bill of exchange; as to the rights of a holder in due course, see below, p.692); Taylor v Chester (1869) L.R. 4 Q.B. 309 (pledge). Contrast Sharif v Azad [1967] 1 Q.B. 605 as explained in Mansouri v Singh [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1393.

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.152.

extent that<sup>62</sup> the underlying contract of sale is prohibited by statute.<sup>63</sup> But if it is the collateral transaction which is illegal, it does not follow that this illegality infects the otherwise lawful principal contract. Thus where an illegal security was in good faith taken to secure the performance of a legal agreement that agreement was not thereby invalidated.<sup>64</sup> Nor is a contract illegal merely because one of the parties to it is also a party to an illegal contract which is remotely connected with the first. Thus a policy of marine insurance on a voyage is not illegal merely because the master has incurred statutory penalties through failing to make the service contracts with his crew in proper form<sup>65</sup>; a policy of insurance on goods is not illegal merely because, in the course of acquiring the goods, the insured had committed a violation of a foreign revenue law<sup>66</sup>; nor is a promise by one solicitor to pay another's charges in respect of a particular transaction illegal merely because the latter solicitor's client intended (without that solicitor's knowledge) to use the transaction in question as a vehicle of fraud.<sup>67</sup> In such cases, the first contract is illegal only if its object was to assist one of the parties in achieving the unlawful purpose under the second contract.<sup>68</sup>

An innocent party to an illegal contract can sometimes recover damages for breach of a "collateral warranty" that the contract was lawful.<sup>69</sup> Such a collateral warranty is not really a separate collateral transaction, but a device invented by law for the protection of an innocent party to an illegal contract.

4. Criticism

The law relating to the effects of illegality on contracts is open to a number of criticisms. The most important of these relate to the question of the enforceability of such contracts by, and to other remedies available to, an innocent party,<sup>70</sup> to the rules governing the right to restitution of benefits conferred under such contracts. In particular, the rules allowing a party to claim restitution of money or property if he can do so without reliance on the contract or its illegality can lead to results which, though explicable on technical grounds, appear to do little to further the policies underlying the legal prohibitions which are the cause of the illegality of the contract.<sup>71</sup> The Law Commission has tentatively recommended that, at least in some cases of illegal contracts, the present rules should be replaced by a "structured discretion"<sup>72</sup> to allow enforcement or

<sup>62</sup> See above, p.506.

<sup>63</sup> The American Accord [1983] 1 A.C. 168 (where the sale was not illegal but only unenforceable under the Bretton Woods Agreement Act 1945); Group Josi Re v Walbrook Insurance Co Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 345 at 363-364. A cheque given in pursuance of such a transaction is likewise unenforceable between the parties to the transaction: Mansouri v Singh [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1393.

<sup>64</sup> South Western Mineral Water Co Ltd v Ashmore [1967] 1 W.L.R. 1110; cf. Carney v Herbert [1985] A.C. 301; above, p.510.

<sup>65</sup> Redmond v Smith (1844) 7 Man. & G. 457.

<sup>66</sup> Euro-Diam Ltd v Bathurst [1990] Q.B. 1; the violation of the foreign law did not benefit the insured but only benefited his supplier; Clarke, [1988] L.M.C. L.Q. 124; Tan, 104 L.Q.R. 523; Tettenborn, [1988] C.L.J. 338.

<sup>67</sup> Rooks Rider v Steel [1994] 1 W.L.R. 818.

<sup>68</sup> See Re Trepca Mines Ltd [1963] Ch. 199; A.L.G. 79 L.Q.R. 49; cf. [1974] 6 C.L. 266; see now above, p.430.

<sup>69</sup> See above, p.489.

<sup>70</sup> See above, pp.484-490.

<sup>71</sup> See above, pp.497, 500-501.

<sup>72</sup> Illegal Transactions: The Effect of Illegality on Contracts and Trusts, Law Commission Consultation Paper No.154, §7.3.

(as the case may be) restitution.<sup>73</sup> These proposals await further consideration. In their present form, they are open to the objections that they go further than necessary, in the sense that the defects in the present law are reasonably specific<sup>74</sup> and scarcely justify and across-the-board abolition of the present rules; that their scope calls for elaboration<sup>75</sup>; and that the guidelines<sup>76</sup> which are meant to provide “structure” to the proposed discretion are so vague as do little to dispel the uncertainty that would necessarily result from the introduction of the discretion. It is to be hoped that further work on the proposals will help to meet at least some of these objections. The difficulty of the task is in no small part due to the fact that the law on this topic has to resolve a conflict of policies: the need to do justice between the parties has to be balanced against the wider considerations of public interest which underlie the law’s refusal to give effect to illegal contracts.

---

<sup>73</sup> The “enforcement” proposals are not, but the restitution proposals are, to apply to contracts which are illegal only on grounds of public policy: §§7.16, 7.17. The scope of this category is problematical: above, pp.477–480.

<sup>74</sup> See above, nn.70 and 71.

<sup>75</sup> See above, n.73.

<sup>76</sup> §§7.27 to 7.42; only the second of these guidelines (“the knowledge and intention of the plaintiff”: §7.33) is reasonably specific.

STATUTORY INVALIDITY

SECTION 1. IN GENERAL

WHERE a statute prohibits or regulates the making or performance of a contract, breach of the statute may make the contract illegal, void or unenforceable, or leave it perfectly valid. If the breach of the statute amounts to a crime, the effects of its breach depend on the principles discussed in Chapter 11.<sup>1</sup> Apart from these principles, the effect of a breach of a statute depends primarily on its express provisions, which may, for example, make the contract (or the offending term<sup>2</sup>) void,<sup>3</sup> voidable<sup>4</sup> or unenforceable<sup>5</sup>; or state that the breach is not to affect the validity of the contract.<sup>6</sup> The difficult cases are those in which the statute gives no clear lead. They may be divided into three groups.

1. “Void” Contracts held to be Illegal

S.1 of the Life Assurance Act 1774 provides that “no insurance shall be made” by any person on the life of another, or on certain other risks, unless the assured has an interest in the subject-matter of the insurance. Contracts of insurance made in breach of this section are declared to be “void” but have repeatedly been held illegal.<sup>7</sup> Similarly, s.1 of the Marine Insurance Act 1745 provided that “no assurance shall be made” on the terms that no further proof of interest than the policy should be required and declared that policies made in breach of the section were to be “void”; and again such policies were held illegal.<sup>8</sup> But when the section was replaced by s.4(1) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, which simply made such policies void, it was held that they were no longer illegal.<sup>9</sup> The reason for this distinction seems to be that the older Acts first prohibited the contracts (though without penalty) and then declared them void, while the Act of 1906 contains no prohibition but only a declaration of nullity.

---

<sup>1</sup> See above, pp.430–439.

<sup>2</sup> e.g. Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.77(1) and (2); Race Relations Act 1977, s.72(1) and (2)—“void” but only “unenforceable against” the victim of unlawful discrimination: Orphanos v Queen Mary College [1985] A.C. 761; Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s.26(1), and above, pp.487–488.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, s.34 (above, p.447); Pension Schemes Act 1993, s.160(1)(a) (“void”); Competition Act 1998, s.2(4) (making agreements prohibited by s.2(1) “void”).

<sup>4</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.341(1); Re Circo Citterio Menswear plc [2002] F.W.C.A. Civ 293, Ch.; [2002] 2 All E.R. 717.

<sup>5</sup> Either in so many words (e.g. Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.40(1), Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss.26(1), 27(1) (unenforceable against one party only) or by saying that “no action shall be brought,” or by use of similar expressions: e.g. Statute of Frauds 1677, s.4; above p.181; Pension Schemes Act 1993, s.160(1)(b) (“unenforceable”).

<sup>6</sup> e.g. Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.20(2)(b).

<sup>7</sup> Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co [1904] 1 K.B. 558; Hughes v Liverpool Victoria Legal Friendly Society [1916] 2 K.B. 482; Re London County Commercial Reinsurance Office [1922] 2 Ch. 67. cf. Fuji Finance Inc. v Aetna Life Insurance Co Ltd [1997] Ch. 173.

<sup>8</sup> Lomry v Bourdieu (1780) 2 Dougl. 468; Allkins v Jope (1877) 2 C.P.D. 375; Gedge v Royal Exchange Assurance [1900] 2 Q.B. 214; contra, Tasker v Scott (1815) 6 Taunt. 234.

<sup>9</sup> Re London County Commercial Reinsurance Office [1922] 2 Ch. 67.

2. Consequences of Breach not Specified

A statute may prohibit the making of a contract without imposing a criminal penalty or specifying all the civil consequences of breach. Contracts which violated such a prohibition were held illegal<sup>10</sup>; if such a consequences was, in the court's view, necessary to give effect to the purpose of the prohibition.<sup>11-13</sup>

3. Formalities Required by Statute

A statute may require some formalities to be observed in making a contract, or require some specific terms to be inserted into the contract, and again fail to specify the consequences of failure to comply with the requirement.<sup>14</sup> The question then is whether the statutory requirement is to be construed as being "directory only or obligatory".<sup>15</sup> Failure to comply with the statute makes the contract void if the requirement is obligatory, but not if it is only directory. In the case in which the distinction was drawn, statutory requirements as to the execution of a mortgage of a ship were held to be obligatory. Failure to comply with them accordingly invalidated the transaction though this effect of the failure was not specified in the legislation.<sup>16</sup> It seems that in applying the distinction the court will ask whether it is necessary, to promote the object of the statute, to hold that failure to comply with its requirements should invalidate transactions.<sup>17</sup>

SECTION 2. GAMING AND WAGERING CONTRACTS

1. Definitions

(1) Wagering contracts

In Carlill v Carbolite Smoke Ball Co<sup>18</sup> Hawkins J. said: "A wagering contract is one by which two persons, professing to hold opposite views touching the issue of a future uncertain event, mutually agree that, dependent upon the determination of that event, one shall win from the other, and that other shall pay or hand over to him, a sum of money or other stake; neither of the contracting parties having any other interest in that contract than the sum or stake he will so win or lose, there being no other real consideration for the making of such contract by either of the parties." The following points arising out of this definition call for comment.

(a) FUTURE UNCERTAIN EVENT. A wager is generally made on a future event but can equally well be made on a past event which is not uncertain at all, e.g. which horse won the Derby last year<sup>19</sup>; or on some other question of fact, e.g. whether the earth is flat.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Sykes v Beadon (1897) 11 Ch.D. 170; disapproved in Smith v Anderson (1880) 15 Ch.D. 247, but not on this point: Shaw v Benson (1883) 11 Q.B.D. 563; cf. Greenberg v Cooperstein [1926] Ch. 657. The prohibition with which these cases were concerned is repealed by the Regulatory Reform (Removal of 20 Member Limit in Partnerships, etc.) Order 2002, SI 2002/3203.

<sup>11</sup> <sup>13</sup> For conflicting views on the purpose of a statutory provision which failed to specify the civil consequences of a prohibition, see Fuji Finance Ltd v Aetna Life Insurance Co Ltd [1997] Ch. 173; cf. above, p.488.

<sup>14</sup> See ante, pp.179-180 for cases in which the statute does specify the effects of non-compliance.

<sup>15</sup> Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner (1860) 2 D.F. & J. 502 at 508.

<sup>16</sup> Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner (1860) 2 D.F. & J. 502 (actual decision reversed by Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s.57).

<sup>17</sup> cf. St. John Shipping Corp. v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 Q.B. 267; above, p.429.

<sup>18</sup> [1892] 2 Q.B. 484 at 490; affirmed [1893] 1 Q.B. 256.

<sup>19</sup> cf. Pugh v Jenkins (1841) 1 Q.B. 631; Rourke v Short (1856) 5 E. & B. 904 (below, p.517).

<sup>20</sup> Hampden v Walsh (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 189.

The event need only be “uncertain” in the sense that the parties profess to hold opposite views on it. It has been suggested that there cannot be a wager on an event which is wholly within the control of one party.<sup>21</sup> But if A says that he will wear a red tie tomorrow, it is perfectly possible for B to bet him that he will not do so; and it is hard to see why the resulting contract should not be described as a wager.

(b) ONE TO LOSE, OTHER TO WIN. A contract is not a wager if one party cannot win or if one party cannot lose. Thus in Carhill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co<sup>22</sup> the defendants promised to pay £100 to anyone who, after using a smoke-ball manufactured by them, caught influenza. This was not a wager because the user of the smoke-ball could not lose anything if he failed to catch influenza. Similarly, in Ellesmere v Wallace<sup>23</sup> the defendant entered his horse for two races under contracts made with the Jockey Club. If he won the first race, he was entitled to £200 put up by the Club plus the stakes of the other nominators. If he won the second, he was entitled to £200 put up by the Club plus the right to sell his horse by auction for £300. These contracts were not wagers because the Club could lose nothing on the outcome of the races: it paid the £200 to the winner, whoever he was. Similarly, persons who contribute to a totalisator<sup>24</sup> or football pool<sup>25</sup> or who take part in a bingo competition<sup>26</sup> do not wager with the person who runs it,<sup>27</sup> since he merely distributes a predetermined proportion of the total stakes among the winners.<sup>28</sup> And persons who participate in a whist drive at which they can win prizes contributed by third parties do not wager because they cannot lose.<sup>29</sup>

(c) BETWEEN TWO PERSONS. It has been said that there can only be two parties to a wager, or that, if there are more than two, they must be divided into two sides.<sup>30</sup> Thus if A and B bet on the result of an election in which there are two candidates, the contract is a wager. But if A, B and C bet on the result of an election in which there are three candidates, each contributing his stake to a common fund to be paid over to the person whose forecast turns out to be correct, the contract is not a wager. The authorities seem to support this distinction, though it is hard to see why the two cases should be treated differently.

(d) NO OTHER INTEREST. A contract is not a wager if the party to whom money is promised on the occurrence of an event has an “interest” in its non-occurrence. Hence contracts of insurance are not wagers if the insured person has some enforceable right or interest (whether contractual or proprietary) in the subject-matter.<sup>31</sup> So long as the insured has an insurable interest, the contract is not a wager merely because the interest

<sup>21</sup> Ellesmere v Wallace [1926] 2 Ch. 1 at 29.

<sup>22</sup> [1893] 1 Q.B. 256. See also Kloekner & Co AG v Gatoil Overseas Inc [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 177 at 192 (agent could not lose as he was remunerated by commission payable in any event); contrast Richards v Starck [1911] 1 K.B. 296 (risk of losing interest on money sufficient to make transaction a wager).

<sup>23</sup> [1929] 2 Ch. 1.

<sup>24</sup> cf. Tote Investors Ltd v Smoker [1968] 1 Q.B. 509 (but Lord Denning M.R. and Lord Pearson said at 515, 520 that, apart from authority, they would have regarded such transactions as wagers).

<sup>25</sup> But where the agreements between the promoters of the pool and the participants contain honour clauses they are not legally binding: above, p.163. Contrast the treatment of football pools in Scots Law: Ferguson v Littlewoods Pools 1997 S.L.T. 309.

<sup>26</sup> See Peck v Lateu (1973) S.J. 185.

<sup>27</sup> Nor do they wager with each other: below, n.30.

<sup>28</sup> Att.-Gen. v Luncheon & Sports Club Ltd [1929] A.C. 400.

<sup>29</sup> Lockwood v Cooper [1903] 2 K.B. 428.

<sup>30</sup> Ellesmere v Wallace [1929] 2 Ch. at p.50; if this is right, contributors to a totalisator or football pool or participants in a bingo competition do not wager with each other.

<sup>31</sup> cf. Wilson v Jones (1867) L.R. 2 Ex. 139 at 150.

is insured for more than its true value.<sup>32</sup> If he has no such interest at all, the contract may be a wager, though this is not necessarily the case since insurer and insured do not necessarily profess to hold opposite views concerning the event insured against.<sup>33</sup> Whether the contract is a wager or not, an insurance without interest is void and may be illegal by statute.<sup>34</sup> Thus a person cannot make a valid contract to insure a third person's property, unless damage to or destruction of it would cause him loss because he has a proprietary interest in it (e.g. where it has been pledged to him for a debt) or because he has a right to use it (e.g. under licence granted to him by the owner).<sup>35</sup> But a person does not have an insurable interest in property merely because loss of or damage to it would indirectly prejudice his financial position: thus, the assets of a company cannot be insured by its principal or even by its sole shareholder.<sup>36</sup> A person cannot in theory insure a mere expectation of benefit, however strong it may be.<sup>37</sup> But "there are many risks which cannot be regarded as legal or equitable in character, but which are not the less real from a business point of view, and which it is therefore important to cover".<sup>38</sup> Policies covering such risks are binding in honour only, but insurers in practice pay on them in spite of the theoretical lack of interest.

Although a mere expectation of benefit in the commercial sense cannot be insured, it is possible to insure a hope of benefit if it is founded on a legal right. Thus the owner of an orchard can insure "next year's apple crop"<sup>39</sup>; and a person who holds shares in a company can insure against the failure of an enterprise in which the company is engaged.<sup>40</sup>

In cases of life insurance, the interest insured is not strictly proprietary. The assured has an interest in his own life<sup>41</sup> and in the life of any relation who is legally bound to support him<sup>42</sup>; and in the life of his debtor.<sup>43</sup> Spouses can also insure each other's lives.<sup>44</sup>

A contract may be a wager although it concerns the property of one of the parties. Thus it is a wager to bet on one's own horse in a race.<sup>45</sup> The owner has an interest, but it is not the object of the contract to protect that interest. There seems to be no objection in principle to the owner's insuring the prize which the horse may win: this is not essentially different from insuring a future crop.

(e) NO OTHER REAL CONSIDERATION. Attempts are sometimes made to pass off as valid contracts transactions which are in substance wagers. In Brogden v Marriott<sup>46</sup> the defendant sold a horse on the terms that if it trotted at 18 miles per hour within a month

<sup>32</sup> The Maira (No.2) [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 660 at 662, reversed [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 12, but not on this point: see ibid. at 17.

<sup>33</sup> Hence Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.4(2) provides that, where the insured has no insurable interest, "a contract of marine insurance is deemed to be a gaming and wagering contract."

<sup>34</sup> e.g. Marine Insurance (Gambling Policies) Act 1909; cf. above, p.513.

<sup>35</sup> The Moonacre [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 501.

<sup>36</sup> Macaura v Northern Assurance Co Ltd [1925] A.C. 619.

<sup>37</sup> Lucena v Craufurd (1806) 2 B. & P.N.R. 269.

<sup>38</sup> Arnould, Marine Insurance, (16th ed.), p.15; cf. Strass v Spillers & Bakers Ltd [1911] 2 K.B. 759 at 768-9.

<sup>39</sup> Thacker v Hardy (1878) 4 Q.B.1D. 685 at 695; cf. Cook v Field (1850) 15 Q.B. 460.

<sup>40</sup> Wilson v Jones (1867) 1 L.R. 2 Ex. 139. Contrast Newbury International Ltd v Reliance International Insurance Co [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 83 at 92-93 (no insurable interest under "prize indemnity" policy when there was no genuine liability to pay the prize).

<sup>41</sup> Wainwright v Bland (1835) 1 Moo. & Rob. 481; (1836) 1 M. & W. 32.

<sup>42</sup> Chitty on Contracts (28th ed.) §41-005.

<sup>43</sup> Von Lindenau v Desborough (1828) 3 C. & P. 353.

<sup>44</sup> Griffiths v Fleming [1909] 1 K.B. 805.

<sup>45</sup> Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co [1892] 2 Q.B. 484 at 492.

<sup>46</sup> (1836) 3 Bing.N.C. 88.

the price was to be £200; if not the price was to be 1s. This was a wager: in effect the defendant staked his horse against £200 on the result of a trotting match.<sup>47</sup> Similarly, in Rourke v Short<sup>48</sup> the parties to an agreement for the sale of rags began, in the course of fixing the price, to argue about the price of a previous lot of rags, the seller maintaining that it had been 5s. 9d. per cwt. and the buyer that it had been 6s. This dispute was referred to a third party (who was to receive one gallon of brandy for deciding it) and it was agreed that the price of the present lot was to be 6s. per cwt. if the seller was right, and 3s. per cwt. if the buyer was right. This was held to be a wager on the price of the previous lot. There could be a perfectly genuine bargain for the price of goods to be fixed by reference to that paid for a previous lot. But that was not the bargain here, "for the lower the former price was, the higher the present price is to be."<sup>49</sup>

These cases should be contrasted with the Irish case of Crofton v Colgan,<sup>50</sup> where the claimant exchanged his horse for the defendant's, who also agreed to pay the claimant half the former horse's winnings in its next two races. This was held to be a valid contract, in which the price was made to depend on the horse's profit-earning capacity.

It is, again, possible to contract to pay a reward to a person for making some discovery, or for proving a particular hypothesis. But in Hampden v Walsh<sup>51</sup> the claimant, who believed that the earth was flat, offered a reward of £500 to any person who could satisfactorily prove the curvature of the earth by actual measurement. This was held to be a wager since the claimant's object was not to establish a scientific fact but "to establish his own view in a marked and triumphant manner".<sup>52</sup>

The most important group of contracts which may in substance amount to wagers are contracts for differences.<sup>53</sup> A person may buy shares or commodities on the understanding that they are neither to be transferred nor paid for but that on settlement day one party shall pay to the other the difference between the price on that day and the price on the contract day. Such a contract has been held to be a wager.<sup>54</sup> But it is not a wager if a person who has genuinely bought resells to the original seller, and the parties then settle accounts by agreeing that only the difference resulting from the two transactions shall change hands.<sup>55</sup> Many contracts for differences are now binding by statute, even if they are wagers<sup>56</sup>; but our present concern is with the question whether such a contract is a wager.

In some of the above cases the question whether a contract is a wager or a genuine transaction depended on the intention of the parties. The parties may have different

<sup>47</sup> For an undisguised wager on such a match, see Batson v Newman (1876) 1 C.P.D. 573.

<sup>48</sup> (1856) 5 F. & B. 904.

<sup>49</sup> ibid. p.912.

<sup>50</sup> (1859) 10 Ir.C.L.R. 133.

<sup>51</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 189.

<sup>52</sup> ibid. p.197.

<sup>53</sup> Chaikin and Moher, [1986] L.M.C.L.Q. 390.

<sup>54</sup> Universal Stock Exchange Ltd v Strachan [1896] A.C. 166; Re Gieve [1899] 1 Q.B. 794; cf. Re The Futures Index [1985] F.L.R. 147. If the proceeds of the transaction are "winnings from betting" they are not subject to Capital Gains Tax: Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992, s.51(1). Under Licensed Dealers (Conduct of Business) Rules (SI 1983/585), r.18(2), a licensed dealer (in securities) may not plead the Gaming Act.

<sup>55</sup> Grizewood v Blane (1851) 11 C.B. 526; The Filipinas I [1973] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 349 at 357; Wilson, Smithett & Cope Ltd v Teruzzi [1976] Q.B. 683 at 710; Kloekner A.G. v Gatoil Overseas Inc [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 177; Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd v Welwyn-Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All E.R. 1 (interest rate swaps).

<sup>56</sup> See below, pp.521, 526; cf. the Kloekner case, above, at p.193; Morgan Grenfell case, above, at 12-14.

intentions: for example, one may intend to make a contract for differences and the other a real sale. Such a contract is not a wager.<sup>57</sup>

(2) Gaming

(a) DEFINITIONS. "Gaming" has been judicially defined to mean the playing of any game for money or money's worth<sup>58</sup>; and for this purpose a "game" includes horse-racing.<sup>59</sup> Some form of contest between the parties is necessary to constitute a "game".<sup>60</sup> A gaming contract<sup>61</sup> is simply a contract to take part in such gaming. It is not necessarily a wager since there may be more than two parties to it. If persons other than the participants in a game bet on its outcome, their contract is not a gaming contract, but it may be a wager on a game.<sup>62</sup>

Many kinds of gaming and wagers on games are regulated by various statutes.<sup>63</sup> The Gaming Act 1968 defines "gaming" as "the playing of any game of chance for winnings in money or money's worth, whether any person playing the game is at risk of losing money or money's worth or not".<sup>64</sup> This definition is narrower than the judicial definition in that it is limited to games of chance.<sup>65</sup> The judicial definition still applies in relation to enactments which use the word "gaming" without defining it.<sup>66</sup>

(b) LAWFUL AND UNLAWFUL GAMING. The 1968 Act defines the circumstances in which gaming is unlawful. For this purpose it distinguishes between gaming on licensed or registered premises (which may be carried on for profit) and gaming elsewhere (which may not be carried on for profit).<sup>67</sup> The Act provides that "no gaming . . . shall take place" under certain conditions: i.e. if the game involves staking against a bank; or if the chances are not equally favourable to all the players; or if the chances lie between the player or players and some other person and are not as favourable to the player or players as they are to that person; or if a charge other than the stake is made in respect of the gaming; or if a levy is made on the stakes or winnings.<sup>68</sup> But these conditions are subject to a number of qualifications and exceptions; and in particular they may be relaxed in the case of gaming on licensed or registered premises so as to enable the gaming to be carried

<sup>57</sup> Thacker v Hardy (1878) 4 Q.B.D. 685; Weddle, Beck & Co v Hackett [1929] 1 K.B. 321; Morgan Grenfell case, above, n.55 at 12.

<sup>58</sup> Ellesmere v Wallace [1929] 2 Ch. 1 at 55 (but see also ibid. p.28); Ankers v Bartlett [1936] 1 K.B. 147.

<sup>59</sup> Applegarth v Colley (1842) 10 M. & W. 723; presumably other kinds of racing could also fall within the definition.

<sup>60</sup> One Life Ltd v Roy [1996] 2 B.C.I.L.C. 608 ("pyramid scheme" not a "game" but an unlawful lottery).

<sup>61</sup> There seems to be no difference between a gaming contract and a "contract by way of gaming" within s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845; below, p.520.

<sup>62</sup> This depends on whether the elements of the definition discussed at pp.514–518, above, are satisfied: e.g. the contract will not be a wager if there are more than two sides or if one party cannot lose.

<sup>63</sup> Particularly by the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Acts 1963–1971, the Gaming Act 1968 (as amended by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986, Gaming (Amendment) Act 1987 and Gaming Act 1990), the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976 and the National Lottery, etc., Act 1993.

<sup>64</sup> s.52(1); the object of the concluding words ("whether . . . not.") was to reverse the decision in McCullom v Wrightson [1968] A.C. 522.

<sup>65</sup> Defined by s.52(1) to include "a game of chance and skill combined and a pretended game of chance or of chance and skill combined." The possibility that the element of chance may be eliminated by "superlative skill" is to be disregarded: s.52(6). An "athletic game or sport" is not a game of chance: s.52(1).

<sup>66</sup> e.g. Gaming Act 1845, s.18 (below, p.520); cf. Gaming Act 1710 (below, p.527).

<sup>67</sup> See s.1 and Pts 1 and 2 respectively. For the distinction between licensed and registered premises, see s.11 and Schs 3 and 4. Roughly speaking, licensed premises are casinos established principally for commercial gambling while registered premises are clubs established for other purposes which also wish to make a sessional charge for gambling but not to profit from it in other ways.

<sup>68</sup> See ss.2(1), 3(1), 4, 13(1), 14(1) and 15(1); and Regulations made under ss.13–15.

on at a profit.<sup>69</sup> Gaming in streets or public places is also prohibited.<sup>70</sup> The definition of unlawful gaming in the Act is exhaustive; the previous common law and statutory definitions of unlawful gaming no longer apply.<sup>71</sup>

The 1968 Act does not, except in one section,<sup>72</sup> affect the law as to gaming and wagering contracts; but it has indirect repercussions on the law of contract in that the effect of a gaming contract or of a wager on a game sometimes depends on the legality of the gaming.

2. Effects of Gaming and Wagering Contracts

(1) Enforcement

(a) AT COMMON LAW wagers were valid and could thus be enforced by the winner.<sup>73</sup> This rule was not much liked by the courts, who refused to enforce wagers on many grounds. Some wagers were illegal: these included wagers on unlawful games<sup>74</sup>; wagers that one of the parties would commit a legal wrong or do an immoral act; wagers which affected the interests and feelings of a third person so as to make a breach of the peace likely; and wagers which were “against sound policy”.<sup>75</sup> Thus the following wagers were held void: a wager that peace between England and France would be concluded by September 1797<sup>76</sup>; a wager on the life of Napoleon in time of peace<sup>77</sup>; a wager tending to cause public disorder<sup>78</sup>; a wager with voters in a constituency as to the outcome of an election there—an obvious cloak for bribery<sup>79</sup>; and a wager on the sex of a living person suspected to be masquerading as a man.<sup>80</sup> The courts also sometimes simply refused to enforce a wager on the ground that it was an “idle wager” and that it was a waste of the court’s time to entertain an action on it.<sup>81</sup> Thus the courts refused to enforce a wager “on the number of ways of nicking 7 on the dice”<sup>82</sup>; a wager, made between persons who had no pecuniary interest in the matter, that the next child of an unmarried woman would be a boy,<sup>83</sup> and a wager on an abstract question of law in which the parties had only an academic interest.<sup>84</sup>

<sup>69</sup> See ss.13(2), 14(2) and 15(2). See also s.6 for special exceptions with regard to certain games played in public houses.

<sup>70</sup> s.5.

<sup>71</sup> This is not expressly provided by any section of the 1968 Act but is the effect of s.32(1) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. The repeal of this subsection by s.53(1) of the 1968 Act does not revive the previous statutory and common law rules as to what constituted unlawful gaming: see Interpretation Act 1978, ss.15, 16.

<sup>72</sup> s.16 (as amended by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986) below, pp.529–530, 534–535.

<sup>73</sup> Micklefield v Hippin (1760) 1 Anst. 33; Good v Elliott (1790) 3 T.R. 693; Hussey v Crickitt (1811) 3 Camp. 168.

<sup>74</sup> See now above, pp.518–519. At common law, cock-fighting, card games other than those of mere skill and (probably) all games of chance were unlawful: Jenks v Turpin (1884) 13 Q.B.1D. 505 at 524.

<sup>75</sup> Good v Elliott (1790) 3 T.R. 693 at 695.

<sup>76</sup> Lacausade v White (1798) 2 Esp. 629 (as to recovery of money under illegal contract, overruled in Landyck v Hewitt (1800) 1 East 96).

<sup>77</sup> Gilbert v Sykes (1812) 16 East 150: because this might lead to his assassination (which would be “against sound policy” in time of peace) or to his preservation (which would be “against sound policy” in time of war).

<sup>78</sup> Eltham v Kingsman (1818) 1 B. & Ald. 683.

<sup>79</sup> Allen v Hearn (1785) 1 T.R. 56.

<sup>80</sup> Da Costa v Jones (1778) 2 Cowp. 729.

<sup>81</sup> Robinson v Mearns (1825) 6 D. & R.K.B. 26 at 27.

<sup>82</sup> Brown v Leeson (1792) 2 H.Bl. 43.

<sup>83</sup> Ditchburn v Goldsmith (1815) 4 Camp. 152.

<sup>84</sup> Henkin v Gerss (1810) 2 Camp. 408.

(b) UNDER GAMING ACT 1845. S.18 of this Act provides that “All contracts or agreements . . . by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void; and . . . no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager. . . .”<sup>85</sup>

(i) Effects of s.18. The section clearly prevents the winner from enforcing the wager by action.<sup>86</sup> It used to be thought that this was the sole effect of the section, and that the loser could be sued if he made a fresh promise, supported by fresh consideration, to pay the amount of the lost bet. In Hyams v Stuart King<sup>87</sup> the loser of bets on horse-races made a fresh promise to pay in consideration of the winner’s promise not to post him as a defaulter. The Court of Appeal held that the winner could enforce this promise. But this case was overruled by the House of Lords in Hill v William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd.<sup>88</sup> It was held, on similar facts, that the winner could not enforce the loser’s fresh promise because the second limb of s.18 prevented the recovery of money alleged to have been won on a wager, whether or not the action was brought on the wagering contract. The fresh promise to pay, though not void by the first limb of the section, was unenforceable by its second limb.

(ii) Gaming with chips. For the purpose of s.18, it makes no difference that the gaming is carried on, not with cash, but with gaming chips supplied by a gambling club to its members; and this is true even though the chips are supplied on terms which entitle the member to use them either for gaming or to buy refreshments in the club. Whether or not there is a separate contract for the supply of the chips,<sup>89</sup> their use for the purpose of gaming is “simply a convenient mechanism for facilitating gambling with money”<sup>90</sup>; and the fact that chips are used does not affect the invalidity of the gaming contract. No doubt if it could be proved that the chips had been used for some purpose other than gaming (e.g. for the purchase of refreshments<sup>91</sup>) a separate contract would arise in respect of that transaction; and that contract would not be affected by the Gaming Acts.

(iii) Attempts to evade s.18. The courts have always resisted attempts indirectly to enforce the wagering contract itself, and have, since Hill’s case, resisted attempts to evade the effect of that decision. Thus the winner cannot recover by suing on an account stated<sup>92</sup> or by getting a third party to promise to pay, in return for the winner’s promise not to post the loser as a defaulter.<sup>93</sup> The use of such devices came to an abrupt stop after it was held that a solicitor who indorsed a writ (now called a claim form) based in

<sup>85</sup> See further below, pp.522, 526, 527. The EC Directive on Electronic Commerce (2000/31) provides in Art.1(5)(d) that it is not to apply to “gambling activities which involve wagering a stake with monetary value in games of chance, including lotteries and betting transactions”; and the Electronic Commerce (EC Directive) Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/2013), which implement most of the Directive, do not apply to “betting, gaming or lotteries which involve wagering a stake of monetary value” (reg.3(1)(d)(iii)).

<sup>86</sup> The court can take this point of its own motion, although the loser does not plead the section: Luckett v Wood (1908) 24 T.L.R. 617; Société des Hôtels Réunis (S.A) v Hawker (1913) 29 T.L.R. 578. Seem, the loser could also obtain a declaration of invalidity.

<sup>87</sup> [1908] 2 K.B. 696.

<sup>88</sup> [1949] A.C. 530.

<sup>89</sup> In Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 562 Lord Templeman said that “there was only one contract and that was a gaming contract;” but Lord Goff at 576–577 appears to treat the transaction as consisting of two contracts.

<sup>90</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 575. The issue in that case was not whether the contract could be enforced but the point arose indirectly for the purpose of the question discussed at pp.536–538, below.

<sup>91</sup> In Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 there was no such evidence: see p.569.

<sup>92</sup> Lam v Dearnley [1950] 1 K.B. 400.

<sup>93</sup> Coral v Kleyman [1951] 1 All E.R. 518.

substance on a wager as a claim on an account stated was guilty of contempt of court, and liable to be imprisoned for having tried to deceive the court.<sup>94</sup>

(iv) Possible qualifications. There are three types of cases which may not fall within s.18.

First, the loser may promise the winner to sell him something at an undervalue in return for the winner's promise not to post him as a defaulter. It would be a question of fact whether an action brought to enforce the loser's promise would be one to recover a valuable thing alleged to be won on a wager; and the court "will not be deceived by any specious attempt to conceal the real nature of the promise".<sup>95</sup> If A, having defaulted on a bet of £300 to B and been threatened with exposure, agrees to sell B a car worth £1,000 for £700, and the contract shows a deduction of the £300 lost on the bet, it is clear that B could not enforce the contract. But it does not follow that "there can never be a case where a promise by a defaulting backer given in consideration of a promise by the winner of the bet not to report the defaulter may be enforced".<sup>96</sup>

Secondly, the loser may bargain for time to pay, without asking to be released from the debt of honour incurred under the bet. Thus A, having lost a bet of £1,000 to B, may promise to pay B £50 in return for B's promise not to report A as a defaulter for one month. An action to recover this £50 might not be an action "for recovering any sum of money . . . alleged to be won upon any wager."

Thirdly, the first limb of s.18 makes void all contracts by way of gaming and wagering but the second limb only precludes the recovery of money or a valuable thing. If the loser, in consideration of the winner's promise not to post him as a defaulter, promises to render some service to the winner, this promise may not be within section 18.<sup>97</sup>

In the cases in which a new promise can still be enforced, this can only be done subject to the restrictions which, before Hill's case, had been placed on the rule in Hyams v Stuart King. The winner must promise not to post the loser as a defaulter; it is not enough for him simply to refrain from posting,<sup>98</sup> nor for him to promise not to sue the loser, for a promise not to sue on a claim known to be invalid is no consideration.<sup>99</sup> It is also clear that the new promise would not be enforced if it had been obtained by threats amounting to blackmail.<sup>1</sup>

(v) Excepted transactions. Certain dealings in investments by way of business are excepted from invalidity under s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845 even though they might amount to wagering contracts, e.g. because they were contracts for differences<sup>2</sup> or bets on stock market indices.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>94</sup> R. v Weisz [1951] 2 K.B. 611. See also L.S.Gaz. January 1952, p.17.

<sup>95</sup> Hill's Case [1949] A.C. 530 at 559; cf. 549 at 565; Re Bromne [1960] 1 W.L.R. 692.

<sup>96</sup> [1949] A.C. at 559; cf. Re Bromne [1904] 2 K.B. 133; discussed in Hill's case at 564–566, 573–574.

<sup>97</sup> The third limb of s.18 (below, p.526) makes it clear that services cannot be a "valuable thing" within s.18; for the "thing" must be of a kind that can be "deposited".

<sup>98</sup> Bob Guinness Ltd v Salomonsen [1948] 2 K.B. 42; the case may be reconciled with the rule that actual forbearance to sue (without a promise) is good consideration along the lines suggested at pp.90–91, above.

<sup>99</sup> Poteliakhoff v Teakle [1938] 2 K.B. 816. But there might be consideration if the validity of the claim was in doubt, e.g. because it was not clear whether the original transaction was a wager.

<sup>1</sup> As defined by Theft Act 1968, s.21.

<sup>2</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.412 and Sch.2, Pt II, para.19(a), referring to "a contract for differences"; for such contracts, see above, p.517. "Specified" activities and investments for the purpose of s.412 are defined by Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 (Gaming Contracts) Order 2001 (SI 2001/2510).

<sup>3</sup> City Index Ltd v Leslie [1992] Q.B. 98. For bets on stock market indices, see Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.412 and Sch.2, Pt II, para.19(b)(ii).

(c) DISTANCE CONTRACTS. The Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000<sup>4</sup> provide that, in the case of a “distance contract” for the supply of goods or services by a commercial supplier to a consumer, the consumer is to have the “right to cancel”<sup>5</sup>; but that in a number of exceptional cases there is to be no such right. One such exception is stated in reg.13(f) to apply in the case of “contracts . . . for gaming, betting or lottery services”. The assumption underlying this exception is that the contract is valid apart from the Regulations: for example, it may be one for betting services without being a wager because one or more of the elements of the definition of a wager discussed earlier in this Chapter<sup>6</sup> are not satisfied. Where the contract is invalid because it is a wager, the consumer does not need to cancel it to escape liability; nor do the restitutionary consequences of cancellation specified in the Regulations<sup>7</sup> appear to displace the rule that losses paid under a wagering contract cannot be recovered back by the loser.<sup>8</sup>

The “right to cancel” may also be excluded by reg.13(f) where the contract, though it is a wager, is valid because it is an excepted transaction of the kind described above<sup>9</sup> and therefore excepted from invalidity under s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845. In such cases, the “right to cancel” a “distance contract” may in addition be excluded by reg.13(b) which provides that there is no such right in the case of “contracts . . . for the supply of goods or services the price of which is dependent on fluctuations in the financial market which cannot be controlled by the supplier”. This exception to the “right to cancel” could, for example, apply to contracts for differences or to bets on stock market indices where such contracts are valid in spite of being wagers.<sup>10</sup>

(2) Recovering back money paid

(a) AT COMMON LAW a loser could not recover back money paid under a lost bet.<sup>11</sup> Money paid under a valid or merely unenforceable contract clearly cannot be recovered back, and money paid under an illegal contract is, in general, irrecoverable,<sup>12</sup> although there are exceptions to this rule. But there is no reported case in which the loser was able to rely on any of these exceptions to recover back his losses from the winner.

(b) UNDER THE GAMING ACT 1845. Prima facie money paid under a void contract can be recovered back.<sup>13</sup> Thus in Re London County Commercial Reinsurance Office<sup>14</sup> it was held that premiums paid under marine policies which were, or were deemed to be, wagers, and void under s.4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, could be recovered back. But it is well settled that losses paid under a simple wager are irrecoverable.<sup>15</sup> One possible reason for this rule is that, under the second limb of s.18, a person cannot bring an action to recover “any sum of money . . . alleged to be won upon any wager.” But it has been said that the second limb only prevents the winner from recovering, and does not apply to an action by the loser.<sup>16</sup> If this is so, then the reason for the present rule is

<sup>4</sup> SI 2000/2334; above, p.29.

<sup>5</sup> reg.10.

<sup>6</sup> See above, pp.514–518.

<sup>7</sup> reg.14.

<sup>8</sup> See below, under heading (3).

<sup>9</sup> At n.2.

<sup>10</sup> See above, p.521 at nn.2 and 3.

<sup>11</sup> Hawson v Hancock (1800) 8 T.R. 575; Vandyck v Hemitt (1800) 1 East 96.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.491.

<sup>13</sup> See below, p.1057.

<sup>14</sup> [1922] 2 Ch. 67.

<sup>15</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 561.

<sup>16</sup> Parney v Hickman (1847) 5 C.B. 271 at 280.

that the loser, by paying, “waives a benefit which the statute has given him and confers a good title to the money on the person to whom he pays it”<sup>17</sup>; or that the payment is in law regarded as a gift by the loser to the winner.<sup>18</sup> It makes no difference, for the purpose of this rule, that the loser’s “payment” is made, not in cash, but with gaming chips supplied by a club to its members as a “mechanism for facilitating gambling with money”.<sup>19</sup> But if the winner cheats, the loser can probably recover back his losses on the ground of fraud.<sup>20</sup>

(c) OVERPAYMENT. It has been held that an overpayment by a bookmaker to his client in respect of a wager cannot be recovered back.<sup>21</sup> But if the client knows when he receives the payment that it is excessive and decides to keep it, he is guilty of theft<sup>22</sup>; and the court by or before which he is convicted can presumably make a compensation order against him.<sup>23</sup>

(3) Recovering back money or property deposited

One party to a wager may deposit a sum of money or other valuable thing with the other before the determination of the wager, as security for the performance of his undertaking.<sup>24</sup>

(a) ILLEGAL WAGERS. Such a deposit is irrecoverable if it was made under an illegal wager,<sup>25</sup> because of the general rule that money paid under an illegal contract cannot be recovered back.<sup>26</sup> But it may be recoverable under one of the exceptions to that rule, e.g., if the depositor repudiates the wager in time.<sup>27</sup> Whether it is actually recoverable then depends on the rules applicable to lawful wagers, discussed below.

(b) LAWFUL WAGERS. Where the wager is lawful,<sup>28</sup> a deposit can, in general, be recovered back by the winner. Thus in Re Cronmire<sup>29</sup> Waud deposited £60 with Cronmire by way of “cover” for gambling transactions between them on the Stock Exchange, which resulted to Waud’s advantage. It was held that he could recover back his £60.

The question whether a deposit can be recovered back by the loser raises more complicated issues, which may be illustrated by reference to the two Strachan cases, both of which arose out of the same transactions. Strachan engaged in gambling transactions on the Stock Exchange with a company. He deposited securities and £3,000 in cash by way of “cover,” and lost heavily. The House of Lords held that he was entitled to recover back his securities since they were deposited to secure payment of a void debt.<sup>30</sup> But the

<sup>17</sup> Bridger v Savage (1884) 15 Q.B.D. 363 at 367; cf. Richards v Stark [1911] 1 K.B. 296 (losses paid in advance irrecoverable).

<sup>18</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 562, 577.

<sup>19</sup> ibid. p.575.

<sup>20</sup> This was the common law position: Dufour v Ackland (1830) 9 L.J.(o.s.) K.B. 3. For a review of conflicting American decisions, see Berman v Riverside Casino Corp., 323 F.2d 977 (1963), where it was alleged that loaded dice had been used in a Nevada casino.

<sup>21</sup> Morgan v Ashcroft [1938] 1 K.B. 49.

<sup>22</sup> R. v Gilks [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1341.

<sup>23</sup> Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.130; above, p.369.

<sup>24</sup> For the position where the deposit is made with a third person as stakeholder, see below, p.526.

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.518.

<sup>26</sup> See above, p.491.

<sup>27</sup> See above, p.494; Tappenden v Randall (1801) 2 B. & P. 467; Aubert v Walsh (1810) 3 Taunt. 277.

<sup>28</sup> A wager is lawful unless it falls into one of the categories of illegal wagers described on p.518, above.

<sup>29</sup> [1898] 2 Q.B. 383.

<sup>30</sup> Universal Stock Exchange Ltd v Strachan [1896] A.C. 166.

Court of Appeal held, on another appeal,<sup>31</sup> that the £3,000 deposited in cash was irrecoverable as it had actually been appropriated by the company in discharge of Strachan's "indebtedness". It seems that Strachan could not have recovered the securities if the contract had authorised the company to realise them and if the company had done so and appropriated the proceeds in discharge of Strachan's "indebtedness". It seems also that Strachan could have recovered back the £3,000, if he had demanded it back before appropriation of it in discharge of any "indebtedness" under the gambling transactions, e.g. if he had made the demand before those transactions had been determined. Thus in Re the Futures Index,<sup>32</sup> a bookmaker took sums of money from a client on account of possible future losses. On the bookmaker's going into liquidation, it was held that the sums could be recovered back by the client in so far as they had not yet been appropriated to any wager.

(4) Principal and agent

(a) FAILURE TO OBEY INSTRUCTIONS. An agent who undertakes to make a bet on behalf of his principal is not liable for failing to do so.<sup>33</sup> In Cohen v Kittell the reason for this rule was said to be that the principal suffered "no real loss"<sup>34</sup> since he could not have enforced the bet even if it had been made. But the rule applies even though it is clearly proved that the bet would have been paid, had it been made and won. It seems that the better reason for the rule is that "A contract declared by the law to be null and void cannot be either directly or indirectly the basis of a legal claim".<sup>35</sup>

An agent is similarly not liable if he makes a bet in a way forbidden by his instructions. In A R Dennis & Co Ltd v Campbell<sup>36</sup> the manager of a licensed betting shop, contrary to his instructions, allowed a customer to place bets on credit to the extent of £1,000. On the customer's failure to pay the bets after he had lost them, it was held that the manager was not liable to his employers for the £1,000. Even if the employers could prove that they had lost this amount,<sup>37</sup> the action was barred by the second limb of s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845.

(b) AGENT'S INDEMNITY. The agent may make the bet, lose it, and pay the winner. It was held in Read v Anderson<sup>38</sup> that an agent who paid the winner could recover the sum so paid from his principal on the ground that the latter had impliedly contracted to indemnify his agent<sup>39</sup> against liabilities, whether legally enforceable or not, which arose in the ordinary course of business from the execution of his authority.

This decision provided an easy means of evading the Gaming Act 1845: wagers could be enforced against a loser by simply interposing an agent. It was therefore reversed by s.1 of the Gaming Act 1892, which provides: "Any promise, express or implied, to pay

<sup>31</sup> Strachan v Universal Stock Exchange Ltd (No.2) [1895] 2 Q.B. 697.

<sup>32</sup> [1985] F.L.R. 147.

<sup>33</sup> Cohen v Kittell (1889) 22 Q.B. 680.

<sup>34</sup> ibid. at 684.

<sup>35</sup> Cheshire & Co v Vaughan Bros & Co [1920] 3 K.B. 240 at 254. Where gaming or wagering is not involved an agent may well be liable for failing to make an invalid contract if it is unlikely that the third party would have repudiated: see Fraser v B N Furman (Productions) Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 898; Everett v Hogg, Robinson & Gardner Mountain Insurance [1973] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 216; Dunbar v A & B Painters Ltd [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 38. But the degree of likelihood of such repudiation may raise an issue of remoteness under the "reasonable contemplation" test discussed at pp. 965–968 below: Bates v Barrow Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 680 at 691.

<sup>36</sup> [1978] Q.B. 365.

<sup>37</sup> If the credit had not been allowed, it is more probable that the customer would not have made the bet than that he would have made it for cash.

<sup>38</sup> (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 779.

<sup>39</sup> See below, p.744.

any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act 1845, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

In Levy v Warburton<sup>40</sup> an agent tried to evade this provision by suing his principal before paying the winner. But the court rejected his claim, holding that "paid" included "to be paid." In Lam v Dearnley<sup>41</sup> it was held that an agent cannot evade the Act by suing on an account stated. Tucker L.J. also said that the principle in Hill v William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd<sup>42</sup> applied to cases falling within the 1892 Act. That Act, however, only deals with promises to pay money.<sup>43</sup> Thus it seems that if the principal promised to deliver some valuable thing to the agent in return for the latter's promise not to post him as a defaulter, the agent could<sup>44</sup> enforce the principal's promise.

(c) AGENT'S LIABILITY TO ACCOUNT. An agent who made a bet for his principal which the principal won is liable at common law to account to the principal if he has received the money won from the loser. This position is not altered by the 1892 Act: the agent is not sued on an implied promise to pay the principal "any sum of money paid by him" (the agent) but on an implied promise to pay over a sum of money received by him.<sup>45</sup> It was further held in Bridger v Savage<sup>46</sup> that the agent's liability to pay over winnings received by him was not affected by s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845. One reason given was that the section struck only at the wagering contract itself, and not at other transactions. But this reasoning is untenable after Hill v William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd<sup>47</sup> and it could plausibly be argued that the principal was suing to recover money "alleged to have been won upon any wager". On the other hand, it would certainly not defeat the policy of the Gaming Acts to force the agent to account to his principal for money actually received. The policy of the Acts is not to prevent the winner from getting his winnings but to prevent the loser from being forced to pay his losses. Bridger v Savage can be justified by saying that, once the loser has paid the bets, "any dispute as to their validity [is] gone".<sup>48</sup>

A person may be called an agent, but in fact bet with his "principal" and not for him. If so, he is an actual party to the bet and is not accountable under the rule in Bridger v Savage.<sup>49</sup>

It seems (although the point has not been decided) that the above principles would apply where several persons agreed to make a bet in the name of one of them and to share any winnings. Thus if the person in whose name the bet was made received any sum won he would have to account to the others, unless he had in fact bet with and not for them.<sup>50</sup>

(d) ADVANCE PAYMENT. An agent who makes a bet for his principal may account to the principal for his winnings before he has himself been paid by the loser. If the loser

<sup>40</sup> (1901) 70 L.J.K.B. 708.

<sup>41</sup> [1950] 1 K.B. 400.

<sup>42</sup> [1949] A.C. 530.

<sup>43</sup> Contrast "sum of money or valuable thing" in Gaming Act 1845, s.18.

<sup>44</sup> Subject to the exceptions stated above at p.521.

<sup>45</sup> De Mattos v Benjamin (1894) 63 L.J.Q.B. 248.

<sup>46</sup> (1884) 15 Q.B.D. 363.

<sup>47</sup> [1949] A.C. 530; above, p.520.

<sup>48</sup> (1884) 15 Q.B.D. 363 at 365. Bridger v Savage was treated as still good law in The Vasso [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 419.

<sup>49</sup> Higginson v Simpson (1877) 2 C.P.D. 76; Potter v Codrington (1892) 9 T.L.R. 54.

<sup>50</sup> cf. Higginson v Simpson, above.

then defaults, the agent cannot recover back the winnings from the principal: the case falls within s.1 of the Act of 1892.<sup>51</sup>

(e) EXCEPTED TRANSACTIONS. The 1892 Act is subject to a statutory exception which applies where an agent by way of business conducts certain dealings in investments which might at common law amount to wagers, e.g. because they were contracts for differences or bets on stock market indices.<sup>52</sup>

(5) Stakeholders

A stakeholder is a person with whom the parties to a wager deposit their stakes under a "tripartite contract"<sup>53</sup> to the effect he will deliver the stakes to the winner on the determination of the wager. He is normally regarded as the agent of both parties, each of whom authorises him to hold his own stake, to receive the other party's and to dispose of the aggregate in accordance with the result of the wager.

The third limb of s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845 provides that no suit shall be brought or maintained "for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing . . . which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made". In spite of the apparent generality of this provision, it has been held that it applies only "to the non-recovery by the winner of a sum deposited by the other party to abide the event, and not to the right of the depositor to recover back his deposit if demanded before the money was paid over".<sup>54</sup> Thus a loser can recover back his own stake, so long as he demands it back from the stakeholder before the latter has paid it over to the winner.<sup>55</sup> Similarly, the winner can recover back his own stake, but he cannot recover the entire stakes from the stakeholder.<sup>56</sup> These rules are not affected by s.1 of the Gaming Act 1892; this section refers to money "paid" out-and-out, and not to money deposited with a stakeholder.<sup>57</sup>

A stake deposited in pursuance of an illegal wager is, in general, irrecoverable as money paid under an illegal contract; but it can be recovered back by the payor if demanded back before execution of the illegal purpose. If the wager is illegal because it is a wager on an illegal game, the stake can thus be recovered back if its return is demanded before the game has taken place.<sup>58</sup> According to Hastelow v Jackson<sup>59</sup> the stake can be recovered back even though the illegal game has taken place so long as the contract has not been executed by payment of the stake to the winner. But it is submitted that the decisive question ought to be whether the illegal purpose has been carried into effect<sup>60</sup>; and that the stake should be irrecoverable once the illegal game has taken place. If the wager is illegal because of its intrinsic nature, e.g. because it is an illegal lottery, it could be said that the illegal purpose was not "executed" until the stake was paid over to the winner so that the loser could, till then, recover it back.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>51</sup> cf. Simpson v Bloss (1816) 7 Taunt. 246 (same rule at common law where wager illegal).

<sup>52</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.412; and see above, p.521, nn.2 and 3.

<sup>53</sup> Rockeagle Ltd v Alsop Wilkinson [1992] Ch. 47 at 50 (where the stakeholder held a deposit under a contract for the sale of land).

<sup>54</sup> Hampden v Walsh (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 189 at 196; cf. Re The Futures Index [1985] F.L.R. 147.

<sup>55</sup> Varney v Hickman (1874) 5 C.B. 271; Hampden v Walsh, above; Diggle v Higgs (1877) 2 Ex.D. 422; Trimble v Hill (1879) 5 App.Cas. 342.

<sup>56</sup> Savage v Madder (1867) 36 L.J.Ex. 178; a dictum that the winner could not recover even his own stake was unnecessary for the decision, and is not law: Hampden v Walsh (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 189 at 196.

<sup>57</sup> O'Sullivan v Thomas [1895] 1 Q.B. 698.

<sup>58</sup> Martin v Hemson (1855) 10 Exch. 737.

<sup>59</sup> (1828) 8 B. & C. 221.

<sup>60</sup> See above, pp.494–495.

<sup>61</sup> cf. Barclay v Pearson [1893] 2 Ch. 154 (not a wager, but a lottery).

(6) Prizes for lawful games

S.18 of the Gaming Act 1845 concludes: "Provided always that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime or exercise."

In Diggle v Higgs<sup>62</sup> two persons agreed to enter into a walking match for £200 a side, to be deposited with a stakeholder and paid to the winner. It was held that this was a wager and not saved by the proviso since this only applied where the prize was due under a contract which was not a wager. This view would leave open the possibility that the proviso would apply where the prize was put up by a third party: the contract would not be a wager since the competitors could win, but not lose, money; nor would it be a gaming contract since no money was staked by the competitors. But since such a contract would in any case be valid it seems that the proviso has no effect at all.<sup>63</sup>

(7) Securities

A security given for the payment of money lost under a gaming or wagering contract, or of a debt incurred in connection with such a contract, has, between the parties to the bet, no greater validity than the principal contract. Thus if the loser gives the winner a cheque in payment, the winner cannot sue the loser on the cheque any more than on the original contract.<sup>64</sup> But the position is more complicated when a security which is negotiable<sup>65</sup> later comes into the hands of a third party. It was formerly common for cheques to be negotiable but they are now usually deprived of this quality by being crossed "a/c payee" or "a/c payee only".<sup>66</sup>

(a) NON-GAMING WAGERS. Where a negotiable security such as a bill of exchange, or promissory note is given in respect of a wager made void by the Gaming Act 1845, the security is also void between the parties as there is no consideration for it. But it can be enforced by a third party who becomes holder of it, if value has at any time been given for it; and, as such a third party will normally be presumed to be a holder in due course, and so to have given value,<sup>67</sup> he can sue on the instrument, unless the defendant proves that value has not been given.<sup>68</sup> It is immaterial that the holder knew that the security was originally given in connection with a wager.<sup>69</sup>

A security may be given in respect of a transaction which is a wager but which is nevertheless valid because it is excepted by statute<sup>70</sup> from invalidity under s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845. In such a case, the fact that the transaction was a wager would have no effect on the validity of the security which could therefore be enforced in the normal way, both between the parties and between one of them and a third party.

(b) GAMING AND WAGERS ON GAMES are governed by special legislation contained in the Gaming Acts of 1710, 1835 and 1968.<sup>71</sup>

(i) The Acts of 1710 and 1835. S.1 of the Gaming Act 1710 provided that all securities given wholly or in part for any money or valuable thing won by gaming or by playing at

<sup>62</sup> (1877) 2 Ex.D. 422; cf. Parson v Alexander (1855) 5 E. & B. 263; Batson v Newman (1876) 1 C.P.D. 573.

<sup>63</sup> cf. Ellesmere v Wallace [1929] Ch. 148, criticising the accepted interpretation.

<sup>64</sup> Richardson v Moncrieffe (1926) 43 T.L.R. 32.

<sup>65</sup> See below, p.691.

<sup>66</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.81A, as inserted by Cheques Act 1992, s.1; below, pp.691–692.

<sup>67</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, ss.27(2), 29, 30(2); below, p.692.

<sup>68</sup> Fitch v Jones (1855) 5 E. & B. 238.

<sup>69</sup> Lilley v Rankin (1886) 56 L.J.Q.B. 248.

<sup>70</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.412; above p.521 nn.2 and 3.

<sup>71</sup> As amended by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986, below, p.529.

any game or by betting on any game,<sup>72</sup> or for repaying any money<sup>73</sup> lent for such gaming or betting or lent at the time and place of play to any person so gaming or betting, shall be “utterly void, frustrate and of none effect”. The object of this enactment was to restrict gaming on credit; but it had the unfortunate effect of prejudicing third parties who in good faith gave value for securities within its scope. S.1 of the Gaming Act 1835 therefore provided that such securities should no longer be void, but that they should be “deemed and taken to have been . . . given . . . for an illegal consideration”. Where, as a result of this Act, a bill of exchange is deemed to have been given for an illegal consideration, it still cannot be enforced by a third party who takes it with notice of the circumstances in which it was given, even though he gave value for it.<sup>74</sup> But it can be enforced by a holder in due course,<sup>75</sup> i.e. by one who took the bill (provided that it was regular on its face and not overdue) for value, in good faith, and without notice of the illegality<sup>76</sup>; it can also be enforced by a holder who derives his title from a holder in due course.<sup>77</sup> However, once it is admitted or proved that the bill is affected with illegality, a holder who sues on it cannot rely on the usual presumption that he is a holder in due course. He must show that, subsequent to the illegality, value has in good faith been given for the bill, either by him or by a previous holder through whom he derives title.<sup>78</sup> “In good faith” here means “without notice of the illegality”.<sup>79</sup> The same rules would apply where the security was given in respect of an illegal wager which is not a gaming wager: in such a case the consideration would be illegal quite apart from the Acts of 1710 and 1835. This would also be true of a security given in respect of a wager on an illegal game.

The Acts of 1710 and 1835 apply (inter alia) to securities given for repaying money “lent for gaming.” It has been held that securities given for money lent to enable the borrower to pay bets already lost are not within the Acts, as such money is not “lent for gaming.”<sup>80</sup> The loan itself may be void under the Gaming Act 1892,<sup>81</sup> but a security given in respect of it is not “deemed and taken to have been given for an illegal consideration.” The Acts of 1710 and 1835 would, however, apply to a security given for money lent if the lender knew that the money would be used to pay a lost bet<sup>82</sup> and either promised to advance the money before the bet was made<sup>83</sup> or stipulated that it should be used to pay the lost bet.<sup>84</sup>

<sup>72</sup> Including horse-racing: Applegarth v Colley (1842) 10 M. & W. 723, and (semble) other forms of racing: above, p.518, n.59.

<sup>73</sup> Including gaming chips: below, p.529. The 1710 Act seems to contemplate repayment by the borrower; but in Ladup Ltd v Shaik [1983] Q.B. 225 it seems to have been assumed that s.1 of that Act also applied to a cheque given by a casino to a loser on cashing in the remainder of his chips.

<sup>74</sup> Hay v Ayling (1851) 16 Q.B. 423 at 431; Woolf v Hamilton [1898] 2 Q.B. 337. Nor will an action lie on a fresh bill made in substitution if, when the holder acquired it, he had notice of the illegal consideration: Hay v Ayling, above; Chapman v Black (1819) 2 B. & Ald. 588.

<sup>75</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.38(2).

<sup>76</sup> ibid. s.29(1) and (2).

<sup>77</sup> ibid. s.29(3); this subsection does not apply where the holder who derived title through a holder in due course is himself a party to any illegality.

<sup>78</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.30(2).

<sup>79</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.90 (“in fact done honestly”); and cf. Tatam v Haslar (1889) 23 Q.B.D. 345 at 348 (a case of fraud, not of illegality). It is submitted that a person who takes with notice of the illegality does not act “honestly”.

<sup>80</sup> Ex p. Pyke (1878) 8 Ch.D. 754; the actual decision would now go the other way under the Gaming Act 1892.

<sup>81</sup> See below, p.531.

<sup>82</sup> Humphery v Wilson (1929) 141 L.T. 469.

<sup>83</sup> Parker v Alcock (1831) You. 361; contrast the position under the 1892 Act, where mere knowledge on the part of the lender is not enough: below, pp.530–531.

<sup>84</sup> Hill v Fox (1859) 4 H. & N. 359.

Although the Acts in terms deal only with securities given for money lent, it has been held that they also strike at a common gaming practice. In Stuart v Stephen<sup>85</sup> the defendant at a gambling party borrowed £150 worth of chips and lost them. He later<sup>86</sup> paid for the chips by cheque. The court held that the Acts of 1710 and 1835 applied even though no money was lent at the time of play. The same analysis of such a transaction applies for the purposes of s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845<sup>87</sup> and of s.16 of the Gaming Act 1968, to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>88</sup>

The Acts of 1710 and 1835 cannot be evaded by stating a fictitious consideration in the security. Thus in William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd v Hofman<sup>89</sup> a mortgage purported to have been given for money lent, but was really given for money lost at play. The court disregarded the false recital and deemed the mortgage to have been given for an illegal consideration.

There may be a loophole in this legislation. Suppose a person loses bets on horse-races and later promises to pay his losses in consideration of not being posted as a defaulter. This promise cannot be enforced because of s.18 of the Act of 1845.<sup>90</sup> But if the loser now gives a security in discharge of his liability under the new promise the security is not tainted with illegality. The reasoning of Hill v William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd<sup>91</sup> does not apply since s.18 of the Act of 1845, in providing that a promise to pay a lost bet cannot be enforced, does not refer to the consideration for the promise; while securities are only deemed to have been given for an illegal consideration under the Acts of 1710 and 1835 "where the whole or any part of the consideration shall be for money or other valuable thing won by gaming . . . or repaying any money knowingly lent . . . for such gaming."<sup>92</sup> Where the consideration for the security given by the loser is the winner's promise not to post the loser as a defaulter,<sup>93</sup> the security may thus not be deemed to have been given for an illegal consideration, since it is arguable that the consideration for the security is not "money . . . won by gaming". The security cannot be enforced between the original parties since between them it has no greater enforceability than the promise in respect of which it was given; and this promise could not be enforced by reason of the second limb of s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845. But if the security is negotiable, a third person may be able to enforce it, even though he knew of the circumstances in which it was given, unless the defendant proves that the third person did not give value.

(ii) S.16 of the Gaming Act 1968<sup>94</sup> was passed principally to limit credit for gaming on licensed premises<sup>95</sup>; and as part of that policy it restricts the circumstances in which the licensee may accept cheques in exchange for cash or tokens to be used for such gaming. Subs.(2) makes it an offence for him to take post-dated cheques and to take cheques at a discount.<sup>96</sup> Subs.(4) then provides that nothing in the Gaming Acts of 1710, 1835, 1845

<sup>85</sup> (1940) 56 T.L.R. 571.

<sup>86</sup> For the question whether there is a "loan" if the cheque is given at the time of the delivery of the chips, see below, p.532, n.22.

<sup>87</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548, above, p.520.

<sup>88</sup> Crockfords Club Ltd v Mehta [1992] 1 W.L.R. 355, below, p.534.

<sup>89</sup> [1950] 1 All E.R. 1013.

<sup>90</sup> See above, p.520.

<sup>91</sup> [1949] A.C. 530.

<sup>92</sup> 1710 Act, s.1.

<sup>93</sup> The existence of such consideration would make the reasoning of Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1992] 2 A.C. 458 inapplicable so far as it related to consideration.

<sup>94</sup> As amended by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986, below, at nn.1, 2.

<sup>95</sup> See further above, p.518, n.67 and below, p.535.

<sup>96</sup> Subs.(2) is clearly restricted to gaming on licensed premises, "the gaming" in the subsection referring back to gaming on licensed premises referred to in subs.(1).

and 1892 “shall affect the validity of, or any remedy in respect of, any cheque which is accepted in exchange for cash or tokens to be used by a player in gaming” on licensed or registered<sup>97</sup> premises. The effect of this appears to be that a cheque lawfully accepted for cash or tokens to be used for lawful gaming on licensed or registered premises is enforceable between the parties. It is true that subs.(4) is not in terms restricted to cheques lawfully accepted or to lawful gaming. But if the acceptance of the cheque, or the gaming, constituted an offence the cheque would be invalid at common law quite apart from the Acts of 1710, 1835, 1845 and 1892.<sup>98</sup> Such common law invalidity is not cured by subs.(+).<sup>99</sup> And the subsection does not affect the validity of any cheque lawfully accepted except in exchange for cash or tokens to be used by a player in gaming: it would not, for example, apply to a cheque given on registered premises to pay for a bet already lost.<sup>1</sup> Nor does the subsection apply to cheques accepted in connection with gaming on unlicensed or unregistered premises.

A player who has given a cheque which is enforceable under s.16(4) of the 1968 Act may later redeem that cheque and give the licensee a substitute cheque: e.g. where the player has paid for tokens worth £100 and has £40 worth left at the end of the playing session, he may redeem his original cheque in exchange for these tokens and a new cheque for £60. Provided that certain statutory conditions (designed to ensure that the restrictions on giving credit for gaming are not evaded) are satisfied,<sup>2</sup> s.16(4)<sup>3</sup> then allows the licensee to enforce the substitute cheque.

(8) Loans

We shall first discuss the general rules governing the validity of loans connected with gaming and wagering contracts and then consider certain special provisions with regard to credit for gaming on licensed premises.

(a) IN GENERAL. At common law, a loan made to enable a person to play an illegal game is irrecoverable.<sup>4</sup> The same is presumably true of a loan to enable a person to make any other kind of illegal wager, or to pay an illegal bet already lost. Where the wager is not illegal at common law, it may be a valid transaction because it is excepted by statute from invalidity under s.18 of the Gaming Acts of 1845. This is the position with regard to certain dealings in investments which may at common law be wagers, e.g. because they amount to contracts for differences.<sup>5</sup> In such a case, the fact that the transaction was a wager would have no effect on the validity of a loan made in connection with it. More commonly, lawful wagers would be void and unenforceable under s.18 of the 1845 Act; and loans for such lawful (but invalid) wagers give rise to two problems.

(i) Loans to pay lost bets. The loser of a bet may ask another person to pay it for him. If the latter then pays the money straight to the winner, he cannot sue the loser for it, since such a payment is made “in respect of” a wagering contract within s.1 of the

<sup>97</sup> Subs.(4) refers to “gaming to which this Part of this Act applies” and this includes gaming on registered premises: see s.9. The offences created by subs.(2), however, are restricted to licensed premises: see last note.

<sup>98</sup> See above, pp.431, 510.

<sup>99</sup> Ladup Ltd v Shaik [1983] Q.B. 225; cf. below, p.534.

<sup>1</sup> Acceptance of a cheque in such circumstances on licensed premises would be unlawful under s.16(1): below, p.534.

<sup>2</sup> Gaming Act 1968, s.16(2A), as inserted by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986, s.1(2).

<sup>3</sup> As amended by Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986, s.1(6).

<sup>4</sup> M’Kinnell v Robinson (1838) 3 M. & W. 434.

<sup>5</sup> Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s.412; and see above, p.521 nn.2 and 3.

Gaming Act 1892.<sup>6</sup> This reasoning was applied in CHT Ltd v Ward.<sup>7</sup> The owners of a gaming club advanced chips on credit<sup>8</sup> to the defendant to enable her to play poker. She lost chips worth nearly £200 and the owners paid these losses in cash to the winners. It was held that the payments were irrecoverable as they had been made "in respect of" gaming contracts.

But a payment is not necessarily made "in respect of" a wager simply because it enables the person for whose benefit it was made to pay betting debts. In Re O'Shea<sup>9</sup> a person guaranteed a gambler's overdraft for £500 which the guarantor ultimately had to pay to the bank. It was held that this payment was not made "in respect of" a wager: it was simply a contribution to the assets of a gambler which he could deal with as he pleased. But in MacDonald v Green<sup>10</sup> it was held that money had been lent "in respect of" a wager, even though it was paid into the hands of the loser, because the loan was made on the terms that it was to be used to pay the lost bet; and the same rule was said to apply where such a stipulation was to be implied.

In Tatam v Reeve<sup>11</sup> Wills J. said that a loan paid straight to the winner would be "in respect of" the wager even if the lender did not know that he was paying a betting debt. But this view has been doubted as it might cause grave hardship to the lender<sup>12</sup>; and it can no longer be supported after MacDonald v Green. The question whether a loan is made "in respect of" a wager depends, at least to some extent, on the intention of the lender, who cannot have the necessary intention if he is ignorant of the purpose of the loan.

It must be pointed out again that the 1892 Act invalidates only promises to pay money. If the borrower promises to deliver to the lender some valuable thing, or to render him some service in return for the loan, that promise seems to be perfectly valid. On the other hand, it seems clear from the concluding words of the section that the principle in Hill v William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd<sup>13</sup> applies. No action could be brought to enforce a promise supported by fresh consideration to repay a loan originally made "under or in respect of" a wager.

(ii) Loans for future betting. A loan to enable the borrower to make bets might be void under the Gaming Act 1892, if it was made subject to a stipulation that it should be used for betting. This seems to follow from MacDonald v Green,<sup>14</sup> though the point has not actually been decided.

A loan to enable the borrower to make gaming bets may also be affected by the Acts of 1710 and 1835.<sup>15</sup> It is uncertain whether these Acts only invalidate securities, or whether they also invalidate the consideration, i.e., the original loan for which a security was given. Most of the cases decided under the Act of 1710 support the view that only the security is invalidated.<sup>16</sup> But in Applegarth v Colley<sup>17</sup> it was said that the Act of 1835

<sup>6</sup> Tatam v Reeve [1893] 1 Q.B. 44; cf. Carney v Plimmer [1897] 1 Q.B. 634 (money paid straight to stakeholder).

<sup>7</sup> [1965] 2 Q.B. 63; following Woolf v Freeman [1937] 1 All E.R. 178.

<sup>8</sup> To make such an advance on licensed premises would be an offence under s.16(1) of the Gaming Act 1968; below, pp.534–535.

<sup>9</sup> [1911] 2 K.B. 981.

<sup>10</sup> [1951] 1 K.B. 594.

<sup>11</sup> [1893] 1 Q.B. at 48.

<sup>12</sup> Hyams v Stuart King [1908] 2 K.B. 696 at 714; cf. MacDonald v Green, above, n.10, at p.605.

<sup>13</sup> [1949] A.C. 530; above, p.520.

<sup>14</sup> [1951] 1 K.B. 594.

<sup>15</sup> See above, pp.527–529.

<sup>16</sup> Barjeau v Walmsley (1746) 2 Stra. 1249; Robinson v Bland (1760) 2 Burr. 1077; Wettenhall v Wood (1793) 1 Esp. 18; a dictum in Young v Moore (1757) 2 Wils.K.B. 67 suggests the contrary, but as to this, see CHT Ltd v Ward [1965] 2 Q.B. at p.83.

<sup>17</sup> (1842) 10 M. & W. 723 at 732.

had by implication invalidated the consideration as well, since it was "impossible to impute to the legislature an intention so absurd as that the consideration should be good and capable of being enforced, until some security is given . . . and then that by the giving of security the consideration should become bad." The present position depends to some extent on cases in which loans were made in foreign countries for the purpose of gaming there. Three propositions can be deduced from the cases.

First: the lender cannot sue in England on a cheque drawn on an English bank even though the cheque was given to repay a loan made in a foreign country to enable the borrower to bet on a game that was legal there. In Moulis v Owen<sup>18</sup> money was lent to the defendant in Algiers to enable him to play baccarat there. The defendant gave the lender a cheque drawn on an English bank in payment of the loan. By French law (which then applied in Algiers) baccarat was a legal game, and both the loan and a cheque given in payment of it were valid. But it was held that the lender could not sue on the cheque in England since the cheque was governed by English law and was invalid under the Acts of 1710 and 1835.

Secondly: the lender can sue in England on a loan made in, and governed by the law of, a foreign country to enable the borrower to bet on a game that is legal there. In Saxby v Fulton<sup>19</sup> money was lent to one Brook in Monte Carlo to enable him to play roulette there. By the law of Monaco, roulette was a legal game, and the loan was valid. It was held that the lender could recover the loan. There were two reasons why the Acts of 1710 and 1835 did not apply: no security had been given upon which those Acts could operate; and the loan was wholly governed by the law of Monaco.

Thirdly: the lender can sue in England on a loan made in, and governed by the law of, a foreign country to enable the borrower to bet on a game that is legal there even though the borrower gives the lender a cheque drawn on an English bank. In Baumgart's case<sup>20</sup> the lender on such facts originally sued in England on the cheque and on the loan, but later abandoned the claim on the cheque. It was held that he could sue on the loan as this was governed by the law of the foreign country in which it had been made, and was valid by that law. It follows that Saxby v Fulton must now be explained on the ground that the loan was governed by foreign law.

The effect of these foreign gaming decisions on a case wholly governed by English law was considered in Carlton Hall Club Ltd v Laurence.<sup>21</sup> The Club advanced chips to the defendant to enable him to play at billiards and poker, and the defendant gave the Club a cheque for the amount of the chips at the time of the advance. This transaction was treated as a loan of money.<sup>22</sup> The Club claimed the amount of the loan, but did not rely on the cheque. The claim might have been resisted by arguing that poker was then an illegal game as it is a card game, and not one of mere skill.<sup>23</sup> But the question whether poker was such a game was of fact and the argument was not open to the defendant as

<sup>18</sup> [1907] 1 K.B. 746; cf. Browne v Bailey (1908) 24 T.L.R. 644.

<sup>19</sup> [1909] 2 K.B. 208; cf. Quarrier v Colston (1842) 1 Ph. 147.

<sup>20</sup> (1927) 96 1.J.K.B. 789.

<sup>21</sup> [1929] 2 K.B. 153.

<sup>22</sup> In Cunning v Mackie, 1973 S.L.T. 242, it was said that there was no "loan" if the cheque was given at the time of the advance but this view was disapproved in R. v Knightsbridge Crown Court, Ex p. Marcrest Properties Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 300, where it was held that making an advance against a cheque amounts to a loan, even though the cheque is not post-dated; this view was approved in Crockfords Club Ltd v Mehta [1992] 1 W.L.R. 355. See also the analysis of a similar transaction as a loan to pay bets already lost in CHT Ltd v Ward [1965] 2 Q.B. 63; above, p.531. That analysis was not possible in the Carlton Hall Club case as there was no evidence that the defendant had lost his chips or that the Club had made any payments in respect of them to third parties who had won bets with the defendant.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.519, n.74.

he had not raised it in the court of first instance.<sup>24</sup> The defendant chose, instead, to rely on the Acts of 1710 and 1835, and this defence succeeded. The question raised by the case, bearing in mind that the defendant could no longer allege that the money was lent for illegal gaming, was whether money lent to enable the borrower to play a game which was lawful in England could be recovered. But according to the Law Reports that was not the question answered. Shearman J. is reported to have said: "Having regard to the cases as a whole in regard to claims for money lent for the purpose of playing a game which is unlawful in this country one finds the law in this curious condition: that where the game is played in a foreign country in which it is lawful . . . the money can be sued for in . . . this country, but where the game is to be played in this country, the weight of opinion is in favour of the view that the money cannot be sued for here because the statute of Anne [i.e. of 1710] avoids not only the security but by implication the consideration also."<sup>25</sup> This suggests that the court held only that loans for unlawful games were invalid. But in the Law Journal Reports the corresponding passage reads as follows: "The curious position therefore arises that though the decisions on foreign gaming should logically apply to legal games in this country, the better authority is that the consideration cannot be sued on because it is avoided under the statute of Anne."<sup>26</sup> This version is preferable<sup>27</sup> to that in the Law Reports as it does at least make the court decide the question before it. The Carlton Hall Club case is thus authority for the proposition that if money is lent to enable the borrower to play in England a game which is lawful in England and if the borrower gives a cheque for the loan, then the lender cannot sue either on the cheque or on the loan. There are two possible criticisms of this decision.

The first is based on Baumgart's case<sup>28</sup>: if a person who has lent money abroad to enable the borrower to play a game that is legal there can disregard an English cheque which the borrower may have given him, why should not the lender have the same rights if the loan is made and the legal game played in England? But the crucial factor in the foreign gaming cases was the validity of the loan, rather than the legality of the game, under the foreign law. If in Saxby v Fulton<sup>29</sup> it had been proved that roulette was a legal game in Monte Carlo but that loans for the purpose of playing roulette were void there, the lender's claim would clearly have failed. The validity of the loan cannot, in a purely English case, be deduced from the legality of the game.

The second objection to the Carlton Hall Club case is based on the wording of s.1 of the Act of 1835. To say that a security is "deemed and taken to have been . . . given . . . for an illegal consideration" is not to say that the consideration for the security is illegal: if it really were illegal, there would be no need to deem it so.<sup>30</sup> But the 1835 Act was not drafted with modern precision. The draftsman probably did not intend to draw any distinction between a consideration which was illegal and one which was deemed to be so. The now repealed s.2 of the Act, in referring back to s.1, uses the words "such illegal consideration".

The decision in the Carlton Hall Club case is therefore consistent with the authorities and with the Acts. It could be said to give effect to the policy of the Acts of 1710 and 1835, which was to restrict credit for gaming. But the question is not in future likely to be of much practical importance. If the facts of Carlton Hall Club Ltd v Laurence

<sup>24</sup> This appears from the report in 45 T.L.R. 195.

<sup>25</sup> Carlton Hall Club Ltd v Laurence [1929] 2 K.B. at p.164 (italics supplied).

<sup>26</sup> L.J.K.B. 305, 307 (italics supplied); cf. 140 L.T. 534 at 536-537; 45 T.L.R. 195 at 196.

<sup>27</sup> CHT Ltd v Ward [1965] 2 Q.B. at 85; Crockfords Club Ltd v Mehta [1992] 1 W.L.R. 355 at 366.

<sup>28</sup> (1927) 96 L.J.K.B. 789, above, at n.20.

<sup>29</sup> [1909] 2 K.B. 208.

<sup>30</sup> Diamond, 54 L.Q.R. 418.

recurred and the premises on which the gaming took place were licensed or registered under the Gaming Act 1968, an action could be brought on the cheque.<sup>31</sup> If the gaming took place elsewhere, an action on the cheque would fail under the Acts of 1710 and 1835; and an action on the loan would probably fail under the Act of 1892 on the ground that there was an implied stipulation to use the loan for gaming.<sup>32</sup> The Acts of 1710 and 1835 would therefore rarely determine the validity of the loan.

Where no security is given for the loan, it seems that the Acts of 1710 and 1835 cannot apply for there is nothing to attract their operation. It has been said that in such a case the loan would be recoverable.<sup>33</sup> But if there is a stipulation that the loan is to be used for gaming or wagering, the loan will again be void under the Act of 1892.

(b) LOANS FOR GAMING ON LICENSED PREMISES. S.16(1) of the Gaming Act 1968 provides that where gaming takes place on licensed premises, the licensee shall not "make any loan or otherwise provide or allow to any person any credit, or release or discharge on another person's behalf, the whole or part of any debt (a) for enabling any person to take part in gaming, or (b) in respect of any losses incurred by any person in the gaming". Thus it is an offence for the licensee to advance money or tokens<sup>34</sup> on credit to enable a person to take part in the gaming, or to pay losses which a player has incurred in the gaming, or to give credit to a loser by paying the winner. But under s.16(2) a licensee who advances cash or tokens in exchange for a cheque will not be guilty of an offence (even though the advance may amount to giving credit) if he gives full value for the cheque and if it is not post-dated.<sup>35</sup> S.16(2) would not, however, exonerate the licensee where the cheque was a mere sham, e.g. where the advance was made against a "house-cheque" drawn on a bank at which the player was known to have no account and not intended to be enforced,<sup>36</sup> and where the licensee took large cheques which he agreed not to bank, and later accepted the smaller sums actually lost in satisfaction of those cheques.<sup>37</sup> An offence will also be committed if the cheque is accepted in payment partly of an advance for future gaming and partly of bets already lost.<sup>38</sup>

S.16 does not specify the civil consequences of the transactions which it prohibits; but a transaction which amounts to an offence under the section would be an illegal contract at common law.<sup>39</sup> It could clearly not be enforced by the lender; nor, probably, could the borrower claim damages if the lender failed to perform a promise to give credit, e.g. if he promised to pay a player's losses and then omitted to do so.<sup>40</sup> The borrower might, however, be able to recover property pledged by him in respect of the contract on the ground that subs.(1) was passed to protect gamblers on licensed premises as a class.<sup>41</sup> S.16(2) also (at least by implication) permits certain transactions and here s.16(4) does specify one of the civil effects by validating certain cheques accepted in exchange for

<sup>31</sup> See above, p.529; for the possible effect of the 1968 Act on actions on the loan, see below.

<sup>32</sup> See above, pp.530-531.

<sup>33</sup> CHT Ltd v Ward [1965] 2 Q.B. 63 at 86; R. v Knightsbridge Crown Court, Ex p. Marcrest Properties Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 300 at 309.

<sup>34</sup> The provisions of the subsection are not restricted to loans of money. They would apply to a case like CHT v Ward [1965] 2 Q.B. 63 if the gaming took place on licensed premises: R. v Knightsbridge Crown Court above, at 309-310; Crockfords Club Ltd v Mehta [1992] 1 W.L.R. 355.

<sup>35</sup> See above, p.529.

<sup>36</sup> R. v Knightsbridge Crown Court, Ex p. Marcrest Properties Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 300.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid.

<sup>38</sup> Ladup v Shaik [1983] Q.B. 225.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.430.

<sup>40</sup> The borrower would be "innocent" only in the sense that he might act under a mistake of law: see above, p.484.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.491.

cash or tokens.<sup>42</sup> Where a cheque is thus validated, the reasoning of Carlton Hall Club Ltd v Laurence<sup>43</sup> would not invalidate the loan: on the contrary, “the implication appears . . . to be quite clear, that the giving of a cheque which does comply with the conditions laid down by s.16(2) results in the lawful grant of credit”.<sup>44</sup>

The prohibitions in s.16 apply only where a licensee gives credit or accepts a cheque, for the purposes there specified, in respect of gaming on licensed premises. Other forms of credit for gaming remain subject to the previous law which therefore applies to gaming elsewhere than on licensed premises and may even apply to gaming on licensed premises, e.g. if a loan is made there by one player to another. However, a cheque may be validated by s.16(4) even though the gaming takes place on registered and not on licensed premises<sup>45</sup>; and where the cheque is thus validated it would once again seem that the loan could not be invalidated by the reasoning of Carlton Hall Club Ltd v Laurence, though it might be void under the Act of 1892.

(9) Gambling with stolen money

We have seen that, where a loser pays money lost under a wager, he cannot recover back the amount so paid from the winner.<sup>46</sup> That rule deals with the normal situation in which the payment is made with the loser’s own money. But the loser may make such a payment with stolen money, and the victim of the theft may then seek to recover that money from the winner. Because of the negotiable<sup>47</sup> quality of money paid as currency, the victim cannot recover an equivalent sum, from the winner, if the winner has received the money in good faith, without notice of the theft and for valuable consideration. The following discussion is concerned largely with the difficulties which may arise in determining whether these conditions have been satisfied.

(a) ILLEGAL WAGERS. In Clarke v Shee and Johnson<sup>48</sup> a clerk stole money and negotiable notes from his employer and paid part of the amount so stolen to the defendant under a lottery<sup>49</sup> which had been made illegal and void by the Lotteries Act 1772. Lord Mansfield held that the employer was entitled to recover the amount so paid as it was “his property which has come into the hands of the defendant iniquitously and illegally and in breach of the Act of Parliament”.<sup>50</sup> These words seem to indicate that the defendant was held liable because he had not received the money in good faith; though they do not make it clear whether his lack of good faith resulted from his awareness of the circumstances in which the money had come into the hands of the thief, or merely from his knowing participation in the violation of the 1772 Act. Later discussion of the case, however, treats it as authority for the view that the defendant had not provided any consideration for the payment, in the shape of the promise which he had made to the thief, since that promise was illegal and void under the Act of 1772.<sup>51</sup>

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.530. See also Gaming Act 1968, s.16(2A), above, p.530.

<sup>43</sup> [1929] 2 K.B. 153; above, p.532.

<sup>44</sup> R. v Knightsbridge Crown Court, Ex p. Marcrest Properties Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 300 at 310; Crockfords Club Ltd v Mehta [1992] 1 W.L.R. 355; but the customer could escape liability on other grounds, e.g. by showing that he had not used the chips.

<sup>45</sup> See above, pp.529–530.

<sup>46</sup> See above, p.522.

<sup>47</sup> See below, p.691.

<sup>48</sup> (1774) 1 Cowp. 197.

<sup>49</sup> For the meaning of “lottery”, see Re Senator Hanseatische Verwaltungsgesellschaft mbH [1997] 1 W.L.R. 515.

<sup>50</sup> (1774) 1 Cowp. at 199–200.

<sup>51</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 563, 575.

(b) LAWFUL WAGERS. In Clarke v Shee and Johnson the transaction in respect of which the payment was made was both illegal and void; but in Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd<sup>52</sup> the reasoning of the earlier case was held to apply even though the stolen money had been used for the purpose of wagers which were not illegal but only void under s.18 of the Gaming Act 1845, and even though the defendant had received the money in good faith. The facts of the Lipkin Gorman case were that one Cass, a salaried partner in the claimant firm of solicitors, wrongfully withdrew money from the firm's client account; after he had replaced part of the money, there was a shortfall of £222,908.98. He used this stolen money<sup>53</sup> (as well as some money of his own) in gambling at the defendants' club over a period of some 10 months. At the end of that time, his losses exceeded his winnings by £174,745, of which £20,050 was attributable to his own money, so that £154,695 of the losses was derived from the money which he had stolen from the firm. The club had throughout acted in good faith, without notice of the fact that the money used by Cass had been stolen, and it would have been entitled to retain the money if it had, in addition, been able to show that it had provided consideration for its receipt of the money. In holding that no such consideration had been provided, the House of Lords rejected two arguments advanced on behalf of the club.

(i) Promise to pay or payment of winnings no consideration for receipt of the money. The first of these arguments was that the club had provided consideration by allowing Cass to gamble and so to obtain the chance of winning, and of being paid in the event of his winning, or by actually paying his winnings on the bets which he had won. The first limb of this argument amounted to saying that the consideration for the payments to the club was its promise to pay Cass his winnings; and it was rejected on the ground that this promise was void under s.18 of the 1845 Act. This is in accord with the view that, prima facie, a void promise does not amount to consideration.<sup>54</sup> In cases unconnected with gaming, the law does, at least sometimes, regard the performance of a defective promise as constituting consideration<sup>55</sup> even where the mere making of the promise would not be so regarded. The possibility of so regarding the club's performance might seem to give some support to the second limb of the argument (i.e. that the club had provided consideration by making payments to Cass on the bets which he had won); but this limb, too, was rejected on the ground that any such payment to Cass was in law regarded as a gift by the club to him.<sup>56</sup> This may not be a very realistic view of the intention accompanying the payment<sup>57</sup>; but it appears to be derived from the rule that gambling losses which have actually been paid by the loser cannot be recovered back by him from the winner,<sup>58</sup> one rationalisation of this rule being that the payment is a gift from the loser to the winner.<sup>59</sup> It may, with respect, be doubted whether this is really an explanation of the rule, rather than a statement of its legal consequence.

(ii) Supply of gaming chips no consideration for receipt of the money. The second argument advanced by the club in the Lipkin Gorman case was based on the fact that the gambling had been carried on, not with cash, but with gaming chips. A majority of the Court of Appeal<sup>60</sup> had regarded the supply of chips as a transaction separate from

<sup>52</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548.

<sup>53</sup> The money so used consisted mainly of cash withdrawals but also included a banker's draft for £3,735 drawn on the client account and made out in favour of the solicitors. The solicitors' claim in respect of this amount succeeded on the basis that the defendants were liable for conversion of the draft.

<sup>54</sup> See above, p.149.

<sup>55</sup> See above, p.150.

<sup>56</sup> [1992] 2 A.C. 548 at 562, 577.

<sup>57</sup> See above, p.151; cf. below, p.538 at n.78.

<sup>58</sup> Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 561.

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.523.

<sup>60</sup> [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1340.

the wagering contracts and as one under which the club had provided consideration, not merely by parting with chips of little intrinsic value, but also by making a number of promises to the member: for example, to allow him to use the chips to take part in the gaming, and to use them for the purchase of refreshments. The House of Lords, however, rejected this view on a number of grounds. One was that the chips were "worthless and at all times remained the property of the club".<sup>61</sup> This reasoning might at first sight seem hard to reconcile with the rules that an object of little value (such as a peppercorn) can constitute consideration<sup>62</sup> and that parting with possession, no less than transfer of ownership, can constitute consideration.<sup>63</sup> But the decision of the House of Lords is nevertheless (with respect) justified, having regard to the context in which the issue of consideration arose. The House of Lords was concerned with the rule that a bona fide recipient of stolen money can retain it if he gives "valuable"<sup>64</sup> or "full"<sup>65</sup> consideration for it, and the object of that rule would be defeated if a technical consideration of the kind described above would (for the purpose of the rule) be allowed to suffice. Another reason, given by Lord Templeman, for rejecting the club's argument was that "there was only one contract and that was a gaming contract"<sup>66</sup> and that the "chips transaction was part of a single contract by virtue of which Cass gambled away money stolen from the solicitors".<sup>67</sup> Lord Goff, indeed, seems to regard the supply of chips as an "independent contract"<sup>68</sup> but this does not affect the issue of consideration where the chips are in fact used for gaming: in such a case they are "simply a convenient mechanism for gambling with money"<sup>69</sup>; and where the chips are so used the club is said not to provide consideration for their supply because it "is under no legal obligation to honour the bet."<sup>70</sup>

(iii) Chips used for purposes other than gaming. In the Lipkin Gorman case it was said that the use of chips for the purpose of buying refreshments in the club "appears to have been very rare" and there is no evidence that Cass ever used them for that purpose.<sup>71</sup> The effect of their use for that purpose was therefore left open; but Lord Templeman said that "neither the power to purchase refreshments nor the exercise of that power could constitute consideration for the receipt [by the club] of £154,693".<sup>72</sup> One possible interpretation of this passage is that the supply of refreshments could not constitute consideration for £154,693 (the net amount lost by Cass on the gambling transactions) since the disparity in value was too great; and that the rule that consideration need not be adequate<sup>73</sup> should not be applied in its full rigour in the context of an assertion by the recipient of stolen money that he has received the money for valuable consideration. But where the consideration is merely inadequate (as opposed to nominal)<sup>74</sup> this explanation could give rise to difficulty: e.g. if a bottle of champagne were to be supplied in exchange for chips given in return for £200 of stolen money. The preferable explanation for Lord Templeman's statement is that, as he says, the chips were "treated

<sup>61</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 561.

<sup>62</sup> See above, pp.85–86.

<sup>63</sup> Bainbridge v Firmstone (1838) 8 A. & E. 743, above, p.156.

<sup>64</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 577.

<sup>65</sup> ibid. at 560.

<sup>66</sup> ibid. at 562.

<sup>67</sup> ibid. at 567.

<sup>68</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 576.

<sup>69</sup> ibid. at 575.

<sup>70</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 577.

<sup>71</sup> ibid. at 569.

<sup>72</sup> ibid. at 567.

<sup>73</sup> See above, pp.73–74.

<sup>74</sup> See above, p.75.

as currency”<sup>75</sup> in the club and could there be used for a variety of purposes. The reason why refreshments would, if they had been supplied, not have been consideration for the money lost at play is that the gaming and the supply of refreshments were entirely separate transactions.

(c) PARTIAL DEFENCE OF CHANGE OF POSITION. The reasoning of Lipkin Gorman's case, as so far discussed, would have led to the result that the club was liable to return to the solicitors all the money stolen by Cass and not repaid by him into the client account, to the extent that it was used for gambling at the club, i.e. to the extent of £222,908.98. But that was not the result reached by the House of Lords, which held the club liable for no more than £154,695, this sum representing the net amount lost by Cass (deducting his winnings from his losses) over the period of 10 months during which he had gambled with the stolen money, after making allowance for the £20,050 attributable to his own money. The House of Lords was able to reach this conclusion by recognising that claims for the restitution of money were subject to the defence of change of position.<sup>76</sup> The club had changed its position by allowing Cass to enter into a series of transactions which “by laws of chance [yielded] the occasional winning bet”<sup>77</sup>; and although the club was not legally liable to pay these bets, they as a practical matter placed it under “an obligation which, in business terms, [it] had to comply with”.<sup>78</sup> The end result of the case, therefore, was that the loss resulting from the theft was split between two innocent parties, and it was no doubt the desire of the House of Lords to reach such a conclusion which led to its rejection of the argument that the club had provided valuable consideration for the payments.<sup>79</sup> The reasoning of the speeches on the issue of consideration may be complex and difficult, but the conclusion is (with respect) justified by the loss-splitting result.

---

<sup>75</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 561.

<sup>76</sup> See generally Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution, 6th ed., pp.821 to 837.

<sup>77</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 582.

<sup>78</sup> [1991] 2 A.C. 548 at 581.

<sup>79</sup> See above, pp.536–538.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

CAPACITY

SECTION 1. MINORS<sup>1</sup>

In the law of contract, persons below the age of majority were formerly called infants; and this expression is used in many of the older cases which deal with their contractual capacity. They are now more generally called minors; and, as this term is used in modern legislation on the subject,<sup>2</sup> it will also be used in this Chapter. When the age of majority was reduced from 21 to 18,<sup>3</sup> the practical importance of the rules which determine the extent to which minors are bound by their contracts was greatly reduced. If the decided cases are any guide, many of the legal problems in this area have in the past concerned the contracts of persons between 18 and 21, whose contractual capacity is now normal. But the question whether persons under 18 are bound by contracts can still arise today: for example, out of the contracts of young professional entertainers<sup>4</sup> or athletes, or out of hire-purchase agreements or contracts of employment involving minors. Legal problems can also arise where a claim is made by the minor against the other party, either to enforce the contract or to reclaim money or property with which the minor has parted under it.

The law on this topic is based on two principles. The first, and more important, is that the law must protect the minor against his inexperience, which may enable an adult to take unfair advantage of him, or to induce him to enter into a contract which, though in itself fair, is simply improvident.<sup>5</sup> This principle is the basis of the general rule that a minor is not bound by his contracts. The second principle is that the law should not cause unnecessary hardship to adults who deal fairly with minors. Under this principle certain contracts with minors are valid; others are voidable in the sense that they bind the minor unless he repudiates; and a minor may be under some liability in tort and in restitution.

1. Valid Contracts

(1) Necessaries

A contract for necessities is binding "not for the benefit of the tradesman who may trust the infant, but for the benefit of the infant himself".<sup>6</sup> It is assumed, rightly or wrongly,<sup>7</sup> that the tradesman would not give credit to the minor unless the law imposed liability. In this connection it should be noted that parents are not liable on their child's contract

---

<sup>1</sup> For a comparative study, see Hartwig, 15 I.C.L.Q. 780.

<sup>2</sup> Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.12 says they "may" be called minors; they are so called in Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.3 and in Minors' Contracts Act 1987.

<sup>3</sup> Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.1; s.9 provides that a person attains 18 "at the commencement of the [18th] anniversary of his birth."

<sup>4</sup> e.g. Mills v IRC [1975] A.C. 38 at 53.

<sup>5</sup> e.g. if the minor for a fair price agrees to buy something that he cannot afford.

<sup>6</sup> Ryder v Wombwell (1868) L.R. 4 Ex. 32 at 38; Zouch v Parsons (1763) 3 Burr. 1794.

<sup>7</sup> cf. below, p.541.

unless the child acts as their agent<sup>8</sup>; and that in English law a minor's contract cannot be validated by the consent or authorisation of his parent or guardian.

Necessaries include goods supplied and services rendered to a minor. He is bound by a contract for necessities only if it is on the whole for his benefit: not if it contains harsh and onerous terms.<sup>9</sup> Nor is he bound by an indivisible contract comprising necessities and non-necessaries.<sup>10</sup>

(a) NECESSARY GOODS. Necessary goods are not confined to necessities: they include "such articles as are fit to maintain the particular person in the state, station and degree . . . in which he is".<sup>11</sup> In one case<sup>12</sup> a livery for a minor's servant was held to be a necessary; and in another<sup>13</sup> the court refused to disturb a verdict that rings, pins and a watch-chain supplied to the son of a rich man were necessities. These "quaint examples of a bygone age"<sup>14</sup> are hardly cases in which liability was imposed "for the benefit of the infant himself".<sup>15</sup> The wide definition of necessities was adopted rather for the protection of suppliers who reasonably gave credit to young men from wealthy families.

On the other hand the definition of necessities was limited so as to exclude "mere luxuries." These were distinguished from "luxurious articles of utility",<sup>16</sup> which could be necessities. Since few articles are so luxurious that they cannot be used at all, the real question was whether it was reasonable for the minor, however rich, to be supplied with articles of the kind in question. Thus it was said that if the son of the richest man in the kingdom bought a racehorse, it could not be a necessary<sup>17</sup> but where an apprentice bought a racing bicycle (which was no more expensive than an ordinary one) it was held to be a necessary.<sup>18</sup> It is doubtful whether goods bought by a minor to be given away can normally be necessities.<sup>19</sup> But an engagement ring bought to be given to the minor's fiancée, whom he later marries, can be a necessary.<sup>20</sup>

Much difficulty was caused in the nineteenth century by the tendency of juries (consisting of 12 shopkeepers) to stretch the definition of necessities beyond its legitimate limits. In one case "an Oxford jury held that champagne and wild ducks were necessities to an infant undergraduate".<sup>21</sup> To counteract this tendency, the courts first distinguished between articles which could, and those which could not, as a matter of law, be necessities.<sup>22</sup> They held, secondly, that the question whether goods were necessities was "one of mixed law and fact; in so far as it is a question of fact it must be determined by the jury . . . ; but there is in every case . . . a preliminary question which is one of law, namely whether there is any evidence on which the jury could

<sup>8</sup> Blackburn v Mackey (1823) 1 C. & P. 1; Lam v Wilkin (1837) 6 A. & E. 718; Mortimore v Wright (1840) 6 M. & W. 482.

<sup>9</sup> Fawcett v Smethurst (1914) 84 L.J.Ch. 473.

<sup>10</sup> Stocks v Wilson [1913] 2 K.B. 235.

<sup>11</sup> Peters v Fleming (1840) 6 M. & W. 42 at 46; Bryant v Richardson (1866) 14 L.T. 24 at 26.

<sup>12</sup> Hands v Slaney (1800) 8 T.R. 578. But a claim for the price of cockades for soldiers under the minor's command was disallowed.

<sup>13</sup> Peters v Fleming, above, n.11.

<sup>14</sup> Allen v Bloomsbury Health Authority [1993] 1 All E.R. 651 at 661.

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.539.

<sup>16</sup> Chapple v Cooper (1844) 13 M. & W. 252 at 258.

<sup>17</sup> Wharton v Mackenzie (1844) 5 Q.B. 606 at 612. Contrast Barber v Vincent (1680) Free.K.B. 581 (horse sold to a minor to carry him about his necessary business held a necessary).

<sup>18</sup> Clyde Cycle Co v Hargreaves (1898) 78 L.T. 296.

<sup>19</sup> Ryder v Wombwell (1868) L.R. 4 Ex. 32; Hewlings v Graham (1901) 84 L.T. 497.

<sup>20</sup> Jenner v Walker (1869) 19 L.T. 398.

<sup>21</sup> (1874) Hansard, Vol.219, ser.3, col.1225.

<sup>22</sup> Ryder v Wombwell (1868) L.R. 4 Ex. 32.

properly find the question for the party on whom the onus of proof lies".<sup>23</sup> The onus of proving that the goods are necessities lies on the supplier. Thus in Ryder v Wombwell<sup>24</sup> the son of a deceased baronet bought jewelled cuff-links for £12 10s. apiece and an antique goblet to give to a friend. The jury found that these articles were necessities. But the court set the verdict aside as there was no evidence on which it could properly be based.

The supplier must show both that the goods are capable of being necessities and that they actually are necessities. Thus in Nash v Inman<sup>25</sup> a tailor sued a minor for the price of clothes, including 11 fancy waistcoats. The action failed because the tailor had not adduced any evidence fit to be left to the jury that the clothes were suitable to the condition in life of the minor, and that the minor was not already adequately supplied with clothes. The courts have put on the claimant the burden of proving the difficult negative proposition that the minor was not adequately supplied. As a general rule a person is only required to prove a negative if such proof depends on facts peculiarly within his own knowledge; here the proof required of the supplier depends on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the minor.

It was further held that the minor is not liable if he already had an adequate supply, even though the supplier did not know this.<sup>26</sup> Such a rule may help to protect minors; but it is difficult to reconcile with the view that minors are liable for necessities because, if they were not, traders would not give them credit. For the rule makes it impossible for the supplier to tell, when the contract is made, whether the minor will indeed be bound by it.

(b) SERVICES RENDERED TO A MINOR. Certain services rendered to a minor may be necessities. These include education (whether liberal or vocational)<sup>27</sup> and medical and legal advice.<sup>28</sup> The provision of a funeral for her deceased husband has been held a necessary for his widow, who was a minor.<sup>29</sup> It seems that any service can be a necessary if it satisfies the tests already stated in relation to necessary goods.

(c) EXECUTORY CONTRACTS.<sup>30</sup> It is disputed whether a minor is bound by an executory contract for necessary goods. Is he liable only if the goods have actually been delivered, or also if he wrongfully repudiates before delivery? Three main arguments have been used to support the view that the minor is liable only if the goods have been delivered.

First: in Nash v Inman Fletcher Moulton L.J. said that the minor was liable because he had been supplied, and not because he had contracted. "An infant, like a lunatic,<sup>31</sup> is incapable of making a contract . . . in the strict sense of the word: but if a man satisfies the need of the infant or lunatic by supplying to him necessities, the law will imply an obligation to repay him for the services so rendered, and will enforce that obligation against the estate of the infant or lunatic".<sup>32</sup> But Buckley L.J. said that a contract for

<sup>23</sup> Ryder v Wombwell (1868) L.R. 4 Ex. 32 at 38.

<sup>24</sup> (1868) L.R. 4 Ex. 32; cf. Wharton v Mackenzie (1844) 5 Q.B. 606.

<sup>25</sup> [1908] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>26</sup> Foster v Redgrave (1867) L.R. 4 Ex. 35n; Barnes v Tye (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 410; Johnstone v Marks (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 509.

<sup>27</sup> Chapple v Cooper (1844) 13 M. & W. 252 at 258; Walter v Everard [1891] 2 Q.B. 369; Roberts v Gray [1913] 1 K.B. 520. For contracts to pay school fees, see Practice Direction [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1441; Practice Direction [1983] 1 W.L.R. 800; Sherdley v Sherdley [1988] A.C. 213 at 225.

<sup>28</sup> Huggins v Wiseman (1690) Carth. 110; Helps v Clayton (1864) 17 C.B. (N.S.) 553.

<sup>29</sup> Chapple v Cooper (1844) 13 M. & W. 252.

<sup>30</sup> Miles, (1927) 43 L.Q.R. 389; Winfield, (1942) 58 L.Q.R. 83.

<sup>31</sup> Now called a mental patient: see below, pp.557 et seq.

<sup>32</sup> [1908] 2 K.B. 1 at 8; cf. Re J [1909] 1 Ch. 574.

necessaries was "such as the infant, notwithstanding infancy, could make" and that "an infant had a limited capacity to contract".<sup>33</sup> And the analogy of the "lunatic" is, with respect, imperfect. Sometimes the reason why such a person is "incapable of making a contract" may be that he cannot consent; and if he is then supplied with necessities there is not even the shadow of an agreement to accept and pay for the goods. This may also be true when necessities are supplied to a very young child.<sup>34</sup> But it is not true when a young man of 17 orders clothes and promises to pay for them. He can and does consent<sup>35</sup>; the only question is whether he ought as a matter of legal policy to be held to the agreement.

Secondly: the minor is liable only for a reasonable price, which may not be the same as the contract price. "That does not imply a consensual contract."<sup>36</sup> But the law often interferes with one or more of the terms of a transaction and this does not necessarily deprive it of its essential character as a contract.<sup>37</sup>

Thirdly: s.3(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 provides that "Where necessities are sold and delivered to a minor . . . he must pay a reasonable price for them". S.3(3) then defines "'necessaries' in subsection (2) above" to mean "goods suitable to the condition in life of the minor . . . and to his actual requirements at the time of sale and delivery." The words here italicised may seem to suggest that goods cannot be necessities unless they have actually been delivered. But the definition is of necessities "In subsection (2) above," and that subsection deals only with necessities sold and delivered. The definition does not apply to goods sold but not yet delivered.

Thus the arguments in support of the view that the minor is not liable on an executory contract are inconclusive; and the contrary view is supported by Roberts v Gray.<sup>38</sup> The claimant, a famous billiards player, agreed to take a minor on a world billiards tour, and to pay for his board and lodging and travelling expenses. This was a contract for necessities, mainly because its object was to teach the minor the profession of a billiards player. The minor repudiated the contract while it was still partly executory; and he was held liable in damages. Hamilton L.J. said: "I am unable to appreciate why a contract which is in itself binding . . . can cease to be binding merely because it is still executory".<sup>39</sup> It has been said that Roberts v Gray can be explained on the ground that contracts for education are more closely analogous to beneficial contracts of service<sup>40</sup> than to contracts for the supply of necessary goods.<sup>41</sup> But it is hard to see why any distinction should for this purpose be drawn between necessary goods and education; or between necessities of either kind and beneficial contracts of service. The reasons for holding a minor liable, and for limiting his liability, are the same in all these cases. It is thought that the minor's overall position might be prejudiced if he could not bind himself, and also that liability should be imposed to protect the legitimate interests of the adult. These considerations have to be balanced against the need to protect the minor. If a balancing of all these factors justifies the view that the minor should be bound by an executory contract for education or of service, it is submitted that it can equally

<sup>33</sup> [1908] K.B. 1 at 12.

<sup>34</sup> See Sherdley v Sherdley [1988] A.C. 213 at 225. R. v Oldham MBC, Ex p. Garlick [1993] A.C. 509 at 517.

<sup>35</sup> For recognition of this requirement in other branches of the law see, e.g., Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.8(1) (consent to medical treatment); Gillick v West Norfolk Health Authority [1986] A.C. 112 (consent to contraceptive advice).

<sup>36</sup> Pontypridd Union v Drew [1927] 1 K.B. 214 at 220.

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.3.

<sup>38</sup> [1913] 1 K.B. 520.

<sup>39</sup> ibid. at 530.

<sup>40</sup> See below, pp.543–545.

<sup>41</sup> Cheshire, Fifoot and Furmston, Law of Contract (14th ed.), p.481.

justify the view that he should be bound by an executory contract for the supply of necessary goods.<sup>42</sup>

(d) LEGISLATION AFFECTING THE MAINTENANCE OF CHILDREN. The common law rules relating to liability for necessities are not directly affected by legislation imposing on an absent parent the duty to maintain a child<sup>43</sup> or empowering courts to make orders against parents for financial relief in respect of children.<sup>44</sup> Such legislation may, however, indirectly affect a minor's contractual liabilities for necessities, in the sense that if, as a result of its operation, the minor is already adequately supplied with the goods or services in question, they will not fall within the common law definition of necessities.

(e) LOANS FOR NECESSARIES. At common law a person who spends money in buying necessities for a minor is entitled to recover it from the minor.<sup>45</sup> One who lends money to a minor to enable him to buy necessities cannot recover it at law, but can in equity recover such part of the loan as was actually used by the minor to discharge his liability for necessities supplied to him.<sup>46</sup> A promise in a mortgage deed to repay such a loan is ineffective since the minor is not bound by his deed.<sup>47</sup> The law leaves the lender for necessities in a somewhat precarious position—perhaps because a loan of money can more easily be misapplied than an actual supply of necessities.

(2) Service contracts

A minor<sup>48</sup> is bound by a service contract if it is on the whole for his benefit. He may be bound even though some of the terms of the contract are to his disadvantage. Thus in Clements v L & NW Ry<sup>49</sup> a minor who was a railway porter agreed to join an insurance scheme, to which his employers contributed, and to give up any claim for personal injury under the Employers' Liability Act 1880. His rights under the scheme were in some ways more, and in other ways less, beneficial than those under the Act; and it was held that the contract was on the whole beneficial, so that the minor was bound by it. But a term which simply limits or excludes the liability of the employer without giving the minor any rights in return is unlikely to be upheld.<sup>50</sup>

A minor is, a fortiori, not bound by a service contract which is on the whole harsh and oppressive to the minor.<sup>51</sup>

<sup>42</sup> The difficulties discussed above would be diminished if parents were liable for necessities, or at least for necessities, supplied to a child. For an American case in which such liability was imposed, see Greenspan v Slate, 12 N.J. 426; 97 A. 2d. 390 (1953).

<sup>43</sup> Child Support Act 1991, s.1(1).

<sup>44</sup> Children Act 1989, s.15 and Sch.5.

<sup>45</sup> Ellis v Ellis (1689) Comb. 482; Earle v Peale (1712) 10 Mod. 67.

<sup>46</sup> Marlow v Pitfield (1719) 1 P.Wms. 558; Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society (1869) L.R. 5 Ch.App. 309 at 313.

<sup>47</sup> Martin v Gale (1876) 4 Ch.D. 428.

<sup>48</sup> Contracts of service with children are to some extent regulated by statute: see, for example, Children and Young Persons Acts 1933, s.18; 1963, ss.34, 37; Employment of Children Act 1973 (as amended by Employment Act 1989 and Children Act 1989).

<sup>49</sup> [1894] 2 Q.B. 482; Slade v Metrodent [1953] 2 Q.B. 112; Mills v IRC [1975] A.C. 38 at 53.

<sup>50</sup> Olsen v Corry and Gravesend Aviation Ltd [1936] 3 All E.R. 241. Even if valid at common law, the term may be ineffective, or subject to the requirement of reasonableness, under Unfair Contracts Terms Act 1977, ss.2 or 3 (above, pp.248, 252–254), and see Sch.1 para.4 ("except in favour of the employee"). The Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations, 1999 do not apply to contracts relating to employment: above, p.278.

<sup>51</sup> De Francesco v Barnum (1889) 43 Ch.D. 165; (1890) 45 Ch.D. 430. For an even more extreme case of this kind, in which there was said to be liability to the minor for intimidation (below, p.625), see Goodwin v Uzoigwe, The Times, June 18, 1992.

In deciding whether a service contract is on the whole beneficial the court is entitled to look at surrounding circumstances. For example, a service contract with a minor may contain a covenant in restraint of trade. Such a covenant, if otherwise valid,<sup>52</sup> does not invalidate the contract if the minor could not have got similar work on any other terms.<sup>53</sup> But it would invalidate a service contract with a minor if it was of a kind that was not usually found in service contracts in that trade and locality.<sup>54</sup> These principles also apply to contracts connected with service contracts. Thus they determine the validity of contracts to carry minors to work,<sup>55</sup> of compromises of industrial injury claims,<sup>56</sup> and of agreements to dissolve service contracts.<sup>57</sup>

The principles evolved in relation to service contracts also determine the validity of contracts under which a minor makes a living by the exercise of some profession, e.g. as an entertainer or author or athlete. In Doyle v White City Stadium Ltd<sup>58</sup> a professional boxer who was a minor made a contract to fight for £3,000, win, draw or lose, subject to the rules of the British Boxing Board of Control, under which a boxer who was disqualified forfeited his "purse". The minor was disqualified for hitting below the belt and his claim for the £3,000 was dismissed. Although in the circumstances the rules operated against him, he was bound by them: they were, on the whole, for his benefit as a professional boxer since they encouraged clean fighting. This case was followed in Chaplin v Leslie Frewin (Publishers) Ltd<sup>59</sup> where a minor contracted to give a firm of publishers the exclusive right to publish his memoirs. The Court of Appeal unanimously held that this was the sort of contract which could bind the minor if it was on the whole for his benefit.<sup>60</sup> Applying this test Lord Denning M.R. thought that, having regard to the contents of the memoirs, the contract was not binding, as it was not for the minor's good "that he should exploit his discreditable conduct for money".<sup>61</sup> But Danckwerts and Winn L.JJ. took the more materialistic view that "the mud may cling but the profits will be secured": thus the contract was on the whole beneficial, and bound the minor as it enabled him to "make a start as an author".<sup>62</sup>

The rule that a minor is bound by "beneficial" contracts is restricted to service or analogous contracts. There is no general principle that a minor is bound by a contract merely because it is for his benefit. For example, a minor would not be contractually liable to repay<sup>63</sup> a loan without interest. And it has long been settled that a minor is not bound by a trading contract. Thus he is not liable for goods supplied to him for the

<sup>52</sup> See above, p.454 et seq. The fact that the employee was a minor may be relevant to the issue of the reasonableness of the covenant: see Sir W C Leng & Co Ltd v Andrems [1909] 1 Ch. 763 at 771-772.

<sup>53</sup> Bromley v Smith [1909] 2 K.B. 235; cf. Leslie v Fitzpatrick (1877) 3 Q.B.D. 229; Fellows v Wood (1888) 59 L.T. 513.

<sup>54</sup> Sir W C Leng & Co Ltd v Andrems [1909] 1 Ch. 763.

<sup>55</sup> Flower v London and North Western Ry [1894] 2 Q.B. 65; in Buckpitt v Oates [1968] 1 All E.R. 1145 it seems to have been assumed that any contract to carry the minor (though not connected with his work) would be binding if on the whole for his benefit; sed quare. The actual decision would now go the other way: Road Traffic Act 1988, ss.145, 149.

<sup>56</sup> Stephens v Dudbridge Ironworks Co [1904] 2 K.B. 225.

<sup>57</sup> Waterman v Fryer [1922] 1 K.B. 499.

<sup>58</sup> [1935] 1 K.B. 110. cf. also Lumley v Wagner (1852) 1 D.M. & G. 604, where a famous soprano was under age, as appears from 5 Dc G. & Sm. 485.

<sup>59</sup> [1966] Ch. 71; the case was later compromised: The Times, February 16, 1966.

<sup>60</sup> The same rule seems to apply to a contract between an entertainer who is under age and his agent: see Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd (1967) 111 S.J. 715, reversed on other grounds [1969] 1 Q.B. 699, below, pp.749, 1016.

<sup>61</sup> [1966] Ch. 71 at 88.

<sup>62</sup> ibid. p.95. The majority may have been influenced by the fact that the minor had received considerable payments in advance of royalties. The publishers would have had considerable difficulties—both legal and practical—in getting these back.

<sup>63</sup> For liability to make restitution, see below, pp.551-557.

purpose of trade, nor for damages if he fails to deliver goods which he has sold as a trader.<sup>64</sup> Nor can he be made bankrupt for trade debts.<sup>65</sup>

It may be asked: why does the law distinguish between a minor who earns his living by the exercise of a profession and one who earns his living by trading? The traditional answer is that "the law will not suffer him to trade, which may be his undoing".<sup>66</sup> A minor who trades thereby necessarily risks his capital. If he exercises some profession or calling he may incur expense, but putting his capital at risk is not of the essence of the matter. Of course there are difficult borderline cases. A minor who is a haulage contractor is a trader,<sup>67</sup> but probably one who was a racing driver would not be so regarded. Similarly, it is probable that a minor who was a house painter would, while one who was a portrait painter would not, be regarded as a trader.<sup>68</sup> There is no precise definition of "trade" for this purpose.

Contracts of apprenticeship were governed by special rules. It was held in the seventeenth century that an apprentice who was under age was not liable in damages if, in breach of contract, he departed from service.<sup>69</sup> This rule was originally based on the fact that the master had other remedies such as having the minor ordered by a justice of the peace to return to work. These remedies no longer exist<sup>70</sup> and it seems that contracts of apprenticeship will now be governed by the normal rules. A minor is not bound by an apprenticeship deed as such, but he is bound by it as a simple contract. Thus he is liable to pay any premium which he has agreed to pay.<sup>71</sup> Similarly, a covenant in restraint of trade (if otherwise valid<sup>72</sup>) or an arbitration clause contained in the apprenticeship deed can be enforced against him so long as the deed is on the whole for his benefit.<sup>73</sup>

2. Voidable Contracts

(1) Cases of voidable contracts

In four cases a minor's contract is voidable: that is, it binds both parties but the minor can avoid liability by repudiating before majority or within a reasonable time thereafter. The other party cannot repudiate.<sup>74</sup>

(a) CONTRACTS CONCERNING LAND. A lessee who is under age is liable for rent unless he repudiates.<sup>75</sup> A minor who agrees to purchase freehold land is similarly bound unless he repudiates.<sup>76</sup> It seems that the same principle applies where a minor lets or agrees to

<sup>64</sup> Mercantile Union Guarantee Corp Ltd v Ball [1937] 2 K.B. 498; Cornwall v Nield [1912] 2 K.B. 491; below, p.556.

<sup>65</sup> Ex p. Jones (1881) 18 Ch.D. 109; but he can be made bankrupt in respect of tax liability incurred in the course of trade: Re a Debtor [1950] Ch. 282. If a minor is made bankrupt as a result of a mistake as to his age, the court has a discretion to set the bankruptcy aside: Re Davenport [1963] 1 W.L.R. 817.

<sup>66</sup> Whymall v Campion (1738) 2 Stra. 1083.

<sup>67</sup> Mercantile Union Guarantee Corp Ltd v Ball, above, n.64.

<sup>68</sup> Quære what the position would be if a minor agreed to sell a picture which he had painted without having been commissioned to paint it.

<sup>69</sup> Gylbert v Fletcher (1630) Cro.Car. 179.

<sup>70</sup> Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.11.

<sup>71</sup> Walter v Everard [1891] 2 Q.B. 369.

<sup>72</sup> See above, p.544, n.52.

<sup>73</sup> Gadd v Thompson [1911] 1 K.B. 304; Slade v Metrodent [1953] 2 Q.B. 112.

<sup>74</sup> Clayton v Ashdown (1714) 2 Eq.Ca.Abr. 516.

<sup>75</sup> Keteley's Case (1613) 1 Brownl. 120; Davies v Benyon-Harris (1931) 47 T.L.R. 424. A minor can no longer hold a legal estate in land: Law of Property Act 1925, s.1(b); cf. Trusts of Land and Appointment of Trustees Act 1996, s.2(6) and Sch.2; but these enactments do not affect the proposition in the text.

<sup>76</sup> Whittingham v Murdy (1889) 60 L.T. 956; Thurstan v Notts PBBS [1902] 1 Ch. 1 at 9, 13 (affirmed [1903] A.C. 6); Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1978] A.C. 95 at 106, 113.

sell land.<sup>77</sup> Actual conveyances to and by minors give rise to special problems which are outside the scope of this book.

According to one case<sup>78</sup> a lessee who is under age is liable for rent only if the subject-matter of the lease is a necessary, but if this were so he could presumably not repudiate. The requirement is not elsewhere stated and is probably not law. On the contrary, it seems that a lessee who is under age is liable unless he repudiates even though the lease is disadvantageous to him.<sup>79</sup>

(b) SHARES IN COMPANIES. A minor who agrees to subscribe for shares in a company, or buys shares which are not fully paid, is liable for calls unless he repudiates. A mere plea that he has not ratified the transaction does not relieve him from liability.<sup>80</sup> If he repudiates he ceases to be liable and can have his name removed from the company's register.<sup>81</sup> If the minor buys shares from a previous owner and fails to repudiate liability for calls on them, the company cannot generally avoid the transaction and so make the transferor liable for the calls.<sup>82</sup> But if the company is being wound up while the buyer is still a minor, the liquidator can exercise the minor's right of repudiation for him and so make the transferor again liable for calls.<sup>83</sup>

The cases on this subject all concern the relations between the minor and the company or between the company and the person who has transferred shares to a minor. There appears to be no authority on the effect between buyer and seller of a sale of shares by or to a minor. Suppose that a minor buys shares, fails to pay for them when due, and then repudiates after majority. If the contract is voidable this repudiation may be too late,<sup>84</sup> so that the minor will be liable to pay. But he would not be liable if the contract had never been binding on him at all.<sup>85</sup>

(c) PARTNERSHIP. A minor can become a partner and is to some extent bound by the partnership agreement. He cannot be sued during minority by persons who give credit to the firm,<sup>86</sup> or be made liable for its losses.<sup>87</sup> But he is liable if after majority he fails to put an end to the partnership.<sup>88</sup> And he is not entitled to any share in the profits or assets of the partnership until its liabilities have been discharged.<sup>89</sup>

<sup>77</sup> Slator v Trimble (1861) 14 Ir.C.L.R. 342; Williams, Vendor and Purchaser (4th ed.), pp.847 et seq.

<sup>78</sup> Lowe v Griffith (1835) 4 L.J.C.P. 94.

<sup>79</sup> North Western Ry v M'Michael (1850) 5 Ex. 114 at 128; in Keteley's Case, sub nom. Kirton v Eliot (1613) 2 Bulst. 69, there is a conflict of opinion on this point. There would be no liability for necessities in such a case: above, p.540 at n.9.

<sup>80</sup> North Western Ry v M'Michael, above; Dublin & Wicklow Ry v Black (1852) 8 Ex. 181; Ebbett's Case (1870) L.R. 5 Ch.App. 302. The rule was originally thought to be based simply on the provisions of the Act incorporating the company: Cork & Bandon Ry v Cazenove (1847) 10 Q.B. 935; but this reasoning was disapproved in M'Michael's case, above, and in Leeds & Thirsk Ry v Fearnley (1849) 4 Ex. 26. Thus the rule applies to shares in all companies, however incorporated.

<sup>81</sup> Dublin & Wicklow Ry v Black, above; Steinberg v Scala (Leeds) Ltd [1923] 2 Ch. 452.

<sup>82</sup> Lumsden's Case (1868) L.R. 4 Ch.App. 31; Gooch's Case (1872) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 266.

<sup>83</sup> Cupper's Case (1868) L.R. 3 Ch.App. 458; Castello's Case (1869) L.R. 8 Eq. 504; Symon's Case (1870) L.R. 5 Ch.App. 298.

<sup>84</sup> See below, p.547.

<sup>85</sup> i.e. if it fell within the general rule stated at p.549, below.

<sup>86</sup> Goode v Harrison (1821) 5 B. & Ald. 147 at 157; Lovell & Christmas v Beauchamp [1894] A.C. 607.

<sup>87</sup> Goode v Harrison, above, at 159.

<sup>88</sup> Goode v Harrison, above.

<sup>89</sup> Lovell & Christmas v Beauchamp [1894] A.C. 607 at 611. Seem, the rules stated in this paragraph would apply to the relations between persons who became members of a limited liability partnership (below, p.563) if one or more of them were a minor: ss.4 and 5 of the Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000 contain no reference to minority. Since under s.1 of the Act such a partnership is a body corporate, a minor would not (any more than a person of full age) be liable on its contracts; but his liability to contribute to the assets of the partnership would seem to be governed by the principles stated at nn.80 and 81 above.

(d) MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS. It was once thought that a marriage settlement by a minor was binding to the extent to which it benefited him; but was otherwise not binding unless ratified after majority.<sup>90</sup> But the prevailing view is that such a settlement binds the minor unless he repudiates.<sup>91</sup> In certain cases a minor could, by statute, make an absolutely binding settlement with the consent of the court.<sup>92</sup> The statute has been repealed,<sup>93</sup> though not with retrospective effect.

(2) Loans for voidable contracts

A minor may borrow money to enable him to make a payment due from him under a voidable contract, and actually use the money borrowed to make the payment. The minor is not for this reason bound by the contract for the loan of the money<sup>94</sup>; but the lender has rights similar to those of a lender for necessities.<sup>95</sup> In Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society v Thurstan<sup>96</sup> a minor borrowed money from a building society to buy land. She paid the money to the vendor and executed a mortgage to the society. The mortgage was void,<sup>97</sup> but the society was entitled to stand in the shoes of the vendor and to exercise the lien that he would have had over the property, if he had not been paid.

(3) Rules relating to repudiation

(a) TIME OF REPUDIATION. A voidable contract can be repudiated during minority, but such a repudiation can be withdrawn by the minor before, or within reasonable time of, majority.<sup>98</sup> If the minor repudiates during minority he need take no further steps to avoid liability on reaching full age.<sup>99</sup>

If the minor does not repudiate during minority, he must do so within a reasonable time of reaching full age. This is so even though he did not know of his right to repudiate, and even though his obligation under the contract had not yet matured. Thus a covenant by a minor in a marriage settlement to settle after-acquired property may not become operative for many years after the settlor comes of age. But it binds him unless he repudiates it within a reasonable time of majority. In Edwards v Carter<sup>1</sup> it was held that a settlement could not be repudiated nearly five years after the majority of the settlor, although he was for most of that time ignorant of his right to repudiate.

(b) EFFECTS OF REPUDIATION. Two points call for discussion.

(i) Relief from future liabilities. Repudiation relieves the minor from liabilities which would, but for the repudiation, have accrued after its date. There are conflicting dicta<sup>2</sup> on the question whether liabilities which have already accrued are extinguished by repudiation. According to an Irish case repudiation has no retrospective effect<sup>3</sup> thus a

<sup>90</sup> See Simson v Jones (1831) 2 Russ & My. 365; traces of this view remain in Kingsman v Kingsman (1880) 6 Q.B.D. 122 and in Clements v London and North Western Ry [1894] 2 Q.B. 482 at 493.

<sup>91</sup> Duncan v Dixon (1890) 44 Ch.D. 211; Edwards v Carter [1893] A.C. 360; [1892] 2 Ch. 278.

<sup>92</sup> Infant Settlements Act 1855.

<sup>93</sup> Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.11.

<sup>94</sup> It falls within the general rule stated at p.549, below.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.543.

<sup>96</sup> [1903] A.C. 6.

<sup>97</sup> See above, p.543 at n.47.

<sup>98</sup> North Western Ry v M'Michael (1850) 5 Ex. 114 at 127; Slator v Trimble (1861) 14 Ir.C.L.R. 342.

<sup>99</sup> Newry and Enniskillen Ry v Combe (1849) 3 Ex. 565 at 575.

<sup>1</sup> [1893] A.C. 360.

<sup>2</sup> North Western Ry v M'Michael, above, n.96 at 125 (retrospective); Keteley's Case (1613) 1 Brownl. 120 (not retrospective); dicta in Steinberg v Scala (Leeds) Ltd [1923] 2 Ch. 452 at 463 can be cited on both sides.

<sup>3</sup> Blake v Concannon (1870) I.R. 4 C.L. 323.

lessee who is under age is liable for rent which has become payable before repudiation.

(ii) No restitution of money or property. A minor cannot recover back money paid under a voidable contract unless there has been a "total failure of consideration".<sup>4</sup> In Steinberg v Scala (Leeds) Ltd,<sup>5</sup> a minor applied for shares in a company but repudiated after allotment. She thus avoided liability for future calls, but her claim for the return of money already paid was rejected as there was no total failure of consideration: she had got the very shares she bargained for. Property transferred under a marriage settlement would similarly be irrecoverable once the marriage had taken place. On the other hand in Corpe v Overton<sup>6</sup> a minor agreed to enter into a partnership and paid a deposit of £100, to be forfeited if he failed to execute the partnership deed. No partnership deed was ever executed because the minor repudiated, and it was held that he could get his deposit back as there had been a total failure of consideration. An adult, too, can recover back money if there has been a total failure of consideration; but a minor (unlike an adult) can do so even though the failure of consideration is due to his own act in repudiating the contract.

(4) Why are these contracts voidable?

In general a minor is not bound by his contracts.<sup>7</sup> He need not repudiate to escape liability. Why must he do so in the four cases discussed above?<sup>8</sup>

The orthodox view is that the minor must repudiate because he has acquired an interest in a subject-matter of a permanent nature to which continuing obligations are attached: it would be unjust to allow him to retain the interest without fulfilling the obligations.<sup>9</sup> But this explanation is not wholly satisfactory. First, it is vague: what is meant by "permanent" here? Is a lease for one year permanent because land is virtually indestructible? Partnerships and shares in companies do not necessarily confer an interest in property which is permanent even in this sense. And marriage settlements can be brought within the explanation only by arguing that the marriage is permanent, whether the settled property is permanent or not. Secondly, the explanation does not cover all cases within the rule. It has been held that a minor's contract to buy freehold land to be paid for in instalments is voidable.<sup>10</sup> Nothing in the judgment suggests that it would have made any difference, had the price been payable in one lump sum. Yet in such a case the contract would not have created any "continuing" obligation between the parties. Thirdly, the explanation proves too much. It is admittedly unjust to allow a tenant who is a minor to retain possession of land without paying rent. But it is equally unjust to allow a minor to keep a car obtained under a hire purchase agreement without paying instalments. Yet the hire purchase agreement does not bind the minor<sup>11</sup>: he need not repudiate.

There seems to be no satisfactory explanation for the existence of this separate class of voidable contracts. It perhaps provides the clearest illustration of the dilemma in which the law sometimes finds itself when it tries at the same time to protect minors and not to cause undue hardship to adults who deal with them. But this dilemma exists in all cases of contracts with minors and scarcely justifies special treatment of the four

<sup>4</sup> See below, p.1049.

<sup>5</sup> [1923] 2 Ch. 452.

<sup>6</sup> (1833) 10 Bing. 252; Everett v Wilkins (1874) 29 L.T. 846.

<sup>7</sup> See below, p.549, heading 3(1).

<sup>8</sup> See above, pp.545-547.

<sup>9</sup> See, e.g., Davies v Benyon Harris (1931) 47 T.L.R. 424.

<sup>10</sup> Whittingham v Murdy (1889) 60 L.T. 956.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. Mercantile Union Guarantee Corp Ltd v Ball [1937] 2 K.B. 498.

classes of voidable contracts. Perhaps this is based on social and economic factors which have long since passed away.

3. Other Contracts

(1) Minor not bound

Contracts which are neither valid, nor voidable in the sense just discussed, do not bind the minor but have a number of legal effects.

(2) Other effects

(a) OTHER PARTY BOUND. Contracts in this group bind the other party.<sup>12</sup> However, the remedies available to the minor are somewhat restricted in that he cannot claim specific performance of the contract.<sup>13</sup>

(b) RATIFICATION. The minor as a general rule<sup>14</sup> becomes liable on the contract if he ratifies it after reaching full age.<sup>15</sup> Ratification may be express, or implied from conduct: the latter possibility is illustrated by the case in which the former minor continues after majority to act on the contract in such a way as to show that he regards it as binding on himself.<sup>16</sup> Because contracts in this group became binding as a result of ratification, they were sometimes called “voidable.” But this is misleading as “voidable” normally means binding unless repudiated, whereas these contracts do not bind the minor unless he ratifies.

(c) EXECUTED CONTRACTS. Once the minor has actually performed the contract he cannot recover back money paid or property transferred by him under it merely on the ground that the contract did not bind him by reason of his minority.<sup>17</sup> He can recover back such money or property only in the same circumstances in which this remedy is available to an adult: for example, he can recover back money paid under the contract if there has been a total failure of consideration.<sup>18</sup> There is, indeed, some doubt as to the scope of the rule that property transferred in pursuance of contracts in this category cannot be recovered back. In Chaplin v Leslie Frewin (Publishers) Ltd<sup>19</sup> a majority of the Court of Appeal accepted the view that the minor would not be able to recover the copyright which he had transferred under the contract even if (contrary to the view of that majority) the contract did not bind him.<sup>20</sup> Lord Denning M.R., on the other hand, said that the rule, by which property could not be recovered back, applied only to transfers by delivery and not to those which require a written document: it would be

<sup>12</sup> Farnham v Atkins (1670) 1 Sid. 446; Bruce v Warmick (1815) 6 Taunt. 118; and see above, p.539.

<sup>13</sup> Flight v Boland (1828) 4 Russ. 298; Lumley v Ravenscroft [1895] 1 Q.B. 683; below; p.1037.

<sup>14</sup> Exceptionally, a penal bond is void so that it cannot be ratified: Baylis v Dmely (1815) 3 M. & S. 477.

<sup>15</sup> See Williams v Moor (1843) 11 M. & W. 256.

<sup>16</sup> This appears from cases which distinguished for the purpose of s.2 of the Infants Relief Act 1874 between a “ratification” (which under that section was not enforceable) and a fresh promise (which was enforceable): e.g. Brønn v Harper (1893) 68 L.T. 488. Now that s.2 has been repealed by Minors’ Contracts Act 1987, ss.1(a) and 4(2), a mere ratification is enforceable.

<sup>17</sup> Wilson v Kearsle (1800) Peake Add. Cas. 196; Corpe v Overton (1833) 10 Bing. 252 at 259; Ex p. Taylor (1856) 8 D.M. & G. 254 at 256.

<sup>18</sup> See below, p.1049.

<sup>19</sup> [1966] Ch. 71; above, p.544.

<sup>20</sup> This view was based “on the authorities cited to us” (at p.94). But these were not strictly in point as the contract in one of them (Steinberg v Scala (Leeds) Ltd [1923] 2 Ch. 452) was truly voidable, while in the other two (Valentini v Canali (1889) 24 Q.B.D. 166; Pearce v Brain [1929] 2 K.B. 310) the contracts were “absolutely void” within s.1 of the Infants Relief Act 1874 (repealed by Minors’ Contracts Act 1987, ss.1(a) and 4(2)). The majority’s view is more appropriately supported by the authorities cited in n.17, above.

"absurd to hold that a contract to make a disposition is voidable and that the disposition is not".<sup>21</sup> But it is, with respect, hard to see why this is more absurd when the disposition has to be in writing than when it can, and does, take effect by delivery.<sup>22</sup>

(d) PASSING OF PROPERTY TO MINOR. It was said by Lush J. in Stocks v Wilson<sup>23</sup> that, where goods were delivered to a minor under a contract of sale, the property in them passed to him "by the delivery". The view that property can pass to a minor under a contract which does not bind him seems to be supported by s.3(1) of the Minors' Contracts Act 1987: this subsection<sup>24</sup> refers to "property acquired" by the minor under such a contract, and to the power of the court to order him to "transfer" such property.<sup>25</sup> The property, in the case put, seems to pass by delivery with intention to pass property. It may indeed be argued that the seller's intention to pass property is based on the assumption that the contract binds the minor and is nullified if this assumption is untrue, just as (in cases not involving minors) a seller's intention to pass property is nullified if the contract is void for mistake as to the identity of the buyer.<sup>26</sup> But delivery to the wrong person may well differ in legal effect from delivery for the wrong reason. In the first case there is no intention to pass the property to the person to whom the delivery is made; in the second there is such an intention, though possibly based on a mistaken assumption. Thus it is submitted that delivery of the goods to the minor can pass property to him. The attraction of this view is that it enables the law to protect an innocent third party who later buys the goods from the minor. It is an open question whether property can pass to the minor without delivery,<sup>27</sup> simply by virtue of the contract. The question is of small practical importance since property is unlikely to pass in this way until the price has been paid<sup>28</sup>, and in that case the seller generally has no interest in claiming that he still has the property in the goods.

(e) PASSING OF PROPERTY FROM MINOR. Cases such as Chaplin v Leslie Frewin (Publishers) Ltd<sup>29</sup> show that property can pass from the minor under a contract which does not bind him.<sup>30</sup> The same principle would apply where the minor made a pledge to secure a debt incurred under such a contract. The person taking the pledge would normally be guilty of an offence,<sup>31</sup> but this does not affect the civil consequences of the transaction.<sup>32</sup> Thus it seems that a special property in the thing pledged would pass to the pledgee and that the minor could not get the thing back without paying off the loan. This conclusion may be disadvantageous to the minor, but the argument that property passes by delivery seems to apply as much where the delivery is made by, as where it is made to, the minor.

<sup>21</sup> [1966] Ch. 71 at 90; cf. G (A) v G (T) [1970] 2 Q.B. 643 at 652.

<sup>22</sup> No such distinction is drawn where the contract is voidable for misrepresentation above, pp.369 et seq.

<sup>23</sup> [1913] 2 K.B. 235 at 246; cf. Watts v Seymour [1967] 2 Q.B. 647.

<sup>24</sup> See below, p.551; a similar assumption seems to underlie Criminal Justice Act 1988, s.141A(1), as inserted by Offensive Weapons Act 1996, s.6(1).

<sup>25</sup> See further below, pp.551–553.

<sup>26</sup> Cundy v Lindsay (1878) 3 App.Cas. 459; above, p.298.

<sup>27</sup> e.g. under Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.18, rule 1.

<sup>28</sup> See R. v Ward Ltd v Bignall [1967] 1 Q.B. 534 at 545.

<sup>29</sup> [1966] Ch. 71; above, pp.544, 549.

<sup>30</sup> Even Lord Denning accepted this view where the property was alleged to have passed by delivery: see above, at n.21.

<sup>31</sup> Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.114(2).

<sup>32</sup> ibid. s.170(1); quære whether this excludes the rules stated at pp.491–492 above; cf. also pp.495–503, above.

4. Liability in Tort

The general rule is that minors are liable in tort in the same way as adults. One possible exception to this rule exists in the case of very young children. Our concern here, however, is with another exception, which exists where a cause of action in tort arises out of, or in connection with, a contract which does not bind the minor.

Conduct amounting to a breach of contract may also be a tort.<sup>33</sup> If a minor engages in such conduct and is sued in tort, he can sometimes set up the invalidity of the contract as a defence to the tort claim. He can do so where the tort consists of wrongfully doing an act authorised by the contract,<sup>34</sup> but not where it consists of doing an act forbidden by the contract.<sup>35</sup> The distinction between these two types of cases can be explained as the product of the law's two conflicting desires: to protect minors, but without causing unnecessary hardship to adults who deal with them.

The minor may be immune from liability in tort, not only where he commits a tort in breaking the invalid contract, but also where he commits a tort in procuring it. Thus it was held in R Leslie Ltd v Sheil<sup>36</sup> that a minor could not be sued in deceit for inducing an adult to lend him money by fraudulent misrepresentations as to his age. Similarly it was held in Stocks v Wilson<sup>37</sup> that a minor could not be sued in deceit for inducing an adult by such misrepresentations to sell and deliver goods to him. The practical effect of a judgment in tort in such cases would be to force the minor to repay the money lent or to pay the value of the goods obtained; and this would once again undermine the protection which the law gives to the minor by holding the contract invalid.

5. Liability in Restitution

Before the Minors' Contracts Act 1987, a minor could be held liable to restore certain benefits received by him under a contract which did not bind him. Such liability was imposed in equity if the minor was guilty of fraud,<sup>38</sup> and (probably) in certain other cases at common law.<sup>39</sup> S.3(1) of the 1987 Act now gives the court a discretion to order the minor to transfer to the adult party any property acquired by the minor under such a contract, or any property representing it. S.3(2) goes on to provide that nothing in s.3 "shall be taken to prejudice any other remedy available to the" adult party to the contract: thus in cases which fall outside s.3(1), or in which the court declines to exercise its discretion under that subsection, it remains open to the adult to seek restitution under the old rules of equity or common law. These therefore still call for discussion, even though generally claims for restitution are now likely to be made under s.3(1), since the conditions imposed by the subsection are less onerous than those imposed by the equitable or the common law rules.

(1) Minors' Contracts Act 1987, s.3(1)

(a) SCOPE. This subsection deals with the case where a contract has been made with a minor and the contract "is unenforceable against [the minor] (or he repudiates it)"<sup>40</sup> because he was a minor when the contract was made". In such a case the court "may,

<sup>33</sup> See below, pp.983–984.

<sup>34</sup> Jennings v Rundall (1799) 8 T.R. 335; cf. Fawcett v Smethurst (1914) 84 L.J.K.B. 473.

<sup>35</sup> Burnard v Haggis (1863) 14 C.B. (N.S.) 45; cf. Ballett Mingay [1943] K.B. 281 (under-age bailee wrongfully disposing of the goods).

<sup>36</sup> [1914] 3 K.B. 607; Johnson v Pye (1665) 1 Sid. 258.

<sup>37</sup> [1913] 2 K.B. 235.

<sup>38</sup> See below, pp.554–556.

<sup>39</sup> See below, pp.556–557.

<sup>40</sup> This phrase refers to the "voidable" contracts discussed above, at pp.545–547.

if it is just and equitable to do so, require [the minor] to transfer to the [other party] any property acquired by the [minor] under the contract, or any property representing it”.

(i) Restoration of property acquired. The subsection would most obviously apply to a case like Nash v Inman<sup>41</sup>: the minor could be ordered to return the fancy waistcoats to the seller. Such an order could be made even though the minor was not guilty of fraud, which is essential to liability in equity<sup>42</sup>; and even though there would, in the case put, be no liability in quasi-contract at common law.<sup>43</sup>

(ii) Proceeds of property acquired. S.3(1) goes beyond the simple case just put, in that the court can order the minor to transfer either the “property acquired . . . under the contract” or “any property representing it”. Thus if the minor were to exchange the fancy waistcoats for a set of silver candlesticks, he could be ordered to transfer those to the seller of the fancy waistcoats. On the other hand, s.3(1) would not apply where the minor had dissipated the property acquired under the contract or its proceeds: e.g. where he had bought champagne and consumed it, or where he had sold property acquired under the contract for cash and had used the money to pay for a holiday. S.3(1) only empowers the court to order the minor to transfer either the property acquired under the contract or property representing it: the court cannot order him to pay either the price or the reasonable value of what he has obtained out of his other assets. The underlying principle seems to be that the minor should not be enriched by retaining “property” obtained under the contract. But his general assets (other than that “property”) are not to be diminished as a result of the exercise of the court’s discretion under the section.

The discretion will present few problems where the “property acquired . . . under the contract” is still in the minor’s possession; but difficulty can obviously arise where the discretion is invoked in respect of “property representing it”. The case in which the minor simply exchanges the “property acquired” for something else will be relatively uncommon. More usually, he will sell the “property acquired” and use the money to buy something else; that other thing may have been paid for wholly or in part with the money obtained from the sale of the property originally acquired. Further problems can arise where that money is paid by the minor into a bank account which is in credit and from which money is then drawn out to pay for the substitute purchase. In such a case it may be very hard to tell whether that substitute is indeed “property representing” the property acquired under the original contract. Even greater difficulties could arise if the substitute had been bought under another contract which was unenforceable against the minor, and if only part of the price due under that contract had been paid by the minor; in such a case claims under s.3 for the transfer of the same thing might be made by two sellers.

(iii) Meaning of “property.” A final difficulty is to determine what is meant by “property” in the section; and in particular whether “property” includes money.<sup>44</sup> The difficulty arises because the cases decided before the Act displayed a somewhat greater reluctance to make a minor “restore” a sum of money than to return goods obtained by

<sup>41</sup> [1908] 2 K.B. 1; above, p.541.

<sup>42</sup> See below, pp.554–555.

<sup>43</sup> English law does not recognise any quasi-contractual claim for the recovery of chattels (as distinct from money): see Pomeroy v Wells (1778) 2 Cowp. 818. The only possible claim for chattels is in tort for wrongful interference with possession or with an immediate right to possession; and in the case put there would be no such claim as property in the goods would have passed to the minor.

<sup>44</sup> The Act contains no definition of property; contrast Theft Act 1968, s.4(1), expressly providing that “property” includes money. The 1987 Act refers to “property”, not to “goods”, so that the definitions referred to at pp.279–280 above are not relevant in the present context.

him under the contract<sup>45</sup>—apparently because a judgment against him to pay a sum of money was more likely than one for the return of goods to present the appearance of indirectly enforcing the contract. But those cases do not rule out the possibility of making the minor restore money,<sup>46</sup> at least where he was guilty of fraud, and s.3(1) seems to be intended to extend such liability to cases in which there was no fraud.<sup>47</sup> Moreover, it appears from the legislative history of the Act that s.3(1) is intended to produce the result that “the minor can be compelled to hand over the proceeds if he has sold the property<sup>48</sup>”; and, in the case of goods at least, the proceeds of a sale, by definition, consist of money.<sup>49</sup> This supports the view that the “property representing” the “property acquired” includes money; and if this is so, then it is submitted that the “property acquired” also includes money, since the word “property” must prima facie bear the same meaning in both the places in which it occurs in the subsection. Thus it is submitted that where a minor buys goods under a contract which is unenforceable against him by reason of his minority, and then sells them, he can be ordered to transfer the money to the seller; while if the minor borrows money under such a contract, and uses it to buy goods, he can be ordered to transfer those goods to the lender.

(b) DISCRETION OF THE COURT. S.3(1) does not entitle the other party to the transfer of the property as of right: it only provides that the court “may, if it is just and equitable to do so,” order the transfer. Of the factors which the court can take into account in exercising this discretion, two call for comment. The first is the difficulty, where the minor has disposed of the property acquired, of determining whether assets still owned by him are indeed “property representing” what he originally acquired. The process of “tracing” assets into their product can be complex<sup>50</sup>; and the court may restrict the operation of s.3(1) to cases in which it is relatively clear that the property which the minor is ordered to restore does indeed represent that acquired under the contract. To extend the operation of the subsection beyond this point would increase the danger that an order to transfer property (especially in the form of money) would amount to indirect enforcement of the contract against the minor. The operation of the equitable doctrine of restitution in cases of the minor’s fraud gave rise to a similar danger, and it was to avert this danger that the courts restricted the scope of that doctrine. The relevant equity cases are discussed below<sup>51</sup> (even though the equitable doctrine has lost much of its former practical importance) because it is submitted that they now provide guidance for the exercise of the statutory discretion. The second factor which the court might take into account is the fairness of the original contract: thus if the court regarded the price payable under the contract as too high it might order the minor to return the property unless he paid a reasonable price fixed by the court.<sup>52</sup> In failing to specify the circumstances and manner in which the discretion is to be exercised, the subsection no doubt gives rise to some uncertainty; but it avoids complexity. In the context, the balance that it thus strikes seems to be satisfactory, since the rules which govern a minor’s liability in

<sup>45</sup> See R Leslie Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 K.B. 607 (below, p.555); Cowern v Neild [1912] 2 K.B. 419 (below, p.556).

<sup>46</sup> See Stocks v Wilson [1913] 2 K.B. 235, below, p.555, and below, pp.556–557.

<sup>47</sup> See Law Com. No.134, para.4.21. The Act is based on this Report; for use of such materials to discover the mischief which the legislation was intended to cure, see M/S Aswan Engineering Establishment Co v Lupidine Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1 at 14. Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 857; Pepper v Hart [1993] A.C. 593 at 630, 635.

<sup>48</sup> Law Commission Report, above, n.47, para.4.21.

<sup>49</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.2(1) (“for a money consideration”).

<sup>50</sup> See Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (6th ed.), §§2–021 to 2–053.

<sup>51</sup> See below, pp.554–556.

<sup>52</sup> See the reference in para.4.21 of the Law Commission’s Report (above, n.47) to para.6.10 of the Commission’s earlier Working Paper No.81 on Minors’ Contracts.

restitution are not of a kind on which either party to the contract relies (or should be encouraged to rely) in conducting his business affairs.

(2) Effects of fraud

(a) COMMON LAW. At common law, a minor cannot be made liable on a contract merely because he has committed a fraud on the other party in inducing him to enter into the contract.<sup>53</sup> The other party can at most rely on the fraud as a defence or as a ground of rescission.<sup>54</sup>

(b) IN EQUITY. The common law rules just stated unduly favoured a class of minors that least deserved protection. Hence equity gave further relief against minors on the ground of fraud. For this purpose, it seems that fraud meant some misrepresentation by the minor as to his age, so that his mere failure to declare that he was under age did not amount to fraud<sup>55</sup>; nor was it fraud for him to keep, without paying, goods obtained by him under a contract which did not bind him.<sup>56</sup> Equitable relief on the ground of fraud took a number of forms.

(i) Restoration of benefits. Our principal concern is with the power of equity to order the fraudulent minor to restore benefits obtained under the contract.<sup>57</sup> The remedy, being equitable, was presumably discretionary,<sup>58</sup> and in this respect it resembles the statutory remedy now available under s.3(1) of the Minors' Contracts Act 1987.<sup>59</sup> On the other hand, the statutory remedy is in two respects more favourable to the adult than the old equitable remedy. First, the statutory remedy is available even though the minor was not guilty of fraud. Secondly, there is no doubt that the statutory remedy extends to the proceeds of the thing obtained under the contract,<sup>60</sup> while it was disputed whether the equitable remedy was available in respect of such proceeds.<sup>61</sup> Thus although the equitable remedy is one of those expressly preserved by the 1987 Act,<sup>62</sup> there seems to be no reason why the other party should wish to resort to it. It follows that questions as to the exact scope and extent of the equitable remedy no longer have any practical importance. The cases concerned with such questions are now useful only as providing illustrations of the factors that the courts may take into account in deciding whether to exercise their statutory discretion to order the minor to transfer property acquired under the contract, or property representing it. Two cases are of particular interest in this context.

<sup>53</sup> Bartlett v Wells (1862) 1 B. & S. 836; De Roo v Foster (1862) 12 C.B.(N.S.) 272; Miller v Blankley (1878) 38 L.T. 527; Levene v Brougham (1909) 25 T.L.R. 265; exceptionally a debt incurred by fraud can be proved in an uncontested bankruptcy: Re King (1858) 3 D. & J. 63.

<sup>54</sup> e.g. Lemprière v Lange (1879) 12 Ch.D. 675. No attempt seems to have been made in the cases to argue that the adult could, by rescinding the contract for fraud, avoid the minor's title at law (cf. above, pp.371–372). Quære whether the court could award damages in lieu of rescission against a minor under s.2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967 (above, p.357). To do this might amount to indirect enforcement of the contract in the sense discussed at p.555, below.

<sup>55</sup> For the definition of fraud, see above, p.343. In equity a person could be guilty of fraud even though he had no "actual intention to cheat": Nocton v Ashburton [1914] A.C. 932 at 954; but in the present context a number of cases state the requirement of a misrepresentation as to age: Strikeman v Dawson (1847) 1 De G. & Sm. 90 at 103; Ex p. Jones (1881) 18 Cl.L.D. 109 at 120; Re Hodson [1894] 2 Ch. 421 at 427.

<sup>56</sup> This must have been assumed in Nash v Inman [1908] 2 K.B. 1; for the contrary view, see Atiyah, 22 M.L.R. 273 at 275. Because of the Minors' Contracts Act 1987, s.3(1), the point no longer has any practical importance: see below, after n.62.

<sup>57</sup> e.g. Clarke v Cobley (1789) 2 Cox 173.

<sup>58</sup> cf. above, pp.319, 321 and see p.378; below, pp.1026, 1040.

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.551.

<sup>60</sup> See the words "any property representing it" in s.3(1): above, p.552.

<sup>61</sup> See below, at nn.63 to 70.

<sup>62</sup> s.3(2).

The first is Stocks v Wilson<sup>63</sup> where a minor had obtained goods under a contract induced by fraud and had disposed of some of those goods. He was held liable to account<sup>64</sup> to the original seller for the proceeds of the goods. The second, contrasting, case is R Leslie Ltd v Sheill<sup>65</sup> where a minor had by fraud obtained a loan of £400 and was held not liable in equity to restore the money. Lord Sumner said: "the money was paid over to be used as the defendant's own and he has so used it, and, I suppose, spent it. There is no question of tracing it, no possibility of restoring the very thing got by fraud, nothing but compulsion through a personal judgment to pay an equivalent sum out of his present or future resources. . . ."<sup>66</sup>

The crucial point in R Leslie Ltd v Sheill was that there was no question of tracing the money, that is of showing that it, or some asset representing it, was still in the hands of the minor. If he had still got the £400 he could have been made to restore it in equity<sup>67</sup>; and if he had used the £400 to buy a car he could have been ordered to hand the car over to the lender.<sup>68</sup> An order to "transfer . . . property" could now be made in such circumstances under s.3(1) of the 1987 Act, even in the absence of fraud.<sup>69</sup> Conversely, in a case like Stocks v Wilson the minor could, under the subsection, be ordered to transfer the proceeds of sale if they could be identified as "property representing" the goods.<sup>70</sup> It is submitted that such an order could be made even if the minor had happened to resell the goods for the exact equivalent of the contract price. It is no objection to a claim for restitution that it leads to the same measure of recovery as an action on the contract. To order a minor to pay such an amount (or any amount) becomes objectionable only on account of the nature of the judgment: that is, if the judgment is, in Lord Sumner's words, "a personal judgment to pay an equivalent sum out of his present or future resources". The only type of order that can be made against the minor is one to restore the property acquired, or its proceeds, in equity, or to transfer it under s.3(1). He cannot be made liable to pay for the property acquired or to account for its proceeds by a personal judgment enforceable against his general assets. This point seems to have been overlooked in Stocks v Wilson where the court ordered the minor to account for the proceeds of sale without enquiring whether those proceeds were still in the hands of the minor.<sup>71</sup> The purpose of the equitable and statutory remedies is to ensure that the minor is not enriched as a result of the transaction which is not binding on him; but the remedy should not diminish such general resources as he had apart from the transaction. It follows that the remedies are limited by the value of the property in the hands of the minor at the time of judgment. If by then the minor has dissipated part of the property (or its proceeds) the remedy is available only in respect of the remainder.

(ii) Other forms of relief. Equity gives relief against fraudulent minors in a number of other ways. It has, for example, been held that a minor who obtained payment of a share in a trust fund by fraudulently pretending to be of age could not claim a second payment

<sup>63</sup> [1913] 2 K.B. 235.

<sup>64</sup> ibid. at 247—a passage criticised in R Leslie Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 K.B. 607.

<sup>65</sup> See above.

<sup>66</sup> [1914] 3 K.B. 607 at 619.

<sup>67</sup> There would have been, in Lord Sumner's words (above, at n.66), a "possibility of restoring the very thing got by fraud."

<sup>68</sup> It is assumed that the money lent could be "traced" into the car, within Lord Sumner's words (above, at n.66).

<sup>69</sup> See above, pp.551–552.

<sup>70</sup> See above, pp.551–552.

<sup>71</sup> In Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC [1996] A.C. 669 at 716 Lord Browne-Wilkinson refers with evident approval to Stocks v Wilson but treats it as a case in which the minor was "bound in equity to restore" property obtained by fraud.

on reaching full age<sup>72</sup>; and that a minor remainderman who by fraud enabled the tenant for life to mortgage the estate could not, when the estate vested in him, deny the validity of the charge.<sup>73</sup> These cases do not call for extended discussion here as they are not directly connected with the law of contract. It has been further suggested that equity recognised a broad principle of relief: viz. that if a minor sued without offering to pay he would be guilty of "fraud" which would give the adult an equitable defence,<sup>74</sup> even (apparently) where, under the contract, payment from the minor was not due until after the adult's performance. But the authorities do not support such a broad definition of "fraud": on the contrary, they support the view that, even in equity, relief is available to the other party only where the minor's "fraud" takes the form of a misrepresentation by him as to his age.<sup>75</sup>

(3) Liability in restitution at common law

In certain circumstances a minor who has obtained benefits at the expense of an adult may be liable to make restitution to the adult at common law. This remedy is available as of right, and it is expressly preserved by s.3(2) of the Minor's Contracts Act 1987.

It is illustrated by cases of so-called waiver of tort, in which the victim of a fraud (and of certain other torts) can claim restitution in respect of certain benefits obtained by the tortfeasor. Such an action lies against a minor if he would have been liable to the direct action in tort. Thus it was available in Bristow v Eastman,<sup>76</sup> where an apprentice, while under age, had embezzled<sup>77</sup> his master's property.

But the courts will not allow a minor's lack of contractual capacity to be circumvented by means of such a restitutionary action. Thus in R Leslie Ltd v Sheill the lenders made an alternative claim that the minor was liable to repay the money lent as money had and received to their use. This claim also failed as "the cause of action is in substance ex contractu and is so directly connected with the contract of loan that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing that contract".<sup>78</sup> Here again the decisive objection is not that the measure of liability may be the same in a restitutionary action as in one for breach of contract: the crucial point is that, where the money had been spent, the only possible effect of the judgment in either kind of action would be to impose personal liability on the minor, enforceable against his assets generally.<sup>79</sup>

Much difficulty is caused by Comern v Nield.<sup>80</sup> A minor who was a trader sold hay and clover, and was paid in advance. He failed to deliver any hay, and the clover which he delivered was defective, so that the buyer justifiably rejected it. As the contract was a trading contract, the buyer's claim for damages failed; and his claim for the return of the money that he had paid was also rejected. The court took the view that such a claim could have succeeded if the minor had obtained the money by fraud, and therefore ordered a new trial on the issue of fraud. But this view is, with respect, open to doubt. A minor cannot be made liable in restitution if "the action would be an indirect way of enforcing [the invalid] contract".<sup>81</sup> If (contrary to the submission made above) this

<sup>72</sup> Cory v Gertken (1816) 2 Madd. 40.

<sup>73</sup> Hatts v Cresswell (1714) 2 Eq.Ca.Abr. 515.

<sup>74</sup> Atiyah, 22 M.L.R. 273.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.554.

<sup>76</sup> (1794) 1 Esp. 172. "Even this has been doubted": per Lord Sumner in R Leslie Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 K.B. 607 at 613.

<sup>77</sup> Such conduct would now be theft under Theft Act 1968, s.15.

<sup>78</sup> [1914] 3 K.B. at 621; cf. p.613.

<sup>79</sup> cf. above, p.555.

<sup>80</sup> [1912] 2 K.B. 419.

<sup>81</sup> R Leslie Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 K.B. 607 at 621.

means that the judgment must not impose the same measure of liability as a judgment in action for breach of contract, then the action for the return of the price should have succeeded in Comern v Nield irrespective of fraud. For the minor's duty under the contract was to deliver the goods, and the damages for their non-delivery might have been quite different from the price. But if (as seems more probable) indirect enforcement refers to the imposition of personal liability on the minor, the action should not have succeeded merely on proof of fraud. The minor should have been liable only to the extent that the money or its identifiable proceeds were still in his hands. Under s.3(1) of the Minors' Contracts Act 1987 the court could now order the minor to transfer such money, or property representing it, to the buyer, irrespective of fraud; but that remedy is discretionary, so that the buyer might prefer to pursue his restitutionary remedy at common law, as this is available as of right.

SECTION 2. MENTAL PATIENTS<sup>82</sup>

The law relating to contracts with persons suffering from mental disorder represents a compromise between two principles. The first is that such a person should not be liable on his contracts if he is incapable of intelligent consent. The second is that it might cause hardship to one contracting party to allow the other to "stultify himself".<sup>83</sup>

1. In General<sup>84</sup>

A contract with a mental patient is valid, except in two cases:

(1) Disability known to other party

If the other contracting party knows of the patient's disability, the contract is voidable at the patient's option.<sup>85</sup> The burden is on the patient to show that his disability prevented him from understanding the transaction,<sup>86</sup> and that the other party knew this. It seems that the patient becomes absolutely bound if he ratifies the contract after he is cured.<sup>87</sup> There is also some support for the view that the contract is binding so long as it was a fair one, even though the disability of one party was known to the other.<sup>88</sup>

Where the other party does not know of the patient's disability, the contract is valid: it cannot be attacked merely on the ground that it was "unfair" in the sense that its terms were more favourable to the other party than they were to the party under the disability.<sup>89</sup> The contract can be attacked on the ground of "unfairness" only (if at all) where if the circumstances are such that the party under the disability can rely, like a person of normal capacity, on the equitable rules relating to undue influence or unconscionable bargains.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>82</sup> A convenient, if slightly inaccurate, term to describe a person suffering from mental disorder within the Mental Health Act 1983.

<sup>83</sup> Beverley's Case (1603) 4 Co.Rep. 123b.

<sup>84</sup> Hudson [1984] Conv. 32.

<sup>85</sup> Molton v Camroux (1849) 4 Ex. 17; Imperial Loan Co v Stone [1892] 1 Q.B. 599.

<sup>86</sup> Re K [1988] Ch. 310, below, p.752.

<sup>87</sup> Birkin v Wing (1890) 63 L.T. 80; Manches v Trimborn (1946) 115 L.J.K.B. 305.

<sup>88</sup> Dane v Kirkwall (1838) 8 C. & P. 679.

<sup>89</sup> Hart v O'Connor [1985] A.C. 1000; Irvani v Irvani [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 420.

<sup>90</sup> See above, pp.408–423.

(2) Property subject to control of the court<sup>91</sup>

If the patient is one whose property is subject to the control of the court<sup>92</sup> an attempt by him to dispose of the property does not bind him, since, if it did bind him, it would interfere with the court's control over the property.<sup>93</sup> But the contract binds the other party.<sup>94</sup>

The rule that the contract does not bind the patient clearly applies to any contract which purports to dispose of the patient's property. But it is not clear whether the rule applies only to such contracts, or whether it extends to all contracts with mental patients whose property is subject to the control of the court. On the one hand it can be argued that every contract creates a potential liability to pay money and thus interferes with the court's control over the property. On the other hand there are some negative contracts which can be enforced by injunction against the patient's person which need not interfere with his property. There is no reason, on principle, why such contracts should not be enforced in this way. The question is largely academic as the court only exercises control over the property in cases of serious disorder. The other party will generally know of such disorder and his claim will fail on this ground.

2. Necessaries

S.3(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 provides that "where necessaries are sold and delivered . . . to a person who by reason of mental incapacity . . . is incompetent to contract, he must pay a reasonable price for them." As a mental patient is by no means always "incompetent to contract" two situations must be considered.

If the patient would be bound by the contract under the rules stated above, his liability for necessaries is not affected by s.3(2). Thus a person who sells and delivers necessaries to the patient without knowing of his disorder can enforce the contract<sup>95</sup>; he is not limited to an action for a reasonable price.

If the patient would not be bound by the contract under the rules stated above, he is liable under s.3(2). Thus a person who sells and delivers necessaries to the patient knowing of his disorder cannot enforce the contract: he can only recover a reasonable price.

S.3(2) applies "where necessaries are sold and delivered" to the patient. These words are scarcely appropriate where necessaries are simply supplied to a patient whose disorder is so serious that he has no capacity for rational thought; or where a patient in this condition is simply maintained at the expense of another person. In such cases the person who supplies or pays for the necessaries has a remedy at common law under the doctrine of agency of necessity<sup>96</sup> unless he acted gratuitously, without thought of recompense.<sup>97</sup>

We have seen that, in the case of minors, "necessaries" can include services no less than goods<sup>98</sup>; and the same principle can apply in the case of mental patients. For example, medical treatment supplied to such a person can be a necessary. Two questions arise in relation to such services. The first is, whether the treatment is lawful even

<sup>91</sup> Jennings, 23 M.L.R. 421; Fridman, 79 L.Q.R. 509–516.

<sup>92</sup> Under Part VII of the Mental Health Act 1983.

<sup>93</sup> Re Walker [1905] 1 Ch. 160; Re Marshall [1920] 1 Ch. 284.

<sup>94</sup> cf. Baldwin v Smith [1900] 1 Ch. 588.

<sup>95</sup> Baxter v Portsmouth (1826) 5 B. & C. 170.

<sup>96</sup> Brockwell v Bullock (1889) 22 Q.B.1D. 567; Pontypridd Union v Drem [1927] 1 K.B. 214 at 220; see also Re Rhodes (1889) 44 Ch.1D. 94 and below, p.721.

<sup>97</sup> Re Rhodes, above.

<sup>98</sup> See above, p.541.

though the patient lacks the capacity to consent to it. This question arose in Re F<sup>99</sup> where it was held that a sterilisation operation could lawfully be carried on on a mental patient if it was necessary to save her life or to secure an improvement in (or to prevent deterioration of) her health. If the patient refuses the treatment, a higher degree of understanding of the nature and consequences of the treatment appears to be required to make the refusal effective (and hence the treatment unlawful) than would be required for the purpose of contractual capacity.<sup>1</sup> The second question is whether the person providing the treatment is entitled to be paid for it. This question does not normally arise where the treatment is carried out under the National Health Service<sup>2</sup>; but it seems that, if necessary services are rendered to a mental patient in circumstances in which a charge would normally be made for them, the person rendering them would be entitled to a reasonable remuneration for them.

A person who lends money to a mental patient knowing of his disorder cannot enforce the contract, but can recover so much of the money as has actually been spent on necessities.<sup>3</sup>

SECTION 3. DRINK AND DRUGS

Extreme drunkenness is a defence to an action on a contract if it prevents the defendant from understanding the transaction, and if the claimant knows this.<sup>4</sup> The drunkard is liable if he ratifies the contract when he becomes sober.<sup>5</sup> He is also liable for necessities<sup>6</sup> in the same way as a mental patient.

A defendant cannot rely at law on drunkenness which merely blurred his business sense: but such drunkenness is a ground on which equity may refuse to order specific performance.<sup>7</sup> Nor does a party's habitual drunkenness deprive him of contractual capacity<sup>8</sup> but it could be a ground for relief if the other party had taken over the position of guardian or adviser to the drunkard so as to give rise to a presumption of undue influence between them.<sup>9</sup>

The rules relating to drunkenness could perhaps be applied by analogy to the case of a person whose ability to understand the transaction was impaired by drugs.<sup>10</sup> Such impairment may, indeed, have been brought about by the illegal conduct of that party but this fact should not preclude reliance on the impairment (if known to the other party) since this course of action would not amount either to reliance on the illegality or to enforcement of the contract. Nor is there any good reason for denying a remedy to a supplier of necessities to such a person, at least where (as will often be the case) the supplier has no connection with the illegality and seeks merely to alleviate the effect of the drugs.

<sup>99</sup> [1990] 2 A.C. 1; cf. Simms v Simms [2002] EWHC 2734 (Fam), [2003] 1 All E.R. 669.

<sup>1</sup> Re C (Adult: Refusal of Medical Treatment) [1994] 1 W.L.R. 290 at 295; Re B (adult: refusal of medical treatment) [2002] EWHC 429, Fam; [2000] 1 All E.R. 449, where the patients did have sufficient mental capacity to refuse consent.

<sup>2</sup> [1990] 2 A.C. at p.74. For statutory provisions relating to payment of National Health charges in respect of a "traffic casualty", see Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999, s.1.

<sup>3</sup> Re Beavan [1912] 1 Ch. 196.

<sup>4</sup> Gore v Gibson (1843) 13 M. & W. 623.

<sup>5</sup> Matthews v Baxter (1873) L.R. 8 Ex. 132.

<sup>6</sup> Gore v Gibson, above, at p.626; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.3(2).

<sup>7</sup> See below, p.1027.

<sup>8</sup> Irvani v Irvani [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 at 425.

<sup>9</sup> ibid.; above, pp.412–414.

<sup>10</sup> The mere fact that a person was an habitual drug addict does not suffice for this purpose: see Irvani v Irvani, above, at 425.

SECTION 4. CORPORATIONS

1. Common Law Corporations

Corporations are created at common law by Royal Charter. The orthodox view is that a common law corporation has the same contractual capacity as a natural person of full age and capacity. Although this view is based only on dicta,<sup>11</sup> which have been doubted,<sup>12</sup> it is probably good law. Thus a contract with such a corporation is binding although it is forbidden, or not authorised, by its charter. But if the corporation makes such a contract the Attorney-General can take proceedings for the revocation of its charter; and any member of the corporation can restrain it by injunction from carrying on a forbidden activity which may lead to the revocation of its charter,<sup>13</sup> or claim a declaration that the activity is ultra vires.<sup>14</sup>

2. Statutory Corporations

Statutory corporations can be created in two ways: first, by complying with the formalities required by statute; and secondly, by special statute, passed to create the particular corporation in question. Since 1862, most trading companies have been created in the first of these two ways; the principal Act now in force is the Companies Act 1985.

(1) Companies created under the Companies Acts

(a) INTRODUCTION. When a company is incorporated under the Companies Acts, the objects for which it is formed must be stated in its memorandum of association.<sup>15</sup> The contractual capacity of the company was formerly limited by the ultra vires doctrine, under which any act which was not authorised by the memorandum was void in law; and, being a nullity, it could not be ratified even by a unanimous vote of the company's shareholders.<sup>16</sup> It followed that the company was not liable on a contract which was not authorised by its memorandum. The primary purpose of the doctrine was to protect investors in the company by giving them some assurance that the assets of the company would not be used in some wholly unexpected way. On the other hand, a person who made a contract with the company was liable to be prejudiced by the doctrine, since he was unlikely to have read the company's memorandum, or (if he had read it) to have understood it. The doctrine could also prejudice the company itself by preventing it from taking advantage of business opportunities which (perhaps as a result of a defect in drafting) fell technically outside its objects. The company could to some extent avoid this prejudice by altering its objects, but its power to make such alterations could be exercised only for seven specified purposes.<sup>17</sup> It could also draw its objects clause in very

<sup>11</sup> Case of Sutton's Hospital (1613) 10 Co.Rep. 1, 30b; Wenlock v River Dee Co (1885) 36 Ch.D. 374 at 385; British S. Africa Co v De Beers Consolidated Mines [1910] 1 Ch. 354 at 374; Jenkin v Pharmaceutical Society [1921] 1 Ch. 392 at 398; Institution of Mechanical Engineers v Cane [1961] A.C. 696 at 724; Hazell v Hammersmith & Fulham LBC [1992] 2 A.C. 1 at 39. Furmston, 24 M.L.R. 518. See also Ayers v South Australia Banking Co (1868) L.R. 3 P.C. 548, which appears to assume the correctness of the generally accepted view; the point is left open in Crédit Suisse v Allerdale B.C. [1997] Q.B. 306 at 336. For the possibility that the powers of a charter corporation may be restricted by special legislation, see below, p.564.

<sup>12</sup> e.g. Holdsworth, History of English Law, Vol.9, pp.55–66; Street, Ultra Vires, pp.18–22; Carden, 26 L.Q.R. 320.

<sup>13</sup> Jenkin v Pharmaceutical Society [1921] 1 Ch. 392.

<sup>14</sup> Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Dickson [1970] A.C. 403.

<sup>15</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.2(1)(c).

<sup>16</sup> Ashbury Ry Carriage & Iron Co v Riche (1875) L.R. 7 H.L. 653.

<sup>17</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.4 (original version), replaced by the provision referred to at n.22, below.

wide terms, enabling it to do almost any act which could be done by a company<sup>18</sup>; but such very widely drawn clauses tended to be restrictively interpreted by the courts,<sup>19</sup> since they made the protection which the ultra vires doctrine was intended to give to shareholders quite illusory.

(b) THE 1989 REFORMS. The effects of the ultra vires doctrine, as described above, were subjected to much criticism<sup>20</sup> and significant reforms were introduced by the Companies Act 1989, which inserted a number of new sections into the Companies Act 1985.

In discussing these reforms, two preliminary points should be noted. First, it is now possible to state the object of a company to be “to carry on business as a general commercial company”. The object of the company will then be “to carry on any trade or business whatsoever” and also to do “all such things as are incidental or conducive to carrying on any trade or business by it”.<sup>21</sup> The ultra vires doctrine can have very little scope in the case of a company with such an objects clause. Secondly, a company can now alter its objects for any purpose whatsoever, and not only for the seven purposes for which it could formerly do so.<sup>22</sup>

The legal effects of acts done by the company which are not authorised by its memorandum are dealt with by two new sections (35 and 35A) inserted in 1989<sup>23</sup> into the Companies Act 1985. These two sections are based on a distinction which was recognised in the previous English case law,<sup>24</sup> and was also drawn in an EC Council Directive,<sup>25</sup> implemented by the 1989 Act, between the capacity of the company and the powers of the board of directors to bind it. The new sections alleviate the hardship which the ultra vires doctrine formerly caused to persons who dealt with the company, while retaining some degree of protection for its shareholders.

(i) The company's capacity. So far as the company's capacity is concerned, the new s.35(1) of the 1985 Act provides that the validity of any act done by a company is not (as a general rule<sup>26</sup>) to be called into question on the ground of lack of the company's capacity by reason of anything in (or, presumably, not in) its memorandum. The argument that a contract is void for lack of capacity if it is not authorised by the memorandum is thus no longer available. S.35(1) will generally operate in favour of persons who enter into contracts with the company, which can no longer rely on its own lack of capacity (by reason of the provisions of the memorandum) against such persons. It is equally true that these persons cannot rely on such lack of capacity against the company.<sup>27</sup>

Members of the company are, in turn, protected by s.35(2), which gives them the right to bring proceedings to restrain the doing of an act which would (but for s.35(1)) be

<sup>18</sup> Cotman v Brougham [1918] A.C. 514; Re Horsley & Weight Ltd [1982] Ch. 442; Brady v Brady [1989] A.C. 755 at 772.

<sup>19</sup> e.g. Rolled Steel (Holdings) Ltd v BSC [1986] Ch. 246, drawing the distinction referred to at n.24, below.

<sup>20</sup> See especially Prentice, Reform of the Ultra Vires Rule, a consultative paper issued by the Department of Trade and Industry in 1986.

<sup>21</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.3A, as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.110(1).

<sup>22</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.4, as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.110(2). In the case of charitable companies, alterations of the memorandum, and of certain provisions of the articles, of association require the consent of the Charity Commissioners: Charities Act 1993, s.64.

<sup>23</sup> By Companies Act 1989, s.108(1).

<sup>24</sup> Rolled Steel (Holdings) Ltd v BSC [1986] Ch. 246.

<sup>25</sup> Dir.68/151 Art.9. For the construction of legislation based on such directives, see above p.267, n.29.

<sup>26</sup> For exceptions, see Companies Act 1985, s.35(4) (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1) and amended by Charities Act 1993, s.98(1), and Sch.6, para.20) and Charities Act 1993, s.65 (charitable companies and certain transactions with directors).

<sup>27</sup> The phrase “shall not be called into question” in s.35(1) applies equally to both parties. Contrast the wording of s.35A(1), set out at n.31, below.

beyond the company's capacity.<sup>28</sup> But no such proceedings lie in respect of an act to be done in the fulfilment of a legal obligation arising from a previous act of the company, so that proceedings under subs.(2) cannot be brought to prevent the performance of a contract which cannot be called into question on the ground of lack of capacity by virtue of subs.(1). Members of the company are further protected by s.35(3), by which it remains the duty of directors to observe any limitation on their powers flowing from the company's memorandum. An act which transgresses these limitations can indeed be ratified by the company by special resolution, but a separate special resolution is required to relieve the directors from liability in respect of the act.<sup>29</sup>

(ii) The powers of the directors. Where a contract is not within the objects clause of the memorandum, the mere fact that it cannot be called into question on the ground of lack of capacity will not enable a person who deals with the company to enforce it; for the making of such an unauthorised contract is necessarily beyond the powers of the directors. Further protection to such a person is therefore given by the new s.35A(1) of the 1985 Act. This provides that, "In favour of a person dealing with a company in good faith, the power of the board of directors to bind the company, or to authorise others to do so, shall [as a general rule<sup>30</sup>] be deemed to be free of any limitation under the company's constitution".<sup>31</sup> The person who deals with the company is not bound to enquire whether the transaction is permitted by the memorandum or whether the power of the directors to bind the company or to authorise others to do so is limited.<sup>32</sup> He is presumed to have acted in good faith until the contrary is proved<sup>33</sup>; and he is not to be regarded as acting in bad faith "by reason only of his knowing that an act is beyond the powers of the directors under the company's constitution."<sup>34</sup> This provision allows for the possibility that it may be in the interests of the company to take advantage of a commercial opportunity by entering into a contract which is technically not within its objects. On the other hand, a person would presumably not be dealing with the company in good faith if the transaction in question was not only beyond the powers of the directors but also constituted a breach of their fiduciary duty to it, or was otherwise a collusive attempt on the part of the directors and the person dealing with the company to act in a way that was contrary to the interests of the company. In such a case the fact that a contract was not authorised by the company's memorandum would not, indeed, make it open to challenge on the ground of lack of capacity; but by reason of the element of bad faith the contract would be unenforceable as it was beyond the directors' powers, and it would not be saved by s.35A(1).

Persons who deal with the company are further protected by s.35A(5) which provides that s.35A(1) does not affect any liability incurred by the directors to persons other than members of the company by reason of the directors' exceeding their powers. Where the company is liable by virtue of subs.(1), such liability is unlikely to be incurred by the directors<sup>35</sup>; though it is possible for a director to undertake additional personal liability under a collateral contract. Where the company is not liable because the person dealing

<sup>28</sup> cf. the position in the case of charter corporations, above, p.560 at n.13.

<sup>29</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35(3) (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1)).

<sup>30</sup> ibid. s.35A(6) (as amended by Charities Act 1993, s.98(1) and Sch.6, para.20) and Charities Act 1993, s.65 (excepting charitable companies and certain transactions with directors).

<sup>31</sup> "Limitation under the company's constitution" is broadly defined in s.35A(3) and includes, inter alia, a limitation derived from a resolution of the company in general meeting.

<sup>32</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35B, and see also s.711A (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, ss.108(1) and 142(1)).

<sup>33</sup> ibid. s.35A(2)(c).

<sup>34</sup> ibid. s.35A(2)(b) (italics supplied).

<sup>35</sup> e.g. the remedy for breach of warranty of authority (below, p.565) would not be available if the contract bound the company under s.35A(1): see below, p.739.

with it did so in bad faith, a claim against the directors is unlikely to succeed: it would probably be dismissed on the analogy of the rule that a contract to defraud a third party (i.e. the company) is illegal and void.<sup>36</sup>

Members of the company are protected in that they can bring proceedings to restrain the doing of an act which is beyond the powers of the directors.<sup>37</sup> But no such proceedings lie “in respect of an act to be done in fulfilment of a legal obligation arising from a previous act of the company”.<sup>38</sup> Presumably it follows that proceedings cannot be brought to restrain a company from performing a contract which a person dealing with the company could enforce against it under s.35A(1). It seems that such a contract will, by virtue of that subsection, be deemed to be an “act of the company” even though the directors actually had no power to enter into it on the company’s behalf.

S.35A(1) only operates “in favour of a person dealing with” the company. It therefore does not confer rights on the company. The company can however acquire such rights by ratifying the transaction.<sup>39</sup>

(2) Limited Liability Partnerships

The Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000 makes provision<sup>40</sup> for the incorporation of limited liability partnerships by registration of specified documents. Such a partnership is “a body corporate (with legal personality separate from its members)”<sup>41</sup> and “has unlimited capacity”.<sup>42</sup> The ultra vires doctrine therefore does not apply to it.

(3) Corporations incorporated by special statute

The ultra vires doctrine was originally established in relation to such corporations.<sup>43</sup> With respect to them, it is not affected by the reforms which have been described above,<sup>44</sup> though it has been mitigated with respect to certain contracts made by local authorities.<sup>45</sup> Before any of these reforms came into force, many of the rules which determine the scope and effects of the doctrine were laid down in cases arising out of contracts with companies incorporated under the Companies Acts (or with local authorities). These cases are obsolete now that the common law doctrine no longer invalidates such contracts (or has been mitigated with respect to them). But the principles stated in them can still (where appropriate) apply to transactions with other corporations which are created, or whose capacity is limited, by special statute. For this reason, the following account is to some extent based on such cases.

(a) THE ULTRA VIRES DOCTRINE. The contractual capacity of a corporation created by special statute continues, in general,<sup>46</sup> to be restricted by the ultra vires doctrine. The objects of such a corporation are set out in the statute by which it was created (or in rules made in pursuance of that statute). Any act done by or on behalf of the corporation which is not authorised by (or under) the incorporating statute is ultra vires and

<sup>36</sup> See above, p.432.

<sup>37</sup> s.35A(4).

<sup>38</sup> ibid.

<sup>39</sup> Grant v U.K. Smithback Ry (1888) 40 Ch.D. 135.

<sup>40</sup> Limited Liability Partnerships Act, s.2.

<sup>41</sup> ibid., s.1(2). The general law relating to other partnerships (which do not have legal personality separate from their members) does not apply to limited liability partnerships: ibid., s.1(5).

<sup>42</sup> ibid., s.1(3).

<sup>43</sup> See Eastern Counties Ry v Hames (1855) 5 H.L.C. 331 at 347–348 (citing earlier cases).

<sup>44</sup> See above, pp.561–563; Crédit Suisse v Allerdale Borough Council [1997] Q.B. 306.

<sup>45</sup> Local Government (Contracts) Act 1997.

<sup>46</sup> For a statutory exception, see n.45, above.

ineffective. It follows that an ultra vires contract made by such a corporation does not bind the corporation. The corporation can also be restrained from doing ultra vires acts.<sup>47</sup> The same rules apply where the corporation has been created in some other way (e.g. by Royal Charter) but its capacity is nevertheless defined or limited by statute.<sup>48</sup>

(i) Whether transaction is ultra vires. The question whether a particular transaction falls within the powers of the corporation turns in the first place on the construction of the statute<sup>49</sup> by which it is incorporated, or which otherwise defines or limits its capacity. Particular difficulty can arise where the statute, after setting out the specific objects for which the corporation is created, goes on to confer a general power to do other acts which it is necessary or desirable for the company to do in order to achieve these objects. When the ultra vires doctrine applied to companies incorporated under the Companies Acts, the courts were faced with similar difficulties arising from analogous, broadly drafted, provisions in memoranda of association.<sup>50</sup> In deciding questions of this kind, they distinguished between the objects of a company and its powers. They went on to hold that, although powers could be exercised only for the purpose of the objects, their exercise for other purposes was not ultra vires but only beyond the powers of the directors; and that their exercise for other purposes could not confer rights on the other party to the transaction if he had notice of the fact that the powers had been so exercised.<sup>51</sup> It is arguable that the same distinction between objects and powers may apply where the officers of a corporation, whose capacity is defined by the incorporating statute, purport to exercise a general power (conferred by the statute) but do so for the purpose of achieving unauthorised objects: e.g. where they give a guarantee and it is alleged that the transaction in respect of which it is given is not an authorised object.<sup>52</sup> In the last resort, however, the question in cases of the present kind turns simply on the construction of the relevant legislation. Thus where the corporation was empowered to do "anything . . . which in its opinion is calculated to facilitate the proper discharge of its functions or is incidental or conducive thereto," it was held that a guarantee given by the corporation could not be challenged on the ground that it was ultra vires.<sup>53</sup>

(ii) Incidental objects. Even in the absence of widely drafted provisions of the kind just discussed, a corporation can do acts which it is not expressly authorised to do, if they are fairly incidental to the objects for which it was established. For example, in Foster v London, Dover & Chatham Ry<sup>54</sup> it was held that a railway company could validly grant short leases of the spaces under the arches of a viaduct, so long as those leases did not disable it from carrying on its railway business. But this rule does not enable the corporation to carry on activities substantially distinct from those authorised: thus a corporation authorised to run trams could not "incidentally" run buses.<sup>55</sup>

<sup>47</sup> e.g. L.C.C. v Attorney-General [1902] A.C. 165.

<sup>48</sup> e.g. Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham LBC [1992] 2 A.C. 1.

<sup>49</sup> Den Norske Creditbank v The Sarawak Economic Development Corp [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 616.

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.561, n.18.

<sup>51</sup> Rolled Steel Products (Holdings) Ltd v BSC [1986] Ch. 246; cf. above, p.561 at n.24. See also Introductions Ltd v National Provincial Bank Ltd [1970] Ch. 119; Wedderburn, 32 M.L.R. 563; 46 M.L.R. 204; Gregory, 48 M.J.R. 109.

<sup>52</sup> Crédit Suisse v Allerdale BC [1997] Q.B. 306; Crédit Suisse v Waltham Forest LBC [1997] Q.B. 362; Sutton LBC v Morgan Grenfell & Co (1997) 29 H.L.R. 608; in all these cases, the guarantees were held void.

<sup>53</sup> Den Norske Creditbank v The Sarawak Economic Development Corp [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 616 (where the incorporating legislation was a Malaysian Ordinance).

<sup>54</sup> [1895] 1 Q.B. 711; cf. Charles Roberts & Co v British Railways Board [1965] 1 W.L.R. 396; and, in the case of certain companies incorporated under the Companies Acts, Companies Act 1985, s.3A(b), as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.110(1).

<sup>55</sup> LCC v Attorney-General [1902] A.C. 165; cf. Hazell v Hammersmith & Fulham LBC [1992] 2 A.C. 1.

(iii) Contracts ex facie intra vires. A contract which is ex facie within the capacity of the corporation is not invalid merely because the corporation uses its proceeds for an ultra vires purpose: e.g. where an intra vires loan is spent on an ultra vires purpose.<sup>56</sup> But the corporation would not be bound by the contract if the lender knew that it intended to use the loan for such a purpose, or if he knew facts from which he could reasonably have deduced that the corporation had such an intention.<sup>57</sup>

(b) ALTERNATIVE REMEDIES. Where a transaction with a corporation is ultra vires, its invalidity can be a source of hardship to the other party: that party will, for example, have no remedy against the corporation if the corporation defaults on a transaction which has, by reason of market fluctuations, turned out to be disadvantageous to the corporation.<sup>58</sup> In theory, the other party can protect himself against this risk, before entering into the transaction, by reading the statute which defines or limits the corporation's powers. But in practice the other party is unlikely to take this step; and, even if he does take it, he runs the risk that his interpretation of the statute may, in legal proceedings on the contract, be held to have been erroneous. The law to some extent mitigates this hardship by making a number of alternative remedies available to the other party to the transaction.

(i) Subrogation. An ultra vires lender can recover so much of his loan as is used by the company to pay debts incurred under intra vires contracts.<sup>59</sup>

(ii) Return of money. Money paid under an ultra vires contract is normally recoverable as money paid under a void contract.<sup>60</sup> This remedy is more fully discussed in Chapter 22.<sup>61</sup>

(iii) Remedy against officers. A person who is induced to contract with a corporation by the false representation of a director that the contract is intra vires may be able to sue the director in tort for deceit or negligence,<sup>62</sup> or in contract for breach of implied warranty of authority.<sup>63</sup> The contractual action lies even though the representation was made innocently and in good faith.<sup>64</sup> It has been held that this remedy is not available if the misrepresentation is one of law<sup>65</sup>; though for reasons given in Chapter 9 the present status of this restriction on the scope of the remedy is open to question.<sup>66</sup> The construction of the company's incorporating statute is a matter of law,<sup>67</sup> so that a director who represents that, on the true construction of the statute, a contract is intra vires, makes a representation of law.

An ultra vires contractor may, finally, be able to show that the director is personally liable on the contract itself. Intention on the part of an agent to assume personal liability

<sup>56</sup> Re David Payne & Co Ltd [1904] 2 Ch. 608.

<sup>57</sup> Re Jon Beauforte Ltd [1953] Ch. 131; cf. Introductions Ltd v National Provincial Bank Ltd [1970] Ch. 199.

<sup>58</sup> e.g. Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham Borough Council [1992] 2 A.C. 1.

<sup>59</sup> Blackburn BS v Cunliffe, Brooks & Co (1882) 22 Ch.D. 61; on appeal it was not necessary to decide this point: 9 App.Cas. 857.

<sup>60</sup> Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] A.C. 669 disagreeing with Sinclair v Brougham [1914] A.C. 938 so far as contra.

<sup>61</sup> See below, p.1057.

<sup>62</sup> At common law, but not under s.2(1) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967; see above, p.351 at n.98.

<sup>63</sup> See below, p.738.

<sup>64</sup> Firbank's Executors v Humphreys (1886) 18 Q.B.D. 54; cf. Weeks v Probert (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 427; Cherry v Colonial Bank of Australia (1869) L.R. 3 P.C. 24.

<sup>65</sup> See below, p.739.

<sup>66</sup> See the discussion of Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1998] 4 All E.R. 513 at p.333 above.

<sup>67</sup> Rushdall v Ford (1866) L.R. 2 Eq. 750; cf. Beattie v Ebury (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 777; affirmed L.R. 7 H.L. 102.

is readily inferred when the principal is non-existent.<sup>68</sup> Such an inference might also be drawn where the principal exists but lacks capacity to make the contract.

(c) ENFORCEMENT BY THE CORPORATION.<sup>69</sup> The ultra vires doctrine normally operates so as to prevent a contract from being enforced against the corporation. The authorities provide no clear answer to the question whether the doctrine also precludes enforcement of the contract by the corporation.

A similar problem used to arise where a contract with a corporation should have been, but was not, made under its common seal.<sup>70</sup> If such a contract was executory, the company could not enforce it because its own promise, being invalid, was no consideration for that of the other party<sup>71</sup>; but if the corporation actually performed its own invalid promise it thereby provided consideration and so became entitled to enforce the contract.<sup>72</sup> It can be argued that a similar distinction should be applied to ultra vires contracts; but it is submitted that the better approach is to ask whether the object of the statutory limitation on the corporation's capacity would be subverted by allowing it to enforce the contract (rather than to ask whether the corporation had provided consideration).<sup>73</sup> Where the corporation wishes to enforce the contract but has not yet performed its part, that the object is likely to be subverted by allowing such enforcement, at least if enforcement by the corporation were (as would often be the case)<sup>74</sup> conditional on performance by it. In such cases the corporation would be encouraged to engage in ultra vires activity so as to satisfy the condition; and since it should not be given any incentive to engage in such activity, the contract should not be enforceable by it.<sup>75</sup> Where, on the other hand, the corporation has performed its part, this argument has no force: enforceability by the corporation could not encourage it to engage in future ultra vires activity since (at least in relation to the transaction in question<sup>76</sup>) the ultra vires activity has already taken place; and this reasoning gives some support to the view that a corporation which has performed its part of the contract should be able to enforce that contract.<sup>77</sup> But it is submitted that this result should not necessarily follow and that a distinction should be drawn between cases in which the nature of the performance is such that it cannot, and those in which it is such that it can, be restored to the corporation. The first possibility is illustrated by the case in which the corporation has rendered services under an ultra vires contract. In such a case, the object of the rule making the contract ultra vires is hardly likely to be defeated by allowing the corporation to sue for the agreed price of the services so that there is no strong argument against allowing it to enforce the contract; though the injustice of denying it such a remedy would at least be mitigated by allowing it to claim a reasonable remuneration in respect

<sup>68</sup> Kelner v Baxter (1866) 1 L.R. 2 C.P. 174; below, p.735.

<sup>69</sup> Furmston, 24 M.J.L.R. 215.

<sup>70</sup> This formal requirement was abolished by Corporate Bodies Contracts Act 1960.

<sup>71</sup> Kidderminster Corp v Harwick (1873) 1 L.R. 9 Ex. 13, above, p.150.

<sup>72</sup> Fishmongers' Co v Robertson (1843) 5 Man. & G. 131.

<sup>73</sup> This approach would make it inappropriate to apply to ultra vires cases the further rule, laid down in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v Merral (1869) 1 L.R. 4 Ex. 162, that a corporation could enforce a contract which should have been (but was not) under seal if the other party had done such acts of part performance as made the contract enforceable against the corporation.

<sup>74</sup> See below, pp.762–763; exceptions would be cases of independent promises (below, pp.763–764) and of accepted anticipatory breach (below, pp.767, 849, 863–864).

<sup>75</sup> See Pellatt's Case (1867) 1 L.R. 2 Ch.App. 527; Triggs v Staines Urban DC [1969] Ch. 10; Bell Houses Ltd v City Wall Properties Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 207 (reversed [1966] 2 Q.B. 656 on the ground that the contract was intra vires).

<sup>76</sup> Bell Houses Ltd v City Wall Properties Ltd [1966] 2 Q.B. 656 at 694.

<sup>77</sup> Future ultra vires transactions could be restrained: above, p.562 at n.28.

of services rendered by it under a void contract.<sup>78</sup> The second possibility can be illustrated by supposing that the corporation has purported to sell an article which it was by its incorporating statute prohibited from selling,<sup>79</sup> and that it had actually delivered that article to the buyer. The object of the statute would, it is submitted, be more effectively promoted by allowing the corporation to sue for the return of the article than by allowing it to sue for the price, or for damages for non-acceptance of the subject-matter of the sale.<sup>80</sup> This argument is supported by a group of cases in which moneys had been paid both by and to corporations under ultra vires contracts and it was held that the payments must be returned to the corporation where it was the payor<sup>81</sup> and by the corporation where it was the payee.<sup>82</sup> It must follow from these cases that the corporation could not have enforced the contracts by claiming the money or damages for failure to pay it; and emphatic statements in them that the contracts were “wholly void”<sup>83</sup> and “devoid of any legal contractual effects”<sup>84</sup> lend further support to the view that an ultra vires contract cannot be enforced by, any more than against the corporation.

<sup>78</sup> On the principle of Craven-Ellis v Cannons Ltd [1936] 2 K.B. 403, below p.1063.

<sup>79</sup> e.g. British Museum Act 1963, s.3(4), as amended by Museums and Galleries Act 1992 s.11(2) and Sch.8, para.5.

<sup>80</sup> cf. the suggestion in the Bell Houses case, above, at first instance that the corporation's remedy should be in quasi contract (though this would not be a possible remedy for the recovery of goods in specie).

<sup>81</sup> South Tyneside MBC v Svenska International plc [1995] 1 All E.R. 545; Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 A.C. 349 at 416.

<sup>82</sup> e.g. Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] A.C. 669; Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd v Kensington & Chelsea Royal Borough Council [1999] Q.B. 215; Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 A.C. 349 below, p.1059.

<sup>83</sup> Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd v Welwyn Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All E.R. 1 at 4.

<sup>84</sup> Guinness Mahon case, above, n.82, at p.284.

PLURALITY OF PARTIES

A PROMISE may be made by or to more than one person. Such a promise must be distinguished from a multilateral contract.<sup>1</sup> If three persons agree to run a race subject to certain rules, there are three sides to the contract, but each side consists of only one person.<sup>2</sup> If two persons promise to pay a third £10, or if one person promises to pay £10 to two others, there may only be two sides to the contract, one consisting of two persons and the other of one person. This Chapter is concerned with promises of this kind.

SECTION 1. PLURALITY OF DEBTORS<sup>3</sup>

1. Definitions

If A and B each separately promise to pay C £10 this does not amount to one promise by several to one, but to two independent promises. Thus C is entitled to £10 from A and a further £10 from B. This was, for example, the position where C granted licences to A and B under agreements providing for payment of a weekly sum by each of them,<sup>4</sup> and where a group of Lloyd's underwriters issued an insurance policy to an assured by which they bound themselves "each for his own part and not one for another".<sup>5</sup> There may be two such separate promises even where both are contained in the same document.<sup>6</sup>

If A and B together promise to pay £10, the promise may be joint, or joint and several. It is joint if A and B make only one promise binding both of them; it is joint and several if they make one promise binding both of them and if in addition each makes a separate promise binding him alone. A joint and several promise is distinguishable from two entirely separate promises in that it does not involve the promisors in cumulative liability. If A and B jointly and severally promise to pay C £10, C is not entitled to more than £10 in all. It is a question of construction whether a promise is joint, or joint and several.<sup>7</sup> A promise by two persons together is deemed to be joint, unless it is qualified in some way.<sup>8</sup> To make a promise joint and several, it is advisable to say expressly "we promise jointly and severally," or "we, and each of us, will pay". But this is not the only way of creating joint and several liability. In Tippins v Coates<sup>9</sup> three persons executed a bond by which they bound themselves "jointly and our respective heirs." This was held to be a joint and several promise, since that was evidently the intention of the parties:

<sup>1</sup> See above, p.77.

<sup>2</sup> cf. Rockeagle Ltd v Alsop Wilkinson [1992] Ch. 47 at 50 ("tripartite agreement").

<sup>3</sup> Williams, Joint Obligations.

<sup>4</sup> Mikeover v Brady [1989] 3 All E.R. 618.

<sup>5</sup> Touche Ross & Co v Colin Baker [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 207 at 209; cf. Lloyd's Act 1982, s.8.

<sup>6</sup> Collins v Prosser (1823) 1 B. & C. 682; Gibson v Lupton (1832) 9 Bing. 297; Lee v Nixon (1834) 1 A. & E. 201.

<sup>7</sup> cf. Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.85(1) ("according to its tenour").

<sup>8</sup> Levy v Sale (1877) 37 L.T. 709; White v Tyndall (1888) 13 App.Cas. 263; The Argo Hellas [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 296 at 300.

<sup>9</sup> (1853) 18 Beav. 401.

if it were held to be a joint bond, the respective heirs of the promisors would not be bound, but only the heir of the survivor.<sup>10</sup>

In some cases the question of whether liability is joint, or joint and several, is expressly dealt with by statute. For example, s.9 of the Partnership Act 1890, provides that "every partner in a firm is liable jointly with the other partners . . . for all debts and obligations of the firm incurred while he is a partner". On the other hand promissory notes made by a number of persons are deemed to be joint and several.<sup>11</sup>

2. Differences Between Joint, and Joint and Several, Promises

(1) Parties to the action

At common law, an action on a joint promise had to be brought against all the surviving joint debtors.<sup>12</sup> If this was not done the defendants could plead the non-joinder of their co-debtors in abatement. Although pleas in abatement no longer exist, it is still the general rule that the action must be brought against all the joint debtors.<sup>13</sup> But the court has a discretion to allow the action to proceed against one joint debtor if the other is out of the jurisdiction, or cannot be traced.<sup>14</sup> If one joint debtor is bankrupt, the other or others may be sued without him.<sup>15</sup>

An action on a joint and several promise could at common law be brought against one or all the co-debtors but not, it seems, against some (but not all). The creditor could either sue each debtor individually on his several promise or all on their joint promise; but he could not, by suing some, treat the contract as joint without also joining all the others.<sup>16</sup> It seems that in such a case the court now has a discretion to order all the other joint and several debtors to be joined to the action since it may order the names of persons to be joined to an action if their presence is "desirable . . . so that the court can resolve all matters in dispute in the proceedings".<sup>17</sup> The court might order such joinder so that the amount of the debt may be conclusively established for the purpose of the contribution<sup>18</sup> between all the debtors. It seems that the onus is on the debtor who is sued to bring his co-debtors before the court as third parties, with a view to claiming contribution from them.<sup>19</sup>

(2) Judgment

If one joint debtor is sued alone and does not plead non-joinder of the others, judgment may be given against him alone. After the creditor had recovered such a judgment, it was formerly the rule that he could not take further proceedings against any of the other joint debtors (even though the judgment remained unsatisfied) because the original cause of action was merged in the judgment.<sup>20</sup> This rule was, however, likely to cause hardship

<sup>10</sup> See below, p.570.

<sup>11</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.85(2); see also Law of Property Act 1925, s.119; Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s.13(1).

<sup>12</sup> Cabell v Vaughan (1669) 1 Wms.Saund. 291; Richards v Heather (1817) 1 B. & Ald. 29.

<sup>13</sup> Norbury, Natzio & Co Ltd v Griffiths [1918] 2 K.B. 369; it is up to the defendant to take the point; Wegg-Prosser v Evans [1895] 1 Q.B. 108. And see CPR, r.19.2(1).

<sup>14</sup> Wilson, Sons & Co Ltd v Balcarres Brook SS Co Ltd [1893] 1 Q.B. 422; Robinson v Geisel [1894] 2 Q.B. 685.

<sup>15</sup> Insolvency Act 1986 s.345(4).

<sup>16</sup> Cabell v Vaughan (1669) 1 Wms.Saund. 291, n.4.

<sup>17</sup> CPR, r.19.2(2)(a).

<sup>18</sup> See below, p.574.

<sup>19</sup> cf. Wilson, Sons & Co Ltd v Balcarres Brook SS Co Ltd, above, n.14, at p.428 (where the contract was joint).

<sup>20</sup> Kendall v Hamilton (1879) 4 App.Cas. 504.

to the creditor; and it has been abolished by statute,<sup>21</sup> so that a creditor is no longer precluded from suing one joint debtor merely because he has previously obtained a judgment against another.

Where the contract is joint and several, judgment against one debtor was never regarded as a bar to proceedings against another. Each is liable on his separate promise, as well as on the joint promise: hence there are several causes of action only some of which are merged in the first judgment.<sup>22</sup> A claim against joint and several debtors is barred only if one of them satisfies it, whether under a judgment or otherwise.

(3) Survivorship

At common law the liability of a joint debtor passed on his death to the surviving joint debtors.<sup>23</sup> The creditor therefore had no claim against the estate of the deceased, but only one against the surviving joint debtors. If they paid, they might be able to recover contribution from the estate of the deceased<sup>24</sup>; but the creditor himself had no direct right against the estate. On the death of the last surviving joint debtor, the creditor could recover the debt from his estate.<sup>25</sup>

On the death of a joint and several debtor, on the other hand, his several (though not his joint) liability remained enforceable against his estate.<sup>26</sup>

The rule that joint liability passed to the surviving debtors might be convenient where the debtors were engaged in administering a trust, but it was highly inconvenient in commercial affairs. If only one of a number of joint debtors was solvent, and that one happened to die, the creditor would lose all substantial remedy. The difficulty was particularly acute in partnership cases. Equity therefore treated partnership debts as joint and several to this extent, that they could be enforced against the estate of a deceased partner.<sup>27</sup> This rule is confirmed by s.9 of the Partnership Act 1890.<sup>28</sup>

The equitable right to enforce a joint debt against the estate of a deceased joint contractor was applied mainly in partnership cases, but there is some authority for saying that it was not confined to such cases, nor even to cases involving mercantile transactions.<sup>29</sup> It is therefore arguable that, on the question of survivorship, there was, before the Judicature Act 1873, a conflict between common law and equity, so that equity now prevails.<sup>30</sup> It is also arguable that the principle of survivorship has been abolished by s.1(1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, which provides that all causes of action subsisting against a person at the time of his death shall (with certain exceptions) survive against the estate. The object of this provision was to abolish the common law rule that actions in tort could not be brought against the estate of a deceased tortfeasor; but its words seem apt to abolish the rule that the liability of a joint debtor

<sup>21</sup> Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, ss.3, 7(1). For a situation not covered by these provisions, see The Argo Hellas [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 296 at 304. S.3 also does not apply where a debt is discharged by an accord and satisfaction which is later embodied in a court order: Morris v Molesworth [1998] N.L.J. 1551. See also CPR, r.12.8 (default judgment).

<sup>22</sup> Blyth v Fladgate [1891] 1 Ch. 337.

<sup>23</sup> Cabell v Vaughan (1669) 1 Wms.Saund. 291, n.4(f); Godson v Good (1816) 6 Taunt. 587 at 594.

<sup>24</sup> Batard v Hawes (1853) 2 F. & B. 287; below, p.574.

<sup>25</sup> Calder v Rutherford (1822) 3 Brod. & B. 302.

<sup>26</sup> Read v Price [1909] 1 K.B. 577.

<sup>27</sup> See Kendall v Hamilton (1879) 4 App.Cas. 504 at 517. Lord Mansfield had anticipated the equitable rule: Rice v Shute (1770) 5 Burr. 2611 at 2613.

<sup>28</sup> But under this section separate debts of a deceased partner must be paid in priority to the partnership debts.

<sup>29</sup> Thorpe v Jackson (1837) 2 Y. & C. Ex. 553.

<sup>30</sup> Judicature Act 1873, s.25(11); now Supreme Court Act 1981, s.49(1).

passed on his death to the surviving joint debtors (so that it could no longer be enforced against his estate).

3. Similarities Between Joint, and Joint and Several, Promises

(1) Defence of one

If one of several co-debtors has a defence to the action, the question whether that defence also avails the others depends on its nature. If it goes to the root of the claim, and wholly destroys it, the other debtors can take advantage of it. Thus they can do so if one co-debtor can prove that the debt has been paid, or that the creditor is not entitled to payment because of his own breach of contract, or that a written contract is a forgery, or that the creditor was guilty of fraud.<sup>31</sup> But if the defence is personal to one co-debtor, e.g. that he was a minor or that he had been discharged as a result of bankruptcy proceedings, it does not avail the other as co-debtors.<sup>32</sup>

Special rules apply to contracts of guarantee, under which the guarantor generally undertakes joint and several liability with the principal debtor.<sup>33</sup> It has been held that the guarantor is not liable if the principal debt is illegal,<sup>34</sup> or if the principal debtor has been discharged as a result of the creditor's breach.<sup>35</sup> A guarantor of a debt that was unenforceable under the Moneylenders Acts was not liable on the guarantee<sup>36</sup>; and the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (which repeals those Acts) lays down a similar rule in the case of a guarantee given in respect of a regulated agreement.<sup>37</sup> These rules cannot be deduced from the general principles governing joint and several contracts, but appear to be based on considerations of policy.<sup>38</sup> It is obviously undesirable to allow a person who lends for an illegal purpose, or a lender who tries to evade the Consumer Credit Act, to recover his loan from any person whatsoever.

On the other hand, a guarantee may be valid where the principal debtor is a corporation acting ultra vires. Whether it is actually valid depends on its construction: did the guarantor undertake to pay only what the corporation could lawfully be required to pay, or what it had in fact promised to pay?<sup>39</sup> Where the principal debt is incurred by a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, the validity of that debt can no longer (as a general rule) be called into question on the ground of lack of the company's capacity by reason of anything in its memorandum<sup>40</sup>; it follows that the guarantee cannot be called into question on this ground. The position is the same where the principal debt arises out of a contract which is made by a person dealing with the company in good faith, but which is, under the company's constitution, beyond the power of the board of directors: in favour of the other contracting party, the power of the board is (as a general

<sup>31</sup> Porter v Harris (1663) 1 Lev. 63; Gardner v Walsh (1855) 5 E. & B. 83; Pirie v Richardson [1927] 1 K.B. 448.

<sup>32</sup> Burgess v Merrill (1812) 4 Taunt. 468; Gillow v Lillie (1835) 1 Bing.N.C. 695; Lovell & Christmas v Beauchamp [1894] A.C. 607; King v Hoare (1844) 3 M. & W. 494 at 506; Pirie v Richardson [1927] 1 K.B. 448, cf. Chaplin v Leslie Frewin (Publishers) Ltd [1966] Ch. 71.

<sup>33</sup> e.g. Anderson v Martindale (1801) 1 East 497; Re W E A, a Debtor [1901] 2 K.B. 642; Read v Price [1909] 1 K.B. 577.

<sup>34</sup> Swan v Bank of Scotland (1836) 10 Bli.(N.S.) 627; Heald v O'Connor [1971] 1 W.L.R. 497.

<sup>35</sup> Unity Finance Ltd v Woodcock [1963] 1 W.L.R. 455, explained on another ground in Goulston Discount Co Ltd v Clark [1967] 2 Q.B. 493.

<sup>36</sup> Eldridge & Morris v Taylor [1931] 2 K.B. 416; Temperance Loan Fund Ltd v Rose [1932] 2 K.B. 522.

<sup>37</sup> s.113(1) and (2); see above, p.178 for the meaning of "regulated" agreement.

<sup>38</sup> Mitchell, (1947) 63 L.Q.R. 354.

<sup>39</sup> Yorks Ry & Wagon Co v McLure (1882) 21 Ch.D. 309; Garrard v James [1925] Ch. 616, as explained in Heald v O'Connor [1971] 1 W.L.R. 497.

<sup>40</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35(1) (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1)); above, p.561.

rule) deemed to be free from any limitation under the company's constitution,<sup>41</sup> so that the contract giving rise to the debt, and consequently also the guarantee, cannot be challenged on the ground that it was beyond the powers of the board. The general rule is that the principal contract will be invalid only if the other party to it dealt with the company in bad faith; and mere knowledge of the fact that the contract was beyond the powers of the directors is not sufficient to constitute bad faith.<sup>42</sup> It seems that some kind of actual dishonesty is required to constitute bad faith; and if the principal transaction is invalid on this ground, then it is submitted that the guarantee should also be invalid. This submission is based on the analogy of the rule relating to illegal contracts,<sup>43</sup> for the principal contract in our last example would be, or would come close to being, one to defraud the company.<sup>44</sup> The only other situations in which the principal contract is now likely to be invalid on the ground that it is ultra vires are (i) those in which a statutory corporation was not incorporated under the Companies Act, so that the common law doctrine of ultra vires still applied to it,<sup>45</sup> and (ii) those in which, though the company was incorporated under those Acts, the statutory modifications of the ultra vires doctrine, described above, exceptionally do not apply.<sup>46</sup> If in such cases the creditor is induced to enter into the contract in reliance on a guarantee given by one of the corporation's directors or officers, it is submitted that the guarantor should be liable on the guarantee: there seems to be no ground of policy for allowing him to rely on the invalidity of the principal debt.

Similar policy considerations apply where the principal debtor is a minor: it would be wrong to allow the guarantor on this ground to escape from a liability deliberately undertaken since such a result would not be necessary for the protection of minors. It has therefore been provided by statute that the guarantee shall not be unenforceable against the guarantor merely because the principal obligation was unenforceable against the debtor because he was a minor when he incurred it.<sup>47</sup>

(2) Release of one

If the creditor releases one co-debtor, the release is available for the benefit of all the others since it wholly destroys the cause of action.<sup>48</sup> At first sight, the application of this rule to joint and several debtors looks illogical, since there are several causes of action against them; but it may be justified on the ground that it would make the release partly futile to hold that only one of the co-debtors was released. If the others could still be sued, they could claim contribution from the one who had been released, who would thus indirectly be made liable, notwithstanding the release.<sup>49</sup> But in spite of this

---

<sup>41</sup> ibid. s.35A(1), above, p.561.

<sup>42</sup> ibid. s.35A(2)(b).

<sup>43</sup> See above, at n.34.

<sup>44</sup> cf. above, p.432.

<sup>45</sup> See above, p.563; subject to the exceptions there stated relating to local authorities.

<sup>46</sup> Companies Act 1985, ss.35(4) and 35A(6) (as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1) and amended by Charities Act 1993 s.98(1) and Sch.6, para.20) and Charities Act 1993, s.65 (charitable companies and certain transactions with directors).

<sup>47</sup> Minors Contracts Act 1987, s.2 (reversing Coutts & Co v Browne-Lecky [1947] K.B. 104); and see s.4, amending Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.113(7).

<sup>48</sup> Nicholson v Revill (1836) 4 A. & E. 675; Re E.W.A. [1901] 2 K.B. 642; Morris v Molesworth [1998] N.I.J. 1551. For a statutory exception (the details of which are beyond the scope of this book), see Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s.13(2). In tort, the rule applies where the liability is joint: New Zealand Guardian Trust Ltd v Brooks [1995] 1 W.L.R. 96; and where it is concurrent Jameson v CEBG [2000] 1 A.C. 455.

<sup>49</sup> Jenkins v Jenkins [1928] 2 K.B. 501 at 508.

argument, a covenant not to sue a single co-debtor releases him alone and does not release the other co-debtors.<sup>50</sup>

It used to be thought that a release granted to one co-debtor released the others even though it reserved the creditor's rights against them.<sup>51</sup> But the courts originally evaded this rule by distinguishing between a release and a covenant not to sue. The former released all the co-debtors; the latter released only the debtor with whom it was made.<sup>52</sup> The distinction turned on the construction of the document and the present approach is to go directly to the question of construction without first distinguishing between "release" and "covenant not to sue".<sup>53</sup> Accordingly, if the document releases one co-debtor but reserves the creditor's rights against the other or others, the courts will give effect to the intention of the parties as so expressed.<sup>54</sup> But a document which simply released one co-debtor without expressly or impliedly<sup>55</sup> reserving the creditor's rights against the others would still wholly extinguish those rights.<sup>56</sup>

The rules discussed above apply only to release by act of the parties. Where one co-debtor is released by operation of law (e.g. by an order of discharge in bankruptcy) the others are not released.<sup>57</sup> If the creditor appoints one co-debtor his executor, both the co-debtor and the others are released when probate is obtained. The reason for this rule is that "the debt is deemed to have been paid by the debtor [qua debtor] to himself as executor" and thus discharged.<sup>58</sup> In equity the executor is then deemed to have the amount of the debt in his hands as assets of the testator, and is thus accountable for it to the estate.<sup>59</sup>

Problems similar to those discussed above can arise where A and B are not joint, or joint and several, debtors but are persons who have entered into, and then broken, two entirely separate contracts with C.<sup>60</sup> The losses suffered by C in consequence of these breaches may be related: e.g. where A and B are associated companies and A's wrongful termination of an agency contract with C on the ground of C's alleged but unsubstantiated misconduct leads B wrongfully to terminate a similar (but not identical) contract, also with C.<sup>61</sup> An agreement by which C settles his claim against A may be expressed to release C's claim against A in respect of loss suffered by C by reason, not only of A's, but also of B's, wrongful termination of the contracts with C<sup>62</sup>; and the effect, if any, of this agreement of C's claim against B depends on its construction.<sup>63</sup> If

<sup>50</sup> See the authorities cited in n.52, below.

<sup>51</sup> Nicholson v Revell (1836) 4 A. & E. at p.683.

<sup>52</sup> Hutton v Eyre (1815) 6 Taunt. 289; Kearsley v Cole (1846) 16 M. & W. 128 at 136; Webb v Hewitt (1857) 3 K. & J. 438; Ex p. Good (1876) 5 Ch.D. 46; Re Wolmerhausen (1890) 62 L.T. 541. In Duck v Mayeu [1892] 2 Q.B. 511 and Gardiner v Moore [1969] 1 Q.B. 55 the same rule was applied in tort; the latter case also shows that reservation of the rights against one of the persons liable may be implied; for such an implied reservation, see also Finley v Connell Associates [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 895.

<sup>53</sup> Johnson v Davies [1999] Ch. 117 at 127–128, following Watts v Aldington, The Times, December 16, 1993.

<sup>54</sup> Johnson v Davies, above; for earlier cases reaching the same conclusion, see Price v Barker (1855) 4 E. & B. 760; Appleby Estates Co v De Bernales [1947] Ch. 217 (tort); cf. Banco Santander S.A v Bayfern Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 776 at 780 (release of one joint and several debtor by assignment of the creditor's right to that one).

<sup>55</sup> See Gardiner v Moore, above, n.52.

<sup>56</sup> cf. Cutler v McPhail [1962] 2 Q.B. 292; cf. Deanplan Ltd v Mahmoud [1993] Ch. 151 (where the liability of successive assignees of a lease was cumulative).

<sup>57</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.281(7); Re Garner's Motors Ltd [1937] Ch. 594.

<sup>58</sup> Jenkins v Jenkins [1928] 2 K.B. 501 at 509; Limitation (Amendment) Act 1980, s.10.

<sup>59</sup> Jenkins v Jenkins, above, at p.509; Commissioner of Stamp Duties v Bone [1977] A.C. 511.

<sup>60</sup> For the distinction between the two types of promises, see above, p.568.

<sup>61</sup> As in Heaton v Axa Equity and Life Assurance Society plc [2002] UKHL 15, [2002] 2 All E.R. 961.

<sup>62</sup> As in the Heaton case, above, where A's (unsubstantiated) allegations of misconduct may also have influenced B.

<sup>63</sup> ibid. at [8], [9], [27], [41].

it meant that the sum paid in pursuance of it were intended to represent the full amount of C's loss, resulting from both breaches, then C, having been fully compensated for that loss by A, would have no further claim in respect of it against B.<sup>64</sup> But such an agreement to release A from liability for A's breach will not bar C's claim against B in respect of other causes of action (than B's breach of contract) which C may have against B or in respect of loss caused by B's breach to the extent to which that loss was attributable to B's (rather than to A's) breach.<sup>65</sup> The only effect of C's settlement with A on such a claim results from the principle that C cannot recover twice over the same loss: that is, C must give credit to B for sums paid by A under the settlement so far as they represent the loss suffered by C as a result of B's breach<sup>66</sup> for which A nevertheless accepted liability on the ground that this breach was a consequence of A's prior breach.

(3) Contribution

If one co-debtor, being liable to pay the entire debt,<sup>67</sup> has paid it in full, he is entitled to recover contribution from the others.<sup>68</sup> Prima facie, he is entitled to recover from each co-debtor the amount of the debt divided by the number of co-debtors. If one of the co-debtors has died, his estate is liable to contribute, even if he was a joint debtor. The general rule may be varied by the terms of the contract or by the bankruptcy of one co-debtor.

(a) TERMS OF THE CONTRACT. The co-debtors can make any provision they like as to contribution. Where the co-debtors are principal debtor and surety, it is implied that the surety, if called on to pay, is entitled to be wholly indemnified by the principal debtor. Conversely, if the principal debtor pays the whole debt, he has no right of contribution against the surety. Several sureties for the same debt are prima facie entitled inter se to contribution in proportion to their number; but where one surety (A) promises to pay only if neither the debtor nor another surety (B) does so, and B pays on the debtor's default, then B will not be entitled to contribution from A.<sup>69</sup>

(b) BANKRUPTCY. At common law, the rule that the amount of contribution was the amount of the debt divided by the number of co-debtors prevailed even though some of the co-debtors were insolvent.<sup>70</sup> Equity adopted the fairer rule that the amount of contribution was the amount of the debt divided by the number of sureties who were solvent when the right to contribution arose.<sup>71</sup> This equitable rule now prevails.<sup>72</sup>

<sup>64</sup> ibid. at [8].

<sup>65</sup> This was the outcome in the Heaton case, above.

<sup>66</sup> In the Heaton case, C accepted the need to give credit for such sums (paid by A) in their claim against B and this concession was evidently regarded as correct by Lord Mackay at [47], with whose reasoning Lords Bingham, Steyn and Hutton agreed.

<sup>67</sup> For this requirement, see Legal & General Assurance Society v Drake Insurance Co Ltd [1992] Q.B. 887 where a debtor who was liable for only part of the debt, but had paid it in full, was held not to be entitled to contribution. Where a guarantee provided for payment on demand and one guarantor paid more than his share before any such demand had been made, he was nevertheless held entitled to contribution as the payment had not been made "officiously" and the making of the demand was said not to be a "condition precedent" of his liability: Stimson v Smith [1999] 2 All E.R. 833.

<sup>68</sup> e.g. Davitt v Titcomb [1990] Ch. 110 at 117.

<sup>69</sup> Scholefield Goodman & Sons Ltd v Zyngier [1986] A.C. 562.

<sup>70</sup> Lowe v Dixon (1885) 16 Q.B.D. 455 at 458.

<sup>71</sup> Hitchman v Stewart (1855) 3 Drew. 271.

<sup>72</sup> Lowe v Dixon, above. The rules as to assessment of contribution laid down in Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s.2 do not alter this position: they apply to damages but not to debts; for this distinction, cf. below, pp.1013-1014.

SECTION 2. PLURALITY OF CREDITORS

1. Definitions

If X promises to pay A and B £10, he may make two separate promises, under which A and B are entitled to £10 each, so that X's total liability is to pay £20. No special problems arise out of such promises. But if X makes only one promise to A and B, so that he is liable to pay only £10 in all, it becomes important to determine whether his promise to A and B is made to them jointly, or whether it is made to them severally. At common law, the question whether a contract was made with two persons jointly or with them severally depended on the wording of the contract, and on the interests of the parties in enforcing it.

If the contract was made with a number of persons "jointly" and their interests were joint, it was a joint contract<sup>73</sup>; if it was made with a number of persons severally, i.e. "with them and each of them" and their interests were several, it was a several contract.<sup>74</sup> If the contract was ambiguous, or did not state whether it was joint and several, then it was joint if the interests of the creditors were joint, and otherwise several.<sup>75</sup> The interests of the creditors were joint if each had the same interest in the performance of the contract, even though they had separate interests in the property affected. Hence a covenant to repair made with a number of lessors jointly was joint, though they did not hold the land jointly, but in common, so that their interests in it were several.<sup>76</sup> On the other hand, where land was sold by tenants in common and the purchaser promised to pay them the price in fixed proportions corresponding with their shares in the land, the promise was regarded as several.<sup>77</sup> The position was less clear where the contract was expressly joint and the interests several, or conversely; but the prevailing view appears to be that the court would give effect to the intention of the parties, as expressed in the agreement.<sup>78</sup> The common law did not originally recognise the possibility that a promise to a number of persons could be joint and several.<sup>79</sup> The possibility was, however, recognised in the late nineteenth century<sup>80</sup>; and the question is now of little importance as s.81 of the Law and Property Act 1925 provides that a covenant, and a contract made under seal<sup>81</sup> and a bond or obligation under seal made with two or more persons jointly, shall, if made after 1925, "be construed as being also made with each of them"<sup>82</sup> unless a contrary intention is expressed; where the instrument is executed by an individual, s.1 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 provides that it need no longer be sealed: execution as a deed in accordance with the requirements of that section is sufficient.<sup>83</sup> Such covenants, etc., are now prima

<sup>73</sup> cf. Sorsbie v Park (1843) 12 M. & W. 146 at 158.

<sup>74</sup> James v Emery (1818) 5 Price 529.

<sup>75</sup> e.g. Anderson v Martindale (1801) 1 East 487; Palmer v Mallett (1887) 36 Ch.D. 411.

<sup>76</sup> Bradburne v Botfield (1845) 14 M. & W. 559; Thompson v Hakewill (1865) 19 C.B.(N.S.) 713. For the position between the tenants in common inter se, see Beer v Beer (1852) 12 C.B. 60.

<sup>77</sup> James v Emery (1818) 5 Price 529.

<sup>78</sup> Sorsbie v Park (1843) 12 M. & W. 146 at 158; Keightley v Watson (1849) 3 Ex. 716; Beer v Beer (1852) 12 C.B. 60; for the earlier view that the interest of the parties was always decisive, see Slingsby's Case (1588) 5 Co. Rep. 18b; Withers v Bircham (1824) 3 B. & C. 254 at 256; Hopkinson v Lee (1845) 6 Q.B. 964.

<sup>79</sup> Slingsby's Case, above; Anderson v Martindale, above; Bradburne v Botfield (1845) 14 M. & W. 559 at 573; Keightley v Watson, above, at 723 (criticising the rule).

<sup>80</sup> Thompson v Hakewill (1865) 19 C.B.N.S., 713 at 726; Palmer v Mallett (1887) 36 Ch.D. 410 at 421.

<sup>81</sup> See now Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.1(7).

<sup>82</sup> Re-enacting, with some changes, Conveyancing Act 1881, s.60. The section does not affect the law relating to joint debtors: Johnson v Davies [1999] Ch. 117 at 127.

<sup>83</sup> Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.1(8) and Sch.1. And see above, pp.158–159 for execution of deeds by corporations.

facie joint and several.<sup>84</sup> S.81 of the 1925 Act applies only promises in deeds<sup>85</sup>; its object seems to have been to avoid in relation to such promises the common law rule that on the death of a joint creditor his rights passed by survivorship<sup>86</sup> to the other or others. In this respect, it resembles the rule under which a contract for the repayment of money lent by a number of lenders was presumed in equity to create a several right in each lender, even though under the common law rules the contract was joint.<sup>87</sup> The presumption could be rebutted, e.g. if the lenders were trustees<sup>88</sup>; here survivorship was administratively convenient, and created no substantive injustice. It seems that promises regarded as several under s.81 and under the equitable presumption will be so regarded not only for the purpose of limiting the doctrine of survivorship,<sup>89</sup> but also for the other purposes to be discussed below.

2. Parties to the Action

Where a promise is made to a number of persons jointly, all of them (if living) must be parties to the action.<sup>90</sup> If one joint creditor is unwilling to join, the one wishing to sue must offer him an indemnity as to costs; if he still refuses to join he can then be added as co-defendant.<sup>91</sup>

Where a promise is made to two or more persons severally an action can be brought by one or more of them: it is not necessary to join them all.<sup>92</sup>

3. Survivorship

On the death of a joint creditor, his rights pass to his surviving co-creditors.<sup>93</sup> On the death of a several creditor, his rights pass, not to his co-creditors, but to his personal representatives.<sup>94</sup>

4. Defence Against One

Where a contract is joint, a defence available against one creditor can be raised against the others if it goes to the root of the claim. For example, "when two persons are jointly insured and their interests are inseparably connected, so that a loss or gain necessarily affects them both, the misconduct of one is sufficient to contaminate the whole

<sup>84</sup> See Josselson v Burst [1938] 1 K.B. 723; for a statutory exception, see Law of Property Act 1925, s.119 (covenants with several mortgagees deemed to be joint).

<sup>85</sup> The primary meaning of "covenant" is a promise by deed: see Rank Xerox Ltd v Lane (Inspector of Taxes) [1981] A.C. 629 at 639. It seems that in Law of Property Act 1925, s.81, "covenant" refers to a promise which would not be binding unless it were under seal, and "contract . . . under seal" to one which would be binding even if it were not sealed.

<sup>86</sup> See below.

<sup>87</sup> Steeds v Steeds (1889) 22 Q.B.D. 537.

<sup>88</sup> ibid. at 542.

<sup>89</sup> This seems to have been the sole effect of Conveyancing Act 1881, s.60, but that section did not include the words quoted in the text at n.82, above.

<sup>90</sup> Jell v Douglas (1821) 4 B. & Ald. 374; Sorsbie v Park (1843) 12 M. & W. 146; Thompson v Hakewill (1865) 19 C.B.(N.S.) 713.

<sup>91</sup> Cullen v Knowles [1898] 2 Q.B. 380; no such indemnity need be offered to one joint creditor who is guilty of a fraud on the other: Johnson v Stephens & Carter Ltd [1923] 2 K.B. 857. If a joint creditor is added as co-defendant without being offered such an indemnity, the only person who can object is that joint creditor, and not the debtor; Burnside v Harrison Marks Productions Ltd [1968] 1 W.L.R. 728.

<sup>92</sup> James v Emery (1818) 5 Price 529; Keightley v Watson (1849) 3 Ex. 716; Palmer v Mallett (1887) 36 Ch.D. 411.

<sup>93</sup> Anderson v Martindale (1801) 1 East 497.

<sup>94</sup> Withers v Bircham (1824) 3 B. & C. 254.

insurance".<sup>95</sup> It seems, although there is no authority precisely in point, that a defence available against one joint creditor does not avail against the other if it is purely personal to the first. Thus, if the debtor can plead ultra vires against one joint creditor,<sup>96</sup> he may remain liable to the others.

Where a contract is several, a defence available against one creditor cannot be raised against the others. In Hagedorn v Bazett<sup>97</sup> an insurance of cargo covered goods some of which belonged to British subjects, some to neutrals and some to an alien enemy. It was held that the policy amounted to a number of separate policies, one with each owner, and was not wholly vitiated by the fact that one of the owners was an alien enemy. "There was no common or joint interest in the whole of the property insured subsisting in the different individuals, nor was there any fraud".<sup>98</sup> The reason why fraud would have vitiated the whole insurance is that the fraud referred to was that of the common agent of all the parties, and thus imputable to them all. It does not follow that the fraud of one several creditor is a defence against others to whom it cannot be imputed. Had the policy been joint (as it might have been if a single item jointly owned by the promisees had been its subject-matter), the fact that one of the owners was an alien enemy would have made it wholly illegal since it seems that this kind of illegal promise cannot be severed.<sup>99</sup>

Where a joint bank account is opened in the names of two persons, the amount standing to the credit of the account is owed to them jointly, so that neither of them can enforce the debt against the bank without joining the other.<sup>1</sup> But a promise by the bank to honour only instructions given by both account holders is made separately to each of them, so that, if the bank allows one of them to draw on the account without the knowledge or authority of the other, the latter can sue alone and recover damage from the bank for breach of this promise.<sup>2</sup>

5. Release by One

A release granted by one joint creditor discharges the debt. Unless this were so, the one who granted the release might be able, after the death of his co-creditor, to recover the debt in spite of his own release, under the rule of survivorship.<sup>3</sup> But if the release is given by one creditor in fraud of another, the latter can have it set aside.<sup>4</sup>

A release granted by one of a number of creditors entitled severally (whether at law or in equity) releases only the share of the grantor.<sup>5</sup>

6. Payment to One

The general rule is that payment to one of two joint creditors discharges the debt.<sup>6</sup> But this rule may be varied by the contract, and such variation may be implied from a course of dealing. Thus where persons have a joint account with a bank, and the usual course

<sup>95</sup> P. Samuel & Co v Dumas [1924] A.C. 432 at 445; Arab Bank plc v Zurich Insurance Co [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 263 at 272.

<sup>96</sup> See above, p.563.

<sup>97</sup> (1813) 2 M. & S. 100; State of the Netherlands v Youell and Hayward [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 440, affirmed on other grounds [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 236.

<sup>98</sup> (1813) 2 M. & S. 100 at 105.

<sup>99</sup> See above, pp.506–507.

<sup>1</sup> Bremer v Westminster Bank Ltd [1952] 2 T.L.R. 568 (as to which, see next note).

<sup>2</sup> Catlin v Cyprus Finance Corporation (London) Ltd [1983] Q.B. 759 not following Bremer's case, above, on this point; Vroegop, 100 L.Q.R. 25.

<sup>3</sup> Wallace v Kelsall (1840) 7 M. & W. 264 at 274.

<sup>4</sup> Jones v Herbert (1817) 7 Taunt. 421.

<sup>5</sup> Steads v Steeds (1889) 22 Q.B.D. 537.

<sup>6</sup> Husband v Davies (1851) 10 C.B. 645; Powell v Broadhurst [1901] 2 Ch. 160 at 164.

of dealing is to make payments only with the authority of them all, a payment made to one without the authority of the others does not discharge the bank.<sup>7</sup> Even where payment to one discharges the debt, it does not discharge any security which may have been given for the debt except to the extent of the payee's beneficial interest in the debt.<sup>8</sup>

Payment to one of a number of several creditors clearly does not discharge the whole debt since each is separately entitled to his share.

7. Consideration Moving from One<sup>9</sup>

Where a promise is made to A and B jointly, it can be enforced by both of them, even though the whole consideration was provided by A.<sup>10</sup> If this were not so, the promise could not be enforced at all; for, if A tried to sue alone, he would be defeated by the rule that all the promisees must be parties to the action.<sup>11</sup> It follows from the doctrine of survivorship<sup>12</sup> that B would be entitled to the entire benefit of the promise after A's death.

None of the above reasoning applies where a promise is made to A and B severally. Hence each promisee must provide consideration for the separate promise made to him.

It is, however, uncertain which of the above rules applies to the intermediate case of a promise made to two persons jointly and severally.<sup>13</sup> In McEvoy v Belfast Banking Co,<sup>14</sup> a father (A) deposited £10,000 in a bank; the deposit receipt stated that the money had been received from him and his son (B) and that it was payable "to either or the survivor". Lord Atkin said obiter that the contract was not by the bank with A for the benefit of B<sup>15</sup> but "with A and B, and I think with them jointly and severally. A purports to make a contract on behalf of B as well as himself, and the consideration supports such a contract."<sup>16</sup> Of course after A's death (which in McEvoy's case had occurred), B would be entitled to enforce any joint promise under the doctrine of survivorship.<sup>17</sup> But it is harder to see how he could sue on any several promise, for this is ex hypothesi an independent promise, and on the facts stated no consideration for it moved from B.<sup>18</sup> Indeed, the more probable view of such facts is that the bank makes no promise to B but only has authority to pay him. Hence it is discharged by a payment to B, but is not liable to him.<sup>19</sup> The bank would not, however, be discharged by such payment if it was not authorised by its contract with A to pay B. This possibility is illustrated by Thavorn v Bank of Credit & Commerce S.A.,<sup>20</sup> where A opened a bank account in the name of her nephew B (who was under age), stipulating that only A should operate the account. It

<sup>7</sup> Husband v Davies (1851) 10 C.B. 645 at 650.

<sup>8</sup> Powell v Broadhurst [1901] 2 Ch. 160 at 166.

<sup>9</sup> Cullity, 85 L.Q.R. 530; Winterton, 47 Can.Bar Rev. 483; Coote, [1978] C.L.J. 301.

<sup>10</sup> This proposition seems to have been accepted in Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385; although the majority of the court held that no joint promise had in fact been made; below, p.605.

<sup>11</sup> See above, p.576.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.576.

<sup>13</sup> For this type of promise, see above, p.576.

<sup>14</sup> [1935] A.C. 24.

<sup>15</sup> On this view, B would not be a "third party" for the purposes of the discussion in Chap.15.

<sup>16</sup> At p.43.

<sup>17</sup> cf. Aroso v Coutts & Co [2002] 1 All E.R. 241, where the contract expressly so provided.

<sup>18</sup> S.J.B., 51 L.Q.R. 419.

<sup>19</sup> See Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385; below, p.605.

<sup>20</sup> [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 259. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 (below, p.651) would not apply to such a case since it was not the intention of the contracting parties that B should be entitled to enforce the contract: see subs.1(2) of the Bill.

was held that B was a mere nominee and that the bank was not discharged by (or was liable in damages for) paying B at the sole request of B and without any instructions from A. As no promise to (or in favour of) B had been made by the bank, it follows that B could not have sued the bank on its promise to A.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

THIRD PARTIES

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTION

OUR concern in this Chapter is with the extent to which persons can either take the benefit of, or be bound by, contracts to which they are not parties. At common law, the doctrine of privity states first, that a contract cannot confer rights and secondly that it cannot impose liabilities, on anyone except a party to it. The second of these propositions is generally regarded as just and sensible<sup>1</sup>; but the first was subjected to much criticism,<sup>2</sup> culminating in a Report, issued by the Law Commission in 1996, on Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties.<sup>3</sup> The recommendations of this Report have (where legislation for this purpose was necessary<sup>4</sup>) been implemented by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999. The Act does not precisely follow the wording of the Draft Bill attached to the Law Commission's Report, but the changes do not, in general,<sup>5</sup> reflect any major departures from the policy of the recommendations in that Report: their object has rather been to secure the clearer and more effective implementation of that policy. For this reason, it is submitted that reference can appropriately be made to the Report in discussing the 1999 Act; and such references will be made in this Chapter.

It is important at the outset to make a point about the nature of the reforms to be made by the 1999 Act, since this determines the present structure of the subject. A crucial passage in the Law Commission's Report states that "it is important to emphasise that, while our proposed reform will give some third parties the right to enforce contracts, there will remain many contracts where a third party stands to benefit and yet will not have a right of enforceability. Our proposed statute carves out a general and wide-ranging exception to the third party rule, but it leaves that rule intact for cases not covered by the statute".<sup>6</sup> The rights conferred on third parties by the 1999 Act therefore have the character of a new statutory exception<sup>7</sup> to the common law doctrine of privity;

---

<sup>1</sup> See below, p.606. The rule that a contract cannot in other respects bind third parties is, in the interests of convenience, subject to modifications: see below, pp.619–625, 638–645.

<sup>2</sup> See p.588, below.

<sup>3</sup> Law Com No. 242 (hereafter "Report"). For an earlier proposal, see Law Revision Committee, sixth Interim Report, Cmd. 5449 (1937), Section D.

<sup>4</sup> For a situation in which this was not necessary, see Report, §6.8 n.8, below, p.656.

<sup>5</sup> The exception is s.8 of the Act, subjecting the third party's rights to arbitration agreements, contrary to the views expressed in Report, §§14.14 to 14.19.

<sup>6</sup> Report §5.16; the importance of the point appears from the fact that it is repeated in almost identical terms in §13.2 of the Report.

<sup>7</sup> See Lord Bingham's reference in Heaton v Axa Equity & Law Life Assurance plc [2002] UKHL 15; [2002] 2 All E.R. 961 at [9] to "the limited class of contracts which either at common law or by virtue of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 was enforceable by . . . a third party". cf. Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 535 per Lord Clyde, saying that the 1999 Act had "made some inroads on the principle of privity" and Lord Browne-Wilkinson, ibid. at 575, saying that the Act had "fundamentally affected" the law on this topic. It is respectfully submitted that these are more accurate statements than Lord Goff's reference ibid. at 544 to the "abolition" by the Act of the doctrine of privity, and to his similar statement in Johnson v Gore Wood & Co [2002] 2 A.C. 1 at 40 ("recently abolished by statute").

and the Act is therefore treated as such an exception in this Chapter, though because of its importance a separate section will be devoted to it.<sup>8</sup> The new exception is, however, limited in two ways. First, a number of situations which have in the past been perceived as giving rise to problems resulting from the doctrine of privity are simply outside the scope of the exception and so are not affected by the provisions of the 1999 Act at all: this is, for example, true of many of the cases in which third parties who have suffered loss in consequence of the breach of a contract between others have sought a remedy in tort against the party in breach.<sup>9</sup> Secondly, the exception created by the 1999 Act is, in turn, under that Act subject to exceptions<sup>10</sup> to which the third party's new statutory rights do not extend; and the effect of this is that in some<sup>11</sup> of these cases the common law doctrine of privity continues to apply. The Act also does not affect any rights which the third party has apart from its provisions<sup>12</sup>: thus it does not deprive the third party of rights which he has because the case falls either outside the scope of the common law doctrine<sup>13</sup> or within one of the exceptions to it recognised either at common law, or in equity or under other legislation.<sup>14</sup> The scope of the doctrine and these other exceptions therefore continue to call for discussion, particularly because the content of rights available apart from the 1999 Act in some ways differs from that of the rights available under it.<sup>15</sup> The Act also (in accordance with the Law Commission's recommendations<sup>16</sup>) does not affect the common law rule that a contract cannot impose liabilities on a third party or (in general) otherwise bind him, so that this aspect of the common law doctrine, too, continues to call for discussion. Nor does the Act affect any rights of the promisee to enforce any term of the contract<sup>17</sup>: such questions as whether the promisee can recover damages in respect of the third party's loss will therefore continue to be governed by the rules which have been (and no doubt will further be) developed as a matter of common law. There is finally the point that the 1999 Act does not apply to contracts made before the end of the period of six months beginning on the day on which it was passed and came into force,<sup>18</sup> except where a contract made within that period expressly provides that the Act is to apply to it.<sup>19</sup> It is therefore likely that for some years to come the courts will be concerned with contracts subject to the rules of law established before the Act came into force. These rules will also, in a significant number of the situations described above, continue to apply even to contracts made after that date. These rules therefore still require discussion, even though a considerable number of the cases on which they are based would if their facts occurred now be decided differently (where they had denied the third party the right to enforce the contract) or be decided on different grounds (where they had given the third party such a right). The result of all these points is that the 1999 Act may have improved, but it has scarcely simplified, the law on this topic.

---

<sup>8</sup> See below, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>9</sup> For further discussion of this point, see below, pp.607 et seq.

<sup>10</sup> See s.6 of the Act, discussed at p.661, below.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. s.6(2) and 6(3); under some of the other exceptions, the third party will be able to get rights by another legal route: e.g. under those stated in s.6(1) and (5): see below, pp.661–662.

<sup>12</sup> s.7(1), below pp.662–663; Report, §12.12.

<sup>13</sup> See below, pp.606–619.

<sup>14</sup> See below, pp.645–651, 666–671.

<sup>15</sup> e.g. ss.2 and 3 of the 1999 Act do not apply where the third party has rights apart from the Act; below, pp.622–664.

<sup>16</sup> Report, §§10.32, 7.6.

<sup>17</sup> s.4; below, p.665.

<sup>18</sup> On November 11, 1999, when the Act received the Royal Assent: see s.10(2).

<sup>19</sup> See s.10(3).

SECTION 2. THE COMMON LAW DOCTRINE<sup>20</sup>

The common law doctrine of privity means that a contract cannot, as a general rule, confer rights or impose obligations arising under it on any person except the parties to it. Two questions arise from this statement: who are the parties to the agreement? and has the claimant provided consideration for the promise which he is seeking to enforce?

1. Parties to the Agreement

Normally, the parties to the agreement are the persons from whose communications with each other the agreement has resulted. There may, indeed, be factual difficulties in identifying these persons<sup>21</sup>; but such difficulties do not generally<sup>22</sup> raise any questions of legal principle. Problems as to the legal analysis of clearly established facts can, however, arise in situations in which there is clearly an agreement, while it is doubtful exactly who the parties to it are, or in which there are several contracts which affect the same subject-matter and involve more than two parties. The rights of all the parties to such contracts arise independently of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, and are not limited by its provisions.<sup>23</sup>

(1) Collateral contracts<sup>24</sup>

(a) ILLUSTRATIONS. A contract between two persons may be accompanied by a collateral contract between one of them and a third person relating to the same subject-matter. In Shanklin Pier v Detel Products Ltd,<sup>25</sup> the claimants employed contractors to paint a pier and instructed them for this purpose to buy and use paint made by the defendants. The instruction was given in reliance on a representation made by the defendants to the claimants that the paint would last for seven years. In fact it lasted for only three months. The main contract for the sale of the paint was between the contractors and the defendants, but it was held that there was also a collateral contract between the claimants and the defendants that the paint would last for seven years. The same reasoning can apply where a person buys goods from a dealer and is given a guarantee issued by the manufacturer. The main contract of sale is between the dealer and the customer, but it seems that the guarantee is a collateral contract between the manufacturer and the customer.<sup>26</sup> Special legislation applies to certain guarantees given to consumers in respect of goods sold or supplied to them. Where the requirements specified in this legislation are satisfied, such guarantees are to take effect as contractual

<sup>20</sup> Finlay, Contracts for the Benefit of Third Persons; Dold, Stipulations for a Third Party; Wilson, 11 Sydney L.Rev. 300; Flannigan, 105 L.Q.R. 564; Kincaid, [1989] C.L.J. 454; Andrews, 8 Legal Studies 14.

<sup>21</sup> e.g. The Zinnia [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 211; Empresa Lineas Maritimas Argentinas v The Oceanus Mutual Underwriting Association (Bermuda) Ltd [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 517; Uddin v Ahmed [2001] EWCA Civ 240; [2001] 3 F.C.R. 300; The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [175].

<sup>22</sup> A highly specialised group of cases (beyond the scope of this book) concerns bills of lading issued in respect of goods shipped on a chartered ship: see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed.), §4-027 to 4-052; The Starsin, above, n.21.

<sup>23</sup> Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.7(1).

<sup>24</sup> Wedderburn [1959] C.L.J. 58.

<sup>25</sup> [1951] 2 K.B. 854; followed in Wells (Merstham) Ltd v Buckland Sand & Silica Co Ltd [1965] 2 Q.B. 170, even though no specific main contract was contemplated when the "collateral" undertaking was given. cf. also below, p.738.

<sup>26</sup> cf. above, p.77.

obligations<sup>27</sup> whether or not the requirements of a collateral contract<sup>28</sup> are satisfied; but these requirements continue to apply to manufacturers' guarantees not covered by this legislation: e.g., where the person to whom the guarantee is given is not a "consumer"<sup>29</sup>. Again, a contract for the execution of building work between A and B may be performed, wholly or in part, through the instrumentality of sub-contractor C, nominated by A but engaged by B. Such an arrangement usually gives rise to a contract between A and B and to one between B and C, but not to one between A and C<sup>30</sup>; but it is possible for a collateral contract to arise between these last two parties,<sup>31</sup> making C contractually liable to A. Yet a further situation in which a single transaction involves several contracts is that in which a supply of goods is paid for by the use of a cheque card or credit card. Such a transaction involves three contracts: one between the supplier and the customer, a second between the customer and the issuer of the card, and a third between the issuer of the card and the supplier of the goods.<sup>32</sup> The supplier therefore has a common law right of action against the issuer on this third contract.

The collateral contract device has also been used to solve a difficulty arising out of hire-purchase agreements. The customer may think of himself as "buying on hire-purchase" from the dealer on whose premises he selects the goods. Actually, the transaction may involve a sale of the goods by the dealer to a finance company which then hires them out to the customer and grants him an option to purchase them. Thus the main contract of hire-purchase is between the customer and the finance company. A representation by the dealer as to the quality of the goods used not to bind the finance company,<sup>33</sup> but it could be enforced against the dealer as a collateral contract.<sup>34</sup> If the transaction is a regulated agreement within the Consumer Credit Act 1974,<sup>35</sup> a dealer who conducts antecedent negotiations is deemed to do so as agent of the finance company as well as in his actual capacity.<sup>36</sup> His representations can therefore make the company liable under the main contract, while he himself may still be liable under a collateral contract.<sup>37</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045; reg.15, implementing Dir.1999/44 Arts 2(e) and 6; for the meaning of "consumer" in this context, see reg.2.

<sup>28</sup> i.e., those of consideration and contractual intention (below, p.584).

<sup>29</sup> e.g., on facts such as those of the Shanklin Pier case, above, n.25.

<sup>30</sup> e.g. Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758; National Trust v Haden & Young (1994) 72 B.L.R. 1.

<sup>31</sup> Holland Hannen & Cubitts (Northern) v. Welsh Health Technical Services Ltd (1987) 7 Con.L.R. 14; cf. Welsh Health Technical Service Organisation v Haden Young (1987) 37 Build.L.R. 130; Greater Nottingham Co-operative Soc Ltd v Cementation Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71; contrast National Trust v Haden & Young, above, where there was no such collateral contract; for C's possible liability to A in tort, see below, pp.607-608.

<sup>32</sup> Re Charge Card Services [1987] Ch. 150, affirmed [1989] Ch. 497; Tiplady, [1989] 1 M.C.L.Q. 22; Jones, [1988] J.B.L. 457; cf. Customs & Excise Commissioners v Diners Club Ltd [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1196; Metropolitan Police Commissioner v Charles [1977] A.C. 177; R. v Lambie [1988] A.C. 449; First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1229 (where the card had been stolen and presented to the retailers by the thief); a different analysis probably applies where the card is issued by the supplier, as is the practice of some department stores: Richardson v Worrall [1985] S.T.C. 693 at 720.

<sup>33</sup> Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Gall [1961] 1 Q.B. 431; reversed on other points in Brannwhite v Worcester Works Finance Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 552 and United Dominions Trust Ltd v Western [1976] Q.B. 513.

<sup>34</sup> Brown v Sheen & Richmond Car Sales [1950] 1 All E.R. 1102; Andrews v Hopkinson [1957] 1 Q.B. 229; Diamond, (1958) 21 M.L.R. 177; cf. Astley Industrial Trust Ltd v Grimley [1963] 1 W.L.R. 584; as to damages, see Yeoman Credit Ltd v Odgers [1962] 1 W.L.R. 215.

<sup>35</sup> See above, p.178.

<sup>36</sup> s.56(2); cf. also s.75, under which the finance company is liable for any breach of contract by the supplier, but entitled to an indemnity from him in respect of such liability.

<sup>37</sup> This follows from s.56(2), above.

(b) CONSIDERATION FOR COLLATERAL CONTRACTS. To be enforceable as a collateral contract, a promise must be supported by consideration,<sup>38</sup> and in the cases so far discussed this requirement was clearly satisfied. In the Shanklin Pier case the consideration was the instruction given by the claimants to their contractors<sup>39</sup>; in the guarantee case it is the purchase by the customer of the goods from the dealer<sup>40</sup>; in the building sub-contractor case, it is similarly the nomination of the sub-contractor by the client; in the cheque or credit card case it is the supply of goods by the supplier to the customer and the discount allowed by the supplier to the issuer of the card<sup>41</sup>; and in the hire-purchase case it is the entering by the customer into a hire-purchase agreement with the finance company. A case in which the problem of consideration gives rise to more difficulty is Charnock v Liverpool Corporation,<sup>42</sup> where a car was damaged and repaired under a contract between the owner's insurance company and a garage. It was held that there was also a collateral contract by which the garage promised the owner to do the repairs reasonably quickly. Although the owner did not pay or promise to pay the garage anything,<sup>43</sup> he had provided consideration by "leaving his car with the garage for repair".<sup>44</sup> This might not be a detriment to the owner, at least in the factual sense.<sup>45</sup> But it benefited the garage in giving it the opportunity of making a contract for the repair of the car with the insurance company; and this benefit constituted the consideration for the garage's promise to the owner.<sup>46</sup>

(c) CONTRACTUAL INTENTION. In the present context, as in others,<sup>47</sup> a promise will not amount to a collateral contract if it was made without contractual intention. For example, in Independent Broadcasting Authority v EMI Electronics<sup>48</sup> EMI had contracted to erect a television mast for the IBA, on the terms that the actual work was to be done by a sub-contractor, who was not a party to the main contract. The sub-contractor wrote to the IBA, saying: "We are well satisfied that the structure will not oscillate dangerously". The mast having later collapsed, it was held that this letter did not have contractual force as there was no animus contrahendi<sup>49</sup> (though the sub-contractor was held liable in negligence).

(2) Agency

Where an agent negotiates a contract with a third party on behalf of his principal, that contract will generally be between the principal and the third party.<sup>50</sup> But it is sometimes

<sup>38</sup> cf. Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] Q.B. 467, (above, p.102), where no third party problem arose.

<sup>39</sup> [1951] 2 K.B. 854 at 856.

<sup>40</sup> cf. (in a different context) Penn v Bristol & West BS [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1356 at 1363 ("entering into some transaction with a third party").

<sup>41</sup> Customs & Excise Commissioners v Diners Club Ltd [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1196.

<sup>42</sup> [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1498.

<sup>43</sup> cf. Godfrey Davies Ltd v Culling and Hecht [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 349; Cooter & Green Ltd v Tyrell [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 377; Brown & Davies v Galbraith [1972] 1 W.L.R. 997.

<sup>44</sup> [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1498 at 1505.

<sup>45</sup> See above, p.69.

<sup>46</sup> cf. above, p.95. For similar reasoning, see International Petroleum Refining & Supply Sociedad v Caleb Brett & Son Ltd [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 569 at 594.

<sup>47</sup> See above, pp.161–162, 179–180, 199–200, 356–357.

<sup>48</sup> (1980) 14 Build.L.R. 1; cf. Alicia Hosiere Ltd v Brown Shipley Ltd [1970] 1 Q.B. 195; Lambert v Lewis [1982] A.C. 225; Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138 at 142; for a successful appeal on another point, see [1995] Ch. 152, below, p.622.

<sup>49</sup> cf. also Hannam v Bradford CC [1970] 1 W.L.R. 937; Construction Industry Training Board v Labour Force Ltd [1970] 3 All E.R. 220.

<sup>50</sup> See below, pp.727 et seq.

doubtful whether a person acted as agent or on his own behalf.<sup>51</sup> Thus where a husband booked tickets on a cross-Channel ferry for himself, his wife and children, there was said to be a "contract of carriage between the [wife] and the [carriers],"<sup>52</sup> presumably made by the husband as agent of the wife. Where a husband and wife lunched together at a restaurant, it was again held that there was a contract between the wife and the proprietor, though on the different ground that husband and wife each made a separate contract with the proprietor.<sup>53</sup> But if there were no such separate contracts and the host on such an occasion did not act as agent it has been said that there would be a contract only between him and the restaurant proprietor.<sup>54</sup>

Similar problems arise where an agent employs a sub-agent. In some such cases there is a direct contract between principal and sub-agent; while in others the sub-agent is in a contractual relationship only with the agent who employed him.<sup>55</sup> In these cases it is again clear that there is a contract, but doubtful who the parties to it are.

(3) Multilateral contracts

When a person joins a club or other unincorporated association he may be in direct communication only with the secretary and be unaware of the identity of the other members. But his contract of membership is likely to be with them,<sup>56</sup> and not with the secretary.<sup>57</sup> It has similarly been held that an insurance policy, which was expressed to be between the assured and a syndicate of underwriters at Lloyd's, nevertheless constituted a number of separate contracts between the assured and each member of the syndicate.<sup>58</sup>

Problems of this kind can also arise where a number of persons agree to enter into a competition subject to rules laid down by the organising club. In The Satanita<sup>59</sup> it was held that the competitors in a regatta had contracted not only with the committee of the club but also with each other. But in Ellesmere v Wallace<sup>60</sup> it was held that persons who entered horses for races organised by the Jockey Club had contracted with the club, and not with each other.

<sup>51</sup> See below, pp.706–708; P Samuel & Co Ltd v Dumas [1923] 1 K.B. 593; [1924] A.C. 431. Similar problems commonly arise in relation to "forwarding agents": see, e.g. Jones v European General Express (1920) 25 Com.Cas. 296; Elektronska, etc. v Transped, etc. [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 49.

<sup>52</sup> The Dragon [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 257 at 262; affirmed [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 415; cf. Wilson v Best Travel Ltd [1993] 1 All E.R. 353 at 355; Bormerman v Association of British Travel Agents [1995] N.I.J. 1815 (holiday booked for pupil by teacher).

<sup>53</sup> Lockett v A M Charles Ltd [1938] 4 All E.R. 170.

<sup>54</sup> Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468 at 1473 (where Lockett v A M Charles Ltd supra, was not cited).

<sup>55</sup> See below, p.747; contrast Robbins v Fennell (1847) 11 Q.B. 248 with Collins v Brook (1860) 5 H. & N. 700; cf. also The Antama [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 112 (agent failing to specify which of two persons is the principal for the purpose of the transaction); Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145; and see the situation which arose for tax purposes in Crossland v Hawkins (1961) 39 T.C. 493.

<sup>56</sup> Lee v Shoemmen's Guild [1952] 2 Q.B. 329 at 341; but in Anderton v Rowland, The Times, November 5, 1999, it was held that breach of the rules by one member did not, as a matter of construction, give another member a right of action in damages against the member guilty of the breach.

<sup>57</sup> Hybart v Parker (1858) 4 C.B.(N.S.) 209; Gray v Pearson (1870) L.R. 5 C.P. 568; Evans v Hooper (1875) 1 Q.B.1.D. 45; Nutting v Baldwin [1995] 1 W.L.R. 201. But where a club was owned by a company of which the club's members were shareholders, the rules of the club were held to constitute contracts between each member and the company, and not between the members inter se: Peskin v Anderson [2000] 2 B.C.I.C. 1.

<sup>58</sup> Touche Ross & Co v Colin Bank [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 207 at 209–210.

<sup>59</sup> [1895] P. 248; affirmed sub nom. Clarke v Dunraven [1897] A.C. 59, where only Lord Herschell dealt with the point here discussed; cf. Meggeson v Burns [1972] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 223; White v Blackmore [1972] 2 Q.B. 651 (where there was no contractual intention).

<sup>60</sup> [1929] 2 Ch. 1.

(4) Corporations

Under the Companies Acts<sup>61</sup> the memorandum and articles of association of a company<sup>62</sup> bind the company and its members as if they had been signed and sealed by each member and contained covenants by each member to observe the provisions of the memorandum and articles. The memorandum and articles amount to a “statutory contract”<sup>63</sup> between each member and the company<sup>64</sup>; and also to one between the members inter se.<sup>65</sup> But they only have the latter effect between the members in their capacity as members<sup>66</sup>; a director is not liable or entitled under them in his capacity as director simply because he happens also to be a member.<sup>67</sup>

In the case of a limited liability partnership (which is a body corporate),<sup>68</sup> the mutual rights and liabilities of the members inter se and between the members and the partnership are governed by agreement between the members or between them and the partnership<sup>69</sup>; or, in the absence of such agreement, by regulations made under the Act governing such partnerships.<sup>70</sup>

(5) Mortgage valuations

Problems as to parties may also arise where a house is valued at the instigation of a building society to which a prospective purchaser has applied for a loan which is to be secured by a mortgage on the house. Where the valuation is carried out by a full-time employee of the building society, there will usually be a contract between the society and its employee, and one between the society and the borrower (under which the society will be vicariously liable for the valuer’s negligence) but none between the valuer and the borrower.<sup>71</sup> Where, on the other hand, the valuation is carried out by an independent valuer, there may be a contract between him and the borrower<sup>72</sup> but this is not necessarily the case. If, for example, the independent valuer were appointed and paid by the society and reported directly to it, there is unlikely to be any contractual relationship between borrower and valuer, though the valuer will be liable to the borrower in tort if as a result of his negligence his report is inaccurate or incomplete and the borrower suffers loss.<sup>73</sup>

The reason why there is no separate contract in the first of the above situations is presumably that the valuer has no intention to contract with the borrower since he

<sup>61</sup> See now Companies Act 1985, s.14(1); Goldberg, 48 M.L.R. 158. The reference to sealing seems (perhaps inadvertently) to have survived Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.1.

<sup>62</sup> See above, p.560.

<sup>63</sup> Soden v British Commonwealth Holdings [1998] A.C. 298 at 323.

<sup>64</sup> Hickman v Kent or Romney Marsh Sheepbreeders Association [1915] 1 Ch. 881; cf. Cumbrian Newspaper Group v Cumberland and Westmorland Herald Ltd [1987] Ch. 1.

<sup>65</sup> Rayfield v Hands [1960] Ch. 1; J H Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v DTI [1989] Ch. 72 at 190 (approved on this point [1990] 2 A.C. 418 at 515); cf. Russell v Northern Bank Development Corp Ltd [1992] B.C.L.C. 1016. But there is no contract between members on the one hand and third parties on the other: Eley v Positive, etc., Assurance Co (1876) 1 Ex.D. 88.

<sup>66</sup> For limitations on the scope of this contract, see Soden v British and Commonwealth Holdings [1998] A.C. 298. They are not affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: see s.6(2), below, p.662.

<sup>67</sup> Beattie v E & F Beattie Ltd [1938] Ch. 708; Rayfield v Hands, above, is difficult to reconcile with this principle: I.C.B.G., 21 M.L.R. 401.

<sup>68</sup> See above, p.563.

<sup>69</sup> Limited Liability Partnership Act 2000, s.5(1)(a).

<sup>70</sup> ibid., s.5(1)(c).

<sup>71</sup> Halifax Building Society v Edell [1992] Ch. 436. Nor could the borrower enforce a term of the valuer’s employment contract by virtue of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: see s.6(3), below, p.662.

<sup>72</sup> Halifax Building Society v Edell, above, at 454.

<sup>73</sup> See, e.g. Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831.

believes that he is merely carrying out his duties under his contract with the society. The further suggestion that, in this situation, there is “seemingly no consideration for a contract by the valuer as principal”<sup>74</sup> is, with respect, harder to follow. It cannot mean that there is no consideration because the valuer is doing no more than performing his contract of employment, for it is now settled that performance of a contractual duty owed to a third party can constitute consideration<sup>75</sup>; and in any event the question is whether there is consideration for the valuer’s promise, and this consideration must move, not from him, but from the purchaser. Prima facie, such consideration is provided by the payment of the survey fee by the purchaser to the society, or by his entering into the mortgage transaction; and it is immaterial that this consideration does not move (at least directly) to the valuer; for so long as consideration moves from the promisee it need not move to the promisor.<sup>76</sup> Nor would such consideration be past, even if the fee had been paid before the valuer had been engaged; for the test for deciding whether consideration is past is a functional (rather than a strictly chronological) one, which is satisfied in the situation discussed here since the consideration and the promise given in return are substantially one transaction.<sup>77</sup> Indeed, the assumption that it is so satisfied is supported by the view that there can be a contract between an independent valuer and the purchaser,<sup>78</sup> since the consideration which moves from the purchaser is exactly the same whether the valuer is an employee of the building society or an independent person.

2. Party to the Consideration

The common law rule that only a party to the agreement can enforce it will often lead to the same result as the rule that consideration must move from the promisee<sup>79</sup>; but the two rules appear to be distinct. They require the claimant to show (1) that the promise was made to him and (2) that the consideration for it moved from him. The statement that consideration must move from the promisee simply assumes that the first requirement has been satisfied. If the rule were stated to be that consideration must move from the party seeking to enforce the promise it would clearly be distinct from the common law rule that only a party to the agreement can sue. A father might, for example, promise his daughter to pay £1,000 to anyone who married her. A man who married the daughter with knowledge of and in reliance on such a promise might provide consideration for it, but could not enforce it, as it was not addressed to him.<sup>80</sup>

A decision which supports the view that the two rules are distinct is Kepong Prospecting Ltd v Schmidt,<sup>81</sup> where a third party made a claim to enforce a contract under the law of Malaysia, by which consideration need not move from the promisee. In rejecting the claim, the Privy Council said: “It is true that section 2(d) of the Contracts Ordinance gives a wider definition of ‘consideration’ than that which applies in England, particularly in that it enables consideration to move from another person than the promisee, but the appellant was unable to show how this affected the law as to enforcement of contracts by third parties”.<sup>82</sup>

<sup>74</sup> Halifax Building Society v Edell [1992] Ch. 436 at 454.

<sup>75</sup> See above, pp.97–98.

<sup>76</sup> See above, p.81.

<sup>77</sup> See above, p.77.

<sup>78</sup> See above, at n.72.

<sup>79</sup> See Price v Easton (1833) B. & Ad. 433; Tiniddle v Atkinson (1861) B & S. 393.

<sup>80</sup> cf. Uddin v Ahmed [2001] EWCA Civ 204, [2001] 3 F.C.R. 300, at [20].

<sup>81</sup> [1968] A.C. 810.

<sup>82</sup> ibid. at 826.

3. Reasons for the Doctrine

There are two aspects of the common law doctrine of privity: no one except a party to a contract can acquire rights under it; and no one except a party can be subjected to liabilities under it. The reason for the second aspect of the doctrine is obvious: a person should not, as a general rule, have contractual obligations imposed on him without his consent. The first aspect of the doctrine is harder to explain; indeed, Steyn L.J. has gone so far as to say that there is “no doctrinal, logical or policy reason”<sup>83</sup> for it. The rule that a third party cannot acquire rights under a contract can scarcely be justified by saying that a contract is, or gives rise, to a personal relationship, affecting only the parties to it; for this is rather a restatement of the rule than a reason for its existence. Nor is it satisfactory to say that it would be unjust to allow a person to sue on a contract on which he could not be sued<sup>84</sup>; for the law enforces unilateral contracts, to which the same argument applies.<sup>85</sup> A further possible reason is that, if third parties could enforce contracts made for their benefit, the rights of contracting parties to rescind or vary such contracts would be unduly hampered: this reasoning has certainly been influential in limiting the development of one of the judge-made exceptions to the doctrine.<sup>86</sup> Yet another possible reason is that the third party is often a mere donee. A system of law which does not give a right to enforce a gratuitous promise to the promisee may well be reluctant to give such a right to a gratuitous beneficiary who is not even a promisee. None of these reasons for the common law doctrine takes account of the inconvenience that can result from its practical operation. This factor accounts for the many exceptions to the doctrine which will be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>87</sup>

4. Development

In the early authorities, there was considerable conflict on the question whether a person could enforce a contract to which he was not a party.<sup>88</sup> A negative answer to this question was given in 1861 in Tieddle v Atkinson,<sup>89</sup> where A promised B to pay a marriage portion to B's son C on C's marriage to A's daughter. It was held that C could not enforce this promise against A. This case was generally considered to have established the common law doctrine,<sup>90</sup> which was approved by the House of Lords in 1915, when the principle that “only a person who is a party to the contract can sue on it” was said to be a “fundamental”<sup>91</sup> one in English law. This view was, indeed, judicially doubted in a

<sup>83</sup> Darlington BC v Wiltshier Northern Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 76.

<sup>84</sup> Tieddle v Atkinson (1861) 1 B. & S. at p.398.

<sup>85</sup> See above, pp.37–41, 151.

<sup>86</sup> See below, pp.645, 648. It is also reflected in s.2 of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

<sup>87</sup> See below, pp.651 et seq; see also p.642–645.

<sup>88</sup> In Crow v Rogers (1724) 1 Str. 592; Baurne v Mason (1669) 1 Ventr. 6 and Price v Easton (1833) 4 B. & Ad. 433 the third party's claim failed; but it was upheld in Thomas v — (1655) Sty. 461; Dutton v Poole (1678) 2 Lev. 210, affirmed T. Raym. 302 and approved in Martyn v Hind (1776) Cowp. 437 at 443; Green v Horn (1693) Comb. 219 (reversed (1694) 1 Salk. 197 on the ground that the third party must at least be mentioned in the deed) and Marchington v Vernon (1786) 1 B. & P. 101. n. (c); E.J.P., 70 L.Q.R. 467; Scammel, 8 C.L.P. 134–135; Palmer, 33 Am. Jl. of Legal History 3; Ibbetson in (ed.) Barton, Towards a General Law of Contract, 67, 96–99; Palmer, The Paths to Privity: the History of Third Party Beneficiaries in English Law; Andrews, 69 Tulane L.Rev. 69.

<sup>89</sup> (1861) 1 B. & S. 393.

<sup>90</sup> Gandy v Gandy (1884) 30 Ch.D. 57, at 69.

<sup>91</sup> Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] A.C. 847 at 853; for a similar, earlier, statement, see Keighley Maxsted & Co v Durant [1901] A.C. 240 at 246.

number of cases.<sup>92</sup> But in 1961 the House of Lords once again affirmed the existence of the doctrine,<sup>93</sup> and this view of the law has been accepted in many later cases.<sup>94</sup>

The leading modern case is Beswick v Beswick.<sup>95</sup> A coal merchant transferred his business to his nephew who made various promises in return. One of these was that he would, after the uncle's death, pay £5 per week to the uncle's widow. The uncle died and the widow became his administratrix. She brought an action to enforce the nephew's promise, suing both in her own right and as administratrix. The House of Lords held that the widow could enforce the nephew's promise in her capacity as administratrix of the promisee and that she was entitled to an order of specific performance against the nephew, obliging him to make the payments to her for her personal benefit. In the Court of Appeal Lord Denning M.R. had said that the widow could also sue in her own right at common law,<sup>96</sup> because the doctrine of privity was "at bottom . . . only a rule of procedure"<sup>97</sup> and could be overcome by simply joining the promisee as a party to the action. The House of Lords found it unnecessary to express a concluded view on this point. But the speeches all assume the correctness of the generally accepted view that a contract can at common law be enforced only by the parties to it<sup>98</sup>; though the House of Lords has on a number of occasions indicated its willingness to reconsider this position.<sup>99</sup> Such reconsideration has indeed been undertaken by a majority of the High Court of Australia, but in a decision in which so many divergent views were expressed, that it provides no firm guidance for the development of the law.<sup>1</sup> The difficulties of

<sup>92</sup> In Smith and Snipes Hall Farm Ltd v River Douglas Catchment Board [1949] 2 K.B. 500 at 519; Drive Yourself Hire Co (London) Ltd v Strutt [1954] 1 Q.B. 250 at 274; Pyrene Co Ltd v Scindia Steam Navigation Co Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 402 at 426; Rayfield v Hands [1960] Ch. 1; Dowrick, 19 M.L.R. 375; cf. Andrews, 8 Legal Studies 14.

<sup>93</sup> Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] A.C. 446; below, p.628; see also Green v Russell [1959] 2 Q.B. 226.

<sup>94</sup> Rookes v Barnard [1964] A.C. 1129 (below, p.614); Re Cook's Settlement Trust [1965] Ch. 902 at 915; Hepburn v A. Tomlinson (Hauliers) Ltd [1966] A.C. 451; The Eurymedon [1975] A.C. 154 166; The New York Star [1981] 1 W.L.R. 138; Woodar Investments & Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277; Balsamo v Medici [1984] 1 W.L.R. 951 at 959–960; Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077 at 1083; The Forum Craftsman [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 291 at 295; Singer (UK) Ltd v Tees & Hartlepool Port Authority [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 164 at 167; J H Rayner. (Mincing Lane) Ltd v DTI [1990] 2 A.C. 418 at 479, 506; The Captain Gregos [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 310 at 318; The Gudermes [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 311 at 314, Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 207; Rhone v Stephens [1994] 2 A.C. 310 at 321; The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 335, White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 252, 266; The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 658; Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1025 at 1028; The Giannis N K [1998] A.C. 605 at 616; the point is perhaps left open in Esso Petroleum Ltd v Hall Russell & Co [1989] A.C. 643 at 662.

<sup>95</sup> [1965] 2 All E.R. 858, [1966] Ch. 538; [1968] A.C. 58; Goodhart, 83 L.Q.R. 465; Fairrest [1967] C.L.J. 149; Treitel, 29 M.L.R. 657; 30 M.L.R. 687.

<sup>96</sup> For the effect of Law of Property Act 1925, s.56, see below, pp.669–671.

<sup>97</sup> [1966] Ch. at 557.

<sup>98</sup> [1968] A.C. at 72, 81, 83, 92–93, 95.

<sup>99</sup> ibid. at 72; Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 291, 297–298, 300; Swain v Law Society [1983] 1 A.C. 598 at 611; cf. Williams v Natural Life Health Foods [1998] 1 W.L.R. 830 at 837.

<sup>1</sup> Trident Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 C.I.R. 107, where a claim under a liability insurance policy by a person who was not a party to it was upheld by a majority of five to two. But one member of the majority (Deane J.) was only prepared to allow the third party's claim under the well-established trust exception to the doctrine of privity (below, p.646), while another (Gaudron J.) based her decision in favour of the third party, not on contract, but on unjust enrichment (below, p.625), and said that this was "not an abrogation of the doctrine of privity of contract" (at 177). Only three of the seven members of the court can be said to have countenanced such an abrogation, and even their view may be restricted to the special insurance context with which the case was concerned. See also Edgell, [1989] L.M.C.L.Q. 139; reaching satisfactory results in this area through purely judicial reconsideration are formidable: they arise, particularly, in defining exactly what classes of third parties can acquire rights under the contract, and in determining how those rights are to be affected by attempts by the contracting parties to rescind the contract or to vary it, and by defences available between the contracting parties.<sup>2</sup> A satisfactory solution of such difficulties is more likely to be achieved by legislative reform,<sup>3</sup> such as that contained in the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.<sup>4</sup> In a significant number of situations, however, third parties will not acquire rights by virtue of this Act<sup>5</sup>; and in many such situations the common law doctrine of privity will continue (at least for the time being<sup>6</sup>) to apply.

5. Operation of the Doctrine

Although at common law a third party cannot generally assert rights under a contract made for his benefit, the contract remains nevertheless binding between promisor and promisee. The fact that the contract was made for the benefit of a third party does, however, give rise to special problems so far as the promisee's remedies against the promisor are concerned. Actual performance of the contract may also lead to disputes between promisee and third party.

(1) Promisee's remedies

(a) SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. The promisee (or those acting for his estate) may seek specific performance. If, as in Beswick v Beswick,<sup>7</sup> this remedy is granted, the third party will in fact receive the benefit contracted for. But the scope of the remedy of specific performance is limited in various ways; these limitations, and their applicability to cases involving third parties, will be discussed in detail in Chapter 21.<sup>8</sup> It is therefore necessary to consider what other remedies may be available to the promisee if the contract is broken.

(b) RESTITUTION. The promisee may claim restitution of the consideration provided by him. But part performance by the promisor<sup>9</sup> might defeat this remedy,<sup>10</sup> and it might also be unjust to restrict the promisee to such a claim: for example, return of premiums could be a quite inadequate remedy where a policy of life insurance had been taken out for the benefit of a third party and had matured.

---

Kincaid, 2 J.C.L. 160. For a different judicial approach in Canada, proceeding by means of the creation of an exception to the doctrine in the context of exemption clauses, see London Drugs Ltd v Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299 (below, p.631); Waddams, 109 L.Q.R. 349; Adams and Brownsword, 56 M.J.L.R. 722. Cf. Fraser River Pile and Dredge Ltd v Can-Drive Services Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 199, where the Supreme Court of Canada, while refusing to engage in "wholesale abolition" of the doctrine of privity, continued to make "incremental changes" by holding that a third party could take the benefit of a "waiver of subrogation" clause in an insurance policy.

<sup>2</sup> See the elaborate discussion of these problems in American law (which in principle recognises the rights of third party beneficiaries) in Corbin on Contracts, Chaps 41–44. The effect of rescission or variation by the contracting parties gives rise to particular difficulties: cf. below, p.647.

<sup>3</sup> See Treitel, 29 M.J.L.R. 657, 665; Reynolds, 105 L.Q.R., 1, 3; contrast Darlington BC v Wiltshier Northern Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 76, favouring judicial reform.

<sup>4</sup> See below, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>5</sup> See below, pp.654–655, 661–662.

<sup>6</sup> The passing of the 1999 Act will probably reduce the pressure for judicial reform.

<sup>7</sup> [1968] A.C. 58, above, p.589.

<sup>8</sup> See below, pp.1038–1040.

<sup>9</sup> As in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 68.

<sup>10</sup> As there would be no "total failure of consideration;" and as "rescission" for breach could probably not be allowed unless the third party was willing to restore any performance received: below, pp.1052–1053. For the suggestion that the third party may have a claim in restitution, see below, p.625.

(c) AGREED SUM. The promisee may claim payment to himself of the agreed sum. It can be objected that to allow such a claim would force the promisor to do something which he never contracted to do, viz. to pay the promisee when he contracted to pay the third party; and one view is therefore that the promisee cannot sue for the agreed sum,<sup>11</sup> save in the exceptional circumstances to be described later in this Chapter.<sup>12</sup> But the objection to allowing the promisee to claim payment to himself loses most of its force where the promisor would not in fact be prejudiced by having to pay the promisee rather than the third party (so long as by such payment gave him a good discharge). In such a case, the contract may, on its true construction, be one to pay the third party or as the promisee shall direct,<sup>13</sup> so that it would not be inconsistent with its terms to allow the promisee to claim payment for himself. The promisee is a fortiori so entitled where the contract is one to pay him (the promisee) as nominee for the third party<sup>14</sup>: such a contract is not one for the benefit of a third party<sup>15</sup> in the sense of one purporting to give that party a right against the promisor.

(d) DAMAGES IN RESPECT OF PROMISEE'S LOSS. The promisee may claim damages where he has suffered loss as a result of the promisor's failure to perform in favour of the third party. But in Beswick v Beswick the majority of the House of Lords evidently thought that no such loss had been or would be suffered and that the damages recoverable by the estate for breach of the nephew's promise would be merely nominal.<sup>16</sup> Lord Upjohn explained that this would be the case because the promisee "died without any assets save and except the agreement which he hoped would keep him and then his widow for their lives".<sup>17</sup> It seems from this that damages might have been substantial if the promisee had had other assets—either because the widow might then have had a claim against those assets if the promise was not performed<sup>18</sup> or because the promisee or his estate would in fact, even if not legally obliged to do so, have made some other, wholly voluntary, provision for the widow. The loss suffered by the promisee would be the cost of making an alternative provision, and there is some authority to support the view that damages for breach of contract may be recovered to compensate for such loss even though the provision is wholly voluntary.<sup>19</sup> A fortiori the promisee can recover substantial damages where he is under a legal obligation to make a payment to the third party and where this obligation would have been discharged if the promisor had paid in accordance with the contract.

<sup>11</sup> See Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385 at 409–411; cf. Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. at 88, 101 (dealing with the remedy of damages).

<sup>12</sup> See Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 Q.B. 147; cf. below, p.650.

<sup>13</sup> The Spiros C [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 319 at 331; below, p.605.

<sup>14</sup> The Turiddu [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 401 at 407.

<sup>15</sup> ibid.

<sup>16</sup> Lord Pearce, however, thought that damages would be substantial: [1968] A.C. at p.88. It is not entirely clear whether he had in mind an action for damages or one for the agreed sum: see his reference at p.87 to "separate actions as each sum falls due".

<sup>17</sup> [1968] A.C. at 102 (italics supplied).

<sup>18</sup> e.g. under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938, now Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependents) Act 1975.

<sup>19</sup> Admiralty Commissioners v SS Amerika [1917] A.C. 38 at 61 (the actual decision was that payments voluntarily made to the victim of an alleged tori could not be recovered: on this point see also Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Hall Russell & Co Ltd [1989] A.C. 643). For the possibility of recovering, as damages for breach of contract, voluntary payments to or benefits conferred on third parties, see also Banco de Portugal v Waterlow & Sons Ltd [1932] A.C. 452, below, pp.978–979. And see the discussion at pp.594 and 596, below, of Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 A.C. 85 and of Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518.

(e) DAMAGES IN RESPECT OF THIRD PARTY'S LOSS: GENERAL RULE. The starting point of the following discussion is the general principle that, in an action for damages, a claimant cannot recover more than the amount required to compensate him for his loss,<sup>20</sup> so that he cannot, in general, recover damages for breach of a contract made for the benefit of a third party<sup>21</sup> in respect of loss suffered, not by the promisee, but by that third party.<sup>22</sup> That principle was indeed doubted by Lord Denning M.R. in Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd,<sup>23</sup> where the defendants contracted with the claimant to provide holiday accommodation for the claimant, his wife and their two three-year-old children.<sup>24</sup> The accommodation fell far short of the promised standard, and the claimant recovered damages, including £500 for "mental distress".<sup>25</sup> Lord Denning M.R., said that this sum would have been excessive compensation for the claimant's own distress.<sup>26</sup> He nevertheless upheld the award on the ground that the claimant had made a contract for the benefit both of himself and of his wife and children<sup>27</sup>; and that he could recover damages in respect of their loss as well as in respect of his own. But the authorities cited in support of this conclusion seem to contradict rather than to favour it.<sup>28</sup> Moreover, in Beswick v Beswick the majority of the House of Lords said that the promisee's estate could have recovered no more than nominal damages as it had suffered no loss.<sup>29</sup> This is scarcely consistent with the view that the promisee under a contract for the benefit of a third party is, as a general rule, entitled to damages in respect of the third party's loss. James L.J. in Jackson's case seems to have regarded the £500 as compensation for the claimant's own distress.<sup>30</sup> No doubt this was increased by his witnessing the distress suffered by his wife and children, and if the promisee himself suffers loss he should not be prevented from recovering it in full merely because the contract was made partly for the benefit of third parties<sup>31</sup> who also suffered loss. In Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction Co Ltd<sup>32</sup> the House of Lords disapproved Lord Denning's

<sup>20</sup> See below, p.927; cf. White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207, below, p.616, where the damages recoverable by the estate of the other party to the contract would have been no more than nominal.

<sup>21</sup> A fortiori, a promisee cannot recover damages in respect of loss suffered by a third party other than one for whose benefit the contract was made. Thus if A agrees to buy goods from B which B intends to acquire from C, and A repudiates the contract so that B does not in turn buy the goods from C, then B cannot recover damages in respect of any loss suffered by C: And so to Bed Ltd v Dixon, Transcript November 21, 2000 at [46-49], [54], Ch D. Of course if B had contracted to acquire the goods from C and was in consequence of A's repudiation liable in damages to C, then B could recover the amount for which he was not liable from A as damages in respect of his (B's) own loss: see below, p.912.

<sup>22</sup> The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774 at 846; Linden Gardens case, above n.19 at p.114; Alfred McAlpine Construction Co Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518, below, p.597 at nn.70 and 71.

<sup>23</sup> [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468; Yates, 39 M.L.R. 202.

<sup>24</sup> It was assumed that the wife and children were not parties to the contract. Contrast, as to this, above, p.585 at n.52.

<sup>25</sup> [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468 at 1472.

<sup>26</sup> [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468 at 1474.

<sup>27</sup> ibid.; cf. McCall v Abelesz [1976] Q.B. 585 at 594.

<sup>28</sup> Lord Denning M.R. relied on a dictum of Lush L.J. in Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch.D. 290 at 331 said to have been quoted by Lord Pearce in Beswick v Beswick "with considerable approval": [1975] 1 W.L.R. at 1473. In fact Lord Pearce said that the dictum "cannot be accepted without qualification and regardless of the context": [1968] A.C. at 88; cf. ibid. at 101; he agreed with the view expressed in Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385 at 411 that Lush L.J.'s dictum must be confined to the case in which the contract creates a trust in favour of the third party (below, p.646). This situation falls within the special exception stated at p.593, n.43 below.

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.591.

<sup>30</sup> At 1474.

<sup>31</sup> cf. Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262 (damages for failure to build a wall not reduced merely because claimant had entered into the contract, not only for his own benefit alone, but also for that of his tenants).

<sup>32</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277.

approach to the question of damages in Jackson's case, though the actual decision in the latter case was supported on the ground that the damages were awarded in respect of the claimant's own loss<sup>33</sup>; or alternatively on the ground that cases such as the booking of family holidays or ordering meals in restaurants<sup>34</sup> might "call for special treatment".<sup>35</sup> In the Woodar case itself a contract for the sale of land provided that, on completion, the purchaser should pay £850,000 to the vendor and also £150,000 to a third party. The vendor claimed damages on the footing that the purchaser had wrongfully repudiated the contract and the actual decision was that there had been no such repudiation,<sup>36</sup> so that the issue of damages did not arise. But the question what damages would have been recoverable in the Woodar case itself if there had been a wrongful repudiation was there described as "one of great doubt and difficulty"<sup>37</sup>; presumably it would turn on such factors as whether the vendor was under a legal obligation to ensure that the third party received the payment, or whether, on the purchaser's failure to make the payment, the vendor had himself made it, or procured it to be made, from other resources available to him.

The assumption underlying the Woodar case thus seems to be that, where a contract for the benefit of a third party has been broken, the promisee cannot generally recover damages in respect of a loss suffered only by the third party. But this position was there described as "most unsatisfactory"<sup>38</sup> and said to be in need of reconsideration, either by the legislature or by the House of Lords itself.<sup>39</sup> It is unsatisfactory because it can give rise to what has been called a "legal black hole"<sup>40</sup> that is, to a situation in which the promisor has committed a plain breach which has caused loss to the third party whom the contracting parties intended to benefit<sup>41</sup> but none to the promisee, and in which no other remedy<sup>42</sup> (than damages for the third party's loss) is available against the promisor.

(f) DAMAGES IN RESPECT OF THIRD PARTY'S LOSS: EXCEPTIONS IN GENERAL. Judicial awareness of the unsatisfactory results which can flow from the general rule that a promisee can recover damages only for his own loss has led to the creation of exceptions to that rule. For example, substantial damages for breach of contract can be recovered by a trustee even though the loss is suffered by his cestui que trust<sup>43</sup>; by an agent even though the loss is suffered by his undisclosed principal<sup>44</sup>; by a local authority even though the loss is suffered (ultimately) by its inhabitants<sup>45</sup>; and by the shipper of goods for breach <sup>33</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 283, 293, 297. Where a contract is made with a company and the breach causes loss to its subsidiary, damages can be recovered by the company since the value of its holding in the subsidiary will be reduced in consequence of the loss: George Fischer (Great Britain) Ltd v Multi Construction Ltd [1995] 1 B.C.L.C. 260.

<sup>34</sup> cf. Lockett v AM Charles Ltd [1938] 4 All E.R. 170, where agency reasoning was used in such a situation.

<sup>35</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 283. cf. Calabar Properties Ltd v Sticher [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287 at 290 where it was not disputed that a tenant's damages for her landlord's breach of his covenant to repair should include compensation for ill-health suffered by her husband.

<sup>36</sup> See below, p.808.

<sup>37</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 284. See also below, p.602, n.31.

<sup>38</sup> ibid. at 291; *cf. pp.*297–298, 300–301; cf. Forster v Silvermere Golf and Equestrian Centre (1981) 125 S.J. 397 ("a blot on our jurisprudence").

<sup>39</sup> cf. Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 72.

<sup>40</sup> Darlington BC v Wiltshier (Northern) Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 79; for the origins of this metaphor, see Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] A.C. 518 at 529.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.592 at n.21 for this requirement.

<sup>42</sup> e.g., by way of specific performance, as in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58.

<sup>43</sup> cf. below, p.646.

<sup>44</sup> See, for example, below, p.734.

<sup>45</sup> cf. St Albans' CC v International Computers Ltd [1996] 4 All E.R. 481.

of his contract of carriage with the shipowner even though the loss is suffered by a person to whom he has sold the goods, and to whom the risk and property in them had passed, but who has not himself acquired any rights to sue the shipowner under the contract of carriage<sup>46</sup>; it will be convenient to refer to this rule as “the Albazero exception”, after the leading modern case in which it is recognised.<sup>47</sup> In all these exceptional cases a person recovers substantial damages for breach of contract even though the breach caused loss, not to him, but to a third party.<sup>48</sup>

(g) FURTHER EXCEPTIONS: BUILDING CONTRACTS. The list of exceptions just stated should not be regarded as closed and the possibility of extending them or of creating further exceptions is illustrated by a line of cases beginning with Linden Gardens Trust v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd.<sup>49</sup> In that case, a building contract between parties described in it as employer and contractor provided for work to be done by the contractor by way of developing a site owned by the employer as shops, offices and flats. The site (but not the benefit of the contract) was later transferred by the employer to a third party, and it was assumed<sup>50</sup> for the purpose of the proceedings that the third party had suffered financial loss as a result of having to remedy breaches of the building contract committed after the transfer. In an action for breach of the building contract brought by the employer, the contractor argued that no loss had been suffered by the employer as he was no longer owner of the land when the alleged breaches occurred, and that the employer was therefore entitled to no more than nominal damages. In the House of Lords, this argument was rejected, and the employer’s claim upheld,<sup>51</sup> on two distinct grounds.

Lord Griffiths upheld the employer’s claim on what has become known as the “broader ground”<sup>52</sup> that the employer “ha[d] suffered financial loss because he ha[d] to spend money to give him the benefit of the bargain which the defendant had promised but failed to deliver”.<sup>53</sup> He added that “the court will of course wish to be satisfied that the repairs have been or are likely to be carried out”.<sup>54</sup> This approach is, it is submitted, <sup>46</sup> Dunlop v Lambert (1839) 2 Cl. & F. 626 at 627 (as to which see Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 523 et seq.); The Sanix Ace [1987] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 465; The Chanda [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 494. The rule was recognised in The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774, but held inapplicable as the buyer had acquired his own contractual rights against the shipowner under s.1 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855; (now repealed and replaced by Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924); Weir [1977] C.L.J. 24. In the case of contracts to which the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924 applies, a special statutory exception is created by s.2(4) of the Act to the general rule that a person can recover damages only in respect of his own loss; for a full discussion of this subsection, see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001), §§5–067 to 5–073.

<sup>47</sup> The Albazero, above, n.46.

<sup>48</sup> For recognition of a similar possibility in the law of tort, see Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 A.C. 350 at 357.

<sup>49</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85; Duncan Wallace, 110 L.Q.R. 42.

<sup>50</sup> The case is reported on a preliminary issue of law, so that the alleged facts had not been proved.

<sup>51</sup> cf. IMI Cornelius (UK) v Alan J Bloor (1993) 57 Build L.R. 108.

<sup>52</sup> Linden Gardens case, above, at 96–97 (per Lord Griffiths); Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518, e.g. at 532.

<sup>53</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 97. In fact the third party had reimbursed the employer in respect of this expenditure: see ibid. at 97; but this did not affect the question of liability.

<sup>54</sup> ibid. This requirement has been doubted on the ground that, in general, the court is “not concerned with what the plaintiff proposes to do with his damages”: Darlington BC v Wiltshire Northern Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 80; and see below p.946. But it seems, with respect, that Lord Griffiths’ requirement is concerned, not with the question what the plaintiff proposes to do with the damages, but with the question whether he has suffered any loss. In Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 592, Lord Millett (dissenting) rejects the above reasoning, apparently on the ground that the promisee is “bound to mitigate his loss” and “cannot increase it by entering into other arrangements”. But, with respect, the mitigation rules only require the injured party to act reasonably (below, pp.978–979) and in cases of the present kind this requirement would normally be satisfied where he made alternative provision to secure for the third party the benefit which the promisor has, in breach of the contract, failed to provide.

consistent with the explanation given in Beswick v Beswick<sup>55</sup> of the fact that the damages there were regarded as no more than nominal: the court there could not be satisfied that the substitute provision for the widow was likely to be made, precisely because the promisee lacked the means to make it.<sup>56</sup> The essence of Lord Griffiths' reasoning is that the promisee recovers damages in respect of the loss which he himself has suffered in ensuring that the third party receives the intended benefit. The "broader ground" therefore cannot apply where there is no practical possibility of curing the breach and so of securing the intended benefit to the third party, as in the "family holiday" cases discussed above.

Although Lord Keith had "much sympathy"<sup>57</sup> with, and Lord Bridge was "much attracted by",<sup>58</sup> Lord Griffiths' reasoning, they (as well as Lord Ackner) preferred to base their decision on the narrower ground stated by Lord Browne-Wilkinson. This treats the loss as having been suffered by the third party rather than by the employer, but concludes that the employer could nevertheless recover substantial damages as the case fell within the rationale of the Abazero exception<sup>59</sup> to the general rule that a party can recover damages only in respect of his own loss. The rationale of this exception was that, in the carriage of goods cases to which it applies, the shipper and carrier must have contemplated that property in the goods might be transferred to third parties after the contract had been made, and that the shipper must therefore be treated in law as having made the contract of carriage for the benefit of all persons who might after the time of contracting acquire interests in the goods.<sup>60</sup> This rationale applied equally to the facts of the Linden Gardens case since the contractor could foresee that parts of the new development were going to be "occupied and possibly purchased by third parties" so that "it could be foreseen that damage caused by a breach would cause loss to later owners".<sup>61</sup> The contractor could also foresee that a later owner would not have acquired rights under the building contract against the contractor since that contract expressly prohibited assignment by the employer without the contractor's written consent, which had not been sought. The effect of the Linden Gardens case was thus to extend the Albazero exception to building (and possibly to other) contracts, but it was consistent with two factors which had restricted the scope of that exception: namely that (a) the loss or damage was caused to property which had been transferred by one of the contracting parties to the third party; and (b) the third party had not acquired any rights under the building contract<sup>62</sup> and it was foreseeable (by reason of the prohibition against assignment) that he would not do so. The significance of these factors is further considered in the two later cases discussed below.

(i) No transfer of the subject-matter to third party. In Darlington BC v Wiltshier Northern Ltd<sup>63</sup> where a local authority (the council) wished to develop land which it already owned. The building work was to be done by the defendant; finance was to be provided by a bank but this could not be done in the most obvious way, by a loan to the council from the bank, since such an arrangement would have violated government restrictions on local authority borrowing. The transaction was therefore cast in the form of two contracts: (1) a building contract in which the bank was the employer and the

<sup>55</sup> [1968] A.C. 58.

<sup>56</sup> ibid. at 102; above p.591.

<sup>57</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 95.

<sup>58</sup> ibid. at 96.

<sup>59</sup> See above, at n.46.

<sup>60</sup> The Albazero [1977] A.C. 744 at 847.

<sup>61</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 114.

<sup>62</sup> cf. above, p.594 at n.47.

<sup>63</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68.

defendant the building contractor; and (2) a contract between the council and the bank, by which the bank undertook to procure the erection of the buildings on the site, to pay all sums due under the building contract and to assign to the council the benefit of any rights against the defendant to which the bank might be entitled at the time of the assignment. Cl.4(5) of this second contract provided that the bank was not to be liable to the council "for any incompleteness or defect in the building work"; and it was this provision which was the principal source of the difficulties in the case. The bank duly assigned its rights against the defendant to the council which claimed damages as such assignee from the defendant in respect of defects in the work. Since an assignee cannot recover more than the assignor could have been done,<sup>64</sup> the question arose what the bank could have recovered; and it was argued that it could have recovered no more than nominal damages since it had suffered no loss, having no interest in the land (or buildings) on which the work had been done and being protected by cl.4(5) from any liability to the council for defects in the work.<sup>65</sup> But the Court of Appeal rejected this argument and held that the bank could have recovered substantial damages from the defendant in respect of the council's loss and that it was this right which had been assigned to the council. This amounted to an extension<sup>66</sup> of the Linden Gardens case to a situation in which there was no transfer of the property affected by the breach from the promisee to the third party. This extension was later approved by the House of Lords,<sup>67</sup> so that, at least in the context of defective performance of building contracts,<sup>68</sup> such a transfer is no longer a necessary condition of the promisee's right to recover damages in respect of the third party's loss.

(ii) Third party with independent contractual right against promisor. In Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatton Ltd<sup>69</sup> the facts resembled those of the Darlington case in that a building contract was again made, not between the building contractor and the company which owned the site (the owner), but between that contractor and another company (the employer) associated with the owners; the object of adopting this tripartite structure was to avoid VAT. On the same day on which this building contract was made, a separate contract (the "Duty of Care Deed") was made between the owner and the contractor; the obligations imposed on the contractor by this deed were not precisely co-terminous with those imposed on him by the building contract; and the Deed did not, while the contract did, contain an arbitration clause. The employer alleged that the building work was seriously defective and in arbitration proceedings claimed damages from the contractor, who argued that the employer should recover no more than nominal damages since any loss resulting from the alleged defects in the work had been suffered, not by the employer (as the employer had never owned the property), but by the owner. The House of Lords, by a majority, upheld the contractor's argument and so rejected the

<sup>64</sup> See below, p.691.

<sup>65</sup> These difficulties are not, it is submitted, removed by Dillon L.J.'s alternative ground for decision, viz. that the bank was constructive trustee for the council of its contractual rights against the defendant: this reasoning merely pushes the enquiry back to the question what (if anything) the bank could have recovered from the defendant.

<sup>66</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 79, per Steyn L.J. Dillon L.J. regarded the result in the Darlington case as a "direct application" of the Linden Gardens case: ibid., at 75. Waite L.J. expressed his agreement with both the other judgments, though his reasoning seems to be closer to that of Dillon L.J. than to that of Steyn L.J. See also John Harris Partnership v Grovenorld Ltd [1999] P.N.L.R. 697 (developer entitled to recover from architect retained by him loss suffered in part by a third party who had financed the building project).

<sup>67</sup> Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatton Ltd [2001] A.C. 518 at 531, 566 per Lords Clyde and Jauncey; ibid., at 545, 584 per Lords Goff and Millett (dissenting).

<sup>68</sup> Quere whether this extension will be applied in the carriage by sea context in which the exception originated: see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001), §5-057.

<sup>69</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 518, discussed by Coote, 117 L.Q.R. 81, reversing (1998) 58 Const.L.R. 58, discussed by Treitel, 114 L.Q.R. 572; for further proceedings see (2001) 76 Con.L.R. 222.

employer's claim for substantial damages in respect of the owner's loss. It was accepted by the majority<sup>70</sup> and by one of the dissentients<sup>71</sup> that, as a general rule, a contracting party could not recover damages in respect of loss suffered, not by himself, but by a third party; and the question therefore arose whether the case could be brought within an exception to that general rule. This raised, in turn, the question whether either of the grounds for the decision in the Linden Gardens case<sup>72</sup> supported the employer's claim. It will be recalled that the "narrow" ground for that decision was derived from the "Albazero exception" under which a shipper of goods can sometimes recover damages in respect of a third party's loss.<sup>73</sup> That exception is, however, subject to the restriction that it does not apply where the third party had himself acquired contractual rights against the carrier,<sup>74</sup> usually by transfer to the third party of a bill of lading.<sup>75</sup> In the Panatown case, the majority held (and the dissentients accepted) that the case fell within this restriction, so that the "Albazero exception" (and hence the "narrow ground" in the Linden Gardens case) did not apply because the Duty of Care Deed gave the owner an independent contractual right against the contractor. This point was, moreover, decisive even though that right did not arise under a building contract, so that, in this respect the restriction was somewhat expanded: in the carriage by sea cases, the restriction normally<sup>76</sup> came into operation because the third party had acquired rights under a contract of carriage. Nevertheless it is respectfully submitted that this aspect of the Panatown case is consistent with the rationale of the restriction. In the carriage by sea cases, this could and did apply even though the content of the third party's contractual right against the carrier was not the same as that of the shipper's right<sup>77</sup>; and it was based on the reasoning that, where the third party had his own contractual rights against the carrier, the exception did not apply "because it was not needed".<sup>78</sup> It was not needed because, where the third party had his own contractual rights against the party in breach there was no risk of the "legal black hole"<sup>79</sup> which had driven judges to create exceptions to the general rule that a contracting party can recover damages only in respect of his own loss.

The majority in the Panatown case further held that the existence of the third party's rights against the contractor under the Duty of Care Deed also precluded the employer from recovering damages under the "broader ground"<sup>80</sup> given by Lord Griffiths in the Linden Gardens case. In view of the existence of those rights, the employer had no pecuniary interest in curing the defects in the contractor's work.<sup>81</sup> Hence he neither had suffered nor would suffer any loss of his own, in consequence of the contractor's breach,<sup>82</sup> and under the "broad ground" it is in respect of his own (not of the third party's) loss that the promisee recovers damages. This conclusion can, on the facts of the

<sup>70</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 522, 563, 575.

<sup>71</sup> Lord Millett, ibid., at 580–581; Lord Goff is more sceptical: see ibid. at 538–539.

<sup>72</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85, above, pp.551–552; referred to as the St Martin case throughout the speeches in the Panatown case.

<sup>73</sup> The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774; above pp.594, 595.

<sup>74</sup> This was the position in The Albazero, above, itself, where the exception accordingly did not apply.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.594, n.46.

<sup>76</sup> The restriction could also apply where the third party's contractual right against the carrier were under an implied contract of the kind illustrated by Brandt v Liverpool, etc., SN Co [1924] 1 K.B. 575; see The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774 at 847.

<sup>77</sup> As in The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774.

<sup>78</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 575; The Albazero, above at 847–848.

<sup>79</sup> Darlington BC v Wiltshire Northern Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 79; above, p.593 n.40.

<sup>80</sup> Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 532 all the other members of the House of Lords accepted and used in this terminology.

<sup>81</sup> ibid. at 574 and 577 (per Lords Jauncey and Browne-Wilkinson).

<sup>82</sup> cf. below, p.934.

Panatown case, be supported for two further reasons. First, the creation or extension of exceptions to the general rule that a party can recover damages only in respect of his own loss is and should be driven and limited by necessity<sup>83</sup>: that is, by the need to guard against the risk of “legal black holes” of the kind described above; and in the Panatown case there was no such risk.<sup>84</sup> Secondly, the decision gives effect to the “contractual scheme”<sup>85</sup> created by the parties; and this point, so far from being undermined by the fact that the contractor’s obligations to the owner under the Duty of Care Deed were not precisely co-terminous with his obligations to the employer under the building contract, is reinforced by this fact. As the parties had taken the “plain and deliberate course”<sup>86</sup> of giving the owner a “distinct entitlement”<sup>87</sup> against the contractor in respect of defects in the work, and as this entitlement was to be governed by the terms of one contract (the Duty of Care Deed), it followed that there was no good practical reason for holding the contractor liable in respect of the same defects on the terms of another contract (the building contract) for substantial damages to the employer, to whom these defects had caused no loss of his own. The fact that the “general rule” has been the subject of frequent judicial disapproval no doubt gives rise to the temptation to continue the process of eroding it by creating new or extending existing exceptions to it. But that criticism has occurred mainly in cases in which the third party problem was an inescapable consequence of normal commercial factors such as those which existed in the Linden Gardens case. The pressure for eroding the unpopular general rule is much less strong where the third party problem is, so to speak, manufactured by the parties for an ulterior motive, such as Government restrictions on borrowing, as in the Darlington case, or avoiding tax,<sup>88</sup> as in the Panatown case, where, in the view of the majority any such pressure was eliminated for the further reason that the third party had his own contractual remedy against the party in breach under a separate contract between these parties.

(h) OUTSTANDING PROBLEMS. The Panatown case is significant not only for the points it decides, but also for some of those which it leaves open.

(i) Status of the “broader ground”. The first such point relates to the effect of the case on the status of Lord Griffiths’ “broader ground” in the Linden Gardens case. This ground forms the basis of the two dissenting speeches<sup>89</sup> in the Panatown case, and it is not the subject of any adverse comment from the majority,<sup>90</sup> whose speeches do not rule out the possibility of its being applied in the, perhaps more common, situation in which the third party has no contractual rights of his own against the promisor in respect of loss suffered by him in consequence of the defective services rendered under the contract between promisor and promisee. It seems that, even in such a situation, the majority would deny the employer’s right to recover substantial damages under the “broader ground” unless either the condition stated by Lord Griffiths is satisfied, i.e. “the repairs

<sup>83</sup> See the references given in n.78, above.

<sup>84</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 574, per Lord Jauncey.

<sup>85</sup> ibid., at 577 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson; and see 76 Con. L.R. 224 at [38] (“made their contractual bed”). Cf. Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1992] 2 A.C. 145 at 195, using the phrase “contractual structure” in the context of the faintly analogous question whether a contract between A and B can impose on a duty of care to C: see below, p.608, n.87; cf. Greater Nottingham Co-operative Society Ltd v Cementation Piling and Foundation Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71 (tort duty excluded by tripartite contractual structure); and R M Turlton & Co Ltd v Kerslake & Partners [2000] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. P.N. 967 (New Zealand Court of Appeal).

<sup>86</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 536, per Lord Clyde.

<sup>87</sup> ibid.

<sup>88</sup> For the contrary view, see Lord Goff, dissenting, in the Panatown case, above, at 556–557.

<sup>89</sup> Of Lords Goff and Millett.

<sup>90</sup> Lords Clyde, Jauncey and Browne-Wilkinson.

have been or are likely to be carried out",<sup>91</sup> or the employer has entered into a separate contract with the owner undertaking liability in respect of defects in the contractor's work.<sup>92</sup> Where neither of these requirements is satisfied, the result of allowing the promisee to recover the cost of repairs as damages for his own loss would be "unattractive" in that it would enable him to "put the money in his own pocket"<sup>93</sup> without carrying out or paying for repairs: the technique of requiring him to hold the damages for the third party applies, on the authorities,<sup>94</sup> only where damages are recovered (under one of the exceptions to the general rule) in respect of the third party's, not in respect of the promisee's own loss. It follows that the requirements stated above<sup>95</sup> do not apply where the promisee's claim can succeed on the "narrow ground": in this respect, that ground is, paradoxically, broader than the "broader ground".

(ii) Scope of the "broader ground". If the "broader ground" is accepted for cases in which the third party has no contractual rights of his own against the promisor, then a further problem arises as to its scope. The example given by Lord Griffiths in support of this ground is one in which loss is caused by reason of the defective performance of a contract to render services.<sup>96</sup> The case put by him<sup>97</sup> is that of a husband who contracts with a builder to have his wife's house repaired; if the builder does the work defectively the husband is (so long as the other requirements of the "broader ground" are satisfied) entitled (in the example) to substantial damages, i.e., to the cost of putting the defects right. Two questions then arise. The first is whether the rationale of the "broader ground" applies to cases in which the breach consists of a simple failure or refusal to perform. And the second is whether it applies where the obligation which is not performed is one to do something other than to render services. The two questions come together in a case where, for a consideration provided or to be provided by A, a promise is made by B to A to pay a sum of money to C and B fails or refuses, wholly or in part to perform that promise. Those were, in substance, the facts of Beswick v Beswick<sup>98</sup> where the majority of the House of Lords took the view that the damages recoverable by the estate would be no more than nominal. That may not, indeed, amount to a direct rejection of the "broader ground" in such cases. The reason given in Beswick v Beswick for the view that the promisee's damages would there have been merely nominal was that the estate had no assets out of which it could make the payments to C which B had promised, but failed, to make.<sup>99</sup> But it is not clear whether in substance that reasoning is inconsistent with the "broader ground"; for, if the cost to A of securing the benefit intended for C is to be defrayed out of the damages, then it should not matter that A cannot provide that benefit out of his other assets, at least so long as A is solvent. The views expressed in Beswick v Beswick on the question of damages recoverable by the estate should, it is submitted, now be read subject to developments of the law as to damages in respect of a third party's loss in a number of later cases. The most directly relevant of these is the Woodar case<sup>1</sup> where it appears to be assumed that, as a general

<sup>91</sup> Linden Gardens case [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 97; see further p.601 below at n.18.

<sup>92</sup> No such separate contract was established in the Panatown case: see 76 Con.L.R. 224 at [35].

<sup>93</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 571. This possible restriction on the scope of the broader ground is not considered in the discussion of that ground in the further proceedings in that case (76 Con. L.R. 244 at [20]) being unnecessary to the decision at this stage.

<sup>94</sup> See below, p.605.

<sup>95</sup> See above, at nn.91 and 92.

<sup>96</sup> Lord Millett's dissent is restricted to this situation: [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 591; Lord Goff's dissent does not appear to be so restricted: see ibid. at 545, 552–553.

<sup>97</sup> Linden Gardens case [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 97.

<sup>98</sup> [1968] A.C. 58, above, p.589.

<sup>99</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 102; above p.591.

<sup>1</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277, above p.593.

rule,<sup>2</sup> A cannot recover substantial damages from B for B's failure to perform his promise to A to pay a sum of money to C. This conclusion seems to be based on the assumptions that the loss is C's and that A cannot generally recover damages in respect of C's loss. It does not seem to preclude the possibility of A's recovering damages in respect of any loss which he himself might have suffered in consequence of B's breach: e.g. because A was under a contractual obligation to procure the payment to C or because A, acting reasonably, has made alternative provision for C.<sup>3</sup> Even in the absence of such factors, it is submitted that, in the light of the developments since the Woodar case,<sup>4</sup> the law should take account of the possibility that, unless B were held liable for substantial changes to A, then he might be under no substantial liability at all: in other words, that there would be a "legal black hole". In Beswick v Beswick and the Panatown case there were no such "black holes": in the former case, because of the availability of a satisfactory remedy for A against B by way of specific performance in favour of C<sup>5</sup>; in the latter because of the availability of a satisfactory remedy for C against B in damages under the separate contract between these parties.<sup>6</sup> If there is no such remedy and if the conditions in which A can (under the "broader ground") recover damages in respect of his own loss are not satisfied,<sup>7</sup> then the lack of any such remedy should, it is submitted be a ground for allowing A to claim damages in respect of C's loss. The need to avoid the "black hole" should generate this remedy; and, where A has suffered no loss himself, result of allowing him to recover damages in respect of C's loss (rather than in respect of A's own loss) would also have the advantage of ensuring that these damages were to be held for C,<sup>8</sup> thus avoiding the "unattractive" result of allowing A to "put the money in his own pocket".<sup>9</sup>

It is submitted that the same approach is also appropriate to the case where the contract between A and B is one for services for the benefit of C which B simply fails or refuses to perform, instead performing them defectively, as in Lord Griffiths' example,<sup>10</sup> in which it seems to be assumed that A has paid for the work. Lord Griffiths does not discuss the case of total non-performance by B, presumably assuming that in such a case B would not have been paid.<sup>11</sup> If A then gets another builder to do the work and that other builder charges no more than B would have done, A will (subject to questions of mitigation<sup>12</sup> and remoteness) be able to recover the difference as damages for his own loss. The position will be substantially the same where A has paid B in advance and B has done no part of the work: in that case A will be entitled to claim restitution of his payment<sup>13</sup> together with damages for his own loss in respect of any extra cost of employing a substitute builder.<sup>14</sup> So in none of these cases of total non-performance is there any "black hole" and hence no need to generate a new remedy at

---

<sup>2</sup> i.e. unless A can show that B's breach caused loss to A himself.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.593.

<sup>4</sup> i.e., in the Linden Gardens case [1994] A.C. 85, the Darlington case [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 and the Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518.

<sup>5</sup> See above, p.590.

<sup>6</sup> See above, p.590.

<sup>7</sup> See below, after n.18.

<sup>8</sup> See below, pp.605-606.

<sup>9</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 571.

<sup>10</sup> See above, at n.97.

<sup>11</sup> Performance of the work is in contracts of this kind prima facie a condition precedent of the right to be paid: below, p.762.

<sup>12</sup> e.g. damages on a "cost of cure" basis are not recoverable if the cost of cure is wholly disproportionate to the benefit to be derived from cure: below, p.944.

<sup>13</sup> There will be a "total failure of consideration": below, p.1049.

<sup>14</sup> See below p.942.

the suit of A in respect of C's loss. The most difficult case is that of an advance payment by A followed by part performance by B in circumstances in which A himself has suffered no loss: e.g. because A was under no obligation to C to secure completion of the performance that B was to render and has neither himself taken any steps to secure that completion nor is likely to do so.<sup>15</sup> In such a case of partial performance there might be considerable difficulty in holding B liable for partial restitution<sup>16</sup>; and if, in addition, the remedy of specific performance were not available (e.g. because the contract was one for personal services to be rendered by B<sup>17</sup>) then there would be at least a partial "black hole" and this fact should (it is again submitted) be a ground for allowing A to recover substantial damages from B in respect of C's loss.

(iii) Use to which damages are put. It will be recalled that, in his statement of the "broader ground" in the Linden Gardens case, Lord Griffiths said that the court would wish to be "satisfied that the repairs have been or are likely to be carried out".<sup>18</sup> In later cases, conflicting views have been expressed on the question whether this is an essential requirement for the operation of the "broader ground".

One view is that it is not, since (at least as a general rule<sup>19</sup>) a court in awarding damages is not concerned with the question of what the claimant intends to do with these damages<sup>20</sup>; that question is said to be relevant only to the issue of "reasonableness". This issue, however, arises, not for the purpose of determining the existence of a claim for substantial damages, but its extent: it may be relevant in determining whether damages in a two-party case are to be assessed on a difference in value or on a cost of cure basis,<sup>21</sup> or whether the claimant has failed to mitigate his loss<sup>22</sup>; but such questions arise only on the assumption that a claim for substantial damages does exist. A related argument in favour of the view that the claimant's intention with regard to the disposal of the damages is irrelevant is that he has been deprived by the defendant's breach of the benefit of his bargain, and this fact is, of itself, enough to support a claim for substantial damages.<sup>23</sup> This line of reasoning is, however, with respect, hard to reconcile with the principle that the victim of a breach has no claim to substantial damages if the breach has no adverse effect.<sup>24</sup> The assumption underlying this principle is that the mere failure to perform a contract does not suffice to sustain a claim for substantial damages: as Lord Clyde said in the Panatown case, "A breach of contract may cause a loss but is not in itself a loss in any meaningful sense".<sup>25</sup> In the cases here under consideration, the breach will have no adverse effect on the claimant (the promisee)<sup>26</sup> unless he has carried out or

<sup>15</sup> As in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58, above, p.589.

<sup>16</sup> The "failure of consideration" would be only "partial": see below, pp.1050–1052.

<sup>17</sup> See below, pp.1029–1032.

<sup>18</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 97; above, p.594; for further discussion, see below at nn.19–29.

<sup>19</sup> For a possible exception, see the discussion at pp.946–947 of the question whether cost of cure is recoverable where cure is not undertaken.

<sup>20</sup> See the Darlington case [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 80; the Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 556, 592 per Lords Goff and Millett, dissenting; Ruxley Electronics and Construction Co v Forsyth [1966] A.C. 344 at 359 and 357; below, p.594 n.54.

<sup>21</sup> See below, pp.946–947.

<sup>22</sup> See below, p.977.

<sup>23</sup> See the references to the Darlington and Panatown cases in n.20, above.

<sup>24</sup> See below, p.934.

<sup>25</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 534.

<sup>26</sup> Our concern here is with adverse financial effect on the claimant. A claim for damages for "loss of amenity" will generally be one for loss suffered by the claimant, though in the family holiday cases (above, pp.592–593) this loss may be increased by the claimant's witnessing the sufferings of his family in comfortless hotels. Cf. also below, p.989.

intends to carry out cure; and the argument that he has been deprived of his bargain cannot answer the question whether it must be shown that this deprivation has had an adverse effect on him: it merely pushes this question back one stage.

The alternative view is that damages in respect of the cost of curing the breach (and so of securing the intended benefit for the third party) can be recovered only if cure has been, or is likely to be, carried out. The main practical argument in favour of this view is that (as noted above) it would be unattractive<sup>27</sup> to allow the promisee to recover the cost of cure as damages in respect of his own loss and then to “put the money in his own pocket”.<sup>27</sup> It is respectfully submitted that this is the preferable view. In a two-party case it is indeed generally<sup>28</sup> no concern of the court’s what the claimant intends to do with the damages; but the rationale of this rule does not necessarily apply in a three-party case. That rationale in a two-party case is that the defendant has, by reason of the breach, inflicted injury, loss or damage on the person or property of the claimant (or has failed to improve, or to transfer, an asset belonging to, or to be vested in, the claimant) who should therefore be able to deal in whatever way he pleases with the damages awarded to him in substitution of the interest of his own of which he has been deprived by the breach. For example, in the case of a contract to repair the claimant’s own house, he could, but for the breach, have sold the house at a price reflecting the value of the repairs, had they been properly carried out, and then have disposed of the proceeds of the sale in any way he pleased; and so he should be able to dispose in the same way of the damages due to him for failure to carry out the repairs. Obviously, this reasoning cannot apply where the house is owned, not by the claimant, but by a third party. There is also the further point that, although in Lord Griffith’s example the claimant as a matter of legal principle recovers damages in respect of his own loss, as a practical matter the purpose of the award in such a case is to protect the interests of the third party. Where damages are awarded in respect of a third party’s loss (under one of the exceptions to the general rule) the court requires the promisee to hold these damages for the third party.<sup>29</sup> No such machinery is available where the damages are awarded in respect of the promisee’s own loss; but a practical way of ensuring that the damages are in fact destined for the benefit of the third party is to require the promisee to show (as a condition of his entitlement to substantial damages) that they will be so used.

(i) RELATION TO THIRD PARTY’S RIGHT. Even where, in one of the exceptional situations discussed above, the promisee can recover damages in respect of the third party’s loss, no right to enforce the contract is conferred directly on the third party, whose only claim will be to the fruits of any action which the promisee may decide to bring.<sup>30</sup> The third party will have a direct right against the promisor only under one of the exceptions to the doctrine of privity. On the facts of some<sup>31</sup> (though not of all<sup>32</sup>) of the cases discussed above, the third party would probably, if those facts recurred now, have such a right under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.<sup>33</sup> If the third party has such a right, then this very fact may restrict the number of situations in which the

<sup>27</sup> Panatown case [2001] 1 A.C. 158 at 571.

<sup>28</sup> See n.19, above.

<sup>29</sup> See below, pp.605–606.

<sup>30</sup> See below, pp.605–606.

<sup>31</sup> e.g. the Woodar case [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 (above pp.592–593), see Law Com. No. 242, §7.49.

<sup>32</sup> e.g., probably, the Linden Gardens case [1994] 1 A.C. 85 (above, p.594): see below, p.654.

<sup>33</sup> See below, pp.651 et seq. Subss 1(1)(a) and (3) of the 1999 Act will make it possible to draw up contracts, on facts similar to those of the Linden Gardens case, above, so as to confer a right of enforcement directly on the third party: see below, pp.651, 655.

promisee can recover damages in respect of the third party's loss<sup>34</sup>; and it will probably reduce the pressure on the courts to extend the range of such situations.<sup>35</sup> S.4 of the 1999 Act, however, preserves the promisee's rights under the contract.<sup>36</sup> The question of his right to recover damages in respect of the third party's loss will therefore continue to arise and to be of practical importance: e.g. where the promisor has a defence against the third party which is not available against the promisee.<sup>37</sup>

(j) NEGATIVE PROMISE. Where the promise is negative in nature, the promisee's most obvious remedy is an injunction to restrain the promisor's breach. This remedy would, for example, be available where A validly promised B not to compete with C.

One type of negative promise which gives rise to special difficulty is a promise by A to B not to sue C, e.g. for a debt owed by C to A. If, in breach of such a promise, A nevertheless did sue C, it would not be appropriate for B to start a second action for an injunction to restrain A from proceeding with the first action; for such a step would lead to undesirable multiplicity of legal proceedings.<sup>38</sup> B's remedy is to ask the court to exercise its discretion<sup>39</sup> to stay A's action against C. In Gore v Van der Lann<sup>40</sup> the Court of Appeal held that B could obtain a stay of A's action against C only if two conditions were satisfied: there must be a definite promise by A to B not to sue C, and B must have a sufficient interest<sup>41</sup> in the enforcement of A's promise. This last requirement would not be satisfied unless, as a result of A's breach, B were exposed to the risk of incurring legal liability to C: for example where B had contracted with C to procure his release from a debt or a liability to A, and would be put in breach of that contract by A's action against C.

Snelling v John G Snelling Ltd<sup>42</sup> goes even further in giving effect to a promise of this kind. Three brothers had lent money to a family company of which they were directors. They agreed that if one of them resigned he should "forfeit" any money due to him from the company. One of them did resign and sued the company for the amounts due to him. By way of defence the company relied on the agreement between the brothers, and, if matters had rested there, the defence would have failed as the company was not a party to the agreement.<sup>43</sup> But the other two brothers applied to be joined as defendants to the action, adopted the company's defence and counterclaimed for a declaration that the third brother's loan was forfeited. It was held that they were entitled to such a declaration by virtue of the contract between them and that brother.<sup>44</sup> Ormrod J. further held that they could obtain a stay of the action against the company and that the most convenient way of disposing of the action against the company was to dismiss it. So far as the granting of the stay is concerned, the judgment is hard to reconcile with the

<sup>34</sup> On the reasoning of The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774, above p.594 and of Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518, above, p.596.

<sup>35</sup> The "legal black hole" referred to in the Darlington case [1995] 1 W.L.R. 68 at 79 would be much reduced in significance.

<sup>36</sup> See below, p.665.

<sup>37</sup> 1999 Act, s.3(4), below, p.660.

<sup>38</sup> Supreme Court Act 1981, s.49(2), replacing Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s.41 which expressly provided that no proceedings in the High Court could be restrained by injunction.

<sup>39</sup> Under Supreme Court Act 1981, s.49(3).

<sup>40</sup> [1967] 2 Q.B. 31; Davies, 1 Legal Studies 287; European Asian Bank AG v Punjab and Sind Bank [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 356; The Chevalier Roze [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 438; and see below, p.637.

<sup>41</sup> Deepak Fertilisers & Petrochemical Corp v ICI Chemicals & Polymers Ltd [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 378 at 401.

<sup>42</sup> [1973] 1 Q.B. 87; Wilkie, 36 M.L.R. 214.

<sup>43</sup> [1973] Q.B. 87 at 95.

<sup>44</sup> ibid. at 96.

requirement of a sufficient interest as defined in Gore v Van der Lann<sup>45</sup>; but it is submitted that Ormrod J.'s decision is consistent with the spirit of Beswick v Beswick.<sup>46</sup> If the promisee takes steps specifically to enforce the contract the court should, wherever possible, grant such remedy as is most appropriate for that purpose. Normally this will be an order of specific performance or an injunction. The fact that the latter remedy is not appropriate to enforce a promise not to sue should not deter the court from granting other remedies that serve substantially to enforce the promise. Such a remedy is, again, available only if it is sought by the promisee.<sup>47</sup> If the two brothers in the Snelling case had not applied to be joined to the action, the company could not have relied on the agreement between them and the third brother by way of defence.<sup>48</sup>

(2) Position between promisee and third party

The promisor may be willing to perform, and may actually perform, in favour of the third party, e.g. by paying him the agreed sum. These possibilities give rise to further problems between the third party and the promisee. In discussing these problems we shall at this stage assume that the case does not fall within any of the exceptions to the doctrine of privity which will be considered later in this Chapter.<sup>49</sup>

(a) PROMISOR PAYS OR IS WILLING TO PAY. The first problem arises where the promisor has actually paid the third party or is willing to pay him, and the promisee claims that the third party is not entitled to keep the money for his own benefit but must hold it on behalf of the promisee. Such a claim is not likely to be made by the promisee himself, as he wants to benefit the third party. But it might be made by the promisee's trustee in bankruptcy, or by his personal representative on death. In Beswick v Beswick the House of Lords held that the third party (the widow) was entitled to keep the money which the promisor (the nephew) was ordered to pay her, simply because it appeared from the true construction of the contract that this was the intention of the contracting parties.<sup>50</sup> It seems that the position would be the same where payments were made willingly, i.e. without any order of the court.<sup>51</sup> Payments actually received by the third party can be claimed by the promisee only if, on the true construction of the contract, they were made to the third party as nominee for the promisee. Where the money has not yet been paid, the promisor and the promisee can agree to rescind or vary the contract; and if they vary it so as to provide for payment to the promisee, the third party has no claim under the contract. But the question whether the promisee can unilaterally (i.e. without the consent of the promisor) demand that payment should be made to himself depends once again on the construction of the contract. If the contract can be construed as one to pay the third party "or as the promisee shall direct", then the promisee is entitled to demand

<sup>45</sup> [1967] 2 Q.B. 31.

<sup>46</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; above, p.589.

<sup>47</sup> cf. Heaton v Axa Equity and Life Assurance Society plc [2002] UKHL 15; [2002] 2 All E.R. 961, at [9] ("is enforceable by B", i.e. the promisee. No such promise had been made: see above p.573).

<sup>48</sup> Snelling v John G Snelling Ltd [1973] Q.B. 87 at 95.

<sup>49</sup> See below, pp.645–671.

<sup>50</sup> Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 71, 96, on this point overruling Re Engelbach's Estate [1924] 2 Ch. 348 and doubting Re Sinclair's Life Policy [1938] Ch. 799. Earlier cases supporting the view stated in the text include Ashby v Costin (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 401; Harris v United Kingdom, etc., Society (1889) 87 L.T.J. 272; Re Davies [1892] 3 Ch. 63.

<sup>51</sup> This appears from the treatment in Beswick v Beswick of Re Engelbach's Estate (above), where the money had in fact been paid to the third party: see 93 L.J.Ch. 616 at 617.

payment to himself.<sup>52</sup> But the contract is not likely to be construed in this way where it is a matter of concern to the promisor that payment should be made to the third party, e.g. because the third party is a close relative of the promisor and it matters to the promisor that the third party should be provided for.<sup>53</sup>

The rules just stated apply only if there is indeed a promise to pay the third party. In Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd<sup>54</sup> an agreement between A and B provided for payment of royalties by B to A and concluded: "I [A] authorise . . . [B] to pay all money connected with this agreement to my wife [W] . . . and myself . . . as joint tenants". The document was signed by A, B and W. A majority of the High Court of Australia held that there was no promise by B to A to pay W but only a mandate by A authorising B to pay W (so that such payment would discharge B). This mandate was revocable and had been revoked by A's death. Consequently, the money (which B was willing to pay) belonged to A's estate and not to W. The third party would, a fortiori, not be entitled to the money if he were mentioned in the contract as a mere nominee in such a way as to indicate that no beneficial interest was intended to pass to him, and that payment to him without the request of the promisee should not discharge the promisor.<sup>55</sup>

(b) PROMISEE REFUSES TO SUE. The second problem arises where the promisee fails or refuses to take any action to enforce the promise. Lord Denning has suggested that, even at common law the third party could in such a case circumvent the doctrine of privity by suing the promisor and joining the promisee as co-defendant.<sup>56</sup> But Diplock and Salmon L.JJ. have said that the action can (in cases not falling within any of the exceptions to the doctrine of privity<sup>57</sup>) be brought only by the promisee<sup>58</sup>, and it is submitted that this is the correct view. Lord Denning's view is inconsistent with the common law doctrine of privity which was recognised in Beswick v Beswick and in later cases.<sup>59</sup> It is also inconsistent with the reasoning of the cases on trusts of promises to be discussed below,<sup>60</sup> for if the third party could always sue by joining the promisee to the action, it would be pointless to insist that he must in addition show the existence of a trust.

(c) PROMISEE SUES FOR DAMAGES OR RESTITUTION. The final problem arises where the promisee sues but claims some form of relief other than specific performance in favour of the third party: i.e. where he claims damages or recovery of the consideration provided by him. If such a claim succeeded, it would seem to lead to a judgment for payment to the promisee and not to the third party; and the question would arise whether the promisee could keep the payment for his own benefit or whether he would be bound to hold it for the third party. In tort, a person can sometimes recover damages for a loss suffered, not by himself, but by another: e.g. a husband may get damages for loss of earnings suffered by his wife in giving up her job to nurse him after an accident

<sup>52</sup> The Spiros C [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 319 at 331. The same is true where a contract provides for some other performance to be rendered to a third party: e.g. Mitchell v Edé (1840) 11 Ad. & El. 888; The Lycaon [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 548.

<sup>53</sup> As in Re Stapleton-Bretherton [1941] Ch. 482.

<sup>54</sup> [1967] A.L.R. 385; for a similar distinction, see below, p.679.

<sup>55</sup> Thavorn v Bank of Credit & Commerce S.A [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 259, as to which see above, p.578 n.20; The Turridu [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 401.

<sup>56</sup> Beswick v Beswick [1966] Ch. at 557; Gurtner v Circuit [1968] 2 Q.B. 587 at 596.

<sup>57</sup> ibid. at 599, 606.

<sup>58</sup> See above, p.604 at n.49.

<sup>59</sup> See above, pp.588–590.

<sup>60</sup> See below, pp.646–651.

and such damages must then be held on trust for the other person.<sup>61</sup> Similarly, damages for breach of contract can in the exceptional situations discussed above be recovered in respect of loss suffered by another<sup>62</sup>; such damages must be held for that other person.<sup>63</sup> This may also be the position in the cases which call “for special treatment”,<sup>64</sup> such as the booking of family holidays or ordering meals in restaurants; if, in such cases, the promisee can recover damages in respect of the third party’s loss, it may be that those damages, when recovered, would be held by the promisee as money had and received for the use of the third party.<sup>65</sup> But apart from these exceptional or special cases there does not appear to be any similar possibility where the promisee claims damages for breach of a contract merely because the contract was made for the benefit of a third party. The general rule in such a case is that damages will be awarded only to compensate the promisee for his own loss<sup>66</sup>; and where that general rule applies, it does not seem that he can be under any obligation to pay those damages (or any part of them) over to the third party.<sup>67</sup>

SECTION 3. SCOPE

1. General

The common law doctrine of privity means that a person cannot acquire rights or be subjected to liabilities arising under a contract to which he is not a party. It does not mean that a contract between A and B cannot affect the legal rights of C indirectly. For example, an agreement between A and B under which A accepts from B part payment of a debt owed by C to A in full settlement of that debt can benefit C by precluding A from suing C for the balance of the debt<sup>68</sup>; and a fortiori full performance by B of C’s obligation to A can discharge that obligation.<sup>69</sup> Conversely, a building contract between A and B may benefit C by defining his rights: e.g. by specifying the time at which payment becomes due to C under a subcontract between B and C for the execution of part of the work.<sup>70</sup> It is also possible for a contract between A and B to affect C

<sup>61</sup> Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 A.C. 350 at 363, following Cunningham v Harrison [1973] Q.B. 942 at 952 and rejecting the contrary view in Donnelly v Joyce [1974] Q.B. 454 at 461–462. cf. Allen v Waters [1935] 1 K.B. 200 and Dennis v LTPB [1948], All E.R. 779, as explained in 72 L.Q.R. 187; Lowe v Guise [2002] EWCA Civ 197; [2002] 3 All E.R. (Comm) 454 at [38]. No such damages can be recovered by the injured party (A) where the result of requiring A to hold the damages for the third party (X) would be indirectly to confer on X a right to recover payment rendered under a contract between A and X which was unenforceable by virtue of Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.127(3): see Dimond v Lovell [2002] 1 A.C. 384, above, p.179. It remains to be seen how (if at all) this conclusion will, in the present context, be effected by the view, taken in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No.2) [2001] EWCA Civ 633; [2002] Q.B. 74 that s.127(3) of the 1974 Act was incompatible with Human Rights Act 1998 Sch.1, Pt I, Art.6 and Pt II, Art.1.

<sup>62</sup> See above, pp.593–594.

<sup>63</sup> The Albazero [1977] A.C. 774 at 845; O’Sullivan v Williams [1992] 3 All E.R. 385 at 387, discussing The Winkfield [1902] P. 42; cf. below, p.634; Linden Gardens case [1994] 1 A.C. 85 (above, p.594); John Harris Partnership v Groveland Ltd [1999] P.N.L.R. 697; Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, s.2(4).

<sup>64</sup> Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 283; above, pp.592–593.

<sup>65</sup> This was the view of Lord Denning M.R. in Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468 at 1473. The strange result would be that the claimant was under quasi-contractual liability to his small children in respect of part of the £500 recovered as damages for distress.

<sup>66</sup> See above, pp.595, 599.

<sup>67</sup> cf. Coulls v Bagot’s Executor and Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385 at 411.

<sup>68</sup> Hirachand Punamchand v Temple [1911] 2 K.B. 330; above, p.129 (where the effects on such facts of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 are also discussed); cf. Johnson v Davies [1999] Ch. 117 at 130.

<sup>69</sup> For the conditions to be satisfied for such discharge, see below, pp.755–757.

<sup>70</sup> Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd v Birse Construction Ltd (1997) 84 B.L.R. 58.

adversely.<sup>71</sup> Of course A and B cannot by a contract between them impose an obligation on C to perform duties arising under the contract. This aspect of the doctrine of privity is so obvious that it scarcely needs to be stated: if A and B agreed that C was to pay £100 to A, no one would suppose that this agreement could oblige C to make the payment. But a contract between A and B may in some other way restrict C's freedom of action: for example it may create rights in or over property, such as a lien<sup>72</sup> or a lease<sup>73</sup> or an equitable interest, or give rise to a constructive trust affecting property<sup>74</sup>; and such interests can affect the rights of third parties who later acquire the property.

The following situations, in which contracts can at common law indirectly affect the legal rights of third parties, call for more extended discussion.

2. Liability in Negligence to Third Parties

(1) Duty of care may be owed to third party

While the primary effect of a contract between A and B is to oblige them to perform their respective promises to each other, the contract may also impose on A a duty of care to C, the breach of which will enable C to sue A in tort for negligence. The contract may have this effect because it gives rise to a relationship in which A owes a duty of care to C: for example, to the relationship of passenger (or cargo-owner) and carrier,<sup>75</sup> of occupier of premises and visitor,<sup>76</sup> or of bailor and sub-bailee,<sup>77</sup> or of building owner and subcontractor.<sup>78</sup> In a number of cases persons providing professional services, such as

<sup>71</sup> e.g. The Glacier Bay [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370; Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 A.C. 221; cf. below, pp.638–645.

<sup>72</sup> See Faith v EIC (1821) 4 B. & Ald. 630; Tappenden v Artus [1964] 2 Q.B. 185; contrast Chellaram & Sons (London) Ltd v Butler's Warehousing & Distribution Ltd [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 412 (third party not bound by agreement purporting to confer on sub-bailee a lien more extensive than that which would, but for such agreement, have arisen at common law).

<sup>73</sup> As in Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] Ch. 1, overruled on another point in Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v London Residuary Body [1992] A.C. 386.

<sup>74</sup> See Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold, above, where the mere fact that C had notice of an earlier contract between A and B was said at 25–26 to be insufficient to give rise to a constructive trust on C's acquisition of the land affected by that contract; and where Fox L.J. (delivering the judgment of the Court) at 17 disapproved dicta in Errington v Errington [1952] 1 K.B. 290 (which had been followed in Re Sharpe [1980] 1 W.L.R. 219) to the effect that a contractual licence granted by A to B gave rise to an equitable interest binding third parties; Hill, 51 M.L.R. 226; Oakley [1988] C.L.J. 353; cf. also Binions v Evans [1972] Ch. 359; Smith, [1973] C.L.J. 81; Hornby, 93 L.Q.R. 568; Pritchard v Briggs [1980] Ch. 338 (option to purchase); Lyus v Promsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044.

<sup>75</sup> Austin v GW Ry (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 442; The Antonis P Lemos [1985] A.C. 711.

<sup>76</sup> Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, s.3; Defective Premises Act 1972, ss.1(1)(b), 4.

<sup>77</sup> Moukattaf v BOAC [1967] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 396; Bart v BWA [1967] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 239 (where the claim failed as the sub-bailee's duty was limited to one to keep safely, and did not extend to transmission of the package); The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 321. Such a sub-bailment may also operate to the disadvantage of C. (the head bailor) in that he may be bound by an exemption clause in the contract between A (the head bailee) and B (the sub-bailee): see Morris v CW Martin Ltd [1996] 1 Q.B. 716 at 729 and The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324, below, p.641. But this principle does not enable B to take the benefit of a term in the contract between A and C: see The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 667–668; it merely enables B to rely on the terms of B's own contract with A against C where C has authorised the relevant terms of the sub-bailment. No "sub-bailment" arises merely because a sub-agent has received the proceeds of sale of the principal's property: Balsamo v Medici [1984] 1 W.L.R. 951.

<sup>78</sup> British Telecommunications plc v James Thomson & Sons (Engineers) Ltd [1999] 1 W.L.R. 9 where the loss caused by the subcontractor's negligence was physical damage to property of the owner other than the very thing supplied by the sub-contractor, so that the various difficulties discussed in relation to the Junior Books case [1983] 1 A.C. 520 (below pp.608–609 and 614–616) did not arise.

solicitors,<sup>79</sup> insurance brokers<sup>80</sup> and safety consultants<sup>81</sup> have been held liable in tort to persons other than their immediate clients for negligence in the performance of contracts with those clients.<sup>82</sup> Surveyors, valuers, accountants and auditors can similarly be liable for negligent misrepresentation to third parties: the basis, and limits, of such liability have been discussed in Chapter 9.<sup>83</sup> Sometimes the provider of the services is liable in tort because his negligence in performing the contract with his client of itself causes loss to the third party: e.g., where a solicitor's negligence in failing to carry out his client's testamentary instructions causes an intended gift to a prospective beneficiary to fail.<sup>84</sup> Sometimes the defendant's negligence results in his making a misrepresentation to the third party and the loss is suffered by the latter in consequence of his acting in reliance on the representation: e.g. where a valuer employed by A negligently makes a report on the structure of a house and the report is communicated to B and induces him to buy the house for more than its true value.<sup>85</sup>

A controversial extension of tort liability to a third party was made in Junior Books Ltd v Veitchi Co Ltd<sup>86</sup> where B had undertaken to build a factory for C by a contract which entitled C to nominate sub-contractors. C nominated A as flooring sub-contractor; B in consequence entered into a contract with A by which A undertook to lay the floor; but no contract came into existence between A and C.<sup>87</sup> The floor later cracked and, on the assumption that this was due to A's negligence in doing the work defectively, it was held that A was liable to C for the loss suffered by C in consequence of the fact that the work

<sup>79</sup> Ross v Caunters [1980] Ch. 287; White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207; cf. Smith v Claremont Haynes, The Times, September 3, 1991; Al Kandari v JR Brown & Co [1988] Q.B. 665. Contrast Clark v Bruce Lance [1988] 1 All E.R. 364 (solicitor acting for testator in a different transaction held to owe no duty to beneficiary); Worby v Rosser [2000] P.N.L.R. 140 (solicitor engaged by testator to draw up a new will held to owe no duty to beneficiary under an earlier will). For earlier discussion of Ross v Caunters, above, see Banque Keyser Ullmann SA v Skandia (UK) Insurance Co Ltd [1990] Q.B. 659 at 794–796, affirmed on other grounds [1991] 2 A.C. 249; Van Oppen v Clerk of the Bedford Charity Trustees [1989] 1 All E.R. 273 at 289, affirmed [1990] 1 W.L.R. 235; Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 635; Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 486.

<sup>80</sup> Punjab National Bank v de Boinville [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1138 at 1152; cf. Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145; Aiken v Stewart Wrightson Members Agency Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1281; Cane in (Rose, ed.) Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel p.96.

<sup>81</sup> Driver v William Willett (Contractors) Ltd [1969] 1 All E.R. 655; cf. Dove v Banham's Patent Locks Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1436; Bailey v HSS Alarms Ltd, The Times, June 20, 2000; Bourne v McEvoy Timber Preservation (1975) 237 E.G. 496 (timber preservation firm giving estimate of cost of work to vendor of a house held to owe a duty of care to purchaser). Contrast The Nicholas H [1996] 1 A.C. 211, below, p.612.

<sup>82</sup> See also Knight v Lawrence [1991] 1 E.G.L.R. 143.

<sup>83</sup> See above, pp.344–350.

<sup>84</sup> e.g. Ross v Caunters and White v Jones, above n.79; contrast Gran Gelato Ltd v Richcliff Group Ltd [1992] Ch. 650 (vendor's solicitor not liable to purchaser for negligently misrepresenting client's state of mind); Cane, 108 L.Q.R. 539; Tettenborn [1992] C.L.J. 415.

<sup>85</sup> e.g. Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831, above, p.339; cf. Niru Battery Manufacturing Co v Milestone Trading Ltd [2002] EWHC 1425; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 705, at [60] (liability of certification company to third party).

<sup>86</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520; Jaffey [1983] C.L.J. 37; Palmer and Murdoch 46 M.L.R. 213. See further Jaffey, 5 Legal Studies 77; Reynolds (1985) 11 N.Z.U.L.R. 215; Stapleton, 104 L.Q.R. 213 and 389; Huxley, 53 M.L.R. 361; Beyleveld and Brownsword, 54 M.L.R. 48. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 probably does not apply on such facts: below, p.654.

<sup>87</sup> In Greater Nottingham Co-operative Society Ltd v Cementation Piling & Foundations Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71 there was a direct contract between A (the subcontractor) and C (the building owner) and it was held that A's duty to C was governed by that contract alone and not by the general law relating to the tort of negligence; cf. Welsh Health Technical Services v Haden Young (1987) 37 Build L.R. 310; Sonat Offshore SA v Amerada Hess Development Co [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 145 at 159; The Hellespont Ardent [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 547 at 593. But it was recognised that breaches of duty arising out of certain contractual relationships may be actionable had to be done again. At first sight, this result represents a considerable encroachment on the common law doctrine of privity, but the following discussion will show that later decisions have taken a highly restrictive view of the scope of the Junior Books case.

In the situations just described, A's liability to C is in tort and not on the contract between A and B as such: both the standard and the basis of liability may differ according to whether A is being sued on the contract by B or in tort by C. Thus in the Junior Books case it does not seem that A would have been liable to C if A had unjustifiably repudiated his contract with B and done no work under it at all, with the result that completion of the building was delayed and C suffered loss.<sup>88</sup> In one group of cases, to be discussed later in this Chapter, A has indeed been held liable in tort to C for simple failure to take steps in the performance of his contract with B.<sup>89</sup> The cases in question hold that where a solicitor (A) fails to carry out his client's (B's) instructions to make a will in favour of C, then A can, after B's death, be held liable in tort to C for the value of the benefit lost by C. But one reason for this conclusion was that A's omission made him liable in tort, as well as for breach of contract, even to his own client, B.<sup>90</sup> This would not have been the position if, in the Junior Books case, A had wrongfully repudiated his contract with B or had simply failed to do any work under it: such a repudiation or omission would have made A liable to B only for breach of contract. The disappointed beneficiary cases are also distinguishable from the building contract cases for other reasons to be discussed later in this Chapter,<sup>91</sup> and they therefore do not support any general proposition that A's omission to perform his contract with B gives a cause of action in tort to C merely because, as a result of the omission, C suffers loss. Further differences between tort and contract liability are that the contract between A and B in the Junior Books case might have made A strictly liable to B,<sup>92</sup> without proof of negligence, while negligence was an essential element of C's cause of action in tort against A; in contract, B would have a cause of action against A as soon as the defective work was done, but in tort C's cause of action would accrue only when the resulting loss was suffered<sup>93</sup>; and in B's action on the contract B has to show only that the contract has been made and broken, while in C's action in tort, C must establish that there was a relationship between himself and A by virtue of which A owed him a duty of care.<sup>94</sup> in tort as well as in contract: see below, pp.983–984; cf. Nitrigin Eirann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Ltd [1992] 1 All E.R. 854 at 856–857; The Volvox Hollandia (No. 2) [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 314 at 322; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145; Holt v Payne Skillington, The Times, December 22, 1995; Sumitomo Bank Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487 at 512–514; Weldon v GRE Linked Life Assurance Ltd [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 914 at 926–927; the same is true of the relationships described at nn.75 to 82, above.

---

<sup>88</sup> In The Zephyr [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 58 at 85, it was said at first instance that even the law of torts can sometimes impose "positive duties . . . recognised . . . only because a party has voluntarily undertaken them." But this suggestion was disapproved on appeal: [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 529; cf. White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 216. No issue of privity arose in The Zephyr; the dispute was as to contractual intention (above, pp.172–173).

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.616.

<sup>90</sup> White v Jones, above, n.79; cf. Hooper v Fynmores [2001] W.T.L.R. 1019; and see below, p.616.

<sup>91</sup> See below, p.618.

<sup>92</sup> See below, p.838. Similarly, on facts such as those of Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 liability for breach of contract in respect of defects in the goods sold would be strict, while the tort liability of, or to, a third party would have depended on negligence. This difference between tort and contract liability in such cases is reduced in importance by Consumer Protection Act 1987, Pt I, introducing strict "product liability" to the ultimate consumer. But such liability is subject to important qualifications and will not extend to many of the situations with which the following discussion is concerned.

<sup>93</sup> Dove v Banham's Safety Locks Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1463; cf. Bell v Peter Browne & Co [1990] 2 Q.B. 495.

<sup>94</sup> For the elements of such a relationship, see above, pp.344–350.

(2) Restrictions on scope of the duty

(a) IN GENERAL.. A relationship giving rise to a duty of care,<sup>95</sup> is not established merely by showing that C has suffered foreseeable loss as a result of A's defective performance of his contract with B. In the Junior Books case, there were many special factors which could be said to have given rise to such a relationship: A were nominated as sub-contractors by C; A were specialists in flooring and knew of C's requirements; C relied on A's special skills in laying floors; and A must have known that defects in the work could necessitate repairs and lead to economic loss.<sup>96</sup> These special factors (and in particular the extent of C's reliance on A's special skills) may have given rise to a "special relationship" and hence to a duty of care in tort.<sup>97</sup> But such factors are unlikely to arise in the ordinary case where C suffers loss as a result of the defective performance by A of his contract with B. Accordingly later authorities<sup>98</sup> have emphasised the exceptional nature of the circumstances of the Junior Books case. It has been said that those circumstances were "unique"<sup>99</sup>; that the case "cannot now be regarded as a useful pointer to the development of the law"<sup>100</sup> or "as laying down any principle of general application in the law of tort"<sup>101</sup>; and that the statement of principle in Lord Brandon's dissenting speech is to be preferred to that of the majority.<sup>102</sup> The authority of the case is further undermined by the fact that the reasoning of the majority is to a considerable extent based on earlier decisions<sup>103</sup> which (so far as they hold the defendants liable for economic loss<sup>104</sup>) have since been overruled by the House of Lords.<sup>105</sup> In consequence of these developments, the decision in the Junior Books case has been described as "discredited"<sup>106</sup> and "virtually extinguished".<sup>107</sup>

The duty owed by A to C in tort may also be less extensive than that owed by A to the other contracting party. This was, for example, the position where A was employed as solicitor by B who was guarantor of C's mortgage. It was held<sup>108</sup> that, although A might owe a duty of care to C, this duty did not extend to requiring A to explain the implications of the mortgage to C, since the imposition of such an extensive duty might

<sup>95</sup> ibid; and cf. below p.612 at n.22.

<sup>96</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520 at 546.

<sup>97</sup> Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 466, 481; see above, p.345.

<sup>98</sup> See below, p.616, nn.55 and 56.

<sup>99</sup> D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177 at 202; cf. Van Oppen v Clerk to the Bedford Charity Trustees [1989] 1 All E.R. 273 at 289, affirmed [1990] 1 W.L.R. 235; Duncan Stevenson MacMillan v A W Knott Becker Scott Ltd [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 98; Nitirigin Eirann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Ltd [1992] 1 W.L.R. 498 at 504.

<sup>100</sup> Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758 at 784.

<sup>101</sup> D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177 at 202; cf. ibid. at 215.

<sup>102</sup> ibid. at 202, 215; Islander Trucking Ltd v Hogg Robinson & Gardner Mountain (Marine) Ltd [1990] 1 All E.R. 826 at 829; cf. Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 2 A.C. 398 at 466, 469; and in Scotland, Strathford East Kilbride Ltd v Film Design Ltd, S.C.I.L.R. 877, 1997.

<sup>103</sup> i.e. Anns v Merton London Borough [1978] A.C. 728; Dutton v Bognor Regis Urban DC [1972] 1 Q.B. 373.

<sup>104</sup> See Stovin v Wise [1996] 3 All E.R. 801 at 824.

<sup>105</sup> Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 2 A.C. 398. Contrast in Australia Bryan v Maloney (1995) 182 C.L.R. 609; in New Zealand (as accepted by the Privy Council) Invercargill City Council v Hamlin [1996] A.C. 624; in Canada Winnipeg Condominium Corp v Bird Construction Co Ltd (1995) 121 D.L.R. (4th) 193 (where the defect made the building dangerous); and in Singapore RSP Architects Planners & Engineers v Ocean Front Ltd (1998) 14 Const.L.J. 139.

<sup>106</sup> Société Commerciale de Réassurance v ERAS International Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 599.

<sup>107</sup> The Volvox Hollandia (No.2) [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 315 at 322; The Orjula [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 395 at 401.

<sup>108</sup> Woodward v Wolfertrans, The Times, April 8, 1997.

give rise to a conflict between A's duty to his own client (B) and the alleged duty to C.

The law finally restricts the range of persons to whom the duty may be owed. Where, for example, a valuer was requested by a borrower to address a valuation of the property on which the loan was to be secured to "the prospective lender", it was held that the valuer owed no duty to that lender's assignee.<sup>10</sup> Similarly, counsel who had given advice to his client in litigation has been held to owe no duty of care in respect of that advice to the other party to the litigation<sup>11</sup>; and a solicitor engaged by one party to a transaction will not normally owe a duty of care to the other party, since the imposition of such a duty could give rise to a conflict of interest.<sup>12</sup> Such a duty may, however, arise in exceptional circumstances: e.g. where, in relation to a loan to be secured on a leasehold flat, the borrower engaged defendants as his solicitors and they knew that the lender had not engaged and did not intend to engage his own solicitor. The defendants were held liable in tort to the lender for failing effectively to secure the loan on the flat.<sup>13</sup>

(b) ECONOMIC LOSS AND PHYSICAL HARM. Except where there is a "special relationship" between the parties (as in the misrepresentation cases,<sup>14</sup> and in cases in which the claim is based on the defendant's failure to perform a contract, such as one to perform professional services, which involves, in addition to his obligations under that contract to the other party to it, an assumption of responsibility to a third party<sup>15</sup>) a claimant cannot rely on the breach of a contract to which he was not a party merely because, as a result of the breach, he has suffered economic loss, that is, loss not taking the form of personal injury or of physical damage to his property.<sup>16</sup> The importance of this point is illustrated by Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2),<sup>17</sup> where the defendants had been nominated as suppliers of glass for incorporation in a building which was being erected by the claimants as main contractors for a client in Abu Dhabi. The glass had been sold by the defendants to a subcontractor engaged by the claimants, so that there was no contract between claimants and defendants; the glass was perfectly sound but was not of the colour specified in the contract of sale or in the main building contract. In consequence of this shortcoming, the claimants were not paid by their client and so suffered financial loss; but it was held that the defendants' breach of their contract with the subcontractors did not give the claimants any right of action in tort against the defendants merely because that breach had caused the claimants to suffer

<sup>10</sup> Barex Brothers Ltd v Morris Dean & Co [1999] P.N.L.R. 344.

<sup>11</sup> Connolly-Martin v Davis [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 790.

<sup>12</sup> Dean v Allin & Watts [2001] EWCA Civ 758; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 249, at [33].

<sup>13</sup> This was the actual result in Dean v Allin & Watts, above.

<sup>14</sup> See above, p.345.

<sup>15</sup> See above, pp.607–608 at nn.79–83; see especially Henderson v Merret Syndicates Ltd [1995] A.C. 145; cf. Parkinson v St James & Seacroft University NHS Trust [2002] EWCA Civ 530; [2002] Q.B. 266; Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2002] EWCA Civ 88; [2003] Q.B. 20.

<sup>16</sup> Tate & Lyle Industries Ltd v GLC [1983] 2 A.C. 509 at 530–531; cf. London Congregational Union Inc v Harriss [1988] 1 All E.R. 15 at 25; Simaan General Contracting Co Ltd v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] 1 Q.B. 758 at 781; Greater Nottingham Co-operative Soc Ltd v Cementation Piling & Foundation Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71 at 94; Verderame v Commercial Union Assurance Co plc, The Times, April 2, 1992; Preston v Torfaen B.C. [1993] E.G.C.S. 137. In European Gas Turbines Ltd v M.S.A.S. Cargo International Ltd [2001] C.L.C. 880 a cargo-owner (C) recovered damages from a sub-contracting carrier (A) for purely economic loss resulting from breach of A's subcontract with the contracting carrier (B) as to the mode of carriage. There was no contract between A and C so that this conclusion is at first sight hard to reconcile with the other authorities cited in this note. The case may be explicable on the ground that C's agent had notified A of the importance to C of carriage by the stipulated mode and that A had accepted this position so as to give rise to an "assumption of responsibility" (cf. above, p.347) to A to observe that stipulation.

<sup>17</sup> [1988] Q.B. 758.

financial loss. Similarly, it was held in Balsamo v Medici<sup>18</sup> that a sub-agent who had negligently paid over the proceeds of the sale of the principal's property to a fraudulent imposter was not liable in tort to the principal for such negligence in handling the money; nor was he liable to the principal in contract as there was no privity of contract between the sub-agent and the principal. To uphold a tort claim in such a situation would, it was said, "come perilously close to abrogating the doctrine of privity altogether".<sup>19</sup> A doctor employed by a company to assess replies of job applicants to medical questionnaires has likewise been held to owe no duty in tort to those applicants.<sup>20</sup> The existence of a duty of care to a person with whom the defendant was not in any contractual relationship may also be negated by the fact that that person has an adequate remedy in respect of the loss in question under a contract with another potential defendant.<sup>21</sup>

The point that is emphasised in cases such as the Simaan and Balsamo cases is that the claimants in them suffered no physical harm as a result of the defendants' acts or omissions. It does not follow that the mere fact of the claimant's having suffered foreseeable harm of this kind is a sufficient condition of the defendant's liability in tort. The claimant must, in addition, show that the relationship between him and the defendant was one of "proximity", so that it was fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care on the defendant.<sup>22</sup> This requirement was held not to have been satisfied in The Nicholas H,<sup>23</sup> where a ship classification society had, in breach of its contract with shipowners, advised them that their ship could proceed on her current voyage until the cargo which she was then carrying had been discharged. In the course of that voyage the ship sank, and it was held that the owners of the cargo had no cause of action in tort against the society in respect of the loss of their cargo. The main reason given by the House of Lords for this conclusion was that the shipowners were, in turn, in breach of their contract of carriage with the cargo-owners; and that it was not fair, just or reasonable to impose on the classification society a liability to the cargo-owners in tort<sup>24</sup> since this would not be subject to the limitations of liability available to the shipowners under international Conventions<sup>25</sup> which have the force of law. The effect of holding

<sup>18</sup> [1984] 1 W.L.R. 951; Whittaker, 48 M.L.R. 86. It seems that on such facts the requirements of s.1(1), (2) and (3) of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 (below, pp.651–655) would not be satisfied.

<sup>19</sup> At 959–960; cf. The Rebecca Elaine [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 8: "the dubious and lethal colonisation by the tort of negligence of the conceptual territory of contract" (engine manufacturer not liable in negligence for purely economic loss to owner of fishing boat with whom he was not in any contractual relationship); Michael Sallis & Co v E.C.A Call (1988) 4 Const. L.J. 125. The soundness of the cases discussed in this paragraph is not questioned in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145, where the liability in tort of a subagent to a principal with whom he was in no contractual relationship was said at 195 to be based on the "most unusual" situation in that case.

<sup>20</sup> Kapfunde v Abbey National plc [1998] I.R.L.R. 583, disapproving Baker v Kaye [1997] I.R.L.R. 219 so far as it holds that a duty was owed by the doctor to the applicant.

<sup>21</sup> Briscoe v Lubrizol Ltd [2000] I.C.R. 694; the question whether the claimant might in such circumstances now have a right under s.1 of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 would depend on whether the requirements discussed at pp.651–656 were satisfied.

<sup>22</sup> For these requirements, see, inter alia, Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 2 A.C. 605 at 617–618; Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 480, 486; X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1995] 2 A.C. 633 at 739; and pp.344–347 above.

<sup>23</sup> [1996] A.C. 211; cf. Reeman v Dept. of Transport [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 648; R M Turton & Co Ltd v Kerslake & Partners [2000] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. (New Zealand CA).

<sup>24</sup> Nor had there been an "assumption of responsibility" (above, pp.347–348) since the cargo-owners were "not even aware of [the classification society's] examination of the ship." [1996] A.C. 211 at 242.

<sup>25</sup> The Convention in question related to tonnage limitations; effect was given to it by Merchant Shipping Act 1979, s.17 and Sch.4, now superseded by Merchant Shipping Act 1995, s.185 and Sch.7, Pt I. The reasoning of the House of Lords is equally applicable to the contractual limitations and exceptions which protect the carrier by virtue of Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971 s.1(2) and Sch.: see The Nicholas H [1996] A.C. 211 classification societies liable in tort to cargo-owners would be to deprive shipowners of the benefits of these Conventions since the societies would pass this liability on to shipowners; and this would be an undesirable conclusion,<sup>26</sup> particularly as loss suffered by cargo-owners in excess of the Convention limits was “readily insurable”.<sup>27</sup>

(c) DEFECTS IN THE VERY THING SUPPLIED NOT SUFFICIENT. Even where A’s negligence in the performance of his contract with B has resulted in damage to “property”, the scope of C’s tort remedy is further restricted by the fact that “property” in this context normally refers to property belonging to C other than the very thing supplied by A under that contract. Thus where A sold goods to B who resold them to C, it was held that A would not be liable in tort to C merely because those goods disintegrated on account of a defect in them amounting to a breach of A’s contract with B.<sup>28</sup> Nor, where goods are bought from a retailer, is the manufacturer liable to the buyer in tort<sup>29</sup> for negligence if the goods are defective and the defect is discovered before any injury, or harm to other property, has resulted. Even if the goods deteriorate by reason of the defect, the buyer’s only loss is the financial or economic loss which he suffers because the defect has made them less valuable or because he discards them or incurs the cost of repairing them. Loss of this kind is not generally recoverable in tort,<sup>30</sup> though there may be an exception to this general rule where the defect is a source of danger in respect of which the claimant could become liable to third parties, so that money has to be spent in averting this danger.<sup>31</sup> The Junior Books case appears, indeed, to be inconsistent with the general rule; for the only “property” which could be said to have been damaged was the factory floor (which had cracked), and that damage was no more than a defect in the very thing supplied by A. The fact that A was nevertheless held liable in tort to C is now explicable (if at all) only by reference to the same special, or “unique”, factors<sup>32</sup> which existed in that case.

(d) CLAIMANT HAVING NO TITLE TO THING DAMAGED. Even where A’s breach of his contract with B does result in physical damage, the mere fact that the loss so occasioned falls on C will not necessarily give C a right of action in tort against A in respect of that loss. In The Aliakmon<sup>33</sup> A, a carrier, had contracted with B for the carriage of a quantity at 238. In Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 255 no such policy reasons were held to exist for protecting an aircraft inspection society for liability for personal injury to a passenger; cf. Watson v British Boxing Board of Control Ltd [2001] Q.B. 1134.

---

<sup>26</sup> cf. below, p.614 at nn.39 and 40.

<sup>27</sup> The Nicholas H [1996] A.C. 211 at 242.

<sup>28</sup> Aswan Engineering Establishment Co v Lupine Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1; cf. D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177 at 202, 216; Reid v Rush & Tompkins Group plc [1990] 1 W.L.R. 212 at 224; Warner v Basildon Development Corp (1991) 7 Const. L.J. 146; cf. Bacardi-Martini Beverages Ltd v Thomas Hardy Packaging Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 549; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 335 at [18] (contaminated ingredient used in manufacturing making finished product useless); for some extension of the principle, see Bellefield Computer Services Ltd v E Turner & Sons [2000] B.L.R. 97.

<sup>29</sup> For possible liability under a manufacturer’s guarantee, see above, p.582.

<sup>30</sup> Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 469; Nitrigin Eirann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Ltd [1992] 1 W.L.R. 498.

<sup>31</sup> The Orjula [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 395 at 402, where it was also arguable that the defective thing supplied by the defendant had caused physical harm to other property in which the claimant had a prior interest as lessee.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.610, n.99.

<sup>33</sup> [1986] A.C. 785; Treitel [1986] L.M.C.L.Q. 294; Markesinis, 103 L.Q.R. 354 at 384–390; Tettenborn [1987] J.B.L. 12; cf. Transcontainer Express Ltd v Custodian Security Ltd [1988] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 128; The Ciudad de Panto [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1145; The Filiatra Legacy [1991] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 337 at 339; The Gudermes [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 311 at 326; The Hamburg Star [1994] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 399 at 403–405; The Seven Pioneer [2001]

of steel coils which B had sold to C. The goods were damaged, as a result of A's negligent breach of the contract of carriage, after the risk in them had passed to C under the contract of sale, but while B remained owner of them. C had no claim under the contract of carriage as he was not a party to it<sup>34</sup>; and the House of Lords held that he also had no cause of action against A in tort in respect of the loss which he had suffered as a result of remaining liable for the full price of the goods in spite of the fact that they had been damaged in transit. This conclusion was based on a long line of authority<sup>35</sup> which had established the "principle of law that, in order to enable a person to claim in negligence for loss caused to him by reason of loss or damage to property, he must have had either the legal ownership of or a possessory title to the property concerned at the time when the loss or damage occurred<sup>36</sup>" or, where the loss is caused by a continuing process, at the time when the cause of action in respect of it first accrued.<sup>37</sup> It is not enough for him at the relevant time "to have only had contractual rights in relation to such property"<sup>38</sup> when the loss or damage occurred. The House of Lords refused to create an exception to this principle where (as in the present case) the contractual right, which C had under his contract of sale with B, was one to have property and possession of the goods transferred to him at a later date. The main reason for this refusal was that the contract of carriage between A and B was expressed to be subject to an international Convention<sup>39</sup> which gave A (as carrier) the benefit of certain immunities from, and limitations of, liability; and to have held A liable in tort to C would have produced the undesirable result of depriving A of the protection of that contract,<sup>40</sup> since C (being a stranger to it) was no more bound by its terms than entitled to assert rights under it.

(e) TORT AND CONTRACT DAMAGES CONTRASTED. Where a third party can recover damages in tort for the negligent performance of a contract between two others, the damages in such a tort action will not normally be assessed in the same way as they would be in a contractual action. In particular, certain kinds of "economic loss" are generally regarded as being recoverable only in a contractual action. This follows from the principle that the object of awarding damages in a contractual action is to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been, if the contract had been

2 Lloyd's Rep. 57 (High Court of New Zealand). For a possible qualification, see The Kapetan Georgis [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 352, where A in breach of his contract with B caused physical harm to B in respect of which C became liable to indemnify B, and C was held to have an arguable case against A.

<sup>34</sup> On the facts of The Aliakmon rights under the contract of carriage would now be transferred to C by virtue of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992, s.2: see White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 265. But cases can still be imagined where this would not be the position: see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001) §5-098.

<sup>35</sup> Stretching from Cattle v Stockton Waterworks Co (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 453 through The Wear Breeze [1969] 1 Q.B. 219 to The Mineral Transporter [1986] A.C. 1.

<sup>36</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 809.

<sup>37</sup> The Starsin [2001] EWCA Civ 56; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437 at [96] (per Rix L.J., whose judgment was on this point affirmed on appeal: [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. at [40], [64], [90], [139]).

<sup>38</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 809. Grieve (1986) 136 N.L.J. 1201 suggests that the principle may have been qualified by Latent Damage Act 1986, s.3; but there is no hint in the legislative history of s.3 that such a qualification was intended. It can in any event only apply where the damage was still latent when the claimant became owner: this was not the position in The Aliakmon. The point was left open in The Starsin [2001] EWCA Civ 56; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437 at [119-128] (per Rix L.J., dissenting but not on this point), [134], [202, 203] and not discussed in the House of Lords (above, n.37).

<sup>39</sup> i.e. the Hague Rules set out in the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, now superseded in England by Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971.

<sup>40</sup> cf. below, pp.642-643; Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758 at 782-783. For the suggestion that the position may be different where the potential tortfeasor has no such protection, see Triangle Steel & Supply Co v Korean United Lines Inc (1985) 63 B.C.L.R. 66 at 80 (the reasoning of which is in other respects inconsistent with that of The Aliakmon). For further discussion of this aspect of The Aliakmon see below p.639 n.65.

performed, while in an action in tort that object is to put him back into the position in which he was before the tort was committed.<sup>41</sup> The distinction is well illustrated by Muirhead v Industrial Tank Specialities Ltd<sup>42</sup> where the plaintiff, who owned a lobster farm, had entered into a contract for the installation of pumps which failed because of a defect in their electric motors. There was no contract between the plaintiff and the supplier of the motors but his claim against that supplier succeeded in tort in respect of the physical damage caused by the failure (i.e. the value of the lobsters which had died); and in respect of “any financial loss suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of that physical damage”.<sup>43</sup> (i.e. the loss of profits on the sale of those lobsters). But a further claim “in respect of the whole economic loss suffered”<sup>44</sup> by the plaintiff (i.e. for loss of the profits that he would have made from the installation, had it not been defective) was rejected: such damages might have been recoverable from the installer of the pumps in contract but they could not be claimed from the suppliers of the motors in tort.

Considerable difficulty again arises in this connection from the Junior Books case.<sup>45</sup> The main question discussed in that case was whether damages for any economic or financial loss could be recovered in a tort action in the absence of any allegation that the cracks in the floor were a source of danger to persons or to other property. In the exceptional circumstances of the case, this question was answered in the affirmative and on that basis most of the items of loss, in respect of which damages were said to be recoverable, can be explained in terms of the principles governing the assessment of damages in tort: this is, for example, true of the profits lost and of the wages and overheads wasted while the factory was closed for repairs to the floor. But it was also said that the factory owners were entitled to the cost of replacing the floor<sup>46</sup> and such an award would, by putting them into the position in which they would have been if the sub-contractor's promise had been performed, amount to an award of contract damages in spite of the fact that there was no contract between them and the sub-contractors<sup>47</sup>: on the normal basis of assessment in tort, the damages for this item should not have included the cost of replacing the floor with a good one.<sup>48</sup> In the Junior Books case, Lord Keith explained this aspect of the case on the ground that, in replacing the floor, the factory owners had simply mitigated the loss of profit resulting from the defects in the floor originally provided<sup>49</sup>; and it is settled that expenses reasonably incurred in mitigation are recoverable.<sup>50</sup> But as this reasoning was not adopted by the other members of the House of Lords, an alternative explanation was given in the Muirhead case, namely that the same special (or “unique”) factors in the Junior Books case, which gave rise to

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.359; below, pp.937–938.

<sup>42</sup> [1986] Q.B. 507; Whittaker, 49 M.L.R. 369; Oughton [1987] J.B.L. 370.

<sup>43</sup> [1986] Q.B. 507 at 533.

<sup>44</sup> ibid.

<sup>45</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520; Grubb [1984] C.L.J. 111; Holyoak, 99 L.Q.R. 591; Smith and Burns, 46 M.L.R. 147.

<sup>46</sup> This was one of the items claimed; the question whether the claim was proved was not before the House of Lords, which decided only that there was a cause of action in respect of it if negligence were established.

<sup>47</sup> The case was governed by Scots law, which recognises a jus quaesitum tertio, but the conditions giving rise to such a right were not satisfied.

<sup>48</sup> cf. Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 2 A.C. 398 at 469. Lord Roskill in the Junior Books case at p.545 discusses (without reaching a definite conclusion) the question whether the pursuer in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] A.C. 562 could have recovered damages “for the diminished value of the ginger beer”—not for the cost of replacing the contaminated with pure ginger beer. Even the former basis of assessment is hard to reconcile with the authorities cited above, p.613, n.28.

<sup>49</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520 at 536.

<sup>50</sup> cf. below, pp.976–977, 978–979.

the duty of care there,<sup>51</sup> also explain the assessment of damages.<sup>52</sup> This narrow view of the Junior Books case is supported by dicta in the Junior Books case itself<sup>53</sup>; by the fact that there is no subsequent similar<sup>54</sup> case in which a third party has recovered damages in tort to put him into the position in which he would have been if the contract between two others had been performed (as opposed to that in which he was before it was broken); and by the fact that many later decisions<sup>55</sup> have made it highly unlikely that such damages will, in a future tort case of this kind, be awarded to a third party. On the contrary, two House of Lords decisions have specifically rejected such claims.<sup>56</sup> In each case, a lessee claimed damages in tort for the cost of remedying defects alleged to be due to the negligence of a building contractor in the performance of a contract to which the lessee was not a party. In each case, the contractor was held not liable in tort, even if he was negligent,<sup>57</sup> since the defects had been discovered before they had caused any personal injury, or damage to other property belonging to the lessees. To make the contractor liable for the purely economic loss suffered by the lessee in remedying the defect would “impose upon [the contractor] for the benefit of those with whom he had no contractual relationship the obligation of one who warranted the quality of”<sup>58</sup> his work. Such a result would have been inconsistent with the common law doctrine of privity; and these cases reinforce the view that liability in negligence to third parties has not wholly subverted (though it may have limited the scope of) that doctrine.

The general principle that a third party cannot recover damages in tort to put him into the position in which he would have been if a contract between two others had been performed is, at least at first sight, hard to reconcile with cases such as White v Jones,<sup>59</sup> where A had instructed his solicitor B to draw up a will containing bequests in favour of his daughters C and D, but B negligently and in breach of his contract with A had done nothing to carry out these instructions by the time of A's death. The House of Lords by a majority held that B was liable in tort to C and D, and that the damages to which they were entitled consisted of the amounts which they would have obtained under A's will, if B had duly carried out A's instructions. The case presented certain special features, namely that C had discussed A's testamentary intentions with B, and that the letter setting out A's wishes had been drafted by D's husband. The majority do

<sup>51</sup> See above, p.610.

<sup>52</sup> Muirhead case, [1986] Q.B. 507 at 523, 533–535.

<sup>53</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520 at 533 (per Lord Fraser, who took the same narrow view of the Junior Books case in The Mineral Transporter [1986] 1 A.C. at 24–25); and [1983] 1 A.C. at 546 (per Lord Roskill).

<sup>54</sup> For the different treatment of the “disappointed beneficiary” cases, see below, pp.616–618.

<sup>55</sup> i.e. Tate & Lyle Industries Ltd v GLC [1983] 2 A.C. 509; Balsamo v Medici [1984] 1 W.L.R. 951; The Mineral Transporter [1986] 1 A.C.; Muirhead v Industrial Tank Specialities Ltd [1986] Q.B. 507; The Aliakmon [1986] A.C. 785; Aswan Engineering Establishment Co v Lupton Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1. cf. also Smith v Littlewoods Organisation Ltd [1987] A.C. 241 at 280; Yuen Kun-yeu v Attorney-General of Hong Kong [1988] A.C. 175; Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758; Greater Nottingham Co-operative Soc Ltd v Cementation Piling & Foundation Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71 at 94; Davies v Radcliffe [1990] 1 W.L.R. 821; Parker-Tweedale v Dunbar Bank plc [1991] Ch. 12 at 24; Deloitte Haskins & Sells v National Mutual Life Nominees [1993] A.C. 774.

<sup>56</sup> D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177; Department of the Environment v Thomas Bates & Son Ltd [1991] 1 A.C. 499.

<sup>57</sup> In the D & F Estates case, there was no such negligence as the builders had employed competent sub-contractors.

<sup>58</sup> [1989] A.C. 177 at 207; cf. ibid. at 211–212.

<sup>59</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207 (Lords Keith and Mustill dissenting), approving the result (though not the reasoning) in Ross v Caunters [1980] Ch. 287, where B's negligence took the form, not of simply failing to carry out A's instructions, but of carrying them out ineffectively. cf. Esterhuizen v Allied Dunbar Assurance plc [1998] 2 F.L.R. 668 (similar liability of company offering will-making services); and, in Australia, Hill v van Erp (1997) 142 A.L.J. 687 (also a case of actual misfeasance by the solicitor).

not seem to restrict the principle of liability to such special circumstances<sup>60</sup> though they accept that there must be “boundaries to the availability of the remedy” which “will have to be worked out . . . as practical problems come before the courts”.<sup>61</sup> It is, for example, an open question whether such a remedy would be available to a prospective beneficiary who had no previous connection with the testator or knowledge of his intentions; and it seems that the solicitor would not be liable for the amount of the intended benefit where it would have been reasonable for the beneficiary to have secured this benefit by taking proceedings against the estate for rectification of the will.<sup>62</sup> But where the principle (whatever its precise scope may turn out to be) does apply, its effect is to put C into the position in which he would have been if the contract between A and B had been properly performed. Such cases are, however, distinguishable from those which hold that building contractors are not liable to third parties in respect of purely economic loss caused by defective work. In the building cases, the third party’s complaint is that he has not received the benefit of the contractor’s performance. In the disappointed beneficiary cases, the benefit of which the third party is deprived is not that of the solicitor’s work: the lost benefit was to be provided, not by the solicitor, but by the testator; it was not to be created by the solicitor’s work, but existed independently of it. The third party is not entitled to the cost of curing the defects in the solicitor’s work (e.g. to the cost of employing another solicitor to give effect to the testator’s intention). On the contrary, it has been held that, if the defect is discovered when cure is still possible, the solicitor owes no duty to the beneficiary.<sup>63</sup> There are also the points that, if any duty is to be imposed on the solicitor to the disappointed beneficiary, the only realistic measure of damages is the value of the lost benefit; and that no more than nominal damages could be recovered from the solicitor by the client’s estate, since it would have suffered no loss. The negligent solicitor would thus escape all substantial liability if he were not held liable to the disappointed beneficiary for the value of the lost benefit. In the building contract cases, on the other hand, the employer will usually have a substantial remedy against the defaulting builder for damages amounting either to the cost of curing the defects in the work or to the difference between the value of the work which was done and that which should have been done<sup>64</sup>; and such a remedy may be available to the employer, not only in respect of his own loss, but also (in appropriate circumstances) in respect of loss suffered by the third party.<sup>65</sup> For these reasons, it is submitted that the building contract cases can be distinguished from disappointed beneficiary cases such as White v Jones.

The principle of that case extended to a number of closely analogous situations. One such extension was made in Carr-Glynn v Frearsons<sup>66</sup> where the solicitors’ negligence took the form, not of failing to secure the proper execution of the will, but of failing to take steps to ensure that property specifically bequeathed to the beneficiary remained within the client’s estate after her death.<sup>67</sup> Loss was thus suffered by the estate but the

<sup>60</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 295.

<sup>61</sup> ibid., at 269. The alleged beneficiary’s claim clearly cannot succeed without proof of the requisite testamentary intention in his favour: see Gibbons v Nelsens [2000] Lloyd’s Rep. P.N. 603.

<sup>62</sup> On the question whether it would have been reasonable for the beneficiary to have taken such proceedings, contrast Walker v Geo H Medlicott & Son, [1999] 1 W.L.R. 727, with Horsfall v Hayward [1999] 1 F.L.R. 1182.

<sup>63</sup> Hemmens v Wilson Browne [1995] Ch. 223.

<sup>64</sup> See below, p.945.

<sup>65</sup> See above, p.594.

<sup>66</sup> [1998] 4 All E.R. 225.

<sup>67</sup> The testatrix was joint owner of the property in question and the solicitors had negligently failed to advise her to sever the joint tenancy, so that on her death her share passed to the other co-owner by right of survivorship.

solicitors were nevertheless held liable to the intended legatee since the proceeds of any claim by the estate would have benefited, not that legatee, but the person entitled under the will to the residuary estate, thus defeating the intention of the testatrix.<sup>68</sup> The decision can be explained on the ground that “the estate” is something of a legal abstraction, the loss being in fact suffered by the individual who under the will would, but for the solicitors’ negligence, have received the property which was lost to “the estate”; and that the court looked behind that abstraction<sup>69</sup> so as to fashion a remedy for that individual. The alternative possibility that the estate might have had a claim against the solicitors in respect of the intended legatee’s loss<sup>70</sup> was not considered, nor was any attempt made to reconcile the result with those building contract cases (discussed above<sup>71</sup>) in which a third party was held to have no remedy in tort against the contractor for pure economic loss. The principle of the “disappointed beneficiary” cases has also been extended to the situation in which the benefit of which the claimant was deprived as a result of the defendant’s negligence was one which would have arisen otherwise than under a will. In Gorham v British Telecommunications plc<sup>72</sup> an insurance company sold a policy to a customer who had made it clear to the company that he was buying the policy to provide for his wife and dependant children in the event of his predeceasing them. The company negligently failed to advise him that these dependants would have been better off if he had joined his employers’ pension scheme; and it was held that the company was liable to the dependants for loss of benefits under the employers’ scheme up to (but not beyond) the time when the company had corrected its original advice. The principle of White v Jones<sup>73</sup> applied because (as in that case) the customer had not himself suffered any loss, so that, if the dependants’ claims had been rejected, then neither the persons who had suffered loss nor anyone else would have any claim for established negligence; and because the advice had been given “in a context in which the interests of the defendants were fundamental to the transaction”.<sup>74</sup> In both these respects, the case was closely analogous to that of a disappointed testamentary beneficiary.<sup>75</sup>

The “disappointed beneficiary” cases go further than any other group of negligence cases in encroaching on the common law doctrine of privity of contract. Perhaps for this reason, they were described as “an unusual class of case” in Goodwill v Pregnancy Advisory Service.<sup>76</sup> In that case, the defendant had arranged for one M to have a vasectomy and, after the operation had been carried out, told him that it had been <sup>68</sup> cf. Corbett v Bond Pearce [2001] EWCA Civ 531; [2001] 3 All E.R. 769, where a residuary gift in favour of a disappointed beneficiary was held invalid in legal proceedings the costs of which were paid out of the testatrix’s estate. The solicitors whose negligence was the cause of the invalidity of that gift then settled the disappointed beneficiary’s claim for the full value of the residuary estate, undiminished by those costs. It was held that the solicitors were not liable to the estate for such costs since to hold them so liable would (1) make them liable twice over for the same loss; and (2) result in benefiting persons whom the testatrix (in accordance with her final testamentary intentions as expressed in the invalid will) no longer wished to benefit.

<sup>69</sup> In a way somewhat reminiscent of the process, well known in company law, of “lifting the corporate veil.”

<sup>70</sup> See above, pp.593 et seq.

<sup>71</sup> See above, n.56.

<sup>72</sup> [2000] 1 W.L.R. 2129.

<sup>73</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207, above, p.616.

<sup>74</sup> Gorham’s case, above n.72, at 2142.

<sup>75</sup> cf. the reference in Dean v Allin & Watts [2001] EWCA Civ 758; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 249 (above p.563) at [69] by Robert Walker L.J. to the “very special problems” which had arisen in White v Jones and Gorham’s case, evidently not sharing the view of Lightman J. in Dean v Allin & Watts, above at [40] that the decision there represented a further extension of the principle in White v Jones.

<sup>76</sup> [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1397 at 1403.

successful and that he no longer needed to use any other method of contraception. Some three years later, M formed a sexual relationship with the claimant, to whom he communicated the information given to him by the defendant relating to the vasectomy; she ceased to use any method of contraception after having consulted her own general practitioner who told her that there was only a minute chance of her becoming pregnant. The vasectomy having undergone a spontaneous reversal, the claimant became pregnant by M and one reason given for holding that the defendant was not liable to her in damages was that a doctor performing a vasectomy could not realistically be described as having been employed to confer a benefit on his patient's future sexual partners. The case was also said to be unlike the "disappointed beneficiary" cases in that dismissal of the claim would not produce the "rank injustice"<sup>77</sup> that would arise in those cases if in them the only person with a claim against the negligent solicitor were the testator's estate, and that estate had suffered no loss. In a sterilisation case, a substantial remedy for negligence (if established) would normally be available to the patient him (or her) self.

3. Interference With Contractual Rights

(1) In general

Although a contract primarily creates rights and duties enforceable by the contracting parties against each other, it also incidentally imposes on third parties the duty not to interfere with the contracting parties in performing the contract.<sup>78</sup> In the leading case of Lumley v Gye<sup>79</sup> it was held that a person who, knowing of a contract between two others, "maliciously"<sup>80</sup> induces one of them to refuse to perform it, is liable for what has since become known as the tort of wrongful interference with contractual, or other legal,<sup>81</sup> rights.

(2) Contracts affecting property

The principle just stated may help to solve the problem which arises when a person acquires property with notice of a contract concerning it, previously made between two other persons. The problem is: to what extent is the acquirer restricted<sup>82</sup> by the contract in the use which he is entitled to make of the property? Where the property is land, the law has developed complex rules as a result of which a third party may be bound by (and, indeed, entitled to enforce) the contract, by way of exception to the doctrine of privity.<sup>83</sup> But the law has been reluctant to admit that contracts concerning chattels can bind a

<sup>77</sup> [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1397 at 1403.

<sup>78</sup> For other effects on third parties, see PSM International v Whitehouse [1992] I.R.L.R. 279.

<sup>79</sup> (1853) 2 F. & B. 216. For further proceedings, see 23 L.T. 66, 18 Jur. 468n.; 23 L.J.Q.B. 116n; Waddams, 117 L.Q.R. 431.

<sup>80</sup> i.e. deliberately and with knowledge of the existence of the contract: British Homophone Ltd v Kunz (1935) 152 L.T. 589; D C Thomson & Co Ltd v Deakin [1952] Ch. 646 at 694; Jones Bros (Hunstanton) Ltd v Stevens [1955] 1 Q.B. 275 at 280. Such knowledge may be inferred from surrounding circumstances: Merkur Island Shipping Corp v Laughton [1983] 2 A.C. 570. Two dicta in British Industrial Plastics Ltd v Ferguson [1940] 1 All E.R. 479 at 483 suggesting that liability may be based on constructive knowledge were not necessary for the decision and run counter to the main stream of authority. See further, below, p.622, n.6. There is no tortious liability for inducing unfair dismissal (which is not a breach of contract): Wilson v Housing Corp [1997] I.R.L.R. 346.

<sup>81</sup> See Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp [1995] Ch. 152 at 165; cf. Royal Brunei Airlines Sdn Bhd. v Tan [1995] 2 A.C. 378 and Twins v Yardley [2002] UKHL 12; [2002] 2 A.C. 164, stating similar principles for liability for dishonestly interfering with a relationship arising by way of trust.

<sup>82</sup> For the possible effect of a promise by the acquirer to perform the contract, see below, p.702.

<sup>83</sup> See Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property (6th ed.), Chaps 15 and 16.

third party.<sup>84</sup> If a third party were bound by such contracts at all, he might (as in the land cases) be bound where he had merely constructive notice of them; and it is generally agreed that the doctrine of constructive notice should be kept, so far as possible, out of commercial affairs.<sup>85</sup> On the other hand, too rigid a refusal to allow contracts concerning chattels to affect third parties may itself prove commercially inconvenient.

Such contracts may be divided into four groups.<sup>86</sup> The first consists of contracts restricting the use or disposition of goods. Certain undesirable restrictions of this kind have been expressly invalidated by legislation.<sup>87</sup> But others may be perfectly reasonable business arrangements aimed at ensuring consistency of quality or stable markets: for example, contracts that goods shall be sold only in packets sealed by the manufacturer, or after a certain time has elapsed.<sup>88</sup> The second group of contracts consists of those requiring the use of particular chattels for their performance, without creating any proprietary or possessory interest in those chattels for example, a contract to carry cargo in a particular ship. The third group consists of contracts for the hire of a chattel: and the fourth of options to purchase a chattel. These last two groups are now very common; a hire-purchase agreement is a contract for the hire of a chattel, coupled with an option to purchase it.

(a) PROTECTION AGAINST THIRD PARTIES IN SPECIAL CASES. In a number of special cases, the courts protect the rights arising under such contracts against third parties with notice of them: for example, where restrictions are imposed by a patentee on the use or disposition of patented goods,<sup>89</sup> and where an option to purchase a chattel is specifically enforceable.<sup>90</sup> The same would be true where money was lent on the terms that the loan was to be repaid out of specific property. Since such an undertaking to repay is specifically enforceable, it would create a charge in equity over the property in favour of the lender, and this would prevail against a third party who later acquired an interest in it, unless he was a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.<sup>91</sup>

(b) GENERAL PRINCIPLE OF PROTECTION AGAINST THIRD PARTIES REJECTED. A more general principle was formulated in De Mattos v Gibson,<sup>92</sup> where Knight Bruce L.J. said:

<sup>84</sup> This aspect of the doctrine of privity is not affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: below, p.580.

<sup>85</sup> See Manchester Trust Ltd v Furness [1895] 2 Q.B. 539 at 545; cf. Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC [1996] A.C. 669 at 704–705.

<sup>86</sup> See Chafee, 41 H.L.R. 945; cf. Wade, 44 L.Q.R. 51; Gardner, 98 L.Q.R. 278; Tettenborn [1982] C.L.J. 58; Cohen-Grabelsky, 45 M.L.R. 241.

<sup>87</sup> Patents Act 1977, s.44, to the extent to which this remains in force: see Competition Act 1998 (Transitional, Consequential and Supplemental Provisions) Order 2000, SI 2000/311, art.3.

<sup>88</sup> See BMT v Salvadori [1949] Ch. 556; below, p.563; semble that in similar circumstances agreements of this kind would be likely to be exempted by virtue of Competition Act, s.4 or of ibid. Sch.3, para.7(1) from any potential invalidity under s.2.

<sup>89</sup> Subject to Patents Act 1977, s.44 (see above, n.87 formerly Patents Act 1949, s.57); Dunlop Rubber Co Ltd v Long Life Battery Depot [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1033. This position is not affected by Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

<sup>90</sup> Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew. 651, as explained in Erskine Macdonald Ltd v Eyles [1921] 1 Ch. 631 at 641; cf. The Stena Nautica (No.2) [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 336 (where specific enforcement was denied). For the special position of mortgages of ships, see The Shizelle [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 444.

<sup>91</sup> Smis Bank Corp v Lloyd's Bank Ltd [1982] A.C. 584 at 598, 613; the actual decision was that the contract of loan did not create an obligation to repay out of specific property so that there was no specifically enforceable agreement affecting it see below, p.1021, n.57. cf. MacJordan Construction Ltd v Brookmount Erosin, The Times, October 29, 1991.

<sup>92</sup> (1858) 4 D. & J. 276 at 282.

"Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man, by gift or purchase, acquires property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract, lawfully and for valuable consideration made . . . with a third person, to use and employ the property . . . in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller".

This principle came to be associated with the rule in Tulk v Moxhay<sup>93</sup> under which third parties are bound by restrictive covenants concerning land. That rule was later confined to cases in which the claimant's interest in enforcing the covenant consisted in the ownership of land capable of being benefited by the covenant. This usually meant adjacent land<sup>94</sup>; and since adjacency is hardly a satisfactory criterion of interest in the case of things that can be moved, the tendency of these developments of the rule in Tulk v Moxhay was to undermine Knight Bruce L.J.'s principle.<sup>95</sup> Nevertheless, in Lord Strathcona SS Co v Dominion Coal Co<sup>96</sup> the Privy Council relied on that principle to hold that the time charterer of a ship had an interest in the ship which he could enforce against a purchaser of the ship with notice of the charterparty; the purchaser was also said to be in the position of a constructive trustee, with obligations which a court of equity would not allow him to violate.<sup>97</sup> The decision provoked adverse criticism,<sup>98</sup> particularly because the land law analogies and the constructive trust reasoning on which it was based might lead to the third party's being made liable where he had only constructive notice of the earlier contract. Where that contract concerned the use or disposition of a chattel, such a conclusion was open to the objection that it might have the undesirable effect of introducing the doctrine of constructive notice into commercial affairs. When a similar problem arose in Port Line Ltd v Ben Line Steamers Ltd,<sup>99</sup> Diplock J. therefore refused to follow the Privy Council's decision. Alternatively, he was prepared to distinguish it: the buyer of the ship in the Port Line case knew that she was under charter to the claimant, but he did not have actual notice of the precise extent of the claimant's rights under the charterparty.<sup>1</sup> Thus the Port Line case rejects the principle stated by Knight Bruce L.J. so far as it relates to contracts concerning chattels; but it does not decide that a third party can always disregard such a contract. A number of possibilities must be considered.

(c) REMEDY. Later authorities have restricted the principle stated in De Mattos v Gibson<sup>2</sup> by emphasising that the remedy there sought was simply an injunction to restrain the acquirer, C, from using the property inconsistently with the terms of the

<sup>93</sup> (1848) 2 Ph. 774.

<sup>94</sup> LCC v Allen [1914] 3 K.B. 642; the actual decision was reversed by statute (see now Housing Act 1985, s.609), but the principle stated in the text remains unimpaired.

<sup>95</sup> See Barker v Stickney [1919] 1 K.B. 121 at 131; for criticism, see Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. at 300.

<sup>96</sup> [1926] A.C. 108.

<sup>97</sup> ibid. at 125.

<sup>98</sup> e.g. Greenhalgh v Mallard [1943] 2 All E.R. 234.

<sup>99</sup> [1958] Q.B. 146. The cases cited in n.74 at p.607, above, all apply the constructive trust reasoning to contracts concerning land and do not, it is submitted, undermine the rejection of that reasoning in the Port Line case so far as contracts affecting the use or disposition of chattels are concerned.

<sup>1</sup> Hence the buyer was not liable in tort: see below, n.6.

<sup>2</sup> See above p.621 at n.92.

contract between A and B, known to C.<sup>3</sup> The principle therefore cannot impose any positive obligation on C to perform the terms of the contract between A and B. Thus where A acquired shares from B, promising to make payments to B on the occurrence of specific events, which later happened, it was held that that promise could not be enforced against C who later acquired the shares from A with knowledge of the contract between A and B, nor against D who acquired them from C with such knowledge.<sup>4</sup> An injunction on the principle of De Mattos v Gibson was not available against C or D as they were not proposing to act inconsistently with the contract between A and B: "they [were] merely proposing . . . to do nothing whatever".<sup>5</sup>

(d) THIRD PARTY'S LIABILITY IN TORT A third party who acquires a chattel with knowledge<sup>6</sup> of a contract affecting it may, if his acquisition or use of the chattel is inconsistent with that contract, be liable in tort for interfering with its performance.<sup>7</sup> Thus in BMTA v Salvadori<sup>8</sup> A bought a car and covenanted with B that he would not resell it for one year without first offering it to B. During the year, C bought the car from A with notice of the covenant, and was held liable to B for wrongfully interfering with B's contractual rights against A. It has been suggested that the decision of the Privy Council in the Lord Strathcona case<sup>9</sup> can be explained on the ground that the purchaser of the ship had committed this tort against the charterer.<sup>10</sup> The tort may be committed even though A was quite willing to break his contract with B. Thus it is immaterial whether A or C began the negotiations leading to the contract between them<sup>11</sup>; indeed, C's tort liability may arise precisely because he has colluded with A in an effort to get rid of a restriction imposed in favour of B by the contract between A and B.<sup>12</sup> The merit of this approach is that it avoids the danger of importing the doctrine of constructive notice into this branch of the law. On the other hand, it is subject to two limitations.

First, the tort is not committed if the defendant's interference was not the cause of the claimant's loss. In the Lord Strathcona case,<sup>13</sup> the purchasers of the ship (who were the defendants in the Privy Council proceedings) mortgaged her, but were too poor to put her to sea. The mortgage gave the mortgagees the right to sell the ship, and it was held that they were entitled to sell her free from the charterer's rights, though they had notice of those rights. The cause of the failure to perform the charterparty was the

<sup>3</sup> Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1979] Ch. 581 at 574 (as to which see also below, n.10).

<sup>4</sup> Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138; Tettenborn [1993] C.L.J. 382; for a successful appeal on another point see [1995] Ch.152; below, p.623, n.16.

<sup>5</sup> [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138 at 146.

<sup>6</sup> See J T Stratford & Sons Ltd v Lindley [1965] A.C. 269 at 332; Emerald Construction Co Ltd v Lomthian [1966] 1 W.L.R. 691; Daily Mirror Newspapers Ltd v Gardner [1968] 2 Q.B. 762; Greig v Insole [1978] 1 W.L.R. 302 at 336; and cf. Distillers Co (Biochemicals) Ltd v Times Newspapers [1975] Q.B. 613; Mercur Island Shipping Corp v Laughton [1983] 2 A.C. 570. But in the Port Line case (above, p.621) the defendant was not liable in tort as he had assumed that the charterparty with which he was alleged to have interfered was in the same terms as another charterparty which he had made with one of the contracting parties. This assumption was mistaken, but not, in the circumstances, unreasonable.

<sup>7</sup> Wade, 42 L.Q.R. 139.

<sup>8</sup> [1949] Ch. 556; Rickless v United Artists Corp [1988] Q.B. 40 at 58–59; cf. Law Debenture Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138, where the fifth defendant admitted liability on this ground; for a successful appeal on another point, see [1995] Ch. 152.

<sup>9</sup> [1926] A.C. 108.

<sup>10</sup> Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyd's Bank Ltd [1979] Ch. 548 at 574; in the Court of Appeal it was conceded that there was "no substance" in the point in that case: see [1982] A.C. 584 at 598 and below, p.623 at n.25.

<sup>11</sup> Sefion v Tophams Ltd [1965] Ch. 1140 at 1161, 1167, reversed without reference to this point [1967] A.C. 50.

<sup>12</sup> Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Kingswood Motors (Addlestone) Ltd [1974] Q.B. 142.

<sup>13</sup> [1926] A.C. 108; above, p.621.

shipowners' poverty, and not the mortgagees' sale of the ship.<sup>14</sup> Similarly, where breach of the contract has already been induced by C's acquisition of the property from A, there will be no tort liability for inducing breach of contract on D, who subsequently buys the property from C, even with knowledge of the contract between A and B, for D's conduct will not have played any part in inducing the original breach.<sup>15</sup> Nor is D in such a case liable for interference with the remedies arising out of the broken contract between A and B.<sup>16</sup>

Secondly, tort liability for interference with contractual rights is based on intentional wrongdoing. It follows that, if a defendant negligently damaged a ship which was subject to a time charterparty, he would not commit this tort against the charterer; nor would he be liable to the charterer in negligence for pecuniary loss, such as hire wasted or profits lost while the ship was, by reason of the damage, out of service.<sup>17</sup>

So far, in discussing the third party's liability for interference with contractual rights, it has been assumed that C either knew, or that he did not know, of the contract between A and B. In the former situation, he could, but in the latter he could not, be liable for the tort.<sup>18</sup> There is also an intermediate situation, in which C at the time of his contract with A had no more than constructive notice of A's earlier contract with B, but then acquired actual knowledge of that contract before calling for (or receiving) performance of his own contract with A.<sup>19</sup> The question then arises whether, on such facts, C is liable to B for the tort of interference with contractual rights. That tort is subject to the defence of "justification",<sup>20</sup> which is certainly available to C where he had contracted with A before B had done so.<sup>21</sup> The defence is a flexible one,<sup>22</sup> and the principle on which it is based appears to be equally applicable where C's contract with A was made after B's but in ignorance of it. The exercise by C of rights thus acquired in good faith against A should not, it is submitted, make C liable for the tort to B.<sup>23</sup> Even in such a situation, however, C may be liable to B (under the rules relating to special cases stated above<sup>24</sup>) if B's contract with A is specifically enforceable. Where the specific enforceability of this contract gives rise to an equitable interest, this can be asserted against C even though he had, when he contracted with A, only constructive notice of A's contract with B. In such a case, the tort claim would be "of no value"<sup>25</sup> if, as has been submitted above, it arises only where C, when he contracted with A, had actual knowledge of B's rights; but it

<sup>14</sup> The Lord Strathcona [1925] P. 143; judgment in this case was given four months before judgment in the Privy Council proceedings so that the injunction issued by the Privy Council never took effect. De Mattos v Gibson suffered a similar fate: (1858) 4 D. & J. 276. cf. The Myrto [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 243; Lyus v Prousa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044 at 1049.

<sup>15</sup> Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138; and see next note.

<sup>16</sup> Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1995] Ch. 152, reversing the decision at first instance (above) on this point.

<sup>17</sup> On the principle stated at p.611, above: The Mineral Transporter [1986] A.C. 1.

<sup>18</sup> See above, pp.619, 621.

<sup>19</sup> This was the position in Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1982] A.C. 584; see [1979] Ch. 548 at 568–569, and see below, n.23.

<sup>20</sup> See Salmond, The Law of Torts (21st ed.), pp.353–355.

<sup>21</sup> Smithies v National Association of Operative Plasterers [1909] 1 K.B. 310 at 337; Edwin Hill & Partners v First National Finance Corp plc [1989] 1 W.L.R. 225 at 230. For terms which may be imposed on C as a condition of obtaining relief against A, see Guinness Peat Aviation (Belgium) NV v Hispania Lineas Aereas S.A [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 190.

<sup>22</sup> Glamorgan Coal Co v South Wales Miners' Federation [1903] 2 K.B. 545 at 574–575.

<sup>23</sup> This was admitted in Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd, above, n.19; see [1979] Ch. 548 at 569–573.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.620.

<sup>25</sup> Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1982] A.C. 584 at 598, where it was held, on construction, that the contract was not specifically enforceable; see below, p.1021, n.57.

would equally be unnecessary to rely on it,<sup>26</sup> since B could succeed against C on the different ground that B's contract with A was specifically enforceable and therefore conferred an equitable interest on B.

(c) PROTECTION OF "POSSESSORY RIGHTS". A final possibility relates to contracts under which possession of a chattel is, or is to be, transferred. The contracts in the Strathcona and Port Line cases were not of this kind: they were time charters, under which a shipowner undertakes to render services by the use of a particular ship, which remains in his possession.<sup>27</sup> Such charters must be contrasted with demise charters, which are contracts for the hire of a ship under which the shipowner does transfer, or undertake to transfer, possession of the ship to the charterer.<sup>28</sup> The nearest analogy in the land law to a contract for the hire of a chattel is a lease,<sup>29</sup> and not a restrictive covenant. Hence the development of the doctrine of Tulk v Moxhay, discussed above,<sup>30</sup> need not affect cases concerning such contracts. One reason given by Diplock J. for his decision in the Port Line case was that a time charterer had "no proprietary or possessory rights in the ship".<sup>31</sup> It can be inferred that a "possessory right" might have been protected. Where the hirer of a chattel is in actual possession of it he should certainly be protected against a third party who acquires the chattel with notice of the hirer's interest.

It is less clear whether, in this context, the words "possessory rights" refer only to rights of possession, or extend also to rights to possession, i.e. whether a person who has a contractual right to the future possession of a chattel would similarly be protected against the third party. In The Stena Nautica (No.2)<sup>32</sup> A had demise-chartered his ship to B under a contract which also gave B an option to purchase her. Later, while A was in possession of the ship, he granted a second demise charter of her to C who had no knowledge of the earlier contract. B exercised his option to purchase and it was held that his only remedy was by way of damages against A: since B's option to purchase was not specifically enforceable,<sup>33</sup> he could not assert rights to the ship against C. The question whether B could assert a right to future possession as demise charterer against C did not, strictly speaking, arise since B was suing to enforce, not that right, but rather his right as a person who had exercised an option to purchase. But it seems from the reasoning of the Court of Appeal that B's right to possession as demise charterer would have been protected only if the contract under which the right arose was one in respect of which the court was willing to make an order of specific performance. The argument of commercial convenience which justifies the decision in the Port Line case<sup>34</sup> would seem to apply as much where a contract creates a right to the future possession of a chattel as where it creates the right to have some particular use made of the chattel. In each case the right is hard to discover and should not be enforced against a third party without <sup>27</sup> The Lancaster [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 497 at 500; The Scaptrade [1983] A.C. 694 at 702; The Niizura [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 66 at 72; The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [119].

<sup>26</sup> [1982] A.C. 584 at 598.

<sup>28</sup> Baumwoll Manufactur v Furness [1893] A.C. 8; The Giuseppe di Vittorio [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 156; BP Operating Co Ltd v Chevron Transport (Scotland) Ltd [2001] UKHL 50; [2003] A.C. 197, at [78, 79].

<sup>29</sup> cf. above, p.607 at n.73.

<sup>30</sup> See above, p.621.

<sup>31</sup> [1958] 2 Q.B. 146 at 166 (italics supplied).

<sup>32</sup> [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 336.

<sup>33</sup> See below, p.1022. A licence to occupy land can be enforced against a trespasser even by a licensee not yet in possession: Dutton v Manchester Airport plc [1999] 2 All E.R. 675.

<sup>34</sup> See above, p.621.

actual knowledge of it; and adequate protection against a third party with such knowledge is provided by the rules relating to the tort of wrongful interference with contractual rights.

4. Intimidation

The tort of intimidation is committed where A induces B to act to the detriment of C by threatening B with some unlawful course of conduct. In Rookes v Barnard<sup>35</sup> the House of Lords decided that a threat by A to break his contract with B is for this purpose a threat to do an unlawful act. Such a threat may therefore entitle C to sue A for intimidation. It has been said that this view outflanks the common law doctrine of privity.<sup>36</sup> No doubt in such a case C bases his cause of action on the threat to break a contract to which he is not a party. But the doctrine of privity only prevents C from enforcing A's promise to B<sup>37</sup>; and in cases of intimidation C is certainly not doing that. If A induces B to dismiss C by threatening to defame B, C may be able to sue A for intimidation, but not for defamation. So, if A induces B to dismiss C by threatening to break A's contract with B, C may be able to sue A for intimidation, but not for breach of contract. In such a case C is not trying to enforce A's promise to B: "his ground of action is quite different".<sup>38</sup> C's complaint is not that A has broken his promise to B but that he has coerced B into acting to C's detriment.<sup>39</sup> The House of Lords has therefore rejected the argument that the doctrine of privity would be outflanked by holding that the tort of intimidation could be committed by threatening to commit a breach of contract.<sup>40</sup>

5. Restitution?

It has been suggested in Australia that the third party may have a claim in restitution where the promisor has received payment (or some other performance) from the promisee and has then failed or refused to perform the promise in favour of the third party; and that the measure of recovery on such a claim is the amount promised.<sup>41</sup> The suggestion was made where premiums under a policy of liability insurance for the benefit of a third party had been paid by the promisee to the promisor (the insurance company) which had then refused to pay the third party. The promisor's liability in restitution was said to be based on his unjust enrichment, and to arise in spite of the fact that there was no correlative impoverishment of the third party. But while it is true that liability in restitution is not based on loss to the claimant, it is (in the case put) based <sup>35</sup> [1964] A.C. 1129. For restrictions on the scope of such liability where the unlawful conduct takes the form of acts done in the contemplation of furtherance of a trade dispute, see Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s.219 as amended by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993 s.49(1) and Sch.8, para.72; for an extension of the principle in favour of an individual whose expected supply of goods or services is disrupted by unlawful acts inducing industrial action, see Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s.235A, as inserted by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.22.

<sup>36</sup> Wedderburn, 24 M.I.L.R. 572 at 577; in Rookes v Barnard the argument was accepted in the Court of Appeal: [1963] 1 Q.B. 623 at 695, but rejected by the House of Lords; below, at n.38.

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.582.

<sup>38</sup> Rookes v Barnard [1964] A.C. at 1168; cf. 1208; if C were trying to enforce the contract, the damages might be quite different.

<sup>39</sup> Rookes v Barnard [1964] A.C. at 1208.

<sup>40</sup> ibid. at 1168, 1200, 1208, 1235; Hamson [1961] C.L.J. 189; [1964] C.L.J. 159; Hoffmann, 81 L.Q.R. 116 at 124–128.

<sup>41</sup> Trident Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 C.L.R. 107, per Gaudron J.; this view does not seem to be shared by any other member of the Court; Soh, 105 L.Q.R. 4.

on gain to the defendant and it is hard to see what justification there can be for wholly disregarding this basis of restitutionary liability in determining its measure. And the argument that, to hold the promisor liable to the third party was “not an abrogation of the doctrine of privity of contract”,<sup>42</sup> merely because the liability was said to arise in restitution, is, it is submitted, inconsistent with the practical result of making the promisor so liable. We have seen that, in England, the promisor is not liable in tort where the practical effect of imposing such liability would be to abrogate the doctrine of privity<sup>43</sup>; and there seems to be no reason why the position should be different merely because the alleged basis of liability is restitution rather than tort. The suggestion that the promisor is liable in restitution to the third party for the amount promised, merely because the promisor has received performance from the promisee is also inconsistent with the reasoning of Beswick v Beswick,<sup>44</sup> where it was assumed that the third party had no common law right to sue the promisor in her own name, in spite of the fact that the promisor had received performance in full from the promisee. The view that claims of the kind here discussed fall outside the scope of the doctrine of privity of contract must therefore be regarded with scepticism. The argument based on restitution would in any event be of no avail to the third party where the promisor was willing to pay and the issue was merely whether it should pay the third party or the promisee<sup>45</sup>: in such cases the promisor would not be unjustly enriched so that there would be no basis for restitutionary liability.

The above discussion is based on the assumption that the promisor would be unjustly enriched if he were allowed to retain a payment received from the promisee in spite of his failure to perform his promise to pay the third party. There is the further possibility that the promisor may have received a benefit from a third party: for example, where A contracts to grant a development lease to B, a company controlled by C, and C incurs expense in improving A's land in anticipation of the development, which then fails to take place because of A's failure to perform his contract with B. In such a case, it is arguable that C may have a restitution claim against A.<sup>46</sup> To allow such a claim would not be inconsistent with the doctrine of privity since in such a case C's claim is not based on any promise made by A to B for the benefit of C; no such promise has been made. The basis and measure of any restitution claim which C may have against A is more closely analogous to cases in which restitution is granted in respect of benefits conferred under anticipated contracts which fail to come into existence.<sup>47</sup>

SECTION 4. EXEMPTION CLAUSES AND THIRD PARTIES

Where an exemption clause purports to affect a third party,<sup>48</sup> two questions arise. Can the third party take the benefit of the clause? Can he be bound by it? For the purpose

<sup>42</sup> 165 C.L.R. at 177.

<sup>43</sup> See above, p.612.

<sup>44</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; above, p.589.

<sup>45</sup> See above, p.604; cf. such cases as Re Schebsman [1944] Ch. 83 (below, p.647) and Re Sinclair's Life Policy [1938] Ch. 799 (below, p.648).

<sup>46</sup> Brennan v Brighton BC, The Times, May 15, 1997, where B was a company which had been wound up and so could no longer sue A for breach of the contract between them.

<sup>47</sup> See below, p.1062.

<sup>48</sup> A contract between A and B may by reference incorporate an exemption clause contained in a contract between B and C. If so, A is not for the present purpose a third party: see, for example, The Coral [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1.

of this discussion, it will be assumed that the clause is valid under the rules stated in Chapter 7.<sup>49</sup>

1. The Benefit

(1) Privity and exceptions

Originally, the courts held that a person could only take the benefit of an exemption clause in a contract which he did not make himself if one of the recognised exceptions to the doctrine of privity could be invoked in his favour: for example, if the contract was made through an agent acting either for him or for the other party.<sup>50</sup> Such agency reasoning might sometimes be artificial, but it at any rate saved the face of the doctrine of privity. A further exception has been created by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, under which third parties are, if the requirements of the Act are satisfied,<sup>51</sup> entitled to the benefit of exemption clauses in contracts between others.<sup>52</sup> But some of the cases with which the following discussion is concerned are<sup>53</sup> or may<sup>54</sup> not be, covered by that legislation; and in others it may be to the third party's advantage to rely, not on the new statutory exception, but on a common law exception,<sup>55</sup> since this is not limited by the provisions of the Act.<sup>56</sup>

Whether, in this context, the common law doctrine must be abandoned altogether depends on the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Elder, Dempster & Co v Paterson, Zochonis & Co.<sup>57</sup> A company agreed to carry the claimant's palm-oil from West Africa to Hull and time-chartered a ship for this purpose. The contract of carriage was evidenced by a bill of lading, the parties to which were the claimants and the company; this bill exempted "the shipowners, hereinafter called the company",<sup>58</sup> from liability for bad stowage. The oil was damaged by bad stowage and it was held that the shipowners were protected by the exemption clause, although there was no express contract directly made between them and the claimants. One possible ground for this decision was that the company had acted as the shipowners' agent for the purpose of making a contract between them and the claimants.<sup>59</sup> The inference that the company had so acted appears to have been based on the ground that the exemption clause expressly referred to, and

<sup>49</sup> Many of the cases discussed in this Section concern contracts for the international carriage of goods by sea and would not be affected by the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 or by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999; above, pp.266, 277. Others (e.g. those in which the claim was for personal injuries) would now often be differently decided, or decided on other grounds, under the Act or the Regulations; above, pp.249, 273.

<sup>50</sup> Hall v NE Ry (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 437; cf. Barrett v Great Northern Ry (1904) 20 T.L.R. 175; The Kirkness [1957] P. 51; Texas Instruments Ltd v Nason (Europe) Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 146 (where the carrier's wilful misconduct deprived him of the benefit of an exempting provision having the force of law); The Romina [2002] EWHC 1759 (admt), [2003] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 129.

<sup>51</sup> See especially s.1(1), (2) and (3); below, pp.651–656.

<sup>52</sup> s.1(6).

<sup>53</sup> e.g. Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158; Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] A.C. 446; see below, p.655.

<sup>54</sup> For the question whether Elder, Dempster & Co v Paterson Zochonis & Co [1924] A.C. 522 would be covered by the 1999 Act, see below p.656, n.34.

<sup>55</sup> s.7(1) of the Act preserves the third party's right to rely on such an exception.

<sup>56</sup> e.g. by ss.2 or 3; below, pp.657–661.

<sup>57</sup> [1924] A.C. 522; distinguished in Gudsdén Pty Ltd v Australian Coastal Shipping Commission [1977] 1 N.S.W.L.R. 575, The Golden Lake [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 632, The Forum Craftsman [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 291 (especially at 295) and in The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 321 at 331.

<sup>58</sup> It was admitted that these words were apt to protect the company: [1923] 1 K.B. 422.

<sup>59</sup> [1924] A.C. 522 at 534 (first sentence).

purported to protect, the shipowners<sup>60</sup>; and, although this fact would no longer of itself support such an inference,<sup>61</sup> the agency reasoning is consistent with the doctrine of privity in that it gives rise to a contract between the claimants and the shipowners. A second possible ground for the decision was that the act of the claimants in presenting the goods for carriage, followed by that of the captain in accepting them for this purpose on behalf of the shipowners,<sup>62</sup> gave rise to what Lord Sumner called a “bailment on terms”<sup>63</sup> between the claimants and the shipowners, that is, to one which incorporated the exemption clause by tacit reference.<sup>64</sup> “Bailment on terms” is, however, unfortunately an expression with more than one possible meaning. It has been judicially interpreted to refer either to a bailment into which terms were incorporated by virtue of an implied contract<sup>65</sup> arising from the conduct of the parties, or to a bailment operating irrespective of contract.<sup>66</sup> On the former view, the requirement of privity would be satisfied, while on the latter there would be no need to satisfy it, bailment being a relationship which can come into existence without any contract.<sup>67</sup> The bailment reasoning is thus again consistent with the doctrine of privity. But a third possible reason for the decision in the Elder, Dempster case is the so-called principle of vicarious immunity: this states that, where a person employs an agent to perform a contract, that agent is entitled, in performing the contract, to any immunity from liability which the contract confers on the principal.<sup>68</sup> Under this principle, the shipowners were protected by the exemption clause because, in carrying out the carriage operation, they had acted as agents for the company, even though the contract to perform that operation was between the company and the claimants. This reasoning is inconsistent with the doctrine of privity in the sense that it would enable an agent to rely by way of defence on the terms of a contract to which he was not a party; and it was rejected by the House of Lords in Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd.<sup>69</sup>

<sup>60</sup> Quaere whether the inference was realistic. The company usually carried goods in its own ships and may simply, as a result of an oversight, have used a form of bill of lading designed for this situation in the different one in which the carrying ship had been chartered from a third party.

<sup>61</sup> Cosgrove v Horsfall (1946) 62 T.L.R. 140; Genys v Matthews [1965] 3 All E.R. 24; Gore v Van der Lann [1967] 2 Q.B. 31; for the effect of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, see below, p.634.

<sup>62</sup> The charter being a time charter, the captain remained their employee and took possession of the goods on the shipowners' behalf: cf. the authorities cited in n.27 at p.624 above. This point is not affected by the fact that he signed the bill of lading (see Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] A.C. 446 at 455) on behalf of the charterers (see [1923] 1 K.B. 420 at 424).

<sup>63</sup> [1924] A.C. 522 at 564.

<sup>64</sup> Exactly how the exemption clause in the contract between the claimant and the company came to be incorporated into the bailment between the claimant and the shipowner is not made clear. Lord Sumner's reference ([1924] A.C. 522 and 564) to “the known and contemplated form of bill of lading” suggests the analogy of incorporation by custom or usage: above, p.213.

<sup>65</sup> Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158 at 189, per Morris L.J.; Pyrene Co Ltd v Scindia Navigation Co Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 402 at 406, per Devlin J.; Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1959] 2 Q.B. 171 at 187, per Diplock J.; cf. also Sandeman Coprimar S.A. v Transito y Transportes Integrales [2003] EWCA Civ 113 at [62], [63], below, p.641, n.84a.

<sup>66</sup> The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 335, 339–340, per Lord Goff (“notwithstanding the absence of any contract”); the question in this case was not whether a third party could take the benefit of a contract between others but whether he could be bound by such a contract: below, p.640. Lord Goff's reference in The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 661 to the claimants in the Elder, Dempster case having “impliedly agreed that the goods were received by the shipowners, as bailees, subject to” the exemption clause could be read as supporting either the contractual or the non-contractual view. The latter view is supported by The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [136].

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.156.

<sup>68</sup> [1924] A.C. 522 at 534 (second sentence), approving the view of Scrutton L.J. in the Court of Appeal [1923] 1 K.B. 420 at 441–442; cf. Mersey Shipping & Transport Co v Rea (1925) 21 Ll.L.R. 375 at 378.

<sup>69</sup> [1962] A.C. 446.

In that case a drum of chemicals had been shipped under a contract between shipper and carrier evidenced by a bill of lading which limited the liability of "the carrier" to $500. After the rights and duties under this contract had passed to the claimants by transfer of the bill of lading,<sup>70</sup> the drum was damaged by the negligence of a firm of stevedores who had been employed by the carrier to unload the ship. The House of Lords<sup>71</sup> held that the stevedores could not rely on the $500 limitation of liability as they were not parties to the contract of carriage; and that the principle of vicarious immunity was not the ratio decidendi of the Elder, Dempster case. Nor did any of the other reasons for that decision help the stevedores. It was not possible to infer that the carrier had intended to act as agent of the stevedores for the purpose of making a contract between them and the claimants so as to give the stevedores the benefit of the limitation clause in the bill of lading, for that term limited the liability only of the carrier and made no reference to the stevedores,<sup>72</sup> nor were there any circumstances extrinsic to the bill on which an inference of agency could be based.<sup>73</sup> Nor did any implied contract arise between the claimants and the stevedores since the claimants had not asked the stevedores to render any services that would normally be governed by contractual terms between them.<sup>74</sup> The claimants had merely applied to the carrier for delivery of the drum, which had been stored in a shed rented by the carrier from the port authority; and when the process of moving the drum from that shed into the lorry sent by the claimants to collect it was carried out through the instrumentality of the stevedores, the latter regarded this as no more than "the performance of their own obligations under the contract which they had made with"<sup>75</sup> the carrier. The implied contract argument thus failed for want of contractual intention.<sup>76</sup> Nor could the stevedores invoke the "bailment on terms" reasoning since, in the circumstances just described, they had not been entrusted with possession of the drum so as to become bailees of it.<sup>77</sup> Even if they had been such bailees (e.g. if the drum had been stored in a shed owned by them) it is far from clear that the mental element requisite for the incorporation of the limitation clause into the supposed bailment would have been satisfied. There would obviously be no requirement of contractual intention where the bailment was a non-contractual one, but it would appear that the consent of the claimants and of the stevedores was a necessary condition for the incorporation of the terms of the contract of carriage into the supposed

<sup>70</sup> See now Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, ss.2 and 3, below, pp.675, 704.

<sup>71</sup> Lord Denning dissenting; his dissent was based, not on the ground that the stevedores were entitled to the benefit of the limitation provision in the contract of carriage, but on the ground that the cargo-owners were bound by a similar term (below, p.638) in the contract between carrier and stevedores: see [1962] A.C. 446 at 489 ("I must be wrong about all this"), 491. See also his judgments in Adler v Dickson, above n.65, White v Warwick (John) & Co Ltd [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1285 and Morris v C W Martin & Sons Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 716.

<sup>72</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 466, rejecting the argument that "carrier" could be construed so as to mean or include stevedores. For this reason, the stevedores would not, under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, be entitled to the benefit of a clause protecting only the carrier: below, pp.603–604. Contrast South Australia Management Corp v Sheahan [1995] A.J.M 3577 where, in another context, "carrier" was construed to include subcontractors of the carrier.

<sup>73</sup> For such extrinsic circumstances, see, for example, The Kirkness [1957] P. 51 at 66; Raymond Burke Motors Ltd v Mersey Docks & Harbour Co [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 155; Texas Instruments Ltd v Nason (Europe) Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 146 at 149.

<sup>74</sup> Diplock J. may have gone too far in saying that the claimants had not asked the stevedores to "do anything to their goods:" [1959] 2 K.B. at 188–189; but the mere moving of the goods from a store to a waiting lorry would not by itself normally be governed by contractual terms. See also [1962] 1 Q.B. 102 at 136.

<sup>75</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 496.

<sup>76</sup> For other cases in which contractual intention was negated by a party's belief that he was merely performing a previously existing contract, see above, p.169.

<sup>77</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 470; The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [146]. Contrast The Rigoletto [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 532 at 540 (goods in stevedores' possession for six days before loss).

bailment<sup>78</sup>; and though the stevedores may be assumed to have consented to a limitation clause which could operate only in their favour,<sup>79</sup> there would have been nothing to show that the claimants had consented, not only to the hypothetical sub-bailment, but also to the inclusion of that clause in the sub-bailment so as to protect the stevedores.<sup>80</sup>

The reasoning of the Midland Silicones case may give the appearance of being merely a technical application of the doctrine of privity<sup>81</sup>; but the decision also reflects a conflict of policies. On one hand, there is the view that a "self-confessed tortfeasor" should not be allowed to "shelter behind a document that is no concern of his",<sup>82</sup> particularly where it is not clear that the injured party has agreed to the third party's having the benefit of the contractual exemptions from and limitations of liability. On the other hand, there is force in the argument that, if the third party were not protected, there would often be an "easy way round"<sup>83</sup> exemption and limitation clauses; it was this argument which was originally used to support the principle of vicarious immunity.<sup>84</sup> In rejecting that principle, the Midland Silicones case severely limited the effectiveness of such clauses. A person who suffered loss or injury as a result of a negligent breach of contract generally had a remedy against someone, if only against the workman who was negligent. In practice the employer would often feel morally obliged to pay the damages awarded against his employee,<sup>85</sup> and might be legally liable to do so.<sup>86</sup> Hence employers tried to protect their servants or agents by differently worded exemption clauses, and the cases to be discussed below make it clear that they can now do so by using appropriate words. There is no objection to this on policy grounds where the clause is itself valid<sup>86a</sup> and constitutes a legitimate device for allocating contractual risks and the burden of insurance. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 now provides a relatively simple drafting mechanism for giving third parties the benefit of exemption and limitation clauses<sup>87</sup>; and some statutes which limit the liability of carriers expressly extend these <sup>78</sup> See The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 339–340 where Lord Goff, in discussing the "bailment on terms" explanation of the Elder, Dempster case refers in turn to the state of mind of the shipowners ("the terms upon which the shipowners implicitly received the goods") and of the shippers ("the shippers . . . [having] impliedly consented" to the terms of the sub-bailment). cf. his use of the phrase "impliedly agreed" in the The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 661.

<sup>79</sup> The requirement of the third party's consent is nevertheless significant, particularly where the term alleged to be incorporated in the bailment is one that can operate against him: e.g. an exclusive jurisdiction clause which the third party wished to contest: see The Forum Craftsman [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 102 at 107.

<sup>80</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 474.

<sup>81</sup> ibid., at 463, 473 and 494.

<sup>82</sup> Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring Co [1956] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 349 at 359; cf. Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158 at 187; in Robert C Herd & Co v Kramill Machinery Corp 359 U.S. 297, 303 (1959) this reasoning prevailed even in the United States, where the law rejects the doctrine of privity, so that the third party could have been protected by making him a "beneficiary" of the contract, even though he was not a "party" to it: ibid., at 308.

<sup>83</sup> Elder, Dempster & Co v Paterson Zochonis & Co [1923] 1 K.B. 420 at 441, approved [1924] A.C. 522 at 534.

<sup>84</sup> The same argument continues to be used in support of that principle: see the London Drugs case [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299 (below at n.89) at 499.

<sup>85</sup> In Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158, the employers said that they would satisfy any judgment which might be given against their servants. But, as the claimants had not made any promise to them not to sue the servants, the employers would not be entitled to have an action by the injured party against the servants stayed: Gore v Van der Lann [1967] 2 Q.B. 31.

<sup>86</sup> i.e. under an express contract to indemnify the servant or agent.

<sup>86a</sup> See The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, below p.635, where this requirement was not complied with.

<sup>87</sup> See ss.1(1)(a) and (b) and 6(5) ("tailpiece"), below, pp.652–653, 654, 656, 661–662. A clause taking effect by virtue of these provisions will, however, do so only subject to the restrictions imposed by other provisions of the Bill: above, p.627, below pp.662–664; and these restrictions differ from those which may arise at common law by reason of defects in the main contract: see below pp.635–636.

limitations to the carriers' servants or agents.<sup>88</sup> This position is generally regarded as acceptable; and in Canada the courts have recognised an exception to the doctrine of privity precisely to protect employees of a contracting party by enabling them to rely on an exemption clause which is clearly intended to protect them, even though it does not expressly refer to them.<sup>89</sup> The doctrine of privity was never a satisfactory instrument for controlling undesirable exemption clauses,<sup>90</sup> and should no longer be used for this purpose now that the ability of a contracting party to exclude or restrict liability by means of such clauses is directly controlled by legislation.<sup>91</sup> Direct control of exemption clauses between the contracting parties is clearly preferable to indirect evasion by means of a claim against a third party whom the words of the clause seek to protect.

(2) Himalaya clauses

Granted, then, that on balance policy considerations support the view that a third party should, in appropriate cases, be able to take advantage of an exemption clause, the remaining question is how this result may be achieved. The most obvious possibility is by drafting the clause in such a way as to extend its protection to the third party; for the decision in the Midland Silicones case was partly based on the fact that the clause there did not refer to the stevedores at all, but only to the carrier. At common law, indeed, it would not suffice simply to say that the third party was to be protected,<sup>92</sup> or that he was to be deemed to be a party to the contract.<sup>93</sup> But a much more elaborate clause (known as a "Himalaya" clause<sup>94</sup>) was considered in The Eurymedon,<sup>95</sup> where it was held to be capable of protecting the third party. Our present concern is with the common law rules relating to such clauses: the effect on them of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 is considered later in this Chapter.<sup>96</sup>

(a) NATURE AND EFFECT. In that case a contract was made between a shipper and a carrier for the carriage of machinery from England to New Zealand. The machinery was damaged by employees of the stevedore while it was being unloaded; and the question was whether the stevedore was protected by the bill of lading issued by the carrier to the shipper as evidence of the contract. The relevant clause of the bill provided that no servant or agent (including independent contractor) of the carrier was to be liable for any

<sup>88</sup> e.g. Carriage by Air Act 1961, Sch.1, art.25A; Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, Sch., art.4 his (stevedores, being independent contractors rather than agents, would not be protected under this provision); Merchant Shipping Act 1995, s.183 and Sch.6, Pt I, art.11, and s.186(2) and (3).

<sup>89</sup> London Drugs Ltd v Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299. The question whether English courts should in the present context develop a "fully fledged exception" to the doctrine of privity was left open in The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 665; the creation of such an exception would involve the overruling of cases such as Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158.

<sup>90</sup> cf. Mason v Uxbridge Boat Centre [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 593 at 598.

<sup>91</sup> See above, pp.246–285. For example, in cases such as Cosgrove v Horsfall (1946) 62 T.L.R. 140, Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158 and Genys v Matthews [1965] 3 All E.R. 24 the doctrine was used to allow recovery for personal injury against an employee of the party relying on the exemption clause. Its use for this purpose is no longer necessary where that party is prevented from relying on the clause by s.2 of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 (above, p.249), and, in consumer contracts on standard terms, by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations, 1999 (above, p.274).

<sup>92</sup> Cosgrove v Horsfall (1946) 62 T.L.R. 140; Genys v Matthews [1965] 3 All E.R. 24. Contrast the position in the United States: see above, n.82 and The Hellespont Ardent [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 547 at 579, 592.

<sup>93</sup> cf. in another context, Taddy v Sterious [1904] 1 Ch. 354 (the agreement in that case might now be void under Competition Act 1998, s.2 if the conditions stated at p.476 above were satisfied).

<sup>94</sup> So named after the cruise ship in Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 155. For a fuller discussion of such clauses, see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001) §§7–047 to 7–063.

<sup>95</sup> [1975] A.C. 154; Reynolds, 90 L.Q.R. 301; Coote, 37 M.L.R. 453; Palmer [1974] J.B.L. 101, 220; Powles [1979] L.M.C.L.Q. 331; Davies & Palmer [1979] J.B.L. 337. And see below, p.640.

<sup>96</sup> See below, p.652.

act or default in the course of his employment<sup>97</sup>; that every limitation applicable to the carrier should be available to such persons; that for the purpose of the clause the carrier should be deemed to be acting as agent or trustee for such persons; and that they should to this extent be or be deemed to be parties to the contract. All the members of the Privy Council agreed that such third persons could be protected by an appropriately drawn clause; and a majority held that the clause in question did protect the stevedore. Lord Wilberforce said that the bill of lading "brought into existence a bargain initially unilateral but capable of becoming mutual, between the shipper and the [stevedore], made through the carrier as agent. This became a full contract when the [stevedore] performed the services by discharging the goods".<sup>98</sup> At this stage, a new contract arose<sup>99</sup> between the cargo-owner and the stevedore, separate from or collateral to the main contract of carriage, to which the stevedore was not a party.

A possible objection to this analysis is that stevedores (unlike carriers) might not be aware of the terms of bills of lading under which goods were carried, so that these could not amount to offers to them which they could accept by performing the services. On the facts of The Eurymedon this objection has little substance as the carrier was a subsidiary of the stevedore who probably did know of the terms of the bill of lading.<sup>1</sup> But the more important point is that it is by no means unknown for contracts to come into existence by a process which cannot be strictly analysed in terms of offer and acceptance.<sup>2</sup> The decision should therefore be evaluated, not in terms of such analysis, but by asking two questions: (1) was there any objection on grounds of policy to extending the protection of the clause to third parties such as the stevedores? and (2) did that extension give effect to the intention of the parties? It has already been suggested<sup>3</sup> that the first question should be answered in the negative, and this must have been the view even of the dissentients in The Eurymedon, for they accepted that a third party could be protected by an appropriately worded clause. The second question is harder to answer but it seems unlikely that the parties at the time of contracting made any conscious distinction between the shipper's rights against the carrier and against persons employed by the carrier in the performance of the contract of carriage; while it was no doubt the stevedore's intention to perform the work of unloading the goods only under the protective terms of the bill of lading. It is submitted that the majority's interpretation of an admittedly obscure clause did give effect to the intentions and commercial expectations of the parties; and that the decision is therefore to be welcomed. It has been both <sup>97</sup> At common law, this part of the clause was crucial for the purpose of creating privity of contract between the cargo-owner and the third party; without it, the doctrine of privity would have prevented that party from relying on the clause: see above, p.631, n.92.

<sup>98</sup> At 167–168. More recently, it has been suggested that the contract would be regarded as "nowadays bilateral": The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 664; but this description should not be understood as meaning that the contract granting the third party the limitation of or exemption from liability imposed executory obligations on the third party: see Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711 at [34], [93], [152], [153] and [196], where the contract is described as "unilateral".

<sup>99</sup> See below, p.634 at n.24.

<sup>1</sup> He at least had means of knowledge since one original of the bill of lading had been delivered to him before the goods were unloaded, though only in his capacity as agent of the carrier; see [1975] A.C. 154 at 164.

<sup>2</sup> See The Satanita [1895] P. 248, affirmed sub nom. Clarke v Dunraven [1897] A.C. 59; above, p.47.

<sup>3</sup> See above, pp.630–631.

followed<sup>4</sup> and distinguished<sup>5</sup> in other jurisdictions.

Difficulty with regard to Himalaya clauses arises from a much-quoted passage in Lord Reid's speech in the Midland Silicones case. This states a number of requirements which must be satisfied before a third party, such as a stevedore, can at common law claim the protection of terms in the contract between shipper and carrier. Our present concern is with two of these requirements: first, the clause must make it clear that the carrier had contracted as agent of the stevedore for the purpose of securing the benefit of such terms for him; and secondly, the carrier must have had "authority from the stevedore to do so, or perhaps later ratification would suffice".<sup>6</sup> The first of these requirements is normally<sup>7</sup> satisfied simply by a declaration of agency in the Himalaya clause; but the second refers to factors extrinsic to the contract in which that clause is contained. In The Eurymedon, the relevant extrinsic factor was the previous connection between carrier and stevedore (as associated companies); and the reasoning of the case leaves open the possibility that, in the absence of some such previous connection, the requirement of "authority from the stevedore" would not be satisfied. In one case it was indeed held that the lack of any such connection made it impossible to regard the carrier as the stevedore's agent for the purpose of making a contract between him and the owner of the goods, so that the stevedore was not protected by virtue of the Himalaya clause.<sup>8</sup> But in The New York Star<sup>9</sup> the Privy Council followed The Eurymedon in unanimously holding that stevedores (who were regularly employed and partly owned by the carriers) were protected by virtue of a similarly worded clause. Lord Wilberforce said that stevedores would "normally and typically" be protected by such a clause and that "their Lordships would not encourage a search for fine distinctions which would diminish the general applicability, in the light of established commercial practice, of the principle".<sup>10</sup> In the later Privy Council case of The Mahkutai Lord Goff did, indeed, say that it was "inevitable that technical points of contract and agency law will continue to be invoked" and that counsel had acted "legitimately"<sup>11</sup> in raising such points. But he evidently did not regard the requirement of the third party's having authorised the carrier to act on his behalf as an obstacle to the enforceability of the Himalaya clause in that case, though reliance on it failed on grounds to be discussed below.<sup>12</sup> Similarly, in The Pioneer Container the actual decision was that a third party was protected by the terms of his own sub-bailment from the carrier, so that he did not have to rely on the Himalaya clause<sup>13</sup>; but it was also said that he could have

<sup>4</sup> Ceres Stevedoring Co Ltd v Eisen und Metall AG [1976] 72 D.L.R. (3d) 660 (where the third party's defence failed on another ground); Miles International Corp v Federal Commerce & Navigation Co [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 285. ITO International Terminal Operators Ltd v Miida Electronics Inc [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752; The Antwerpen [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 213; cf. the assumption evidently made in The Zhi Jiang Kou [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 493, that an agent of the contracting party could rely on the clause.

<sup>5</sup> Lummus Co Ltd v East African Harbours Corp [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 317; see also Herrick v Leonard and Dingley Ltd [1975] 2 N.Z.L.R. 566 (discussed by Palmer and Rose, 39 M.L.R. 466), where a clause in different terms did not expressly refer to independent contractors.

<sup>6</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 474.

<sup>7</sup> For an exception, see Quantum Corp Ltd v Plane Trucking Co [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 916 at [35], reversed on other grounds [2002] EWCA Civ 350; [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 25.

<sup>8</sup> The Suleyman Stalskiy [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 609; cf. Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077, at 1085, a building case where the sub-contractor could not for this reason take the benefit of an exemption clause in the main contract, but succeeded on another ground stated on p.587 at n.56.

<sup>9</sup> The New York Star [1981] 1 W.L.R. 138; Reynolds, 96 L.Q.R. 506; Coote, [1981] C.L.J. 13; Clarke [1981] C.L.J. 17; Rose, 44 M.L.R. 336. The reasoning of The Eurymedon was also approved in The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, though in that case the third party was, for the reason given on p.635 below, not protected by the clause.

<sup>10</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 138 at 144.

<sup>11</sup> [1996] A.C. 650 at 664.

<sup>12</sup> See below, pp.634–635.

<sup>13</sup> See below, p.640.

relied on that clause.<sup>14</sup> In both these cases, The Eurymedon and The New York Star were discussed with evident approval and with no direct reference to or emphasis on the special circumstances<sup>15</sup> of those cases; nor was there evidence of extrinsic circumstances from which previous authorisation could be inferred in The Pioneer Container and The Mahkutai. Moreover, while there are no doubt good reasons for requiring such previous authorisation where the contract arising by virtue of the Himalaya Clause<sup>16</sup> can impose obligations<sup>17</sup> on the third party,<sup>18</sup> it is hard to see what practice grounds there are for such a requirement where the only effect of that contract can be to benefit that party (by excluding his liability) and where that contract cannot, by reason of its nature as a unilateral contract,<sup>19</sup> impose any obligations on him. And even where the common law requirement of previous authorisation is not satisfied, the stevedore or other third party will “in the majority of cases”<sup>20</sup> be able to ratify the carrier’s act and so by virtue of the Himalaya clause gain the protection of the exemptions from and limitations of liability available under the main contract of carriage to the carrier.

(b) SCOPE. The scope of the Himalaya Clause depends on its construction; and since typically such a clause is expressed to protect the third party only while he is engaged in the performance of the contract in which the clause is contained, he will not be protected by the clause in such terms, if he damages the goods before performance of that contract has begun<sup>21</sup> or after such performance has been completed.<sup>22</sup>

At common law, the part of the typical Himalaya Clause which purports to exclude or limit the third party’s liability cannot itself produce the desired effect.<sup>23</sup> This can follow only from the separate contract<sup>24</sup> which arises or may arise from the agency provision of such a clause followed by the conduct of the third party and the injured party in relation to each other; the effect of this contract may be to extend to the third party the protection of, not only the Himalaya Clause itself, but also other terms of the contract in which that Clause is contained. Two further questions can therefore arise. The first is whether the provision which the third party seeks to invoke is covered by the wording of the Himalaya Clause. This question arose in The Mahkutai<sup>25</sup> where such a clause in a bill of lading provided that subcontracting carriers were to have the benefit of “all exceptions, limitations, provisions and liberties herein”. It was held that these words did

<sup>14</sup> [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 344.

<sup>15</sup> i.e. to the fact that stevedores and carriers were associated companies. cf. Godina v Patrick Operations Ltd [1984] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 333; The Zinnia [1984] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 211 at 217; for express authorisation by the third party of the carrier, see Raymond Burke Motors Ltd v Mersey Docks & Harbour Co [1986] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 155.

<sup>16</sup> i.e., the new or separate contract referred to on pp.632 at n.99 and 634 at n.24.

<sup>17</sup> e.g. where it purports to be on the terms of an exclusive jurisdiction clause: cf. below at n.26. Such a clause is not normally within the scope of a Himalaya Clause: ibid.; but could be brought within it by express words to that effect.

<sup>18</sup> The “third party” to the main contract is of course an immediate party to the separate contract referred to in n.16 above.

<sup>19</sup> See above, p.582, at n.98.

<sup>20</sup> The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 at 664, per Lord Goff. The phrase “in the majority of cases” is not amplified. It could refer to the requirement in the law relating to ratification that the stevedoring company must have been in existence when the carrier purported to act as its agent by issuing the bill of lading containing the Himalaya clause: for this requirement see below, p.724.

<sup>21</sup> Raymond Burke Motors Ltd v Mersey Docks & Harbour Co [1986] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 155; cf. The Rigoletto [2000] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 532 at 545, 547.

<sup>22</sup> This is implicit in the reasoning of The New York Star [1981] 1 W.L.R. 138, where the actual decision was that at the relevant time such performance had not been completed.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.632, n.99.

<sup>24</sup> The Starsin [2003] UKHC 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [59] (dissenting, but not on this point), [93].

<sup>25</sup> [1996] A.C. 650.

not entitle the sub-contractors to rely on an exclusive jurisdiction clause in the bill of lading, since they referred only to those provisions in it which benefited one of the parties to it, while the exclusive jurisdiction clause was a “mutual agreement” creating “mutual obligations”.<sup>26</sup> The second question is whether the terms of the clause, or of other provisions in the main contract to which it refers, do indeed protect the third party. The answer to this question depends on the rules relating to the construction and effectiveness of exemption clauses generally. These are discussed in Chapter 7; here it is necessary only to make the point that the third party would not be protected by a clause which, on its true construction, would not apply in the events which have happened or cover the loss which has occurred, or by a clause which was legally invalid.<sup>27</sup> The latter possibility is illustrated by The Starsin,<sup>27a</sup> where goods were damaged whilst being carried in a chartered ship under a bill of lading constituting a contract between charterer and shipper.<sup>27b</sup> The benefit of a Himalaya Clause in the bill of lading was claimed by the shipowner who was not a party to the contract of carriage and who relied on words in the clause exempting him from “any liability whatsoever to the shipper” for loss resulting from acts done by the shipowner in the course of his employment by the carrier.<sup>27c</sup> The Clause also provided that the shipowner was (to the extent to which it protected him) to be deemed to be a party to the bill of lading contract<sup>27d</sup>; and another term of that contract<sup>27e</sup> incorporated into it an international convention known as the Hague Rules. These rules specified certain obligations of a carrier of goods by sea, made available to him certain exemptions from and limitations of liability, and provided that any clause in the contract “lessening such liability otherwise than as provided in this convention shall be null and void.”<sup>27f</sup> The House of Lords held<sup>27g</sup> that this provision of the Rules invalidated the wide words of the Himalaya Clause quoted above, so that the shipowner was not protected by these words.

The cases on Himalaya clauses assume that the third party seeking to invoke them is not in any contractual relationship with the claimant except for the collateral contract which may arise by virtue of such a clause. Where there is also an express contract between these parties on terms inconsistent with those of any such a collateral contract, then the terms of that express contract will prevail: e.g., where a stevedore enters into an express contract with the cargo-owner making him liable to the cargo-owner for negligence but the bill of lading contains a Himalaya clause the effect of which would (if there were no such express contract) be to exonerate the stevedore from such liability.<sup>29</sup>

(c) DEFECT IN THE MAIN CONTRACT. In The Eurymedon<sup>30</sup> the Himalaya clause in the contract between shipper and carrier gave rise to a separate contract between shipper

<sup>26</sup> ibid. at 666; followed on this point in Bougoyes Offshore S.A v Caspian Shipping Co (No.2) [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 485 at 490.

<sup>27</sup> e.g. Eisen and Metall AG v Ceres Stevedoring Co Ltd [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 665.

<sup>27a</sup> [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711.

<sup>27b</sup> In this respect, the case resembles the Elder Dempster case [1924] A.C. 522, above, p.627.

<sup>27c</sup> Clause 5(1) of the bill of lading, in the numbering given by Lord Bingham in The Starsin, above, n.27a, at [20].

<sup>27d</sup> Clause 5(3), in the same numbering.

<sup>27e</sup> Clause 2: see The Starsin, above, n.27a, at [31].

<sup>27f</sup> Art III.8: see now the Hague Visby Rules, Art III.8, which have the force of law by virtue of Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971 s.1 and Sch.

<sup>27g</sup> Lord Steyn dissenting, Lord Hobhouse took the view that the contract between shipper and shipowner created by virtue of the Himalaya Clause was a “contract of carriage within the Rules”: see at [153], [156]; but this view is rejected by Lord Millett at [203] and does not seem to be adopted by Lord Bingham or Lord Hoffmann.

<sup>29</sup> The Rigoletto [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 532.

<sup>30</sup> The Eurymedon [1975] A.C. 154.

and stevedore collateral to the main contract of carriage.<sup>31</sup> This contract has what may be called certain parasitic qualities so that it may fail to protect the third party, at least in certain cases, where the main contract suffers from some legal defect. Thus in a South African case,<sup>34</sup> in which the relations of the parties were governed by English law,<sup>35</sup> the main contract between A and B contained a Himalaya clause by virtue of which C was prima facie entitled to the benefits of the exemptions from liability which the main contract conferred on A. The main contract was rescinded by B on account of A's misrepresentations and it was held that the Himalaya clause did not entitle C to the protection of the exemption clauses in the main contract since "once those . . . exemptions . . . fall away on rescission of the [main contract], nothing remains to exempt [C]".<sup>36</sup> This was so even though the Himalaya clause had given rise to a "separate contract" between A and C, since under the terms of that contract C took only "the benefits of the same exemptions which the carrier [A] receives, no more and no less".<sup>37</sup>

It is an essential part of this reasoning that the effect of misrepresentation on a contract is to "wipe it out altogether"<sup>38</sup> with retrospective effect. The position would be the same where the main contract was void for mistake at common law. On the other hand, the reasoning would not apply where the main contract was rescinded for A's breach, since this process brings the contract to an end only from the time of rescission and therefore does not deprive the guilty party of the protection of exemption and limitation clauses in respect of breaches occurring before such rescission<sup>39</sup>; consequently, it would not deprive the third party of this benefit where he was otherwise entitled to it by virtue of a Himalaya clause.<sup>40</sup> If the main contract were frustrated, the third party would likewise be deprived of its protection by virtue of such a clause only in respect of breaches of duty which had occurred after, and not in respect of those which had occurred before, the frustrating event: this follows from the principle that frustration discharges the contract only from the time of the frustrating event.<sup>41</sup> The most difficult cases would be those in which the main contract was affected by illegality. The source of the difficulty is that the effects of illegality vary widely<sup>42</sup>; and that the illegality of the main contract does not necessarily affect the validity of a collateral contract.<sup>43</sup> The guiding principle, it is submitted, should be that the illegality which affects the main contract should deprive the third party of the protection of the collateral contract which arises by virtue of the Himalaya clause only where such a result would in some way promote the policy of the rule of law, the violation of which had given rise to the illegality.<sup>44</sup> No doubt in applying this principle the court would have regard not only to the nature of the illegality but also to the third party's knowledge of or participation in the illegal purpose.

<sup>31</sup> See above, pp.632 at, n.99, p.634, n.24.

<sup>34</sup> Bougayes Offshore v. Utlisat Transport Contractors [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 153, Note.

<sup>35</sup> ibid. at 154, 155. The circumstances underlying this case were the subject of much litigation both in South Africa and in England: see, for example, above n.26.

<sup>36</sup> [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 153 at 165.

<sup>37</sup> ibid. For a similar restriction on the third party's right to rely on exemption clauses under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, see s.3(6) of that Act (below, p.661).

<sup>38</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 398; above, p.370.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.239.

<sup>40</sup> Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.3(2) (below, p.660) would not apply to such a case: it deals with a different situation in which C sues A and A seeks to rely, against C, on B's repudiatory breach.

<sup>41</sup> See below, p.909.

<sup>42</sup> See above, pp.480–490.

<sup>43</sup> See above, p.510.

<sup>44</sup> cf. above, p.429.

3. Other drafting devices

The third party could also be protected by a form of words other than that used in The Eurymedon. For example, an exemption clause in a contract between A and B may contain an express promise by A to B not to sue C. Under the rules already considered, B can, even at common law,<sup>45</sup> enforce that promise by getting a stay of any action by A against C,<sup>46</sup> for example if there is a contract between B and C under which B is bound to indemnify C against liability to third parties incurred in the performance of his duties under that contract.<sup>47</sup> Alternatively, the contract between A and B might provide that A should be liable to pay over to B any sum that A might recover from C.<sup>48</sup>

4. Clauses defining duties

The preceding discussion is based on the assumptions that C is under a prima facie liability in tort to A and that C seeks to rely on a provision in a contract between A and B in order to exclude or restrict the liability. But it is arguable that the terms of that contract can be relevant at an earlier stage, namely in determining the extent of any duty of care owed to A by C. For example, work under a building contract between A and B may be done by a subcontractor C, who is a party to the sub-contract between himself and B, but not a party to B's main contract with A. If C does the work negligently and so causes harm to A (e.g. by damaging other property belonging to A<sup>49</sup>), then C may be liable in tort to A, and an exemption clause in the main contract between A and B will not, as such, at common law protect C. But in the Junior Books case, Lord Roskill suggested that a "relevant exclusion clause in the main contract" might "limit the duty of care"<sup>50</sup> of C and so indirectly provide him with a defence to a claim in tort by A. In The Aliakmon, this suggestion was doubted by Lord Brandon on the ground that the exemption clause in the example was contained "in a contract to which the plaintiff [was] a party but the defendant [was] not"<sup>51</sup>: in other words, because there was no privity of contract between them. The Aliakmon was, however, concerned with the converse of the situation discussed by Lord Roskill, namely with the case in which the exemption clause was contained in a contract to which the defendant was a party but the plaintiff was not.<sup>52</sup> Both situations raise issues of privity of contract but they are concerned with different aspects of that doctrine: the first with the question whether C can take the benefit of an exemption clause in a contract between A and B, and the second with the question whether A can be bound by an exemption clause in a contract between B and C. As a matter of policy, there is less objection to giving an affirmative answer to

<sup>45</sup> For the position under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, see below, p.656. C's rights at common law would not be subject to the provisions of the Act: cf. above, p.627, below, pp.662–663.

<sup>46</sup> Snelling v John G Snelling Ltd [1973] 1 Q.B. 87; above, p.603.

<sup>47</sup> See Gore v Van der Lann [1967] 2 Q.B. 31; above, p.591; The Elbe Maru [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 206; contrast The Starsin [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, where the House of Lords rejected the view that the words of the Himalaya Clause quoted on p.635 above at n.27g amounted only to a covenant not to sue. For the purpose of enforcement of such a covenant, it suffices that C has a claim for such an indemnity which is not "obviously bad": Deepak Fertilisers & Petrochemicals Corp v ICI Chemicals & Polymers Ltd [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 378 at 401. Contrast The Chevalier Roze [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 438 (where the contract between A and B had been fully performed before A's cause of action against C arose, and so did not protect C).

<sup>48</sup> Quære whether this would be a penalty; see below, pp.999–1006. For further possible devices, see the Midland Silicones case [1962] A.C. 446, 473 and Hamson [1959] C.L.J. 150.

<sup>49</sup> In this respect the facts of the example given in the text differ from those of the Junior Books case [1983] 1 A.C. 520 and so do not give rise to the difficulties occasioned by that case (see above, p.613).

<sup>50</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520 at 546, applied in Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077, 1086.

<sup>51</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 817.

<sup>52</sup> See below, p.639. Lord Brandon's view (above, n.51) was accordingly questioned in Pacific Associates Inc v Baxter [1990] 1 Q.B. 993 at 1022.

the first question than to the second; for in the first situation A has assented to the clause while in the second no inference of such assent can be drawn merely from the presence of the clause in the contract between B and C.<sup>53</sup> Lord Roskill's suggestion has therefore been followed in a number of later cases in which exemption clauses in the main contract between A and B have been held to negative any duty of care which C might (but for such clauses) have owed to A.<sup>54</sup> In such cases, C is protected, in spite of the absence of privity of contract,<sup>55</sup> because the clause "destroys the duty of [C] if duty there ever was".<sup>56</sup> It follows that the clause may be available not only to C, but also to any other person whose hypothetical duty is in this way affected. It may thus protect C's employees as well as C himself: in one case of this kind it was said that if C owed no duty "then neither can any of their employees have done so".<sup>57</sup> Whether a clause affects the duty of persons other than C depends simply on its construction and not on the doctrine of privity.

Lord Roskill's statement refers only to "a relevant exclusion clause": that is, to one which can "limit the duty of care". A clause which merely imposed a financial limit on the amount recoverable would not be of this kind since such a clause would come into operation only on the assumption that a duty was owed and had been broken.<sup>58</sup> Similarly, the clause must refer to the duty of the person relying on it: thus if a contract between a building owner and a contractor contained a provision restricting the duty of subcontractors nominated by the owner, that provision would not protect other subcontractors (who had not been so nominated).<sup>59</sup>

2. The Burden

(1) General rule

The law starts with the principle that a person is not bound by an exemption clause in a contract to which he is not a party, unless one of the recognised exceptions to the doctrine of privity (such as agency) can be invoked against him.<sup>60</sup> In the Midland Silicones case<sup>61</sup> the contract between the carrier and the stevedores provided that the stevedores should have "such protection as is afforded by the terms of the bill of lading". The owners of the drum nonetheless recovered full damages from the stevedores. They were not bound by what was, in effect, a limitation clause in the contract between the <sup>53</sup> For this reason, the suggestion, made in Muirhead v Industrial Tank Specialties Ltd [1986] Q.B. 507, 525, that Lord Roskill intended to refer to an exclusion clause in the sub-contract, may with respect be doubted. The suggestion is based on a passage in Lord Fraser's speech in the Junior Books case at 534, which is, however, not concerned with exclusion clauses at all but rather with the type of performance that C has agreed to render under his contract with B: see below, pp.642–643.

<sup>54</sup> Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077; Normich CC v Harvey [1989] 1 W.L.R. 828; Pacific Associates Inc v Baxter [1990] 1 Q.B. 993; Adams and Brownsword [1990] J.B.L. 23.

<sup>55</sup> Normich CC v Harvey [1989] 1 W.L.R. 828 at 837.

<sup>56</sup> Pacific Associates Inc v Baxter [1990] 1 Q.B. 993 at 1038.

<sup>57</sup> Normich CC v Harvey [1989] 1 W.L.R. 828 at 834.

<sup>58</sup> cf. below, pp.642–643.

<sup>59</sup> British Telecommunications plc v James Thomson & Sons (Engineering) Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R. 241.

<sup>60</sup> Delaunier v Wyllie (1889) 17 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 167; cf. The Kite [1933] P. 164; White v Warwick (John) & Co Ltd [1953] 2 W.L.R. 1285 at 1294; Chas Davis (Metal Brokers) Ltd v Gilyot & Scott Ltd [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 422; The Eagle [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 70; Twins Transport v Patrick Brocklehurst (1983) 25 Build.L.R. 65. This rule applies even in systems of law under which a third party can take the benefit of a contract, as in the United States: see The OOCL Bravery [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 394, 399. It follows that in England the rule survives the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.1(6). For a statutory exception to the rule, see Congenital Disabilities (Civil Liability) Act 1976, s.1(6).

<sup>61</sup> [1962] A.C. 446, above, p.628.

stevedores and the carrier.<sup>62</sup> Similarly, in The Aliakmon<sup>63</sup> the buyers were not bound by exemption provisions in the contract of carriage since the only parties to that contract were the sellers and the shipowners.<sup>64</sup>

(2) Exceptions

The general rule stated above may be unsatisfactory in practice,<sup>65</sup> and is therefore subject to a number of exceptions.

(a) AGENCY AND IMPLIED CONTRACT. The first such exception is illustrated by Pyrene Co Ltd v Scindia Navigation Co Ltd,<sup>66</sup> where a fire tender which had been sold for export was to be shipped under a contract between buyer and carrier, which limited the latter's liability.<sup>67</sup> The seller presented the tender for loading to the carrier who, in carrying out this operation, damaged the tender while it was still at the seller's risk. It was held that the seller was bound by the limitation clause. The decision was partly based on the doubts which had been expressed in earlier cases as to the existence of the doctrine of privity.<sup>68</sup> It can no longer be supported on this ground; nor is the seller's tort claim against the carrier in such a case adversely affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, since under this Act a person will not, in general, be bound by terms of a contract to which he is not a party.<sup>69</sup> But the Pyrene case can still be justified either on the ground that the buyer was the seller's agent in making the contract with the carrier, at least so far as it concerned the seller<sup>70</sup>; or on the ground that an implied contract incorporating the limitation clause arose between seller and carrier when the tender was presented by the seller and accepted by the carrier for loading. The latter explanation is the one now generally accepted<sup>71</sup> though it is not entirely free from difficulty since the carrier may at this stage have intended merely to perform his contract of carriage with the buyer and so have lacked the contractual intention necessary for the creation of a new contract.<sup>72</sup>

<sup>62</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 474.

<sup>63</sup> [1986] A.C. 785, above, p.613.

<sup>64</sup> Paradoxically, it was the buyers who argued (unsuccessfully) that they were bound, their object being to establish that the undesirable consequence of depriving the shipowners of the benefit of those provisions (see above, p.614) would not follow if the shipowners were held liable to them in tort.

<sup>65</sup> e.g. if the buyers in The Aliakmon, above had been owners of the goods when they were damaged their tort claim would then have succeeded on the reasoning given at pp.613–614, above, but they might still not have been parties to the contract of carriage, so that the carriers would have been deprived of the protection of the international Convention known as the Hague Rules. Under the Conventions relating to the international carriage of goods by air, an owner of goods may have a right in tort against the carrier without depriving the latter of the protection of the Convention. Such protection may be retained by interpreting the relevant Convention so as either (i) to restrict the categories of persons entitled to sue the carrier to those specified in the Convention (e.g. as consignor or consignee, or as principals of the persons so specified) or (ii) to allow claims based on title to the goods (irrespective of contract) to be brought against the carrier only subject to the "scheme of liability" imposed by the Convention: see Sidhu v British Airways plc [1997] A.C. 430, 442–443, discussing Gatewhite Ltd v Iberia Lineas de Espana Sociedad [1990] 1 Q.B. 326; Herd v Clyde Helicopters [1997] A.C. 437; Western Digital Corp v British Airways plc [2001] Q.B. 733 at 752, 755, 769. This reasoning would not affect The Aliakmon since the Hague Rules contain no equivalent provisions.

<sup>66</sup> [1954] 2 Q.B. 402.

<sup>67</sup> Under what is now Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, Sch. art.IV. 5.

<sup>68</sup> At p.426; and see above, p.588.

<sup>69</sup> See above, p.582; for a qualification, not relevant in the present context of a third party's claim brought apart from the Act, see below, p.643.

<sup>70</sup> See [1954] 2 Q.B. at 423–425; The Kite [1933] P. 164 at 181 ("limited authority").

<sup>71</sup> Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] A.C. 446 at 471; The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 321 at 331; The Captain Gregos (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 395 (claim by B.P.).

<sup>72</sup> cf. above, p.169.

Implied contract reasoning was also used in The Eurymedon,<sup>73</sup> to deal with the point that the action against the stevedore was brought, not by the shipper, but by the consignee, who (it was assumed) was not a party to the contract of carriage contained or evidenced in the bill of lading.<sup>74</sup> It was held that the consignee was nevertheless bound by the exclusion clause in that contract since an implied contract arose<sup>75</sup> between stevedore and consignee, as a result of the consignee's "acceptance of [the bill of lading] and request for delivery of the goods thereunder"<sup>76</sup>; and this implied contract incorporated the terms of the bill of lading (which protected the stevedore<sup>77</sup>). In the Midland Silicones case,<sup>78</sup> by contrast, there was no implied contract between the claimants and the stevedores incorporating the terms of the contract between the carrier and the stevedores. The case differs from The Eurymedon in that there the consignees had possession of the bill of lading and so knew, or at least had means of knowing, its terms, while in the Midland Silicones case there was nothing to indicate that the claimants knew anything about the contract between the carrier and the stevedores.<sup>79</sup> The implied contract argument may also fail on other grounds. In The Aliakmon the buyers had presented a bill of lading to which they were not parties, and took delivery of the goods; but no implied contract arose since they had there done these acts purely as agents of the sellers.<sup>80</sup>

Where an injured party is bound by the exemption clause in a contract between two others by virtue of agency or implied contract reasoning, the legal basis for his being so bound is not in doubt: it is that he is brought into a contractual relationship with the party relying on the clause. There are, however, a number of further grounds on which the injured party may be bound by an exemption clause in a contract to which he is not a party in spite of the fact that he has not come into any contractual relationship with the person relying on the clause; and it is with these grounds that the following discussion is concerned.

(b) BAILMENT ON TERMS. One such ground is that the injured party is so bound by virtue of a bailment on terms. Earlier in this Chapter, we saw that this concept could be invoked to enable a person to get the benefit of an exemption clause in a contract to which he was not a party.<sup>81</sup> Our present concern is with the use of the concept for the converse purpose of binding a person by such a clause in a contract between others. This possibility is illustrated by the case in which a customer sends goods to a cleaner or repairer and allows him to send the work out to a subcontractor. If the subcontract contains an exemption clause, the owner may be bound by it on the ground that he has "expressly or impliedly consented to the bailee making a sub-bailment containing those

<sup>73</sup> [1975] A.C. 154.

<sup>74</sup> It was assumed that the consignee had not become a party to the contract under the Bills of Lading Act 1855, s.1 since it was not clear that the requirements of the section had been satisfied. See now Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, s.2, below, pp.675, 704.

<sup>75</sup> On the analogy of Brandt v Liverpool etc. SN Co Ltd [1924] 1 K.B. 575. The two cases raise different issues of consideration. In Brandt's case the issue was whether the owner of the goods could enforce an implied promise made to him, so that it was necessary to find consideration moving from him. In The Eurymedon, the issue was whether an implied promise not to sue made by the owner of the goods was supported by consideration, and this consideration would have to move from the other parties to that promise (or at least from the one seeking to rely on it).

<sup>76</sup> [1975] A.C. 154 at 168.

<sup>77</sup> See above, p.631.

<sup>78</sup> [1962] A.C. 446; above, p.628.

<sup>79</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 467, 493.

<sup>80</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 808; this fact was known to the carrier: see [1985] Q.B. 350 at 364.

<sup>81</sup> Elder, Dempster & Co v Paterson Zochonis & Co [1924] A.C. 522 at 564; above, p.627.

conditions, but not otherwise".<sup>82</sup> The same principle was applied in The Pioneer Container<sup>83</sup> where C had entered into a contract with B for the carriage of C's goods on terms which authorised B to sub-contract "on any terms". B did enter into a sub-contract with A (another carrier) on terms containing an exclusive jurisdiction clause and it was held that C was bound by this clause. Lord Goff said that the effect of the clause on C did "not depend for its efficacy either on the doctrine of privity of contract or on the doctrine of consideration"<sup>84</sup>; in other words. C was bound by it irrespective of contract.<sup>84a</sup> He was bound under the law of bailment, because he had consented to the making of the sub-bailment by B to A and to the terms of that sub-bailment. C's consent to those terms was thus essential<sup>85</sup>; though no doubt the law will here (as elsewhere) apply an objective test, so that C may be bound by terms of the sub-bailment, even though he has not actually consented to them, if he has so conducted himself as to induce A to believe that he has so consented.<sup>86</sup> The principle of such cases is, however, confined to situations in which there is a relationship of bailor and bailee (or sub-bailee) between the claimant and the defendant. In The Aliakmon, the exception did not apply as no such relationship there existed between the buyers and the shipowners: "The only bailment of the goods was one by the sellers to the shipowners".<sup>87</sup> Similarly, in the

<sup>82</sup> Morris v C W Martin & Sons Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 716 at 729; cf. ibid. 741; Port Smettenham Authority v T W Wu & Co [1979] A.C. 580; The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 323 at 340; Singer (UK) Ltd v Tees & Hartlepool Port Authority [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 164, 167-168; The Captain Gregos (No. 2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 395 at 405; Palmer [1988] L.M.C.L.Q. 466; Phang, 8 O.J.L.S. 418. Carnegie, 3 Adelaide L.Rev. 7. For a similar view, see Fosbrooke-Hobbs v Airmork Ltd (1936) 53 T.L.R. 254 at 257 (carriage of persons), but contrast Haseldine v C A Daw & Sons Ltd [1941] 2 K.B. 343 at 379. cf. also Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, s.3; Defective Premises Act 1972, ss.11(b) and 4; White v Blackmore [1972] 2 Q.B. 651 at 676.

<sup>83</sup> [1994] 2 A.C. 324; Lee Cooper Ltd v Jeakins & Son Ltd [1964] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 300 (also reported [1967] 2 Q.B. 1, but not on this point); Leary & Bros & Co v Pope & Sons (Dock Carriers) Ltd [1966] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 142; Johnson Matthey & Co v Constantine Terminals Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 215; Dresser UK Ltd v Falconbridge Management Ltd [1992] Q.B. 502; The Gudermes [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 311 at 328; Spectra International plc v Hayesok Ltd [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 153 (reversed on another ground [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 162); Sonicare International Ltd v EAFT Ltd [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 48; Coote [1977] C.L.J. 177; The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [133-136]; cf. The Agia Skepi [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 467 at 472; The Tergament (1914) 1 Com. Cas. 239, where no consent to the sub-bailment had been given. See also The Rigoletto [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 532 at 546, though this aspect of the case seems to be concerned with the existence of the sub-bailee's duty to the owner rather than with any question of the availability against the owner of exemption clauses in the contract between sub-bailee and the head bailee.

<sup>84</sup> [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 339.

<sup>84a</sup> C may be bound by reason both of a bailment on terms and of a contract between C and A made through the agency of B: see Sandeman Coprimar SA v Transitos y Transportes Integrales SL [2003] EWCA Civ 113 at [62], [63]. See also East West Corp v DKBS 1912 [2003] EWCA Civ 83 at [24], [69] holding the same principle to be applicable to the case where the bailor was originally in a contractual relationship with the bailee and had lost his rights under the contract by transfer of the bill of lading which evidenced or contained the contract; but concluding that there were no relevant terms in that contract which protected the bailee: see ibid., at [81], [85].

<sup>85</sup> [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 340-342, rejecting the view that no such consent was necessary, which had been expressed by Donaldson J. in Johnson Matthey & Co v Constantine Terminals Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 221. The need for such consent had also been stressed in Chellaram & Sons (London) Ltd v Butler's Warehousing & Distribution Ltd [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 412, where the relevant clause in the sub-bailment was not an exemption, but a lien, clause.

<sup>86</sup> cf. Lord Goff's reference in The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 342 to ostensible authority.

<sup>87</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 818; cf. Swiss Bank Corp v Brink's-Mat Ltd [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 79 at 98; The Captain Gregos (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 395 (claim by PEAG), but the same case shows that a bailment incorporating the terms of the contract can arise by subsequent attornment of the carrier to the buyer (claim by B.P.). On the question whether a bailment relationship can arise between a carrier and a buyer of goods who is not an original party to the contract of carriage, see also The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 321, where it was said at 332 that the existence of such a relationship was "not seriously disputed"; and Sonicare International Ltd v EAFT [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 48 at 53.

Midland Silicones case the present exception did not apply since, for the reasons given earlier in this Chapter,<sup>88</sup> stevedores were not bailees of the drum.<sup>89</sup>

Where the present exception does apply, the head bailor, C, is bound by an exemption clause in the sub-bailment between the head bailee, B, and the sub-bailee, A, in spite of the fact that there is no contract between A and C. Some legal basis other than contract must therefore be found to explain this result. One view is that C is bound simply because he consented to the inclusion of the term in the contract between B and A.<sup>90</sup> But if this were the reason for the exception, then it would not be restricted, as on the authorities it is,<sup>91</sup> to cases of bailment. The reason for the restriction appears to be that (in cases of the present kind) C has consented, not only to the terms of the contract between B and A, but also to the creation of the very relationship of bailor and sub-bailee between C and A which is the sole source of the duty alleged to be owed by A to C and to have been broken.<sup>92</sup> It follows that the exception does not apply where C does not need to rely on the bailment to establish that A owed him a duty of care. This would be the position, not only where A was never a bailee of C's goods at all (as in the Midland Silicones case), but also where A was such a bailee and C's loss resulted, not from A's breach of his custodial duty as bailee, but from A's conduct causing damage to C's goods in breach of a duty which had arisen quite apart from the bailment, "simply by virtue of A's proximity to the goods".<sup>93</sup>

(c) CLAUSES DEFINING DUTIES. A distinction must here (as elsewhere<sup>94</sup>) be drawn between exemption clauses and clauses which define a party's duty. Clauses of the latter kind can adversely affect a claimant even though they are contained in a contract to which he is not a party. Breach of that contract may amount also to breach of a duty of care owed to a third party, giving that third party a remedy in tort<sup>95</sup> and the terms of the contract can be relevant to the scope of that duty of care. For example, where work in

<sup>88</sup> See above, pp.628–630.

<sup>89</sup> [1962] A.C. 446 at 470.

<sup>90</sup> This appears to have been the view of Denning L.J. in Morris v CW Martin Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 716 at 729 and in his dissenting speech in the Midland Silicones case [1962] A.C. 446 at 491.

<sup>91</sup> See the Midland Silicones case, above at nn.88 and 89 and the authorities cited in n.82 above and The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650 and n.92 below.

<sup>92</sup> See The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324 at 336; The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711 at [136]. The view that the exception may extend beyond cases of bailment derives some support from an obiter dictum in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] A.C. 145 at 196. This suggests that, where an owner enters into a building contract with a contractor who engages a sub-contractor, then the latter "may be protected from liability [to the owner] by a contractual exemption clause [apparently in the sub-contract] authorised by the building owner". The word "authorised" may indicate that the contractor acted as agent for the owner to create privity of contract between the owner and the sub-contractor; but even in the absence of such agency such an extension of the bailment exception could be supported on the grounds that the law now recognises that relationships other than bailment can be the source of a duty irrespective of contract; and that the rationale of the rule that a person cannot be bound by a contract to which he is not a party loses at least some of its force where he has consented to be so bound. The Midland Silicones case [1962] A.C. 446 could be distinguished from Lord Goff's example on the ground that the cargo-owner there had not consented to the terms of the contract between the carriers and the stevedores (though he must be taken to have consented to the carrier's employment of sub-contractors for the purpose of discharging the cargo and probably to have realised that such a sub-contract would contain exclusions and limitations of liability). The view that the exception is not confined to cases of bailment is also supported by Toulson J. in Lukoil-Kalingradmorneft plc v Tata Ltd [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 365 at 375, affirmed without reference to this point [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 129 (the actual issue was whether a lien was enforceable against a third party and the conclusion that it was so enforceable was based on agency reasoning).

<sup>93</sup> The Kapetan Markos NL (No.2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 321 at 340; cf. Johnson Matthey & Co v Constantine Terminals Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 222; this point is not affected by the disapproval of the case on another point, referred to in n.85 above.

<sup>94</sup> See above, pp.238, 637.

<sup>95</sup> See above, pp.607–611.

pursuance of a building contract between A and B is done by C under a roofing subcontract between B and C, the terms of the latter contract would clearly determine the type of work to be done by C.<sup>96</sup> If the sub-contract merely required C to tile the roof he would not be liable in tort to A on the ground that the main contract required the roof to be tiled and felted, or even on the ground that tiling and felting was standard practice for the type of building in question. It would not, in such a case, be “unfair”<sup>97</sup> to A to deprive him of a right in tort against C by a term in a contract over which A had no control; for A would not (even if B were authorised to sub-contract the work) be precluded from recovering damages for breach of contract from B if the work done by C was not in conformity with the contract between A and B.<sup>98</sup> Different reasoning would apply to a clause in the subcontract which merely limited C’s liability (e.g., to the cost of replacing defective tiles). Such a clause would not be relevant to the definition of C’s duty to A in tort since it would not define what C had to do, but merely specify the legal consequences of failing to do it.<sup>99</sup> Hence such a clause would as a general rule not bind A contractually, since he was not a party to the contract in which it was contained.

(d) DERIVATIVE RIGHTS. Two points call for discussion.

(i) Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999. Under this Act, a third party C is, in circumstances to be discussed later in this Chapter,<sup>1</sup> entitled to enforce a term in a contract between two others; but his right to do so is, in general, subject to defences which would have been available to the promisor A if the proceedings to enforce the term had been brought by the promisee B.<sup>2</sup> If, for example, a contract between A and B contained (1) a promise by A to B to render some service to C and (2) a term excluding or limiting A’s liability for specified breaches, then, in an action by C under the 1999 Act to enforce the first of these terms, A would be entitled to rely on the second. In such a case, C’s right, being derived from B’s right, is subject to the restrictions which govern the latter right.<sup>3</sup> This statutory rule, however, applies only where C’s claim against A is one to enforce a term of the contract between A and B under the 1999 Act. It does not apply where C’s claim is not derived from that contract but arises independently of it and is made apart from the Act. This was the position in most of the cases with which the preceding discussion has been concerned. In them, the claim made by C against A was typically one in tort, and it was argued that C’s right to sue A in tort was excluded or limited by the terms of a contract between A and B. That contract was not, in such cases, the basis of C’s claim against A, but (at most) part of the history or chain of events giving rise to the circumstances in which A owed (or was alleged to owe) a duty of care to C. The 1999 Act expressly states that such common law claims are not to be affected by its provisions.<sup>4</sup>

(ii) Transferred loss. A more controversial way in which a person might, at common law, be adversely affected by an exemption clause in a contract to which he is not a party

<sup>96</sup> Junior Books case [1983] 1 A.C. 520 at 534; cf. Simaan General Contracting Co v Pilkington Glass Ltd (No.2) [1988] Q.B. 758 at 782–783.

<sup>97</sup> ibid. discussing a sale of goods example.

<sup>98</sup> See below, p.758.

<sup>99</sup> See The Aliakmon where the contract incorporated the Hague Rules which contained an intricate set of provisions some of which defined duties while others provided immunities and limitations; taken together, these could not be “synthesised into a standard of care”: [1985] Q.B. 350 at 368, approved [1986] A.C. 785 at 818; cf. Twins Transport Ltd v Patrick Brocklehurst (1983) 25 Build.L.R. 65.

<sup>1</sup> See below, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>2</sup> 1996 Act, s.3(2); below, p.660.

<sup>3</sup> cf. Law Com. No.242, §10.24.

<sup>4</sup> 1999 Act, s.7(1); below, p.662.

has been said to arise under the so-called “principle of transferred loss”.<sup>5</sup> The principle was, so far as English law is concerned, first stated by Robert Goff L.J. (as he then was) in The Aliakmon. It is said to apply where A, in breach of a duty of care in tort, causes physical damage to B’s property but can reasonably foresee that the loss will fall on C, e.g. because B has sold the property to C and the risk under that contract has passed to C. The effect of the doctrine is then said to be that “C will be entitled, subject to the terms of any contract restricting A’s liability to B, to bring an action in tort against A in respect of such loss or damage to the extent to which it falls upon him”.<sup>6</sup> In The Aliakmon itself<sup>7</sup> the effect of the principle, on the assumption that the damage was due to the negligence of A,<sup>8</sup> would, in Robert Goff L.J.’s view, have been that C would have acquired a tort claim against A, and that this claim would have been subject to any terms in the bill of lading contract between A and B which restricted or excluded A’s liability to B under that contract. But when the case reached the House of Lords, Lord Brandon<sup>9</sup> described the principle as “not only unsupported by authority, but . . . on the contrary inconsistent with it”<sup>10</sup> and declared himself unwilling to introduce it into English law. A more favourable view of the principle of transferred loss was, however, taken by Lord Goff in White v Jones,<sup>11</sup> the “disappointed beneficiary” case discussed earlier in this Chapter.<sup>12</sup> The actual decision in that case could not, indeed, be based on the principle since the solicitor’s breach of duty had not caused any loss to his client<sup>13</sup>; but the analogy between cases covered by the principle and the facts of White v Jones was said to be “very close”.<sup>14</sup> One point of resemblance between them is that, in Lord Goff’s view, the solicitor’s tort liability to an intended beneficiary would be “subject to any term of the contract between the solicitor and the testator which may exclude or restrict the solicitor’s liability to the testator . . .”.<sup>15</sup> The fact that there is no support in the speeches of other members of the majority in White v Jones for this restriction on the beneficiary’s tort claim<sup>16</sup> may be explicable on the ground that the restriction would be based on terms of a contract to which the beneficiary was not a party, to which he had not consented and which he had not authorised; for the principle of transferred loss, as formulated above,<sup>17</sup> does not contain any requirement that C should have consented to or authorised the exemption or limitation clauses in the contract between A and B. This position may be contrasted with the requirement of such consent which has been stated in a number of other contexts in which a person is or may be bound at common law by an exemption clause in a contract to which he is not a party: for example, in the sub-

<sup>5</sup> The Aliakmon [1986] A.C. 785 at 820; White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 264.

<sup>6</sup> [1985] Q.B. 350 at 399 (italics supplied).

<sup>7</sup> See above, p.613.

<sup>8</sup> Robert Goff L.J.’s conclusion was that A (the shipowner) was not liable since the person responsible for the damage was not A but the time charterer. Lord Donaldson M.R. and Oliver L.J. also held that A was not liable, but on the different ground that A owed no duty of care to C; this was also the view of the House of Lords: see above, pp.613–614.

<sup>9</sup> With whom all the other members of the House agreed.

<sup>10</sup> [1986] A.C. 785 at 820; see further p.614, above.

<sup>11</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 264–265. In Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 529, the principle is referred to with apparent approval and, with some misgivings, by Lord Goff (dissenting) at p.557, citing Unberath, 115 L.Q.R. 535.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.618.

<sup>13</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207 at 265.

<sup>14</sup> ibid.

<sup>15</sup> ibid. at 268; cf. Trusted v Clifford Chance (1999) [2000] W.T.L.R. 1219.

<sup>16</sup> There is no reference to the point in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson, while Lord Nolan at 294 left the point open.

<sup>17</sup> At n.6.

bailment cases discussed above.<sup>18</sup> If the principle of transferred loss were to be accepted in English law, and if rights of a third party arising under it could be excluded or restricted by the terms of a contract between others, further judicial consideration would have to be given to the question whether there should, for the purpose of binding the third party by such terms, be a requirement of his authorisation of or consent to them. One possible view is that the bailment and other cases, in which such a requirement seems now to be firmly established, should be followed by analogy in cases in which the third party's right (if any) arose under the principle of transferred loss. The alternative view is that in those other cases the third party has an independent tort claim, of which he should not be deprived by terms of a contract over which he had no control, while a third party who relied on the principle of transferred loss would assert what is, in effect, a derivative claim which, in its nature, should not be more extensive than the claim of the person from whom it is derived.

SECTION 5. EXCEPTIONS

The doctrine of privity would, if inflexibly applied, give rise to considerable injustice and inconvenience. Many exceptions to it have therefore been developed by the courts and the legislature. The most important of these is the "general and wide ranging"<sup>19</sup> one which has been created by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999. This Act preserves any right or remedy which the third party may have apart from its provisions.<sup>20</sup> The exceptions which were established before the Act came into force therefore still call for discussion, particularly because situations may arise in which it will be to the third parties' advantage to rely on one of these exceptions, rather than on the new one which has been created by the Act.<sup>21</sup>

1. Judge-made Exceptions

(1) Covenants concerning land

Covenants in a lease can benefit or bind persons, other than the original parties to the lease, who later acquire an interest in the property or the reversion; a person may be able to enforce a covenant affecting land made by his predecessor in title, and one who acquires land with notice that it is burdened by a restrictive covenant may be bound by it although he was not a party to the covenant. Detailed discussion of these topics will be found in works on the land law.<sup>22</sup>

(2) Agency

Agency is the relationship which arises when one person (the principal) authorises another (the agent) to act on his behalf and the agent agrees to do so. One legal consequence of this relationship is that the principal acquires rights and incurs liabilities under contracts made by the agent on his behalf with third parties. It is sometimes said that this is only an apparent exception to the doctrine of privity, since in such cases the

<sup>18</sup> See especially The Pioneer Container [1994] 2 A.C. 324; cf. also Lord Goff's dictum in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 196, discussed above, p.642 n.92.

<sup>19</sup> Law Com No 242, §5.16.

<sup>20</sup> s.7(1); this can apply not only to existing, but also to future, exceptions.

<sup>21</sup> See above, p.581; below, pp.653, 662–664.

<sup>22</sup> e.g. Megarry and Wade, The Law of Real Property (6th ed.), Chaps 15 and 16.

agent is only the instrument of the principal, who is the real contracting party.<sup>23</sup> This may be true where the agent acts within his actual authority. But it is only doubtfully true where the principal is liable under the doctrine of apparent authority although the agent's act is unauthorised, or where the principal ratifies.<sup>24</sup> And the principles of agency constitute a clear exception to the doctrine of privity where the agent acts without actual but within his "usual" authority,<sup>25</sup> where the principal is undisclosed,<sup>26</sup> and in certain cases of agency of necessity.<sup>27</sup> These matters are discussed in Chapter 17.

(3) Assignment

Assignment is a process whereby a contractual right is transferred to someone other than the original creditor without the consent of the original debtor. It is a clear exception to the doctrine of privity and is discussed in Chapter 16.

(4) Trusts of promises<sup>28</sup>

Equity developed a more general exception to the doctrine of privity by use of the concept of trust. A trust is an equitable obligation to hold property on behalf of another. It may be express or implied; and a person may be trustee not only of a physical thing or of a sum of money,<sup>29</sup> but also of a chose in action,<sup>30</sup> such as a debt owed to him. In Equity, a person could, moreover, be trustee of a promise to pay to money, not to himself, but to a third party; and where such a trust was established, the third party could enforce the promise against the promisor.<sup>31</sup> This device was applied in a number of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century cases<sup>32</sup> and was even recognised by the common law courts, who sometimes allowed the promisee to recover more than he had lost on the ground that he was bound to hold the surplus for a third party.<sup>33</sup> It was approved by the House of Lords in Walford's case,<sup>34</sup> where a broker (C) negotiated a charterparty by which the shipowner (A) promised the charterer (B) to pay the broker a commission. It was held that B was trustee of this promise for C, who could thus enforce it against A.<sup>35</sup> Many problems arise in determining the scope and effects of this trust device.

<sup>23</sup> cf. Pollock, Principles of Contract (13th ed.), p.163.

<sup>24</sup> See below, pp.712–716, 722–726.

<sup>25</sup> Hatteau v Fenwick [1893] 1 Q.B. 346; below, pp.716–718.

<sup>26</sup> See below, pp.727–730.

<sup>27</sup> See below, pp.718–722.

<sup>28</sup> Corbin, 46 L.Q.R. 12; Contracts, Chap.46; Jaconelli [1998] Conv. 88.

<sup>29</sup> If A lends a sum of money to B and stipulates that the money is to be used only for paying a debt which B owes C, then B may hold the money on trust for C: see Barclays Bank Ltd v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] A.C. 567 (where the trust in favour of C failed and it was held that there was a resulting trust for A). In this case, the subject-matter of the trust was the money and not a promise. A made no promise to B to pay C; nor did B promise A to pay C: B promised only not to use the money for any other purpose.

<sup>30</sup> See below, p.672.

<sup>31</sup> Tomlinson v Gill (1756) Amb. 330. For the effectiveness of directions (not of a contractual nature) to executors in favour of a third party, see Cramden v Aldridge [1993] 1 W.L.R. 433.

<sup>32</sup> e.g. above, n.31; Gregory v Williams (1817) 3 Mer. 582; Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch.D. 290.

<sup>33</sup> e.g. Lamb v Vice (1840) 6 M. & W. 467; Robertson v Wait (1853) 8 Ex. 299; Prudential Staff Union v Hall [1947] K.B. 685.

<sup>34</sup> Les Affrèteurs Réunis, SA v Leopold Walford (London) Ltd [1919] A.C. 801; The Panaghia P [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 653 at 655; Atlas Shipping Agency (UK) Ltd v Suisse Atlantique Société d'Armement SA [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 188. Contrast The Manifest Lipkomy [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 138, where an agreement for the sale of a ship provided for deduction of the broker's commission from the price, but seems to have contained no promise by the seller to pay the broker.

<sup>35</sup> Lord Finlay seems to have regarded the broker as a party to the contract.

(a) INTENTION TO CREATE A TRUST. A promisee will not be regarded as trustee for a third party unless he has the intention to create a trust.<sup>36</sup>

Such an intention can be made clear by using the word “trust” or “trustee”<sup>37</sup> though even where this is done the further question<sup>38</sup> may arise: in whose favour has the trust been created? In Gandy v Gandy<sup>39</sup> a husband entered into a separation agreement by which he promised trustees to pay them an annuity for the benefit of his wife, and to pay them money for the maintenance and education of his daughters. It was held that this agreement created no trust in favour of the daughters, since its sole object was to regulate the relations between husband and wife. Thus the wife could, but the daughters could not, enforce the agreement.<sup>40</sup>

A trust may be created without using any particular form of words, and where the word “trust” or “trustee” is not used, the question of intention to create a trust gives rise to great difficulty. Two cases may be contrasted. In Re Flavell<sup>41</sup> a partner retired and the continuing partners promised him that they would, after his death, pay an annuity to his widow. It was held that there was a trust in favour of the widow. But in Re Schebsman<sup>42</sup> a company promised one of its employees on his retirement that it would, after his death, pay annuities to his widow for a specified period, or (if she should die within that period) to his daughter. It was held that there was no trust in favour of the widow or daughter.<sup>43</sup>

Similarly, a life insurance policy expressed to be for the benefit of a third party has in some cases been held to create a trust in his favour,<sup>44</sup> but in others to confer no rights on him.<sup>45</sup> And in some cases concerning other types of insurance<sup>46</sup> the courts have held that a third party could take advantage of the policy under the trust device<sup>47</sup> while in others they have held that the third party had no rights because of the doctrine of

<sup>36</sup> Spain v Lam Society [1983] 1 A.C. 598 at 620; Feltham, 98 L.Q.R. 17.

<sup>37</sup> Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67; Bowkill v Dawson [1955] 1 Q.B. 13.

<sup>38</sup> For the purpose of the present discussion, it is assumed that formal requirements, such as that imposed by Law of Property Act 1925, s.53(1)(b), have been satisfied. As to the effect on the rights of third parties of failure to satisfy such requirements, see Feltham [1987] Conv. 246.

<sup>39</sup> (1884) 30 Ch.D. 57.

<sup>40</sup> Fry L.J. held that the daughters had no claim because the trustees had a discretion as to their upbringing. But when the wife was joined to the action her claim succeeded even though enforcement by her could also be said to interfere with the trustees' discretion.

<sup>41</sup> (1883) 25 Ch.D. 89; see further, cf. Page v Cox (1852) 10 Hare 163; Re Gordon [1940] Ch. 851; Drimmie v Davies [1899] 1 I.R. 176.

<sup>42</sup> [1944] Ch. 83; see further, below, p.649, n.62; cf. Re Stapleton-Bretherton [1941] Ch. 482. In Re Miller's Agreement [1947] Ch. 615 and Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 it was conceded that there was no trust.

<sup>43</sup> Paradoxically, the argument that there was a trust was advanced, not on behalf of the third parties, but on behalf of the promisee's trustee in bankruptcy. The point of the argument was to have the trust set aside under Bankruptcy Act 1914, s.42 (now superseded by Insolvency Act 1986, s.339): see [1944] Ch. 83 at 86. On p.104 the argument is attributed to “Mr. Denning,” who appeared for the third parties. But this must be a mistake; the corresponding passage in [1943] 2 All E.R. 768 at 779 correctly attributes it to “counsel for the appellant,” i.e. for the trustee in bankruptcy. As the company was willing to pay, the outcome of holding that there was no trust was that the third parties obtained the intended benefit. In Re Flavell, above, the same result followed from the decision that there was a trust.

<sup>44</sup> Re Richardson (1882) 47 L.T. 514; Royal Exchange Assurance v Hope [1928] Ch. 179; Re Webb [1941] Ch. 225; Re Foster's Policy [1966] 1 W.L.R. 222.

<sup>45</sup> Re Burgess' Policy (1915) 113 L.T. 443; Re Clay's Policy of Assurance [1937] 2 All E.R. 548; Re Foster [1938] 3 All E.R. 357; Re Sinclair's Life Policy [1938] Ch. 799; Re Engelbach's Estate [1924] 2 Ch. 348. For criticism of the last two cases in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 (but on another ground), see above, p.604, n.50.

<sup>46</sup> For statutory exceptions to the doctrine of privity in cases of insurance, see below, pp.666–669.

<sup>47</sup> Williams v Baltic Insurance Co [1924] 2 K.B. 282; cf. Waters v Monarch Assurance Co (1856) 5 E. & B. 870 at 881. See also Deane J. in Trident General Ins Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 C.L.R. 107 (above, p.589).

privity.<sup>48</sup> There is no point in trying to reconcile all these cases. They represent different stages of development and show that the courts became, at one stage, reluctant to apply the trust device because, once a trust was held to have been created, the parties to the contract lost their right to rescind or vary that contract by mutual consent.<sup>49</sup> In this state of the authorities, the most that can be done is to try to extract from them a number of principles which will at any rate serve as guides to the solution of future problems.

(i) There must be an intention to benefit the third party. It follows from this requirement that, if the promisee intends the promise to be for his own benefit, there will be no trust in favour of the third party.<sup>50</sup> The same result may follow if it is as consistent with the facts that the promisee took the promise for his own benefit as for that of a third party.<sup>51</sup> Conversely, the fact that the promisee had not intended to take the promise for his own benefit can be relied on to support the argument that there was a trust in favour of the third party.<sup>52</sup>

(ii) The intention to benefit the third party must be irrevocable. It is now<sup>53</sup> settled that a contract will not normally<sup>54</sup> give rise to a trust in favour of a third party if, under the terms of the contract, the promisee is entitled to deprive the third party of the intended benefit by diverting it to himself. Thus in Re Sinclair's Life Policy<sup>55</sup> a policy of life insurance, taken out by the assured for the benefit of his godson, contained an option enabling the assured to surrender the policy for his own benefit.<sup>56</sup> This fact negated the intention to create a trust. On the other hand, the existence of such a power to divert the benefit was held not to negative the intention to create the trust where the power was expressed to be exercisable only for a limited period and was not exercised within that period.<sup>57</sup> Nor will the existence of a trust necessarily be negated where the contract names a group of beneficiaries but reserves to the promisee the power to alter the nature or destination of the benefit as between those beneficiaries.<sup>58</sup> And where a contract by statute creates a trust<sup>59</sup> a general provision in the contract entitling the promisee to divert the benefit to whom he pleases will not defeat the trust: on the contrary such power can be exercised only for the benefit of objects of the trust.<sup>60</sup> The court may conclude that there was no intention irrevocably to benefit the third party even though the contract contains no express provision entitling the promisee to divert the benefit away from the third party. It may do so on the ground that the contract would, if it were held to give rise to a trust, unduly limited the freedom of action of the parties or of one of them, e.g.

<sup>48</sup> Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corp [1933] A.C. 70; Green v Russell [1959] 2 Q.B. 226, cited with approval in McCamley v Cammell Laird Shipbuilders [1990] 1 W.L.R. 963 at 969.

<sup>49</sup> See above, p.588; below, p.648.

<sup>50</sup> See West v Houghton (1879) 4 C.P.D. 197; criticised in Re Flavell (1883) 25 Ch.D. 89 at 98 and in Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch.D. 290 at 311.

<sup>51</sup> Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Ins Corp [1933] A.C. 70, where one relevant factor for denying that a motor insurance policy created a trust in favour of a person authorised to drive the insured's car was that the insured was himself liable for the torts of that person. Contrast Williams v Baltic Ins Co [1920] 2 K.B. 283; for the statutory position relating to such policies, see below, p.667.

<sup>52</sup> Lyus v Promsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044.

<sup>53</sup> For the earlier view that a trust may arise although the contracting parties can divert the benefit away from the third party, see Hill v Gomme (1839) 5 My. & Cr. 250; Page v Cox (1852) 10 Hare 163.

<sup>54</sup> For exceptions, see below, at nn.57 to 60.

<sup>55</sup> [1938] Ch. 799; criticised on another ground in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 96; above, p.604, n.50.

<sup>56</sup> A provision of this kind would not fall within Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.2 since this applies only to rescission or variation by agreement: see below, p.658.

<sup>57</sup> Re Foster's Policy [1966] 1 W.L.R. 432.

<sup>58</sup> Re Webb [1941] Ch. 225; Re Flavell (1883) 25 Ch. D. 89.

<sup>59</sup> See below, p.666.

<sup>60</sup> Re a Policy of the Equitable Life Assurance of the United States and Mitchell (1911) 27 T.L.R. 213; Re Fleetwood's Policy [1926] Ch. 48.

by restricting the promisee's freedom of movement<sup>61</sup> or by depriving the parties to the contract of their rights to vary it by mutual consent.<sup>62</sup>

(iii) The intention to benefit is not, without more, sufficient. An intention to create a trust must be distinguished from an intention to make a gift.<sup>63</sup> There are many cases in which the courts have refused to apply the trust device although the promisee clearly and without qualification intended to benefit the third party.<sup>64</sup> It seems that an intention to create a trust will readily be found where the contract for the benefit of the third party is made in performance of a previous contract between promisee and third party, e.g. where an employer promises to insure his employee against accident and then does so.<sup>65</sup> An intention to create a trust should, on principle, involve an intention on the part of the promisee to assume fiduciary responsibilities towards the third party.<sup>66</sup> But there is no clear definition of "fiduciary" for this purpose; and the courts did not at one time insist very strictly on proof of the intention to create a trust. The fact that they later came to do so is largely responsible for the present, more restricted, scope of the trust device.

The intention to create a trust may, finally, be negated on the ground that a trust is not necessary to give rights to the third party because he is entitled to enforce the contract, even in the absence of a trust, under a statutory exception to the doctrine of privity.<sup>67</sup>

(b) EFFECTS OF THE TRUST. The effects of a trust in favour of a third party are as follows:

(i) Third party can sue. The third party is entitled to sue the promisor for the money or property which the promisor had promised to pay or to transfer to him.<sup>68</sup> He must join the promisee as a party to the action<sup>69</sup> since if this were not done the promisor might <sup>61</sup> e.g. Re Burgess' Policy [1915] 113 L.T. 43 (policy to become void if insured went "beyond the boundaries of Europe" without previously notifying insurers).

<sup>62</sup> e.g. Re Schebsman [1944] 83 at 104 (parties "intended to keep alive their common law right consensually to vary the terms of the obligation"). The mere existence of such a right does not negative the statutory right of enforcement which a third party has under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: this is clear from s.2 of that Act, below pp.657–659.

<sup>63</sup> See Richards v Delbridge (1874) L.R. 18 Eq. 11.

<sup>64</sup> Re Engelbach's Estate [1924] 2 Ch. 348 (overruled on another point in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58); Re Clay's Policy of Assurance [1937] 2 All E.R. 548; Re Foster [1938] 3 All E.R. 357; Re Stapleton-Bretherton [1941] Ch. 482; Green v Russell [1959] 1 Q.B. 28; Re Cook's Settlement Trusts [1965] Ch. 902; cf. Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 Q.B. 147 at 152. Under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.1(1)(b) and (2) (below, pp.653–654) it will suffice for the term to purport to confer a benefit on the third party, so long as it is not shown that the contracting parties did not intend the term to be enforceable by the third party. For the reasons given at pp.581 above and 653, 662–664 below, however, it may be in the third party's interest to establish an intention to create a trust, so that he can rely on the trust exception rather than on the statutory right.

<sup>65</sup> See Re Independent Air Travel Ltd, The Times, May 20, 1961, where counsel, with the approval of the court, conceded this point.

<sup>66</sup> See Harmer v Armstrong [1934] Ch. 65, where the fact that the promisee was the third party's agent, and so under a fiduciary duty (below, p.745), helped to establish the necessary intention.

<sup>67</sup> Swain v Law Society [1983] 1 A.C. 598, esp. at 621.

<sup>68</sup> But where a trustee engages a professional adviser for the purpose of administering the trust, a claim for negligence against that adviser cannot be brought by the beneficiary since such a claim is not part of the trust property (though any damages recovered by the trustee would be): Bradstock Trustee Services Ltd v Nabarro Nathanson [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1405.

<sup>69</sup> cf. Performing Right Society Ltd v London Theatre of Varieties [1924] A.C. 1; The Panaghia P [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 653 at 655; Atlas Shipping Agency (UK) Ltd v Suisse Atlantique Société d'Armement [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 188 at 193; and below, pp.674–675.

be sued a second time by the promisee. As this rule as to joinder of parties exists for the benefit of the promisor, it can be waived by him.<sup>70</sup>

(ii) Third party entitled to the benefit. The third party is (as a general rule<sup>71</sup>) beneficially entitled to any money paid or payable under the contract; the promisee has no right to such money.<sup>72</sup> After Beswick v Beswick<sup>73</sup> the third party can generally keep money paid to him even if there is no trust.

(iii) Failure of the trust. There are exceptional cases in which the promisee may be entitled to the money even though there was a trust. In Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association<sup>74</sup> a husband insured his life for the benefit of his wife by a policy which, by statute, created a trust in her favour.<sup>75</sup> The wife was convicted of murdering the husband and was therefore disqualified from enforcing the trust. It was held that the executors of the husband were entitled to the policy moneys. It can be argued that the promisor should not have been held liable to pay the promisee when its promise was one to pay the third party.<sup>76</sup> But it seems that the destination of the payments was a matter of indifference to the insurance company and that there was nothing to show that the company would (even if there had been no conviction) have been in any way prejudiced by paying the husband's executors rather than the wife.<sup>77</sup> The actual decision may also turn on the interpretation of the statute creating the trust.<sup>78</sup>

(c) KINDS OF PROMISES WHICH CAN BE HELD ON TRUST. The trust device has so far been applied only to promises to pay money or to transfer property.<sup>79</sup> It is sometimes suggested that it might be applied to other kinds of promises, e.g. that an employer might hold the benefit of an exemption clause on trust for his employee.<sup>80</sup> But the present judicial tendency is to restrict the scope of the trust device; and the suggestion has therefore been rejected on the ground that "the conception of a trust attaching to a benefit under an exclusion clause extends far beyond conventional limits".<sup>81</sup> Other techniques for making the benefit of such clauses available to third parties have been discussed earlier in this Chapter.<sup>82</sup>

(d) RELATION BETWEEN TRUST DEVICE AND PRIVACY. The trust device has here been treated as an exception to the doctrine of privity, of limited if uncertain scope. It has, however, been argued that where a third party was enabled by this device to enforce a contract made for his benefit there was, before the Judicature Act 1873, a conflict between the rules of equity and those of common law; that the rules of equity now prevail<sup>83</sup>; and that therefore the third party generally has a right of action.<sup>84</sup> But this

<sup>70</sup> As in Walford's case [1919] A.C. 801; cf. William Brandt's Sons & Co v Dunlop Rubber Co [1905] A.C. 454.

<sup>71</sup> i.e. subject to the exception stated at n.74, below.

<sup>72</sup> Re Flavell (1883) 25 Ch.D. 89; Re Gordon [1940] Ch. 851; cf. Paul v Constance [1977] 1 W.L.R. 52.

<sup>73</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; see above, p.604.

<sup>74</sup> [1892] 1 Q.B. 147.

<sup>75</sup> Married Women's Property Act 1882, s.11; below, p.666.

<sup>76</sup> Ames, Lectures, 320; Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385 at 410–411, per Windeyer J. (dissenting).

<sup>77</sup> cf. above, p.591.

<sup>78</sup> See [1892] 1 Q.B. 147 at 157.

<sup>79</sup> For a possible extension, see Swain v Lam Society [1982] 1 A.C. 598, where a promise to provide indemnity insurance was evidently regarded as a possible subject-matter of a trust; though for the reason given at p.649, above, there was no intention to create a trust.

<sup>80</sup> See the clause in The Eurymedon [1975] A.C. 154; above, p.632.

<sup>81</sup> Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077 at 1083.

<sup>82</sup> See above, pp.631–638.

<sup>83</sup> Judicature Act 1873, s.25(11); now Supreme Court Act 1981, s.49(1).

<sup>84</sup> Drimmie v Davies [1899] 1 I.R. 176, 182 (the actual decision was that specific performance could be obtained by the executors of the promisee); Corbin, 46 L.Q.R. 12, 36; cf. Langbein, 105 Yale L.J. 625 at 646–647.

view has not been accepted.<sup>85</sup> Even in equity the third party did not succeed merely because the contract was expressed to have been made for his benefit: he had to show, in addition, that a trust had been created in his favour.<sup>86</sup> And the argument that third parties were entitled to enforce contracts made for their benefit has been rejected in many cases after the Judicature Act 1873. Some of these were admittedly argued entirely on common law principles,<sup>87</sup> but in others the equitable argument was considered and rejected.<sup>88</sup>

(5) Covenants in Marriage Settlements

A covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in a marriage settlement can be enforced by all persons “within the marriage consideration”, i.e. the spouses and issue of the marriage, but not by anyone else.<sup>89</sup> For example, it cannot be enforced by either spouse’s next-of-kin, who are regarded as volunteers.<sup>90</sup> The rule seems to be a relic from the days when it was thought that any stranger who provided consideration could enforce a promise.<sup>91</sup>

2. Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999<sup>92</sup>

(1) Third party’s right of enforcement

“A general and wide-ranging exception to”<sup>93</sup> the doctrine of privity is created by this Act, the central purpose of which is to enable a third party to acquire rights under a contract if, and to the extent that, the parties to the contract so intend. Subs.1(1) provides that a person who is not a party to the contract may in his own right enforce a term of the contract in the two situations to be described below. In discussing these situations and other provisions of the Act, it will be convenient to refer to the person who makes the promise which the third party is claiming to enforce (the promisor) as A, to the person to whom that promise is made (the promisee) as B<sup>94</sup> and to the third party as C.

(a) EXPRESS PROVISION. Under subs.1(1)(a) of the 1999 Act, C can enforce a term of the contract if “the contract expressly provides that he may”: e.g. where a contract contains a promise by A to B to pay £1000 to C and also provides that C is to be entitled to enforce the term which contains this promise. If the contract contains such a provision, there is no further requirement (as there is under subs.1(1)(b), to be discussed

<sup>85</sup> Re Schebsman [1943] 1 Ch. at 370, approved [1944] Ch. at 104.

<sup>86</sup> Colyear v Mulgrave (1836) 2 Keen 81; the actual decision has been criticised, but the principle remains unimpaired. See Page v Cox (1852) 10 Hare 163; Kekewich v Manning (1851) 1 D.M. & G. 176.

<sup>87</sup> e.g. Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] A.C. 847.

<sup>88</sup> Re Burgess’ Policy (1915) 113 L.T. 443; Re Clay’s Policy of Assurance [1937] 2 All E.R. 548; Re Sinclair’s Life Policy [1938] Ch. 799; Re Schebsman [1944] Ch. 83; Green v Russell [1959] 1 Q.B. 28.

<sup>89</sup> Hill v Gomme (1839) 5 My. & Cr. 250 at 254; Re D’Angibau (1880) 15 Ch.D. 228 at 242; Green v Patterson (1886) 32 Ch.D. 95, 107; Re Plumtre’s Marriage Settlement [1910] 1 Ch. 609 at 619. These cases, apart from constituting an exception to the doctrine of consideration, are also hard to reconcile with the modern definition of consideration: above, p.79.

<sup>90</sup> Re Cook’s Settlement Trusts [1965] Ch. 902 at 915–918; Lec, 85 L.Q.R. 213; Barton, 91 L.Q.R. 326; Meagher and Lehane, 92 L.Q.R. 427.

<sup>91</sup> The statement in Hill v Gomme, above, that the children are “quasi-parties” to the contract is curiously reminiscent of the reasoning of Dutton v Poole (1678) 2 Lev. 210, above, p.588 n.88.

<sup>92</sup> See also above, pp.580–581.

<sup>93</sup> ibid; Law Commission Report on Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties, Law Com No. 242, (1996), hereafter “Report”; Merkin & Faber (ed), Privity—the Impact of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

<sup>94</sup> cf. the definitions of “promisor” and “promisee” in s.1(7) of the 1999 Act.

below) that the promise must have been made for C's own benefit: e.g. he can enforce the term even though the payment is to be made to him as trustee for D.<sup>95</sup> Express provisions in contracts of the kind just described, to the effect that C is to be entitled to enforce the term containing the promise made by A to B, have hitherto been rare, presumably because under the doctrine of privity they would at common law have been ineffective.<sup>96</sup> The 1999 Act provides a new drafting device to enable the contracting parties to give effect to their intention that C is to acquire an enforceable right against A. Apart from the Act, a similar result can be achieved by creating a trust of A's promise in favour of C<sup>97</sup> or by making him a joint promisee.<sup>98</sup> There is a procedural advantage in making use of the machinery of subs.1(1)(a) in that, if C sues under this provision, he will not (it seems) need to join B as a party to the action<sup>99</sup>; though the court could order B to be so joined where claims against A were made by both B and C, or where A relied against C on a defence available to A against B,<sup>1</sup> since in such cases B's presence before the court is likely to be "desirable . . . so that the court can resolve all the matters in dispute in the proceedings".<sup>2</sup> If C does have a claim apart from the Act as the beneficiary of a trust of A's promise or as joint promisee, it may, in spite of the need to join B to the action, be in C's interest to pursue that claim since it would not be subject to other provisions of the Act which may restrict his rights under it: e.g. to those relating to the rescission or variation of the contract between A and B, or to defences available to A against B.<sup>3</sup>

S.1(1)(a) is also likely to apply to terms such as Himalaya clauses,<sup>4</sup> by which A promises B that exemptions from or limitations of liability contained in a contract between A and B shall be available for the benefit of C, who typically will be an employee, agent or sub-contractor employed by B for the purpose of performing some or all of B's obligations under the contract. This follows from subs.1(6) of the 1999 Act, by which references to C's "enforcing" a term which "excludes or limits liability"<sup>5</sup> are to be "construed as references to his availing himself of the exclusion or limitation". Words in the contract to the effect that C is to be protected by the exemption or limitation clause therefore amount in themselves to an express provision that C may enforce the clause<sup>6</sup>; no further words will be necessary. C's protection under the Act will, however, be based on a theory different from that which accounts for the effectiveness of Himalaya clauses at common law. The common law theory is that such clauses, and the conduct of the relevant parties, can give rise to a separate or collateral contract between A and C.<sup>7</sup> Under the Act, by contrast, C enforces a term of a contract to which

<sup>95</sup> Report, §7.5.

<sup>96</sup> As in Tinédle v. Atkinson (1861) 1 B. & S. 393, above, p.588.

<sup>97</sup> See above, p.646.

<sup>98</sup> See McEvoy v. Belfast Banking Co [1935] A.C. 24, above, p.578.

<sup>99</sup> This appears to follow from the words "in his own right" in subs.1(1); cf. Report, §14.3.

<sup>1</sup> Under s.3 of the 1999 Act: see below, p.660.

<sup>2</sup> CPR, r. 19.2(2)(a); cf. above p.569.

<sup>3</sup> See ss.2 and 3 (below pp.657–660 and 660–661) and s.7(1) of the Act below, p.662. For the effect on one co-promisee of a defence available against, or of a release granted by, another, see above, pp.571–574.

<sup>4</sup> See above p.631. For the effect of the Act on such clauses, see further Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2000), §§7–073 to 7–079.

<sup>5</sup> This phrase would not include other terms in the contract on which C might wish to rely: e.g. not choice of forum clauses: see Report, §14.9; cf., at common law, The Mahkutai [1996] A.C. 650, where the Himalaya clause in the bill of lading was held as a matter of construction not to cover the choice of forum clause in the same bill (above, pp.634–635). If, in a future case, a Himalaya clause were so drafted as to cover the choice of forum clause, the case would not fall within s.1(6) of the 1999 Act.

<sup>6</sup> Report, §7.10.

<sup>7</sup> See above, p.632.

he is not a party.<sup>8</sup> It follows that the agency requirements which exist at common law<sup>9</sup> are irrelevant for the purposes of the Act. On the other hand, under the Act C's right to "enforce" a Himalaya clause is subject to the provisions of the Act<sup>10</sup> while at common law the operation of such a clause is subject only to the common law rules discussed earlier in this Chapter<sup>11</sup>; and if C wishes to rely on his common law rights, in preference to those under the Act, it is open to him to do so.<sup>12</sup> For these (among other)<sup>13</sup> reasons, what may be called the old law relating to Himalaya clauses retains a considerable degree of practical importance, so that it would not be safe to rely exclusively on the simpler forms of words that can protect third parties under the Act.

(b) TERM CONFERRING BENEFIT ON THIRD PARTY. Under subs.1(1)(b) of the 1999 Act, C may enforce a term of the contract if "the term purports to confer a benefit on him"; but his right to do so in such a case is subject to subs.1(2), by which C has no such right "if on a proper construction of the contract it appears that [A and B] did not intend the term to be enforceable by" C. These will probably be the most significant provisions of the 1999 Act and their interpretation is likely to give rise to a number of difficulties. It seems that a "benefit" within subs.1(1)(b) can include any performance due under the contract between A and B: thus it can include a payment of money, a transfer of property, or the rendering of a service; it can also (by virtue of subs.1(6)) include the benefit of an exemption or limitation clause. The term must, moreover, purport to confer the benefit on C, so that it is not enough for C to show that he would happen to benefit from its performance. The question whether the term purported to confer a benefit on C would be one of construction. If, for example, A were employed by B "to cut my hedge adjoining C's land", performance by A might benefit C, but the term would not "purport to confer a benefit" on C. The question of construction could be particularly hard to answer where A was a sub-contractor employed by B to render services in relation to property owned by C. Assuming that the term does purport to confer a benefit on C, it is then necessary to construe the contract as a whole to determine the nature and extent of C's right to enforce the term. This follows from subs.1(4), under which "this section does not confer a right on [C] to enforce a term of a contract otherwise than subject to and in accordance with any other relevant terms of the contract". This provision would, for example, apply if the term which C was seeking to enforce provided for the payment to him of £1000, but another term of the contract provided that claims under the former term must be made within one year.

Yet a further and different question of construction arises (with regard to the intention of A and B) under subs.1(2) (quoted above) and it appears from the wording of this subsection that the burden of proof under it rests on A, or (in other words) that if the term purports to confer a benefit on C, then there is a rebuttable presumption that the term is intended by A and B to be enforceable by C.<sup>14</sup> To rebut the presumption, A must (in the words of subs.1(2)) show that "the parties" did not intend the term to be enforceable by C. This seems to mean that it is not enough for A to show that he did not so intend; he must show that neither he nor B had this intention. Nor is the presumption rebutted merely because in the contract A and B had reserved the right to rescind or vary the contract: this follows from the provisions with regard to such rescission or variation

<sup>8</sup> s.1(1) ("a person who is not a party . . .").

<sup>9</sup> See above, p.633.

<sup>10</sup> s.1(1); see especially ss.2 and 3, below pp.657–661.

<sup>11</sup> See above, pp.634–636.

<sup>12</sup> 1999 Act, s.7(1).

<sup>13</sup> See n.5, above.

<sup>14</sup> Report, §§7.5. 7.17.

made in s.2 of the Act and discussed below.<sup>15</sup> As the question of intention put in subs.1(2) is there described as one of construction, it seems that the evidence which A will be allowed to adduce for this purpose will, in general, be limited by the rules which restrict the types of evidence admissible on other questions of construction.<sup>16</sup>

It is tempting to speculate how the provisions of the Act just discussed would apply to some of the leading cases in which the doctrine of privity was applied before the 1999 Act. To some extent, indeed, such an exercise is likely to be fruitless since the courts have not in the past directed their attention to the issues which will arise under the Act. In Beswick v Beswick,<sup>17</sup> for example, the contract no doubt purported to confer a benefit on C; but no finding of fact was made (because such a finding would have been irrelevant) as to the intention of A and B on the issue of legal enforceability by C: it is conceivable that A could succeed on this issue if, for example, he could show that A and B had, when the contract was made, instructed the solicitor who drafted it to do so in such a way as not to confer legally enforceable rights on C.<sup>18</sup> On the facts (if they now recurred) of a number of other cases, the position under the 1999 Act would, it is submitted, be clearer. Thus in the “disappointed beneficiary” cases such as White v Jones<sup>19</sup> C would not get a right under the Act against A, the negligent solicitor, since the terms of the solicitor’s retainer (even if they identified C<sup>20</sup>) would not purport to confer a benefit on C: the intended benefit was to come, not from A, but from B.<sup>21</sup> It is similarly unlikely that cases such as the Junior Books case,<sup>22</sup> in which A is a subcontractor employed by B to enable B to perform his contract with C, would be covered, even if the subcontract named C, since the purpose of such a sub-contract would prima facie be to regulate the relations between A and B rather than to confer a benefit on C.<sup>23</sup> Cases such as the Linden Garden case<sup>24</sup> would likewise not be affected by s.1 of the Bill, since the mere possibility that land on which work is done by a building contractor might be transferred to purchasers from the owner would not be sufficient to show that the term relating to the quality of the work purported to “confer a benefit” on such purchasers; nor would the contract, without more, adequately “identify”<sup>25</sup> such purchasers as third parties for the purpose of subs.1(1)(b). Nor, in circumstances such as those in the Panatown case,<sup>26</sup> would the mere fact that the building contractor (A) knew that the property on which he was working in pursuance of his contract with B belonged to someone other than B suffice to show that the a benefit was to be conferred on that other person (C): the answer to the question whether the work was being done for the benefit of C or of B would depend on the contractual relations between B and C, of the details

<sup>15</sup> See below, pp.657–660.

<sup>16</sup> See above, pp.196–199; but the rule that evidence is not admissible to ascertain the “parties’ intention” (Prenn v Simmonds [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1381 at 1385) can scarcely apply in the present context since the very purpose of the enquiry under s.1(2) is to determine what the parties intended.

<sup>17</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; above, p.589.

<sup>18</sup> It would have been easy for the solicitor to have drafted the contract so as to make it enforceable by C: e.g. by expressly making B trustee for C (above, p.647) or by making C a joint promisee with B (above, pp.576–578). We do not know whether the solicitor explained these possibilities to A and B or whether he received any instructions from them on the point.

<sup>19</sup> [1995] 2 A.C. 207; above p.616.

<sup>20</sup> See below p.655.

<sup>21</sup> Report, §7.25.

<sup>22</sup> [1983] 1 A.C. 520; above p.608.

<sup>23</sup> The case was a Scottish case and no claim was made in contract even though Scots law recognises a jus quaesitum tertio arising by way of contract.

<sup>24</sup> [1994] 1 A.C. 85; above p.594.

<sup>25</sup> Within subs.1(3), below.

<sup>26</sup> Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518, above, p.596.

of which A might be wholly unaware. In the “family holiday” cases<sup>27</sup> the outcome under the Act would depend on the nature of the transaction. If the person making the booking supplied the names of other members of the family when the contract was made, those other members would probably acquire rights under subs.1(1); but no such rights are likely to be acquired if a person simply rented a holiday cottage without giving any information as to the number or names of the persons with whom he proposed to share the accommodation. In many of the situations which have here been discussed, the question whether the contract purports to confer a benefit on C will be closely related to the question, to be discussed in the following paragraph, whether C is adequately “identified” in the contract between A and B.

(c) IDENTIFICATION OF THIRD PARTY. Under subs.1(3) of the 1999 Act, it is a requirement of C’s right to enforce A’s promise that C must have been “expressly identified” in the contract between A and B, either “by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description”; it follows from this requirement that C could not rely for the purpose of subs.1(1) on the argument that the contract referred to him by implication.<sup>28</sup> So long as C is identified in accordance with these requirements, there is no need for C to be in existence when the contract was made: for example, a promise in favour of an unborn child, a future spouse or an unformed company could be enforced by<sup>29</sup> such a third party when it came into existence. Although it is a necessary condition for the creation of C’s rights under subs.1 that he must be expressly identified in the contract between A and B, such identification is not a sufficient condition for this purpose, since a contract which identifies C does not necessarily purport to confer a benefit on him. If, for example, a portrait painter (A) were commissioned by a college (B) to paint a portrait of the head of the college (C) for display on its premises, the contract would not purport to confer a benefit on C, nor would A and B intend the contract to be enforceable by C. It would seem that C must be identified in such a way as to indicate that A and B intended to confer rights on C: thus the identification requirement would be satisfied where A promised B not to sue C for negligence but not where A promised B not to sue B for C’s negligence.<sup>30</sup> The requirements of subs.1(3) are, in other words, additional to those of subs.1(2). Their operation may be illustrated by reference to the Midland Silicones case.<sup>31</sup> On the facts of that case, C would not be able to enforce the limitation clause since the contract between A and B contained no express reference to C (whether by name, by description or as a member of a class). In these circumstances, neither subsection would be satisfied: C would not be identified and this very fact would indicate that the contract did not purport to confer a benefit on him. Where a contract is (as it was in the Midland Silicones case) contained in or evidenced by a bill of lading, it is now likely to contain a Himalaya clause,<sup>32</sup> which would be likely adequately to identify C and confer a right on him to “enforce”<sup>33</sup> the limitation clause under subs.1(2). The question whether C is identified in such a way as to give him an enforceable right may itself raise a question of construction: e.g. where the words of the

<sup>27</sup> See above, pp.592–593.

<sup>28</sup> Thus cases such as London Drugs Ltd v Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299 (above, p.631) would not appear to be covered by the Act.

<sup>29</sup> A company which did not at the time of the contract exist could, on coming into existence, by virtue of subs.1(3) enforce a term made for its benefit (within subs.1(2)); but the rules relating to contracts made on behalf of such a company stated at pp.735–736, below would continue to govern the extent to which such a company could be bound by a contract made on its behalf: Report §§8.9 to 8.16.

<sup>30</sup> As, for example, in Adler v Dickson [1955] 1 Q.B. 158.

<sup>31</sup> [1962] A.C. 446; above, p.628.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.561.

<sup>33</sup> See s.1(6), above, p.652.

term are literally adequate to identify C but the term does not purport (or A and B do not intend) to confer a benefit on him.<sup>34</sup>

(d) REMEDIES. Where C has a right to enforce a term of the contract by virtue of subs.1(1) of the 1999 Act, he has this right in spite of the fact that he is not a party to the contract: the Act does not, in general, adopt the technique of transferring rights from B to C or of treating C as having acquired rights by means of the fiction that he has become a party to the contract.<sup>35</sup> It does, however, make use of such a fiction so far as C's remedies are concerned.<sup>36</sup> Subs.1(5) provides that "For the purpose of exercising his right to enforce a term of the contract, there shall be available to the third party any remedy that would have been available to him in an action for breach of contract if he had been a party to the contract (and the rules relating to damages, injunctions, specific performance and other relief shall apply accordingly)". It follows from this provision that C can invoke the same kinds of judicial remedies as would be available to B if no third party were involved, and that C can recover damages for loss of bargain (or "expectation" loss<sup>37</sup>) even though the bargain was made, not with him, but with B. It also follows that the same principles which would limit B's remedies in a two-party case apply to an action brought by C: for example, the principles of remoteness<sup>38</sup> and mitigation<sup>39</sup> and those which restrict the availability of specific relief.<sup>40</sup> The application of these principles may, however, lead to different practical results where the action is brought by C from those which would follow from them in an action brought by B. For example, in an action brought by C, the test of remoteness would be whether it was C's (not B's) loss which A ought reasonably have contemplated; the principles of mitigation would require the court to ask what steps C (not B) ought reasonably have taken to mitigate his loss; and the question whether specific relief should be refused on account of the conduct of the claimant could receive one answer where the action was brought by C and another if it were brought by B.

The contract containing the term which C seeks to enforce against A may also contain an arbitration clause amounting to a written arbitration agreement within the Arbitration Act 1996.<sup>41</sup> The 1999 Act provides that, if C seeks to enforce the former term against A, then C is to be treated as a party to the arbitration agreement.<sup>42</sup> It follows that, if C attempted to enforce that term by action, A could obtain a stay of that action under the 1996 Act and so secure compliance by C with the arbitration agreement. A contract between A and B may also provide that C is to be entitled to submit to arbitration some dispute between himself and A other than one concerning the enforcement by C against A of one of the other terms of the contract. Such an arbitration provision cannot compel C to resort to arbitration of (for example) a tort claim between himself and A. But if the provision is a term which C is entitled to enforce under s.1 of the 1999 Act and is also a written arbitration agreement within the Arbitration Act 1996 and C chooses to submit <sup>34</sup> Such a question could arise on facts such as those in Elder Dempster [1924] A.C. 522, where the form of bill of lading used seems to have been based on the assumption that the goods would be carried by B but they were in fact carried by C and the words of the exemption clause in the bill happened to be apt to refer also to C: see above, p.627.

<sup>35</sup> 1999 Act, s.7(4). This refers only to other legislation, but the principle that C is not to be treated as a party to the contract appears also to apply for the purpose of rules of common law: see below at n.45.

<sup>36</sup> Also for a number of other purposes relating to defences available to A against C: see s.3(4) and (6), below, pp.660–661; and to arbitration provisions: see s.8, below, p.656.

<sup>37</sup> See below, p.944.

<sup>38</sup> See below, p.965.

<sup>39</sup> See below, p.976.

<sup>40</sup> See below, p.1020; and cf. above p.1013. Report, §§3.32, 3.33.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.449.

<sup>42</sup> 1999 Act, s.8(1).

the dispute with A to arbitration, then C is treated for the purpose of the 1996 Act as a party to the arbitration agreement so that the arbitration proceedings will be governed by that Act.<sup>43</sup>

(e) NO REQUIREMENT OF CONSIDERATION MOVING FROM THIRD PARTY. The 1999 Act does not impose any requirement that consideration for A's promise must move from C. It does not contain any express provision to this effect<sup>44</sup>; but the consequence follows from the fact that the Act gives C the right to enforce the term and is further supported by the general principle that C is not to be treated as a party to the contract between A and B.<sup>45</sup> Since the promise in contracts of the kind in question is made to B, the fact that C need not provide any consideration for it is not strictly an exception to the rule that consideration need not move from the promisee, but it can be regarded as a quasi exception to that rule in the sense that C is a person in whose favour a promise is made and who can enforce it even though he may be no more than a gratuitous beneficiary.

(2) Right to rescind or vary the contract

Under the judge-made rules relating to contracts for the benefit of third parties, one objection to the creation of such rights has been that it would deprive the contracting parties of their right to rescind or vary the contract by mutual consent.<sup>46</sup> The 1999 Act deals with this problem by means of a compromise: it specifies the circumstances in which A and B prima facie lose this right, while it at the same time enables them so to draw up their contract so as to retain the right, or to change the prima facie rules laid down in the Act which specify when it is lost.

(a) GENERAL RULE: C'S CONSENT REQUIRED. The general rule, stated in subs.2(1) of the 1999 Act, is that, once C has acquired the right to enforce a term of the contract between A and B "under section 1", then, if one of the circumstances to be described below has arisen, A and B may not, without C's consent, by agreement rescind or vary the contract, or vary it so as to "extinguish or alter" C's entitlement. Rescission calls for no further comment here; but with regard to variation it should be noted that A and B are, under the general rule, precluded from varying the contract not only so as to extinguish but also so as to alter C's rights. An alteration may of course operate, not only to C's prejudice, but also to his advantage: e.g. where it purports to increase payments to be made to C under the term in question. Such a variation is unlikely to give rise to any problems between A and C, since C will presumably consent to it as soon as he hears of it. But the argument that C is entitled to enforce a term of a contract between A and B can also give rise to problems between one of these parties and outside interests: e.g. creditors of B in the event of B's insolvency.<sup>47</sup> Such persons may seek to invoke subs.2(1) where the variation increases C's rights but where, on the crucial date for the assertion of their rights, C has either not yet acquired any knowledge of the variation or has not yet made any communication to A or done any other act from which his assent to the variation can be inferred.

(i) C's assent to the term. The first of the circumstances in which A and B may not, without C's consent, agree to rescind the contract, or vary it in the ways described above,

<sup>43</sup> 1999 Act, s.8(2).

<sup>44</sup> Report §6.8 n.8.

<sup>45</sup> See above, at n.35.

<sup>46</sup> This has been one reason for the restrictions on the scope of the equitable exception to the doctrine of privity by way of trusts of promises: above, p.648.

<sup>47</sup> As, for example, in Re Schebsman [1944] Ch. 83, above, p.647.

arises where C has communicated his assent to the term to A<sup>48</sup>; communication to B does not suffice for this purpose.<sup>49</sup> The assent may be by words or conduct<sup>50</sup>; and if it is "sent" to A by post or other means, it is not regarded as communicated to him "until received by him".<sup>51</sup> In other words, the "posting" rule, as developed in cases of contract formation<sup>52</sup> does not apply in the present context. "Sent" here seems to refer to some act done by C in order to communicate words of assent to A. The rule relating to an assent "sent" to A by post or other means is negative in nature: it states that the assent is not communicated to A until received by him. It thus leaves open the question whether an assent which has been so sent can take effect before it has actually come to A's notice: e.g. where it has been delivered to his address but not yet been read by him. If the overriding requirement is one of communication, it may not be satisfied in such a case. The expression "sent" also does not seem to be appropriate to refer to an assent by conduct; but it seems that such an assent must come to A's notice: this seems to follow from the general requirement that C's assent must be "communicated"<sup>53</sup> to A. No formality (such as writing) is required even for an assent in words,<sup>54</sup> so that an oral communication suffices.

(ii) C's reliance. The right to rescind or vary the contract is also barred where A is aware of C's having relied on the term,<sup>55</sup> or where A could reasonably have foreseen such reliance and it has actually taken place.<sup>56</sup> It would seem that, in such cases, C may be entitled, not merely to the promised performance, but also to damages in respect of his reliance loss: e.g. where he has travelled to the place specified in the contract for the receipt by him of the promised performance. This follows from the rule laid down by the 1999 Act with respect to C's remedies<sup>57</sup>; it also follows from this rule that C could not claim under both heads to the extent to which such a combination of claims would result in double recovery or in his being placed in a better position than that in which he would have been if A had performed his promise in accordance with its original terms.<sup>58</sup>

(b) CONSEQUENCES OF ATTEMPTED RESCISSION OR VARIATION WITHOUT C'S CONSENT. The general rule in subs.2(1) is that A and B "may not" by agreement rescind the contract, or vary it in the ways described above, without C's consent. The most obvious consequence of this provision is that a purported rescission or variation without C's consent is simply ineffective, so that C can, in spite of it, enforce the term in question against A. But such enforcement may, because of the rescission, become a practical impossibility (e.g. because A has in consequence of the rescission put it out of his power to perform); and it is arguable that the purported rescission is also wrongful so as to give C a remedy in damages against B, perhaps on the analogy of liability for wrongful interference with contractual rights.<sup>59</sup> This possibility could have practical significance in the event of A's insolvency.

<sup>48</sup> s.2(1)(a).

<sup>49</sup> This follows from the words "to the promisor" in s.2(1)(a).

<sup>50</sup> s.2(2)(a).

<sup>51</sup> s.2(2)(b).

<sup>52</sup> See above, p.24.

<sup>53</sup> s.2(1)(a).

<sup>54</sup> Contrast Law of Property Act 1925, s.136(1) (below, p.676) requiring written notice of an assignment.

<sup>55</sup> s.2(1)(b).

<sup>56</sup> s.2(1)(c).

<sup>57</sup> s.1(5); above p.656.

<sup>58</sup> e.g. where it would have been necessary for C to incur the reliance expenditure in order to secure the benefit—perhaps by travelling to the place where it was to be conferred. cf. below, p.942.

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.619.

(c) CONTRACT CONFERRING CHOICES ON PROMISEE. Subs.2(1) of the 1999 Act deals with the situation in which C has become entitled to enforce a term of the contract “under section 1” and A and B then attempt by agreement to rescind or vary the contract. This situation must be distinguished from that in which A promises B to perform in favour of C or as B shall direct. If, in such a case, B directs A to perform in favour of D (or of B himself) the contract is not varied. On the contrary, it is performed in accordance with its original terms, under which B has a choice as to the person to whom performance is to be rendered. The case therefore does not fall within subs.2(1), so that the requirement of C’s consent, as there stated, does not apply.<sup>60</sup> Another way of explaining this conclusion is to say that, in the case put, the mere making of the promise was not intended to confer an indefeasible right on C; for the fact that B had power to divert the benefit away from C would indicate that A and B did not at this stage intend<sup>61</sup> the term to be enforceable by C if B exercised that power. A term of the present kind might, however, also limit B’s power to divert the benefit away from C: e.g. by providing that the power was to be exercisable only for a specified period. After the end of the period, C could no longer be deprived of the benefit of A’s promise by the unilateral act of B since the consent of A and B would then as a matter of common law be necessary to vary the contract; and any such variation would then be subject to the requirement of C’s consent under subs.2(1).

(d) CONTRARY PROVISION IN THE CONTRACT. The general requirement of C’s consent, imposed by subs.2(1), may be displaced by an express term of the contract. Two possibilities are envisaged.

The first, stated in subs.2(3)(a), is for such an express term to state that A and B may by agreement rescind or vary the contract without the consent of C. A and B can then rescind or vary the contract by agreement in spite of the fact that C has acquired a right under subs.1(1) and in spite of the fact that the circumstances specified in subs.2(1) have occurred: that is, even after communication of assent by C to A, or after reliance by C of which A is aware or which he could reasonably have been expected to foresee. It is not entirely clear whether it is enough for the express term to provide that A and B may by agreement rescind or vary the contract or whether it must go on to say in so many words that they may do so without the consent of C; but to be sure of achieving the desired result, A and B would be well advised to use the latter form of words.

The second possibility, stated in subs.2(3)(b), is for the express term to provide that the consent of C is required in circumstances other than those specified in subs.2(1). For example, the term might provide that such consent was required only for a specified period or that it must be given in a specified form (e.g. by registered letter). Again effect would be given to such provisions, so that in the first of our two examples C’s consent would no longer be needed (even after the circumstances described in subs.2(1) had occurred) after the end of the period; and in the second it would be ineffective if not given in the specified form.

(e) JUDICIAL DISCRETION TO DISPENSE WITH CONSENT. Subs.2(4) give the court power, on the application of A and B, to dispense with the requirement of C’s consent to a rescission or variation of the contract in two situations: (a) where C’s consent cannot be obtained because “his whereabouts cannot reasonably be ascertained”; or (b) where he is mentally incapable of giving his consent. On a similar principle, the court has under subs.2(5) the same power where it is alleged that C’s consent is required because A could reasonably have foreseen that C would rely on the term<sup>62</sup> but it cannot reasonably be ascertained whether he has in fact relied on it. Where the court under these provisions dispenses with C's consent, it may order compensation to be paid to him<sup>63</sup>; such an order may presumably be made against either A or B or both of them.

<sup>60</sup> cf. Report, §10.30.

<sup>61</sup> Within s.1(2).

(3) Promisor's defences against third party

S.3 of the 1999 Act contains an elaborate set of provisions which specify matters on which A can rely by way of defence, set-off or counterclaim against C in an action by C for the enforcement, "in reliance on section 1",<sup>64</sup> of a term of the contract between A and B.

(a) GENERAL PRINCIPLE. The starting principle, stated in subs.3(2), is that A can rely by way of defence or set-off on any matter that "arises from or in connection with the contract [between A and B] and is relevant to the term" and would have been available to A if the proceedings (to enforce the term) had been brought by B. Under this principle, A could, for example, rely against C on a valid exemption clause in the contract between A and B<sup>65</sup>; and on the fact that the contract was void for mistake or voidable for misrepresentation, or that it had been frustrated or that A was justified in refusing to perform it on account of B's repudiatory breach.

(b) CONTRARY PROVISION. This general principle can, however, be excluded by a contrary provision in the contract: i.e. by a term in the contract between A and B that A is not to be entitled to rely on such matters against C<sup>66</sup>; though where the contract between A and B was wholly void such a term would appear to be of no more effect than the rest of the purported contract. The general principle can, conversely, be extended by an express term in the contract. Subs.3(3) provides that A can (in addition to the matters referred to in subs.3(2)) rely by way of defence or set-off against C on any matter if "an express term of the contract provides for it to be available to him in proceedings brought by" C and it would have been so available to A in proceedings brought by B. Under this provision, A could rely against C on debts owed by B to A even though the debts arose out of other transactions, if the contract containing the term which C was seeking to enforce contained an express term that A was to be entitled to rely on those debts also against C.

(c) DEFENCES AGAINST C ONLY. There is the further possibility that A may have defences or counterclaims against C which he would not have against B: e.g., where A had been induced to enter into the contract by C's misrepresentation, or where C was indebted to A under another transaction. Subs.3(4) enables A to rely on such matters against C if they could have been so relied on if C had been a party to the contract; though this rule, like the general principle stated in subs.3(2), can be modified or excluded by an express term of the contract between A and B.<sup>67</sup>

(d) RELIANCE ON EXEMPTION CLAUSES. A rule analogous to the general principle of subs.3(2) applies where the "enforcement" of the term by C takes the form of his availing himself of an exemption or limitation clause in his favour in the contract

<sup>62</sup> See s.2(1)(c).

<sup>63</sup> s.2(6).

<sup>64</sup> s.3(1).

<sup>65</sup> cf. Report, §10.31.

<sup>66</sup> s.3(5).

<sup>67</sup> s.3(5) applies to subsection 3(4) as well as to subsection 3(2).

between A and B.<sup>68</sup> Subs.3(6) provides that C cannot in this way “enforce” the term if he could not have done so, had he been a party to the contract. This restriction on C’s right to enforce the term would, for example, apply if, by reason of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977<sup>69</sup> the clause had been invalid or if it had not satisfied the requirement of reasonableness as imposed by that Act; or if C was guilty of a fraud on A and so could not have relied on the term (even though B might have been able to do so) by reason of the common law rule that an exemption clause does not protect a party from liability for his own fraud.<sup>70</sup>

(4) Exceptions to third party’s entitlement

A number of situations which prima facie fall within s.1 of the 1999 Act are excepted by s.6 from the operation of s.1. These exceptions fall into two groups. In cases which fall within the first group, C has, or can acquire, rights under the contract between A and B by virtue of some other rule of law; and the purpose of excepting these cases from the operation of s.1 is to preserve the conditions under which C’s rights arise or may arise under those other rules of law. In cases which fall within the second group, by contrast, C has prima facie no rights under other rules of law; and the purpose of excepting these cases from the operation of s.1 is to preserve in them the general rule of common law by which C acquires no rights under the contract between A and B. Such cases, in other words, continue to be governed by the common law doctrine of privity, subject to any limitations on its scope and to any exceptions to it that may exist at common law or under other legislation.

The first of the above group of exceptions includes contracts on bills of exchange, promissory notes and other negotiable instruments<sup>71</sup>: third parties can acquire rights under such contracts under the rules relating to negotiability, discussed elsewhere in this book, and it is not the purpose of the 1999 Act to extend these rights.<sup>72</sup> It also includes contracts for the carriage of goods by sea which are governed by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, and corresponding electronic transactions to which that Act may be applied by Order.<sup>73</sup> The carefully regulated scheme of the 1924 Act<sup>74</sup> for the acquisition of rights under such contracts by third parties (such as transferees of bills of lading) would be seriously disrupted if such third parties could acquire rights under the 1999 Act in circumstances in which no such rights would be acquired under the 1924 Act. The same is (mutatis mutandis) true of contracts for the international carriage of goods by rail, road and air, which are governed by international conventions having the force of law in the United Kingdom,<sup>75</sup> so that these contracts are likewise excepted from the operation of s.1 of the 1999 Act.<sup>76</sup> The exception is, however, in turn, subject to an exception: C is not precluded from taking the benefit of an exemption or limitation clause in a contract for the carriage of goods governed by the 1924 Act or by the international conventions referred to above merely because such legislation applies to the contract.<sup>77</sup> Before the 1999 Act, C could in many cases take the benefit of an exemption or limitation clause in the contract of carriage e.g. where that contract

<sup>68</sup> See s.1(6), above p.653.

<sup>69</sup> See above, pp.246 et seq.; Report, §10.22.

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.242.

<sup>71</sup> s.6(1).

<sup>72</sup> See below, p.691; Report, §12.16.

<sup>73</sup> s.6(5).

<sup>74</sup> For details of this scheme, see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed.), §§5–008 et seq.

<sup>75</sup> See Chitty on Contracts (28th ed.), Vol.II, Chaps 35 and 36.

<sup>76</sup> s.6(5)(b) and 8.

<sup>77</sup> s.6(5), “tailpiece”.

contained a Himalaya clause.<sup>78</sup> The legal reasoning on which this result was based was that a separate or collateral contract arose by virtue of such a clause between A and C.<sup>79</sup> Since C is a party to this contract, his right to “enforce” it does not depend (in the words of the present exception) on any “reliance on . . . section” 1.<sup>80</sup> The effectiveness of Himalaya clauses would therefore not be directly affected by the present exception<sup>81</sup> to a third party’s entitlement under s.1 to “enforce” an exemption or limitation clause. But one of the objects of the 1999 Act appears to have been to simplify the drafting of Himalaya clauses and to remove obstacles to their efficacy which might be encountered in establishing the separate contract between A and C<sup>82</sup>; and it is for this reason that the present exception to the operation of s.1 does not apply to exemption and limitation clauses in contracts of carriage which, for other purposes, fall within that exception.

The second of the groups of exceptions described above includes the contract which binds a company and its members on the terms of the memorandum and articles of association, when these documents are registered, by virtue of s.14 of the Companies Act 1985. The purpose of this exception is presumably to preserve the established limitations of the scope of this “statutory contract”<sup>83</sup>: e.g. the rule that this contract confers no rights on a director of the company as such.<sup>84</sup> The second group also includes contracts of employment and certain analogous contracts to the extent that such a contract will not give the employer’s customer any right under s.1 of the 1999 Act to enforce any term of the contract against the employee.<sup>85</sup>

(5) Third party’s other rights unaffected

Subs.7(1) of the 1999 Act provides that “Section 1 does not affect any right or remedy of a third party that exists or is available apart from this Act”. It follows that C will continue, after the coming into force of the Act, to be able to enforce rights and to rely on defences arising under a contract between A and B, if before then he could have done so under exceptions to the doctrine of privity established at common law, in equity or under other legislation, or if he could have done so because the case fell outside the scope of the doctrine of privity of contract: these possibilities are discussed elsewhere in this Chapter.<sup>86</sup> C will, for example, continue to be able to enforce a promise made by A to B if there is a trust of the promise in his favour<sup>87</sup>; he will be able to rely on Himalaya clauses and on other common law and statutory rules under which the benefit of an exemption clause in a contract between A and B is available to him<sup>88</sup>; and he will continue to be able to enforce collateral contracts between himself and A.<sup>89</sup> Indeed, in some such cases the person seeking to enforce the term is not truly a “third party” within the 1999 Act.<sup>90</sup> The whole point of the collateral contract device is to establish a direct contractual relationship between the parties that have here been called A and C;

<sup>78</sup> See above, p.631.

<sup>79</sup> See above, pp.632, 634.

<sup>80</sup> s.1(1) confers a right of enforcement only on a “person who is not a party” to the contract.

<sup>81</sup> i.e., that contained in s.6(5) of the 1999 Act.

<sup>82</sup> See Report §§2.35, 12.10; for the complexity of the drafting of Himalaya clauses and the difficulties which arise, or are thought to arise, in satisfying the common law requirement of a separate contract between A and C, see above, pp.632–635.

<sup>83</sup> Soden v British & Commonwealth Holdings [1998] A.C. 298 at 323.

<sup>84</sup> See above, p.586.

<sup>85</sup> ss.6(3) and (4).

<sup>86</sup> See above, pp.606 et seq.; below, pp.666 et seq.

<sup>87</sup> See above, pp.646 et seq.

<sup>88</sup> See above, p.631 et seq.

<sup>89</sup> See above, pp.582 et seq.

<sup>90</sup> s.1(1) (“not a party . . .”).

and the legal basis for the efficacy of Himalaya clauses is similarly that a contract of some kind comes into existence between A and C, though this is not the same as "the contract" (i.e. that between A and B) containing the term which C is seeking to enforce.<sup>91</sup> Subs.7(1) also preserves any rights which C may have to sue A in tort in respect of loss suffered by C in consequence of A's breach of his contract with B; we have seen that in such cases C will often have no rights under the 1999 Act.<sup>92</sup> The subsection also leaves it open to the courts to develop new exceptions at common law to the doctrine of privity of contract.<sup>93</sup>

Although subs.7(1) in terms states only that "Section 1" does not affect other rights and remedies available to C, it follows from the structure of the 1999 Act that many of its other provisions will likewise not apply where C's rights against A arise apart from the Act. Of particular significance are the points that the rules as to rescission and variation, contained in s.2, and the rules as to defences and related matters, contained in s.3, will not so apply, since s.2 applies only "where a third party has a right under section 1 to enforce a term of the contract"<sup>94</sup> and s.3 applies only "where, in reliance on section 1, proceedings for the enforcement of a term of a contract are brought by a third party".<sup>95</sup>

The structure resulting from the above distinctions is therefore a complex one. Four types of cases call for consideration. The first is that in which C has rights under the 1999 Act but none at common law because the case falls within the scope of the doctrine of privity of contract but not within any of the judge-made or other legislative exceptions to it. Here C's rights and remedies are clearly subject to the provisions of the Act. The second is the case in which C has no rights under the Act (either because the requirements of its s.1 are not satisfied or because one of the exceptions listed in its s.6 applies) but in which he does have rights apart from the Act, because the case falls either outside the scope of the doctrine of privity of contract or within one of the judge-made or other legislative exceptions to it. Here the rights and remedies to which C is entitled are clearly not subject to the provisions of the Act.<sup>96</sup> The third is the case in which C has rights both under the Act and apart from it (because the case falls outside the scope of the doctrine of privity of contract or within one of the judge-made or other legislative exceptions to it). It would seem that in such a case C can choose between making his claim under the Act (and so subject to its provisions) and apart from the Act (and so not subject to its provisions). If, for example, C has a cause of action against A in tort at common law, it may be to C's advantage to pursue that claim (rather than one which may also be prima facie available to him under s.1) since in making such a common law claim he would not, in general, be bound by an exemption clause in the contract between A and B, while he would be so bound if he made a claim under the Act.<sup>97</sup> The fourth is the case in which C has no rights under the Act and none under the existing rules of common law or under other legislative exceptions to the doctrine of privity of contract. Here, C's only hope is to induce the court to create a new exception to the doctrine of privity<sup>98</sup> or (in the House of Lords) to reject that doctrine altogether. If C's claim were

<sup>91</sup> See p.634, above.

<sup>92</sup> See above, p.654.

<sup>93</sup> See below, at n.98.

<sup>94</sup> s.2(1).

<sup>95</sup> s.3(1).

<sup>96</sup> White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207 (above, p.616) illustrates this possibility.

<sup>97</sup> s.3(2), above, p.660.

<sup>98</sup> e.g. perhaps, to follow the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in London Drugs Ltd v Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299 in recognising, at least to a limited extent, the principle of vicarious immunity: see above, p.631.

upheld on one of these grounds, it would plainly not be subject to the provisions of the 1999 Act.

(6) Nature of the third party's rights

Although the 1999 Act for a number of purposes<sup>99</sup> makes use of the fiction of treating C as if he were a party to the contract, it in general treats C's rights and defences as being sui generis. It does not, in other words, except for those purposes treat C as if he were or were deemed to be, or to have become, a party to the contract. In particular, the Act provides that C is not to be treated as a party to the contract between A and B for the purposes of other legislation.<sup>1</sup> For example, the references to a party or to the parties to a contract in the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943<sup>2</sup> and in the Misrepresentation Act 1967<sup>3</sup> do not, under the Act include references to C. The same is true of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. The point can be illustrated by supposing that a contract was made between A and B on A's standard terms of business, that a term of this contract conferred a benefit on C, that this term was enforceable by C by virtue of s.1 of the Act, and that the contract contained a term excluding or restricting A's liability for defects in the performance rendered to C. The requirement of reasonableness under s.3 of the 1977 Act<sup>4</sup> would not apply in favour of C since he was not one of the parties to the contract between A and B, or a party who had dealt on A's standard terms: the requirement would apply only in favour of B.<sup>5</sup> The justification given by the Law Commission for this position is that to apply the 1977 Act in a three-party case would raise complex policy issues going beyond those involved in reforming the doctrine of privity.<sup>6</sup>

(7) Effect on Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.2

The relationship between the 1999 Act and the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 gives rise to the further difficulty that, under s.2(1) of that Act,<sup>7</sup> contract terms may be void if they purport to exclude or restrict liability for death or personal injury resulting from negligence; and that under s.2(2)<sup>8</sup> contract terms may be subject to the requirement of reasonableness if they purport to exclude or restrict liability for negligence in respect of other loss. Negligence here can include the breach of a contractual duty of care,<sup>9</sup> so that a claim by C affected by s.2 of the 1977 Act could be brought either under the 1999 Act or in tort, apart from the Act. Where it is brought under the latter Act, a compromise solution is adopted for cases of the kind here under discussion, i.e. for those in which C sues A for breach of a duty of care arising out of a contract between A and B, and A seeks <sup>99</sup> See s.1(5), relating to C's remedies: above, p.656; s.3(4), relating to certain defences and s.3(6), relating to restrictions on the availability of exemption clauses: above, pp.660–661; for a different technique, see s.7(3), relating to limitation of actions and s.8, relating to arbitration agreements (above, p.604).

<sup>1</sup> 1999 Act, s.7(4). This provides that C is not to be so treated "by virtue of section 1(5) or 3(4) or 3(6)", above n.99. No reference is made in s.7(4) to s.8, above n.99, by virtue of which C is treated as a party to an arbitration agreement for the purposes of the Arbitration Act 1996: see above, p.656.

<sup>2</sup> See below, pp.911 et seq.

<sup>3</sup> See above, pp.350 et seq.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.253.

<sup>5</sup> Report, §13.10; for B's right of enforcement, see below, p.665.

<sup>6</sup> Report, §13.10(vii) and (viii).

<sup>7</sup> See above, p.249.

<sup>8</sup> See above, pp.252–253.

<sup>9</sup> Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.1(1)(a).

to rely on a term of that contract as excluding or restricting his liability for negligence.<sup>10</sup> Where C in consequence of the breach suffers death or personal injury, the strong policy considerations against contract terms excluding or restricting A's liability for such harm are to prevail, so that nothing in the 1999 Act will affect C's right to impugn the validity of a term excluding or restricting A's liability for such harm under s.2(1) of the 1977 Act. But where C suffers other loss, the case is regarded as more closely analogous to the situation (described above) that can arise under s.3 of the 1977 Act. Subs.7(2) of the 1998 Bill therefore provides that s.2(2) of the 1977 Act is not to apply where A's alleged negligence consists of the breach of an obligation arising from a term of a contract (between A and B) and the claim by C is brought in reliance on s.1 of the 1999 Act. In such an action, therefore, a term in that contract excluding or restricting A's liability for loss other than death or personal injury is not subject to the requirement of reasonableness under the 1977 Act.

(8) Promisee's rights

(a) IN GENERAL. At common law, the doctrine of privity of contract does not preclude the promisee from enforcing the contract<sup>11</sup> and this position is preserved by s.4 of the 1999 Act, by which "Section 1 does not affect any right of the promisee to enforce any term of the contract". The contract between A and B can thus be enforced by B even where the 1999 Act also gives C the right to enforce one of its terms against A. On A's failure to perform that term in favour of C, B can therefore make any claims for the agreed sum, for other specific relief or for damages that would have been available to him at common law apart from the Act. There is also nothing in the Act that affects B's right to restitution<sup>12</sup> against A in the event of the latter's non-performance of the term in favour of C, even though B's right to restitution would not normally be a "right of [B] to enforce a term of the contract" within s.4: it would have this character only where the contract provided for the return by A of the consideration provided by B to A in the event of A's failure to perform in favour of C. The 1999 Act also contains nothing to affect the common law rules which govern the relative rights of B and C where A has performed, or is willing to perform, in favour of C.<sup>13</sup>

(b) PROVISION AGAINST DOUBLE LIABILITY. At common law, A's failure to perform in favour of C may, in circumstances discussed earlier in this Chapter,<sup>14</sup> give B a right to recover damages in respect of C's loss or in respect of expenses incurred by B in making good A's default: e.g. in completing A's unfinished, or in repairing A's defective, work. If, after B had recovered such damages, C were to make a claim against A under s.1 of the 1999 Act, there would be a risk of A's being made liable twice over for the same loss. S.5 of the Act therefore directs the court in such circumstances "to reduce any award to [C] to such extent as it thinks appropriate to take account of the sum recovered by" B. Such a reduction would not prejudice C since, where damages had been recovered by B in respect of C's loss, these would have to be held by B for C<sup>15</sup>; and where B had incurred expense in curing A's breach, C's loss would be reduced in fact by his receipt

<sup>10</sup> See Report, §13.12.

<sup>11</sup> See above, p.590.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.590.

<sup>13</sup> See above, pp.604 et seq.

<sup>14</sup> See above, pp.593 et seq.

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.605.

of the intended benefit,<sup>16</sup> though by a route other than that envisaged by the contract. S.5 of the Act applies only where B has recovered “a sum” (i.e. of money) in respect of C’s loss or B’s expense in making good A’s default. Thus it will normally apply where B has recovered damages, though the possibility of its also applying where B has recovered the agreed sum or where he has made a successful claim for restitution does not appear to be excluded. It will not, however, apply where B has obtained an order for the specific performance of an obligation by A to render some performance to C other than the payment of money, or where B has obtained an injunction to enforce a negative promise made by A for the benefit of C. In such cases, C will obtain the performance due to him under the term made enforceable by him by virtue of s.1 and so will not have any right to damages for its non-performance. But C might, in addition to the receipt of the performance, claim damages from A, e.g., in respect of delay in rendering the performance. Such a claim is not, and should not be, affected by s.5 of the 1999 Act since its success would not make A liable twice over for the same loss.

3. Other Statutory Exceptions

A number of other exceptions to the doctrine of privity have been created by statute<sup>17</sup> and will continue to be available to the third party after the coming into force of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Bill 1998.<sup>18</sup> The most important of these are the following:

(1) Insurance

The doctrine of privity applies to contracts of insurance.<sup>19</sup> It was in practice much modified in this field by the trust device and by agency; but the inadequacy of these exceptions has led to the creation of further exceptions to the doctrine by statute.

(a) LIFE INSURANCE. S.11 of the Married Women’s Property Act 1882<sup>20</sup> provides that where a man insures his life for the benefit of his wife or children, or where a woman insures her life for the benefit of her husband or children,<sup>21</sup> the policy “shall create a trust in favour of the objects therein named”. This is a good provision so far as it goes, but it is subject to some odd limitations. It applies only where a person insures his or her own life, and not where the policy is on the life of the third party<sup>22</sup>; and it is restricted to policies for the benefit of spouses and children, so that it does not apply in favour of other dependants, such as informally adopted children.<sup>23</sup> These restrictions will not be affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999<sup>24</sup>; but persons who have no rights under s.11 of the 1882 Act may, if the requirements of the 1999 Act are satisfied,

<sup>16</sup> cf. below, p.980.

<sup>17</sup> A statutory exception to the doctrine enabling price maintenance agreements to be enforced against third parties formerly existed by virtue of Resale Prices Act 1976, s.26; but that Act has been repealed by the s.1 of the Competition Act 1998 which makes no similar provision where such agreements are exempted (under ss.4 to 9) from prima facie invalidity under s.2.

<sup>18</sup> s.7(1).

<sup>19</sup> See Boston Fruit Co v British & Foreign Marine Insurance Co [1906] A.C. 336; Yangtze Insurance Association v Lukmanjee [1918] A.C. 585. Contrast, in Australia, Trident General Ins Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 C.L.R. 107 (above, p.590).

<sup>20</sup> Replacing Married Women’s Property Act 1870, s.10.

<sup>21</sup> Illegitimate children are included: Family Law Reform Act 1969, s.19(1).

<sup>22</sup> Re Engelbach’s Estate [1924] 2 Ch. 348, overruled on another point in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58.

<sup>23</sup> Re Clay’s Policy of Assurance [1937] 2 All E.R. 548.

<sup>24</sup> Law Com. No. 242, §12.27.

acquire the more restricted<sup>25</sup> rights conferred on third parties by that Act. They may also have rights under the trust exception to the doctrine of privity.<sup>26</sup>

(b) MOTOR INSURANCE. In Williams v Baltic Insurance Co<sup>27</sup> it was held that the owner of a car may be trustee of his motor insurance policy for a person driving his car with his consent. By statute such a person can now take the benefit of the owner's insurance policy without having to prove that the owner intended to constitute himself trustee.<sup>28</sup>

(c) FIRE INSURANCE. Where a house which is insured is destroyed by fire, "any person . . . interested" may require the insurance money to be laid out towards reinstating the house<sup>29</sup>; thus a tenant may claim under his landlord's insurance,<sup>30</sup> and a landlord under his tenant's insurance.

(d) INSURANCE BY PERSONS WITH LIMITED INTERESTS. A person may insure property for its full value although he has only a limited interest in it. He may then be able to recover its full value from the insurers but be liable to pay over to the other persons interested any sum exceeding his own loss.<sup>31</sup> A number of real or supposed limitations on this principle have been removed by statute. Thus it has been provided that any person who has an interest in the subject-matter of a policy of marine insurance can insure "on behalf of and for the benefit of other persons interested as well as for his own benefit".<sup>32</sup> On a somewhat similar principle, where property is sold and suffers damage before the sale is completed, any insurance money to which the vendor is entitled in respect of the damage must be held by him for the purchaser, and be paid over to the purchaser on completion.<sup>33</sup>

(e) SOLICITORS' INDEMNITY INSURANCE. Under s.37 of the Solicitors Act 1974, a scheme has been established by the Law Society for the compulsory insurance of solicitors against liability for professional negligence or breach of duty. The scheme takes the form of a contract between the Society and insurers whereby the insurers undertake,

<sup>25</sup> e.g. powers of rescission or variation under s.2 of the 1999 Act do not apply where a trust has arisen under s.11 of the 1882 Act; cf. above, p.664.

<sup>26</sup> Re Foster's Policy [1966] 1 W.L.R. 222; above p.647.

<sup>27</sup> [1924] 2 K.B. 282.

<sup>28</sup> Road Traffic Act 1988, s.148(7), replacing Road Traffic Act 1930, s.36(4), discussed in Tattersall v Drysdale [1935] 2 K.B. 174; Austin v Zurich, etc., Insurance Co [1944] 2 All E.R. 243 at 248.

<sup>29</sup> Fires Prevention (Metropolis) Act 1774, s.83.

<sup>30</sup> Portavon Cinema Co Ltd v Price and Century Insurance Co [1939] 4 All E.R. 601; Mark Rowlands Ltd v Berni Inns Ltd [1986] Q.B. 211; Lonsdale & Thompson Ltd v Black Arrow Group plc [1993] Ch. 361.

<sup>31</sup> Waters v Monarch Insurance Co (1856) 5 E. & B. 870; Hepburn v Tomlinson (Hauliers) Ltd [1966] A.C. 451; Lonsdale Thompson Ltd v Black Arrow Group plc, above n.30; Glengate Properties Ltd v Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society [1996] 2 All E.R. 487 at 497; Sumitomo Bank Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert S.A [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487 at 495; cf. Petrofina (UK) Ltd v Magnaload Ltd [1984] Q.B. 127 (head contractor insuring for the benefit of himself and sub-contractors); contrast Stone Vickers Ltd v Appledore Ferguson Shipbuilders Ltd [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 578, where the main contractors' insurance did not cover the subcontractors since the main contractors had no authority or intention to contract on behalf of the subcontractors; for similar reasoning, see Colonia Versicherung AG v Amoco Oil Co [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 261 at 270-272; and see Simon Container Machinery Ltd v Emba Machinery AB [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 428, at 437.

<sup>32</sup> Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.14(2).

<sup>33</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.47; reversing the rule in Rayner v Preston (1881) 18 Ch.D. 1; the section applies to all kinds of "property." For the definition of "property" see ibid. s.205(1) (xx). In contracts for the sale of land, s.47 appears to be commonly excluded: see Law Com. No. 191 para.3.2. cf. also Law of Property Act 1925, s.108 as to the application of insurance money where property is mortgaged.

on being paid the appropriate premiums, to provide indemnity insurance to solicitors. It has been held that the scheme gives rise to reciprocal rights and duties between the insurers and solicitors.<sup>34</sup> This result follows “by virtue of public law, not the ordinary English private law of contract”<sup>35</sup>; for in operating the scheme the Society acts, not in its private capacity as a professional association, but in its public capacity as a body one of whose functions is to protect members of the public against loss which they may suffer from dealings with solicitors.

(f) THIRD PARTIES’ RIGHTS AGAINST INSURERS. Our concern here is not with insurance contracts which purport to confer benefits on third parties, but with those which insure the policy-holder against liability to third parties. By statute<sup>36</sup> such a third party may in certain circumstances<sup>37</sup> enforce the rights of the insured under the policy by proceeding directly against the insurance company. In the case of victims of motor accidents, these rights are supplemented by an agreement originally made between the Motor Insurers’ Bureau and the Minister of Transport.<sup>38</sup> This provides that the Bureau will pay any judgment (to the extent to which it remains unsatisfied) “in respect of any liability which is required to be covered by a policy of insurance” under the statutory scheme of compulsory motor insurance. A person who is injured in a road accident cannot technically enforce the agreement as he is not a party to it. But the agreement may be specifically enforced by the Minister,<sup>39</sup> and, although “the foundations in jurisprudence” of the agreement “are better not questioned”,<sup>40</sup> the Bureau’s practice is

<sup>34</sup> Smain v Law Society [1983] 1 A.C. 598.

<sup>35</sup> ibid. at 611.

<sup>36</sup> Third Parties (Rights Against Insurers) Act 1930, s.1; Road Traffic Act 1988, ss.151–153, as amended by Road Traffic Act, s.48 and Sch.4, para.66 and s.83 and Sch.8 (giving rights to the third party against the insurer in respect of liability covered by the terms of the policy even though the insurer is entitled to avoid liability under it for breach of condition by the insured: see Motor & General Insurance Co Ltd v Paty [1994] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 607, decided under similar, though not identical, legislation in force in Trinidad and Tobago); Michel, [1987] L.M.C.L.Q. 228; and see Policyholders Protection Act 1975, s.7 for the rights of such persons if the company is in liquidation.

<sup>37</sup> Normid Housing Association v R John Ralphs [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 265; Bradley v Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd [1989] A.C. 957 (third party unable to sue insurer where insured had gone into liquidation before liability was established); Duncan Stevenson MacMillan v A W Knott Becker Scott Ltd [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 98; Lefevre v White [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 569 at 577; The Fanti and the Padre Island [1991] 2 A.C. 1; Cox v Bankside [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 437 at 457, 466–467; Total Graphics Ltd v AGF Insurance Ltd [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 599 at 606; Schiffahrtsgesellschaft Detlev von Appen GmbH v Alpine Intertrading GmbH [1997] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 279 at 285; cf. Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd v Provincial Insurance plc [1994] 1 A.C. 130, where the issue of contribution between insurers arose under legislation in force in the Bahamas giving third parties direct rights against insurers; Nigel Upchurch Associates v Aldridge Estates Investment Co Ltd [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 53; (third party held to have no right against insurer until the latter’s liability to insured had been established); Charlton v Fisher [2001] EWCA Civ 112; [2002] Q.B. 578 at [96] (third party has no claim under the 1930 Act where the insured’s claim against the insurer would fail on grounds of public policy since “as statutory assignee under the 1930 Act the third party simply stands in the shoes of the insured”). This topic is not covered by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: see Law Com. No. 242, §12.21. For proposals for reform (relating largely to the procedure for enforcing such claims), see Law Com. Report No.272 (2001).

<sup>38</sup> For the text of the agreement and of a supplementary agreement, see Hardy v MIB [1964] 2 Q.B. 745 at 770; White v London Transport [1971] 2 Q.B. 721 at 729 Evans v MIB, The Times, November 10, 1997. The current agreements are published by HMSO under the titles Motor Insurers’ Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Untraced Drivers) (1972) and Motor Insurers’ Bureau (Compensation of Victims of Uninsured Drivers) (1988). For the interpretation of the 1998 agreement, see White v White [2001] UKHL 9; [2001] 1 W.L.R. 481; and see ibid. at [7] for a further “supplemental agreement” of August 13, 1999.

<sup>39</sup> See Gurtner v Circuit [1968] 2 Q.B. 587.

<sup>40</sup> Gardner v Moore [1984] A.C. 548 at 556.

not to rely on the doctrine of privity as a defence to claims by the injured parties themselves.<sup>41</sup>

(2) Law of Property Act 1925, s.56<sup>42</sup>

At common law a person could not take an immediate interest in property, or the benefit of any covenant, under an indenture purporting to be inter partes, unless he was named as a party to the indenture.<sup>43</sup> An indenture was a deed whose top was indented to match with a counterpart, as a precaution against fraud. It was said to be "inter partes" if it was expressed to be "between A of the first part, B of the second part . . ." etc. The common law rule did not apply to deeds poll (deeds with a smooth top) or to indentures not inter partes.<sup>44</sup> In the case of such deeds the grantee never had to be named as a party; and it was eventually settled that he need not be named at all, so long as he was sufficiently designated.<sup>45</sup> Deeds no longer have to be indented for any purposes,<sup>46</sup> but the law still distinguishes between deeds inter partes and other deeds and the distinction seems to retain some practical significance.<sup>47</sup>

The common law rule with regard to indentures inter partes was modified by s.5 of the Real Property Act 1845,<sup>48</sup> which was in turn replaced by s.56(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, which provides: "A person may take an immediate or other interest in land or other property, or the benefit of any condition, right of entry, covenant or agreement over or respecting land or other property, although he may not be named as a party to the conveyance or other instrument". The 1925 Act further defines "property" to include "any thing in action".<sup>49</sup> In Beswick v Beswick Lord Denning M.R. and Danckwerts L.J. held that a promise in writing by A to B to pay a sum of money to C would, by virtue of this definition of "property", be within s.56(1) and so give C a right to sue A.<sup>50</sup> In their view, s.56(1) was a "clear" provision to this effect, doing away with the doctrine of privity where the contract is written. But the words "although he may not be named as

<sup>41</sup> Persson v London County Buses [1974] 1 W.L.R. 569; and see Hardy v MIB, above, n.38, at 757; Randall v MIB [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1900; Porter v Addo [1978] R.T.R. 503; for enforceability of the agreement by third parties, see also Charlton v Fisher [2001] EWCA Civ 112; [2002] Q.B. 578 at [25], [82]. As the Bureau is, therefore, interested in the outcome of litigation between the injured party and the driver, it may, at the court's discretion, be added as a party to such litigation: see Gurtner v Circuit [1968] 2 Q.B. 587; contrast White v London Transport [1971] 2 Q.B. 721. Notice of proceedings against the driver must be served on the Bureau in respect of claims against it: Cambridge v Callaghan, The Times, March 21, 1997.

<sup>42</sup> Elliot, 20 Conv. 43, 114; Andrews, 23 Conv. 179; Wade [1964] C.L.J. 66; Furmston, 23 M.L.R. 380–385; Ellinger, 26 M.L.R. 396; all these comments on s.56(1) must now be read in the light of the decision of the House of Lords, in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58.

<sup>43</sup> Scudamore v Vandenstene (1587) 2 Colnst. 673; Storer v Gordon (1814) 3 M. & S. 308; Berkeley v Hardy (1826) 5 B. & C. 355; Southampton v Brown (1827) 6 B. & C. 718; Gardner v Lachlan (1836) 8 Sim. 123.

<sup>44</sup> Cooker v Child (1673) 2 Lev. 74; Chelsea & Waltham Green Building Soc v Armstrong [1951] Ch. 853.

<sup>45</sup> Sunderland Marine Insurance Co v Kearney (1851) 16 Q.B. 925; qualifying Green v Horn (1694) 1 Salk. 197.

The old rule relating to indentures inter partes appears still to apply to deeds inter partes in cases falling outside s.56(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925; see Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 104.

<sup>46</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.56(2).

<sup>47</sup> See n.45, above.

<sup>48</sup> Replacing s.11 of the Land Transfer Act 1844, which was not restricted to real property. For the history of this change, see Davidson's Concise Precedents in Conveyancing (2nd ed., 1845), pp.10 et seq.; Treitel, 30 M.L.R. 687, 688–689. S.5 of the 1845 Act applied only to real property: Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58, 87, 104, and, in the case of covenants, to those which run with the land: Forster v Elvett Colliery Co Ltd [1908] 1 K.B. 629 (in the House of Lords, Lord Macnaghten reserved the point: Dyson v Forster [1909] A.C. 98 at 102); Grant v Edmonton [1931] 1 Ch. 1.

<sup>49</sup> s.205(1)(xx).

<sup>50</sup> [1966] Ch. 538; see also Smith and Snipes Hall Farm Ltd v River Douglas Catchment Board Ltd [1949] 2 K.B. 500 and Drive Yourself Hire Co (London) Ltd v Strutt [1954] 1 Q.B. 250; criticised on this point by Wade [1954] C.L.J. 66.

a party” are far from clear. They could refer to a number of things: to a party who is not named but only described; to a person who is named but not as a party; and to a person who is neither named nor a party<sup>51</sup> (e.g. where A promises B to pay a pension “to any of your employees who is injured at work”). The House of Lords in Beswick v Beswick rejected the view of Lord Denning M.R. and Danckwerts L.J., principally on the ground that the definition of “property” in the Act was stated to apply “unless the context otherwise requires”. The context in s.56(1) did otherwise require, since s.56(1) was part of a consolidating Act and was designed to reproduce s.5 of the 1845 Act, which admittedly did not have the wide effect suggested for s.56(1).<sup>52</sup> There was, moreover, nothing in the legislative history of s.56(1) to support the view that the subsection was intended to abolish the doctrine of privity in relation to written contracts.<sup>53</sup> Indeed, the legislative history gives some support to the view that no such change was intended.<sup>54</sup>

S.56(1) therefore does not apply to a bare promise in writing by A to B to pay a sum of money to C; and the correctness of a number of previous decisions to this effect<sup>55</sup> is reaffirmed by Beswick v Beswick. But the question, to what other cases the subsection does apply, remains one of great difficulty. There is support in Beswick v Beswick for four limitations on its scope: namely, that it applies only (1) to real property<sup>56</sup> (2) to covenants running with the land<sup>57</sup>; (3) to cases where the instrument is not merely for the benefit of the third party but purports to contain a grant to or covenant with him<sup>58</sup>; and (4) to deeds strictly inter partes.<sup>59</sup> But there is no clear majority in the speeches in favour of all, some or even one of these limitations, so that the scope of the subsection remains obscure. There appear to be only three reported cases in which s.56(1) has actually been applied. The first<sup>60</sup> is consistent with all four of the above limitations, the second<sup>61</sup> is consistent only with the last two and it is not clear whether the third is consistent with any of them.<sup>62</sup> The third limitation was regarded as the operative one in both these cases and also in a number of others in which the courts have refused to apply the subsection.<sup>63</sup> It seems probable that the subsection will be applied only where this limitation

<sup>51</sup> cf. the side-note to s.56: “Persons taking who are not parties.”

<sup>52</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 77, 81, 87.

<sup>53</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 77, 81, 104; cf. Treitel, 29 M.L.R. 657, 661.

<sup>54</sup> Before the passing of the 1925 Act, a number of reforming measures had been enacted. None of these contained any provision from which the present s.56(1) is derived. In introducing one of the reforming Bills, which were consolidated, together with earlier Acts, in the 1925 property legislation, Lord Haldane L.C. said that no Parliamentary time would be needed for the consolidating Bills “because they do not change what will then be the law”: (1924) 59 H.L. Deb. 125. In view of his speech in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] A.C. 847 at 853, Lord Haldane could hardly have taken this view of the 1925 legislation if the effect of s.56(1) had been to reverse (for written contracts) the “fundamental” principle that “only a person who is a party to a contract can sue on it”.

<sup>55</sup> Re Sinclair's Life Policy [1938] Ch. 799 (criticised on another ground in Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 90); Re Foster [1938] 3 All E.R. 357; Re Miller's Agreement [1947] Ch. 615.

<sup>56</sup> See [1968] A.C. 87 and 76; contrast p.105. See also Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077 at 1083.

<sup>57</sup> See [1968] A.C. 58 at 87; contrast 77, 93, 105.

<sup>58</sup> See [1968] A.C. 58 at 94, 106; cf. 74–75 and 87.

<sup>59</sup> See [1968] A.C. 58 at 107 and 94; cf. 76–77. See above, p.669.

<sup>60</sup> Re Ecclesiastical Commissioners' Conveyance [1936] Ch. 430; cf. Re Windle [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1628 at 1631 (not affected on this point by doubts expressed in Re Kumar [1993] 1 W.L.R. 224, 235).

<sup>61</sup> Sirromdale and Ball Ltd v Burden [1952] Ch. 223.

<sup>62</sup> OTV Birwelco Ltd v Technical & General Guarantee Co Ltd [2002] EWHC 2240; [2002] 4 All E.R. 686 at [12]; the statement of facts leaves the point in doubt.

<sup>63</sup> See the cases cited in n.55, above; White v Bijou Mansions [1937] Ch. 610, affirmed [1938] Ch. 351; Lyus v Promsa Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044 at 1049; Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1025. This is a more stringent requirement than those contained in Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.1(1) and (2), above, pp.651–654.

is satisfied. There is also much to be said on historical grounds for the fourth limitation, which is consistent with all the cases, though it does not form a ground of decision in any of them. The scope of s.56(1) is further limited by a rule which it was not necessary to consider in Beswick v Beswick, namely, that a person cannot take the benefit of a covenant under the subsection unless he, or his predecessor in title, was in existence<sup>64</sup> and identifiable in accordance with the terms of the instrument at the time when it was made.<sup>65</sup>

---

<sup>64</sup> Kelsey v Dodd (1883) 52 L.J.Ch. 34; Westhoughton Urban DC v Wigan Coal Co [1919] 1 Ch. 159 (both these cases were decided under s.5 of the Real Property Act 1845, but the position under s.56(1) of the 1925 Act seems to be the same); White v Bijou Mansions, above.

<sup>65</sup> There is no such requirement under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: see s.1(3), above, p.655.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

ASSIGNMENT<sup>1</sup>

THE benefit of a contract may be transferred to a third party by a process called assignment. This is a transaction between the person entitled to the benefit of the contract (called the creditor or assignor) and the third party (called the assignee) as a result of which the assignee becomes entitled to sue the person liable under the contract (called the debtor). The debtor is not a party to the transaction and his consent is not necessary for its validity.

SECTION 1. AT COMMON LAW

The common law refused to give effect to assignments of “choses in action”, that is, of rights which could be asserted only by bringing an action and not by taking possession of a physical thing. The early lawyers found it hard to think of a transfer of something intangible like a contractual right.<sup>2</sup> Later the rule was based on the fear that assignments of choses in action might lead to maintenance,<sup>3</sup> that is, to “intermeddling in litigation in which the intermeddler has no concern.”<sup>4</sup> Such conduct was formerly a crime and a tort.<sup>5</sup>

Exceptionally, debts due to and by the Crown<sup>6</sup> and negotiable instruments<sup>7</sup> could be assigned at law. The common law also recognised that assignments were effective in equity: thus a promise by the assignee not to sue the debtor was good consideration for a promise by the debtor to pay the assignee.<sup>8</sup> And although an assignment did not at law entitle the assignee to sue the debtor, it might be binding as a contract between assignor and assignee, for breach of which the assignee could recover damages.<sup>9</sup>

The common law did give effect to three kinds of transactions which to some extent did the work of assignment.

---

<sup>1</sup> Marshall, The Assignment of Choses in Action; Bailey, 47 L.Q.R. 526; 48 L.Q.R. 248, 547.

<sup>2</sup> Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, Vol.II, p.226.

<sup>3</sup> Johnson v Collings (1880) 1 East 98; Wilson v Coupland (1821) 5 B. & Ald. 228, 232; Liversidge v Broadbent (1859) 4 H. & N. 603; Fitzroy v Cave [1905] 2 K.B. 364, 372.

<sup>4</sup> Neville v London Express Newspaper Ltd [1919] A.C. 368, 385; Re Oasis Merchandising Services [1998] Ch. 170 at 174.

<sup>5</sup> Criminal and tortious liability for maintenance and champerty (bargaining for a share in the proceeds of the litigation) were abolished by Criminal Law Act 1967, ss.13(1) and 14(1), but under s.14(2) this has (in general) no effect on the validity of contracts: see p.430, above. For possible effects on the validity of certain assignments, see below, pp.695 et seq.

<sup>6</sup> Miles v Williams (1714) 1 P.Wms. 249 at 259.

<sup>7</sup> Ryall v Rowles (1750) 1 Ves.Scn. 348; below, p.691.

<sup>8</sup> Forth v Stanton (1681) 1 Wms.Saund. 210; cf. Moulds v Birchall (1772) 2 W.Bl. 820; Master v Miller (1791) 4 T.R. 320, 341 (for another explanation, see Israel v Douglas (1789) 1 H.Bl. 239). For other instances of recognition of assignment at common law, see Winch v Keely (1787) 1 T.R. 619; Legh v Legh (1799) 1 B. & P. 447; Carpenter v Marnell (1802) 3 B. & P. 40; Cromfoot v Gurney (1832) 9 Bing. 372.

<sup>9</sup> Gerrard v Lewis (1867) 1 L.R. 2 C.P. 305.

1. Novation<sup>10</sup>

Novation is a contract between debtor, creditor and a third party that the debt owed by the debtor shall henceforth be owed to the third party. This is not assignment because the consent of all three parties,<sup>11</sup> including that of the debtor, is necessary, and because the original debt is not, strictly, transferred. The third party's right against the debtor is based on the new contract between him and debtor,<sup>12</sup> the consideration for the debtor's promise typically taking the form of some benefit (such as a payment of money) provided by the third party to the original creditor.<sup>13</sup> As the "third party" is thus a party to the tripartite contract of novation, it follows that he would not acquire any rights under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.<sup>14</sup> At common law, the third party's claim under the novation would fail if no consideration moved from him for the debtor's promise to pay him<sup>15</sup>; and this position is probably not affected by the 1999 Act.<sup>16</sup>

2. Acknowledgment<sup>17</sup>

If a creditor asks his debtor to pay a third party, and the debtor agrees to do so, and notifies the third party of his agreement, then the third party may be entitled to sue the debtor.<sup>18</sup> It was for long doubtful whether such a transaction had to be supported by consideration. In the second half of the nineteenth century, the following distinction was established: that consideration was, in general, necessary; but that it was not necessary where the debtor actually had in his hands (e.g. as banker) a fund belonging to the creditor.<sup>19</sup> But this distinction, which seems to have little merit, was disregarded in the later case of Shamia v Joory.<sup>20</sup> The defendant owed some £1,200 to his agent Youssuf, who asked him to pay £500 of this sum to the claimant, Youssuf's brother. The defendant agreed to do so and notified the claimant of this agreement. It was held that the claimant could sue the defendant for the £500, though no consideration moved from him. If this decision is right,<sup>21</sup> acknowledgment is in one respect more advantageous than assignment, since certain types of assignment have to be supported by consideration.<sup>22</sup> On facts such as those of Shamia v Joory, it is probable that the defendant's promise to Youssuf to pay the £500 to the claimant could now be enforced by the claimant against the defendant by virtue of the Contracts (Right of Third Parties) Act

<sup>10</sup> Ames, Lectures, p.298.

<sup>11</sup> See The Aktion [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283 at 309.

<sup>12</sup> e.g. Rashora Ltd v JCL Marine Ltd [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 645.

<sup>13</sup> Consideration need not move to the promisor (the original debtor): above, p.81.

<sup>14</sup> Rights are conferred by virtue of this Act only on "a person who is not a party" to the contract (s.1(1)).

<sup>15</sup> Tatlock v Harris (1789) 3 T.R. 174 at 180; Cuxon v Chadley (1824) 3 B. & C. 591; Wharton v Walker (1825) 4 B. & C. 163.

<sup>16</sup> A third party can make a claim under the Act even though he provided no consideration (above, p.657); but in the case put in the text the "third party" is a person to whom a promise has been made and the Act does not make it clear whether, if that promise is not enforceable, the person to whom it was made is to be regarded as a promisee or as a third party. Prime facie "promisee" in the Act means a "party to the contract by whom the term is enforceable against the promisor" (s.1(7)); but the Act also envisages the possibility of a person's being the promisee even though the term is not so enforceable because a "defence" is available to the promisor (s.3(2)(b)).

<sup>17</sup> Davies, 75 L.Q.R. 220; cf. Yates, 41 Conv. 49.

<sup>18</sup> Wilson v Coupland (1821) 5 B. & Ald. 228; Hamilton v Spottismonde (1842) 4 Ex. 200; Griffin v Weatherhy (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 753.

<sup>19</sup> Liversidge v Broadbent (1859) 4 H. & N. 603 at 612.

<sup>20</sup> [1958] 1 Q.B. 448.

<sup>21</sup> For criticism, see Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (5th ed.), pp.692–693.

<sup>22</sup> See below, pp.682 et seq.

1999<sup>23</sup>; and such a claim could succeed even though the claimant had not provided any consideration for that promise.<sup>24</sup>

3. Power of Attorney

A creditor can give a third party a power of attorney, authorising him to sue for the debt in the creditor's name, without any liability to account to creditor. But this device had many disadvantages from the third party's point of view. The most important of these was that a power of attorney could generally be revoked by the creditor, and was often revoked automatically by his death.<sup>25</sup>

SECTION 2. EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENTS

Equity regarded the common law's fear of maintenance as unrealistic<sup>26</sup> and took the view that choses in action were property<sup>27</sup> which ought, in the interest of commercial convenience, to be transferable, e.g. to provide security for a loan. Choses in action were therefore assignable in equity.<sup>28</sup> The phrase "choses in action" here refers to claims for the enforcement of a contract (e.g. for the sum due under it or for damages for its breach). These must be distinguished from remedies that are sometimes provided by law for purposes other than enforcement: for example, where a person who has entered into a transaction as a result of misrepresentation or undue influence is entitled to rescind it. It has been held that this remedy is not itself a chose in action and therefore cannot be assigned; but it is possible for the person to whom the remedy is available to agree to account to another person for any financial benefit which he may derive from its exercise.<sup>29</sup>

Where a chose in action is assigned, the machinery used for enforcing the assignment varied with the nature of the chose in action, which might be legal or equitable. A legal chose is one which could be sued for only in a common law court, e.g. a contract debt. An equitable chose is one which could be sued for only in the Court of Chancery, e.g. an interest in a trust fund.

1. Legal Choses

There were four reasons why equity could not simply allow the assignee of a legal chose to sue the debtor in the Court of Chancery. First, equity did not in general enforce purely legal debts. Secondly, the debtor might suffer hardship if he were later sued for a second payment at common law by the original creditor (the assignor): he would have to take separate proceedings in Chancery to make good his defence. Thirdly, the assignor might retain some interest in the debt, e.g. he might assign only part of it: in such a case, it was desirable to have him (as well as the assignee) before the court, so that the relative <sup>23</sup> This would depend on whether (a) the agreement between the defendant and Youssuf had contractual force; and (b) the requirements of ss.1(1)(a) or (b) and (2) were satisfied: see above, pp.651 to 653 the reasoning in nn.13 and 16 above would not apply since the claimant was clearly not a party to the agreement between those parties nor a promisee in it.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.657. Any such claim would not affect the claimant's common law rights as described in the text above: see 1999 Act, s7(1).

<sup>25</sup> See below, p.750.

<sup>26</sup> Wright v Wright (1750) 1 Ves.Sen. 409 at 411, ("very refined").

<sup>27</sup> cf. Allway v Phillips (Inspector of Taxes) [1980] 1 W.L.R. 888 at 893.

<sup>28</sup> Crouch v Martin (1707) 2 Vern. 595; Rom v Danson (1749) 1 Ves.Sen. 331; Ryall v Rowles (1750) 1 Ves.Sen. 348; Ex p. South (1818) 3 Swanst. 392.

<sup>29</sup> Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich BC [1998] 1 W.L.R. 896; for contrary dicta, see below, p.697.

rights of all the parties could be determined in a single action. Fourthly, the assignor might wish to dispute the validity of the assignment: this possibility again made it desirable to have him before the court at some stage.

These difficulties were solved by allowing the assignee to sue the debtor at common law in the name of the assignor. If the assignor refused to cooperate, equity could compel him to do so. In the resulting proceedings in Chancery, the rights of the assignor could be adequately safeguarded. Now that common law and equity are administered in the same courts, the first of the above two reasons for the original method of enforcing equitable assignments are of purely historical interest, but the third and fourth reasons may retain their force and sometimes make it important to have all the parties before the court.<sup>30</sup> But the action against the debtor need no longer be brought in the name of the assignor<sup>31</sup>: he is simply joined as co-claimant if he is willing to co-operate with the assignee, and as co-defendant if he is not,<sup>32</sup> i.e. if he wishes to dispute the validity of the assignment. The machinery of joining the assignor as a party to the action may, however, break down if the assignor has ceased to exist, e.g. because the assignor is a company which has been dissolved.<sup>33</sup> Where the assignor is a natural person and has died, it would seem to be possible for the assignee to sue, joining the assignor's legal personal representatives.

2. Equitable Choses

The assignee of an equitable chose could in his own name sue the trustee in the Court of Chancery.<sup>34</sup> The chose being equitable, the trustee was not exposed to the danger of a subsequent action in a different (common law) court by the assignor. It was necessary to make the assignor a party to the proceedings only if he retained some interest in the subject-matter. If he wished to dispute the validity of the assignment, he could take separate proceedings for that purpose.<sup>35</sup>

SECTION 3. STATUTORY ASSIGNMENTS

Certain specific contracts, such as life and marine insurance policies and bills of lading, were made assignable by statute during the nineteenth century.<sup>36</sup> A more general provision was made by the Judicature Act 1873, which fused the courts of common law and equity, and so made obsolete some of the reasons for the original method for enforcing equitable assignments of legal choses. There was no longer any difficulty in allowing the assignee to sue in any Division of the High Court; and a debtor who was successfully sued by the assignee no longer had to take separate proceedings if he were sued again by the assignor: he could simply rely on his payment to the assignee as a defence in the second action. Thus it was no longer necessary to have the assignor before

<sup>30</sup> The Aiolos [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 25 at 33; cf. Deposit Protection Board v Dalia [1994] 2 A.C. 367 at 387, reversed on other grounds ibid. 391. See generally, Tolhurst, 118 L.Q.R. 98.

<sup>31</sup> Weddell v J A Pearce & Major [1988] Ch. 26 at 40.

<sup>32</sup> Conversely, if the assignor sues the debtor, the assignee must be joined as a party to the action: Three Rivers DC v Bank of England, [1996] Q.B. 292.

<sup>33</sup> See M H Smith (Plant Hire) Ltd v D L Mainwaring (T/A Onshore) Ltd [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 244, where subrogation (below, p.696, n.26) was said at 246 in this respect to resemble equitable assignment.

<sup>34</sup> Cator v Croydon Canal Co (1841) 4 Y. & C. Ex. 405 at 593; Donaldson v Donaldson (1854) Kay 711.

<sup>35</sup> e.g. Bridge v Bridge (1852) 16 Beav. 315.

<sup>36</sup> e.g. Bills of Lading Act 1855, s.1 (now repealed and superseded by Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924); Policies of Assurance Act 1867 (life insurance); Marine Insurance Act 1868 (see now 1906 Act, s.50(1)).

the court unless he retained an interest in the subject-matter<sup>37</sup> or wished to dispute the validity of the assignment.

S.136(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 (re-enacting s.25(6) of the Judicature Act 1873), therefore provides that an absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor (not purporting to be by way of charge only) of any debt or other legal thing in action, of which express notice in writing has been given to the debtor or trustee, is effectual in law to pass the legal right to the debt or thing in action to the assignee. The effect of such an assignment is to enable the assignee to sue the debtor in his own name, and to sue alone, i.e., without joining the assignor as a party to the action. The subsection finally makes provision for enabling the assignor to dispute the validity of the assignment; if he does so, the debtor can drop out of the proceedings and leave the dispute to be fought out between assignor and assignee.

1. Absolute Assignment

Under s.136(1), the assignee can sue alone only if the assignment is absolute; this requirement excludes cases in which the assignor retains an interest in the subject-matter so that it is still desirable to have him before the court. Absolute assignments are for this purpose contrasted with the following:

(1) Assignments by way of charge

In Durham Bros v Robertson<sup>38</sup> a builder to whom £1,080 was due under a building contract borrowed money and assigned the £1,080 to the lender as security for the loan "until the money [lent] . . . be repaid." This was held to be an assignment by way of charge. The builder had not assigned the £1,080 absolutely to the lender; he had only charged that sum with the repayment of the money he had borrowed. But an assignment may be absolute although it is made by way of mortgage, and does not transfer the subject-matter out-and-out. Thus in Tancred v Delagoa Bay, etc., Ry<sup>39</sup> a debt was assigned as security for a loan of money, with the proviso that, if the assignor repaid the loan, the debt should be reassigned to him. This was held to be an absolute assignment.

The distinction between these two cases can best be understood by taking the point of view of the debtor, and assuming that he wants to pay the debt. In Tancred's case, he can find out from documents in his own possession whether he ought to pay the assignor or the assignee; for even if the debt is reassigned to the assignor, the debtor can safely pay the assignee until he gets notice of the reassignment.<sup>40</sup> But in Durham Bros. v Robertson the debtor does not know whether to pay the assignee until it is settled whether the assignor still owes anything to the assignee. The debtor cannot find this out from documents in his own possession: he would have to investigate the state of accounts between the assignor and assignee. Similarly, if the assignee sued the debtor, the court could not determine whom the debtor should pay without investigating the state of accounts between assignor and assignee; and it cannot satisfactorily do this if the

<sup>37</sup> The Mount I [2001] EWCA Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 597, at [60].

<sup>38</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 765; cf. Jones v Humphreys [1902] 1 K.B. 10; Mercantile Bank of London Ltd v Evans [1899] 2 Q.B. 613; Colonial Mutual General Insurance Co v ANZ Banking Group (New Zealand) [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1140 at 1144.

<sup>39</sup> (1889) 23 Q.B.D. 239; cf. Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd [1902] 2 K.B. 190; The Cebu [1983] Q.B. 1005 at 1016 (where nothing seems to have turned on the distinction between equitable and statutory assignments).

<sup>40</sup> See below, p.682.

assignor is not before the court. For similar reasons, an assignment of a debt to a bank was held to be by way of charge only where it was expressed to be made as security for a loan from the bank and was to become operative only on the assignor's failing to perform his obligations under the original contract which had given rise to the debt or under the loan agreement with the bank.<sup>41</sup>

In Bank of Liverpool v Holland<sup>42</sup> a creditor assigned a debt of £285 to a bank "to hold the same absolutely. And it is hereby agreed and declared that the amount recoverable by these presents shall not at any time exceed" £150. This was held to be an absolute assignment of the whole debt, with the proviso that, if the bank recovered more than £150, it was to hold the excess on trust for the assignor. This part of the arrangement did not concern the debtor: he could get a good discharge by paying the bank at any time.

(2) Assignments of part of a debt

An assignment of part of a debt (e.g. of £500 out of the £1,000 which X owes me; or of half of what X owes me) is not absolute.<sup>43</sup> In such a case a debtor who wants to pay may know perfectly well how much to pay to whom. But to hold such an assignment absolute might cause hardship to a debtor who wished to dispute the debt. If the assignment were absolute, the assignee would be able to sue alone. In this action, the debtor might be able to show that there was no debt. But he would have to prove this over again if he were later sued by the assignor for the balance of the alleged debt. And if the assignor split the debt up into a large number of small parts, the debtor might have to defend many actions arising out of the same transaction. Hence it is necessary, for the protection of the debtor, to have all the interested parties before the court. For the same reason, an assignor of part of a debt cannot sue for the part he retains without joining the assignee as a party to the action.<sup>44</sup>

The above reasoning does not apply to an assignment of the balance of a debt. Suppose A owes B £100 and pays off £25 of the debt. An assignment of the remaining £75 would be absolute since it would be an assignment of B's entire remaining interest in the debt.<sup>45</sup>

(3) Conditional assignments

S.136(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 contrasts absolute assignments with assignments by way of charge; but some judgments also distinguish between absolute and conditional assignments.<sup>46</sup> Many assignments by way of charge are, in fact, assignments subject to the condition subsequent that they will cease to have effect when the assignor pays off the debt which he owes to the assignee. Assignments which are subject to some

<sup>41</sup> The Halcyon The Great [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283.

<sup>42</sup> (1926) 43 T.L.R. 29; cf. Comfort v Betts [1891] 1 Q.B. 737; Fitzroy v Cave [1905] 2 K.B. 364; Ramsay v Hartley [1977] 1 W.L.R. 686.

<sup>43</sup> Forster v Baker [1910] 2 K.B. 636; Re Steel Wing Co [1921] 1 Ch. 349; Williams v Atlantic Assurance Co Ltd [1933] 1 K.B. 81 at 100 (the actual decision seems to turn on Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.50(2)); Deposit Protection Board v Dalia [1994] 2 A.C. 367 at 392; The Mount I [2001] E.W.C.A. Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 587, at [74].

<sup>44</sup> Walter & Sullivan Ltd v J. Murphy & Sons Ltd [1955] 2 Q.B. 584.

<sup>45</sup> e.g. Harding v Harding (1886) 17 Q.B.D. 442.

<sup>46</sup> e.g. Durham Bros v Robertson [1898] 1 Q.B. 765 at 773; cf. The Balder London [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 489 at 495.

other condition (whether precedent or subsequent) should be treated in the same way.<sup>47</sup> Whatever the condition may be, the assignor retains a contingent interest in the debt, and is thus a desirable party to an action to recover it. Suppose that A assigns rent due under a lease “to my daughter until she marries”. The assignment should not be absolute since it is desirable that A should be a party to an action brought by his daughter against the tenant for rent. If the daughter could sue alone, she might be able to prove that she was unmarried, and so entitled to the rent. But this would not prevent A, in a subsequent action against the tenant, from proving that the court in the first action had made a mistake in finding that the daughter was unmarried, so that the tenant would have to pay over again. What matters to the tenant is not whether the daughter is married but that the question should be decided, one way or the other, so as to bind both A and the daughter.<sup>48</sup>

2. Debt or Other Legal Thing in Action

A “debt” in s.136(1) is a sum certain due under contract or otherwise.<sup>49</sup> The phrase “other legal thing in action” has been broadly interpreted: it means any “debt or right which the common law looks on as not assignable by reason of its being a chose in action, but which a court of equity deals with as being assignable”.<sup>50</sup> The phrase includes equitable choses in action,<sup>51</sup> though this point is of little practical importance since an assignment of an equitable chose is no more effective under the statute than it is in equity. The phrase also includes a debt not yet due but accruing due,<sup>52</sup> and the benefit of an obligation to do something other than to pay cash,<sup>53</sup> or of one to forbear from doing something.<sup>54</sup> It does not include choses in action which can be transferred only<sup>55</sup> by complying with some other statute; thus shares in a company cannot be assigned by statutory assignment under s.136, but only in the manner prescribed by the articles of association of the company.<sup>56</sup>

SECTION 4. GENERAL REQUIREMENTS

1. Formalities

A statutory assignment must be “by writing under the hand of the assignor”. An assignment which for some reason fails to take effect as a statutory assignment may still be a good equitable assignment. Thus although an oral assignment cannot take effect

<sup>47</sup> e.g. The Halcyon The Great [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283; Herkules Piling v Tilbury Construction (1992) 61 Build.L.R. 107 at 117.

<sup>48</sup> cf. The Aiolos [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 25 at 33.

<sup>49</sup> e.g. under statute: Danson v Great Northern & City Ry [1905] 1 K.B. 260.

<sup>50</sup> Turkington v Magee [1902] 2 K.B. 427 at 430 (actual decision reversed on another ground: [1903] 1 K.B. 644); cf. King v Victoria Insurance Co [1896] A.C. 250 at 254; Manchester Brewery v Coombs [1901] 2 Ch. 608 at 619.

<sup>51</sup> Re Pain [1919] 1 Ch. 38 at 44.

<sup>52</sup> Brice v Bannister (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 569 at 574; Walker v Bradford Old Bank (1884) 12 Q.B.D. 511; Re Green [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1211 at 1219–1224. Contrast Lam v Coburn [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1238, where the date on which the debt became due was crucial under the relevant legislation.

<sup>53</sup> Turkington v Magee, above.

<sup>54</sup> Jacoby v Whitmore (1883) 49 L.T. 335.

<sup>55</sup> s.136 may apply to a policy of marine insurance though such a policy is also assignable under Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.50: see The Mount I [2001] EWCA Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 597, at [74].

<sup>56</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.182(1).

under the statute, it may be valid in equity.<sup>57</sup> The statute merely provides an alternative method of making assignments; it does not destroy the earlier method.

A disposition of an equitable interest “must be in writing signed by the person disposing of the same or by his agent thereunto lawfully authorised”.<sup>58</sup> This rule is mandatory: an oral assignment of an equitable chose is therefore void.<sup>59</sup>

As a general rule, writing is not necessary for an equitable assignment of a legal chose in action. But a contract may provide that rights under it shall be assigned only by use of a specified form, such as writing. An attempt to assign such rights without using the stipulated form is probably not effective as an assignment, though it may amount to a contract to assign.<sup>60</sup>

For the protection of the assignor’s creditors, provision has been made by various statutes for the registration of certain assignments. S.344 of the Insolvency Act 1986,<sup>61</sup> for example, requires general assignments of book debts (or any class of them) made by a person engaged in any business to be registered; if they are not registered they are void as against the trustee in bankruptcy to the extent specified in the section.

2. Intention to Assign

Although assignments must sometimes be in writing, no particular form of words has to be used to effect an assignment. The document need not on its face purport to be an assignment. As Lord Macnaghten said in William Brandt’s Sons & Co v Dunlop Rubber Co<sup>62</sup> “An equitable assignment does not always take that form. It may be addressed to the debtor. It may be couched in the language of command. It may be a courteous request. It may assume the form of mere permission. The language is immaterial if the meaning is plain. All that is necessary is that the debtor should be given to understand that the debt has been made over by the creditor to some third person.”<sup>63</sup> An assignment is not itself a contract between assignor and debtor: its legal nature is that of a direction amounting to the transfer of a right. It follows that an assignment does not confer rights on the assignee, under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.<sup>64</sup>

A creditor does not necessarily assign a debt by asking his debtor to pay a third party. The request may be intended only as a mandate (or instruction) to the debtor to pay the third party.<sup>65</sup> Such a mandate does not give the third party any rights against the debtor, and can be revoked by the creditor. Similarly, a person who draws a cheque on his bank

<sup>57</sup> cf. below, pp.682, 687–688.

<sup>58</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.53(1)(c), formerly Statute of Frauds 1677, s.9. The enactment applies to all “dispositions,” whether they are assignments or not. But it does not apply to a transfer of the legal title which is intended to operate as a transfer of the equitable interest, even though before the transfer the legal title and the equitable interest were in different hands; Vandervell v IRC [1967] 2 A.C. 291; Strauss, 30 M.L.R. 461; Green, 47 M.L.R. 385. Nor does it apply to implied or constructive trusts: see s.53(2) and Neville v Wilson [1997] Ch. 144. As to joinder of documents, see above, pp.184–185.

<sup>59</sup> Oughtred v IRC [1960] A.C. 206; cf. Grey v IRC [1960] A.C. 1.

<sup>60</sup> cf. below, p.682.

<sup>61</sup> See also Companies Act 1985, ss.395, 396.

<sup>62</sup> [1905] A.C. 454.

<sup>63</sup> At 462. cf. also Spellman v Spellman [1961] 1 W.L.R. 921; Palmer v Carey [1926] A.C. 703; The Kelo [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 85; Re Marmalt [1992] BCC 32 at 37; Colonial Mutual General Insurance Co Ltd v ANZ Banking Group (New Zealand) Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1140; and see Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyd’s Bank Ltd [1982] A.C. 584 at 613 and Kijowski v New Capital Properties (1990) 15 Con.L.R. 1 (where there was no assignment).

<sup>64</sup> See above, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>65</sup> Ex p. Hall (1878) 10 Ch.D. 615; cf. Re Williams [1917] 1 Ch. 1; Timpson’s Executors v Yerbury [1936] 1 K.B. 645; Dalton v IRC [1958] T.R. 45. For a similar distinction between a contract for the benefit of a third party and a mandate to pay a third party, see above, p.604.

in favour of a third person does not thereby assign part of his bank balance.<sup>66</sup> The bank is not liable to the third party, though if it fails to pay him it may be liable in damages to its own customer. The position is the same where the customer gives a standing order or direct debit instruction to his bank in favour of the third party.<sup>67</sup>

3. Communication to Assignee

An assignment has no effect unless it is communicated<sup>68</sup> to the assignee by the assignor, or by someone with his authority<sup>69</sup>; or unless it is made in pursuance of a prior agreement between assignor and assignee. The reason for the requirement is not immediately obvious since a person can have property transferred to him without his knowledge, subject to a right to repudiate the transfer when he becomes aware of it.<sup>70</sup> One possible reason for the requirement is that communication to the assignee is evidence of intention to assign<sup>71</sup>; but such an intention could equally well be proved by other evidence. Alternatively, communication to the assignee may be regarded as the equivalent of the delivery which is necessary to perfect a gift of a chattel made otherwise than by deed.<sup>72</sup> A final possible explanation of the requirement is that it is based on the nature of assignment as a transaction between assignor and assignee.

4. Notice to Debtor

(1) How to give notice

Notice of an equitable assignment may be oral,<sup>73</sup> but if the chose assigned is equitable, oral notice will seldom be effective between successive assignees.<sup>74</sup> Notice of a statutory assignment under s.136 of the Law of Property Act 1925 must be in writing.<sup>75</sup> It need not be given by the assignor, nor at the time of the assignment: it may be given by the assignee and is effective so long as it is given before action brought.<sup>76</sup> There must, however, be a notice of assignment given by assignor or assignee: it is not enough to show that the debtor came to know of the assignment in some other way: e.g. as a result of discovery in legal or arbitral proceedings.<sup>77</sup> No particular form of words is necessary<sup>78</sup>; but the notice must clearly and unconditionally<sup>79</sup> tell the debtor to pay a third party as assignee, and not merely as agent for the creditor.<sup>80</sup> A notice which incorrectly states the

<sup>66</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.53(1); Schroeder v Central Bank of London Ltd (1876) 34 L.T. 735; Deposit Protection Board v Dalia [1994] 2 A.C. 367 at 400. Thus if an account is overdrawn the bank is not concerned with the question of priorities between competing payees. See also R. v Preddy [1996] A.C. 815 (actual decision reversed by Theft (Amendment) Act 1996).

<sup>67</sup> cf., in Scotland, Mercedes-Benz Finance Ltd v Clydesdale Bank plc, 1997 S.L.T. 905.

<sup>68</sup> According to Alexander v Steinhardt, Walker & Co [1903] 2 K.B. 208 posting is sufficient communication, but that case was doubted in Timpson's Executors v Yerbury [1936] 1 K.B. 645 at 657.

<sup>69</sup> e.g. by the debtor: Burn v Carvalho (1839) 4 My. & Cr. 690.

<sup>70</sup> Standing v Bowring (1885) 31 Ch.D. 282.

<sup>71</sup> See Re Hamilton (1921) 124 L.T. 737.

<sup>72</sup> See below, p.685.

<sup>73</sup> Ex p. Agra Bank (1868) L.R. 3 Ch.App. 555.

<sup>74</sup> See below, p.682.

<sup>75</sup> See above, p.622; there is no requirement of notice for an assignment under Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.50: The Mount I [2001] F.W.C.A. Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 597.

<sup>76</sup> Walker v Bradford Old Bank (1884) 12 Q.B.D. 511; Bateman v Hunt [1904] 2 K.B. 530; Re Westerton [1919] 2 Ch. 104; Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd [1942] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>77</sup> Herkules Piling Ltd v Tilbury Construction Ltd (1992) 61 Build.L.R. 107.

<sup>78</sup> Smith v S.S. "Zigurds" Owners [1934] A.C. 209.

<sup>79</sup> The Balder London [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 489 at 495.

<sup>80</sup> James Talcott Ltd v John Lewis & Co Ltd [1940] 3 All E.R. 592.

date of the assignment or, it seems, the amount of the debt, is invalid.<sup>81</sup> But a notice which says nothing at all about these particulars appears to be valid, so long as it describes the debt with sufficient certainty. A notice is valid although it inaccurately states that another notice had been previously given.<sup>82</sup>

A notice sent through the post has been said to take effect when it is received by the debtor.<sup>83</sup> This is clearly right where a dispute arises between assignee and debtor, for it is unreasonable to make the debtor suffer for failing to act on a notice of which he is not yet aware. But where the dispute is between successive assignees, it is at least arguable that the first to post his notice should have priority over any other assignee who has not yet posted his notice (or otherwise communicated with the debtor) when the first notice was posted.<sup>84</sup>

(2) Effects of notice

Notice may affect the relative rights of assignor and assignee, of assignee and debtor, and of a number of successive assignees.

(a) BETWEEN ASSIGNOR AND ASSIGNEE. The rights of these parties may depend on whether the assignment is statutory<sup>85</sup>; and it can only have this character if notice is given.<sup>86</sup> If no notice is given, the assignment may still be effective in equity.<sup>87</sup> Notice to the debtor is not necessary to perfect the rights of an equitable assignee against the assignor.<sup>88</sup>

(b) BETWEEN ASSIGNEE AND DEBTOR. Notice is, however, necessary to perfect the title of an equitable assignee against the debtor,<sup>89</sup> since without such notice the debtor is entitled to assume that he remains liable to his original creditor (the assignor) and that he will get a good discharge by paying the assignor.<sup>90</sup> Notice may<sup>91</sup> also turn the assignment into a statutory assignment, in which case the debtor is liable to be sued by the assignee alone: he can no longer insist that the assignor be made a party to the action. Where the assignment is statutory, the debtor ceases, as soon as notice has been given, to be liable to the assignor<sup>92</sup> and becomes liable to the assignee. It is submitted that the same is true, where an assignment of part of a debt is valid in equity, to the extent of the amount assigned<sup>93</sup>; for it has been held that if the debtor in such a case ignores the notice and pays the assignor he is not discharged and will have to make a second payment to

<sup>81</sup> Stanley v English Fibres Industries Ltd (1889) 68 L.J.Q.B. 839; W F Harrison & Co Ltd v Burke [1956] 1 W.L.R. 419; criticised by R. E. M., 72 L.Q.R. 321.

<sup>82</sup> Van Lynn Developments Ltd v Pelias Construction Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 607.

<sup>83</sup> Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd [1942] 2 K.B. 1 at 6.

<sup>84</sup> Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd, supra, is not inconsistent with this suggestion since the order in which the two claimants communicated with the debtor is not stated in the report.

<sup>85</sup> See below, p.683.

<sup>86</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.136(1).

<sup>87</sup> Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd [1942] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>88</sup> Gorringe v Irwell India Rubber, etc., Works (1886) 34 Ch.D. 128; Re Trytel [1952] 2 T.L.R. 32. Other aspects of the latter case are discussed in Performing Rights Society v Rowland [1997] 3 All E.R. 336.

<sup>89</sup> Warner Bros Records Inc v Rollgreen Ltd [1976] Q.B. 430; Kloss, 39 Conv.(N.S.) 261; Herkules Piling v Tilbury Construction (1992) 61 Build.L.R. 107 at 119.

<sup>90</sup> See Stocks v Dobson (1853) 4 D.M. & G. 11.

<sup>91</sup> i.e. if the assignment is in writing and is "absolute" (above, pp.676–678).

<sup>92</sup> Cottage Club Estates Ltd v Woodside Estates (Amersham) Ltd [1928] 2 Q.B. 463 at 467; The Halcyon The Great [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283 at 289.

<sup>93</sup> The contrary view was, indeed, taken by Simon Brown L.J. in Deposit Protection Board v Dalia [1994] 2 A.C. 367 at 382, but in a dissenting judgment; actual decision reversed but on other grounds [1994] 2 A.C. 391.

the assignee.<sup>94</sup> Nor, once notice of an equitable assignment had been given, could the assignor sue the debtor without joining the assignee<sup>95</sup>; and if he does join the assignee his claim will fail to the extent of the amount assigned.<sup>96</sup>

(c) BETWEEN SUCCESSIVE ASSIGNEES. A chose in action may be successively assigned by an insolvent assignor to several persons for more than it is worth. It is then necessary to decide in what order the assignees are to be paid. The rule is that successive assignments taken in good faith rank in the order in which notice is given to the debtor. Thus a later assignee may gain priority over an earlier one by giving notice first.<sup>97</sup> Notice of the assignment of an equitable chose should be given in writing, since oral notice of an assignment of such a chose does not give priority over later assignees in good faith and for value.<sup>98</sup>

SECTION 5. CONSIDERATION<sup>99</sup>

The question whether an assignment must be supported by consideration is one of great complexity. Two points must be made to clear the ground for the discussion. First, the dispute concerns only the relative rights of assignor and assignee. The debtor cannot refuse to pay the assignee on the ground that the assignment was gratuitous<sup>1</sup>; he is liable to pay the debt in any event and his only interest is to see that all possible claimants are before the court, so that he does not run the risk of having to pay twice over. So long as this possibility of prejudice to the debtor is removed by the joinder of all appropriate parties, it is only the assignor who can raise an issue as to the validity of the assignment on the ground that no consideration was given for it; indeed the only purpose of taking the point is to enable the assignor to claim payment of the debt for himself. In practice this most frequently happens if the assignor has died or become bankrupt: his representatives may, for the benefit of his estate or of his creditors, wish to challenge the validity of the assignment. Secondly, the discussion concerns all gratuitous assignments, <sup>94</sup> Jones v Farrell (1857) 1 D. & J. 208; Brice v Bannister (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 569 (where the assignment was equitable: see Durham Bros v Robertson [1898] 1 Q.B. 765, 774); Ex p. Nicholls (1883) 22 Ch.D. 782 at 787. In view of these authorities it is hard to accept the suggestion in Warner Bros Records Inc v Rollgreen Ltd, [1976] Q.B. 430 at 443, 445 that an equitable assignment (of a legal chose) gives the assignee rights only against the assignor but none against the debtor. This suggestion may be true of an agreement to assign a chose in action in the future; but any historical support which may once have existed for it in the case of an actual present assignment seems to have been made obsolete by the developments outlined on pp.674–675 above. The suggestion seems, with respect, to be based on failure to distinguish between the substantive rights arising in equity out of assignments and the procedure for their enforcement: see Three Rivers DC v Bank of England [1996] Q.B. 292 at 315 and ibid. p.312, describing the requirement of joinder of the assignor to the action as “procedural and not substantive”.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.677.

<sup>96</sup> Deposit Protection Board v Dalia, [1994] 2 A.C. 367 at 386, 387, reversed on other grounds ibid. p.391.

<sup>97</sup> Dearle v Hall (1828) 3 Russ. 1; cf. Stocks v Dobson (1853) 4 D.M. & G. 11; Mutual Life Assurance Society v Langley (1886) 32 Ch.D. 460; Ellerman Lines Ltd v Lancaster Maritime Co Ltd [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 497 at 503; The Attika Hope [1988] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 439 at 441; Pfeiffer Weinkellerei-Weineinkauf GmbH & Co v Arbutnot Factors [1988] 1 W.L.R. 150. See also Goode, 92 L.Q.R. 554–559; Donaldson, 93 L.Q.R. 324; Goode, ibid. 487.

<sup>98</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.137(3).

<sup>99</sup> Megarry, 59 L.Q.R. 58; Hollond, ibid. 129; Hall [1959] C.I.J. 99; Sheridan, 33 Can. Bar Rev. 284.

<sup>1</sup> Walker v Bradford Old Bank (1884) 12 Q.B.D. 511; the question of consideration may also be relevant for revenue purposes, but the question in cases of this kind is always whether the assignor could have denied the validity of the assignment, as against the assignee: e.g. Re Rose [1952] Ch. 499; Letts v IRC [1957] 1 W.L.R. 201; Dalton v IRC [1958] T.R. 45. Nor is the assignor precluded from relying on want of consideration moving from the assignee by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 since in the relations between assignor and assignee the latter will not be a “third party” within subsection 1(1).

even those made by deed or for a nominal consideration.<sup>2</sup> The fact that an assignment is so made may make an assignor who disputes it liable in damages for breach of contract,<sup>3</sup> or make an agreement to assign binding contractually. But it does not, of itself, make the assignment effective as a transfer of the debt.

1. Assignments of Future Property

An assignment is the transfer of an existing right. There can be no assignment of rights which do not yet exist or belong to the assignor. Such rights are sometimes called “future property”. An attempt to assign future property may operate as an agreement to assign which must be supported by consideration if it is to be binding.<sup>4</sup>

Money payable in the future under an existing contract is not necessarily future property, and a disposition of the right to receive such money may be an assignment and not an agreement to assign.<sup>5</sup> If the contingency on which the money is payable is within the control of the creditor, there is no difficulty in holding that the disposition is an assignment: thus a builder can assign instalments to become due to him under a building contract as the work progresses, for here the contingency on which the money will become due is simply his own performance.<sup>6</sup> If, however, the contingency is not within his control, the disposition is prima facie an agreement to assign: this would be the position where a person purported to assign future dividends in a company which was not under any obligation to him to declare any dividends.<sup>7</sup> But even where the rights of the assignor depend on a contingency outside his control, he may purport to assign either his present right to future income from a specified source or the future income itself. A disposition of the first kind may be regarded as an assignment<sup>8</sup> and a disposition of the second kind as an agreement to assign.<sup>9</sup> The question into which category it falls turns on the construction of the document purporting to effect the disposition.

2. Statutory Assignments

A statutory assignment, whether of a legal or of an equitable chose in action, is effective although it is made without consideration.<sup>10</sup> The reasons for this rule are discussed below.<sup>11</sup>

3. Equitable Assignments

The effects of a “voluntary” equitable assignment (i.e. one which is not supported by consideration) must be discussed historically.

<sup>2</sup> Kekewich v Manning (1851) 1 D.M. & G. 176 (deed); Dillon v Coppin (1839) 4 My. & Cr. 647 (nominal consideration).

<sup>3</sup> Gerrard v Lewis (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 305; Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch. 213.

<sup>4</sup> Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App.Cas. 523; Glegg v Bromley [1912] 3 K.B. 474; Cotton v Hcyl [1930] 1 Ch. 510; cf. Meek v Kettlewell (1843) 1 Ph. 342; The Annangel Glory [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 45 (actual decision reversed by Companies Act 1985, s.396(2)(g), as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.93); The Atika Hope [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 439 at 442 (where “or future chose” seems to be a misprint for “of a future chose”); Wu Koon Tai v Wy Yau Loi [1997] A.C. 179 at 189; The Cebu (No.2) [1993] Q.B. 1 (where it was not necessary to distinguish between an assignment and an agreement to assign); The Mount I [2001] EWCA Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 597 at [80] (“for value”); Smith v Smith [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1937 at [11].

<sup>5</sup> cf. Performing Rights Society v Rowland [1997] 3 All E.R. 336 at 348.

<sup>6</sup> e.g. Hughes v Pump House Hotel Co Ltd [1902] 2 K.B. 190.

<sup>7</sup> Norman v Commissioner of Taxation (1963) 109 C.I.R. 9.

<sup>8</sup> Shepherd v Commissioner of Taxation [1966] A.L.R. 969; The Mount I [2001] EWCA Civ 68; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 597, at [80].

<sup>9</sup> Williams v Commissioner of Inland Revenue [1965] N.Z.L.R. 395.

<sup>10</sup> Harding v Harding (1886) 17 Q.B.D. 442; Re Westerton [1919] 2 Ch. 104.

<sup>11</sup> See below after n.13 and below, p.685 at n.26.

(1) Before the Judicature Act 1873

There are two main views as to the position in equity before 1873.

(a) PROCEDURAL VIEW. According to one view, the need for consideration depended on the procedure for enforcing the assignment. In Re Westerton<sup>12</sup> Sargant J. gave the following reason for holding that a statutory assignment was effective without consideration: "Apart from the Judicature Act . . . the want of consideration would have been fatal to [the assignee's] claim. Prior to the Judicature Act . . . a legal chose in action such as this debt could not be transferred at law, and the assignee of the debt could only have sued in the name of the assignor, and in the absence of consent . . . or of a binding contract by the assignor . . . the use of the assignor's name could only have been enforced by filing a bill in equity . . . and equity would not have granted that relief unless the assignment had been for valuable consideration".<sup>13</sup> Since a statutory assignee can now sue the debtor without the co-operation of the assignor, "there is no reason for continuing against the assignee those terms which were imposed by equity as a condition of granting relief".<sup>14</sup> In other words, consideration is necessary if the assignee needs the co-operation of the assignor to recover the debt, but is not necessary if the assignee does not need such co-operation. If this were true three things would follow.

First: consideration should not have been necessary in the rare cases in which the assignee could sue alone at law.<sup>15</sup> This assumption is to some extent supported by the rule that the voluntary transferee of a negotiable instrument could sue all the parties liable on it, except the transferor.<sup>16</sup> But this rule was based on commercial practice, and not on the fact that the transferee did not need the co-operation of the transferor. It is not clear whether assignments of debts due to and from the Crown had to be supported by consideration.

Secondly: consideration should not have been necessary for absolute assignments of equitable choses, since the assignee could sue without the co-operation of the assignor.<sup>17</sup> This assumption, too, is borne out by cases in which such assignments were upheld, though they were voluntary. But in most of these cases the fact that the assignee could sue alone is not even mentioned, let alone relied on.<sup>18</sup> The decisions were based on the view that the assignor had made a completed gift.<sup>19</sup> And in some cases voluntary assignments of equitable choses were held invalid as incomplete gifts<sup>20</sup>; these are hard to explain on the procedural view.

Thirdly: consideration should have been generally<sup>21</sup> necessary for the assignment of a legal chose, since the assignee could not sue the debtor without the co-operation of the

<sup>12</sup> [1919] 2 Ch. 104.

<sup>13</sup> ibid. at 111.

<sup>14</sup> ibid. at 114.

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.672.

<sup>16</sup> Easton v Pratchett (1835) 1 Cr.M. & R. 798 at 808. There is no reference to consideration in Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, s.2, which deals with the transfer of rights arising under a contract contained in or evidenced by a bill of lading.

<sup>17</sup> See above, p.675.

<sup>18</sup> Exceptionally, the argument is mentioned in Ward v Aucland (1845) 8 Beav. 201 (the actual decision was doubted in Kekewich v Manning (1851) 1 D.M. & G. 176).

<sup>19</sup> Kekewich v Manning, above; Bentley v Mackay (1851) 15 Beav. 12; Vaile v Hughes (1854) 2 Sm. & G. 18; Donaldson v Donaldson (1854) Kay 711; Nanney v Morgan (1887) 37 Ch.D. 346; Re Way's Trust (1864) 2 D.J. & S. 365.

<sup>20</sup> e.g. Bridge v Bridge (1852) 16 Beav. 315 (doubted but distinguished in T Choithram International v Pagarani [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1 at 12); Beech v Keep (1854) 18 Beav. 285.

<sup>21</sup> Except where the legal chose was, even before the Judicature Act, assignable by some special statute (above, p.675) or at common law (above, p.672).

assignor. Here the procedural view breaks down. Although some voluntary assignments of legal choses were held invalid, others were upheld.<sup>22</sup> The distinction between valid and invalid assignments was not based on procedural requirements. It depended on the question whether the assignor had made a completed gift.

(b) COMPLETED GIFT VIEW. A person may enter into a contract to dispose of his property, or make a gift of it, or create a trust of the property in favour of another.

Consideration (or a deed) is clearly necessary for the validity of a contract to dispose of property, including a contract to assign a chose in action.

It is equally clear that consideration is not necessary for the validity of a trust of a chose in action.<sup>23</sup> All that is necessary is that the settlor should clearly have expressed his intention to create a trust. As in the case of trusts of promises for the benefit of a third party,<sup>24</sup> a mere intention to benefit is not enough: there must be an intention to create a trust. The settlor must intend to undertake a legally binding obligation to hold the subject-matter for the beneficiary, or to persuade someone else to undertake such an obligation.<sup>25</sup>

Consideration is also unnecessary for the validity of a completed gift. Thus in Harding v Harding<sup>26</sup> a voluntary statutory assignment was held binding on the ground that it was a completed gift. In many cases, the law requires a gift to be made in a prescribed way: for example, the gift of a chattel must be made by delivery with intention to pass the property, or by deed of gift.<sup>27</sup> If a purported gift of a chattel is not made in one of these two ways, it is incomplete or imperfect; and equity refuses to complete an imperfect gift by ordering the donor to make it in the proper legal manner.<sup>28</sup>

In the same way, a voluntary assignment of a chose in action did not bind the assignor unless it was made in the manner, if any, required by law. In Milroy v Lord<sup>29</sup> the owner of shares in a company voluntarily assigned them by deed poll. This was held to be an imperfect gift since the legal title to the shares could not be transferred except by the execution of a proper instrument of transfer. Turner L.J. said: "In order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property and render the settlement binding upon him."<sup>30</sup> The assignment thus failed as a gift but the assignees argued that it could still take effect

<sup>22</sup> Ex p. Pye (1811) Ves. 140; Fortescue v Barnett (1834) 3 My. & K. 36; M'Fadden v Jenkyns (1842) 1 Ph. 153; Paterson v Murphy (1853) 11 Hare 88; Richardson v Richardson (1867) L.R. 3 Eq. 686; Re King (1879) 14 Ch.D. 179 (where the assignment was made before the Judicature Act); cf. Re Patrick [1891] 1 Ch. 82 and Re Griffin [1899] 1 Ch. 408, in which the provisions of the Judicature Act relating to assignment were not mentioned.

<sup>23</sup> Ex p. Pye, above; Bentley v Mackay (1851) 15 Beav. 12; Paterson v Murphy, above; Richardson v Richardson, above; Re Richards (1887) 36 Ch.D. 541; Paul v Constance [1977] 1 W.L.R. 527. A declaration of trust is not, strictly, an assignment: see Grey v I.R.C. [1958] Ch. 690; affirmed on other grounds: [1960] A.C. 1.

<sup>24</sup> See above, pp.648–649.

<sup>25</sup> Bayley v Boulcott (1828) 4 Russ. 345; Smith v Warde (1845) 15 Sim. 56; Re Caplen's Estate (1876) 45 L.J.Ch. 280.

<sup>26</sup> (1886) 17 Q.B.D. 442.

<sup>27</sup> Re Breton's Estate (1881) 17 Ch.D. 416; Cochrane v Moore (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 57; Re Cole [1964] Ch. 175.

<sup>28</sup> Ellison v Ellison (1802) 6 Ves. 656 at 662. For a special exception in cases of so-called donatio mortis causa see Sen v Headley [1991] Ch. 425 (land); Woodward v Woodward [1995] 3 All E.R. 980 (chattel).

<sup>29</sup> (1862) 4 D.F. & J. 264; cf. Antrobus v Smith (1805) 12 Ves. 39; Dillon v Coppin (1839) 4 My. & Cr. 647; Jones v Lock (1865) L.R. 1 Ch.App. 25; Richards v Delbridge (1874) L.R. 18 Eq. 11; Heartley v Nicholson (1875) L.R. 19 Eq. 233; Re Shield (1885) 53 L.T. 5; Macedo v Stroud [1922] 2 A.C. 330; Re Wale [1956] 1 W.L.R. 1346; Pappadakis v Pappadakis [2000] 1 W.L.R. 79; McKay, 40 Conv. 139.

<sup>30</sup> (1862) 4 D.F. & J. 264 at 274.

as a declaration of trust. This argument, too, was rejected, as the donor had no intention to create a trust, but only an intention to make a gift.

A gift is only incomplete under the rule in Milroy v Lord if something more has to be done by the donor to transfer the property. If the donor has done all that he needs to do to transfer the property, the gift is complete even though further steps to vest the property in the donee have to be taken by a third party,<sup>31</sup> or by the donee himself.<sup>32</sup> The rigour of rule has, moreover, been mitigated in a number of ways. It has been held that, where the gift takes the form of a declaration of trust, the vesting of its subject-matter in one of a number of trustees suffices to complete the gift<sup>33</sup>; and that a gift of shares in a company may be completed by the execution of a proper instrument of transfer (coupled with evidence of intention that this was to take effect of a gift and with circumstances making it unconscionable for the donor to resile from the gift) even without delivery of the instrument of transfer to either the donee or to the company.<sup>34</sup> Where further steps to complete the gift are capable of being taken by the donee, the donor may constitute himself the agent for the donee to take those steps: e.g., by telling the donee that nothing more needs to be done by the donee to perfect the gift. Failure by the donor to take those steps will not then vitiate the gift if the donee has relied on the donor's statement so as to make it unconscionable for the donor to invoke that failure as a ground of invalidity.<sup>35</sup>

The rule in Milroy v Lord applied only to gifts which had, by law, to be made in a certain form. The only formal requirement for the assignment of an equitable chose was that it must be in writing.<sup>36</sup> Hence in Kekewich v Manning<sup>37</sup> a voluntary settlement in writing of an equitable interest in property was held binding on the settlor, since there was nothing more that he could have done to transfer the property. Again, in the absence of special rules, such as those governing the transfer of shares in companies, equity did not lay down any formal requirements for the transfer of legal choses. Thus in Fortescue v Barnett<sup>38</sup> a voluntary assignment by deed<sup>39</sup> of a life insurance policy<sup>40</sup> was held binding on the assignor, as there was nothing more that he could do to complete the transfer.

A gift may be imperfect for some reason other than failure to use the proper form. The donor may only have said that he would make a gift in the future, or subject to some condition which can only be satisfied by his doing some further act. Thus a gift "to my daughter when she marries a man of whom I approve" is imperfect until the donor gives his approval.

The "completed gift" view seems to be preferable to the "procedural" view in two respects. It is more consistent with the reasoning of the cases decided before the

<sup>31</sup> Re Rose [1952] Ch. 499; following Re Rose [1949] Ch. 78; cf. Mascall v Mascall (1985) P. & C.R. 119 (transfer of a house); contrast Re Fry [1946] Ch. 312.

<sup>32</sup> cf. Re Paradise Motor Co Ltd [1968] 1 W.L.R. 1125 (defective execution by transferee did not invalidate gift of shares).

<sup>33</sup> T Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1.

<sup>34</sup> Pennington v Waine [2002] E.W.C.A. Civ 227; [2002] 4 All E.R. 215; the execution of the instrument of transfer by donor is essential for this purpose: ibid. at [69].

<sup>35</sup> ibid., at [67].

<sup>36</sup> See above, p.678. cf. Chinn v Collins [1981] A.C. 533 at 548.

<sup>37</sup> (1851) 1 D.M. & G. 176; cf. Re Way's Trusts (1864) 2 D.J. & S. 365; Nanney v Morgan (1887) 37 Ch.D. 346, decided after the Judicature Act, but without reference to its provisions regarding assignments.

<sup>38</sup> (1834) 3 My. & K. 36; cf. Edwards v Jones (1836) 1 My. & Cr. 226; Re King (1879) 14 Ch.D. 179; Re Patrick [1891] 1 Ch. 82.

<sup>39</sup> This would not cure the want of consideration for the present purpose: above, p.682.

<sup>40</sup> See above, p.675: for assignment of life insurance policies.

Judicature Act. And it explains why voluntary assignments of legal choses were sometimes upheld.

(2) After the Judicature Act 1873

An assignment may now fail to be statutory, and so take effect (if at all) in equity, for one of three reasons.

(a) NO WRITTEN NOTICE. An assignment which fails to be statutory merely because written notice has not yet been given to the debtor is effective although it is not supported by consideration.<sup>41</sup> The assignor has done all that need be done by him to transfer the property, as notice can be given by the assignee. It would be futile to insist that the assignee must give consideration, since he could evade the requirement by simply writing to the debtor and so making the assignment statutory.

(b) NO WRITING. An oral assignment of an equitable chose is void, quite apart from the question of consideration.<sup>42</sup> It is more doubtful whether a voluntary oral assignment of a legal chose can be valid as a gift.

One view is that consideration is not now necessary in cases of this kind because the assignee no longer needs the co-operation of the assignor to sue the debtor: if the assignor refuses to join as co-claimant, he can simply be joined as co-defendant. But this argument is based on the untenable "procedural" view of the old rules of equity and it would fail even if that view were sound. It can make no difference whether the assignor is joined as co-claimant or as co-defendant. The important point is that he is joined at all. He is joined, not out of respect for history, but "to allow him to dispute the assignment."<sup>43</sup> One reason for disputing it might be that it was voluntary. If the assignor disputed the assignment on this ground, the debtor would in practice leave the assignor and assignee to fight out the dispute in which the debtor would have no interest. Thus in substance the assignor would be the sole defendant.<sup>44</sup> To argue that he will lose simply because he has been made defendant is to assume the very point in issue.

Another view is that an oral voluntary assignment of a legal chose in action fails as an imperfect gift under the rule in Milroy v Lord.<sup>45</sup> On this view, the proper way to transfer a debt is by making a statutory assignment. If the assignor does not put the assignment into writing, he has not done "everything which, according to the nature of the property . . . was necessary to be done [by him] to transfer the property". This view was adopted in the Australian case of Olsson v Dyson<sup>46</sup> where a voluntary oral assignment of a debt was accordingly held ineffective.

Under the first of the above views, all oral voluntary assignments of legal choses would be valid; under the second they would all be invalid. Neither of these conclusions can be accepted. The law may recognise two ways of making a gift of a chose in action, just as it recognises two ways of making a gift of a chattel.<sup>47</sup> Before the Judicature Act a gift of a chose in action could be made by equitable assignment and equity laid down no formal requirements for this purpose. The Act provided a second method of making such a gift, without necessarily affecting the first. Thus in German v Yates<sup>48</sup> a voluntary oral assignment of a debt was held binding on the personal representatives of the

<sup>41</sup> Holt v Heatherfield Trust Ltd [1942] 2 K.B. 1.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.679.

<sup>43</sup> Durham Bros v Robertson [1898] 1 Q.B. 765 at 770.

<sup>44</sup> cf. above, p.675.

<sup>45</sup> (1862) 4 D.F. & J. 264; above, p.684.

<sup>46</sup> (1969) 120 C.L.R. 365.

<sup>47</sup> See above, p.685.

<sup>48</sup> (1915) 32 T.L.R. 52.

assignor. Lush J. rejected the argument that the gift was imperfect, and said that the Judicature Act had not "destroyed equitable assignments or impaired their validity in any way".<sup>49</sup>

The true position seems to be that oral voluntary assignments of legal choses can be valid so long as they are perfect gifts. They are not imperfect merely for want of writing, but they may be imperfect for some other reason. In particular, there may be room for doubt whether an oral statement was a completed gift, rather than a promise to make a gift in the future.

(c) NOT ABSOLUTE. There are three reasons why an assignment may not be absolute.<sup>50</sup>

(i) Part of a debt. An assignment of part of a debt may be effective without consideration. This can be deduced from Re McArdle.<sup>51</sup> A testator left his estate in equal shares to his five children. The wife of one of them, at her own expense, made improvements to a farm belonging to the estate. Thereafter, the children wrote to the wife: "In consideration of your carrying out certain alterations . . . we . . . hereby agree that the executors shall repay you [£488] from the estate." This promise was supported only by past consideration<sup>52</sup> and was held to be ineffective because it purported to be a contract and not a gift. It was further said that, even if the letter could be construed as a gift, it was not perfect, because something more had to be done by the donors; the executors could not have paid the wife without referring back to the children to find out whether the work had been done to their satisfaction.<sup>53</sup> On this reasoning, the result would have been different if the letter had on its face been a gift and had involved no reference back to the children. A letter simply saying "We hereby agree that the executors shall pay you £488 out of the estate" would have been a valid equitable assignment.

(ii) By way of charge. The question whether an assignment by way of charge must be supported by consideration is not likely to arise. Such an assignment is almost always made to secure a debt, so that there will generally be consideration for it in the shape of the assignee's advancing money or promising not to sue or actually forbearing to sue.<sup>54</sup> Moreover, such an assignment is usually intended to operate as a disposition by way of contract, and cannot be construed as a gift merely because, for some technical reason, there is no consideration. Even if the assignment were intended to operate as a gift, the fact that the amount assigned would fluctuate from time to time as the assignor increased or decreased his indebtedness to the assignee would show that the gift was not perfect.

(iii) Conditional. The validity of a voluntary conditional assignment depends on the nature of the condition. An assignment of rent due under a lease "to A until she marries" might well be a perfect gift, and so might an assignment "to A when she marries", unless it is construed as a promise to make a gift in the future. But a gift "to A when she marries a man of whom I approve"<sup>55</sup> would be imperfect as it could not take effect until some further act had been done by the donor.

<sup>49</sup> ibid. at 53. He also said that the assignor might have been able to revoke the assignment but that his personal representative could not do so; and that there might have been consideration for the agreement because the parties thought there was. No reasons were given for these puzzling statements. The decision is, however, consistent with the mitigations of the rule in Milroy v Lord described on p.632, above, at nn.33 and 34.

<sup>50</sup> See above, pp.676–678.

<sup>51</sup> [1951] Ch. 669; Stone, 14 M.I.L.R. 356.

<sup>52</sup> See above, p.77.

<sup>53</sup> For criticism of this reasoning, see R. E. M., 67 L.Q.R. 295.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.87–91.

<sup>55</sup> It is assumed that this is a condition and not consideration (cf. above, p.72).

SECTION 6. SUBJECT TO EQUITIES

An assignee takes “subject to equities”,<sup>56</sup> i.e. subject to any defects in the assignor’s title and subject to certain claims which the debtor has against the assignor. He takes subject to such defects and claims whether they arise at law or in equity, and whether or not he knew of their existence when he took his assignment.<sup>57</sup> And he cannot recover more than the assignor could have recovered. The object of these rules is to ensure that the debtor is not prejudiced by the assignment.<sup>58</sup>

1. Defects of Title

An assignor cannot confer any title if he had none himself. Thus if a builder assigns money to become due to him under a building contract, and then fails to perform the contract so that the money never becomes due, the assignee takes nothing.<sup>59</sup> Similarly, the assignee of a contract which is affected by mistake or illegality generally<sup>60</sup> takes no greater rights than the assignor would have had. And the assignee of a contract which is voidable for a misrepresentation made by the assignor takes subject to the right of the debtor to set the contract aside.<sup>61</sup> Defences available by the terms of the contract to the debtor against the assignor can similarly be raised against the assignee.<sup>62</sup> On the other hand payment of the debt to the assignor is a defence against the assignee only if made before notice of the assignment was given to the debtor<sup>63</sup> and the same is presumably true of rescission of the contract assigned by subsequent agreement between debtor and assignor.

2. Claims by Debtor against Assignor

The debtor may have claims<sup>64</sup> against the assignor which he could set up, if he were sued by the assignor, to diminish or extinguish his liability. Whether he can rely on such claims against the assignee depends on the way in which they arose.

(1) Claims arising out of the contract assigned

If the debtor has claims arising out of the contract assigned, on which he could have relied by way of defence or set off against the assignor, he can also rely on those claims against the assignee, and he can do so whether the claims have arisen before or after notice of the assignment is given to him.<sup>65</sup> Thus if a builder assigns money due to him under a

<sup>56</sup> Ord v White (1840) 3 Beav. 357; Mangles v Dixon (1852) 3 H.L.C. 702 at 731; Law of Property Act 1925, s.136(1).

<sup>57</sup> Athenaeum Soc v Pooley (1853) 3 D. & J. 294.

<sup>58</sup> cf. Sinclair v British Telecommunications plc [2001] 1 W.L.R. 38; (action by assignee stayed till an order for costs against assignor on an earlier action on the same contract had been satisfied).

<sup>59</sup> Tooth v Hallett (1869) L.R. 4 Ch.App. 242.

<sup>60</sup> An assignee for value may be able to enforce a life insurance policy though the estate of the assured could not do so because he died by his own hand: above, p.439.

<sup>61</sup> See above, pp.370 et seq.

<sup>62</sup> The League [1984] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 259 (arbitration clause); Glencore International AG v Metro Trading International Inc [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 899 at 917 (exclusive jurisdiction clause).

<sup>63</sup> See above, p.681.

<sup>64</sup> For this purpose legal (as opposed to equitable) claims can be “equities”: Roxburghe v Cox (1881) 17 Ch.D. 520; Glencore Grain Ltd v Argos Trading Co [1999] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 410 at 420.

<sup>65</sup> Graham v Johnson (1869) L.R. 8 Eq. 36; William Pickersgill & Sons Ltd v London & Provincial Marine, etc., Insurance Co Ltd [1912] 3 K.B. 614; The Raven [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 266; contrast The Dominique [1987] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 239 at 251, (approved [1989] A.C. 1056 at 1109–1101), where the debtor’s claim could not have been set up against the assignor (below, p.788, n.32) and was therefore not available against the assignee.

building contract, and then commits a breach of that contract, the debtor can set off against the assignee the amount of any damages which he could have recovered from the assignor.<sup>66</sup> If this amount exceeds the sum assigned, the assignee will not be entitled to anything; but he is not liable to the debtor for the excess<sup>67</sup> as he is not himself in breach of the contract. Nor, once the assignee has been paid, is he liable to return the payment merely because events later happen which make the assignor liable to return it to the debtor.<sup>68</sup>

If the debtor has been induced to enter into the contract by a misrepresentation on the part of the assignor, he can rely against the assignee on the right to rescind the contract on that ground<sup>69</sup>; but a further problem arises where that right has been lost. In Stoddart v Union Trust Ltd,<sup>70</sup> the defendants were induced by the fraud of one Price to buy a business from him. Price made an assignment of £800, part of the agreed price, and the assignees now claimed this sum from the defendants. Two defences were raised. First, the defendants counterclaimed for damages for Price's fraud, but such a claim could not be made against the assignees, as they were not themselves guilty of fraud, nor responsible for the fraud of Price. Secondly, the defendants pleaded that by reason of Price's fraud they had suffered loss exceeding £800, so that no money was due from them. This defence would have succeeded against Price; but it failed against the assignees as the claim for damages did not "arise out of the contract in question at all"<sup>71</sup> but was "something dehors the contract".<sup>72</sup> The decision seems to lead to the regrettable result that a contract may be worth more in the hands of the assignee than in the hands of the assignor, and so to defeat the purpose of the rule that an assignee takes "subject to equities". No attempt was made by the defendants to rely simply on their right to rescind the contract. They had disposed of the subject-matter and seem to have assumed that they could not rescind as they were unable to make restitution.<sup>73</sup> But the victim of a criminal fraud can rely on it by way of defence without making restitution.<sup>74</sup> This defence would seem to be an "equity" and should have been available against the assignee.

(2) Claims arising out of other transactions

(a) CLAIMS AGAINST ASSIGNOR. The debtor may have a claim against the assignor arising out of some transaction other than the contract assigned: e.g. a debtor may owe money under a building contract and in turn have a claim against the builder for the price of goods sold and delivered. Such a claim can only be set up against an assignee of the debt due under the building contract if it arose before notice of the assignment was given to the debtor.<sup>75</sup> If the claim arises later, the debtor is not prejudiced by being unable to raise it against the assignee. He knows that the assignor is no longer his creditor in respect of the debt assigned and cannot therefore expect to set off against it any claims which he may later acquire against the assignor.

<sup>66</sup> cf. Govt of Newfoundland v Newfoundland Ry (1888) 13 App.Cas. 199.

<sup>67</sup> Young v Kitchin (1878) 3 Ex.D. 127.

<sup>68</sup> The Trident Beauty [1994] 1 W.L.R. 161.

<sup>69</sup> See Banco Santander SA v Bayfern Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 766.

<sup>70</sup> [1912] 1 K.B. 181; the decision is viewed with scepticism in the Banco Santander case, above, n.69.

<sup>71</sup> [1912] 1 K.B. 181 at 193.

<sup>72</sup> ibid. at 194.

<sup>73</sup> See above, pp.377 et seq.

<sup>74</sup> See above, pp.373–374.

<sup>75</sup> Stephens v Venables (1862) 30 Beav. 625; cf. Watson v Mid Wales Ry (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 593; Roxburghe v Cox (1881) 17 Ch.D. 520; Business Computers Ltd v Anglo-African Leasing Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 578.

(b) CLAIMS AGAINST INTERMEDIATE ASSIGNEE. Where a debt which has been assigned to one person is then assigned by him to another, the question may arise whether a claim or defence which the debtor has against the first assignee can be set up against the second assignee. Such a claim or defence should be available against the second assignee, if it arose after the first assignment,<sup>76</sup> but before notice of the second assignment had been given to the debtor. If the debtor paid the first assignee before the notice of the second assignment, he would clearly not have to make a second payment to the second assignee. The same rule should apply if the debtor supplied goods to the first assignee on the terms that the price was to be set off against the debt assigned.<sup>77</sup>

(c) PROVISIONS OF THE CONTRACT. The rule that claims arising before notice of the assignment can be set off against the assignee may be excluded by the express provisions of the contract creating the debt. Such provisions are often found in debentures issued by companies to secure loans, since the rule that an assignee takes subject to equities unduly restricts the transferability of such instruments.<sup>78</sup>

3. Assignee Cannot Recover More than Assignor

The assignee cannot recover more from the debtor than the assignor could have done. Thus in Dawson v GN & City Ry<sup>79</sup> a landowner had a statutory claim against a railway company for injuriously affecting his land. He sold the land and assigned the statutory claim to the buyer. It was held that the railway company's liability to the buyer must be measured by the loss which would have been suffered by the assignor and that any extra loss suffered by the buyer by reason of a trade carried on by him, but not by the assignor, must be disregarded.

SECTION 7. NEGOTIABILITY

Special rules apply to the assignment of certain written contracts, called negotiable instruments, such as bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. A bill of exchange is a written order made by one person (the drawer) requiring another (the drawee) to pay a sum of money either to, or to the order of, the drawer or a named third person, or simply to the bearer.<sup>80</sup> If the drawee accepts the bill, he becomes liable as acceptor of a bill. A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand<sup>81</sup>; cheques are now usually deprived of negotiability by being crossed "a/c payee" or "a/c payee only".<sup>82</sup> A promissory note is an unconditional promise in writing to pay a person a sum of money.<sup>83</sup> The categories of negotiable instruments are not closed, so that instruments

<sup>76</sup> Not if it arose before then, since in that case the debtor can have had no expectation of being able to set it up in diminution of the debt assigned: The Raven [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 266.

<sup>77</sup> According to a dictum in Re Milan Tramways Co (1884) 25 Ch.D. 587 at 593 an ultimate assignee takes "free from any equities which only attach on the intermediate assignee"; but this view could cause injustice to the debtor, and the actual decision can be explained on the ground that the intermediate assignee's liability to the debtor was not established until after the second assignment had been made (see ibid., at 637). The actual decision in the Milan Tramways case was approved in Fryer v Ewart [1902] A.C. 187 at 192.

<sup>78</sup> Pennington, Company Law (7th ed.), pp.612–613.

<sup>79</sup> [1905] 1 K.B. 260.

<sup>80</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.3.

<sup>81</sup> ibid. s.73.

<sup>82</sup> ibid. s.81A, as inserted by Cheques Act 1992; Eso Petroleum Ltd v Milton [1997] 1 W.L.R. 938 at 946, 954.

<sup>83</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.83(1). A promissory note must be distinguished from an IOU, which is only evidence of a debt.

can still become negotiable by mercantile custom, that is, by being regularly so treated by businessmen.<sup>84</sup>

The transfer of a negotiable instrument differs from the assignment of an ordinary chose in action in the following ways.

1. Transfer

A negotiable instrument is actually or potentially transferable by delivery. A bill of exchange payable to bearer can be transferred by simply handing it to the transferee. If a bill of exchange is payable to the order of A, he can transfer it by indorsing it, i.e. by signing his name on it, and then handing it to the transferee. Notice of the transfer need not be given to the person or persons liable on the instrument.

2. Defects of Title

An ordinary assignee takes "subject to equities".<sup>85</sup> But negotiable instruments pass from hand to hand like cash, so that it is particularly important that those who deal with them should be able to rely on their apparent validity. The transferee of a negotiable instrument therefore takes it free from certain defects in the title of prior parties<sup>86</sup> and from defences available among them, if he is a "holder in due course".<sup>87</sup> Such a holder is a person in possession of the instrument who has in good faith given value for it, provided that it is complete and regular on its face, not overdue and that it has not, to his knowledge, been dishonoured.<sup>88</sup> Every holder is prima facie deemed to be a holder in due course<sup>89</sup> unless the instrument is affected by fraud, duress or illegality<sup>90</sup>; but even in such a case the holder can still enforce the instrument if he can prove that he in fact gave value for the instrument in good faith. The only cases in which his title is no better than that of the transferor are those in which a party's signature to the instrument is wholly void, i.e. for mistake or under statute.<sup>91</sup>

3. Consideration

The holder of a bill of exchange is deemed to be a holder for value if value<sup>92</sup> has at any time<sup>93</sup> been given for the bill. Thus he can enforce it against (for example) the acceptor even though he himself gave no consideration for it. This rule should be distinguished from the further rule that consideration is not necessary for the validity of a transfer of a negotiable instrument.<sup>94</sup> Suppose that A draws a bill of exchange on B who accepts it. If A transfers the bill to C, neither A nor B can deny the validity of the transfer on the ground that it was gratuitous. But B can escape liability by showing that his acceptance was gratuitous, and that C gave no consideration for the transfer. Want of consideration

<sup>84</sup> Crouch v Crédit Foncier of England Ltd (1873) L.R. 8 Q.B. 374.

<sup>85</sup> See above, p.689.

<sup>86</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.38(2).

<sup>87</sup> ibid. s.29. And see Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.125, for special provisions designed to prevent evasions of that Act.

<sup>88</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.29(1).

<sup>89</sup> ibid., s.30(2).

<sup>90</sup> ibid.

<sup>91</sup> Foster v Mackinnon (1869) L.R. 4 C.P. 704; for contracts declared to be "void" by statute, see above, p.513.

<sup>92</sup> An antecedent debt or liability is sufficient by way of exception to the rule that consideration must not be past: Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s.27(1)(b); above, p.80.

<sup>93</sup> ibid. s.27(2).

<sup>94</sup> Easton v Pratchett (1835) 1 Cr.M. & R. 798 at 808. The transferee could not sue the transferor, but the transferor could not prevent the transferee from collecting the amount due from the other parties liable.

may enable the acceptor to resist an action on the bill. But it does not entitle the transferor to deny the validity of the transfer.

SECTION 8. RIGHTS WHICH ARE NOT ASSIGNABLE

1. Contracts Expressed to be Not Assignable

If a contract provides that the rights arising under it shall not be assigned, a purported assignment of such rights is not only a breach of that contract but is also ineffective, in the sense that it does not give the assignee any rights against the debtor.<sup>95</sup> For example, a hire-purchase agreement may provide that the rights of the hirer shall not be assignable; and if he nevertheless purports to assign them, the assignee cannot enforce them against the owner.<sup>96</sup> But an assignment of the benefit of a contract which is expressed to be not assignable may be binding as a contract or as a declaration of trust between assignor and assignee. Thus it has been held that a settlement of an insurance policy, expressed to be not assignable, could be enforced by the beneficiaries against the settlor.<sup>97</sup>

2. Personal Contracts

The benefit of a contract cannot be assigned if it is clear that the debtor is willing to perform only in favour of one particular creditor, and if it would be unjust to force him to perform in favour of another. In such cases it is sometimes said that the “personal” nature of the contract prevents assignment.

An important application of this principle is that an employer cannot assign the benefit of his employee’s promise to serve. It has been said that the right of the employee to choose whom he would serve “constituted the main difference between a servant and a serf”.<sup>98</sup> But in the case of an employee of a company, this right of choice will often depend on distinctions which are somewhat technical. If the shares in the company are sold, and its directors are replaced by others in the course of a take-over bid, the employee is, it seems, bound to go on serving the company. In law he still has the same employer<sup>99</sup> but his right of choice is in such cases of more theoretical than real importance. If, on the other hand, the company sells its business, then at common law the

<sup>95</sup> Helstan Securities Ltd v Hertfordshire CC [1978] 3 All E.R. 262; Munday [1979] C.L.J. 50; Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 A.C. 85 (rejecting the argument that such a prohibition is contrary to public policy); Bamejem Ltd v MC Fabrications Ltd [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 377 at 328; cf. Hendry v Chartsearch Ltd [1998] C.L.C. 1382 (assignment invalid where contract required debtor’s consent and that consent had not been sought); see generally Goode, 42 M.L.R. 453; Alcock [1983] C.L.J. 328. For the construction of clauses prohibiting assignment, see Flood v Shand Construction Ltd (1987) 81 B.L.R. 31.

<sup>96</sup> United Dominion Trust Ltd v Parkway Motors [1955] 1 W.L.R. 719 (disapproved as to the effect of such a provision on measure of damages in Wickham Holdings Ltd v Brooke House Motors Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 295). Apart from such clauses prohibiting assignment, hire-purchase agreements are assignable: Whiteley Ltd v Hilt [1918] 2 K.B. 808.

<sup>97</sup> Re Turcan (1888) 40 Ch.D. 5. cf. Don King Productions Inc. v Warren [2000] Ch. 291; Spellman v Spellman [1961] 1 W.L.R. 921.

<sup>98</sup> Nokes v Doncaster Amalgamated Collieries Ltd [1940] A.C. 1014 at 1026; cf. Denman v Midland Employer’s Mutual Assurance Soc Ltd [1955] 2 Q.B. 437; Smith v Blandford Gee Cementation Ltd [1970] 3 All E.R. 154 at 163; O’Brien (Inspector of Taxes) v Benson’s Hosiery (Holdings) Ltd [1980] A.C. 562 at 572; Don King case, above n.97.

<sup>99</sup> cf. Re Mack Trucks (Britain) Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 780; Griffiths v S of S for Social Services [1974] Q.B. 468; Nicholl v Cutts 1985 P.C.C. 311; (service contracts not determined by appointment of receiver); cf. Gill & Duffus SA v Rionda Futures Ltd [1994] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 67 at 83, 84 (guarantee not terminated by change of ownership of guarantor company).

effect of the sale is to terminate the contracts of employment.<sup>1</sup> This common law rule has in turn been modified by delegated legislation,<sup>2</sup> by which certain transfers of undertakings do not terminate the contracts of their employees. Each contract of employment is kept in being as if it had originally been made between the employee and the transferee of the undertaking.<sup>3</sup> It follows that the contract can be enforced by the transferee against the employee,<sup>4</sup> but the employee can avoid this consequence by giving notice to the transferor or to the transferee that he objects to becoming employed by the transferee<sup>5</sup>; hence his legal right to choose his employer is preserved.

The common law principle applies to all contracts involving personal confidence. Thus a publisher cannot assign the benefit of an author's contract to write a book if the author relied on the publisher's skill and judgment as a publisher.<sup>6</sup> And the holder of a motor insurance policy cannot assign it since the insurer relies on the holder's skill and record as a driver.<sup>7</sup> It may be that even the benefit of a builder's promise under a building contract cannot be assigned, since such contracts are "pregnant with disputes" so that the builder may intend to deal only "with the particular employer with whom he has chosen to enter into a contract"<sup>8</sup>

The principle may even apply to contracts for the sale of goods. Thus it has been held that the benefit of a contract to supply coal on credit to a retail coal merchant could not be assigned to his successor in the business. In making the contract, the sellers had relied on the original buyer's business experience; and to force them to give credit to his successor (who had no such experience) would subject them to quite a different business risk.<sup>9</sup> Again in Kemp v Baerselman<sup>10</sup> a farmer agreed to supply to a baker all the eggs which the latter should need in his business for one year; and the baker agreed not to buy eggs elsewhere during that period. The baker sold his business to a large company, to whom he purported to assign the benefit of his contract with the farmer. It was held that the farmer was justified in refusing to supply eggs to the company. One reason for the decision was that the baker's promise to deal exclusively with the farmer could not be enforced against the company.<sup>11</sup> Thus if the farmer were compelled to supply eggs to the company he would be subject to all the burdens of the original contract, but would lose the privilege of exclusive trading for which he had originally bargained.

<sup>1</sup> Re Foster Clark Ltd's Indenture Trusts [1966] 1 W.L.R. 125.

<sup>2</sup> Giving effect to EC Council Directive, 77/187/EEC.

<sup>3</sup> Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 (SI 1981/1794), reg.5(1), as amended by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.33 and Collective Redundancies and Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/2587). cf. also Learning & Skills Act 2000, s.95.

<sup>4</sup> Morris Angel & Son Ltd v Hollande [1993] I.C.R. 71; cf. News v British Airways [1992] I.R.L.R. 575. For enforcement by the employee against the transferee, see below, p.704.

<sup>5</sup> See the 1993 amendments of the 1981 Regulations (above n.3); Humphreys v Oxford University [2000] I.C.R. 405.

<sup>6</sup> Stevens v Benning (1854) 1 K. & J. 168; 6 D.M. & G. 223; Hole v Bradbury (1879) 12 Ch.D. 886; Griffith v Tower Publishing Co [1897] 1 Ch. 21.

<sup>7</sup> Peters v G.A.F.L.4C [1937] 4 All E.R. 628.

<sup>8</sup> Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 105, where the point was put beyond doubt by an express provision prohibiting assignment by either party without the written consent of the other.

<sup>9</sup> Cooper v Micklefield Coal & Lime Co Ltd (1912) 107 L.T. 457.

<sup>10</sup> [1906] 2 K.B. 604.

<sup>11</sup> For the validity of such exclusive dealing arrangements, see above, pp.468–472. Where a lease contains such a covenant by the tenant (e.g. one to buy all the petrol that he needs for his business on the premises) it may "run with the land". If so, the principle in Kemp v Baerselman does not apply and the covenant is at common law enforceable against an assignee of the landlord's interest in the land by virtue of the rules referred to on p.645 above: Clegg v Hands (1890) 44 Ch. D. 503; Caerns Motor Services Ltd v Texaco Ltd [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1249. For the effect of the Competition Act 1998 see s.50 above, p.476.

But the benefit of a long-term contract for the sale of goods can be assigned if it was expressly or impliedly made with the buyer or his assigns. In Tolhurst v Associated Portland Cement Co<sup>12</sup> Tolhurst agreed that he would for 50 years supply to Imperial so much chalk as it should require for the manufacture of cement on certain land which was described in the contract. Imperial sold its business to Associated (a much larger concern), to which it purported to assign the benefit of its contract with Tolhurst. It was held that Tolhurst was not justified in refusing to supply chalk to Associated, since the contract was impliedly made between the parties and their respective assigns. The fact that Associated was a larger concern than Imperial did not increase Tolhurst's burden, since the contract obliged him only to supply so much chalk as was needed on the land originally occupied by Imperial.

It seems that the rule against the assignment of "personal" contracts does not apply where the creditor has an accrued right to a fixed sum of money. A person who is indebted to an indulgent creditor cannot apparently complain if the creditor assigns the debt to the debtor's trade rival (who may make him bankrupt), or to a debt-collecting agency.<sup>13</sup>

In cases of this kind, one party may be able to assign the benefit of the contract while the other cannot do so. Thus in Kemp v Baerselman<sup>14</sup> the farmer could no doubt have assigned the benefit of the baker's promise to pay for the eggs.

Where a purported assignment fails because of the "personal" nature of the debtor's obligation, the transaction may nevertheless take effect between assignor and assignee by way of contract between them or by way of trust.<sup>15</sup>

3. Mere Rights of Action

Equity in general<sup>16</sup> regarded the common law's fear that assignments would lead to maintenance as exaggerated. But where assignments in fact savoured of maintenance<sup>17</sup> or champerty,<sup>18</sup> equity refused to enforce them. The Criminal Law Act 1967 abolishes criminal and tortious liability for maintenance and champerty<sup>19</sup> but goes on to provide that this "shall not affect any rule of law as to the cases in which a contract<sup>20</sup> is to be treated as contrary to public policy or otherwise illegal".<sup>21</sup> The rule against the assignment of certain rights known as "mere rights of action" has therefore survived the 1967 Act.<sup>22</sup> But, partly as a result of the Act, and partly as a result of the current "more liberal attitude"<sup>23</sup> towards maintenance and champerty, the courts have considerably restricted the scope of the rule.

<sup>12</sup> [1903] A.C. 414; cf. Shayler v Woolf [1946] Ch. 320.

<sup>13</sup> cf. Fitzroy v Cave [1905] 2 K.B. 364. But the "personality" of the creditor may be material to the debtor: see Gordon v Street [1899] 2 Q.B. 641.

<sup>14</sup> [1906] 2 K.B. 604, above p.694.

<sup>15</sup> Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2000] Ch. 291; cf. above, p.693 at n.97.

<sup>16</sup> See above, p.674.

<sup>17</sup> Rees v De Bernardy [1896] 2 Ch. 437.

<sup>18</sup> Laurent v Sale & Co [1963] 1 W.L.R. 829; Trendtex Trading Co v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679 at 694–695; Camdex International Ltd v Bank of Zambia [1998] Q.B. 22 at 37. For a champerty, see above, p.430.

<sup>19</sup> ss.13(1) and (2).

<sup>20</sup> An assignment will often be a contract between assignor and assignee even though such a transaction may also be effective without consideration (above, pp.682–688) or even agreement: communication to the assignee is necessary, but not assent by him (above, p.680).

<sup>21</sup> s.14(2).

<sup>22</sup> Trendtex Trading Corp v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679.

<sup>23</sup> ibid. at 702. cf. Giles v Thompson [1994] 1 A.C. 142; see also Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, ss.58 and 58A, above, p.431.

(1) Claims in tort

A right of action in tort cannot generally be assigned.<sup>24</sup> A person who is defamed or assaulted cannot sell his right to sue the tortfeasor. He can, however, sue the tortfeasor and agree to assign any damages he may recover; this is unobjectionable as it does not give the assignee any right to interfere with the conduct of the action.<sup>25</sup> Exceptionally, a right of action in tort can be assigned to an insurance company which has compensated the victim of the tort<sup>26</sup> and by a trustee in bankruptcy or the liquidator of an insolvent company who is, by statute, entitled to sell all rights of action for the benefit of the bankrupt's or of the company's creditors.<sup>27</sup>

The generality of the rule against assignment of claims in tort is open to criticism. Such claims may be brought to assert rights of property; and it is hard to see why the assignment of a right of action in (for example) conversion is more likely to lead to maintenance than the assignment of a debt.<sup>28</sup> Some tort claims can be enforced by quasi-contractual (or restitutionary) actions,<sup>29</sup> and it is arguable that the assignment of these, at least, should be allowed.<sup>30</sup>

(2) Liquidated claims

A liquidated sum due under contract (e.g. for money lent, goods supplied, or services rendered) or otherwise<sup>31</sup> can be assigned in spite of the fact that the debtor denies liability. A debtor cannot destroy the assignability of a debt by refusing to pay it.<sup>32</sup> Nor is it relevant that such an assignment is made or taken with an oblique motive. An assignment of a debt is not invalid merely because its object is to enable the assignee to make the debtor bankrupt.<sup>33</sup>

(3) Unliquidated claims

If the benefit of a contract, e.g. to deliver goods, is assigned before breach, the assignee can claim damages for the seller's subsequent refusal to deliver the goods. But it is less

<sup>24</sup> Defries v Milne [1913] 1 Ch. 98.

<sup>25</sup> Glegg v Bromley [1912] 3 K.B. 474; Trendlex Trading Corp v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679 at 702.

<sup>26</sup> King v Victoria Insurance Co [1896] A.C. 250; Compania Colombiana de Seguros v Pacific Steam Navigation Co [1965] 1 Q.B. 101. Even if there is no assignment, the insurer is, to the extent that he has compensated the victim, entitled to be subrogated to the latter's rights against the tortfeasor: see Hobbs v Marlowe [1978] A.C. 16 at 37; cf. Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.79; Napier & Ettrick v Kershaw [1993] A.C. 713 at 732; Caledonia North Sea Ltd v Norton (No.2) Ltd [2002] UKHL 4; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 321. The insurer must in such a case sue in the name of the insured: see The Aiolos [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 25 (where the claim was in contract); M H Smith (Plant Hire) Ltd v D L Mainmaring (T/A Inshore) [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 244, where the insured was a company which had been wound up, so that the insurer lost his rights by way of subrogation; Eso Petroleum Co Ltd v Hall Russell & Co Ltd [1989] A.C. 643. Amounts recovered by the insurer in excess of those to which he is entitled must be held for the insured: Lorrho Exports Ltd v ECGD [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 649.

<sup>27</sup> Norglen Ltd v Reeds Rains Prudential Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 1 at 11–12.

<sup>28</sup> In Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No.1) [1996] Q.B. 292 no objection seems to have been raised to the assignment on the ground that its subject matter was described at 305 as a claim "for a tortious wrong". cf., in Australia, South Australian Management Corp v Sheehan [1995] A.L.M. 3577.

<sup>29</sup> i.e. in cases of so-called "waiver" of tort where the tort benefits the defendant, e.g. where he converts the claimant's property. See Goff & Jones, The Law of Restitution (6th ed.), Chap.36; Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution, Chap.10.

<sup>30</sup> cf. Re Berkeley Securities (Property) Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1589 at 1611.

<sup>31</sup> Dawson v Great Northern and City Ry [1905] 1 K.B. 260.

<sup>32</sup> County Hotel & Wine Co v London and North Western Ry [1918] 2 K.B. 251 at 258; Camdex International Ltd v Bank of Zambia [1998] Q.B. 22.

<sup>33</sup> Fitzroy v Cave [1905] 2 K.B. 364; Camdex case, above, at p.32; for a different oblique motive, see Deposit Protection Board v Dalia [1994] 2 A.C. 367 and see below, p.698 at n.56.

clear whether the right to claim unliquidated damages for breach of contract can be assigned after the contract has already been broken.

One view is that such a right is a "mere" right of action and cannot be assigned.<sup>34</sup> But this view causes difficulty where the contract provides for the payment of a fixed sum in the event of its breach. Such a provision may be (i) invalid as a penalty, in which case no more than the actual loss is recoverable; or (ii) valid as a liquidated damages clause, in which case the fixed sum (no more and no less) is recoverable.<sup>35</sup> According to the present view, the assignment would be valid if the contractual provision were a liquidated damages clause, and invalid if the contractual provision were penal. But this distinction has no relevance to the tendency of the assignment to maintenance.

Another view is that a right to claim unliquidated damages for breach of contract can, generally,<sup>36</sup> be assigned. But this view in turn gives rise to difficulty where the claim which has been assigned could be framed in contract or in tort.<sup>37</sup> The assignability of the right to damages can hardly depend on the way in which it is described.

As both the views so far discussed are unsatisfactory, the law has adopted the intermediate view that a right to unliquidated damages for breach of contract may be validly assigned, so long as the assignment does not in fact savour of maintenance or champerty. If, for example, the assignee has a proprietary interest in the subject-matter, the assignment is valid since maintenance is committed only where a person interferes in another's litigation without having a genuine or substantial interest<sup>38</sup> in the outcome. Thus a vendor of land can assign to the purchaser the right to claim damages for breaches of covenant committed by the vendor's tenants before the sale<sup>39</sup>; and a buyer of goods which turn out to be defective can assign his claim in respect of the defect to a sub-buyer to whom he has resold the goods.<sup>40</sup> Similarly, "a conveyance of land can include the right to set aside an earlier transaction relating to it".<sup>41</sup> And a person can assign the benefit of a specifically enforceable contract, though the assignee elects, or is forced, to claim damages.<sup>42</sup>

Even where the assignee has no proprietary interest, the assignment may be valid if he has a "genuine commercial interest"<sup>43</sup> in the subject-matter of the action. Thus in Trendtex Trading Ltd v Crédit Suisse<sup>44</sup> a bank had financed a sale of cement by one of its customers. It was held that the bank could validly have taken an assignment from the

<sup>34</sup> May v Lane (1894) 64 L.J.Q.B. 236 at 237, 238.

<sup>35</sup> See below, pp.999–1007.

<sup>36</sup> In County Hotel & Wine Co v London and North Western Ry, above, at p.259, an exception is made for contracts which are "personal" in the sense discussed at pp.693–695, above.

<sup>37</sup> e.g. Mathews v Kuwait Bechtel Corp [1959] 2 Q.B. 57 at 77; and see below, pp.983–984.

<sup>38</sup> Martell v Consett Iron Co Ltd [1955] Ch. 363.

<sup>39</sup> Williams v Protheroe (1829) 5 Bing 309; Defries v Milne [1913] 1 Ch. 98; Ellis v Torrington [1920] 1 K.B. 399.

<sup>40</sup> Total Liban SA v Vitol Energy SA [2001] Q.B. 643.

<sup>41</sup> Defries v Milne [1913] 1 Ch. 98 at 110, citing Dickinson v Burrell (1866) L.R. 1 Eq. 337 (see especially p.342). The only point of these dicta is that such an assignment is not champertous. On the issue of the assignability of a right to rescind, they are hard to reconcile with Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich BC [1998] W.L.R. 896 (above, p.674) where they were not cited.

<sup>42</sup> Turkington v Magee [1902] 2 K.B. 427; reversed on another ground: [1903] 1 K.B. 644.

<sup>43</sup> Trendtex Trading Ltd v Crédit Suisse [1982] A.C. 679 at 703; cf. The Aiolos [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 25; Brownnton Ltd v Edward Moore Inbucon Ltd [1985] 3 All E.R. 499 (where the same result could now be reached without assignment under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, ss.1(1), 2(1)); The Kelo [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 85; SE Regional Health Authority v Lovell (1985) 33 Build L.R. 127; Weddell v J.A Pearce & Major [1988] Ch. 26, 43; Murray v Young & Co's Brewery Co [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 236; Tharros Shipping Co v Den Norske Bank plc [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 541; Stoczni Gdanska v Latvian Shipping Co (No.2) [1999] 3 All E.R. 822.

<sup>44</sup> See above; Thornely [1982] C.L.J. 29. For the requirement that the maintainer must accept liability for costs to the other party to the litigation, see McFarlane v EE Caledonia Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 366.

customer of his claim for damages for wrongful failure to pay for the cement.<sup>45</sup> But the assignment actually made was held to be champertous and invalid because it was expressed to have been taken for the purpose of enabling the bank to resell the customer's right of action to a third party, so that the profit resulting from its enforcement (which was considerable)<sup>46</sup> could be divided between the third party and the bank. The crucial fact was that the assignee contemplated a further sale of the right, as opposed to its enforcement by himself. If he intends to pursue the latter course, the assignment is not champertous merely because he expects to improve his position by taking the assignment: unless this were so, few assignments would be valid.<sup>47</sup>

4. Public Policy

In English law, an assignment of wages or salary is generally valid,<sup>48</sup> so long as it does not deprive the employee of his sole means of support.<sup>49</sup> But a public officer cannot assign his salary.<sup>50</sup> This rule was originally based on two considerations of public policy.<sup>51</sup> First, it was thought that a public officer must not be deprived of the means to maintain the dignity of his office; but this argument now has little force, except, perhaps, in the case of ambassadors. Secondly, it was thought that public officers must have the means to pay damages for wrongs committed by them or by their order; but this is no longer important since the injured party can now sue the Crown.<sup>52</sup> It could perhaps be argued that to allow such assignments might lead to corruption. But this seems to be a remote contingency; and the argument proves too much. Officers who are paid out of local funds can assign their salaries,<sup>53</sup> but are presumably just as corruptible as officers paid out of national funds.

Maintenance and other similar payments to which a wife may become entitled as a result of matrimonial proceedings are inalienable, since to allow the wife to assign them might leave her destitute.<sup>54</sup> There are many other statutory restrictions on assignment, based on various considerations of public policy.<sup>55</sup>

An assignment is not contrary to public policy merely because it was made and taken with an oblique motive: for example, if its purpose was to enable the assignee to obtain legal aid when this would not have been available in an action brought by the assignor against the debtor.<sup>56</sup>

<sup>45</sup> The claim was not against the buyer for the price but against a bank for damages for failing to honour a letter of credit: cf. below, p.997.

<sup>46</sup> The bank paid $800,000 for the claim and sold it for $1,100,000 to the third party who settled it for $8,000,000.

<sup>47</sup> Brownlton Ltd v Edmond Moore Inbucon Ltd [1985] 3 All E.R. 499 at 506, 509, where the "profit" likely to be made by the assignee was (even proportionately) much more modest than that in the Trendtex case.

<sup>48</sup> For a statutory exception, see Merchant Shipping Act 1995, s.34(1)(c). See also Employment Rights Act 1996, s.14(4) for formal requirements to be satisfied before the amount assigned can be deducted from wages.

<sup>49</sup> King v Michael Faraday & Partners Ltd [1939] 2 K.B. 753.

<sup>50</sup> Methwold v Walbank (1750) 2 Ves.Sen. 238; Barmick v Reade (1791) 1 H.Bl. 267; Liverpool Corp v Wright (1859) 28 L.J.Ch. 868.

<sup>51</sup> Logan, 61 L.Q.R. 240.

<sup>52</sup> Under the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

<sup>53</sup> Re Mirams [1891] 1 Q.B. 594.

<sup>54</sup> Watkins v Watkins [1896] P. 222.

<sup>55</sup> e.g. Army Act 1955, s.203(1); Superannuation Act 1972, s.5(1); Police Pension Act 1976, s.9; Social Security Administration Act 1992, s.187; Pension Schemes Act 1993 s.159; Pensions Act 1995, s.91.

<sup>56</sup> See Norglen Ltd v Reeds Rains Prudential Ltd [1999] 2 A.C. 1; cf. above p.696 at n.33.

SECTION 9. ASSIGNMENT BY OPERATION OF LAW

1. Death

On the death of a contracting party, his rights generally pass to his personal representatives, who can recover any sums due under the contract or damages for its breach. The representatives may sometimes recover less than the deceased would have done, and sometimes more. Thus, personal representatives cannot recover exemplary damages.<sup>57</sup> On the other hand, in Otter v Church, Adams, Tatham & Co<sup>58</sup> solicitors negligently advised a client that he had an absolute interest in property, when in fact he had an entailed interest. Had the mistake been discovered while the client was alive, he could have barred the entail, so that the solicitors would only have been liable for nominal damages. But the mistake was not discovered until after the client's death, with the result that the solicitors had to pay substantial damages as the entailed property was through their negligence lost to the client's estate.

Where at time of death the contract is still partly executory, the personal representatives are generally entitled to complete its performance and to claim the agreed remuneration. But they cannot do so if the contract is "personal" in the sense that one party places confidence in the skill, judgment or integrity of the other. Thus if either party to a contract of employment dies, his right to go on serving, or to be served (as the case may be), does not pass to his representatives: they can enforce only rights which had accrued before,<sup>59</sup> or which accrue on,<sup>60</sup> death. It is possible for one party, but not the other, to rely on such personal considerations. If a painter contracted to paint a house and died when the work was half-done, his representatives might not be entitled to finish the work and claim the contract price; but if the houseowner died, his representatives might well be able to demand further performance from the painter.

2. Bankruptcy

When a person is adjudged bankrupt, things in action forming part of his estate at the commencement of the bankruptcy<sup>61</sup> are "deemed to have been assigned" to his trustee in bankruptcy.<sup>62</sup> Thus the trustee can recover debts due to the bankrupt and claim damages for breach of any contract with the bankrupt. Where the contract is executory, the trustee may be entitled to perform it and claim payment from the other party. Certain "personal" rights do not pass to the trustee. The word "personal" is here used in two senses.

First: rights do not pass to the trustee if they are concerned with the person or personal affairs of the bankrupt. Thus a right to claim damages for injury to reputation does not pass,<sup>63</sup> nor does the benefit of a contract "to carry him [the bankrupt] in safety, [or] to cure his person of a wound or disease. . . ."<sup>64</sup> Such rights do not pass to the trustee, even though they have accrued before bankruptcy. The rule is based on the view that only the bankrupt's property is divisible between his creditors: they are not entitled to benefit from injuries to his person. The "property"<sup>65</sup> of the bankrupt that vests in his

<sup>57</sup> Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, s.1(2)(a)(i), as amended by Administration of Justice Act 1982, s.4. Such damages are hardly ever (if at all) recoverable on a breach of contract: below, p.935.

<sup>58</sup> [1953] Ch. 280.

<sup>59</sup> Stubbs v Holywell Ry (1867) L.R. 2 Ex. 311.

<sup>60</sup> e.g. death benefits payable under a contract of employment.

<sup>61</sup> For after-acquired property, see Insolvency Act 1986, s.307.

<sup>62</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.311.

<sup>63</sup> Wilson v United Counties Bank [1920] A.C. 102.

<sup>64</sup> Beckham v Drake (1849) 2 H.L.C. 579 at 627.

<sup>65</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.283(1).

trustee<sup>66</sup> includes “things in action”<sup>67</sup> without qualification; it includes contractual rights even though the contract giving rise to them in terms prohibits their assignment.<sup>68</sup> But the definition has not changed the previous rules relating to “personal” rights of the kind just described.<sup>69</sup> The bankrupt may have a single cause of action giving rise to a right to damages in respect both of personal loss (such as pain and suffering resulting from personal injury) and economic loss (such as loss of earnings resulting from the same injury). The cause of action is then vested in his trustee but the trustee must account to the bankrupt for such part of the amount recovered as relates to the bankrupt’s personal loss, and to earnings lost after the bankrupt’s discharge.<sup>70</sup> The proceeds of insurance against permanent disability, on the other hand, do pass to the trustee since the purpose of such a policy is to protect the insured against economic loss by the payment of premiums which, had they not been used for this purpose, would have been available for the payment of his debts.<sup>71</sup> By statute, rights under certain pension schemes are excluded from the bankrupt’s estate.<sup>72</sup>

Secondly: the benefit of an executory contract does not pass to the trustee if it was “personal” in the sense that the other contracting party relied on the skill and judgment of the bankrupt. In such a case the other party cannot be required to accept performance from the trustee or someone employed by him. Thus where a contract to build a house was “personal” in this sense, the trustee was not entitled to finish the house and then to demand payment.<sup>73</sup> But the trustee may employ the bankrupt to finish the work, and if the other party in this way gets precisely what he bargained for, the trustee can enforce the contract against him.<sup>74</sup>

Special rules apply to payments in the nature of income to which the bankrupt is from time to time entitled.<sup>75</sup> Such entitlement may not vest in the trustee because the bankrupt’s right to the payment may not arise until after the commencement of the bankruptcy,<sup>76</sup> typically where the income consists of the bankrupt’s earnings after the date of the bankruptcy. In respect of such earnings,<sup>77</sup> the trustee may apply to the court for an “income payments order”<sup>78</sup> requiring either the bankrupt or the person from whom the payments are due<sup>79</sup> to pay to the trustee so much of the income as may be specified in the order. In deciding what part (if any) of the income is to be paid over to the trustee, the court takes account of “what appears . . . to be necessary for meeting the reasonable domestic needs of the bankrupt and his family”<sup>80</sup>: an income payments order must not be made if its effect would be to reduce the income of the bankrupt below

<sup>66</sup> ibid. s.306.

<sup>67</sup> ibid. s.436; Re Landau [1998] Ch. 223; Performing Rights Society v Rowland [1997] 3 All E.R. 336 at 348.

<sup>68</sup> See Re Landau above; Krasner v Dennison [2001] Ch. 76; and see n.72.

<sup>69</sup> Heath v Tang [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1421, 1423; Ord v Upton [2000] Ch. 352 at 360; Haigh v Aitken [2001] Ch. 110 (bankrupt’s personal correspondence not “property” for present purpose); Cork v Rawlings [2001] EWCA Civ 202; [2001] Ch. 792 at [21].

<sup>70</sup> Ord v Upton [2000] Ch. 352.

<sup>71</sup> Cork v Rawlings [2001] EWCA Civ 202; [2001] Ch. 792.

<sup>72</sup> Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999, s.11, dealing with situations such as those in the cases cited in n.68, above.

<sup>73</sup> Knight v Burgess (1864) 33 L.J.Ch. 727; cf. Lucas v Moncreiff (1905) 21 T.L.R. 683.

<sup>74</sup> Oliphant v Wadling (1875) 1 Q.B.D. 145; Ex p. Shine [1892] 1 Q.B. 522. To the extent that the right to the money had not yet vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy, the trustee could claim it as after-acquired property under Insolvency Act 1986, s.307.

<sup>75</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.310(7).

<sup>76</sup> ibid., s.283(1)(a).

<sup>77</sup> See Krasner v Dennison [2001] Ch. 76, at [33] (on such facts see now above, at n.70).

<sup>78</sup> ibid. s.310(1).

<sup>79</sup> ibid. s.310(3).

<sup>80</sup> ibid. s.310(2).

this level. These provisions are not based on the “personal” nature of the contract under which the income is earned (for ex hypothesi the bankrupt is himself still rendering the services) but on the need to allow the bankrupt to work to maintain himself and his family.<sup>81</sup>

A trustee in bankruptcy is in a less favourable position than an ordinary assignee in that he cannot gain priority over a previous assignee for value by being the first to give notice to the debtor.<sup>82</sup>

SECTION 10. ASSIGNMENT DISTINGUISHED FROM TRANSFER OF LIABILITIES

Assignment is the transfer of a right without the consent of the debtor. The common law does not recognise the converse process of the transfer of a contractual liability without the consent of the creditor: “the burden of a contract can never be assigned without the consent of the other party to the contract . . . ”<sup>83</sup> If A has a contractual right against X, he cannot be deprived of that right merely because X and Y agree that X’s duty under his contract with A is to be performed by Y and not by X.<sup>84</sup> The phrase “assignment of liabilities” is highly misleading and should be avoided.

It is of course possible for Y to perform X’s obligation. The question whether the creditor is bound to accept such vicarious performance<sup>85</sup> (so as to discharge X) will be considered in Chapter 18. It is also possible, in the situations to be discussed below, for Y to become liable to perform the obligation originally undertaken by X; but in these situations there is generally<sup>86</sup> no true transfer of liability.

1. Novation

We have seen that it is possible by novation to substitute one creditor for another.<sup>87</sup> Similarly, one debtor may by novation be substituted for another. In Miller’s case<sup>88</sup> the claimant insured his life with the X Co, which was later amalgamated with the Y Co, which agreed to become liable on the policy if the claimant paid future premiums to it. The claimant did so, and it was held that he could enforce the policy against the Y Co. It has been suggested that a similar analysis may apply where a customer pays by credit <sup>81</sup> cf. Re Roberts [1900] 1 Q.B. 122, commenting on the position under earlier legislation.

<sup>82</sup> Re Wallis [1902] 1 K.B. 719. This rule does not seem to be affected by Insolvency Act 1986, s.311(4).

<sup>83</sup> Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 A.C. 85 at 103; Don King Productions Inc v Warren [1998] 1 All E.R. 609 at 631, affirmed [2000] Ch. 291; cf. Baytur S.A v Finagrain Holdings S.A [1991] 4 All E.R. 129 at 134; Société Commerciale de Réassurance v ERAS International Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 570 at 595–596; Weldon v GRE Linked Life Assurance Ltd [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 914 at 922.

<sup>84</sup> For statutory exceptions to this principle, by which either party to a lease may be released from liabilities under it in consequence of the assignment of his interest, see Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, ss.5, 6.

<sup>85</sup> See below, pp.755–758.

<sup>86</sup> For what seems to be an exception, see below p.704 at n.17.

<sup>87</sup> See above, p.673.

<sup>88</sup> (1876) 3 Ch.D. 391; cf. Société Commerciale de Réassurance v ERAS International Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 570 at 596. Contrast Re a Company (No. 0032314 of 1992), Duckwari plc v Offerventure Ltd [1995] B.C.C. 89 where a purchaser of land (P) directed the vendor (V) to convey the land to a third party (X) but V did not agree to look to X (rather than to P) as the contracting purchaser and there was held to be no novation. A dictum at 97–98 that “novation requires a substitution of the obligor, not of the party who takes the benefit of the contract” should be read as descriptive of the context and should not be taken to restrict the process of novation to the substitution of an obligor (i.e. of a debtor). The latter interpretation would be inconsistent with the authorities cited earlier in this note and with those cited in n.90 below.

card<sup>89</sup> for goods supplied by a retailer: the customer's liability to the retailer is discharged and a new liability to the retailer is undertaken by the company issuing the card.<sup>90</sup> Such arrangements are binding only if they are made with the appropriate contractual intention,<sup>91</sup> and if they are supported by consideration. Usually the creditor provides consideration for the new debtor's promise to pay him by agreeing to release the original debtor or to accept a discount<sup>92</sup>; and the original debtor provides consideration for the creditor's promise to release him by providing a new debtor.<sup>93</sup> The effect of novation is not, in strict theory, to transfer a liability, but to extinguish it and put a new one in its place.

2. Benefit and Burden

Generally, a person to whom the benefit of a contract is assigned makes no promise to perform the obligations of the assignor; and in the ordinary case such an assignee does not become liable under the contract. Suppose, for example, that a builder assigns to a bank moneys due or to become due under a building contract. The bank is under no liability to the builder's client for any breach of contract by the builder; the most that the client can do is to rely on the builder's breach in diminution or extinction of the bank's claim.<sup>94</sup>

There are, however, exceptions, or apparent exceptions, to this general rule.<sup>95</sup> In particular, the discharge of a burden may be a condition of the enjoyment of the benefit, so that the burden can be said to be annexed to the benefit, or to the subject-matter of the contract. Where this is the case, a person (other than one of the original contracting parties) to whom the benefit is transferred must perform the burden, or at least forego the benefit if he fails to do so. If, for example, a right to extract minerals is subject to the duty to pay compensation if the surface of the land is let down, such compensation may have to be paid by the assignee of the mining right.<sup>96</sup> This exception, however, does not apply if the burden, though imposed in the same instrument which creates the right, is not a condition of its exercise but an independent obligation undertaken by the original grantee of the right.<sup>97</sup>

But even the burden of such independent obligations may have to be performed by an assignee under a second, and broader, exception to the general rule. This has been called by Megarry V.-C. the "pure principle of benefit and burden"<sup>98</sup>; it is "distinct from the conditional benefit cases, and cases of burdens annexed to property."<sup>99</sup> In Tito v Waddell

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.754.

<sup>90</sup> Customs & Excise Commissioners v Diners Club Ltd [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1196, citing Re Charge Card Services [1989] Ch. 497, 513 ("quasi-novation").

<sup>91</sup> A requirement not satisfied in Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106: see 287.

<sup>92</sup> Customs & Excise Commissioners v Diners Club Ltd [1988] 2 All E.R. 1016 at 1023, affirmed [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1196.

<sup>93</sup> See above, p.155.

<sup>94</sup> See Young v Kitchen (1878) 3 Ex.D. 127; The Trident Beauty [1994] 1 W.L.R. 161 at 165, 170; Tettenborn [1993] C.I.J. 220; above, p.689.

<sup>95</sup> For a statutory exception relating to covenants in leases, see Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s.3.

<sup>96</sup> e.g. Aspden v Seddon (No.2) (1876) 1 Ex.D. 496 (for earlier proceedings see (1875) L.R. 10 Ch.App. 394); cf. Chamber Colliery Co Ltd v Timmerould (1893) [1915] 1 Ch. 268n; Werderman v Société Générale d'Electricité (1881) 19 Ch.D. 246; Schiffahrtsgesellschaft Detlev von Appen GmbH v Voest Alpine Intertrading GmbH [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 279 at 286, 291.

<sup>97</sup> Radstock Co-operative and Industrial Society v Norton-Radstock U.D.C. [1967] Ch. 1094; [1968] Ch. 605. For independent obligations, cf. below, p.763.

<sup>98</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 302.

<sup>99</sup> ibid.

(No.2)<sup>1</sup> a company that was engaged in mining phosphates on a Pacific island had acquired land there under contracts obliging it to return any worked out land to its former owners and to replant it. The rights under these contracts were transferred to commissioners “subject to . . . the covenants . . . therein contained”; and the commissioners undertook to keep the company indemnified against claims by the landowners under the original contracts. Many years after the company had been wound up, it was held that the commissioners were liable to the landowners for failing to perform the covenant to replant. Their liability was based on the “pure principle of benefit and burden”.<sup>2</sup>

That principle had been recognised in a number of earlier cases<sup>3</sup>; but its existence does give rise to the problem how it is to be reconciled with the rule “that in general contractual burdens are not assignable, though contractual benefits are”.<sup>4</sup> A person is certainly not subject to the burdens of a contract merely because he has taken benefits under it: it has, for example, been held that the equitable assignee of a licence to use a patent was not subject to the burdens imposed by the licence on the original licensee.<sup>5</sup> The “pure principle” is best regarded as a limited exception to this rule, restricted in scope by two factors. The first is that “the condition [which gives rise to the burden] must be relevant to the exercise of the right”.<sup>6</sup> This limitation is illustrated by Rhone v Stephens<sup>7</sup> where the owner of a house covenanted to keep the common roof of the house and an adjoining cottage in repair and both properties were then sold. It was held that the “pure principle” did not entitle the purchaser of the cottage to enforce the repairing covenant against the purchaser of the house: the duty to repair the roof was not a “relevant” condition of the right to occupy the house as there was no necessary connection between them. The second factor which restricts the operation of the “pure principle” is the intention of the parties to the assignment.<sup>8</sup> An intention to subject the assignee of contractual rights to liabilities arising under the contract will not normally be inferred.<sup>9</sup> In particular, any such inference will be displaced where it is the assignor who has undertaken (in the contract between assignor and assignee) to discharge the burden<sup>10</sup>; where it is plainly the intention of both parties to the assignment that the assignee is not to be subject to the obligations imposed by the original contract on the assignor<sup>11</sup>; and where the assignment is of benefits acquired by the assignor under one instrument but the burden is imposed by another, recording a separate transaction.<sup>12</sup> Even where the “pure principle” does apply, its effect is not strictly to transfer a liability; for the assignor remains liable to the other contracting party.

<sup>1</sup> [1977] Ch. 106.

<sup>2</sup> ibid. at 307; the original contracts between the company and the landowners had not made the benefits conditional on discharge of the burdens.

<sup>3</sup> Elliston v Reacher [1908] 2 Ch. 665 at 669 (in argument); Halsall v Brizell [1957] Ch. 169 at 182 (but the point was conceded; see 180; and not necessary for the decision); E R Ives Investment Ltd v High [1967] 2 Q.B. 379 at 394, 399, 400 (where estoppel was another ground of decision).

<sup>4</sup> [1977] Ch. at p.291; cf. at 299; above, p.701.

<sup>5</sup> Bagot Pneumatic Tyre Co v Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co [1902] 1 Ch. 146; cf. Cox v Bishop (1857) 8 D.M. & G. 815; Barker v Stickney [1919] 1 K.B. 121.

<sup>6</sup> Rhone v Stephens [1994] 2 A.C. 310 at 322.

<sup>7</sup> See above; see also Amsprop Trading Ltd v Harris Distribution Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1025 at 1034–1035.

<sup>8</sup> Titu v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 302.

<sup>9</sup> ibid., at 291; cf. 299.

<sup>10</sup> ibid., at 302.

<sup>11</sup> Law Debenture Trust Corp v Ural Caspian Oil Corp Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138 at 146–147; for a successful appeal on another point see [1995] Ch. 152, above, p.623.

<sup>12</sup> Law Debenture Trust case, [1993] 1 W.L.R. 138 at 146; and see previous note.

3. Operation of Law

In the following cases, a creditor may by operation of law be entitled to sue someone (other than the original debtor) who has not voluntarily undertaken such liability.

(1) Death

Contractual liabilities pass to the personal representatives of a deceased person in the sense that they must apply his assets in discharging those liabilities. They are not personally liable, so that there is no true transfer of liability.

(2) Bankruptcy and insolvency

Contractual liabilities of a bankrupt pass to his trustee in bankruptcy in the sense that the latter must distribute the bankrupt's assets among his creditors. Again there is no true transfer of liability as the trustee is not personally liable. He can also disclaim a contract which is wholly or partly executory if it is onerous or unprofitable, e.g. a lease at too high a rent.<sup>13</sup> Such disclaimer puts an end to the contract but does not relieve the bankrupt's estate from liability for breach of it.<sup>14</sup> An administrative receiver of a company may become liable on contracts by "adopting" them<sup>15</sup>; but this liability arises from a new contract taking effect on such adoption, rather than under a transfer of the company's liability, incurred before adoption, under the old contract.

(3) Legislation

Under legislation referred to earlier in this Chapter,<sup>16</sup> not only the benefit but also the burden of a contract of employment may be transferred as a result of the transfer of the undertaking, with the owner of which the original contract was made.<sup>17</sup> The transferor thus ceases to be liable on the contract,<sup>18</sup> while liabilities under it are imposed on the transferee, though the employee can take steps to avoid being bound to serve the transferee.<sup>19</sup> In this sense, the consent of all three parties to the transfer is necessary; and, perhaps for this reason, the process has been described as a "statutory novation"<sup>20</sup> of the contract.

Under the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, a person may acquire rights under a contract for the carriage of goods by sea to which he was not an original party: for example, by becoming the lawful holder of the bill of lading which contains or evidences the contract.<sup>21</sup> Such a person may also become subject to liabilities under the contract: for example, if he takes or demands delivery of the goods.<sup>22</sup> But the original party to the contract of carriage remains liable under it, so that there is no transfer of liability.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.315; cf. ibid. s.178. For exceptions, see Companies Act 1989, s.164.

<sup>14</sup> For the measure of such liability, see Re Park Air Services plc [2000] 2 A.C. 172.

<sup>15</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.44, as amended by Insolvency Act 1994; Pomdrill v Watson [1995] 2 A.C. 394.

<sup>16</sup> Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 (S.I. 1981 No. 1794), reg. 5(1); for amendments, see, above, p.694.

<sup>17</sup> Latster v Forth Dry Dock Co Ltd [1990] A.C. 546 at 555.

<sup>18</sup> Reg.5(2); Wilson v St Helen's BC [1999] 2 A.C. 52 at 76, 83.

<sup>19</sup> See above, p.694.

<sup>20</sup> Nemis v British Airways [1992] I.R.L.R. 575 at 577; MRS Environmental Services v Dyke, The Times, March 25, 1997.

<sup>21</sup> s.2(1)(a).

<sup>22</sup> s.3(1)(a); see The Berge Sisar [2001] UKHL 17, [2002] 2 A.C. 205.

<sup>23</sup> Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924, s.3(3).

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

AGENCY<sup>1</sup>

SECTION 1. DEFINITION

AGENCY is a relationship which arises when one person, called the principal, authorises another, called the agent, to act on his behalf, and the other agrees to do so. Generally, the relationship arises out of an agreement<sup>2</sup> between principal and agent. Its most important effect, for the purpose of this book, is that it enables the agent to make a contract between his principal and a third party.

1. Agreement

(1) General

The agreement between principal and agent is often a contract. But agency may also arise out of an agreement which does not amount to a contract because one of the parties lacks contractual capacity<sup>3</sup> or because there is no consideration. Thus the committee of a club, though they act gratuitously, may be agents of the members.<sup>4</sup>

(2) Agency without agreement

There may be agency without agreement in the following cases:

(a) OPERATION OF LAW. The law may attribute an agent to a person: for example, when a company is first formed, its original directors are its agents by operation of law.<sup>5</sup> Public corporations created by statute are sometimes regarded as agents of the Crown<sup>6</sup>: such agency arises simply by virtue of the incorporating statute. Moreover, by statute, one person, or the court, may have power to appoint an agent to act on behalf of another: thus a mortgagee can in certain circumstances appoint an agent of the mortgagor<sup>7</sup>; an administrative receiver appointed by debenture holders is deemed to be the agent of the company<sup>8</sup>; and a person appointed by the court to manage the affairs of a mental patient has been held to be the patient's agent.<sup>9</sup> At common law, one person may be regarded as the agent of another, even against the latter's will, under the doctrine of agency of necessity.<sup>10</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> The leading work on this subject is Bowstead and Reynolds on Agency (17th ed.).

<sup>2</sup> Garnac Grain Co Inc v Fauré & Fairclough Ltd [1968] A.C. 1130 at 1137; Fridman, 84 L.Q.R. 224.

<sup>3</sup> See below, p.709.

<sup>4</sup> cf. Fleming v Hector (1836) 2 M. & W. 172.

<sup>5</sup> cf. Companies Act 1985, s.282. But English law does not regard the company as agent for its shareholders: J H Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v DTI [1989] Ch. 72 at 188 (approved on this point [1990] 2 A.C. 418 at 515). See also Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.6(1): members of a limited liability partnership (which is a body corporate: s.1(2)) are agents of the partnership.

<sup>6</sup> e.g. Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart NV v Administrator of Hungarian Property [1954] A.C. 584.

<sup>7</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.109; see Medforth v Blake [2000] Ch. 86.

<sup>8</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.44(1)(a); cf. s.14(5).

<sup>9</sup> Plumpton v Burkinshaw [1908] 2 K.B. 572.

<sup>10</sup> See below, pp.718 et seq.

(b) APPARENT AND USUAL AUTHORITY. Under the doctrines of apparent and usual authority<sup>11</sup> a principal is liable on contracts made by his agent although he has not authorised the agent to make them.

2. Intention to Act on Behalf of Principal

Whether a person intends to act on behalf of another is a question of fact. Thus a person who agrees out of friendship to ferry another's car from one place to another can be regarded as the owner's agent,<sup>12</sup> so that his negligent driving may make the owner liable in tort; but a person who borrows another's car for his own purposes would not be so regarded.<sup>13</sup> Even where the owner is liable for the driver's torts, it does not follow that the driver is his agent for other purposes, such as pledging his credit for fuel or repairs. Where a person does intend to act on behalf of another, agency may arise although a contract between the parties declares that there is no such relationship<sup>14</sup>; conversely the mere fact that a person says he is an agent does not make him one if he intends to act on his own behalf and not on behalf of his alleged principal.<sup>15</sup>

The rule that an agent must intend to act on behalf of his principal distinguishes agency from other analogous relationships, and is helpful in cases where it is clear that a person acted as agent, but not clear whose agent he was.

(1) Agency distinguished from other relationships

(a) BUYER AND SELLER. A retailer or distributor may describe himself as the "agent" of the manufacturer whose products he sells. This description is legally accurate if he negotiates a contract between manufacturer and customer, accounts to the manufacturer for the price paid by the customer, and is remunerated by a commission or salary paid by the manufacturer<sup>16</sup>; it may be accurate even if he is remunerated by a "mark-up" on the price that he pays to the manufacturer.<sup>17</sup> But generally the retailer acts, not in this capacity,<sup>18</sup> but as a middleman who buys and resells on his own behalf. He is the manufacturer's "agent" only in a commercial, and not in the legal sense.<sup>19</sup> Thus if the goods are defective the customer can sue only the retailer, and not the manufacturer, on the contract of sale. The manufacturer may be liable to the customer on a separate contract if he gives a guarantee<sup>20</sup>; he may also be liable in tort<sup>21</sup> if the customer suffers loss or injury because of a defect in the goods. Again a manufacturer who contracts to make something for a customer is not the agent of the customer. Although he makes the

<sup>11</sup> See below, pp.712–718.

<sup>12</sup> e.g. Ormerod v Grosvenor Motor Services Ltd [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1120; Vandyke v Fender [1970] 2 Q.B. 292.

<sup>13</sup> e.g. Hewitt v Bowrin [1940] 1 K.B. 188; Morgans v Launchbury [1973] A.C. 127.

<sup>14</sup> McLaughlin v Gentles (1919) 51 D.L.R. 383.

<sup>15</sup> Kennedy v De Trafford [1897] A.C. 180 at 188.

<sup>16</sup> In Triffitt Nurseries v Salads, etc. Ltd [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 74 a contract between P and A authorised A to contract with customers "as principal" but required A to account to P for sums received from such customers. The contract was treated as giving rise to an agency relationship between P and A.

<sup>17</sup> cf. Mercantile International Group plc v Chuan Soon Huat International Group Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 288; [2002] 1 All E.R.(Comm) 788.

<sup>18</sup> Similar problems can arise in determining whether a person who is asked to procure goods for another is his agent or a seller to him: see Ireland v Livingston (1871) L.R. 5 H.L. 395; Hill, 31 M.L.R. 623; Kloekner & Co AG v Gatoil Overseas Inc [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 177; cf. Customs & Excise Commissioners v Paget [1989] S.T.C. 773; The Coral Rose [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 563.

<sup>19</sup> cf. AMB Imballaggi Plastici SRL v Pacflex Ltd [1999] 2 All E.R.(Comm) 249.

<sup>20</sup> See above, pp.77, 582. "Consumer guarantees" under Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), reg.15 take effect as "contractual obligations": see above, p.163 at n.7.

<sup>21</sup> For negligence at common law and irrespective of negligence under Consumer Protection Act 1987.

thing at the customer's request, he acts primarily for his own profit and on his own behalf.<sup>22</sup>

(b) HIRE-PURCHASE. A dealer who negotiates a hire-purchase agreement between a customer and a finance company is considered at common law to act primarily on his own behalf.<sup>23</sup> But he may be the agent of the company for some purposes, e.g. to accept offers on the terms of the company's proposal form.<sup>24</sup> And under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 he may be treated as the agent of the company when he makes any representation in the course of negotiations as to the quality of the goods,<sup>25</sup> and when he receives notice from the customer that the agreement has been cancelled or rescinded, or that the customer's offer has been withdrawn.<sup>26</sup>

(c) BANKER AND CUSTOMER. The relation of banker and customer is primarily that of debtor and creditor but may for certain purposes be that of agent and principal: for example, where a bank on the instructions of its customer makes a transfer of funds out of the customer's account.<sup>27</sup> Conversely, an ordinary agency agreement does not give rise to the relationship of banker and customer merely because funds belonging to or destined for the principal are held (and used to make payments under the agreement) by the agent.<sup>28</sup>

(d) PROVISION OF SERVICES. Persons who are engaged in the business or profession of supplying services may be described as "agents" in the commercial sense, without being agents in the legal sense: "To carry on the business of an 'agent' is not the same thing as saying that you are contracting as agent."<sup>29</sup> For example, where a "forwarding agent" is engaged to arrange for goods to be transported to a foreign destination, he may act as agent (in the legal sense) in making a contract between the exporter and a carrier<sup>30</sup>; but he may equally well act as principal in undertaking to get the goods to the specified destination.<sup>31</sup> Whether such persons act in the legal sense as agents depends on the responsibilities that they undertake in relation to the particular transaction. The same point may be illustrated by reference to two further examples.

(i) Client and professional man. In Leicestershire CC v Michael Faraday & Partners Ltd<sup>32</sup> it was held that a firm of valuers had not acted as agents for their clients. MacKinnon L.J. said that the case was "emphatically not one of principal and agent. It is the case of the relations between a client and a professional man to whom the client

<sup>22</sup> Dixon v London Small Arms Co (1876) 1 App.Cas. 632; State of the Netherlands v Youell [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 236.

<sup>23</sup> Mercantile Credit Co Ltd v Hamblin [1965] 2 Q.B. 242 at 269; cf. Woodchester Equipment (Leasing) Ltd v British Association of Canned Food Importers [1995] C.C.L.R. 51; Shogun Finance Ltd v Hudson [2001] EWCA Civ 1000; [2002] Q.B. 834, at [42–44]. In Brunnwhite v Worcester Works Finance Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 552 Lords Morris, Guest and Upjohn took the view stated in the text, but Lords Reid and Wilberforce said that the dealer would normally be the finance company's agent.

<sup>24</sup> Northgran Finance Ltd v Ashley [1963] 1 Q.B. 476.

<sup>25</sup> s.56(2); by s.56(3) a provision in a regulated agreement purporting to make the dealer the customer's agent is void.

<sup>26</sup> ss.69(6), 102(1), 57(3). See also s.175 for the "agent's" duty to transmit such notices.

<sup>27</sup> Barclays Bank plc v Quinere Ltd [1992] 4 All E.R. 363.

<sup>28</sup> Kingscroft Insurance Co Ltd v HS Weaver (Underwriting) Agencies Ltd [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 187 at 191.

<sup>29</sup> Elektronska etc. v Transped etc. [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 49 at 52.

<sup>30</sup> Lukoil-Kalingradmorneft plc v Tata Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 129 at 138.

<sup>31</sup> See Jones v European General Express (1920) 25 Com.Cas. 296; cf. Posidon Freight Forwarding Co Ltd [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 388 at 389.

<sup>32</sup> [1941] 2 K.B. 205. The question arose for the purpose of determining the ownership of documents created by the valuers, and this would not be in the client merely because the person creating the documents was his agent: Formica Ltd v Secretary of State acting by the ECGD [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 692.

resorts for advice.”<sup>33</sup> Some professional advisers, such as solicitors<sup>34</sup> and architects<sup>35</sup> often do act as agents for their clients. Other professional persons are engaged simply to produce specified results: for example, to prepare a report or to paint a picture. Such persons have no power to act on behalf of their clients; and it is to this type of “professional man” that MacKinnon L.J. refers in the Leicester case.

(ii) Estate agents.<sup>36</sup> An estate agent who is instructed to negotiate the sale of a house by private treaty has normally<sup>37</sup> no power to make a contract between his client and a prospective purchaser.<sup>38</sup> He may for certain purposes act on behalf of the client, e.g. for the purpose of making representations about the property<sup>39</sup>; and he also owes the client certain duties similar to those owed by an agent to his principal.<sup>40</sup> But “an estate agent, despite the style, is an independent person”<sup>41</sup> who for most purposes does not normally act in the legal sense as the vendor’s agent. In particular, he does not so act when he receives a deposit from a person who has agreed, subject to contract, to buy the property.<sup>42</sup> So long as no contract of sale has been concluded, he must not pay the deposit over to his client. He holds the money in trust for the prospective purchaser,<sup>43</sup> and must return it to him on demand<sup>44</sup>; but if he fails to do so the client is not liable for the deposit unless he had expressly authorised the estate agent to receive it on his behalf.<sup>45</sup>

(2) Whose agent?

It may be clear that a person is an agent, but doubtful whose agent he is. Thus it has been held that a London agent employed by a country solicitor was the agent, not of the lay client, but that he is the agent of the country solicitor.<sup>46</sup> On the other hand counsel, though briefed by the solicitor, may be the client’s agent.<sup>47</sup>

In other cases the question is whether a person who is undoubtedly the agent of P may not also for some purposes be the agent of Q. Thus persons employed by an insurance company to solicit proposals for insurance are generally the company’s agents,<sup>48</sup> but may

<sup>33</sup> [1941] 2 K.B. at 216.

<sup>34</sup> e.g. Tudor v Hamid [1988] 1 E.G.L.R. 251 (vendor’s solicitor vendor’s agent in receiving deposit); contrast Hastingwood Property Ltd v Sanders Bearman Anselm [1991] Ch. 114 (solicitor receiving money as stakeholder).

<sup>35</sup> e.g. Gibson v Pease [1905] 1 K.B. 810.

<sup>36</sup> Murdoch, 91 L.Q.R. 357.

<sup>37</sup> i.e. unless specifically so authorised, as seems to have been the case in Spiro v Lintern [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1002 at 1006; cf. Jawara v Cambian Airways [1992] E.G.C.S. 54, where such authority was held to have been conferred on a solicitor. For a statutory definition of “estate agency work,” see Estate Agents Act 1979, s.1(1).

<sup>38</sup> Wragg v Lovett [1948] 2 All E.R. 968.

<sup>39</sup> Sorrell v Finch [1977] A.C. 728 at 753.

<sup>40</sup> e.g. Regier v Campbell-Stuart [1939] Ch. 766 (agent engaged to find a property for the client). cf., in the case of a commodity broker, Brandeis (Brokers) Ltd v Black [2001] 2 All E.R.(Comm) 98.

<sup>41</sup> Sorrell v Finch [1977] A.C. 728 at 753.

<sup>42</sup> Sorrell v Finch, above; John McCann & Co v Pow [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1643 at 1647; Reynolds, 92 L.Q.R. 484; Markesinis [1976] C.L.J. 237.

<sup>43</sup> Estate Agents Act 1979, s.13(1)(a).

<sup>44</sup> At common law, he is not liable for interest: Potters v Loppert [1973] Ch. 399; but regulations made under Estate Agents Act 1979, s.15 may impose such liability.

<sup>45</sup> Ryan v Pilkington [1959] 1 W.L.R. 403, as explained in Sorrell v Finch, above, at 750; cf. Ojelay v Neosale [1987] 2 F.G.L.R. 167.

<sup>46</sup> Robbins v Fennell (1847) 11 Q.B. 248.

<sup>47</sup> Grindell v Bass [1920] 2 Ch. 487.

<sup>48</sup> Bamden v London Assurance [1892] 2 Q.B. 534; Stone v Reliance Mutual Insurance Soc Ltd [1972] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 469; Reynolds, 88 L.Q.R. 462.

become the agents of the proposer when helping him to complete the proposal form.<sup>49</sup> On the other hand insurance brokers are for most purposes agents of the insured persons and not of the insurers.<sup>50</sup> But they may be agents of the insurers for some purposes, such as the provision of interim insurance cover until the policy is issued.<sup>51</sup> Again, directors of a company are primarily the agents of the company, and not of the shareholders; but they may for some purposes become agents of the shareholders, e.g. for the purpose of negotiating a sale of their shares.<sup>52</sup>

3. Commercial Agents

Our main concern in this chapter is with the common law principles of agency. Some of these are in effect restated, but others are modified, by Regulations which give effect to an EC Council Directive<sup>53</sup> governing the relations between “commercial agents” and their principals.<sup>54</sup> The Regulations define “commercial agent” to mean “a self-employed intermediary who has continuing authority to negotiate the sale or purchase of goods on behalf of<sup>55</sup> another person (the “principal”), or to negotiate and conclude the sale or purchase of goods on behalf of and in the name of the principal”.<sup>56</sup> A detailed discussion of these Regulations is beyond the scope of this book, but their effect on the rules here under discussion will be noted at appropriate points in this Chapter.

SECTION 2. CAPACITY

1. Capacity to Act as Agent

As agency is a consensual but not necessarily a contractual relationship, any person who is capable of consenting can act as agent, although his contractual capacity may be limited. In the days when married women lacked contractual capacity they could nonetheless act as agents.<sup>57</sup> Similarly, a minor can, it seems, be an agent to make a contract which he has no capacity to make on his own behalf; and a corporation could probably act as agent in respect of a transaction which was ultra vires. But to say that a person of limited contractual capacity can act as agent does not mean that his agreement to do so gives rise to all the legal consequences that usually result from the relationship of principal and agent. It means that he can make a contract between his principal and a third party, but not that he acquires all the rights or is subject to all the liabilities of an agent towards his principal or the third party. The agent could not be made liable if to hold him liable would defeat the protection which the law means to give him by limiting his capacity. Thus he could not be made liable on the contract between principal and third party, even though the circumstances were such that an agent of full capacity

<sup>49</sup> Biggar v Rock Life Assurance Co [1902] 1 K.B. 516; Nemsholme v Road Transport Insurance Co [1929] 2 K.B. 356; cf. above, pp.338–339.

<sup>50</sup> Anglo-African Merchants v Bayley [1970] 1 Q.B. 311 at 322; McNealy v Pennine Ins Co [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 18; John W. Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 602; Winter v Irish Life Assurance plc [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 274. For criticism, see Roberts v Plaisted [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 341 at 345.

<sup>51</sup> Stockton v Mason [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 430 (except in cases of marine insurance: cf. above, p.181).

<sup>52</sup> Briss v Woolley [1954] A.C. 333.

<sup>53</sup> Dir.86/653.

<sup>54</sup> Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/3053), as amended by Commercial Agents (Council Directive) (Amendment) Regulations 1993 and 1998 (SI 1993/3173 and SI 1998/2868).

<sup>55</sup> These words do not cover the case of a person who, though an agent in the commercial sense (above, p.652), sells goods as principal: Parks v Esso Petroleum Co Ltd [2000] Eur.L.R. 25.

<sup>56</sup> reg.2(1); for excepted cases, see reg.2(1)(i) to (iii) and 2(2).

<sup>57</sup> Stevenson v Hardie (1773) 2 Wm.Bl. 872.

would be so liable.<sup>58</sup> On the other hand, there is no reason to suppose that he would be denied the ordinary agent's right of indemnity<sup>59</sup> against his principal.

2. Capacity to Act as Principal

Capacity to act as principal is determined by the rules governing contractual capacity generally. Thus a minor cannot make himself liable for luxuries merely by employing an agent; but he can appoint an agent to make a contract which would have bound him if he had made it personally.<sup>60</sup> This rule again applies primarily to determine the reciprocal rights and liabilities of principal and third party. It might also protect the principal from liability to the agent. Thus a principal who was under age would not be liable to indemnify an agent employed to buy luxuries. But the rule would not necessarily protect the agent: thus an under-age principal might well have a remedy against the agent if the latter accepted a bribe<sup>61</sup> from the third party.

SECTION 3. CREATION OF AGENCY

Agency may arise by express or implied agreement, or without agreement under the doctrines of apparent and usual authority, and where a person has authority of necessity. Finally, agency may arise ex post facto by ratification.

1. Agency by Agreement

(1) Express authority

An agent's authority is commonly conferred by express appointment. At common law, no formality is required. Oral appointment suffices even where the agent is appointed to make a contract which has to be in writing, or evidenced in writing.<sup>62</sup> Under the Regulations governing contracts with commercial agents,<sup>63</sup> such an agent and his principal are entitled, on request, to receive from the other a signed written document setting out the terms of the agency contract.<sup>64</sup> This provision does not require the contract to be made in writing; it only requires each party to provide the other with a written record of its terms. No sanction is specified for failure to comply with the request.

The extent of an agent's express authority depends on the true construction of the words of the appointment. If these are vague or ambiguous, the principal may be bound even though the agent, in good faith, interprets them in a sense not intended by the principal.<sup>65</sup> But in such cases the speed of modern communications will often make it reasonable for the agent to seek clarification of his instructions, and if he fails to do so he will not be able to rely on his own mistaken interpretation of his instructions.<sup>66</sup> Where

<sup>58</sup> See below, pp.732 et seq.

<sup>59</sup> See below, p.744.

<sup>60</sup> See Webb, 18 M.L.R. 861; R.F.M., 69 L.Q.R. 446; a contrary dictum in Shephard v Cartwright [1953] Ch. 728 at 755 (reversed without reference to this point [1955] A.C. 431) was later corrected in G (A) v G (T) [1970] 2 Q.B. 644 at 651–652.

<sup>61</sup> See below, p.746.

<sup>62</sup> Heard v Pillely (1869) 1 L.R. 4 Ch. 548.

<sup>63</sup> See above, p.709.

<sup>64</sup> Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/3053), reg.13(1).

<sup>65</sup> Weigall v Runciman (1916) 85 L.J.K.B. 1187; cf. Ireland v Livingston (1871) L.R. 5 H.L. 395, as explained in Woodhouse A.C. Israel Cocoa Ltd S.A. v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co [1972] A.C. 741 at 757, 771–772; Credit Agricole Indosuez v Muslim Commercial Bank Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 275 at 280.

<sup>66</sup> European Asian Bank v Punjab & Sind Bank (No.2) [1983] 1 W.L.R. 642 at 656 (where the claim succeeded on another ground).

the agent's instructions are clear, it makes no difference that the principal acted under a mistake in giving them: for example, if he instructed the agent to insure a ship for £3m he is liable to indemnify the agent for the premium even though his actual intention was to insure her for only £2m.<sup>67</sup>

(2) Implied authority

(a) EXISTENCE OF AUTHORITY IMPLIED. The very existence of agency may be implied, either from conduct, or from the relationship of the parties. Thus it has been held that a husband who lives with his wife impliedly authorises her to pledge his credit for necessary household expenses.<sup>68</sup> This authority is not a legal consequence of marriage, but depends on the inference of fact that the husband has permitted the wife to pledge his credit as manager of the household. The authority therefore does not arise where there is no household because the parties live in an hotel.<sup>69</sup> But where there is a household, the authority can arise even though the parties are not married.<sup>70</sup> As the authority is based on implied consent, it can be negated if the husband forbids his wife to pledge his credit.<sup>71</sup> The wife's authority is also negated if the husband gives her an adequate housekeeping allowance<sup>72</sup>; if the husband warns the tradesman not to supply goods to the wife on his credit; and if the wife already has an adequate supply of the goods in question.<sup>73</sup> The cases which lay down these rules are unlikely to be of much significance in modern conditions when household supplies are generally paid for either on delivery or on credit terms requiring the signature of the debtor personally<sup>74</sup>; but they could still have some practical importance in relation to services supplied to the household. A child has no implied authority to pledge his parents' credit; but such authority may be implied if the parent stands by and acquiesces in a purchase made by the child on his account.<sup>75</sup>

(b) INCIDENTAL AUTHORITY. An agent who is appointed for a particular purpose may have implied authority to do acts incidental to the execution of that authority. For example, a solicitor, or counsel engaged to conduct litigation, may have implied authority to compromise the suit.<sup>76</sup> On the other hand, an agent employed to sell a thing has generally no authority to receive payment for it.<sup>77</sup> The question whether he has authority to warrant its quality is one of fact, depending on the circumstances of each case.<sup>78</sup>

(c) CUSTOMARY AUTHORITY.<sup>79</sup> A principal who employs an agent to act for him in a particular market impliedly authorises the agent to act in accordance with the custom of

<sup>67</sup> The Tzelepi [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 265.

<sup>68</sup> Jewsbury v Newbold (1857) 26 L.J.Ex. 247; Phillipson v Hayter (1870) 1 L.R. 6 C.P. 38 at 42; Gage v King [1961] 1 Q.B. 188 (medical bills).

<sup>69</sup> Debenham v Mellon (1880) 6 App.Cas. 24.

<sup>70</sup> Blades v Free (1829) 9 B. & C. 167.

<sup>71</sup> Jolly v Rees (1864) 15 C.B.(N.S.) 628; Miss Gray Ltd v Cathcart (1922) 38 T.L.R. 562.

<sup>72</sup> Morel Bros. v Westmorland [1903] 1 K.B. 63; affirmed [1904] A.C. 11.

<sup>73</sup> Miss Gray Ltd v Cathcart (1922) 38 T.L.R. 562 at 565; Seaton v Benedict (1828) 5 Bing. 28.

<sup>74</sup> See Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.61(1)(a): the requirement of signature "by the debtor . . . and by or on behalf of the creditor" indicates that signature on behalf of the debtor is insufficient.

<sup>75</sup> Lam v Wilkin (1837) 6 A. & E. 718; some dicta in this case are too sweeping: Mortimore v Wright (1840) 6 M. & W. 487.

<sup>76</sup> Waugh v H B Clifford & Sons [1982] Ch. 374.

<sup>77</sup> Mynn v Jolliffe (1834) 1 M. & Rob. 326; Butwick v Grant [1924] 2 K.B. 483. cf. above, p.708 as to deposits received by estate agents.

<sup>78</sup> Such authority was implied in Alexander v Gibson (1811) 2 Camp. 555; Howard v Sheward (1866) 1 L.R. 2 C.P. 148; and Baldry v Bates (1885) 52 L.T. 620; contrast Brady v Todd (1861) 9 C.B.(N.S.) 592.

<sup>79</sup> cf. above, p.213, for the view that it is artificial to base such authority on actual agreement.

that market.<sup>80</sup> He is bound by the custom even if he is not aware of it.<sup>81</sup> But the inference that the principal authorises the agent to act in accordance with the custom cannot be drawn if the custom is inconsistent with the instructions given by the principal to the agent, or with the very relationship of principal and agent. The custom is then said to be "unreasonable" and the principal is not bound by it unless he knows of it.<sup>82</sup> Thus in Robinson v Mollett<sup>83</sup> there was a custom in the tallow market by which an agent employed by several principals was allowed to buy in bulk to satisfy the needs of all. The custom was held unreasonable since its effect was to turn an agent into a seller. This was inconsistent with the relationship of principal and agent since an agent must buy for his principal as cheaply as he can, while a seller sells at the highest price he can get. But in Scott v Godfrey<sup>84</sup> a custom of the Stock Exchange permitting stockbrokers to buy enough shares for several principals from a single seller was held reasonable because all the parties intended that contracts should be made between the seller and the various buyers.

2. Agency without Agreement

(1) Apparent authority

Where a person represents to a third party that he has authorised an agent to act on his behalf, he may, as against the third party, not be allowed to deny the truth of the representation, and be bound by the agent's act whether he in fact had authorised it or not. In Summers v Solomon,<sup>85</sup> for instance, the defendant employed a manager to run a jeweller's shop and regularly paid for jewellery ordered by the manager from the claimant for resale in the shop. The manager left the defendant's employment, ordered further jewellery in the defendant's name, and absconded with it. The defendant was held liable to pay for this jewellery since his conduct had led the claimant to believe that the manager had authority to pledge his credit, and he had not informed the claimant that that authority had come to an end.

The following conditions must be satisfied before apparent authority arises:

(a) THERE MUST BE A REPRESENTATION OF AUTHORITY. This may be express<sup>86</sup> but it is more frequently implied: for example, from a course of dealing, as in Summers v Solomon; or from placing the agent in such a position that it is reasonable for third parties to assume that he has the principal's authority to make a contract of the kind in question<sup>87</sup>; or from the known relationship of the parties, so that where a partner has

<sup>80</sup> Graves v Legg (1857) 2 H. & N. 210.

<sup>81</sup> Pollock v Stables (1848) 12 Q.B. 765; Cropper v Cook (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 194; Reynolds v Smith (1893) 9 T.L.R. 494.

<sup>82</sup> e.g. Perry v Barnett (1885) 15 Q.B.D. 388 (custom to make contract without complying with statutory formalities and hence void); contrast Seymour v Bridge (1885) 14 Q.B.D. 460, where the principal knew of the custom.

<sup>83</sup> (1875) L.R. 7 H.L. 802; cf. North & South Trust Co v Berkeley [1971] 1 W.L.R. 471.

<sup>84</sup> [1901] 2 Q.B. 726.

<sup>85</sup> (1857) 7 E. & B. 879; cf. Pole v Leusk (1862) 33 L.J.Ch. 155; The Unique Mariner [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 438; The Shamah [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 40; Waugh v H B Clifford & Sons [1982] Ch. 374; John W Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 602 at 615; First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1229. The following discussion deals only with the extent to which the principal can as a result of the representation be held liable on an unauthorised contract. It is not concerned with any other form of liability for misrepresentation.

<sup>86</sup> e.g. Gurtner v Beaton [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 369.

<sup>87</sup> Panorama Developments (Guildford) Ltd v Fidelis Furnishing Fabrics Ltd [1971] 2 Q.B. 711; The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 777; United Bank of Kuwait v Hamoud [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1051; cf. Strover v Harrington [1988] Ch. 390 at 409-410; contrast Cleveland Manufacturing Co v Muslim Commercial Bank Ltd [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 646.

retired he continues to be liable to those who deal with the firm and know that he had been a partner but not that he had retired<sup>88</sup>; and conversely the firm will be liable to such third parties on contracts made by him, ostensibly on its behalf.<sup>89</sup> In such cases, the apparent authority is said to be general in character since it extends generally to all transactions which a person, in the position in which the principal has placed the agent, is normally regarded as having authority to conclude.<sup>90</sup> Even where the agent has no such apparent authority by virtue of his position, he may have specific apparent authority to enter into a particular transaction; but since in such cases it is (ex hypothesi) clear to the third party that the agent does not normally have authority to conclude a transaction of that kind, the principal will be liable on the basis of specific apparent authority only if the third party can show that the principal expressly represented that the agent had authority to enter into the particular contract on his behalf.<sup>91</sup>

(b) THE REPRESENTATION MUST BE OF FACT. A representation of law does not give rise to apparent authority.<sup>92</sup> Thus a third party cannot rely on the doctrine of apparent authority if he has read the terms of the agent's appointment, but has misconstrued them, since the construction of a document is a question of law. The rejection by the House of Lords of the former rule that mistake of law gives rise to no restitutionary<sup>93</sup> claim would not seem to affect the present rule, which is concerned with the creation of contractual rights.

(c) THE REPRESENTATION MUST BE THAT THE "AGENT" IS AUTHORISED TO ACT AS AGENT. Apparent authority does not arise if a person is represented to be the owner of a business or other property. In such cases the representor may be bound under the doctrine of usual authority, or under some analogous doctrine.<sup>94</sup> But the scope of these doctrines is limited, and where they do not apply, the representee can fall back on the more general doctrine of apparent authority only if the representation is one of agency.

(d) THE REPRESENTATION MUST BE MADE BY THE PRINCIPAL. Apparent authority can arise only out of a representation made by the principal: it cannot arise out of a representation made by some other person<sup>95</sup> or out of one made by the agent himself.<sup>96</sup> Of course, a principal may represent that the agent has authority to make further representations on his behalf; and the principal may make such a representation by conduct, for example, by placing the agent in a position in which he would normally have authority to enter into a transaction of the type in question or to communicate what purports to be the principal's approval of it<sup>97</sup> (even though the principal's instructions

<sup>88</sup> Partnership Act 1890, s.14(1); and cf. Scurf v Jardine (1882) 7 App.Cas. 345.

<sup>89</sup> cf. Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.6(3)(a).

<sup>90</sup> The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 777; contrast The Suwalki [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 511 (shipbroker has no such authority); Hirst v Etherington [1999] 1 Lloyd's P.N. 938 (solicitor not acting in usual course of business).

<sup>91</sup> The Ocean Frost, above, where the third party's claim on this basis failed.

<sup>92</sup> cf., above, p.332; below, p.739.

<sup>93</sup> Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 A.C. 349; below, p.1059.

<sup>94</sup> See below, pp.716–718.

<sup>95</sup> The Rhodian River [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 373; First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1229 at 1240.

<sup>96</sup> Lanyon v Blanchard (1811) 2 Camp. 597; Attorney-General for Ceylon v Silva [1953] A.C. 461; British Bank of the Middle East v Sun Life Assurance Co of Canada (U.K.) Ltd [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 9 at 17; The Rafflacla [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 36 at 43; The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 778; The Suwalki [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 511; Re Selectmove [1995] 1 W.L.R. 474 at 478.

<sup>97</sup> First Energy (UK) Ltd v Hungarian International Bank Ltd [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 195.

had negated the agent's actual authority to take such steps).<sup>98</sup> In such a case, the agent may by his own representation enlarge an existing authority,<sup>99</sup> but such a representation cannot create an apparent authority out of nothing.<sup>1</sup>

(c) THE REPRESENTATION MUST BE MADE TO THE THIRD PARTY. The representation must be made to a third person or group of persons. The old notion of holding a person out as agent "to the world"<sup>2</sup> has long been discredited.<sup>3</sup> Nor can a representation made by principal to agent give rise to apparent authority.

(f) THE THIRD PARTY MUST HAVE RELIED ON THE REPRESENTATION. The third party must have been induced by the representation to deal with the agent in the belief that the principal had authorised the agent to enter into the transaction.<sup>4</sup> Two consequences flow from this requirement. First, the representation must actually be known to the third party; and this requirement cannot be satisfied if the representation is contained in a document which has not actually come to his attention.<sup>5</sup> Secondly, the third party is not allowed to say that he relied on the representation if he knew that it was untrue,<sup>6</sup> or if he had, but did not take, a reasonable chance of reading the agent's instructions and so of discovering the truth.<sup>7</sup>

These requirements have given rise to particular difficulties in cases in which a third party dealt with a corporation through an agent who had no actual authority to enter into the transaction. In the case of a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, these difficulties arose largely because the authority of such an agent might be set out in, or limited by, the company's memorandum or articles of association; and, before the changes in the law to be discussed below, the rule was that the third party had constructive notice of these documents.<sup>8</sup> This doctrine of constructive notice operated in favour of the company but not against it. Thus if the memorandum or articles limited the power of the company's officer, the third party was deemed to know of the limitation and could not rely on an appearance of authority inconsistent with it. But if they conferred power, the third party could not base a case of apparent authority on them, for he could not be said to have relied on something of which he was only deemed to know (but did not actually know).<sup>9</sup> This state of the law could cause considerable hardship to third parties, and two important changes in the law were made by the Companies Act 1989.

<sup>98</sup> United Bank of Kuwait v Hamoud [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1051.

<sup>99</sup> The Raffaella [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 36 at 43.

<sup>1</sup> The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 778. United Bank of Kuwait v Hamoud [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1051 at 1064 ("cannot hold himself out"); First Energy case, above, n.97; Suncorp Insurance & Finance v Milano Assicurazioni SpA [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 225 at 232; Lukoil Kalingradmornefti plc v Tata Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 129 at 138; cf. Hirst v Etherington [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 938.

<sup>2</sup> Whitehead v Tuckett (1812) 15 East 400 at 411.

<sup>3</sup> Dickinson v Walpy (1829) 10 B. & C. 128 at 140.

<sup>4</sup> For cases in which this requirement was not satisfied, see Kooragang Investments Pty Ltd v Richardson & Wrench Ltd [1982] A.C. 462; Bedford Insurance Co Ltd v Instituto de Ressaguros do Brasil [1985] Q.B. 966; The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717; cf. Nationwide BS v Lewis [1998] Ch. 482.

<sup>5</sup> The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 778.

<sup>6</sup> Similar restrictions apply where a member of a limited liability partnership enters into a transaction with a third party which is beyond the scope of the member's actual authority: see Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.6(2).

<sup>7</sup> Jacobs v Morris [1902] 1 Ch. 816; Overbrooke Estates Ltd v Glencombe Properties Ltd [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1335; Coote [1975] C.L.J. 17; Rollad Steel (Holdings) Ltd v BSC [1986] Ch. 246 at 295–296. The principle seems to have been overlooked in Mendelsohn v Normand Ltd [1970] 1 Q.B. 177.

<sup>8</sup> Mahony v East Holyford Mining Co Ltd (1875) 1 L.R. 7 H.L. 869.

<sup>9</sup> See Rama Corp v Proved Tin & General Investments Ltd [1952] 2 Q.B. 147, discussing earlier authorities; for further discussion, see Freeman & Lockyer v Buckhurst Properties (Mangal) Ltd [1964] 2 Q.B. 480.

First, the doctrine of constructive or deemed notice of the company's registered documents has been abolished.<sup>10</sup> A third party may, indeed, still be "affected by notice of any matter by reason of a failure to make such inquiries as ought reasonably to be made".<sup>11</sup> But the latter provision is of limited importance in the present context because "a party to a transaction with a company is not bound to enquire as to whether it is permitted by the company's memorandum or as to any limitation on the powers of the board of directors to bind the company or to authorise others to do so."<sup>12</sup> The third party is thus not bound to inquire whether the directors actually had the power to authorise the agent, with whom he dealt, to enter into the transaction on behalf of the company.

Secondly, in favour of a person dealing in good faith with the company, the power of the board of directors to bind the company is "deemed to be free of any limitation under the company's constitution".<sup>13</sup> This provision has already been discussed<sup>14</sup>; here it is only necessary to repeat that a person does not act in bad faith merely because he knows that an act is beyond the powers of the directors under the company's constitution.<sup>15</sup> Liability under this provision may therefore arise even though the requirements of the doctrine of apparent authority are not satisfied because the third party knows of the limitation on the directors' authority.

The common law principles governing apparent authority can, however, still apply where the third party relies, not on the apparent existence of powers, but on their exercise. The point may be illustrated by supposing that the board of directors of a company has power under the articles to appoint a managing director, but that the person with whom the third party has dealt as such has not actually been appointed to the post. The third party cannot then rely simply on the fact that the board had power to make the appointment. But the third party's claim will be upheld if he can show that there has been a representation by the persons entitled to make the appointment, to the effect that it has in fact been made. Such a representation need not be express but may be implied from conduct: for example, from the action of the board in allowing the person with whom the third party dealt to act as managing director. The company will then be bound by contracts made by him (even though he has not actually been appointed managing director) so long as those contracts are within the scope of the authority normally conferred on managing directors.<sup>16</sup> A company may also be bound by contracts made by its officers on the ground that they were impliedly authorised to make them; but here the liability is based on actual (implied) and not on apparent authority.<sup>17</sup>

(g) FORGERIES BY AGENT. In two cases, company secretaries affixed the common seals of their companies to documents which they had forged. It was held that third parties who were taken in by the forgeries could not, against the companies, rely on them.<sup>18</sup> But in Uxbridge PBS v Pickard<sup>19</sup> a solicitor's clerk obtained money by way of mortgage on the strength of forged title deeds alleged to belong to a fictitious client. His principal was <sup>10</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.711A(1) (as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.142). Contrast Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.6(3)(b) under which the apparent authority of a member of such a body can be terminated by giving notice that he has ceased to be a member of the Registrar of Companies.

<sup>11</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.711A(2).

<sup>12</sup> ibid. s.35B (as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1)).

<sup>13</sup> ibid. s.35A(1).

<sup>14</sup> See above, p.562 (also listing cases excepted from s.35A).

<sup>15</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35A(2)(b) (as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1)).

<sup>16</sup> Freeman & Lockyer v Buckhurst Properties (Mangal) Ltd, above, n.9.

<sup>17</sup> Hely-Hutchinson v Brayhead Ltd [1968] 1 Q.B. 549 at 573; Nock, 30 M.L.R. 705.

<sup>18</sup> Bank of Ireland v Evan's Trustees (1855) 5 H.L.C. 389; Ruben v Great Fingall Consolidated [1906] A.C. 439.

<sup>19</sup> [1939] 2 K.B. 248.

held liable. In the former cases, the secretaries had not been held out as having authority to execute the documents (respectively a power of attorney and a share transfer). In the latter case, the clerk had been held out as having authority to conclude mortgage transactions. Alternatively, the first two cases can be regarded as cases in which the agent had, in effect, forged the principal's signature. When this happens, the third party is induced to believe, not that the agent has his principal's authority, but that the signature is the act of the principal himself. Such a belief does not give rise to apparent authority.<sup>20</sup> The person whose signature is forged is, however, liable if he knew of the forgery and acquiesced in it.<sup>21</sup>

(h) SUBSEQUENT CONDUCT OF "PRINCIPAL". A person may be bound by a contract, even though the requirements of apparent authority are not satisfied, if he is precluded by his subsequent conduct from denying that the contract was made on his behalf. In Spiro v Lintern<sup>22</sup> a wife purported to enter into a contract for the sale of her husband's house. She had no actual authority to do so, nor had the husband before the transaction led the purchaser to believe that she was his agent for the purpose. But afterwards the husband met the purchaser, gave him the impression that there was a binding contract and allowed him to incur expenses in connection with the property. It was held that the husband was estopped<sup>23</sup> from denying his wife's authority to make the contract on his behalf.

(2) Usual authority

(a) MEANING. The phrase "usual authority" is used in a number of senses. First, it may mean implied authority, and, in particular, incidental authority.<sup>24</sup> Secondly, it may refer to cases in which an agent has apparent authority because he has been placed by his principal in a situation in which he would have had incidental authority, if this had not been expressly negated by instructions given to him by the principal (and not communicated to the third party).<sup>25</sup> But the phrase will here be used in a third sense, to refer to cases in which a principal is bound by his agent's contracts although there is no express, implied or apparent authority. This usage is based on Watteau v Fenwick,<sup>26</sup> where the owner of a public-house was sued for the price of cigars bought without his authority by his manager for the purposes of the business. The manager had bought the cigars in his own name. Thus the seller could not rely on any appearance of authority since he believed, at the time of the contract, that the manager was contracting on his own behalf. But the defendant was nonetheless held liable. Wills J. said: "The principal is liable for all the acts of the agent which are within the authority usually confided to an agent of that character, notwithstanding limitations, as between the principal and the agent, put upon that authority. It is said that this is only so where there has been a holding out of authority. . . . But I do not think so."<sup>27</sup>

<sup>20</sup> cf. Kooragang Investments Pty Ltd v Richardson & Wrench Ltd [1982] A.C. 462.

<sup>21</sup> Greenwood v Martins Bank Ltd [1933] A.C. 51.

<sup>22</sup> [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1002; followed in Worboys v Carter [1987] 2 E.G.L.R. 1; cf. Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444.

<sup>23</sup> Detrimental reliance by the third party is necessary for this type of estoppel (above, p.403); while for the purposes of apparent authority, "the only detriment that has to be shown . . . is the entering into the contract": The Tatra [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 51 at 59.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.711.

<sup>25</sup> The Raffiaella [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 36 at 41; First Energy (UK) Ltd v Hungarian International Bank Ltd [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 195 at 201.

<sup>26</sup> [1893] 1 Q.B. 346.

<sup>27</sup> ibid. at 348-349; cf. The Ocean Frost [1986] A.C. 717 at 734 (affirmed ibid. 773), where there was no holding out for the different reason stated at p.713, above.

This decision has been criticised,<sup>28</sup> and has been more often distinguished than followed, but later courts which have thought it necessary to distinguish it must have regarded it as still good law.<sup>29</sup> There are, moreover, other cases in which a principal is bound by his agent's acts done outside the scope of his express, implied or apparent authority. Thus if a principal gives his agent documents and authorises him to borrow a fixed sum on the security of them, he may be liable to a third party from whom the agent borrows more, even though the third party did not think that the agent had any authority to borrow.<sup>30</sup> Similarly, at common law a person was bound by an unauthorised sale of his goods by a factor, though the factor sold in his own name.<sup>31</sup> At common law, he was not bound by an unauthorised pledge, but under the Factors Act 1889, he is bound, if certain conditions are satisfied, by any disposition (though unauthorised) made by such an agent. These rules are, it is submitted, based on the same principle as Watteau v Fenwick. That principle seems to be more closely analogous to the doctrine of vicarious liability in tort (under which an employer may be liable even for forbidden acts if done by an employee in the course of employment<sup>32</sup>) than to the doctrine of apparent authority.

Two Privy Council decisions can be said to be inconsistent with the principle of usual authority, in that they simply did not consider it as a possible basis of liability where the requirements of apparent authority were not satisfied. But in the first<sup>33</sup> the question was whether a principal could be held criminally liable for his agent's unauthorised act in purporting to enter, on the principal's behalf, into a contract which the latter was by statute prohibited from making. The negative answer given to this question can be explained on the ground that the courts are reluctant to impose criminal liability without mens rea. And in the second case<sup>34</sup> the contract was a sale of Crown property made without actual or apparent authority. The conclusion that the Crown was not bound was supported on the ground that "The subject derives benefits . . . from property vested in the Crown, and its proper protection is necessary in the interests of the subject, though it may cause hardship to an individual."<sup>35</sup> But this reasoning proves too much, for the need to give "proper protection" to Crown property would seem to extend to all dispositions made without actual authority, i.e. even to those within the agent's apparent authority. And the only conclusion which follows from Privy Council's reasoning is that the Crown should not have been ordered to deliver the goods to the buyer, and such specific relief is not available against the Crown, even where it is bound by a contract.<sup>36</sup> The reasoning does not explain why the disappointed buyer should not receive damages or compensation; and in deciding whether such a remedy ought to be available it is submitted that the principle of usual (no less than that of apparent) authority should be taken into consideration.

(b) SCOPE. The extent of an agent's usual authority depends on the class of agent to which he belongs and on the common understanding of the trade concerning such

<sup>28</sup> See Montrose, 17 Can.Bar Rev. 693; Hornby [1961] C.I.J. 239; The Rhodian River [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 373 at 379.

<sup>29</sup> See Johnston v Reading (1893) 9 T.J.R. 200; Lloyds Bank v Swiss Bankverein (1912) 107 L.T. 309; 108 L.T. 143; Jerome v Bentley & Co [1952] 2 T.L.R. 58.

<sup>30</sup> Brocklesby v Temperance PBS [1895] A.C. 173; Fry v Smellie [1912] 3 K.B. 282. For criticism of the reasoning of these cases, see Bomstead and Reynolds on Agency (17th ed.), pp.393-394.

<sup>31</sup> Coles v NW Bank (1875) L.R. 10 C.P. 354 at 362.

<sup>32</sup> Limpus v LGO (1862) 1 H. & C. 526.

<sup>33</sup> Miles v McIlwraith (1883) 8 App.Cas. 120.

<sup>34</sup> Attorney-General for Ceylon v Silva [1953] A.C. 461; above, p.713.

<sup>35</sup> [1953] A.C. at 481.

<sup>36</sup> Crown Proceedings Act 1947, s.21(1)(a).

agents. Watteau v Fenwick should from this point of view be contrasted with Daun v Simmins,<sup>37</sup> where it was held that the manager of a tied public-house had no usual authority to order spirits from any person he chose. And where the agent does not belong to a well-known class of agents, but is simply appointed for an isolated transaction, the doctrine of usual authority does not apply. Thus in Jerome v Bentley & Co<sup>38</sup> a retired army officer to whom jewellery had been entrusted for sale was held not to have the usual authority which a mercantile agent would have had in the same circumstances.

A principal is liable under the doctrine of usual authority only if there is some dealing between the third party and the agent: the doctrine does not apply if the agent's involvement in the transaction has been concealed so that the third party thinks that he is dealing directly with the principal.<sup>39</sup> The contract must also be made in the course of the principal's business: in Kinahan v Parry<sup>40</sup> it was accordingly held that a hotel-owner was not liable for whisky bought without his authority by his manager, since it was not proved that the manager had bought it for use in the hotel rather than for his personal use. Similarly, where the manager of a tied house bought beer from outside suppliers and resold it on the premises on his own account, it was said that his employers could not have been sued for the price of the beer.<sup>41</sup> A person is, a fortiori, not liable under the doctrine of usual authority if the business in the course of which the contract was made was not his business at all. Thus in MacFisheries Ltd v Harrison<sup>42</sup> the owner of a public-house sold it as a going concern, but forgot to transfer the licence to the buyer. He was not liable for food supplied to his successor for consumption on the premises, since the latter was carrying on the business entirely on his own behalf.

(3) Authority of necessity<sup>43</sup>

Under this heading, we shall first discuss a number of situations in which one person acts to protect some interest of another without any previous authorisation from that other person. We shall then consider whether any useful purpose is served by attempting to bring all these, somewhat disparate, cases within the scope of a single doctrine.

(a) ACCEPTANCE OF A BILL OF EXCHANGE FOR THE HONOUR OF THE DRAWER. When a bill is not accepted by the person on whom it is drawn, a stranger may, with the consent of the holder, accept the bill for the honour of the drawer. If the stranger has to pay on this acceptance, he becomes entitled to the rights of the holder to sue the drawer on the bill.<sup>44</sup>

(b) SHIPMASTERS. Where it is necessary<sup>45</sup> to do so for the further prosecution of the voyage, the master of a ship has authority of necessity to borrow on the shipowner's

<sup>37</sup> (1879) 41 L.T. 783.

<sup>38</sup> [1952] 2 T.L.R. 58.

<sup>39</sup> Kooragang Investments Pty Ltd v Richardson & Wrench Ltd [1982] A.C. 462.

<sup>40</sup> [1911] 1 K.B. 459.

<sup>41</sup> Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1985) [1986] Q.B. 491 at 506.

<sup>42</sup> (1924) 93 L.J.K.B. 811.

<sup>43</sup> Williston, 22 Can.Bar Rev. 492; Treitel, 3 W.A.A.L. Rev. 1; Wade, 19 Vanderbilt L.Rev. 1183; Birks, 10 C.L.P. 110; Matthews [1981] C.L.J. 340. The old rules under which a deserted wife had authority of necessity were abolished by Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, s.41, and are not revived by the repeal of that section by Matrimonial Causes Act 1973: see Interpretation Act 1978, ss.15, 16; for a dispute on the point see 36 M.I.L.R. 638 at 642, 37 M.I.L.R. 480.

<sup>44</sup> See Bills of Exchange Act 1882, ss.65-68.

<sup>45</sup> See below, pp.720-721.

credit, to hypothecate the ship, cargo and freight, or the cargo alone, to sell part of the cargo,<sup>46</sup> and to enter into a salvage agreement on behalf of the cargo-owner.<sup>47</sup>

(c) SALVAGE. A person who goes to the aid of a ship in distress at sea<sup>48</sup> and saves life or property is entitled to a reward the amount of which is (subject to certain limitations), at the discretion of the court.

(d) OTHER CASES. The courts have been reluctant to extend the doctrine of agency of necessity, because it may deprive a person of his property, or subject him to an obligation, without his consent.<sup>49</sup> But the doctrine is not confined to the three situations described above. It extends to a number of other situations, in some (but not in all) of which the authority is based on some prior relationship between the parties.<sup>50</sup>

(i) Powers of sale. It has been held that land carriers can have authority of necessity to sell.<sup>51</sup> At common law, the courts were reluctant to hold that a bailee with whom goods had been left for storage or repair was entitled to sell them merely because the owner had failed to collect them and could not be traced. By statute, the bailee is now entitled to sell in a number of situations if he has given notice to the bailor of his intention to sell or if he has failed to trace the bailor after having taken reasonable steps to do so.<sup>52</sup> This statutory power extends to cases in which there was, at common law, no authority of necessity to sell.<sup>53</sup> There may also be cases in which, though the statutory requirements are not satisfied, a sale can be justified under the common law doctrine of agency of necessity. For example, a buyer of goods may justifiably reject them on the ground that they are not in conformity with the contract of sale; and if the seller refuses to accept their return, the buyer may then have authority of necessity to sell them for the account of the seller.<sup>54</sup>

(ii) Preservation of another's property. A number of cases raise the question whether a person who preserves another's property has any claim against the owner. Two eighteenth-century cases decided that such a person has no lien on the property saved<sup>55</sup>; but it does not necessarily follow that he has no claim for reimbursement. In Tetley v British Trade Corp<sup>56</sup> an agent who, contrary to his principal's express instruction, removed goods from Batum to Constantinople (to save them from seizure by an invading army) recovered the expense of the removal from his principal. In The Winson<sup>57</sup> a salvor of goods from a stranded ship took them to a place of safety and (to prevent them from deteriorating) had them stored in a warehouse there. It was held that the owner was liable to the salvor for the cost of warehousing the goods. And in GN Ry v Smafield<sup>58</sup>

<sup>46</sup> See Notara v Henderson (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 225.

<sup>47</sup> The Winson [1982] A.C. 939. But where the conditions stated at pp.720–721, below are not satisfied, the master has no implied authority to enter into such an agreement: The Choko Star [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 516.

<sup>48</sup> For this restriction, see The Goring [1988] A.C. 831.

<sup>49</sup> Falcke v Scottish Imperial Assurance Co (1886) 34 Ch.D. 234 at 248; The Winson [1982] A.C. 939 at 962.

<sup>50</sup> Re F [1990] 2 A.C. 1 at 75. cf. Crantrave Ltd v Lloyd's Bank plc [2000] Q.B. 917 at 922–923, where there was no "necessity".

<sup>51</sup> Sims & Co v Midland Ry [1913] 1 K.B. 103 at 112; Springer v Great Western Ry [1921] 1 K.B. 257 at 265, 267; cf. Carriage of Goods by Road Act 1965, Sch., Arts 14(2), 16(3), for statutory provisions in case of international carriage.

<sup>52</sup> Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, ss.12, 13 and Sch.1.

<sup>53</sup> e.g. Sachs v Miklos [1948] 2 K.B. 23; Munro v Wilmott [1949] 1 K.B. 295.

<sup>54</sup> Gruanhandel T Vink BW v European Grain & Shipping Co [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 531 at 533 (where there was no such agency as the buyer had lost his right to reject); cf. The Olib [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 108 at 114.

<sup>55</sup> Binstead v Buck (1776) 2 Wm.Bl. 1117; Nicholson v Chapman (1793) 2 H.Bl. 254.

<sup>56</sup> Cited in (1922) 10 Ll.L.R. at 678.

<sup>57</sup> [1982] A.C. 939; Samuel, 98 L.Q.R. 362.

<sup>58</sup> (1874) L.R. 9 Ex. 132.

a railway company claimed the cost of feeding and stabling a horse from the owner, who had failed to collect it on arrival at its destination and had not authorised the company to incur these expenses. The claim succeeded on the ground that the company "were bound from ordinary feelings of humanity to keep the horse safely and feed him."<sup>59</sup>

(iii) Improvement of another's property. A person who improves another's property may do so in the mistaken but honest belief that it is his own. In such a case there is no agency of necessity since the improver's intention is to act on his own behalf, and not on behalf of the owner. If the subject-matter is goods and the owner sues the improver for wrongful interference, the improver is by statute entitled to an allowance (against the owner's claim) in respect of the improvements.<sup>60</sup> A similar rule existed at common law, and presumably applies in relation to property other than goods.<sup>61</sup> It is more doubtful whether the improver has an independent claim in respect of the improvements,<sup>62</sup> i.e. one that he can assert even though no action has been brought against him by the owner.

If the improver knows that he has no title to the property he may again have certain limited rights in respect of the improvements. In Munro v Wilmott<sup>63</sup> the plaintiff with the defendant's permission left his car in the defendant's yard. Some years later, the defendant wanted to have the car moved, and, after trying unsuccessfully to contact the plaintiff, spent some £85 on making the car saleable, and sold it. He was held liable for conversion, but the damages were reduced by £85 "not from the point of view of payment for what he has done, but in order to arrive at . . . the true value of the property which the plaintiff had lost".<sup>64</sup> The case would now come within the statutory provisions authorising sales of uncollected goods,<sup>65</sup> so that the defendant would no longer be liable in conversion. Under the statutory provisions the bailee must account for the proceeds of sale to the bailor and is entitled to deduct items such as the costs of sale and sums due to him under the terms of the bailment<sup>66</sup>; but nothing is said about the value of improvements.<sup>67</sup> However, the bailee can apply to the court for an order authorising the sale "subject to such terms . . . as may be specified in the order".<sup>68</sup> These could perhaps give him the right to make a deduction in respect of improvements. Even this possibility would not be open to the bailee if he did not sell the goods but simply returned them to the bailor. In such a case he could perhaps invoke the doctrine of agency of necessity.

(iv) Conditions to be satisfied. In the sale, preservation and improvement cases just discussed, the common law doctrine of agency of necessity will apply only if certain conditions are satisfied.<sup>69</sup> It must be impossible to communicate with the owner of the goods in time to get his instructions or impossible to obtain such instructions because

<sup>59</sup> ibid. at 137.

<sup>60</sup> Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, ss.6(1), 3(7).

<sup>61</sup> Peruvian Guano Co v Dreyfus Bros. [1892] A.C. 166 at 176; Greenwood v Bennett [1973] Q.B. 195.

<sup>62</sup> For a suggestion that there is such a claim, see Greenwood v Bennett, above at p.201 (but see p.203); Jones, 93 J.Q.R. 273.

<sup>63</sup> [1949] 1 K.B. 295.

<sup>64</sup> [1949] 1 K.B. 295 at 299.

<sup>65</sup> Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, ss.12, 13 and Sch.1; Palmer [1987] L.M.C.L.Q. 43.

<sup>66</sup> Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s.12(5).

<sup>67</sup> s.6 of the Act (above, n.60) would not apply as the defendant knew that he had no title to the car.

<sup>68</sup> s.13(1)(a).

<sup>69</sup> See Springer v GW Ry [1921] 1 K.B. 257; Prager v Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd [1924] 1 K.B. 566. These principles also apply to a shipmaster's authority of necessity: above, pp.718-719; cf. The Winson [1982] A.C. 939.

the owner (though he can be reached) fails to give them<sup>70</sup>; the agent must act reasonably, in good faith and in the interests of the owner; and his acts must have been commercially necessary. It is not "necessary" to sell goods merely because they are causing inconvenience,<sup>71</sup> for there may be a reasonable opportunity of storing them.<sup>72</sup>

(v) Preservation of life or health. The doctrine of agency of necessity may apply where one person preserves the life or health of another. Thus it is the basis on which a person can sue for the value of necessities supplied to a mental patient who has no capacity for rational thought.<sup>73</sup> A doctor who gives medical attention to an unconscious person might recover a fee on the same ground<sup>74</sup>; the case for allowing him to do so would be particularly strong where the doctor's acts are not merely lawful but are done in the performance of a legal duty to render the services in question.<sup>75</sup> A right to payment would of course be negated if the circumstances were such that the services would not normally be paid for: this would be the position where emergency treatment is given under the National Health Service. Special statutory provisions entitle the doctor to a fee where he gives emergency treatment to the victim of a road accident<sup>76</sup> and require National Health Service charges to be paid to the Secretary of State in respect of hospital treatment given by the Service to a "traffic casualty" if a "compensation payment" is made (normally by an insurer) in respect of injury or death suffered as a result of the use of a motor vehicle on a road.<sup>77</sup>

(e) SCOPE OF THE DOCTRINE. It will be seen from the situations discussed above that "agency of necessity" can produce three quite different results. First, it may enable the agent to create a contract between the principal and a third party<sup>78</sup>; secondly it may entitle the agent to dispose of the principal's property<sup>79</sup>; and thirdly it may entitle the agent to recompense or reimbursement in respect of the efforts that he has made, or the expense that he has incurred, to protect the interests of the principal.<sup>80</sup> It has been suggested that the expression "agency of necessity" should no longer be used in its traditional broad sense, to refer to all these consequences, but that it should be used in a narrower sense, to refer only to cases in which the question is whether the agent has, by reason of the necessity, the power to create a contract between his principal and a third party.<sup>81</sup>

The purpose of this suggested departure from the traditional terminology is to make the point that the three consequences described above do not necessarily depend on the

<sup>70</sup> The Winson, above at 962; The Olib [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 108 at 104; the possibility that the owner may fail to give the instructions shows that the difficulty of obtaining them is not invariably "overcome to-day by modern means of communication" (Re F [1990] 2 A.C. 1 at 75); cf. The Choko Star [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 516 at 524; it may also be impracticable for a shipmaster to obtain instructions from all the cargo-owners.

<sup>71</sup> Sachs v Miklos [1948] 2 K.B. 23, as to which see above, p.719, n.53.

<sup>72</sup> As in Prager v Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock Ltd [1924] 1 K.B. 566. Semble the statutory power of sale referred to on p.719, above, would not extend to the facts of this case.

<sup>73</sup> See above, pp.558–559.

<sup>74</sup> Cotnam v Wisdom, 83 Ark. 601, 104 S.W. 164 (1907); Re Crisan's Estate, 102 N.W. 2d 907 (1961). For the right of an accident victim to recover damages in respect of loss suffered by a person who nurses him, cf. above, p.594 n.48.

<sup>75</sup> Re F [1990] 2 A.C. 1 at 55, where the issue was whether the treatment was lawful (see above, pp.558–559); cf. Re T [1993] Fam. 95; Re M B (Caesarean Section) [1997] 2 F.L.R. 426; Re B (adult's refusal of medical treatment) [2002] EWHC 429, Fam.; [2002] 2 All E.R. 449.

<sup>76</sup> Road Traffic Act 1988, ss.158, 159, as amended by Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999, s.18(2).

<sup>77</sup> Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Act 1999, s.1.

<sup>78</sup> e.g., above, p.719 at n.47.

<sup>79</sup> e.g. above, p.719 at n.51.

<sup>80</sup> e.g. above, pp.719–720 at nn.56–59.

<sup>81</sup> The Winson [1982] A.C. 939 at 958.

same requirements.<sup>82</sup> Thus a person who, to prevent another's goods from deteriorating, arranges for them to be stored in a warehouse, may have a claim against the owner for reimbursement of the charges that he has paid to the warehouseman. It does not follow from this that he also has the power to make a contract between the owner and the warehouseman, so that the warehouseman can sue the owner directly for his charges.<sup>83</sup> On the other hand, the fact that both consequences depend on necessity makes it at least likely that similar factors will often be relevant to each of them. For example, the humanitarian considerations which enabled the railway company in GN Ry v Swaffield<sup>84</sup> to claim reimbursement might well have been used in support of the argument that the railway company had power to create a contract between the owner of the horse and a livery stable in which it was housed on his failure to collect it. Similarly, it is relevant for the purpose of both consequences to ask whether the agent acted in the interests of the owner or out of self-interest.<sup>85</sup>

Thus it is submitted that the question whether the label "agency of necessity" should be used in its traditional broad, or in a new narrow, sense is largely one of emphasis, or, as has been said, a "purely terminological"<sup>86</sup> one. It is part of the wider question as to the effects of non-consensual agency, to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>87</sup> Such agency scarcely ever produces all of the effects of agency based on agreement, but it generally does produce some of those effects. This is true of all forms of non-consensual agency; and it is submitted that, so long as the relationships discussed under the present heading produce at least some of the consequences that normally flow from agency by agreement, it is not inappropriate to say that they give rise to "agency of necessity".

3. Ratification

A principal may acquire rights and incur liabilities as a result of his agent's unauthorised act by ratifying it.

(1) What amounts to ratification

Ratification may be express or implied. It can be implied if the principal by conduct unequivocally affirms the agent's acts, even though he purports to repudiate them.<sup>88</sup> Mere passive acquiescence does not of itself amount to ratification,<sup>89</sup> but it may, when combined with other circumstances, have this effect: for example where the principal knows that the third party believes him to have accepted the agent's act as having been authorised and takes no steps within a reasonable time to repudiate the transaction.<sup>90</sup>

Ratification will not generally be implied from conduct unless the principal has full knowledge of the agent's unauthorised act.<sup>91</sup> But a principal may be held to have ratified if he indicates that he will support whatever the agent has done on his behalf, even

<sup>82</sup> ibid.

<sup>83</sup> ibid.

<sup>84</sup> (1874) L.R. 9 Ex. 132; above, pp.719–720.

<sup>85</sup> The Winson, above at 962.

<sup>86</sup> ibid. at p.965; cf. Re F [1990] 2 A.C. 1 at 75 (using the expression to refer to the intervenor's right to reimbursement).

<sup>87</sup> See below, p.748.

<sup>88</sup> Cornwall v Henson (1750) 1 Ves.Sen. 509.

<sup>89</sup> Moon v Towers (1860) 8 C.B.(N.S.) 611; reversed on other grounds: (1860) 9 H.L.C. 78. Contrast the now doubtful case of Waithman v Wakefield (1807) 1 Camp. 120; and Michael Elliott & Partners v UK Land [1991] 1 E.G.L.R. 39.

<sup>90</sup> Suncorp Insurance & Finance v Milano Assicurazioni SpA [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 225 at 241.

<sup>91</sup> Lewis v Read (1845) 13 M. & W. 834.

though he does not know exactly what the agent has agreed to: in such a case the principal takes the risk of the agent's having exceeded his authority.<sup>92</sup>

An act will be regarded as a ratification only if the principal had a free choice whether to do it or not. Merely taking back one's own property after a third party has, in reliance on unauthorised instructions, done work on it is not ratification.<sup>93</sup>

(2) When ratification possible

Ratification is effective only if the following conditions are satisfied.

(a) THE AGENT MUST PURPORT TO ACT ON BEHALF OF THE PRINCIPAL. A principal can only ratify acts which the agent purported to do on his behalf.<sup>94</sup> The most important consequence of this rule is that if the agent purports to act on his own behalf the principal cannot ratify; or, in other words, that an undisclosed principal<sup>95</sup> cannot ratify. Thus in Keighley, Maxsted & Co v Durant<sup>96</sup> an agent bought corn at a price above that at which he had been instructed to buy. He intended to buy for his principal, but did not disclose this fact to the seller. The undisclosed principal purported to ratify the purchase, but later refused to accept delivery. It was held that the ratification was ineffective and that the principal was not liable. Lord Macnaghten said that "Civil obligations are not to be created by or founded upon undisclosed intentions."<sup>97</sup> It could be objected that this reasoning would destroy the whole law relating to undisclosed principals. But the decision is nonetheless intelligible, having regard to the common law doctrine of privity of contract. Ratification and the undisclosed principal are two important exceptions to that doctrine. To allow both exceptions to operate on the same set of facts would go far towards overthrowing the doctrine of privity altogether.<sup>98</sup>

On the other hand, an unnamed principal<sup>99</sup> can ratify. Policies of marine insurance may be taken out "for and on behalf of any person interested"; and such persons can ratify although they are not named in the policy.<sup>1</sup>

The rule that the agent must purport to act on behalf of the principal does not mean that he must intend to do so. Thus the principal may ratify although the agent intended to defraud him.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>92</sup> Fitzmaurice v Bayley (1856) 6 E. & B. 868; cf. Haseler v Lemoyne (1858) 5 C.B.(N.S.) 530; Suncorp case, above, n.90, at p.234.

<sup>93</sup> Foreman & Co Pty Ltd v The Liddesdale [1900] A.C. 190.

<sup>94</sup> Wilson v Tumman (1843) 6 Man. & G. 236.

<sup>95</sup> For the definition of "undisclosed principal," below, p.727.

<sup>96</sup> [1901] A.C. 240; cf. The Astyanax [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109; Welsh Development Agency v Export Finance Co [1992] B.C.L.C. 148; The Moonacre [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 501 at 515; Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 207; Secured Residential Funding plc v Douglas Goldberg Hendeles & Co, The Times, April 26, 2000.

<sup>97</sup> [1901] A.C. 240 at 247.

<sup>98</sup> Since an undisclosed principal is, by definition, not identified in the contract, the present rule is not affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: see s.1(3), above, p.655. A further reason why the Act would not apply on facts such as those of the Keighley Maxsted case, above, is that the issue there was whether the ratifier was liable under the contract; and the rule that a contract does not bind a third party is generally unaffected by the Act: above, p.581.

<sup>99</sup> For the definition of "unnamed principal," see below, p.727.

<sup>1</sup> Hagedorn v Oliverson (1814) 2 M. & S. 485. Quære whether the requirement stated in Watson v Swann (1862) 11 C.B.(N.S.) 756 at 771, that the person seeking to ratify must be described at the time of the contract in such a way as to be ascertainable at that time is generally accepted: see Boston Fruit Co v British & Foreign Marine Insurance Co [1906] A.C. 336 at 338-339 (a case apparently overlooked in Southern Water Authority v Carey [1985] 2 All E.R. 1077 at 1085); Arnould, Marine Insurance (16th ed.), §243.

<sup>2</sup> Re Tiedemann & Ledermann Frères [1899] 2 Q.B. 66.

In Brook v Hook<sup>3</sup> an agent forged his principal's signature to a promissory note. The principal's later ratification was held to be ineffective. This case has given rise to a dispute on the question whether a forgery can ever be ratified. But it does not seem that this question arises in a case of this kind. If an agent forges his principal's signature he does not say "I am signing for my principal" but "this is my principal's signature". The principal cannot ratify because the agent did not purport to act on his behalf.<sup>4</sup> But if the principal stands by knowing that his agent will forge his signature he may be estopped from denying its genuineness.<sup>5</sup>

(b) THE PRINCIPAL'S CAPACITY. At common law, a corporation cannot ratify the unauthorised act of its agent in entering into an ultra vires contract.<sup>6</sup> There are two reasons why, in general,<sup>7</sup> this rule no longer applies in relation to companies incorporated under the Companies Acts. First, the validity of an act done by such a company can no longer be called into question on the ground of lack of capacity by reason of anything in the company's memorandum.<sup>8</sup> Secondly, an act can be ratified even though it was done by the directors in breach of their duty to observe limitations on their powers contained in the memorandum.<sup>9</sup> Such ratification would also prevent the company from impugning the transaction on the ground that it was beyond the power of the board of directors.<sup>10</sup>

A person can become liable on a contract made by him while he was a minor if he "ratifies" it after reaching full age.<sup>11</sup> "Ratification" here seems to refer to confirmation by a person of a contract made by himself; but there seems to be no reason why a person should not be similarly liable on a ratification after full age of a contract made on his behalf, but without his authority, while he was a minor. There are, however, cases in which a person is not liable on a ratification in the sense of a confirmation of a contract made during minority by himself<sup>12</sup>; and it is submitted that he would equally not be liable if, after full age, he ratified a contract of this kind which had during his minority been made on his behalf but without his authority.<sup>13</sup>

(c) THE PRINCIPAL MUST HAVE BEEN IN EXISTENCE WHEN THE ACT WAS DONE. This rule can give rise to inconvenience when promoters contract on behalf of a projected company. It was held in Kelner v Baxter<sup>14</sup> that the company could not, after its formation, ratify the promoters' contracts, since it was not in existence when those contracts were made. One way of evading this rule is for the promoter to enter into a draft agreement providing that the company, when formed, shall enter into a similar agreement with the third party and that the liability of the promoter shall thereupon cease. But the draft agreement creates no binding contract between company and third

<sup>3</sup> (1871) L.R. 6 Ex. 89.

<sup>4</sup> Imperial Bank of Canada v Begley [1936] 2 All E.R. 367.

<sup>5</sup> Greenwood v Martins Bank Ltd [1933] A.C. 51.

<sup>6</sup> Ashbury Ry Carriage & Iron Co v Riche (1875) L.R. 7 H.L. 653; Mann v Edinburgh N Tramways [1893] A.C. 69; Rolled Steel Products (Holdings) Ltd v BSC [1986] Ch. 246 at 304.

<sup>7</sup> For exceptions, see above, p.561.

<sup>8</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35(1) (as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1)); above, p.561.

<sup>9</sup> Companies Act 1985 (above), s.35(3).

<sup>10</sup> i.e. under ibid. s.35A(1); it seems to follow that ratification can be effective even if the third party acted in bad faith, at least if the members of the company were aware of this fact when ratifying the contract.

<sup>11</sup> See above, p.549.

<sup>12</sup> A penal bond could not be ratified as it was considered to be wholly void: Baylis v Dineley (1815) 3 M. & S. 477.

<sup>13</sup> On the principle that a nullity cannot be ratified: below, p.725.

<sup>14</sup> (1866) L.R. 2 C.P. 174; cf. Melhado v Porto Alegre Ry (1874) L.R. 9 C.P. 503.

party, so that each can, with the collusion of the promoter, deprive the other of the expected benefit of the contract. The position is somewhat better in equity. The company may be able to enforce the contract against the third party by showing that the promoter acted as trustee for it,<sup>15</sup> and the third party may be able to claim a reasonable remuneration out of any sum which the company has paid, or bound itself to pay, to the promoter for initial expenses.<sup>16</sup> But the third party has no such right if the company has neither made nor promised any payment to the promoter<sup>17</sup>; nor has he any claim against the company on a purely executory contract. By statute, a contract which purports to be made by or on behalf of a company before it is formed has effect (subject to contrary agreement) as a contract between the third party and the person purporting to act for the company or as agent for it.<sup>18</sup> But it is still impossible to create a direct contract between the company and the third party by ratification after incorporation. It would be better if the rule in Kelner v Baxter were wholly repealed by legislation.<sup>19</sup> We shall see that legislation to some extent solves the problems which arise out of pre-incorporation contracts; but it does so by techniques other than ratification.<sup>20</sup>

(d) THE PRINCIPAL MUST RATIFY IN TIME. A contract cannot be ratified after the time fixed for its performance<sup>21</sup>; if no such time is fixed, it must be ratified within a reasonable time of the principal's acquiring notice of the unauthorised act.<sup>22</sup> Nor can a contract be ratified at a time when the principal could not validly have made it.<sup>23</sup> Thus it has been held that, where an agent, without authority, insures his principal's property, the latter cannot ratify the insurance after the destruction of the property,<sup>24</sup> since he could not at that time have insured it. But exceptionally a policy of marine insurance can be ratified after the destruction of the property insured<sup>25</sup> and it has been suggested that this rule should also be applied to other kinds of insurance.<sup>26</sup>

(e) A NULLITY CANNOT BE RATIFIED.<sup>27</sup> Although ratification is not confined to lawful acts, an act which is simply void in law cannot be validated by ratification. Similarly, a principal cannot become liable if the unauthorised contract was prohibited by statute: "life cannot be given by ratification to prohibited transactions".<sup>28</sup> This is an additional reason for saying that a forgery cannot be ratified.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>15</sup> See above, pp.646 et seq.

<sup>16</sup> Touche v Metropolitan Ry (1871) L.R. 6 Ch.App. 671; cf. Re Hereford, etc., Engineering Co (1876) 2 Ch.D. 621 (where the third party lost his rights because of the promoter's fraud); Re Empress Engineering Co (1880) 16 Ch.D. 125. Spiller v Paris Skating Rink Co (1878) 7 Ch.D. 368 states the equitable principle too widely.

<sup>17</sup> Re Rotherham Alum & Chemical Co (1883) 25 Ch.D. 103.

<sup>18</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.36C(1), as inserted by Companies Act 1989, s.130(4); below, p.735.

<sup>19</sup> The Companies Bill 1973 (which was lost at the dissolution of Parliament in February 1974) contained a provision (cl.6) to this effect. And see Gross, 87 L.Q.R. 367.

<sup>20</sup> See below, pp.730–731, 731–732, 735–736.

<sup>21</sup> Metropolitan Asylums Board v Kingham (1890) 6 T.L.R. 217; Dibbins v Dibbins [1896] 2 Ch. 348.

<sup>22</sup> Re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines (1890) 45 Ch.D. 16; cf. Bedford Insurance Co Ltd v Instituto de Ressaguros do Brasil [1985] Q.B. 966 at 987 (and see above, p.434).

<sup>23</sup> cf. Bird v Brown (1850) 4 Ex. 786 at 789, quoted with approval by Dillon L.J. in Presentaciones Musicales S.A. v Secunda [1994] Ch. 271; for another explanation of Bird v Brown, see below, p.726, n.35.

<sup>24</sup> Grover & Grover Ltd v Matthews [1910] 2 K.B. 401.

<sup>25</sup> Williams v N China Insurance Co (1876) 1 C.P.D. 757; Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.86.

<sup>26</sup> NOW v DOL [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 587 at 607–608.

<sup>27</sup> For a discussion of this rule, see Danish Mercantile Co v Beaumont [1951] Ch. 680 (where the act was held not to be a nullity).

<sup>28</sup> Bedford Insurance Co Ltd v Instituto de Ressaguros do Brasil [1985] Q.B. 966 at 986 (and see above, p.434).

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.723.

(3) Effect of ratification

The effect of ratification is to put principal, agent and third party into the position in which they would have been, if the agent's acts had been authorised from the start: his authority is said to relate back to the time of the unauthorised act. Thus in Bolton Partners v Lambert<sup>30</sup> an agent without authority purported to buy a house for his principal from the defendant, who later repudiated the contract. The principal then ratified. It was held that the defendant was bound by the contract. His repudiation was ineffective as the principal's ratification related back to the time of the agent's unauthorised purchase. The same rule applies where the agent does some act other than the making of a contract. Where, for example, he without authority, begins legal proceedings on behalf of his principal, the principal can ratify even after the expiry of the period of limitation.<sup>31</sup> For the purpose of the doctrine of relation back, it is assumed that the unauthorised act is not a nullity: if it were, ratification would be ineffective either because a nullity cannot be ratified or on the ground that, when it took place, the principal could not himself have validly or effectively done the act in question.<sup>32</sup>

The rule that ratification relates back does not apply where the agent contracts "subject to ratification": in such a case the third party can withdraw at any time before ratification.<sup>33</sup> Nor does the rule apply where before ratification the agent and the third party have cancelled the unauthorised transaction by mutual consent.<sup>34</sup> And the doctrine of relation back will not be allowed to deprive a stranger to the contract of a right of property which had vested in him before ratification<sup>35</sup>; though it may deprive him of a right to sue the agent in tort if the agent's unauthorised act would have been lawful, had it been done with the principal's prior authorisation.<sup>36</sup>

The rule in Bolton Partners v Lambert has been criticised on the ground that it puts the third party at the mercy of the principal, who is free to ratify or not as he pleases.<sup>37</sup> But the hardship to the third party should not be exaggerated. If the principal does not ratify, the third party has his remedy against the agent for breach of implied warranty of authority.<sup>38</sup> If the principal does ratify, the third party will be liable to him; but since this is precisely what he expected, he cannot complain. The only hardship is that the principal may be able to keep the third party waiting while he decides whether to ratify. But he must ratify within reasonable time; and the extent of such time is considerably abridged if the third party tells the principal that he wishes to withdraw from the contract.<sup>39</sup> Moreover, a principal cannot ratify after he has, by words or conduct, intimated to the third party that he does not intend to do so<sup>40</sup>; and such an intention could probably be inferred from his remaining silent for more than a comparatively short time after notice of the third party's intention to withdraw. Thus the third party need not be kept indefinitely in suspense. He can, in effect, say to the principal: ratify quickly or not at all.

<sup>30</sup> (1888) 41 Ch.D. 295; cf. Maclean v Dunn (1828) 4 Bing. 722; Koenigsblatt v Sweet [1923] 2 Ch. 314.

<sup>31</sup> Presentaciones Musicales SA v Secunda [1994] Ch. 271.

<sup>32</sup> ibid. at 280.

<sup>33</sup> Watson v Davies [1931] 1 Ch. 455; Warehousing & Forwarding Co of East Africa Ltd v Jafferli & Sons Ltd [1964] A.C. 1.

<sup>34</sup> Walter v James (1871) L.R. 6 Ex. 124; Pacific & General Insurance Co Ltd v Hazell [1997] L.R.L.R. 65.

<sup>35</sup> Bird v Brown (1850) 4 Ex. 786, as explained in Presentaciones Musicales SA v Secunda [1994] Ch. 271 at 285; Tan Cheng Han, 117 L.Q.R. 626.

<sup>36</sup> Whitehead v Taylor (1839) 10 A. & E. 210.

<sup>37</sup> Wambaugh, 9 Harv.L.R. 60; and see Fleming v Bank of New Zealand [1900] A.C. 577.

<sup>38</sup> See below, pp.738–740.

<sup>39</sup> Re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines (1890) 45 Ch.D. 16.

<sup>40</sup> McEvoy v Belfast Banking Co [1935] A.C. 24.

SECTION 4. EFFECTS OF AGENCY

When an agent makes a contract on behalf of his principal with a third party, the transaction can give rise to legal effects between principal and third party, between agent and third party, and between principal and agent. In discussing these effects, we shall first assume that the agency has arisen by consent, and then consider to what extent the same effects result from non-consensual agency.

1. Between Principal and Third Party

(1) Rights of principal against third party

The rights of principal against third party depend in part on the distinction between disclosed and undisclosed principals. A disclosed principal is one of whose existence the third party is aware at the time of contracting. He is called a named principal if the third party also knew his name, and an unnamed principal if the third party did not know his name.<sup>41</sup> An undisclosed principal is one of whose existence the third party is unaware at the time of contracting. Where a person makes a contract “as agent” or “on behalf of my client” the principal will generally be disclosed. But such words may not make it clear that that person is acting as agent in the legal sense<sup>42</sup>; they may merely indicate that he is acting as agent in a commercial sense. If that is the position and the person described as “agent” actually has a principal in the legal sense, that principal may be undisclosed.<sup>43</sup>

(a) DISCLOSED PRINCIPAL. The general rule is that a disclosed principal can enforce the contract against the third party.<sup>44</sup> The third party is not discharged by settling with the agent unless the principal by his conduct induced the third party to do so, or unless the agent had authority to receive payment.<sup>45</sup> The third party cannot set off against the principal any debt which the agent may owe to the third party<sup>46</sup>; and a custom enabling the agent to receive payment by such set-off is unreasonable.<sup>47</sup>

A former usage of trade, by which the general rule did not apply where an English agent contracted on behalf of a foreign principal, is obsolete so that such a principal can now enforce the contract against the third party.<sup>48</sup>

(b) UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL. An undisclosed principal can also, in general, enforce the contract against the third party. Attempts have been made to reconcile this rule with the doctrine of privity. One view is that the contract is “in truth” made with the

<sup>41</sup> Reynolds in (Rose, ed.) Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel, p.77.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.706.

<sup>43</sup> See a difference of opinion on this point in Teheran-Europe Co Ltd v S T Belton (Tractors) Ltd [1968] 2 Q.B. 545 at 552, 556, 561.

<sup>44</sup> Langton v Waite (1868) L.R. 6 Eq. 165. The principal's right arises because he is a party, so that it is not governed by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999: this creates rights only in favour of “a person who is not a party” (s.1(1)).

<sup>45</sup> Yates v Freckleton (1781) 2 Dougl. 623; Linck, Moeller & Co v Jameson & Co (1885) 2 T.L.R. 206; Butwick v Grant [1924] 2 K.B. 483.

<sup>46</sup> Pratt v Willey (1826) 2 C. & P. 350; Fish v Kempton (1849) 7 C.B. 687; Mildred v Maspons (1883) 8 App.Cas. 874; Cooke v Eshelby (1887) 12 App.Cas. 271; unless the agent has authority to receive payment in this way: Stewart v Aberdeen (1838) 4 M. & W. 211 at 228.

<sup>47</sup> Pearson v Scott (1878) 9 Ch.D. 198.

<sup>48</sup> Teheran-Europe Co Ltd v S T Belton (Tractors) Ltd [1968] 2 Q.B. 545; Reynolds, 85 L.Q.R. 92 at 97–103; Hudson, 32 M.L.R. 207. Seem the rule also applies to undisclosed principals: above, n.43.

undisclosed principal,<sup>49</sup> but this is scarcely consistent with the rule that the agent is fully entitled and liable under the contract.<sup>50</sup> Other views recognise that the contract is between agent and third party but say that the principal can intervene because his contract with the agent entitles him to do so, or because he is a cestui que trust or a quasi-assignee.<sup>51</sup> But the better view seems to be that the undisclosed principal's right is not based on the theory that he has somehow acquired the agent's right. His right is an independent right,<sup>52</sup> established by way of exception to the common law doctrine of privity,<sup>53</sup> in the interests of commercial convenience.<sup>54</sup>

The undisclosed principal's right could prejudice a third party, who necessarily thought that he was dealing only with the agent. To avoid such prejudice, the undisclosed principal's right is limited in the following ways.

(i) Consistency with the terms of the contract. An undisclosed principal is not allowed to intervene where this would be inconsistent with the terms of the contract. In Humble v Hunter<sup>55</sup> a person signed a charterparty as "owner." This was held to mean that he and he alone was owner,<sup>56</sup> so that his undisclosed principal was not allowed to intervene. But in F Drughorn Ltd v Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic<sup>57</sup> the fact that an agent signed a charterparty as "charterer" did not exclude his undisclosed principal's right to enforce the contract; and in Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd<sup>58</sup> the fact that the agent was described in an employer's liability policy as the employer did not exclude the right of the undisclosed principal (who was in fact the employer) to intervene. It seems that the courts have become reluctant to hold that this right has been excluded by descriptive words in the contract, since such a conclusion would tend to defeat the considerations of commercial convenience on which the doctrine of the undisclosed principal is based.<sup>59</sup>

(ii) Personal considerations. If the third party can show that he wanted to deal with the agent and with no one else, the undisclosed principal cannot intervene. This will, for example, be the position where the third party wished to contract only with the agent because the nature of the contract was such as to show that the third party relied on the agent's business reputation or integrity<sup>60</sup>; or because the agent owed him money which was to be set off against the amount due from the third party under the contract which

<sup>49</sup> Keighley Maxsted & Co v Durant [1901] A.C. 240 at 261.

<sup>50</sup> See below, p.734.

<sup>51</sup> For discussions of the basis of the doctrine, see Ames, Essays, 453; Seavey, 29 Y.L.J. 859; Goodhart and Hamson, 4 C.L.J. 320; Montrose, 16 Can.Bar Rev. 757; Dowrick, 17 M.L.R. 25; Higgins, 28 M.L.R. 167; Reynolds, above, n.41, pp.89–90. cf. The Astyanax [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 at 113 (where "not a settled part of our law" should probably read "now a settled part . . .", etc.).

<sup>52</sup> Pople v Evans [1969] 2 Ch. 255; The Havprins [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 356 at 362.

<sup>53</sup> Welsh Development Agency v Export Finance Co Ltd [1992] B.C.L.C. 173 at 182, describing the exception as "anomalous."

<sup>54</sup> Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 207. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 does not confer any rights on the undisclosed principal both for the reason given in n.44 above and because he is, by definition, not "expressly identified" within s.1(3) (above, p.655).

<sup>55</sup> (1842) 12 Q.B. 316; Formby Bros v Formby (1910) 102 L.T. 116; cf. The Astyanax [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109.

<sup>56</sup> For the construction in this context of phrases such as "disponent owner" or "operating owner," see The Yanxilas [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 444. In the context of a bill of lading, "[ship]owner" can refer to the person with whom the shipper enters into the contract of carriage and so include a charterer: The Stolt Loyalty [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 559.

<sup>57</sup> [1919] A.C. 203; Danziger v Thompson [1944] K.B. 654. Contrast The Starsin [2003] UKHL 12, [2003] 2 W.L.R. 711, at [84, 85].

<sup>58</sup> [1994] 2 A.C. 199.

<sup>59</sup> ibid. at 210. cf. Epps v Rothnie [1945] K.B. 562 at 565, doubting Humble v Hunter, above.

<sup>60</sup> Collins v Associated Greyhound Racecourses Ltd [1930] Ch. 1 (underwriting contract).

the principal sought to enforce.<sup>61</sup> But the third party will not be prejudiced by the undisclosed principal's right to intervene if (as may be the case in many commercial contexts) it is a matter of indifference to him whether his contract is with the agent or with the undisclosed principal.<sup>62</sup> This was held to be the position in the Siu Yin Kwan<sup>63</sup> case, where the Privy Council also rejected the argument that the undisclosed principal's right should be excluded merely because the contract was one of indemnity insurance. While in some such contracts the insurer may rely on personal considerations relating to the insured,<sup>64</sup> he had not done so here since the proposal form had given him all the information relating to the principal that was relevant to the risk.<sup>65</sup> Presumably, however, the principal could not have intervened if the insurer had proved that, in entering into the contract, he had in fact relied on personal considerations relating to the agent.

A third party who has no particular reason for wanting to deal with the agent may nevertheless not want to deal with the principal. If the agent expressly says that he is not acting for the principal, the third party can avoid the contract for fraud.<sup>66</sup> If he makes no such misrepresentation, the law is less clear.

In Nash v Dix<sup>67</sup> a committee of Roman Catholics wanted to buy a Congregational chapel from the defendants and to turn it into a place of Roman Catholic worship. The defendants refused to deal with the committee as they disapproved of the proposed user. The committee then told the claimant that if he could buy the chapel from the defendants they would buy it from him for £100 more than he had paid for it. The defendants sold the chapel to the claimant but repudiated the contract on discovering that he intended to resell to the committee. North J. held that the defendants were bound (1) because the claimant was not an agent, but simply a person who had bought for resale; and (2) because the claimant had not been guilty of any misrepresentation. It appears from the judgment that the claimant would have failed if he had been the agent of the committee.

In Said v Butti<sup>68</sup> the claimant wanted to go to the first night of a play, but knew that the proprietors of the theatre would not sell him a ticket as he had in the past strongly criticised their conduct. He therefore sent a friend to the box-office to buy a ticket for him without disclosing his name, but he was later refused admission by the manager of the theatre. In an action against the manager for inducing a breach of contract, McCardie J. held that there was no contract between the proprietors and the claimant: since the proprietors reserved the right to sell first-night tickets to specially selected persons, the "personality" of the other contracting party was a material element in the contract.

Both these cases were distinguished in Dyster v Randall & Sons.<sup>69</sup> The claimant wanted to buy land from the defendants, who, to his knowledge, would not deal with him as they distrusted him. He employed an agent to buy the land in the agent's own name, and then claimed that he was entitled to intervene as undisclosed principal. Lawrence J.

<sup>61</sup> Greer v Downs Supply Co [1927] 2 K.B. 28; quære whether this decision was necessary for the protection of the third party since an undisclosed principal can intervene only subject to the third party's right of set-off against the agent: below, p.730.

<sup>62</sup> Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 210.

<sup>63</sup> ibid. The claim was by employees of the principal under the equivalent of the Third Parties (Rights Against Insurers) Act 1930, above, p.668.

<sup>64</sup> cf. above, p.694 for restrictions on the assignment of such policies on this ground.

<sup>65</sup> [1984] 2 A.C. 199 at 208.

<sup>66</sup> Archer v Stone (1898) 78 L.T. 34; cf. Berg v Sadler & Moore [1937] 2 K.B. 158; above, pp.373-374.

<sup>67</sup> (1898) 78 L.T. 445.

<sup>68</sup> [1920] 3 K.B. 497.

<sup>69</sup> [1926] Ch. 932; cf. Smith v Wheatcroft (1878) 9 Ch.D. 223; for a discussion of these cases, see Williams, 23 Can.Bar Rev. 397.

upheld the claim: he said that it would be futile to deny the claimant's right to sue since the agent could have assigned the benefit of the contract to him. But this reasoning does not satisfactorily distinguish Said v Butt: theatre tickets can (unless they expressly provide the contrary)<sup>70</sup> be assigned no less than contracts to buy land. Again it was said that "personal" consideration entered into the two earlier cases but not into Dyster v Randall & Sons. While this may distinguish Said v Butt, it does not satisfactorily explain why the action in Nash v Dix would have failed if the claimant had been an agent; for it is hard to see why an objection based on religious grounds is more "personal" than one based on distrust.

It is submitted that an undisclosed principal should not be allowed to intervene if he knows that the third party does not want to deal with him. If the principal directly concealed his identity, the contract would be void for mistake, or voidable for fraud; and the principal should not be able to improve his position by simply employing an agent. The position is the same where the agent knows, or should know, that the third party wanted to contract only with him.<sup>71</sup>

(iii) Other safeguards. The rights of the undisclosed principal against the third party are subject to any defences which the third party has against the agent.<sup>72</sup> This rule is necessary for the protection of the third party, who thinks that he is dealing with the agent alone. Thus if the agent owes money to the third party, the debt can be set off by the third party against the principal, and if the third party pays the agent he can rely on the payment against the principal.<sup>73</sup> This rule is based on the third party's belief that he is dealing with the agent alone: it therefore does not apply where the third party has no such belief. In Cooke v Eshelby<sup>74</sup> the third party had no belief one way or the other whether the person with whom he was dealing was principal or agent. He was in fact an agent. The third party was not allowed to set off against the principal a debt which the agent owed to the third party.

The principal may intend the agent to disclose his existence, but the agent may fail to do so because he wants to misappropriate the proceeds of the contract, or to induce the third party to accept the principal's property in discharge of a debt which the agent owes to the third party. In such cases the third party can only rely on his settlement with, or set-off against, the agent, in an action brought by the principal, if the latter has so conducted himself as to enable the agent to appear as principal in the transaction.<sup>75</sup>

(c) NON-EXISTENT PRINCIPAL. At common law, a principal cannot become a party to a contract made on his or its behalf before the principal came into existence. This is, for example, the position where a contract purports to be made on behalf of a corporation before its incorporation: such a contract is a nullity because one party to it does not exist.<sup>76</sup> The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, however, makes it possible so to draw up the contract as to make the corporation a third party beneficiary; it will then, in the circumstances specified in the Act,<sup>77</sup> be entitled to enforce the relevant terms of the contract.<sup>78</sup> The Act expressly provides that, for this purpose, the third party "need

<sup>70</sup> The report of Said v Butt does not state whether the ticket contained a condition prohibiting its assignment or transfer.

<sup>71</sup> Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 207.

<sup>72</sup> Bromberg v Provincial Insurance Co of Canada (1873) L.R. 5 P.C. 263 at 272.

<sup>73</sup> George v Clagett (1797) 7 T.R. 359; Rabone v Williams, ibid. p.360n.; Mann v Forrester (1814) 4 Camp. 60; Montague v Formood [1893] 2 Q.B. 350, Derham [1986] C.L.J. 384.

<sup>74</sup> (1887) 12 App.Cas. 271; Reynolds [1983] C.L.P. 119.

<sup>75</sup> Drakeford v Piercey (1866) 14 L.T. 403.

<sup>76</sup> See below, p.680, n.17.

<sup>77</sup> See especially ss.1(1) and (2), above, pp.651–653.

<sup>78</sup> s.1(1).

not be in existence when the contract is entered into.”<sup>79</sup> Statutory provisions which deal with the contractual relations between the agent and the third party under pre-incorporation contracts are discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>80</sup>

(2) Liability of principal to third party

The general rule is that a principal, whether disclosed or undisclosed, is liable to the third party.<sup>81</sup> The limitations on the right of an undisclosed principal to intervene exist mainly for the protection of the third party. Hence they do not necessarily apply where the third party sues the principal. But a person who is alleged to have contracted on behalf of another may, on the true construction of the contract, have contracted solely on his own behalf. In that case he alone is liable on the contract<sup>82</sup>; the reason why the other is not liable is not that he is an undisclosed principal whose liability is excluded, but that he is not a principal in the transaction at all.

The principal cannot set off against the third party any money owed to the principal by the agent.<sup>83</sup> If the principal gives the agent the money with which to pay the third party, but the agent fails to pay it over, the principal remains liable to the third party: he must seek out his creditor and see that he is paid.<sup>84</sup> The principal is discharged by payment to the agent only if such payment is made at the third party's request,<sup>85</sup> or if the third party looked to the agent for payment and so induced the principal to settle with the agent.<sup>86</sup>

In Heald v Kenworthy<sup>87</sup> it was assumed that an undisclosed principal is not (any more than one who is disclosed) discharged by settling with his agent. But in Armstrong v Stokes<sup>88</sup> the court said that this rule produced “intolerable hardship”,<sup>89</sup> and refused to follow it. Thus it was held that an undisclosed principal who settled with his agent was not liable to make a second payment to the third party if the agent failed to pay over the money. Of course, it is hard for the principal to have to pay twice over; but it is equally hard for the third party not to be paid at all. It could be argued that the law should, in this situation, have no sympathy for the third party since he did not rely on the credit of a principal of whose existence he was unaware at the time of contracting. But this proves too much: whenever an undisclosed principal is sued the third party gets a windfall of this kind. Thus the case for applying a special rule to undisclosed principals in this context is weak. Armstrong v Stokes was doubted by the Court of Appeal in Irvine v Watson<sup>90</sup>; and it is submitted that an undisclosed principal who settles with his agent should remain liable to the third party.

At common law, a contract purporting to be made with a non-existent principal, e.g. with a corporation before its incorporation, is a nullity<sup>91</sup> and so cannot impose liabilities, any more than it can confer rights, on the corporation. This position is not directly affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999; for although a third party

<sup>79</sup> s.1(3).

<sup>80</sup> See below, p.736.

<sup>81</sup> See Boyer v Thomson [1995] 2 A.C. 629 at 632.

<sup>82</sup> JH Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v DTI [1989] Ch. 72 at 190–191, approved on this point [1990] 2 A.C. 418 at 515.

<sup>83</sup> Waring v Favenck (1807) 2 Camp. 85.

<sup>84</sup> Irvine v Watson (1880) 5 Q.B.D. 414.

<sup>85</sup> Smyth v Anderson (1849) 7 C.B. 21.

<sup>86</sup> See Wyatt v Hertford (1802) 3 East 147.

<sup>87</sup> (1855) 10 Ex. 739; Reynolds (1983) C.L.P. 119.

<sup>88</sup> (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 598.

<sup>89</sup> ibid. at 610.

<sup>90</sup> See above, n.84.

<sup>91</sup> See below, p.736 at n.38.

can by virtue of this Act acquire rights under a contract, the Act does not impose any liabilities on the third party.<sup>92</sup> However, the third party's right to enforce the term conferring a benefit on that party is "subject to . . . any other terms of the contract".<sup>93</sup> Thus it is possible to draw up a pre-incorporation contract so as to make the corporation's right of enforcement (once it has come into existence) subject to its discharging liabilities undertaken by its agents on its behalf. Even if this is not done, the corporation's right of enforcement is under the Act subject to defences available against the promisee (i.e., in the present context, the agent).<sup>94</sup> The result is that the corporation cannot enforce rights under the contract unless it discharges the relevant liabilities. But if it chooses not to enforce the rights, then the liabilities cannot be enforced against it merely because it is named as a third party beneficiary in the contract. By statute, this problem is now in part resolved in the case of an agreement made before the incorporation of a limited liability partnership between the persons who subscribe their names to the incorporation document.<sup>95</sup> Such an agreement "may impose obligations"<sup>96</sup> on the partnership to take effect after its incorporation. But even this provision does not extend to agreements made with other persons before the incorporation of the partnership and purporting to impose liabilities on it.<sup>97</sup>

Our concern in the preceding discussion has been with the liabilities of the non-existent principal in the case of pre-incorporation contracts. The rights of such a principal against the third party are discussed earlier,<sup>98</sup> and the contractual relations between the agent and the third party are discussed later,<sup>99</sup> in this Chapter.

2. Between Agent and Third Party

Agent and third party may incur reciprocal rights and liabilities either under the contract which the agent makes on behalf of his principal, or under a collateral contract. The agent may also be liable for breach of implied warranty of authority and for other misrepresentation.

(1) Under the contract

(a) GENERAL RULE. The general rule is that an agent is neither liable under,<sup>1</sup> nor entitled to enforce,<sup>2</sup> a contract he makes on behalf of his principal.

(b) EXCEPTIONS. An agent may enter into a contract on his own behalf as well as on behalf of the principal and so be liable or entitled under the contract. This possibility is illustrated by the following cases.

(i) Agent contracting personally. An agent is liable under the contract if he intended to undertake personal liability. Where the contract is in writing, the question whether he

<sup>92</sup> See above, p.581.

<sup>93</sup> Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, s.1(4).

<sup>94</sup> ibid., s.3(2); cf. above, p.643, n.3.

<sup>95</sup> For the status of such a partnership as a body corporate, see Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.1(2).

<sup>96</sup> ibid., s.5(2).

<sup>97</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.36C (above, p.724, below, p.734) applies (with appropriate modifications) to limited liability partnerships by virtue of Limited Liability Partnership Regulations 2001, SI 2001/1090, reg.4(1) and Sch.2, Pt 1, but does not impose liabilities on the principal.

<sup>98</sup> See above, p.729.

<sup>99</sup> See below, p.734.

<sup>1</sup> Robins v Bridge (1837) 3 M. & W. 114; Ferguson v Wilson (1866) L.R. 2 Ch.App. 77; N. & J. Vlassopoulos v Ney Shipping Ltd [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 478; Boyer v Thomson [1995] 2 A.C. 629 at 632.

<sup>2</sup> Lucas v Beale (1851) 10 C.B. 739; Fairlie v Fenton (1870) L.R. 5 Ex. 169.

had this intention is one of construction.<sup>3</sup> An agent who is described in a written contract as a party to it and signs it without qualification is liable under it although the third party knew that he was acting as agent.<sup>4</sup> He may be liable even though such a contract also provides that it is signed on behalf of a third person, for such a provision may merely be intended to mean that that person is to be a party to the contract and not that the agent is to be absolved from liability under it.<sup>5</sup> At the other extreme, an agent who is described as agent in the contract and signs as agent is not liable.<sup>6</sup> But an agent may be described as agent in the body of the contract and sign without qualification; or he may be described as a party in the body of the contract and sign as agent.<sup>7</sup> A distinction has been drawn in such cases between words which merely describe the agent's profession, and words of representation, which show that he is acting as agent. The former do not, while the latter do, exonerate him from liability. Thus the words "we, as solicitors, undertake . . ." were held in Burrell v Jones<sup>8</sup> to be merely descriptive; and even the words "as agent" when used in their commercial, rather than their legal, sense have been held to be descriptive.<sup>9</sup> The words "on behalf of" or "per procuracionem" are generally representative. But no particular formula is conclusive; and where the description is equivocal the court will rely on other relevant circumstances in order to determine, on an objective standard, whether an undertaking of personal liability may be inferred. Thus in one case<sup>10</sup> a company director ordered repairs to be done to a boat which the company had hired from him. He gave the order on the company's notepaper and signed it with the addition "Director." He was, nevertheless, held personally liable as he was the owner of the boat. But for this fact it seems that he would not have been personally liable.<sup>11</sup> An agent is no longer personally liable merely because he acts on behalf of a foreign principal.<sup>12</sup>

Just as the agent may on the true construction of the contract, be liable, so he may be entitled.<sup>13</sup> The courts will, if possible, hold that "the existence of the liability on the one hand involves the existence of the correlative right on the other"<sup>14</sup>; but words which indicate that the agent is not to be liable are not necessarily construed to mean that he is not to be entitled. Thus where an agent had contracted "on account of" his principal,

<sup>3</sup> Punjab National Bank v de Boinville [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1138 at 1155; cf. Ignazio Messina & Co v Polskie Linie Oceaniczne [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 566 at 571.

<sup>4</sup> Basma v Weekes [1950] A.C. 441; cf. Davies v Sweet [1962] 2 Q.B. 300; Sika Contracts v Gill (1978) 9 Build.L.R. 11; Kai Yung v Hong Kong & Shanghai Banking Corp [1981] A.C. 787 at 795.

<sup>5</sup> The Sun Happiness [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 381.

<sup>6</sup> Mahony v Kekulé (1854) 14 C.B. 390; The Rialto (No.2) [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 322 at 328.

<sup>7</sup> As in Gadd v Houghton (1876) 1 Ex.D. 357; Universal Steam Navigation Co Ltd v James McKelvie & Co [1923] A.C. 492 (in these cases the agents were held not liable); The Maria D [1992] 1 A.C. 21.

<sup>8</sup> (1819) 3 B. & Ald. 47.

<sup>9</sup> Parker v Winlow (1857) 7 E. & B. 942; cf. above, pp.706–708.

<sup>10</sup> The Swan [1968] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 5; Reynolds, 85 L.Q.R. 92; Legh-Jones, 32 M.L.R. 325; cf. Tudor Marine Ltd v Tradax Export SA [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 135; The Primorje [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 74; Ojeh v Waller [1999] C.L.Y. 4405; contrast Astilleros Canarios SA v Cape Hatteras Shipping Co SA [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 518.

<sup>11</sup> cf. The Riza Sun [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 314.

<sup>12</sup> Miller, Gibb & Co v Smith & Tyrer Ltd [1917] 2 K.B. 141; J S Holt & Moseley (London) Ltd v Sir Charles Cunningham & Partners Ltd (1949) 83 Ll.L.R. 141 at 145; Hudson, 23 M.L.R. 695; 29 M.L.R. 353; 35 Can.Bar Rev. 336.

<sup>13</sup> Short v Spackman (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 962; Clay v Southern (1852) 7 Ex. 717; H O Brandt & Co v H N Morris & Co Ltd [1917] 2 K.B. 784; cf. The Yanxilas [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 444; Fraser v Thames Television [1984] Q.B. 44; Transcontinental Underwriting Agency SRL v Grand Union Ins Co Ltd [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 409.

<sup>14</sup> Repetto v Millar's Karri & Jarrah Forests Ltd [1901] 2 K.B. 306 at 310.

it was held that the agent was not personally liable on the contract<sup>15</sup>; but where a policy of insurance described the assured as a bank "a/c [a named customer]" it was held to confer rights on the bank (the agent), the reference to the customer being merely intended to remind the bank which of its customers was concerned with the transaction in question.<sup>16</sup> It follows that the agent can be entitled without being liable or liable without being entitled, if that is the true meaning of the contract. In the first of these situations, there may indeed be some difficulty in seeing what consideration has been provided by the agent so long as the contract remains wholly executory, but there would be no such difficulty where the agent has actually performed, e.g. by making a payment under the contract on behalf of the principal. In the second situation there is no similar difficulty even if the contract is still executory; the third party provides consideration for the agent's promise by undertaking liability towards the principal and it is immaterial that the consideration does not move to the agent: consideration must move from the promisee (the third party) but need not move to the promisor (the agent).<sup>17</sup>

(ii) Trade usage or custom. An agent may be personally liable or entitled if that is the usual course of business either between particular parties or in relation to a particular class of agents. For example, "where one attorney does work for another, it is common practice for him to give credit to that other and not to the client".<sup>18</sup> A local or trade custom can have the same effect.<sup>19</sup>

(iii) Principal undisclosed. Where the principal is undisclosed the agent is both entitled and liable<sup>20</sup>; but this rule does not apply where the agent uses words of representation and the principal is only unnamed.<sup>21</sup> The agent's failure to name the principal may make it easy to infer that he intended to contract personally; but there is no general rule to that effect.<sup>22</sup>

(iv) Agent in fact principal. An agent may purport to act on behalf of a principal when he is in fact acting on his own behalf. If he purports to act for an unnamed principal, he can enforce the contract for his own benefit.<sup>23</sup> But if he purports to act for a named principal, he can enforce the contract only after giving due notice to the third party that he acted on his own behalf.<sup>24</sup> Even then the agent will not be allowed to enforce the contract if this would prejudice the third party.<sup>25</sup> These safeguards are necessary as the third party may have relied on the principal's solvency or other attributes when he made the contract. It follows that the agent cannot enforce the contract if he knew that, for some "personal" reason, the third party was unwilling to contract with him either at all,

<sup>15</sup> Gadd v Houghton (1876) 1 Ex. D. 357.

<sup>16</sup> Punjab National Bank v de Boinville [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1138.

<sup>17</sup> See above, p.81.

<sup>18</sup> Scrace v Whittington (1823) 2 B. & C. 11. The above dictum makes the agent exclusively liable: cf. below, p.737.

<sup>19</sup> Fleet v Murton (1871) L.R. 7 Q.B. 126; cf. Cory Brothers Shipping Ltd v Baldan Ltd [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 58 (forwarding agent acting for unnamed principal liable, by custom, for freight).

<sup>20</sup> Sims v Bond (1833) 5 B. & Ad. 389 at 393; Siu Yin Kwan v Eastern Insurance Co Ltd [1994] 2 A.C. 199 at 207; Boyter v Thomson [1995] 2 A.C. 629 at 632.

<sup>21</sup> e.g. Universal Steam Navigation Co v James McKelvie & Co [1923] A.C. 492; Benton v Campbell, Parker & Co Ltd [1925] 2 K.B. 410.

<sup>22</sup> N & J Vlassopoulos v Ney Shipping Ltd [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 478.

<sup>23</sup> Schmaltz v Avery (1851) 16 Q.B. 655; Harper & Co v Vigers Bros [1909] 2 K.B. 549. See Bowstead and Reynolds on Agency (17th ed.), pp.517–518 for the suggestion that this rule should only be applied where it was not inconsistent with the terms of the contract to allow the agent to sue.

<sup>24</sup> Bickerton v Burrell (1816) 5 M. & S. 383; aliter if the other party knows that the "agent" is the real principal: Rayner v Grote (1846) 15 M. & W. 359.

<sup>25</sup> See Fellows v Gwydyr (1829) 1 Russ. & M. 83.

or on the same terms as those on which he was willing to contract with the principal.<sup>26</sup> If the claimant in Said v Butt<sup>27</sup> had gone in person to buy a ticket, pretending that it was not for him but for a friend, he could not later have said that his friend was in fact himself.

The present exception to the general rule, that an agent acquires no rights under the contract, is based on the assumptions that he has (i) purported to contract as agent and (ii) in fact contracted as principal. The exception therefore did not apply where a father conducted negotiations for the purchase of a house and the resulting contract was drawn up in the name of his son (who was a minor). It was held that the father could not enforce the contract since the contract did not say that he had entered into it on behalf of the son, or indeed mention the father's name at all.<sup>28</sup>

(v) Principal non-existent. Where the alleged principal does not exist, it may be easy to infer that the agent intended to assume personal liability. At common law this inference was drawn in Kelner v Baxter<sup>29</sup> with the result that promoters were held personally liable on a contract made by them on behalf of a company which had not yet been formed. But such an inference is not necessarily drawn merely because the agent purports to act for a non-existent principal<sup>30</sup>: the question is one of intention in each case.<sup>31</sup> The agent was accordingly held not liable where the contract was with a non-existent company which was believed to form part of a group of companies, the third party's intention being merely to contract with a company within that group, and one such company having accepted responsibility under the contract.<sup>32</sup> Similarly, it is arguable that the agent should not be personally liable where, under the rules discussed earlier in this Chapter,<sup>33</sup> the principal can be held liable under the contract in spite of not having been in existence when the contract was made.

S.36C(1) of the Companies Act 1985<sup>34</sup> provides that "a contract which purports to be made . . . on behalf of a company<sup>35</sup> at a time when the company has not been formed has effect, subject to any agreement to the contrary, as one made with the person purporting to act . . . as agent for" the company. Under this subsection, the agent can no longer escape liability merely on the ground that he entered into the contract "as agent"<sup>36</sup>; it is up to him to establish that there was an "agreement to the contrary" exonerating him from liability. The subsection puzzlingly concludes with the words "and he [i.e. the agent, in our examples] is personally liable on the contract accordingly". It seems these

<sup>26</sup> The Remco [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 205.

<sup>27</sup> [1920] 3 K.B. 497; above, p.729.

<sup>28</sup> Hector v Lyons (1989) 58 P. & C.R. 156. No such point arose in Shogun Finance Ltd v Hudson [2001] EWCA Civ 1000; [2002] Q.B. 834 (above, p.299) where any attempt by the rogue to enforce the contract would have failed by reason of his fraud.

<sup>29</sup> (1886) L.R. 2 C.P. 174; above, p.696; cf. Phonogram Ltd v Lane [1982] Q.B. 938; Green, 47 M.I.L.R. 671.

<sup>30</sup> Holman v Pullin (1884) Cab. & El. 254.

<sup>31</sup> Black v Smallwood [1966] A.L.R. 744; Baxt, 30 M.I.L.R. 328; Lücke, 3 Adelaide L.Rev. 102.

<sup>32</sup> Coral (UK) Ltd v Rechtman [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 235.

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.732 at n.96.

<sup>34</sup> As substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.130(4) for the former s.36(4) of Companies Act 1985, which had in its turn replaced European Communities Act 1972, s.9(2). The effect of s.36C(1) seems to be the same as that of the earlier provisions, in spite of slight changes in the wording.

<sup>35</sup> i.e. one incorporated in the United Kingdom: Rover International Ltd v Cannon Film Sales Ltd (No.3) (1987) 3 B.C.C. 369, reversed in part on other grounds [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912. The section applies to limited liability partnerships: see above, p.735, n.97.

<sup>36</sup> Phonogram Ltd v Lane [1982] Q.B. 938 at 944; McMullen [1982] C.I.J. 47. And see above, n.34. Contrast Badgerhill Properties v Cottrell [1991] B.C.L.C. 805 (agent not liable merely because existing company's name was incorrectly stated in the contract).

words merely spell out one consequence of the previous words and do not limit their operation: i.e. the agent may be entitled as well as liable.

At common law, a distinction was drawn between the cases so far considered where the agent purported to act on behalf of the unformed company, and those in which he said that the contract actually was that of the company<sup>37</sup> and purported to affix the company's signature. In the latter case it was held that the resulting transaction was a complete nullity,<sup>38</sup> and that the agent could not acquire any rights under it.<sup>39</sup> But the distinction between the two situations was criticised as highly technical<sup>40</sup> and one which businessmen were unlikely to appreciate. The provisions of s.36C(1) of the Companies Act 1985<sup>41</sup> therefore extend also to "a contract which purports to be made by a company" before it is formed. Such a contract has effect (subject to contrary agreement) "as one made with the person purporting to act for the company"; e.g. by the officer purporting to affix the company's signature. The concluding words of the subsection again refer only to the liability of such a person, but it has been held that he is also entitled to enforce the contract, subject only to restrictions which may be imposed on his right to do so at common law<sup>42</sup>: e.g., on the ground that, for "personal" reasons of the kind described above, the third party was willing to contract only with the company, or unwilling to contract with the person purporting to act on its behalf.<sup>43</sup> But the subsection does not apply where the contract purports to have been made by a company which had once existed and later been dissolved before the time of the putative contract. That contract is then a nullity and cannot be enforced either by the person purporting to have acted for the company or by a new company formed after the date of contracting to carry on the business of former company. The reason why such a case is not within s.36C(1) is that the agent purported to act for the old company rather than on behalf of the new company before it was formed.<sup>44</sup>

Our concern here has been with the rights and liabilities of the agent under pre-incorporation contracts; the rights and liabilities of the principal in such cases have been discussed earlier in this Chapter.<sup>45</sup>

(vi) Deeds. At common law, an agent who executed a deed was personally liable on it even though the deed said that he had executed it on behalf of his principal.<sup>46</sup> It seems, however, that this rule has been reversed by statute.<sup>47</sup>

(vii) Statute. An agent may be personally liable by statute: for example, an administrative receiver appointed by debenture holders, who is deemed to be the agent of the company,<sup>48</sup> is nevertheless personally liable on a contract into which he enters in

<sup>37</sup> For the concept of an act done by the company itself, see Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 2 A.C. 500 at 506–507.

<sup>38</sup> cf. Rover International Ltd v Cannon Film Sales Ltd (No.3) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912—a position described in earlier proceedings in the same case as "a blot on English jurisprudence": [1987] 1 W.L.R. 670 at 679.

<sup>39</sup> Newborne v Sensolid (Great Britain) Ltd [1954] 1 Q.B. 45.

<sup>40</sup> The defendants in Newborne's case escaped from a bad bargain on a technicality: see the comments of Lord Goddard C.J. reported in The Times, March 20, 1953. cf. Lord Denning M.R. in Phonogram Ltd v Lane [1982] Q.B. 938 at 944.

<sup>41</sup> See above, n.34.

<sup>42</sup> Braymist Ltd v Wise Finance Co Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 127; [2002] Ch. 273.

<sup>43</sup> ibid., at [63], [83]. The Braymist case was not of this kind.

<sup>44</sup> Cotronic (UK) Ltd v Dezonie (t/a Wendaland Builders Ltd) [1991] B.C.L.C. 721.

<sup>45</sup> See above, pp.730, 731–732.

<sup>46</sup> Appleton v Binks (1804) 5 East 148.

<sup>47</sup> Powers of Attorney Act 1971, s.7(1), as amended by Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, ss.1(8) and 4 and Schs 1 and 2.

<sup>48</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.44(1)(a).

carrying out his functions, except in so far as the contract or legislation otherwise provides.<sup>49</sup>

(c) ELECTION.<sup>50</sup> Where an agent is liable on the contract, one possible interpretation of the transaction is that he is solely liable, or, in other words, that the contract is simply between him and the third party and not between the third party and the principal at all.<sup>51</sup> Another possibility is that the agent and the principal are both liable under the contract.<sup>52</sup> This is certainly the position where the principal is undisclosed<sup>53</sup> and it may also be true where an agent incurs personal responsibility under a contract made on behalf of a disclosed principal.<sup>54</sup>

Where both principal and agent are liable on the contract, the third party may lose his right to sue one of them on the ground that he has “elected” to hold the other liable. This doctrine is most commonly discussed in relation to cases involving undisclosed principals, though there is some authority for applying it in all cases in which both principal and agent are liable on the contract.<sup>55</sup> The reasons for the doctrine are obscure: it is hard to see why a principal should be released merely because the third party has “elected” to hold the agent liable. It might be more satisfactory to hold that the principal should be released only if he had relied on the third party’s conduct in such a way that he would be prejudiced by being subsequently held liable: for example, if the principal had adjusted his accounts with the agent in reliance on the third party’s conduct.<sup>56</sup> Election to hold the principal liable may similarly be a ground for releasing the agent if it has led to action in reliance by the agent: for example, to his giving up rights against the principal. Where there has been no action in reliance on the third party’s conduct, the courts do not often apply the doctrine of election. What amounts to election is a question of fact; and in the decided cases the courts have been somewhat reluctant to find an election. Merely sending a bill to one of two parties liable has been held not to be an election<sup>57</sup>; and even the commencement of legal proceedings, though strong evidence of election,<sup>58</sup> is not necessarily conclusive.<sup>59</sup>

There was formerly a rule that, if the liability of principal and agent was joint, and the third party obtained judgment against one of them, he could not then sue the other, even though the judgment was not satisfied.<sup>60</sup> This rule has been abolished by statute,<sup>61</sup> so that the mere obtaining of a judgment against principal or agent will not bar proceedings against the other; though it might, presumably, still amount to an “election”.

<sup>49</sup> ibid. s.44(1)(b) as amended by Insolvency Act 1994, s.2; cf. Pondrill v Watson [1995] 2 A.C. 394 (personal liability on “adopted” contracts of employment); for his right of indemnity, see 1986 Act s.45.

<sup>50</sup> Reynolds, 86 L.Q.R. 318.

<sup>51</sup> e.g. above, p.734 at n.18, below, n.55.

<sup>52</sup> See Reynolds, 85 L.Q.R. 92.

<sup>53</sup> See above, pp.727, 734.

<sup>54</sup> See The Sman [1968] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 5 at 12; Teheran-Europe Co v S T Belton (Tractors) Ltd [1968] 2 Q.B. 545 at 558; The Kurnia Dewi [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 553 at 559.

<sup>55</sup> Debenham v Perkins (1925) 113 L.T. 252 at 254. Other cases which have been cited to support the doctrine of election where the principal was disclosed may turn rather on the point that he was never liable under the contract at all because it was made solely with the agent: e.g. Addison v Gandasequi (1812) 4 Taunt. 574; Thomson v Davenport (1829) 9 B. & C. 78; Calder v Dobell (1871) L.R. 6 C.P. 486.

<sup>56</sup> Smethurst v Mitchell (1859) 1 E. & E. 622; Davison v Donaldson (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 623.

<sup>57</sup> Chesterton v Barone [1987] 1 E.G.L.R. 15.

<sup>58</sup> See Scarf v Jardine (1882) 7 App.Cas. 345.

<sup>59</sup> Curtis v Williamson (1874) L.R. 10 Q.B. 57; Clarkson Booker Ltd v Andjel [1964] 2 Q.B. 775; cf. The Scaplake [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 380.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.569.

<sup>61</sup> Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s.3.

(2) Under a collateral contract

There may be a collateral contract between agent and third party, quite distinct from the main contract between principal and third party. Thus when goods are sold by auction, the auctioneer undertakes certain obligations towards the buyer,<sup>62</sup> but they are not co-extensive with those of the seller. The seller undertakes that he has the right to sell, but the auctioneer only undertakes to give the buyer possession<sup>63</sup> so that he is not liable for the seller's lack of title.<sup>64</sup> The collateral contract may confer rights, as well as impose liabilities, on the agent. Thus an auctioneer can sue the buyer for the price of the goods sold.<sup>65</sup> The liability of an auctioneer who refuses to knock goods down to the highest bidder at an auction sale without reserve<sup>66</sup> has also been explained on the ground of a "collateral agreement existing between the auctioneer and the bidder."<sup>67</sup>

(3) Implied warranty of authority

(a) NATURE OF LIABILITY. An agent who purports to act for a principal, knowing that he has no authority to do so, is liable to the third party in deceit, even if he believed that the principal would ratify.<sup>68</sup> It was at one time thought that if the agent honestly believed that he had authority when in fact he had none, he was under no liability.<sup>69</sup> But it was settled in Collen v Wright<sup>70</sup> that the agent was in such circumstances liable for breach of an implied warranty that he had the authority which he purported to have. It makes no difference that the agent has acted in good faith and with due diligence.<sup>71</sup>

The rule sometimes operates harshly on the agent, and it might be more reasonable to imply a warranty that the agent should not negligently exceed his authority.<sup>72</sup> The agent's position has been alleviated by legislation, so that an agent who acts under a power of attorney incurs no liability if the power of attorney has without his knowledge been revoked.<sup>73</sup>

The agent does not impliedly<sup>74</sup> warrant that the contract which he makes between principal and third party will be performed, but only that he has authority to make it.<sup>75</sup> This has an important bearing on damages. If the third party could have obtained full satisfaction from the principal, had the contract been binding on him, the agent is liable to the same extent.<sup>75a</sup> But if the principal is insolvent, the third party cannot recover more from the agent than he would have got from the principal, had the agent had

<sup>62</sup> Woollé v Horne (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 355.

<sup>63</sup> Wood v Baxter (1883) 49 L.T. 45.

<sup>64</sup> Benton v Campbell, Parker & Co [1925] 2 K.B. 410.

<sup>65</sup> Coppin v Walker (1816) 7 Taunt. 237; cf. Wilson v Pike [1949] 1 K.B. 176; Chelmsford Auctions Ltd v Poole [1973] Q.B. 542.

<sup>66</sup> See above, pp.11, 142.

<sup>67</sup> Barry v Davies [2000] 1 W.L.R. 1962 at 1968 ([2001] 1 All E.R. at 950).

<sup>68</sup> Polhill v Walter (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 114.

<sup>69</sup> This was one basis of Smout v Ilbery (1842) 10 M. & W. 1; see also below, p.739. The view that fault is essential was still stated (wrongly) in Salton v New Beeston Cycle Co [1900] 1 Ch. 43.

<sup>70</sup> (1857) 8 E. & B. 647; approved by the House of Lords in Starkey v Bank of England [1903] A.C. 114 and followed in V/O Rasnoimport v Guthrie & Co Ltd [1966] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1; Reynolds, 83 L.Q.R. 189.

<sup>71</sup> Yonge v Toynbee [1910] 1 K.B. 215; see below, pp.750–751, for survival of apparent authority in cases of the principal's insanity.

<sup>72</sup> Negligence may lead to liability in damages at common law or under the Misrepresentation Act 1967; but the measure of such damages could differ from that for breach of implied warranty of authority: cf. above, p.359.

<sup>73</sup> Powers of Attorney Act 1971, s.5(1).

<sup>74</sup> He may expressly do so as (for example) in The Maria D [1992] 1 A.C. 21.

<sup>75</sup> cf. Nelson v Nelson [1997] 1 W.L.R. 233.

<sup>75a</sup> cf. Hahton Farms v Nimms [2003] E.W.C.A. Civ 68, [2003] 1 All E.R. 1136.

authority; and this may be very little, or nothing, according to the degree of the principal's insolvency.<sup>76</sup>

Normally, the effect of the warranty is to induce the third party to enter into a contract with the principal or supposed principal. But liability may also be incurred if the third party acts in reliance on the warranty in some other way: e.g. where the agent falsely represents to a building society that he is authorised to act for a vendor of property and the society in consequence makes a loan to the purchaser.<sup>77</sup>

(b) RESTRICTIONS ON LIABILITY. An agent is not, or may not be, liable for breach of implied warranty of authority in the following cases:

(i) Want of authority known to third party. The agent is not liable where the third party knew, or must be taken to have known, that the agent had no authority.<sup>78</sup> The agent may also not be liable where he and the third party had equal means of knowing that the agent had no authority; though the claim in the case<sup>79</sup> which supports this view was actually one for goods sold and delivered, i.e. on the main contract of sale. Thus the case may not be authoritative on an agent's liability for breach of implied warranty.<sup>80</sup>

(ii) Representation of law. The traditional view (which may be open for reconsideration<sup>81</sup>) is that the agent is not liable where the representation is one of law.<sup>82</sup> Accordingly, it has been held that, since the construction of a document is a matter of law, an agent who misrepresents its meaning is not liable for breach of implied warranty. Thus if the director of a statutory corporation<sup>83</sup> which has, on the true construction of its incorporating statute, no borrowing powers, purports to borrow on its behalf, he is not liable for breach of implied warranty.<sup>84</sup> But if such a corporation has a limited power to borrow up to, say, £10m., and the director purports to borrow on its behalf above that limit, he is liable for breach of implied warranty, for he has misrepresented a fact: namely, that the company has not yet borrowed £10m.<sup>85</sup> If a loan is made to a company incorporated under the Companies Acts by a lender dealing with the company in good faith, the contract of loan will normally be enforceable against the company even though the directors had, under the company's constitution, no power to enter into the contract.<sup>86</sup> The lender's claim for breach of warranty against the directors will therefore fail on the principle stated in the following paragraph. If the lender had no claim against the company because he had acted in bad faith, he would know that the loan was unauthorised. His claim for breach of warranty of authority would fail on the ground that he knew of the agent's want of authority.<sup>87</sup>

(iii) Principal liable on main contract. An agent who has no actual authority is probably not liable for breach of implied warranty if the principal is liable to the third party on the ground of apparent or usual authority. In Rainbow v Homkins<sup>88</sup> an auctioneer who

<sup>76</sup> See below, p.975.

<sup>77</sup> Penn v Bristol & West BS [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1356.

<sup>78</sup> Jones v Hope (1880) 3 T.L.R. 247n.; Lilly, Wilson & Co v Smales, Eccles & Co [1892] 1 Q.B. 456; Halbot v Lens [1901] 1 Ch. 344.

<sup>79</sup> Smout v Ilberry (1842) 10 M. & W. 1.

<sup>80</sup> See Oliver v Bank of England [1901] 1 Ch. 652 at 660.

<sup>81</sup> See the discussion of Kleinmort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC [1999] 2 A.C. 349, at p.333, above.

<sup>82</sup> Saffron Walden, etc. BS v Rayner (1880) 14 Ch.D. 406.

<sup>83</sup> Such corporations remain subject to the ultra vires doctrine: above, p.563.

<sup>84</sup> Rushdall v Ford (1866) L.R. 2 Eq. 750.

<sup>85</sup> Cherry v Colonial Bank of Australasia (1869) L.R. 3 P.C. 24; Weeks v Propert (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 427.

<sup>86</sup> Companies Act 1985, s.35A(1), as substituted by Companies Act 1989, s.108(1); above, p.562 (also stating exceptions to these provisions).

<sup>87</sup> See above, at n.78.

<sup>88</sup> [1904] 2 K.B. 322; criticised in McManus v Fortescue [1907] 2 K.B. 1 at 6, but that case can be explained on the ground that the third party knew of the agent's want of authority.

had authority to sell a horse, subject to a reserve price, sold it without reserve. It was held that he was not liable for breach of implied warranty, as the buyer could have enforced the main contract against the seller on the ground that the auctioneer had apparent authority to sell without reserve.<sup>89</sup> Similarly, an agent would not be liable for breach of implied warranty if he did an unauthorised act which the principal later ratified.

(iv) Crown agent. An agent of the Crown is probably not liable for breach of implied warranty of authority. The assumption that such an agent impliedly warrants his authority is "utterly inconsistent with the facts".<sup>90</sup> In view of the enormous value of some government contracts, it would be extremely harsh to impose liability on a civil servant who in good faith and without negligence had misrepresented his authority.

(4) Other liability for misrepresentation

The agent's liability for breach of warranty of authority arises where he misrepresents his authority; but he may also be liable to the third party in tort for other misrepresentations. This was, for example, held to be the case where an estate agent who had been engaged by the vendor of property negligently made misrepresentations about it to a prospective purchaser who, in reliance on those representations, entered into a contract with the vendor for the purchase of the property.<sup>91</sup> Under the Property Misdescriptions Act 1991, an agent who makes such a misrepresentation may also incur criminal liability. The Act provides that no right of action in civil proceedings is to arise "by reason only" of the commission of such an offence<sup>92</sup>; but this provision would not seem to preclude the agent's being held liable to the third party for negligence at common law.

3. Between Principal and Agent

(1) Rights of agent

(a) COMMISSION. Three questions arise in connection with an agent's right to commission.

(i) Whether payable at all. Whether an agent is entitled to any commission at all depends on the terms of the agreement between principal and agent. In Taylor v Brewer<sup>93</sup> an agent was to receive "such commission . . . as should be deemed right" by the principal. It was held that he had no legal right to commission. But where the agency is a commercial relationship the courts are reluctant to send the agent away empty-handed.<sup>94</sup> Thus if the agreement merely provides that the amount of commission is to be left to the principal's discretion, and he refuses to fix the amount, he may be liable to pay a reasonable sum.<sup>95</sup> On the other hand, the director of a company may agree to work for it "for such remuneration as the other directors may determine" on the understanding that he will receive nothing until the company has "got on its feet". If this never happens, he cannot claim a reasonable remuneration for his work.<sup>96</sup>

<sup>89</sup> cf. Mitsui & Co Ltd v Marpo Industrial Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 393. Quaere whether this reasoning might have been applied in Yonge v Toynbee [1910] 1 K.B. 215; cf., below p.751, n.19.

<sup>90</sup> Dunn v Macdonald [1897] 1 Q.B. 555 at 558.

<sup>91</sup> McCullagh v Lane Fox & Partners Ltd [1994] 1 E.G.L.R. 48.

<sup>92</sup> Property Misdescriptions Act 1991, s.1(4).

<sup>93</sup> (1813) 1 M. & S. 290.

<sup>94</sup> See Kofi Sunkersette Obu v A Strauss & Co Ltd [1951] A.C. 243.

<sup>95</sup> Bryant v Flight (1839) 5 M. & W. 114; British Bank for Foreign Trade Ltd v Novinec Ltd [1949] 1 K.B. 623; Powell v Braun [1954] 1 W.L.R. 401.

<sup>96</sup> Re Richmond Gate Property Co Ltd [1965] 1 W.L.R. 335.

(ii) When earned. Commission is payable only in respect of a transaction which the agent was employed to bring about. In Toulmin v Millar<sup>97</sup> the owner of a house employed an agent to find a tenant. The agent found a tenant, who later bought the house. His claim for commission on the sale failed, since he was only employed to let the house.

The transaction must also be caused by the agent's efforts. In Tribe v Taylor<sup>98</sup> a principal employed an agent to raise a loan of money. The lender later entered into partnership with the principal and on this occasion made a further loan. The agent's claim for commission on this second loan failed, since it was not brought about by his efforts.

Unless otherwise agreed,<sup>99</sup> the agent is not entitled to commission in respect of transactions which take place after the termination of the agency.<sup>1</sup> A contract may, however, provide that commission is earned when the agent secures the order (so that nothing more need be done by him to perfect his entitlement to it) but that it is only to become payable at some later stage, e.g. when the order is executed. In such a case the agent is entitled to commission on orders obtained before, though not executed till after, the termination of the agency.<sup>2</sup> Under the Regulations which apply to "commercial agents",<sup>3</sup> such an agent has somewhat more extensive rights in respect of transactions concluded after the termination of the agency<sup>4</sup> and in respect of transactions not brought about by his efforts but concluded in breach of an exclusive agency agreement.<sup>5</sup>

A principal may engage more than one agent: e.g. where an owner instructs two estate agents to find a purchaser for his house.<sup>6</sup> Commission will then be due to the agent whose efforts have brought about the sale<sup>7</sup>; and where the efforts of both have contributed to this result, each may<sup>8</sup> be entitled to commission.<sup>9</sup> Where two "commercial agents" appointed in succession claim commission on the same transaction, the first agent is not normally entitled to commission, but the court may, if it is equitable to do so, order the commission to be shared between the two agents.<sup>10</sup>

The precise stage at which the agent becomes entitled to commission depends on the terms of the contract between principal and agent.<sup>11</sup> This question has given rise to

<sup>97</sup> (1887) 12 App.Cas. 746. For a fuller report, see 58 L.T. 96.

<sup>98</sup> (1876) 1 C.P.D. 505; cf. Debenham, Tewson & Chinnocks plc v Rimington [1989] 2 E.G.L.R. 26 (where, however, the agents were awarded a reasonable remuneration for their efforts); Harwood v Smith, The Times, December 8, 1997; contrast Nahun v Royal Holloway and Bedford New Colleges Ltd, The Times, November 19, 1998.

<sup>99</sup> Levy v Goldhill [1917] 2 Ch. 297; cf. Brian Cooper & Co v Fairview Estates (Investments) Ltd [1987] 1 E.G.L.R. 18; Robert Bruce & Partners v Wynyard Developments [1987] 1 E.G.L.R. 20; Barnard Marcus & Co v Ashraf [1988] 1 E.G.L.R. 7; Marshall v N M Financial Management Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1527 (so far as it relates to the "renewal commission"); Harwood v Smith [1998] 1 E.G.L.R. 5.

<sup>1</sup> Crocker-Horlock v B Lang & Co Ltd [1949] 1 All E.R. 526; Bronester Ltd v Priddle [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1294.

<sup>2</sup> Sellers v London Counties Newspapers [1951] 1 K.B. 784.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.709. SI 1993/3053.

<sup>4</sup> ibid., regs 7(1)(b), 8.

<sup>5</sup> ibid., reg.7(2); at common law, the agent's remedy in such a case would be by way of damages: cf. Alpha Trading Ltd v Dunsham-Patten [1981] Q.B. 290, below, pp.744, 749. For exclusive dealing agreements, see above p.468.

<sup>6</sup> Although estate agents are not "agents" for the purpose of enabling them to conclude contracts between their clients and third parties (above, p.708), they are treated in the same way as agents for the purpose of their right to commission.

<sup>7</sup> John D Wood & Co v Dantata (1985) 275 E.G. 1278; Chasen Rider v Hedges [1993] 1 E.G.L.R. 47.

<sup>8</sup> Depending on the terms of the contract: see the authorities cited at nn.13–19, below.

<sup>9</sup> Lordgate Properties v Balcombe (1985) 274 E.G. 493; Anscombe & Ringland v Watson [1991] 2 E.G.L.R. 28.

<sup>10</sup> SI 1993/3953, reg.9.

<sup>11</sup> See, e.g. Fairvale v Subharmall [1992] 2 E.G.L.R. 27.

much litigation in cases concerning estate agents' commission.<sup>12</sup> In Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper<sup>13</sup> the landowner undertook to pay the estate agent his commission "on completion of sale". No sale took place because the owner refused to deal with the prospective purchaser introduced by the agent. It was held that the agent was not entitled to commission. Again, a contract for the payment of commission on the agent's "introducing a person ready, willing and able to purchase" does not entitle him to commission if the prospective purchaser makes a conditional offer subject to contract and satisfactory survey; or if he makes an offer and withdraws it before the vendor accepts<sup>14</sup>; or if he signs a contract which cannot be completed because of a defect in the vendor's title<sup>15</sup>; or if, before the prospective purchaser is introduced, the owner has entered into a binding contract to sell the property to a purchaser introduced by another agent.<sup>16</sup> Nor does a promise to pay commission "in the event of your introducing . . . a person prepared to enter into a contract" entitle the agent to commission where the person introduced only agrees to sign a contract which is subject to conditions.<sup>17</sup> Even a contract for the payment of commission "in the event of securing for you an offer" does not entitle the agent to commission unless a firm, unconditional offer is made.<sup>18</sup> But where the contract was to pay commission as soon as "any person introduced by us enters into a legally binding contract to purchase" it was held that the agent was entitled when such a contract was made although the vendor later rescinded it on account of the purchaser's breach.<sup>19</sup>

The common law on this topic is far from satisfactory. On the one hand it is hard for the estate agent, who may have gone to much trouble and expense in advertising<sup>20</sup> a house and securing offers, to be deprived of all reward through the caprice of his client. On the other hand it is hard for the client to have to pay commission where it is not his fault that no sale takes place: the common understanding is that the commission should come out of the proceeds of sale. In this conflict of interests, the estate agents usually have the advantage of being able to submit a standard form of contract<sup>21</sup> to the client, who may accept its terms without question. The courts have to some extent redressed the balance in favour of the client. They have (as the above cases show) construed stipulations for commission strictly against the agents,<sup>22</sup> or held them to be ineffective for uncertainty or for misrepresentation.<sup>23</sup> But it remains possible for commission to be payable even though there is no sale. It would perhaps be better if the question when an

<sup>12</sup> Gower, 13 M.L.R. 490; Hardy-Ivamy (1951) C.L.P. 305.

<sup>13</sup> [1941] A.C. 108.

<sup>14</sup> Dennis Reed Ltd v Goody [1950] 2 K.B. 277; Graham & Scott (Southgate) Ltd v Oxlade [1950] 2 K.B. 257. Contrast Christie Owen & Davies Ltd v Rapacioli [1974] Q.B. 781 (where a vendor who withdrew after a firm offer had been made by the prospective purchaser was held liable for commission).

<sup>15</sup> Dellaflora v Lester [1962] 1 W.L.R. 1208; cf. Blake & Co v Sohn [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1412.

<sup>16</sup> A. I. Dickinson & Co v O'Leary (1979) 254 F.G. 731.

<sup>17</sup> A. I. Wilkinson Ltd v Brown [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1914.

<sup>18</sup> Bennett, Walden & Co v Wood [1950] 2 All E.R. 134; cf. Christie, Owen & Davies Ltd v Stockton [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1353.

<sup>19</sup> Scheggia v Gradwell [1963] 1 W.L.R. 1049; cf. Midgeley Estates Ltd v Hand [1952] 2 Q.B. 432; Dremery & Dremery v Ware-Lane [1960] 1 W.L.R. 1204; aliter if the contract goes off because of the agent's misrepresentation: Peter Long & Partners v Burns [1956] 1 W.L.R. 413 at 1083.

<sup>20</sup> The agent can expressly stipulate for reimbursement of advertising expenses, as in Bernard Thorpe & Partners v Flannery (1977) 244 F.G. 129.

<sup>21</sup> The Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 does not affect the validity of the provisions discussed: they confer rights on the agent and do not exclude or restrict his liability. For possible application of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, see below at n.27.

<sup>22</sup> See above, at nn.13–19.

<sup>23</sup> See Jaques v Lloyd D George & Partners [1968] 1 W.L.R. 625.

estate agent was entitled to commission ceased to be regarded purely as one of construction. Only legislation could now achieve this result<sup>24</sup>; but the Estate Agents Act 1979 (which regulates the activities of estate agents) does not lay down any rules for this purpose. It merely requires the agent, before a client enters into an agency contract with him, to give the client particulars of the circumstances in which the commission will become due.<sup>25</sup> Nor are the estate agency cases affected by the Regulations which apply to “commercial agents” since these Regulations apply only to agents who have continuing authority and who negotiate sales or purchases of goods.<sup>26</sup> If an agent acts for purposes relating to his trade, business or profession, the client is a consumer and the term in question is not individually negotiated, that term might not be binding on the consumer under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999<sup>27</sup>; e.g. if it provided for payment of the full commission even if no sale took place.<sup>28</sup> Even where the agent is not entitled to commission, he may have other rights against the client. He may be entitled to damages<sup>29</sup> where the sale goes off as a result of the client’s fault.<sup>30</sup> If the sale goes off as a result of the purchaser’s default, and the purchaser’s deposit is forfeited to the client, it has been suggested that the agent should be entitled to a quantum meruit out of the sum so forfeited.<sup>31</sup>

Under the Regulations which apply to “commercial agents”, commission becomes due when the principal has executed the transaction or when he should have done so or when the third party has done so<sup>32</sup>; and it becomes due at the latest when the third party has executed the transaction or would have done so if the principal had duly executed his part of it.<sup>33</sup> Where “execution” fails the Regulations give the agent the right to commission only if the failure is due to the principal’s breach of his contract with the third party.<sup>34</sup> Except in this situation, the question whether the agent can become entitled to commission before “execution” of that contract is (under the Regulations, no less than at common law) one of construction of the agency agreement.

(iii) Whether principal must give agent a chance to earn commission. If a principal employs an agent for a fixed period he is not, in general, bound to stay in business merely to enable the agent to earn his commission.<sup>35</sup> But if, on the true construction of the

<sup>24</sup> Lord Denning’s view in Jaques v Lloyd D George, above, n.23, at p.629, that an unreasonable stipulation will not be enforced, does not seem to have received any judicial support.

<sup>25</sup> s.18(2)(a); supplemented by Estate Agents (Provision of Information) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/859).

<sup>26</sup> See above, p.709.

<sup>27</sup> See above, pp.267 et seq.

<sup>28</sup> Such a term is not included in the list of prima facie unfair terms set out in Sch.2 of the 1999 Regulations, but that list is “non-exhaustive”: ibid. reg.5(5).

<sup>29</sup> Unless the contractual provision for commission is intended to be his only remedy, as in Property Choice v Fronda [1991] 2 F.G.L.R. 249.

<sup>30</sup> Dennis Reed Ltd v Goady [1950] 2 K.B. 277 at 285; for this purpose the default must be wilful, and not merely inability to complete on account of a defect of title: Blake & Co v Sohn [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1412.

<sup>31</sup> Boots v E Christopher & Co [1952] 1 K.B. 89 at 99; cf. Debenham Tewson & Chinnock plc v Rimington [1989] 2 F.G.L.R. 26. In the United States, there is authority for holding the prospective purchaser liable to the agent for commission where he defaults: Ellsworth Dobbs Inc v Johnson 236 A. 2d. 843 (1967). Contrast The Manifest Lipkowsky [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 138 (buyer’s agent held to have no right to commission against defaulting seller).

<sup>32</sup> SI 1993/3053, reg.10(1); above, p.709.

<sup>33</sup> reg.10(2). This rule cannot be excluded to the detriment of the agent: reg.10(4).

<sup>34</sup> reg.10(2); this would seem to apply in a situation analogous to that in those estate agency cases in which completion was prevented by a defect in the vendor’s title: above, p.742 at n.15. The actual estate agency cases fall outside the scope of the 1993 Regulations for the reason stated at n.26, above.

<sup>35</sup> Rhodes v Formod (1876) 1 App.Cas. 256; cf. Lazarus v Cairn Line Ltd (1912) 106 L.T. 378; L French & Co Ltd v Leeston Shipping Co Ltd [1922] 1 A.C. 451; Burrows, 31 M.L.R. 390. Contrast the position of “commercial agents” (above, p.709) SI 1993/3053, reg.17(7): Page v Combined Shipping & Trading Co [1997] 3 All E.R. 656.

agency contract, the principal has undertaken to stay in business so as to enable the agent to earn his commission, then the principal is liable in damages if he fails to do so. This was the effect of the contract in Turner v Goldsmith,<sup>36</sup> where the principal employed the agent for five years to obtain orders for shirts “manufactured or sold” by the principal. It was held that he was not justified in putting an end to the agency agreement simply because the factory in which he manufactured shirts was burnt down. An agency agreement may, moreover, relate to a specific contract which is actually concluded between principal and third party. In such a case, a term may be implied into the agency agreement that the principal will not break that contract so as to deprive the agent of his commission.<sup>37</sup>

A client who employs an estate agent to sell a house is, in general, under no liability if he sells it himself or through a second agent.<sup>38</sup> If the agent is appointed “sole agent” the client cannot sell through another agent, but he can still sell the house himself unless he gives the agent “the sole and exclusive right to sell”.<sup>39</sup> A manufacturer’s “sole agent” may simply be a buyer and not an agent at all.<sup>40</sup> The manufacturer’s undertaking to sell all his output to such a “sole agent” would bind him not to dispose of any of it himself,<sup>41</sup> so long as it was not invalid for restraint of trade.<sup>42</sup>

(b) INDEMNITY. A principal must indemnify his agent against all liabilities reasonably incurred or discharged by him in the execution of his authority.<sup>43</sup> This right of indemnity exists not only where the agent incurs contractual liability, but also where he incurs tortious liability, e.g. as a result of selling a third person’s property under the instructions of his principal.<sup>44</sup> The agent is not entitled to any indemnity in respect of an obviously illegal transaction,<sup>45</sup> nor in respect of a liability due to his own breach of duty.<sup>46</sup>

An agent may even be entitled to an indemnity in respect of payments which he was not legally obliged to make<sup>47</sup> so long as the payment, though not legally due, was made in the usual course of business, or possibly if it was made under a strong moral obligation.

(c) LIEN. An agent is (unless otherwise agreed)<sup>48</sup> entitled to a lien on all property of the principal which has come into his possession in the course of the agency. Every agent has a particular lien: that is, he can hold the property until the principal satisfies all

<sup>36</sup> [1891] 1 Q.B. 544; cf. Re Patent Floor Cloth Co (1872) 26 L.T. 467.

<sup>37</sup> Alpha Trading Ltd v Dunsham-Patten [1981] Q.B. 290; Carter, 45 M.L.R. 220; cf., above, pp.62–64 and 743 at n.30; George Moundreas & Co SA v Navimpex Centrala Navala [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 515; The Energy Progress [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 355.

<sup>38</sup> Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd v Cooper [1941] A.C. 108.

<sup>39</sup> Bentall Horsley & Baldry v Vicary [1931] 1 K.B. 253; Hampton & Sons Ltd v George [1939] 3 All.E.R. 627. cf. in the case of “commercial agents,” SI 1993/3053, reg.7(2), above, p.741.

<sup>40</sup> See above, p.706.

<sup>41</sup> W T Lamb & Sons v Goring Brick Co Ltd [1932] 1 K.B. 710.

<sup>42</sup> See above, pp.468–472.

<sup>43</sup> Thacker v Hardy (1878) 4 Q.B.D. 685; Reynolds v Smith (1893) 9 T.L.R. 494; cf. Insolvency Act 1986, s.44(1)(c) and (3); contrast Wilson v Avec Audio Visual Equipment Ltd [1974] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 80 (payment made after termination of authority).

<sup>44</sup> Adamson v Jarvis (1827) 4 Bing. 66.

<sup>45</sup> Thacker v Hardy, above, at 687.

<sup>46</sup> cf. Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] A.C. 555; above, p.209.

<sup>47</sup> Read v Anderson (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 779; the actual decision was reversed by Gaming Act 1892 (above, pp.524–525), but the principle would still apply to cases not concerned with wagering contracts: cf. Adams v Morgan [1924] 1 K.B. 751; 40 L.Q.R. 389.

<sup>48</sup> Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox [1967] 1 Q.B. 552.

claims of the agent arising out of the agency. An agent may by custom or by special contract also have a general lien, entitling him to hold the property until the principal satisfies all claims of the agent, whether they have arisen out of the agency or not.

(2) Duties of agent

(a) TO CARRY OUT HIS INSTRUCTIONS. An agent who is appointed under a contract binding him to carry out his instructions is obviously obliged to carry them out.<sup>49</sup> He may be liable for failing to do so even if the contract which he was instructed to make would not, if made, have been a binding one.<sup>50</sup> He will also be in breach of the contract if he acts in a way not authorised by the terms of his appointment.<sup>51</sup> An agent who acts gratuitously or under a unilateral contract<sup>52</sup> is not bound to do anything, but may be liable if he starts to perform and then leaves the task unfinished.

(b) TO ACT WITH DUE CARE AND SKILL. The degree of care and skill expected of an agent depends on the circumstances. A person who holds himself out as being skilled in some profession or trade<sup>53</sup> must show greater care and skill than one who merely offers to give what help he can as a friend. There is probably no rigid distinction between paid and gratuitous agents for this purpose. The fact that the agent is paid is taken into account, along with other circumstances, in determining the degree of the care and skill to be expected of him; but even a gratuitous agent may be liable in tort for acting negligently.<sup>54</sup>

(c) FIDUCIARY DUTY. Although the position of an agent in various respects differs from that of a trustee,<sup>55</sup> an agent does, because the principal places confidence in him, owe a fiduciary duty to the principal.<sup>56</sup> This duty is distinct from his duty to act with due care and skill: its breach “connotes disloyalty or infidelity” and not merely failure by the agent to do his “incompetent best”.<sup>57</sup> Its most important consequences are the following.

(i) Conflict of interest and duty. The agent must not put himself into a position where his interest and duty conflict.<sup>58</sup> He must not, for instance, sell his own goods to the principal when he is employed to buy: his interest as a seller would be to get the highest possible price, whereas his duty as agent is to buy at the lowest possible price.<sup>59</sup> Similarly, he must not, if employed to sell, buy the principal’s property for himself.<sup>60</sup> Again, he

<sup>49</sup> cf., in the case of “commercial agents,” (above, p.709) SI 1993/3053, reg.3(2)(a).

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.524, n.35.

<sup>51</sup> County Ltd v Girozentrale Securities [1996] 3 All E.R. 834.

<sup>52</sup> See above, pp.37–38, 152, 157–158; The Zephyr [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 529 at 538.

<sup>53</sup> See above, p.206.

<sup>54</sup> Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] A.C. 465 at 495, 510, 526–527, 530, 538; approving Wilkinson v Coverdale (1793) 1 Esp. 75; above, p.157.

<sup>55</sup> See, for example, above, p.412; Kingscroft Insurance Co Ltd v H S Weaver (Underwriting) Ltd [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 187 at 191.

<sup>56</sup> Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 A.C. 324, below at n.67 and p.746. cf. in the case of “commercial agents” (above, p.709) SI 1993/3053, reg.3(1) (duty of good faith).

<sup>57</sup> Bristol & West BS v Mothew [1998] Ch. 1 at 18. cf. Coulthard v Disco Mix Club [2000] 1 W.L.R. 707: claim in respect of under-accounting by agent held (for limitation purposes) to be a simple contract claim and not one for breach of fiduciary duty).

<sup>58</sup> Lamb v Evans [1893] 1 Ch. 218; cf. Reading v Attorney-General [1951] A.C. 507.

<sup>59</sup> Armstrong v Jackson [1917] 2 K.B. 822; Tetley v Shand (1871) 25 L.T. 658; Regier v Campbell-Stuart [1939] Ch. 766; Guinness plc v Saunders [1990] 2 A.C. 663; cf. Companies Act 1985, s.317.

<sup>60</sup> McPherson v Watt (1877) 3 App.Cas. 254.

must not subject himself to conflicting duties by acting as agent for both principal and third party,<sup>61</sup> unless he fully discloses the position to each of these persons.<sup>62</sup> But where the nature of the agent's business is such that he will normally act for more than one principal it is an implied term of the contract of agency that he should be free to do so, even though the interests of the various principals are likely to conflict. Thus an estate agent is entitled to accept instructions for the sale of properties from several principals, and where he does so he is both entitled and bound not to disclose confidential information received from any one of his clients to the other or others.<sup>63</sup>

A contract made in breach of this fiduciary duty is voidable at the option of the principal. The agent himself cannot avoid a transaction on the ground that it may conflict with his duties to his principal.<sup>64</sup>

(ii) Bribes and secret profits.<sup>65</sup> The agent must not without the principal's consent<sup>66</sup> accept a commission from a third party. Such a secret commission is called a "bribe" if the third party, at the time of paying it, knew that the payee was acting as agent for another: the payment is then regarded as "a gift accepted by a fiduciary as an inducement to betray his trust".<sup>67</sup> It is immaterial that the third party had no corrupt motive in making the payment.<sup>68</sup> The promise or payment of a bribe has drastic effects. The agent can (even if he has been appointed for a fixed period) be summarily dismissed<sup>69</sup>; he loses his right to commission on the tainted transaction<sup>70</sup>; and he holds the bribe in trust<sup>71</sup> for the principal, to whom it must be paid over, whether or not he has suffered loss.<sup>72</sup> The principal is entitled to any increase in the value of the bribe or of its product: thus if a cash bribe has been invested in assets which have increased in value, the principal is entitled in equity to those assets.<sup>73</sup> If the bribe has not yet been paid, the

<sup>61</sup> Fullwood v Hurley [1928] 1 K.B. 498 at 502; Anglo-African Merchants v Bayley [1970] 1 Q.B. 311 at 322–323; North & South Trust Co v Berkeley [1971] 1 W.L.R. 470.

<sup>62</sup> See Harrods Ltd v Lemon [1931] 2 K.B. 157 and Clark v Boyce Mouat [1994] 1 A.C. 428 (where full disclosure was made). cf. Estate Agents Act 1979, s.21 (imposing a statutory duty of disclosure on estate agents: the remedy is disqualification under s.3 of the Act).

<sup>63</sup> Kelly v Cooper [1993] A.C. 205.

<sup>64</sup> Boulting v ACCT [1963] 2 Q.B. 606.

<sup>65</sup> Needham, 95 L.Q.R. 536.

<sup>66</sup> See Anangel Atlas Compania Naviera SA v Ishikawajima-Harima Heavy Industries Co [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 167 (where the principal knew of the payments).

<sup>67</sup> Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 A.C. 324 at 330; Allwood v Clifford [2002] E.M.L.R. 3 (where there was no such knowledge).

<sup>68</sup> Industries & General Mortgage Co v Lewis [1949] 2 All E.R. 573.

<sup>69</sup> Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339. For the effect of such dismissal on the agent's rights to salary (or recompense for work actually done), see below, pp.784–785. In the case of "commercial agents," (above, p.709) this right of dismissal is preserved by SI 1993/3053, reg.16.

<sup>70</sup> Solomon v Pender (1865) 3 H. & C. 639; Andrews v Ramsey [1903] 2 K.B. 635 (but commission on other transactions remains payable if they are severable: Nitedals Taenstickfabrik v Bruster [1906] 2 Ch. 671); cf. Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell, above, where the fact that the agent had made secret profits on two groups of contracts did not defeat a right to commission on a third group. However, the reason given for this result was not that the transactions were severable but that the right to commission accrued before dismissal; this reasoning is hard to reconcile with such cases as Andrews v Ramsey, above.

<sup>71</sup> Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 A.C. 324.

<sup>72</sup> Reading v Attorney-General [1951] A.C. 507; Sealy [1963] C.L.J. 119 at 128–136; Islamic Republic of Iran Shipping Lines v Denby, Financial Times, October 28, 1986.

<sup>73</sup> Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid, above, n.71, where the Privy Council disapproved the contrary decision of the Court of Appeal in Lister v Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch.D. 1. Where the asset is acquired partly with the bribe and partly with the agent's own money, the principal appears to be entitled to a pro rata share in the asset, on the analogy of Foskett v McKeown [2001] 1 A.C. 102 (where the wrongdoer was a trustee, not an agent).

agent cannot recover it from the third party, but the principal can do so.<sup>74</sup> The principal can further set the tainted transaction aside and retain the bribe, if it has been paid over to him by the agent<sup>75</sup>; whether or not the bribe has been paid, the principal can, as an alternative to claiming the bribe,<sup>76</sup> claim damages from the agent and the third party for the loss suffered as a result of the bribery.<sup>77</sup> These claims are available even though the payment of the bribe did not induce the principal to enter into any contract with the third party.<sup>78</sup> If the principal was induced to enter into such a contract with the third party, that party is also liable to the principal for an account of the profits made by the third party from that contract, but only to the extent that these exceeded the profits that he would have made if the contract had not been induced by bribery and that the third party has not already been required to pay such amounts to the principal by way of damages.<sup>79</sup> Agent and third party may also incur criminal liability.<sup>80</sup> Where the secret profit is not a bribe, the third party is under no contractual or tortious liability. The agent is likewise not guilty of theft<sup>81</sup> though he can be summarily dismissed<sup>82</sup> and is civilly liable to account for the payment to the principal.

(d) PERSONAL PERFORMANCE. The general rule is that an agent cannot delegate the performance of his duties, unless the principal expressly or impliedly authorises him to appoint a sub-agent.<sup>83</sup> But an agent does not “delegate” by instructing his own employees to do various necessary acts in connection with the execution of his duty.

An agent may have authority to appoint a sub-agent and to make a contract between the sub-agent and the principal.<sup>84</sup> He may, alternatively, have authority to delegate (in the sense that he commits no breach of duty by performing through another) but have no authority to make a contract between principal and sub-agent.<sup>85</sup> In such a case the agent remains contractually liable to the principal if the sub-agent performs defectively,<sup>86</sup> while the sub-agent is under no contractual duty to the principal. The sub-agent may, however, be liable on other grounds, e.g. for breach of fiduciary duty or in tort if he

<sup>74</sup> Harrington v Victoria Graving Dock Co (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 549; Industries & General Mortgage Co v Lewis, above, n.68.

<sup>75</sup> Logicrose v Southend United FC [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1256; Jones [1989] C.I.J. 22.

<sup>76</sup> T Mahesan S/O Thambiah v Malaysian Government Officers' Housing Society [1979] A.C. 374; disapproving dicta in Salford Corp v Lever [1891] 1 Q.B. 168; Tettenborn, 95 L.Q.R. 68; Arab Monetary Fund v Hashim [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 543; Island Records Ltd v Tring International plc [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1256 at 1257; Fyffes Group Ltd v Templeman [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 643.

<sup>77</sup> Salford Corp v Lever [1891] 1 Q.B. 168.

<sup>78</sup> Petrotrade Inc v Smith [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 486, where the “third party” had itself been appointed as agent but the bribes were paid by its employees to another of the principal's agents, i.e. to one of the latter's employees.

<sup>79</sup> Fyffes Group Ltd v Templeman [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 643 at 672.

<sup>80</sup> Prevention of Corruption Acts 1906–1916; corrupt motive is necessary for this purpose.

<sup>81</sup> R. v Cullum (1873) L.R. 2 C.C.R. 28. This decision has survived the Theft Act 1968; see s.5(3); Criminal Law Revision Committee, 8th Report (1966) Cmd. 2977, para.57(iii); Attorney-General's Reference (No.1 of 1985) [1986] Q.B. 491; R. v Cooke [1986] A.C. 909 at 934. For possible liability for false accounting, see Lee Cheung Wing v R. [1992] Crim.L.R. 400.

<sup>82</sup> Neary v Dean of Westminster [1999] I.R.I.L.R. 288.

<sup>83</sup> e.g. John McCann & Co v Pom [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1643.

<sup>84</sup> De Bussche v Alt (1878) 8 Ch.D. 286.

<sup>85</sup> New Zealand & Australian Land Co v Watson (1881) 7 Q.B.D. 374; Calico Printers' Assoc v Barclays Bank (1931) 145 L.T. 51; Royal Products Ltd v Midland Bank Ltd [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 194 at 198; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 202; Prentis Donegan & Partners v Leeds & Leeds plc [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 326.

<sup>86</sup> Powell & Thomas v Evan Jones & Co [1905] 1 K.B. 11 apparently disapproved, but on another point, in Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 A.C. 324 at 337.

negligently causes damage to the principal's property.<sup>87</sup> But the sub-agent is not liable in tort merely because he has negligently paid over the proceeds of the principal's property to an impostor (so that the principal suffers financial loss)<sup>88</sup>; for such liability would be in practice indistinguishable from contractual liability and so be inconsistent with the absence of a contractual relationship between principal and sub-agent. The contract between agent and sub-agent could also be drawn up in such a way as to confer rights on the principal under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.<sup>89</sup>

(c) INDEMNITY. It is an implied term in a contract of employment that the employee will indemnify the employer against any liability to third parties incurred by reason of the employee's negligence in doing what he was employed to do.<sup>90</sup> A contract of agency will generally give rise to a similar liability to indemnify the principal.

4. Effects of Non-consensual Agency

It is a difficult and largely unsolved problem to what extent the effects of agency which have so far been discussed arise where the agency is not created by agreement between principal and agent, e.g. in cases of apparent and usual authority, and in cases of agency of necessity.

One effect of apparent or usual authority is to make the principal liable to the third party. But is the third party liable to the principal? When an agent acts within his apparent authority, the principal is liable because he is estopped from denying the agent's authority; but no similar estoppel need arise against the third party. If the principal wants to enforce the contract, he will usually ratify. But there may be some reason why he cannot do so,<sup>91</sup> and, if this is the case, it is far from clear that he could sue the third party simply because the third party can sue him. An agent who does an unauthorised act which binds his principal is clearly not entitled to commission, but is probably subject to the usual liabilities if he accepts a bribe or makes a secret profit.<sup>92</sup> An agent of necessity often acquires rights of recompense or reimbursement against his principal, but it is less common for him to be able to create a contract between principal and third party. Thus it is impossible to make any general statement about the effects of non-consensual agency. The problems which may arise must be considered in the light of the considerations of policy which underlie each type of non-consensual agency.

SECTION 5. TERMINATION

Agency as a contract is determined by any event which terminates a contract,<sup>93</sup> and also in certain special ways. After discussing these, we shall discuss the effects of termination and finally consider some cases of irrevocable agency.

<sup>87</sup> Meyerstein v Eastern Agency (1885) 1 T.L.R. 595; cf. Stewart v Reavell's Garage [1952] 2 Q.B. 545.

<sup>88</sup> Bulsamo v Medici [1984] 1 W.L.R. 951; contrast Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145, where in a "most unusual" (at 195) situation a sub-agent was held liable in tort to the principal for negligently inflicted financial loss. See also Aiken v Stewart Wrightson Members Agency, [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1281.

<sup>89</sup> See above, pp.651, et seq.

<sup>90</sup> Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] A.C. 555; contrast Harvey v R G O'Dell Ltd [1958] 2 Q.B. 78.

<sup>91</sup> See above, pp.722, et seq.; e.g. it may be too late to ratify.

<sup>92</sup> English v Dedham Vale Properties Ltd [1978] 1 W.L.R. 93.

<sup>93</sup> e.g. by performance, rescission or frustration.

1. Modes of Termination

(1) Consensual agency

It will be convenient first to consider modes of termination at common law and then to deal with special rules applicable to “commercial agents”.<sup>94</sup>

(a) NOTICE. An agent’s authority can be determined by giving him notice: for instance, a wife’s implied authority to pledge her husband’s credit for necessary household expenses can be terminated in this way.<sup>95</sup> Where the agency is contractual it may be for a fixed term or specify a period of notice. If no term or period of notice is specified, the contract is determinable on reasonable notice.<sup>96</sup> A notice given in breach of contract is, in general,<sup>97</sup> nonetheless effective. It determines the agent’s actual authority<sup>98</sup> and the relationship of principal and agent. Thus the agent cannot restrain the breach by injunction or obtain a declaration that his dismissal was void or claim his agreed remuneration in respect of periods after the wrongful termination.<sup>99</sup> His normal remedies are by way of damages for wrongful dismissal and a declaration that the dismissal was wrongful.<sup>1</sup> He may also be able to restrain by injunction the breach of a negative stipulation in the agency contract,<sup>2</sup> such as an undertaking by the principal not to appoint another agent to conduct the business in question.<sup>3</sup>

(b) INCONSISTENT CONDUCT. It seems that agency can be determined without notice by conduct inconsistent with its continuance, e.g. if the principal sells the subject-matter of the agency.<sup>4</sup> Such conduct may again be a breach of contract but nevertheless puts an end to the agency.

(c) INSANITY. At common law,<sup>5</sup> agency is determined by the supervening insanity of principal or agent if the insanity is inconsistent with the consensual nature of agency. The principal’s insanity terminates agency even though the agent has no notice of it.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>94</sup> See above, p.709.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.711.

<sup>96</sup> Martin-Baker Aircraft Co Ltd v Canadian Flight Equipment Ltd [1955] 2 Q.B. 556; cf. Re Spenborough UDC's Agreement [1968] Ch. 139; Richardson v Koeftod [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1812 at 1814. The “presumption of perpetual duration” in contracts specifying no time limit, stated in Llanelly Ry & Dock Co v L & NW Ry (1875) L.R. 7 H.L. 550 (discussed by Carnegie, 85 L.Q.R. 392) does not apply to contracts of agency.

<sup>97</sup> For exceptions, see below, pp.1030–1031.

<sup>98</sup> i.e. the authority based on the wrongfully repudiated contract; as to apparent authority, usual authority and authority of necessity, see below, pp.750–751.

<sup>99</sup> Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 699; Roberts v Elmvells Engineering Co Ltd [1972] 2 Q.B. 586; Guntton v London Borough of Richmond upon Thames [1981] Ch. 448; R. v East Berkshire Health Authority, Ex p. Walsh [1985] Q.B. 152 at 165; Delaney v Staples [1992] 1 A.C. 687 at 692; below, p.1016; Freedland, 32 M.L.R. 314; Drake [1969] J.B.L. 113. Remuneration earned before the dismissal but payable thereafter could be claimed on the principle of Sellers v London County Newspapers [1951] 1 K.B. 784. Remuneration can also be claimed where the termination is lawful because it is authorised by a contractual provision for notice or payment in lieu: Abrahams v Performing Rights Society [1995] 1 C.R. 1028.

<sup>1</sup> As to damages, see Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd, above; Marsh v National Autistic Society [1993] I.C.R. 453 and Boyo v Lambeth LBC [1994] I.C.R. 727; as to declaration, see Taylor v NUS [1967] 1 W.L.R. 532.

<sup>2</sup> See below, pp.1042–1044.

<sup>3</sup> Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361.

<sup>4</sup> E P Nelson & Co v Rolfe [1950] 1 K.B. 139.

<sup>5</sup> For a statutory exception, see below, pp.751–752.

<sup>6</sup> Yonge v Tynbee [1910] 1 K.B. 215; above, p.738.

(d) DEATH. Death of principal or agent terminates agency, whether the survivor has notice of death or not.<sup>7</sup> Dissolution of a company has the same effect, and so has dissolution of a partnership, unless the contract is, on its true construction, with the partners constituting the firm from time to time.<sup>8</sup> However, in such a case dissolution may be a repudiatory breach, justifying rescission of the contract by the agent.<sup>9</sup>

(e) BANKRUPTCY. The principal's bankruptcy terminates the agent's authority.<sup>10</sup> The bankruptcy of the agent terminates his authority if it makes him unfit to perform his duties.<sup>11</sup>

(f) COMMERCIAL AGENTS. The Regulations governing "commercial agents"<sup>12</sup> specify minimum periods of notice (depending on the duration of the agency contract) which must be given to terminate the agency contract.<sup>13</sup> The relevant rules appear to apply only to the relationship of the parties to that contract. They do not seem to apply to the agent's authority: in other words, the position under the Regulations appears to resemble the common law position that failure to give proper notice makes the termination wrongful, but not ineffective. Even where proper notice is given, the agent is entitled under the Regulations to compensation or to an indemnity in respect of the termination.<sup>14</sup> The object of this rule appears to be to provide the agent with a sort of redundancy or severance payment, reflecting the commission that he would (but for the termination) have earned, the expenses that he has incurred, and the benefits that have accrued to the principal in consequence of the agent's activities.<sup>15</sup> The rights of compensation and indemnity can also apply where the agency contract is terminated by the death of the agent<sup>16</sup> or by notice given by himself on the ground of his age, illness or infirmity, or on account of the principal's breach.<sup>17</sup> But the agent has no such rights where termination is justified by his own breach.<sup>18</sup>

(2) Non-consensual agency

The events listed above terminate an agent's express or implied authority, but do not necessarily terminate apparent or usual authority, or authority of necessity. Notice to the agent obviously does not terminate apparent or usual authority: notice must be given to the third party to have this effect. Again, a principal's insanity terminates his agent's actual authority; but a third party who goes on dealing with the agent without notice of the principal's insanity may be able to hold the principal liable on the ground that the

<sup>7</sup> Campanari v Woodburn (1854) 15 C.B. 400; Pool v Pool (1889) 58 L.J.P. 67.

<sup>8</sup> Salton v New Beeston Cycle Co [1900] 1 Ch. 43. And see Brace v Calder [1895] 2 Q.B. 253; Harold Fielding Ltd v Mansi [1974] 1 All E.R. 1035; Tunstall v Condon [1980] I.C.R. 786; Briggs v Oates [1990] I.C.R. 473. Dissolution of a limited liability partnership incorporated under the Limited Liability Partnership Act 2000 (above p.563) seems for the present purpose to have the same effect as dissolution of a company.

<sup>9</sup> Briggs v Oates, above.

<sup>10</sup> Elliott v Turquand (1881) 7 App.Cas. 79.

<sup>11</sup> McCall v Australian Meat Co Ltd (1870) 19 W.R. 188.

<sup>12</sup> See above, p.709.

<sup>13</sup> SI 1993/3053, reg.15.

<sup>14</sup> ibid. reg.17. Rights under reg.17 may be more extensive than those which would be available at common law: see Page v Combined Shipping & Trading Co [1997] 3 All E.R. 656; for claims both under the Regulations and at common law, see Duffen v FRABO SpA [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 180.

<sup>15</sup> See Moore v Piretta PTA Ltd [1999] 1 All E.R. 174 at 181.

<sup>16</sup> SI 1993/3053, reg.17(8).

<sup>17</sup> ibid. reg.18(b) (as amended by SI 1993/3173).

<sup>18</sup> ibid. reg.18(a).

agent still had apparent authority.<sup>19</sup> It is submitted that the position should be the same where (unknown to the third party) the agent's actual authority has been terminated by the principal's death.<sup>20</sup>

Agency of necessity can sometimes be terminated by notice, e.g. a shipmaster's authority would be terminated, just as it could be prevented from arising, in this way. But notice would not terminate such authority where the need to encourage the agent to act was particularly strong. In GN Ry v Swaffield,<sup>21</sup> for instance, the railway company's claim was not defeated merely because the owner of the horse had said that he would not be responsible for the cost of feeding and stabling it.

2. Irrevocable Agency

In the following cases agency is irrevocable in the sense that any attempt to revoke it is not merely a breach of contract but also ineffective. The agent's authority continues in spite of the attempt to revoke it.

(1) Authority coupled with an interest

An authority coupled with an interest is irrevocable. This does not mean that an authority is irrevocable simply because the agent can, by executing it, earn commission. The authority must be given for valuable consideration or by deed to secure some interest of the agent which exists independently of the agency. Thus in Carmichael's case<sup>22</sup> one Phillips promoted a company to buy a mine from him. Carmichael agreed to underwrite 1,000 shares in this company—i.e. to take up so many of these shares as could not be sold to the public—and authorised Phillips to apply for the shares on his behalf. This authority was held to be irrevocable; it was coupled with an "interest" because, if the shares were not taken up, Phillips would not get the purchase-money for the mine.

This rule only applies if the authority was intended for the protection of the interest.<sup>23</sup> It therefore cannot apply where the interest arises after the creation of the authority.<sup>24</sup>

(2) Irrevocable and enduring powers of attorney

At common law a power of attorney, even though coupled with an interest, was revoked by the death of the donor, i.e. of the principal.<sup>25</sup>

This rule might cause hardship both to the agent and to a person who bought from him in ignorance of the principal's death. The Powers of Attorney Act 1971 therefore provides that a power of attorney which is expressed to be irrevocable and is given to <sup>19</sup> Drew v Nunn (1879) 4 Q.B.D. 661; Yonge v Toynbee [1910] 1 K.B. 215 is only concerned with the termination of the agent's actual authority and his consequent liability for breach of warranty of authority. Normally such liability would not arise if the third party could hold the principal liable on the footing that the agent still had apparent authority (above, p.739). The two cases can, perhaps, be distinguished on the ground that the acts done by the agent in Yonge v Toynbee (taking steps in litigation) were acts which the insane principal had no capacity to do at all; while the contract in Drew v Nunn was one which could validly be made with an insane principal in accordance with the rules stated at pp.557–558, above. However that may be, the court did not in Yonge v Toynbee consider the possibility that the principal might have been held liable on the footing of apparent authority.

<sup>20</sup> As in Blades v Free (1829) 9 B. & C. 167, where apparent authority was not discussed.

<sup>21</sup> (1874) L.R. 9 Ex. 142; above, pp.719–720.

<sup>22</sup> [1896] 2 Ch. 643; cf. Walsh v Whitcomb (1797) 2 Esp. 565.

<sup>23</sup> Frith v Frith [1906] A.C. 254.

<sup>24</sup> Smart v Sandars (1848) 5 C.B. 895.

<sup>25</sup> Watson v King (1815) 4 Camp. 272.

secure a proprietary interest of, or the performance of an obligation owed to, the donee shall not be revoked by the donor without the consent of the donee, or by the donor's death, incapacity or bankruptcy, so long as the interest or obligation secured by it remains in being.<sup>26</sup> The Act also protects third parties who deal in good faith with the donee of a power which is expressed to be irrevocable and to be given by way of security. Such persons are entitled to assume (unless they know the contrary) that the power cannot be revoked except by the donor acting with the consent of the donee, and that it has not been revoked in this way.<sup>27</sup>

The Enduring Powers of Attorney Act 1985<sup>28</sup> makes provision for powers of attorney executed in a prescribed form and expressed to continue in spite of the donor's supervening mental incapacity.<sup>29</sup> To create such an "enduring power" the donor need only have the capacity to understand the act of conferring authority on the donee: it is not necessary for the donor to have the mental capacity of managing his or her own affairs.<sup>30</sup> An enduring power is not revoked by the supervening incapacity of the donor,<sup>31</sup> but when such incapacity occurs the power is, in effect, suspended<sup>32</sup> until it is registered by the court.<sup>33</sup> Once an enduring power has been registered, it can no longer be revoked by the donor of the power; it can be revoked only with the consent of the court.<sup>34</sup> The Act further protects the donee of the power and third parties in a number of cases: if they act in good faith in ignorance of the donor's supervening mental incapacity<sup>35</sup>; if they act in good faith in pursuance of an instrument which is registered as an enduring power in spite of not being a valid power of attorney; if an enduring power is invalidly revoked (i.e. by the donor without the consent of the court); and if the instrument, though valid as a power of attorney, was not a valid enduring power though purporting to be one, and the power has been revoked by the donor's supervening mental incapacity.<sup>36</sup>

---

<sup>26</sup> s.4.

<sup>27</sup> s.5(3); special protection is provided for transferees under stock exchange transactions by s.6.

<sup>28</sup> Cretney and Lush, Enduring Powers of Attorney (4th ed.).

<sup>29</sup> s.2.

<sup>30</sup> Re K [1988] Ch. 310. For the burden of proof on this issue, see Re W (Enduring Power of Attorney) [2001] Ch. 609.

<sup>31</sup> s.1(1)(a).

<sup>32</sup> s.1(1)(b).

<sup>33</sup> Under s.6. Execution of a second power of attorney in favour of different donees from those named in the first is no bar to registration of the first: Re E (Enduring Power of Attorney) [2001] Ch. 364.

<sup>34</sup> ss.7(1)(a), 8(3).

<sup>35</sup> s.1(1)(c).

<sup>36</sup> s.9.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

PERFORMANCE

A PARTY who performs a contract in accordance with its terms is thereby discharged from his obligations under it. Such performance also normally entitles him to enforce the other party's undertakings. It is often possible to perform a contract vicariously, i.e. by procuring performance by a third party. The legal effects of failure to perform are complex: a discussion of them forms the bulk of this Chapter. Special rules govern the effects of failure to perform certain stipulations as to time.

SECTION 1. METHOD OF PERFORMANCE

1. When Performance is Due

The general rule is that performance is due without demand: a debtor must seek his creditor.<sup>1</sup> This rule can be varied by contrary agreement, by mercantile usage or by other rules of law. The first possibility is illustrated by a contract which provides for payment to be made "on demand." The effect of these words is that the debtor is not bound to pay before the demand is made,<sup>2</sup> and that normally he must pay within a reasonable time of receiving the demand.<sup>3</sup> The second possibility is illustrated by the rule that the holder of a bill of exchange is not entitled to payment unless he first presents the bill for payment.<sup>4</sup> A demand or notice of default may also have to be given where the party from whom performance is claimed cannot, without notice, reasonably be expected to know that performance is due. Thus "a landlord is not in breach of his covenant to repair [the demised premises<sup>5</sup>] until he has been given notice of the want of repair and a reasonable time has elapsed in which repair could have been carried out."<sup>6</sup> The third possibility is illustrated by a legislative provision by which a tenant under a long lease of a dwelling is not liable to make payment of rent under the lease unless the landlord has given him a notice relating to the payment.<sup>7</sup> In certain other cases, a demand or notice of default is also necessary to entitle the injured party to rescind,<sup>8</sup> though not to establish breach.

Where a contract provides that money is to be paid on, or by, a specified day, the debtor has the whole of that day to make the payment. The creditor cannot treat him as

---

<sup>1</sup> Walton v Mascall (1844) 13 M. & W. 452. cf. Carne v Debono [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1107.

<sup>2</sup> Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Alstonbridge Properties Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1474; Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] Q.B. 728 at 748–749. For the possibility of the debtor's waiving a contractual requirement of a "demand" (and so of acquiring rights, by virtue of a payment without the demand against a co-debtor), see Stimson v Smith [1999] Ch. 340, above, p.574.

<sup>3</sup> Toms v Wilson (1862) 4 B. & S. 442; Bank of Baroda v Panessar [1987] Ch. 335. If the debtor has made it clear that he cannot or will not pay, he will be in default as soon as the demand is made: Sheppard & Cooper Ltd v TSB Bank [1996] 2 All E.R. 654.

<sup>4</sup> Bills of Exchange Act 1882, ss.41(1)(a), 40(1).

<sup>5</sup> British Telecommunications plc v Sun Life Assurance Society plc [1996] Ch. 69 at 74 (where the want of repair was in another part of the building, so that the landlord was in immediate breach as soon as the want of repair occurred).

<sup>6</sup> Calabar Properties Ltd v Stitcher [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287 at 298.

<sup>7</sup> Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, s.166.

<sup>8</sup> See below, pp.779–780, 829–830.

in default before the end of that day (i.e. before midnight) merely because the bank at which payment was, under the contract, to be made had already closed.<sup>9</sup> As a practical matter, the debtor therefore cannot be treated as in default until the day following that specified in the contract.

2. Tender

A tender of money is ineffective unless the money is actually produced, or unless production is dispensed with by the creditor.<sup>10</sup> It will not do for the debtor to offer to pay and then simply to put his hand in his pocket.<sup>11</sup> Tender of part of a debt is bad.<sup>12</sup> Conversely, tender of too large a sum, requiring change, is bad, as this might put an unreasonable burden on the creditor.<sup>13</sup>

Tender of goods due under a contract of sale must be made at a reasonable hour; what is a reasonable hour is a question of fact.<sup>14</sup>

Where a bad tender is rejected and is, within the time fixed for performance, followed by a good tender, the latter must generally be accepted.<sup>15</sup> But if the first tender amounts to a repudiation of the contract, the injured party can treat the contract as discharged,<sup>16</sup> and if he does so he will not be bound to accept the second tender.

3. Payment by Cheque or Credit Card

There is a presumption that payment by cheque or negotiable<sup>17</sup> security operates only as conditional payment: that is, the payer is not discharged until the cheque or security is honoured.<sup>18</sup> During the currency of the security, the creditor impliedly undertakes not to sue on the original debt.<sup>19</sup> But the presumption of conditional payment can be rebutted by proof of contrary intention i.e. by showing that the creditor had accepted the security unconditionally in payment of the debt.<sup>20</sup> The presumption that payment is merely conditional does not apply where a customer pays for goods or services by use of a charge or credit card. Use by the customer of such a card discharges his obligations under the contract with the supplier and makes the customer liable to reimburse the card

<sup>9</sup> The Lutetian [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 140; The Afovos [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195.

<sup>10</sup> Farquharson v Pearl Insurance Co Ltd [1937] 3 All E.R. 124.

<sup>11</sup> Finch v Brook (1834) 1 Bing.N.C. 253.

<sup>12</sup> Dixon v Clark (1847) 5 C.B. 365.

<sup>13</sup> Betterbee v Davis (1811) 3 Camp. 70; Robinson v Cook (1815) 6 Taunt. 336.

<sup>14</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.29(5).

<sup>15</sup> Tetley v Shand (1871) 25 L.T. 658; cf. Borrowman Phillips & Co v Free & Hollis (1878) 4 Q.B.D. 500; McDougall v Aeromarine of Emsworth [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1126 at 1132; Agricultores Federados Argentinos v Ampro S.A [1965] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 157; Getreide Import Gesellschaft mbH v Itoh & Co (America) Ltd [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 592; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v J H Rayner & Co [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 216 at 224–229; The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 186; The Niizura [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 66 at 70; Apps, [1994] L.M.C.L.Q. 525.

<sup>16</sup> See below, p.860.

<sup>17</sup> Cheques are now rarely negotiable: above, p.691.

<sup>18</sup> Once it is honoured, payment is taken to have been made when the cheque was received: Homes v Smith [2000] Lloyd's Rep. Bank. 139.

<sup>19</sup> Sayer v Wagstaff (1844) 14 L.J.Ch. 116; Re Romer & Haslam [1893] 2 Q.B. 286; cf. Maran Road Saw Mill v Austin Taylor & Co Ltd [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 156 and EDF Man v Nigerian Sweets & Confectionery Co [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 50 (payment by letter of credit). Payment by direct debit has been treated as equivalent to payment by cheque, at least for the purpose of set-off: Esso Petroleum Ltd v Milton [1997] 1 W.L.R. 938. In DPP v Turner [1974] A.C. 357 at 367–368, and Jameson v CEBG [2000] 1 A.C. 455 at 478 it is suggested that giving a cheque amounts to payment but that the debt revives if the cheque is not met. However, in Sayer v Wagstaff (above) "payment" was held to have taken place when the promissory note was paid, not when it was given.

<sup>20</sup> Sard v Rhodes (1836) 1 M. & W. 153.

issuing company in accordance with the contract between these two parties. If the company should fail to pay the supplier (e.g. because it has become insolvent) the supplier's sole remedy is against the company.<sup>21</sup> He cannot claim the price from the customer; for to allow him to do so would make the customer liable to immediate full payment in cash for the goods or services supplied and so impose on him an obligation substantially more onerous than that to which he agreed when contracting with the supplier on the terms that payment was to be made by means of the card.

4. Alternatives<sup>22</sup>

A contract may provide for performance in one of several ways without stating which party is to have the power of choosing between them. In Reed v Kilburn Co-operative Society<sup>23</sup> the claimant lent £50 to the defendants at six per cent per annum "for six or nine months". The period of the loan was held to depend on the choice of the borrower. One reason given was that "the alternative was put in for the benefit of the borrower".<sup>24</sup> On this view the result could vary with the state of the market: the alternative might be for the benefit of the borrower if interest rates were thought likely to rise and for that of the lender if they were thought likely to fall. But this is not the law: the choice is always the borrower's, unless the contract expressly provides the contrary. Another reason given was that "the option is in the party who is to do the first act; here the borrower is to do the first act by paying".<sup>25</sup> But this test would not satisfactorily solve all cases. Quain J. during the argument said: "A lease for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, without saying at whose option, is at the option of the lessee."<sup>26</sup> Yet before one knows whose the option is, it is impossible to tell who is to do the first act, i.e. whether landlord or tenant must give notice of termination. No general rule is satisfactory where parties make such obscure contracts. One can only deal with the problem by laying down arbitrary rules in particular cases.<sup>27</sup>

SECTION 2. VICARIOUS PERFORMANCE

A contract may be performed by a third party on behalf of the debtor. The legal effects of such performance depend on whether it is made (or tendered) with or without the creditor's consent.

1. With the Creditor's Consent

If the creditor agrees to accept<sup>27a</sup> performance by a third party, such performance can discharge the contract, even though it is not the same as that stipulated for in the contract. In Hirachand Punamchand v Temple<sup>28</sup> a debt was held to have been discharged when the creditor accepted a smaller sum from the debtor's father in full settlement. Payment by a third party will, however, discharge the debtor only if it was made by the

<sup>21</sup> Re Charge Card Services Ltd [1989] Ch. 497; cf. Richardson v Worrall [1985] S.T.C. 693 at 717, 720; Customs & Excise Commissioners v Diners Club Ltd [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1196 at 1205–1206 rejecting the argument that the debt is not extinguished but assigned to the card-issuing company.

<sup>22</sup> cf. below, p.892.

<sup>23</sup> (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 264; cf. Price v Nixon (1813) 5 Taunt. 338.

<sup>24</sup> (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 264 at 265.

<sup>25</sup> ibid. at 264.

<sup>26</sup> ibid. at 265.

<sup>27</sup> cf. Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.).

<sup>27a</sup> See Customs & Excise Commissioners v National Westminster Bank plc [2002] EWHC 2204, [2003] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 327.

<sup>28</sup> [1911] 2 K.B. 330; above, p.129.

third party on behalf of the debtor and with the intention of discharging him. These requirements are illustrated by a case<sup>29</sup> in which a company made an ex gratia payment to a person who had been defrauded by its secretary. The victim of the fraud was nevertheless entitled to claim the whole of his loss from the secretary, since the company's payment was not made on the secretary's behalf. Similarly, part-payment by one of two persons who are both liable for a debt will not discharge the other, since it will be presumed to have been made on account of his own and not of his co-debtor's liability.<sup>30</sup> It is an open question whether the debt is discharged if payment by a third party is made without the knowledge or consent of the debtor.<sup>31</sup> Some dicta support the view that the debt is discharged<sup>32</sup>; and this consequence clearly results if the debtor adopts or ratifies the payment.<sup>33</sup> But if, before he has done so, the transaction between creditor and third party is cancelled and the payment is returned to the third party, there is no discharge<sup>34</sup>; nor will the payment discharge the debt if the third party made it in the mistaken belief (however genuine<sup>35</sup>) that he was authorised by the debtor to pay the debt on his behalf.<sup>36</sup> It follows that, where a bank without its customer's authority or ratification pays the customer's debt, then the debt is not discharged; nor is the bank entitled to debit the customer's account with the amount of the payment.<sup>37</sup>

The cases on this subject all concern the payment of debts; but presumably the same principles apply where a creditor agrees to accept vicarious performance of some other obligation, e.g. of one to deliver goods.

2. Without the Creditor's Consent

A creditor cannot object to vicarious performance where he is not prejudiced by the fact that the debtor does not perform personally. Thus a tradesman, to whom money is owed for goods, cannot object if the debtor procures full payment in cash to be made on his behalf by a third party. The same is often true of obligations to do something other than pay cash. Thus in British Waggon Co v Lea & Co<sup>38</sup> it was held that a contract to let out railway wagons and to keep them in repair for seven years could be vicariously performed: it did not matter to the hirer who kept the wagons in repair so long as the work was efficiently done by someone.

But a creditor may be entitled to object to vicarious performance either on account of the nature of the contract or because of its terms.

(1) Nature of the contract

When a contract is "personal" in the sense that one party relies on the skill and judgment of the other, the latter must perform personally. Thus duties under a contract

<sup>29</sup> Re Rome [1904] 2 K.B. 483; Pacific Associates Inc v Baxter [1990] 1 Q.B. 993 at 1033–1034.

<sup>30</sup> Jones v Broadhurst (1850) 9 C.B. 173; Cook v Lister (1863) 13 C.B. (N.S.) 543 at 594; Kemp v Balls (1854) 10 Ex. 607.

<sup>31</sup> See generally Beatson, The Use and Abuse of Unjust Enrichment, Chap.7.

<sup>32</sup> Cook v Lister (1863) 13 C.B. (N.S.) 543 at 594; contrast Guardian Ocean Cargoes Ltd v Banco do Brasil S.A [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 68 at 88, affirmed [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 152. A theoretical objection might be based on the doctrine of privity but it is submitted that cases of the present kind fall outside the scope of that doctrine as properly understood: see above, p.559. For the possible application of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 to cases of this kind, see above, p.118.

<sup>33</sup> See Walter v James (1871) 1 L.R. 6 Ex. 124 at 127.

<sup>34</sup> This was the position in Walter v James itself; cf. above, p.726.

<sup>35</sup> Crantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank plc [2000] Q.B. 917.

<sup>36</sup> Barclays Bank Ltd v W J Simms Son & Co (Southern) Ltd [1980] Q.B. 677. Contrast Lloyds Bank plc v Independent Insurance Ltd [2000] Q.B. 110, where the payment was authorised.

<sup>37</sup> Crantrave Ltd v Lloyds Bank plc [2000] Q.B. 917.

<sup>38</sup> (1880) 5 Q.B.11. 149; cf. Phillips v Alhambra Palace Co [1901] 1 Q.B. 59.

of service cannot be vicariously performed; an estate agent who has been instructed to find a purchaser for a house cannot perform vicariously, since he "holds a position of discretion and trust"<sup>39</sup>; a contract under which building operations are to be supervised by an architect whose work is known to the client cannot be vicariously performed<sup>40</sup>; a person who agrees to store another's goods must perform personally, since the owner of the goods relies on his skill and integrity<sup>41</sup>; a person who enters into a promotion contract with a professional boxer cannot require the boxer to accept performance from a person to whom the promoter has purported to assign the benefit and burden of the contract<sup>42</sup>; and a shipowner must perform a charterparty personally in the sense that he cannot require the charterer to accept performance from a third party to whom the ship has been sold.<sup>43</sup> There are cases in which even a contract for the sale of goods must be personally performed by the seller, e.g. if the goods are to be manufactured by the seller and the buyer has relied on the seller's skill as a manufacturer<sup>44</sup> or if the buyer has in some other way relied on the personal integrity of the seller.<sup>45</sup> Perhaps the most extreme case is Robson v Drummond,<sup>46</sup> where it was held that a person who had agreed to keep a carriage in repair for five years and to paint it from time to time was not entitled to delegate performance of the contract to his partner.

(2) Terms of contract

It is obvious that a contract must be personally performed if it expressly so provides. A contract may also contain terms which impliedly rule out vicarious performance. In Davies v Collins<sup>47</sup> the defendant accepted a uniform for cleaning under a contract which provided: "Whilst every care is exercised in cleaning . . . garments, all orders are accepted at owners' risk." It was held that the defendant had broken the contract by sending the uniform to be cleaned by a sub-contractor (who had lost it); for the words "whilst every care is exercised in cleaning . . ." were inconsistent with the right to perform the cleaning operation vicariously. If however, the uniform had been properly cleaned, and returned, by the sub-contractor, the owner would not have been prejudiced by the fact of vicarious performance, and it is submitted that he should have been liable to make at any rate some payment.<sup>48</sup> Lord Greene M.R. said that the clause did not preclude every kind of sub-contracting: the cleaner might have employed a sub-contractor to perform some purely ancillary service, such as returning the uniform to the customer. It is arguable that the clause precluded only vicarious performance of the duty to take care of the goods, and that, so long as that duty remained unbroken, the owner was liable to pay the cleaning charges.

<sup>39</sup> John McCann & Co v Pow [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1643 at 1647; cf. above, p.747.

<sup>40</sup> Southway Group v Wolff (1991) 57 Build L.R. 33.

<sup>41</sup> Edwards v Newland [1950] 2 K.B. 534.

<sup>42</sup> Don King Productions Inc v Warren [2000] Ch. 291 at 335–336; the contract in this case was not assignable: see above, pp.693, 695.

<sup>43</sup> Fratelli Sorrentino v Buerger [1915] 3 K.B. 367 at 370, but that case shows that the charterer cannot object if, notwithstanding the sale, the shipowner can still perform personally, i.e. if he retains the control and management of the ship during the chartered period or voyage; cf. Humble v Hunter (1842) 12 Q.B. 310; above, p.728.

<sup>44</sup> Johnson v Raylton, Dixon & Co (1881) 7 Q.B.D. 438.

<sup>45</sup> Dr Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co Ltd v Walker & Sons (1897) 77 L.T. 180.

<sup>46</sup> (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 303.

<sup>47</sup> [1945] 1 All E.R. 247; cf. Kollerich & Cie SA v The State Trading Co of India [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 32; and see above, p.230.

<sup>48</sup> cf. below, p.820.

3. Vicarious Performance Distinguished from Assignment

The factors which determine whether a contract can be vicariously performed closely resemble those which determine whether the benefit of a "personal" contract is assignable.<sup>49</sup> For this reason, vicarious performance is sometimes called assignment of liabilities; but this is (as already noted) a concept which is not recognised by the common law.<sup>50</sup> Where vicarious performance is permitted no liability is transferred; the original debtor remains liable for the due performance of his obligations under the contract; and the sub-contractor does not at common law become liable in contract to the creditor.<sup>51</sup> In Stewart v Reavell's Garage<sup>52</sup> the owner of a 1929 Bentley motor-car took it to the defendants' garage to have the brakes relined. At the defendants' suggestion, the owner agreed that the work should be done by a sub-contractor, who did it so badly that the brakes failed, and the owner was injured. The defendants were clearly entitled to perform vicariously, as the owner had agreed to their doing so. But they were nonetheless held liable for the sub-contractor's defective workmanship: their liability was not transferred. Nor did the sub-contractor incur any contractual liability to the owner. He might have been liable to the owner in tort for doing the work negligently<sup>53</sup> but he would not have been liable to the owner in contract, had he failed to do the work at all. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999,<sup>54</sup> makes it possible to draw up the sub-contract in such a way as to confer rights against the sub-contractor on the creditor; but even if this is done, the debtor will not be relieved from his liability to the creditor under the main contract.

The above discussion is based on the assumption that a contract contains an undertaking by A to B for the provision of some service and that the contract permits A to delegate the performance of the service to C. It is, however, also possible for A's undertaking to be, not one that he will render the service, but one that he will arrange for it to be rendered by another person (C) as his agent.<sup>55</sup> In that case, A's duty is merely to exercise reasonable care and skill in selecting the agent<sup>56</sup>; and if he performs that duty he will not (at common law<sup>57</sup>) be liable to B for defects in C's performance. Such a case is not one of vicarious performance at all: A will have personally performed the only duty which the contract imposed on him.

<sup>49</sup> See above, pp.693–695.

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.701.

<sup>51</sup> Unless the main contractor is the other party's agent for the purpose of making a contract between him and the sub-contractor; above, p.747.

<sup>52</sup> [1952] 2 Q.B. 545; cf. Basildon DC v JE Lesser (Properties) Ltd [1985] Q.B. 839; The Superhulls Cover Case (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 431 at 445; Société Commerciale de Reassurance v ERAS International Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 596; Wong Mee Wan v Kwan Kim Travel Services Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 38.

<sup>53</sup> cf. Leahey Bros v Pope & Sons [1966] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 142; British Telecommunications plc v James Thomson & Sons (Engineers) Ltd [1999] 1 W.L.R. 9.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>55</sup> Wong Mee Wan v Kwan Kim Travel Services [1996] 1 W.L.R. 38, where the contract was not of this kind, and A was held liable for C's defective performance.

<sup>56</sup> Wong Mee Wan v Kwan Kim Travel Services Ltd, above; Rafatec Ltd v Eade [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 507 at 509. The same conclusion has been drawn where performance required specialist skills which A could not reasonably be expected to have: see Investors in Industry Commercial Property Ltd v Bedfordshire CC [1986] 1 All E.R. 787 at 807 (not reported on this point in [1986] Q.B. 1034); for a similar rule where the defendant's only liability to the claimant is in tort for negligence, see D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177 at 209 (the claim for the "trivial sum" of £50 in respect of damage to carpets). cf. Aiken v Stewart Wrightson Members Agency Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1281.

<sup>57</sup> For a legislative exception, see Package Travel, Package Holidays and Package Tours Regulations 1992 (SI 1992/3228), reg.15(1).

SECTION 3. RESCISSION FOR FAILURE TO PERFORM<sup>58</sup>

1. Introduction

(1) Terminology

Failure to perform may (and often will) amount to breach of contract. Where this is the case the injured party can bring actions either for the specific enforcement of the contract, or for damages.<sup>59</sup> In such actions, the injured party seeks to be put (either actually or so far as money can do it) into the position in which he would have been if the contract had been performed. But he may also resort to another group of remedies, the object of which is to put him into the position in which he would have been, if the contract had not been made. These remedies are based on failure in performance rather than on breach,<sup>60</sup> so that they may be available even though the failure does not amount to a breach because there is some lawful excuse<sup>61</sup> for it. Where there is no breach, these remedies are, moreover, the only ones available to the “injured party”; it will be convenient to use this expression to refer to any party who by reason of a failure in performance (whether excused or not) does not get what he bargained for. One special excuse for non-performance arises where supervening events so fundamentally disrupt performance of the contract as to bring it automatically to an end under the doctrine of frustration. This doctrine is discussed in Chapter 20; our present concern is with cases in which the failure in performance is not such as to frustrate the contract.<sup>62</sup> In cases of this kind, a number of remedies are available to an injured party who wishes to “undo” rather than to “enforce” the contract. One such remedy is a simple refusal by the injured party to perform his own promise, e.g. he may refuse to pay for work on the ground that it was defectively done. This remedy is often combined with a refusal to accept further performance from the other party on account of a defect in the performance so far rendered, e.g. with a refusal to accept further deliveries under an instalment contract on the ground that one or more of the deliveries so far made are defective. Alternatively, the injured party may wish to undo the transaction by returning the defective performance and claiming back the consideration which he provided for it, e.g. he may return defective goods and sue for recovery of the money which he had paid for them.<sup>63</sup>

<sup>58</sup> Devlin [1966] C.L.J. 192; Reynolds, 79 L.Q.R. 534; Shea, 42 M.L.R. 623.

<sup>59</sup> See below, Chap.21, Sections 1 to 3.

<sup>60</sup> e.g. in The Kathleen (1874) L.R. 4 A. & E. 269, and in Poussard v Spiers (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410; below, pp.775, 776, 783. In Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187 at 1199, Lord Denning M.R. suggests that one party's “unfair conduct,” not amounting even to non-performance (let alone to breach), justifies the other's refusal to perform; but acceptance of this view could lead to great uncertainty. cf. Lord Denning's view in Western Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp [1978] Q.B. 761 at 770 that for the purpose of constructive dismissal the test of “unreasonable conduct” would be “too indefinite by far.”

<sup>61</sup> See below, pp.835–838.

<sup>62</sup> In The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689, at [82] reference is made to the test formulated by Diplock L.J. in the Hong Kong Fir case [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 65 for the purpose of determining whether an event is sufficiently serious to “discharge one of the parties from further performance of his undertakings” (italics supplied). This test is discussed at pp.791 and 795, below; in The Great Peace, above, it is said to be “applicable alike to both frustration and to fundamental breach”. But it is, with respect, submitted that an event may be sufficiently serious to satisfy Diplock L.J.'s test without frustrating the contract: e.g. on facts such as those of Poussard v Spiers (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410, below, p.775. This point is reflected in Diplock L.J.'s reference, above, to an event which discharges only “one of the parties” (and does so only at that party's election: below, p.844) while a frustrating event automatically discharges both parties: below, pp.893, 909. There is no reference in Blackburn J.'s judgment in Poussard v Spiers, above, to his earlier judgment in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B. & S. 826, below, p.866, in which he laid the foundations of what is now known as the doctrine of frustration.

<sup>63</sup> This remedy is more fully discussed in Chap.21: below, pp.1049–1056.

The first difficulty in discussing this subject is the terminological one of finding a suitable word or phrase to refer to the remedies just described. For this purpose, the courts<sup>64</sup> (and contractual draftsmen<sup>65</sup>) have commonly used words such as "rescission" and "termination". This traditional terminology has attracted judicial criticism. In the Photo Production case, Lord Wilberforce said that the use of "rescission" in this sense "may lead to confusion"<sup>66</sup>; and Lord Diplock described the usage as "misleading" unless it was borne in mind that, in cases of breach, such rescission did not deprive the injured party of his right to claim damages for the breach.<sup>67</sup> The Sale of Goods Act 1979 avoids this difficulty by referring to a buyer's "right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated".<sup>68</sup> But even this language is inappropriate where the failure in performance does not amount to a breach; and Devlin J. has described the buyer's right to reject as being "merely a particular form of the right to rescind".<sup>69</sup> The Sale of Goods Act itself, moreover, refers to a contract of sale as being "rescinded" by the seller on account of the buyer's breach; and it meets the point made by Lord Diplock by going on to provide that the rescission is "without prejudice to any claim the seller may have for damages".<sup>70</sup> Recent amendments to the Act likewise refer to the right of a buyer who deals as consumer to "rescind" the contract for breach of an express term and of certain implied conditions<sup>71</sup>; and judges<sup>72</sup> (including Lord Diplock)<sup>73</sup> have continued to use the same terminology since the Photo Production case. This usage is certainly more convenient than the somewhat clumsy circumlocution of "treating a contract as repudiated (or discharged) for breach (or excused non-performance)." In the following discussion we shall therefore continue to use the term "rescission" to refer to the remedies described above, bearing in mind that such rescission does not deprive the injured party of his claim for damages where the failure in performance amounts to a breach. In this respect rescission for breach differs fundamentally from rescission for misrepresentation, discussed in Chapter 9.<sup>74</sup>

(2) Policy Considerations

The law governing the right to rescind for failure in performance is complex and difficult; and in this it reflects the difficulty which the courts have experienced in

<sup>64</sup> e.g. McDougall v Aeromarine of Emsworth Ltd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1126 at 1134; The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 44 at 66; Buckland v Farmar & Moody [1979] 1 W.L.R. 221 at 231–232; Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 392–393; Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574 at 577, 600; cf. Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 468 ("determination").

<sup>65</sup> See, for example, the terms of the contracts in Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 227, Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129 and the Stocznia case, above.

<sup>66</sup> Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 844; cf. an earlier criticism in Heyman v Darwins Ltd [1942] A.C. 356 at 399.

<sup>67</sup> [1980] A.C. 827, 851; below, p.851.

<sup>68</sup> ss.11(3), 11(4) and 61(1) (definition of "warranty").

<sup>69</sup> Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders Ltd [1954] Q.B. 459 at 480.

<sup>70</sup> s.48(4).

<sup>71</sup> ss.48A(2)(b)(ii), 48C and 48F, as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045, reg.5; similar provisions are inserted by reg.9 into the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982.

<sup>72</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 719, 723, 724; The Cleon [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 587 at 590; The TFL Prosperity [1984] 1 W.L.R. 48 at 58; Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch. 457 at 482; Shine v General Guarabovce Corp [1988] 1 All E.R. 911 at 916; Nova Petroleum etc v Tricon Trading Ltd [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 312 at 315; Barber v NSW Bank [1996] 1 W.L.R. 641 at 646, 647; Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574 at 584.

<sup>73</sup> The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 702; Gill & Duffus SA v Berger Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 390, 391; Metro Meat Ltd v Fares Rural Co Pty Ltd [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 13 at 17.

<sup>74</sup> See above, pp.369–377, especially at 370.

balancing or reconciling the conflicting interests of the parties in respectively seeking, and resisting, the remedy of rescission.<sup>75</sup>

The interests of the injured party in seeking rescission may be grouped under three heads. First, rescission will be his only remedy where the failure in performance is not a breach. Secondly, rescission may, even where the failure is a breach, lead to a result which is more favourable to the injured party in monetary terms than a claim for damages. This will be true where the contract would have been a bad bargain for the injured party even if it had been duly performed<sup>76</sup>; and also where the loss or injury which he suffers is one for which he might not recover damages in an action for breach of contract: for example, if his loss (or part of it) is irrecoverable because it is too remote.<sup>77</sup> Thirdly, the injured party may, by rescinding, get a quicker and more efficacious remedy. A buyer who has not yet paid for defective goods will often prefer to “rescind” (in the sense of rejecting the goods and refusing to pay) than to perform his side of the bargain and be left to pursue a claim for damages. By rescinding he avoids the delays of litigation, and the risk that the seller’s credit may fail. Even if he has already paid, an action for the return of the payment is in many ways more convenient than one for damages. It is an action for a liquidated sum, which avoids many of the difficulties (such as quantification, mitigation and causation) which can arise in an action for damages.<sup>78</sup>

On the other hand, the party who fails to perform in accordance with the contract may have equally strong interests in resisting rescission. He may have incurred expenses in the course of performance, for example by paying commission on a sale or by transporting goods to a distant place; and these expenses will be thrown away if the contract is rescinded. He may, in addition, have conferred benefits on the injured party who may be unjustly enriched by being allowed to rescind: rescission of partly performed building contracts may, for example, produce this result.<sup>79</sup> And he may suffer hardship if the injured party is allowed to rescind on a falling market: he may be left with goods whose value has diminished by an amount far in excess of the loss which the defect in his performance would have caused to the injured party.

In balancing these conflicting interests, the courts have developed a number of rules and distinctions which prima facie determine the availability of rescission as a remedy for failure to perform. Further rules specify that the right to rescind, even where it is prima facie available, may be limited or barred by certain supervening factors.

2. The Order of Performance

The order in which contracting parties must perform their respective obligations depends on the distinction between conditions precedent, concurrent conditions, and independent promises. Somewhat confusingly, English law also uses the expression “condition” in rules which deal with the conformity of one party’s performance with that promised (as opposed to the order in which the two performances must be rendered). This usage, and the distinction between these two senses of “condition,” are discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>80</sup>

<sup>75</sup> Honnold, 97 U. of Pa.L.Rev. 457.

<sup>76</sup> e.g. if he has agreed to pay £100 for something which would, because of a later fall in the market, be worth only £50 on delivery even if there had been no breach. This is a constantly recurring problem: see below, pp.777, 778, 787, 793–794, 794, 796, 809, n.31.

<sup>77</sup> See below, pp.965–974.

<sup>78</sup> See below, pp.944–965, 974–982.

<sup>79</sup> See below, pp.759–760.

<sup>80</sup> See below, pp.788–805, especially at pp.788–789.

(1) Condition precedent

Performance by one party, A, is a condition precedent to the liability of the other, B, when A has to perform before B's liability accrues. This will most obviously be the case if the contract expressly provides that A's act is to be done before B's.<sup>81</sup> Thus if A agrees to work for B at a weekly wage payable in arrear, B need not pay A until A has done a week's work.<sup>82</sup> Performance by A may also be a condition precedent to the liability of B even though the contract does not expressly state the order in which the two acts are to be done. In Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co<sup>83</sup> A bought steel from B to be paid for by "cash against shipping documents from a confirmed credit to be opened by" an American company (to whom A had resold) in favour of B. A undertook that the credit would be opened "forthwith". Performance by A of his undertaking to procure the letter of credit was regarded as a condition precedent to the liability of B although the order in which their acts were to be done was not expressly laid down in the contract. A knew that B could not get supplies of steel unless the credit was made available. Hence the nature of the contract made it clear that A was to perform before B became liable.

In Chapter 2 we distinguished between contingent and promissory conditions, and noted that "condition" was used to refer either to an event or to a term of a contract.<sup>84</sup> Our present concern is with conditions as events. In this sense, a contingent condition is an event which neither party undertakes to bring about and on which the existence of a contract, or the binding force of its principal obligations, depends. A promissory condition, on the other hand, refers to an event which one party is obliged by the contract to bring about. In the Trans Trust case, A argued that the opening of the credit was a condition of the former kind, so that A was not liable when his sub-buyer failed to open the credit. But the court rejected the argument and held A liable on the ground that the opening of the credit was not a condition precedent to the existence of the contract, but only a condition precedent to the liability of B. In other words, it was not a contingent, but a promissory condition. In its contingent sense, condition precedent is contrasted with condition subsequent. In its promissory sense (with which we are here concerned), condition precedent is contrasted with concurrent condition and independent promise: these concepts are discussed below.

The distinction between a contingent and a promissory condition turns on the question whether the agreement purports to impose on A an obligation to bring about the stipulated event.<sup>85</sup> For example, in one case A undertook to erect buildings on B's land, and B undertook, when A had done so, to grant a lease of the land to A. This was held not to be a (contingently) "conditional contract," but a case in which performance by A was a (promissory) condition precedent to the liability of B.<sup>86</sup> The position is similar where A contracts to buy a house from B and to pay a deposit. As A promised

<sup>81</sup> Société Générale de Paris v Milders (1883) 49 L.T. 55 at 59; cf. Pioneer Concrete (UK) Ltd v National Employers Mutual, etc. [1985] 2 All E.R. 395; Motor & General Insurance Co Ltd v Pavy [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 607 at 612; Kazakhstan Wool Processors (Europe) Ltd v Credietverzekering Madtschapping NV [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 708 at 720.

<sup>82</sup> Morton v Lamb (1797) 7 T.R. 125; Cresswell v Board of Inland Revenue [1984] I.C.R. 508; Miles v Wakefield MDC [1987] A.C. 539 at 561, 574; Wiluszynski v Timor Hamlets LBC [1989] I.C.R. 493, 498; see further p.821, below.

<sup>83</sup> [1952] 2 Q.B. 297. For a similar argument in a different context, see Films Rover International v Cannon Film Sales Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 670 at 684; for further proceedings see [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912. Contrast Clowes Development (UK) Ltd v Mulchinock [1998] 1 W.L.R. 42.

<sup>84</sup> See above, p.62; cf. below, p.788.

<sup>85</sup> cf. Albion Sugar Co Ltd v Williams Tankers Ltd [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 457 at 464; The Fanti and the Padre Island [1991] 2 A.C. 1 at 31.

<sup>86</sup> Eastham v Leigh, London & Provincial Properties Ltd [1971] 1 Ch. 871; cf. Michaels v Harley House (Marylebone) Ltd [1997] 1 W.L.R. 967.

to pay the deposit, that payment is not a contingent condition precedent to the existence of the contract<sup>87</sup> but a promissory condition precedent to the liability of B. If the deposit is not paid, B is, moreover, entitled to rescind the contract,<sup>88</sup> while A can be sued for the unpaid deposit, or for damages for failing to pay it.<sup>89</sup>

(2) Concurrent condition

The two performances are said to be concurrent conditions when the parties undertake to perform concurrently (or simultaneously). Thus in the case of a contract for the sale of goods delivery and payment are concurrent conditions: this means that the buyer cannot claim delivery unless he is ready and willing to pay, and the seller cannot claim the price unless he is ready and willing to deliver.<sup>90</sup> Of course this rule can be varied by contrary agreement: the seller may agree to give credit or the buyer to pay in advance. Similarly, under a charterparty, delivery of the goods by the shipowner and payment of the freight are (unless otherwise agreed<sup>91</sup>) concurrent conditions.<sup>92</sup>

(3) Independent promises

If promises are “independent” each party can enforce the other’s promise although he has not performed his own. The remedy of the party sued is not to withhold performance, but to make a counterclaim to enforce the promise of the party suing. In the old case of Pordage v Cole<sup>93</sup> a purchaser promised to pay a vendor “£775 for all his lands . . . the money to be paid before Midsummer.” In an action to recover the £775 it was held that the vendor need not aver conveyance or tender of conveyance. A contract for the sale of land would now generally require conveyance and payment to take place concurrently.<sup>94</sup> But a tenant’s covenant to pay rent and a landlord’s covenant to repair are still regarded as independent, so that the landlord is not entitled to refuse to perform his covenant to repair merely because the tenant is in arrears with his rent.<sup>95</sup> Similarly, in a separation deed the wife’s covenant not to molest her husband and the husband’s covenant to pay the wife an annuity are independent unless the deed otherwise provides: breach of the wife’s covenant is therefore no answer to an action by her for the annuity.<sup>96</sup> And where goods carried on a chartered ship are damaged as a result of the shipowner’s breach of the charterparty, before the time fixed for payment of freight, the charterer

<sup>87</sup> Michael Richards Properties Ltd v St Saviour’s Parish [1975] 3 All E.R. 416 at 420; Portara Shipping Co v Gulf Pacifica Navigation Co Ltd [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 180 at 184; Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422; The Blankenstein [1985] 1 W.L.R. 435. These authorities reject the contrary view stated in Myton Ltd v Schwab-Morris [1974] 1 W.L.R. 326 at 330.

<sup>88</sup> Myton Ltd v Schwab-Morris [1974] 1 W.L.R. 326 at 331, below, p.774. The contract may require B to give notice of termination before he is entitled to rescind, as in Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 (where this requirement was not satisfied).

<sup>89</sup> See below, pp.852, 1011–1012.

<sup>90</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.28; Morton v Lamb (1797) 7 T.R. 125.

<sup>91</sup> e.g. The Karin Vatis [1988] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 330.

<sup>92</sup> Paynter v James (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 348 at 355; cf. Stanton v Richardson (1872) L.R. 7 C.P. 421 at 433 (affirmed 45 L.J.Q.B. 78); The Posidon [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 697.

<sup>93</sup> (1669) 1 Wms.Saund. 319; cf. Campbell v Jones (1796) 6 T.R. 570; Christie v Borelly (1860) 29 L.J. Ch. 153; Leiston Gas Co v Leiston cum Sizewell Urban DC [1916] 2 K.B. 428 at 434 (“independent contract”).

<sup>94</sup> But for this, Pordage v Cole would probably have been overruled long ago; it was said to “outrage common sense” as long ago as 1792, in Goodison v Nunn (1792) 4 T.R. 761 at 764.

<sup>95</sup> Taylor v Webb [1937] 2 K.B. 283 at 290 (reversed, ibid., on another ground which was disapproved in Regis Property Co Ltd v Dudley [1959] A.C. 370); cf. Johnstone v Milling (1886) 16 Q.B.D. 460 at 468; Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 290; The Aegnoussiotis [1977] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 268 at 276; Yorbrook Investments Ltd v Batten (1986) P. & C.R. 51.

<sup>96</sup> Fearon v Aylesford (1884) 14 Q.B.D. 792.

must nevertheless make the payment when that time comes: his remedy is by way of a cross-action for damages.<sup>97</sup>

(4) Criteria for drawing the distinction

The distinction between conditions precedent, concurrent conditions and independent covenants is easily illustrated by reference to stereotyped situations, such as the employment, sale of goods and tenancy cases referred to in the preceding discussion. In those cases, the distinction is governed by well-settled rules, though these can be excluded by express or implied<sup>98</sup> agreement. But more difficulty arises in drawing the distinction in cases of first impression which fall outside these stereotyped situations. For this purpose the courts have regard to certain policy considerations, though these can be displaced by evidence of the intention of the parties.

The effect of holding promises to be independent is to expose each party to the risk of having to perform without any security for the performance of the other; the effect of holding performance by one party to be a condition precedent is to expose that party to the same risk. To reduce the first of these risks, the courts have long been reluctant to classify promises as independent<sup>99</sup> unless the intention of the parties to that effect was clear. Both risks would be eliminated if the two performances were held to be concurrent conditions; and for this reason the law should, in doubtful cases, favour such a classification whenever simultaneous performance by both parties is possible.<sup>1</sup> In a contract between a commercial seller or supplier and a consumer, a term which has not been individually negotiated and which makes the consumer's undertaking, (e.g. to pay the agreed price or charge) independent of the due performance of the other party's obligations is prima facie unfair under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999,<sup>2</sup> and if it is actually unfair it will not bind the consumer.<sup>3</sup>

Where simultaneous performance is not possible (as in the case of contracts to do work over a period of time) performance by one party must necessarily be a condition precedent to the liability of the other. Which party has to perform first depends on their relative bargaining power and on the court's view (right or wrong) as to which of them is more likely to default after the other has performed. These factors no doubt account for the general rule that work must precede pay.<sup>4</sup> The position of the person doing the work is in practice safeguarded by stipulating for interim payments, such as weekly or monthly remuneration under contracts of employment, or progress payments under building contracts.

Even where it is possible for the two performances to be rendered simultaneously, it does not follow that they should invariably be classified as concurrent conditions. There are, in particular, three situations in which it is more appropriate to classify promises as independent.

The first such situation arises where the promise which has not been performed is of only minor importance. This was the position in Huntoon Co v Kolynos (Inc),<sup>5</sup> where an agreement was made by which the claimants licensed the defendants to use a patent. By cl.7 the claimants undertook to prosecute all claims for infringement of the patent if

<sup>97</sup> See below, pp.785, 788, n.32; the rule applies even though the shipowner's breach was repudiatory: see The Dominique [1989] A.C. 1056 (not a case of damage but of delay).

<sup>98</sup> As in the Trans Trust case [1952] 2 Q.B. 297, above, p.762.

<sup>99</sup> See Kingston v Preston (1773) 1 Offt. 194; and Jones v Barkley (1781) 2 Dougl. 648 at 689.

<sup>1</sup> This is the view taken by the Restatement 2d, Contracts, §234(1); cf. ibid. §233(2).

<sup>2</sup> See above, pp.267–283; SI 1999/2083, reg.5(5) and Sch.2, para.1(o).

<sup>3</sup> reg.8(1).

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.762.

<sup>5</sup> [1930] 1 Ch. 528.

requested to do so by the defendants; while by cl.9 the defendants undertook to stamp the number of the patent on all articles incorporating it. It was held that cl.7 was an independent promise, so that, although the claimants were in breach of it, they could enforce cl.9. Lawrence L.J. said: "Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant . . . ." <sup>6</sup> Cl.7 might apply in relation to quite trivial, or only suspected, infringements: failure to prosecute claims for these would not substantially deprive the defendants of what they had bargained for.

The classification of promises as independent is, secondly, appropriate where the circumstances show that this was the intention of the parties. This was the position in The Odenfeld.<sup>7</sup> A charterparty provided that hire was to be assessed by a panel from time to time, but that, if it were assessed at less than some $3.50 per ton, this amount was nevertheless payable. However, the parties also agreed by a "side letter" that, if the amount assessed by the panel fell below the $3.50 per ton, any excess over the amount assessed was to be paid back by the shipowners to the charterers. The freight market having collapsed, the panel assessed the amount payable at $1.50 per ton, but the shipowners failed to perform their promise contained in the "side letter" to repay $2 per ton to the charterers. It was held that the "side letter" constituted an independent promise, so that its breach did not justify the charterers' refusal to perform their obligations under the charterparty. Kerr J. relied mainly on the way in which the transaction had been set up in two documents: this supported the view that the promises were "intended to be independent and not interdependent".<sup>8</sup>

Thirdly, promises may be classified as independent because of their commercial setting. This possibility arises where goods are sold for export on "c.i.f." terms, that is, for an inclusive price covering their cost, insurance and freight. Under such a contract the seller must ship goods that are in conformity with the contract and tender certain shipping documents to the buyer, while the buyer must pay the price on tender of the documents.<sup>9</sup> So long as the documents are in accordance with the contract, the buyer cannot refuse to pay against tender of those documents merely because the goods were not, when shipped, in conformity with the contract.<sup>10</sup> This is true even if the non-conformity of the goods is such that it would justify their rejection when the goods themselves (as opposed to the documents) later reach the buyer. The seller's undertaking with respect to the conformity of the goods can therefore be described as an independent promise in the sense that his failure to perform it does not prevent the buyer's duty to pay the price from arising on tender of documents. The buyer's remedies, in the case put, are to claim damages for the defects in the goods, or to reject them and reclaim the price if, on their arrival at the agreed destination, it turns out that they suffered, when they were shipped, from defects of a kind that justify their rejection.<sup>11</sup>

(5) Effects of the distinction

It follows from the nature of an independent promise that failure by one party (A) to perform such a promise does not justify rescission by the other party (B). The position

<sup>6</sup> ibid. at 558.

<sup>7</sup> [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357.

<sup>8</sup> [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357 at 371. He may also have been influenced by the fact that to hold the promises interdependent would have prejudiced a bank which had taken an assignment of the shipowner's rights under the charterparty without notice of the "side letter."

<sup>9</sup> See generally Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§19–072 to 19–076.

<sup>10</sup> Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382, more fully discussed in Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§19–158 to 19–161.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. from defects amounting to a breach of condition: see below, pp.788–805.

where A fails to perform a condition precedent or a concurrent condition is more complex: such a failure justifies B's refusal to perform for so long as the failure continues, but it does not, of itself, justify rescission in the sense of an outright refusal by B to perform, or to accept further performance from A. If A, an employee, fails to perform the condition precedent of doing the agreed work, his employer, B, is prima facie entitled to refuse to pay A so long as that failure continues; and B's refusal to pay may be justified even though he does not dismiss A.<sup>12</sup> But it does not follow that B is entitled to rescind (in the sense of dismissing A) merely on account of A's failure to perform: he would, for example, generally not be so entitled where A's failure was due to a relatively brief temporary illness.<sup>13</sup> Similarly, if A, a buyer of goods, fails to perform the concurrent condition of paying or tendering the price when due, the seller, B, is prima facie justified in withholding delivery; but it again does not follow that B is, merely on account of the failure, entitled to rescind the contract: he may, for example, still be bound to deliver if A tenders the price on the day after that fixed by the contract. In other words, A's failure to comply with a stipulation as to the order of performance which is a condition precedent or a concurrent condition justifies B's refusal to perform for as long as A's failure continues; but it does not, of itself, justify rescission.<sup>14</sup> It has the latter effect only where A's failure is (in accordance with the principles to be discussed later in this Chapter<sup>15</sup>) either sufficiently serious to justify rescission or such that it falls within one of the exceptions to the requirement of serious failure.

(6) Wrongful refusal to accept performance

(a) AS A GROUND OF RESCISSION. In general, A's failure to perform a condition precedent or a concurrent condition justifies a refusal by B to perform. But this rule is displaced if, before performance from A has become due, B has repudiated the contract by wrongfully refusing to accept performance (or indicating that he would do so) and A has rescinded the contract on account of that repudiation.

(i) Repudiation inducing victim's failure to perform. Suppose that a contract for the sale of goods provides that the goods are to be manufactured by A to B's order. If, before anything has, or should have been, done by A, B wrongfully repudiates the contract A is entitled to rescind; and, if he does so, two things follow: A need no longer manufacture the goods, and he can claim damages from B.<sup>16</sup> It would be pointless to require A to manufacture and tender the goods when the tender was virtually certain to be rejected. His inability to deliver the goods at the agreed time is not allowed to prejudice his rights against B as it was induced by B's wrongful repudiation; another way of putting the point is to say that B is estopped from relying on A's inability to perform.<sup>17</sup> A buyer is similarly not entitled to rely on the seller's failure to deliver where that failure was

<sup>12</sup> Wiluszynski v Tower Hamlets LBC [1989] I.C.R. 493. Ticehurst & Thompson v British Telecommunications [1992] I.C.R. 383.

<sup>13</sup> See below, pp.776, 875.

<sup>14</sup> cf. Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.10(1), below, p.766.

<sup>15</sup> See below, pp.769–811.

<sup>16</sup> e.g. Glencore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386, where a seller's refusal to load goods was justified by the buyer's refusal to operate the contractual payment mechanism unless unjustified demands by the buyer were met; cf. Grant v Cigman [1996] B.C.L.C. 24 (A's inability to perform induced by B's failure to co-operate). As to A's remedy in such cases, see The Odenfeld [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357, below, p.1018.

<sup>17</sup> The Simona [1989] A.C. 788 at 805–806. Foran v Wight (1989) 168 C.L.R. 385 is explicable on this relatively simple ground.

induced by the buyer's insistence on delivery at a place other than that specified by the contract.<sup>18</sup>

(ii) Victim's inability not induced by the repudiation. In the situations just described, it has been assumed that A could have performed, and would have done so, if B had not repudiated. But sometimes A can recover damages even though he cannot show that he would, but for B's repudiation, have been able to perform his part. In British and Beningtons Ltd v N W Cachar Tea Co Ltd<sup>19</sup> A sold tea to B who, before delivery was due, without justification stated that they would refuse to accept it. It was held that A was entitled to damages even though he could not show that he could have delivered the tea at the agreed time and place. B's wrongful refusal to accept was an anticipatory breach,<sup>20</sup> and, once this had been "accepted" by A so as to rescind the contract, later events affecting A's ability to perform did not deprive A of his right of action<sup>21</sup>; for, by rescinding the contract, A had been liberated from his duty of further performance.<sup>22</sup> The position would have been different if, at the time of B's refusal to accept, A had himself already committed a repudiatory breach,<sup>23</sup> for such a breach would have justified B's refusal. It is therefore crucial to determine which party committed the first breach,<sup>24</sup> whether that breach was repudiatory, and whether it was accepted by the other party so as to rescind the contract.

These questions are easy enough to formulate but they can raise difficult issues of fact and law where each party to a commercial dispute in good faith believes that he is acting in accordance with the contract, and that the other is not. The issue is further complicated by two rules. The first is that A is not necessarily in breach merely because he makes a defective tender; for it may be open to him to cure the defect by making a second (and good) tender within the time allowed for performance.<sup>25</sup> The second is that

<sup>18</sup> Bulk Oil (Zug) AG v Sun International Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 531 at 546.

<sup>19</sup> [1923] A.C. 48; cf. Cort v Ambergate Ry (1851) 7 Q.B. 127; Rightside Properties Ltd v Gray [1975] Ch. 72 at 87; Texaco Ltd v Eurogolf Shipping Co Ltd [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 541.

<sup>20</sup> See below, pp.857–865.

<sup>21</sup> See below, pp.863–864; Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co [1905] 2 K.B. 543, as explained in The Simona [1989] A.C. 788 at 805.

<sup>22</sup> Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 390; cf. MSC Mediterranean Shipping Co SA v BRE Melro Ltd [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 239 at 240; Glencore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 394–395; North Sea Energy Holdings NV v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 418 at 432, where the principle stated in the text above was held at first instance not to apply because the contract had become ineffective by reason of failure of a condition precedent, without default of the allegedly repudiating party, before acceptance of any repudiation by the other party; the decision was affirmed on appeal without further reference to the present point: [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483. Dawson, 96 L.Q.R. 239 argues that Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 is inconsistent with the explanation of the British and Beningtons case given in the text above. But the claim in the Citati case was made against the party alleged to be unable to perform (the charterer) while in the British and Beningtons case it was made by that party. Moreover, in the Citati case the charterer was already in breach (actual and anticipatory) at the time of the shipowner's refusal to perform while in the British and Beningtons case the sellers were not in breach at the time of the buyer's refusal. The crucial issue in the Citati case was simply whether the charterer's breach was sufficiently serious to justify the shipowner's rescission.

<sup>23</sup> i.e. one that satisfied the requirement of "substantial failure" (below, pp.769–778) or fell within an exception to that requirement (below, pp.778–811). In Braithwaite's case (above n.21) A had already shipped non-conforming goods before B's repudiation; but there are at least three possible reasons why this did not justify that repudiation: (1) A had not yet tendered the goods: Taylor v Oakes Runcorn & Co (1922) 38 T.L.R. 349 at 351 (affirmed ibid. at 517); (2) A still had the opportunity to cure the breach (below, at n.25) and was induced by B's repudiation not to make use of it: cf. below p.769 at n.42; (3) as the contract was on c.i.f. terms (see 74 L.J.K.B. 688 at 694) A's shipment of non-conforming goods was a breach only of an independent covenant and hence did not justify B's repudiation: above, p.765. See further Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§19–162 to 19–166.

<sup>24</sup> Glencore Grain case, above, n.18; cf. The Energy Progress [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 355 at 358.

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.754.

B is not necessarily in breach merely because, at the time of his refusal to accept A's performance, he gives an inadequate reason for the refusal, or none at all; for if he actually had a lawful excuse he can (in general) rely on it later even though he did not state it, or even know of it, at the time of his refusal to accept performance.<sup>26</sup>

(iii) Pre-rescission non-repudiatory breach by injured party. Before rescinding the contract on account of B's repudiation, A may himself have committed a breach, but one which did not justify B's repudiation, e.g. a breach of an independent promise.<sup>27</sup> Rescission by A does not affect his liability for that pre-rescission breach<sup>28</sup>; so that the damages to which A is entitled on account of B's wrongful repudiation will be reduced by those for which he is liable in respect of his own pre-rescission breach.<sup>29</sup> Those damages will prima facie be the amount by which A's breach reduces the value of his performance.<sup>30</sup>

(b) INJURED PARTY DOES NOT RESCIND. The reason for the rule that A may be entitled to damages for B's repudiation, without having to show that he could have performed, is that, when A accepts B's repudiation, he is liberated from his own duty to perform.<sup>31</sup> That reasoning obviously cannot apply where A does not accept the repudiation. In such a case, A continues to be bound by his own duties under the contract, so that his failure to perform these duties, even after B's repudiation, can (if not induced by B's repudiation<sup>32</sup>) amount to a breach by A. Such a breach will make A liable in damages,<sup>33</sup> and, if it is repudiatory,<sup>34</sup> it will also justify B's refusal to perform and so absolve B from liability in damages to A.<sup>35</sup>

Where A does not accept B's repudiation and then commits a breach which does not justify B's refusal to perform (e.g. because it is a breach of an independent promise<sup>36</sup>), A's breach will nevertheless be relevant to the damages to which A is entitled on account of B's repudiation. At the least, those damages will (as in the case where A has rescinded) be reduced by the damages for which A is liable by reason of his own breach, e.g. by the amount by which the value of goods delivered by A is reduced by reason of a defect in them. There are, moreover, circumstances in which, if A has not rescinded, B can rely on A's breach so as to reduce still further the damages for which B is liable by reason of his repudiation. This possibility arises where A's breach, though not originally of such a kind as to justify B's repudiation, later acquires that character. We have seen that, where goods are sold on c.i.f. terms, the buyer is not justified in refusing to pay against documents merely because the goods were not, when shipped, in conformity with the contract; but that such non-conformity may give him the right to reject the goods, a right that he will usually exercise when the goods arrive at the contractual destination and are actually delivered to him.<sup>37</sup> That stage is never reached if the seller rescinds on

<sup>26</sup> See below, p.836.

<sup>27</sup> See above, p.763.

<sup>28</sup> See below, p.851.

<sup>29</sup> Gill & Duffus S.A v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 390 (where "certification clause" in the contract excluded such liability).

<sup>30</sup> See below, p.950.

<sup>31</sup> See above, p.767.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.766.

<sup>33</sup> Regent OHG Aisenstadt und Barig v Francesco of Jermyn Street [1983] 3 All E.R. 327 at 335.

<sup>34</sup> In the sense described in n.23 at p.767, above.

<sup>35</sup> See The Simona [1989] A.C. 788, where A's failure was not a breach but justified cancellation under an express cancelling clause in the contract; Marston [1988] C.I.J. 340; Carter [1989] L.M.C.I.Q. 81.

<sup>36</sup> See above, p.763.

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.765.

the buyer's wrongful refusal to pay against documents<sup>38</sup>; but if the seller does not rescind, and the defect in the goods is such as to give the buyer the right to reject them on arrival, then the buyer will be able to argue that he would, even if he had duly paid against documents, have rejected the goods on arrival and so have become entitled to the return of the money that he ought to have paid at the earlier stage of tender of documents.<sup>39</sup> The effect of this argument is that the seller's damages will be merely nominal: he will have lost nothing but the worthless right to be paid a sum of money which he would (had it been paid) have later become liable to repay.<sup>40</sup> Such an argument is not, however, available to the buyer where it was still open to the seller to have cured his breach<sup>41</sup> and his failure to do so was induced by the buyer's wrongful repudiation.<sup>42</sup> If the seller's failure to cure was induced in this way, the buyer cannot rely on it in reduction of damages, any more than he can rely on the seller's original failure to perform (when so induced) on the issue of liability.<sup>43</sup>

(c) EVALUATION. The rule that A is entitled to rescind and to recover damages where his own inability to perform is induced by B's repudiation is generally regarded as uncontroversial. But there is dispute about the merit of the rule that A has the same rights where he could not have performed even if B had not repudiated and where his inability to perform was not in any way induced by B's conduct. This aspect of the rule can be criticised by saying that B is made liable in damages for merely saying that he will not perform, even though he may not thereby cause any prejudice to A.<sup>44</sup> On the other hand, B can avoid this hardship by simply waiting till A's performance is due: if it is not forthcoming at that time it is A, not B, who will be liable in damages; and any hardship that the rule may cause to B if he repudiates before that time is mitigated by the qualifications on its scope that have been stated above.<sup>45</sup> For these reasons, it does not seem that the rule causes undue prejudice to B. It can be justified on the ground that it promotes certainty by discouraging premature repudiation.

3. General Requirement of Substantial Failure

A party may comply with the rules as to the order of performance, just discussed, but his performance or tender may be deficient in quality or quantity or it may be late, i.e. after the agreed time. The general principle is that any such defect in performance must attain a certain minimum degree of seriousness to entitle the injured party to rescind. In

<sup>38</sup> As in Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382.

<sup>39</sup> See Henry Dean & Sons (Sydney) Ltd v O'Day Pty Ltd (1929) 39 C.L.R. 330 at 340, so far as it relates to the seller's claim; the disapproval of that decision in Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc, above, relates to the buyer's claim only; and in the Gill & Duffus case itself the House of Lords treated the seller's rescission as crucial to the success of his claim.

<sup>40</sup> cf. The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 641, below, p.779. An alternative view is that the seller's damages are nominal only if the defect makes the goods worthless: see Bunge Corp v Vegetable Vitamin Foods (Private) Ltd [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 613 at 620; but the buyer's case is not that the goods are worthless: it is that the seller's right to have them accepted is worthless because the buyer's option to reject them would certainly have been exercised.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.767 at n.25.

<sup>42</sup> This is one possible explanation of Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co [1905] 2 K.B. 543, above, p.767, n.21: cf. Sheffield v Gornran (1987) 22 Con L.R. 108.

<sup>43</sup> cf. above, pp.766–767.

<sup>44</sup> The rule does not seem to apply in the United States: see, for example Caporale v Rubine, 105 A. 226 (1918); Corbin on Contracts, §978; Williston on Contracts, §699; Farnsworth on Contracts (3rd ed.), §8.22.

<sup>45</sup> i.e. at nn.27–43, above.

the following discussion we shall refer to this principle as the requirement of "substantial failure" in performance. Our present concern is with the general principle; it is subject to many important exceptions which will be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>46</sup>

(1) Historical introduction

In Boone v Eyre<sup>47</sup> the plaintiff conveyed to the defendant a plantation in the West Indies, together with the slaves on it, for £500 plus an annuity of £160. He covenanted that he had good title to the plantation and that he was lawfully possessed of the slaves. He later sued for arrears of the annuity and was met by the plea that he was not lawfully possessed of the slaves. Lord Mansfield rejected the plea, saying: "Where mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions. But where they only go to a part, where a breach may be paid for in damages, there the defendant has a remedy on his covenant and shall not plead it as a condition precedent. If this plea were allowed any one negro not being the property of the plaintiff would be a bar to the action." In later cases, the contrast between the whole and a part of the consideration was not, however, taken quite literally. In Duke of St Albans v Shore<sup>48</sup> a contract was made for the sale of land with the timber on it. Before conveyance the vendor cut down a considerable part of the timber, and, on the purchaser's refusal to perform, sued him for the penalty payable under the contract on breach. The action failed for a number of reasons, one of which was that the timber might have been the chief inducement to the purchaser to enter into the contract. The fact that the timber formed only part of the consideration to be provided by the vendor was not decisive. Later dicta state that the plaintiff in Boone v Eyre would have lost if he had had no title to the land,<sup>49</sup> or if he had been lawfully possessed only of a single one of the slaves.<sup>50</sup> These discussions of Boone v Eyre, rather than the terms of the judgment in that case, may be considered to have established the requirement that a party who has only partly performed his obligations may nevertheless enforce the contract if the failure in performance does not "substantially" deprive the other party of what he bargained for.

(2) When failure is substantial

The question when a failure in performance "substantially" deprives a party of what he bargained for, or (as it is sometimes put) "frustrates" his purpose in making the contract gives rise to very great difficulty. The frequent references in the cases to breaches which "substantially" deprive a party of what he bargained for or "go to the root" of a contract are not particularly helpful in analysing the law or in predicting the course of future decisions. It is submitted that the courts, in applying the general requirement of substantial failure,<sup>51</sup> generally classify a failure in performance with an eye on the consequences. On the one hand, they consider whether rescission (as opposed to damages) is necessary to protect the injured party and, on the other hand, they take into account the prejudice which rescission will cause to the other party. If, on balancing these factors, they conclude that the injured party should be allowed to rescind, they will classify the failure in performance as "substantial" in order to produce the desired result; and conversely.<sup>52</sup> An attempt will be made in the following pages to illustrate this

<sup>46</sup> See below, pp.778–811.

<sup>47</sup> (1777) 1 Hy.Bl. 273n.; 2 W.Bl. 1312.

<sup>48</sup> (1789) 1 Hy.Bl. 270.

<sup>49</sup> Glazebrook v Woodrow (1799) 8 T.R. 366 at 374.

<sup>50</sup> Ellen v Tupp (1851) 6 Ex. 424 at 442.

<sup>51</sup> Different factors govern the exceptions discussed at below, pp.778–811.

<sup>52</sup> Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 at 380.

approach. The decisions are for the most part soundly based on practical considerations; though it must be admitted that these do not always appear very clearly from the judgments.

(a) UNJUST ENRICHMENT. Where the requirement of substantial failure applies,<sup>53</sup> the courts are reluctant to allow a party to refuse to perform if he has received a benefit from the other party's partial or defective performance and cannot, or will not, restore that benefit. The point may be illustrated by a further distinction between Boone v Eyre and Duke of St Albans v Shore. In the former case the plantation had actually been conveyed to the defendant,<sup>54</sup> and a judgment in his favour would have enabled him to escape liability for a part of the price which might have exceeded the value of the slaves. In the latter case, however, it was said that "this is not an action of covenant where one party has performed his part, but is brought for a penalty on the other party refusing to execute his contract".<sup>55</sup> In such a case the claimant "ought punctually, exactly and literally to perform his part".<sup>56</sup> These words may suggest that an action on an executory contract in a case like Boone v Eyre would have failed even if the vendor had lacked title to only a single slave; but if this was indeed ever the law it has been neutralised by the developments about to be discussed.

(b) ADEQUACY OF DAMAGES. Sometimes the main reason for allowing rescission is that damages would not adequately compensate the injured party.

(i) General principle. In Vigers v Cook<sup>57</sup> an undertaker had contracted to make arrangements for the funeral of the defendant's son, but so negligently constructed the coffin that it could not be taken into the church where the funeral service was held. He was not entitled to recover any part of his charges as it was "an essential part of the funeral that the body should be taken into the church so that the service might be read in its presence".<sup>58</sup> The breach was one for which a money payment could not compensate. But where the loss suffered in consequence of the breach can be valued with relative certainty, an award or allowance of the sum so assessed will be regarded as an adequate remedy, more suitable than rescission.<sup>59</sup> For example, in one case the fact that a party was persistently late in making payments under a long-term contract was held not to be a ground of rescission, since the other party suffered no prejudice except in having to pay a relatively small amount of interest on the outstanding sums, and this loss could easily have been recovered from the party in breach.<sup>60</sup>

(ii) Specific performance with compensation. The same principle is illustrated by the equitable jurisdiction to order specific performance of contracts for the sale of land with "compensation"—i.e. at a price reduced to take account of a deficiency or defect.<sup>61</sup> In

<sup>53</sup> In cases falling within an exception to the requirement, rescission often does lead to unjust enrichment, e.g. where one party's refusal to pay is justified by the other's failure to perform an "entire" obligation; below, pp.782–784.

<sup>54</sup> This is stressed by Ashurst J. in (1777) 2 W.Bl. 1312 at 1314n. (e).

<sup>55</sup> (1789) 1 Hy.Bl. 270 at 279; for a similar argument, see Graves v Legg (1854) 9 Ex. 709 at 717.

<sup>56</sup> (1789) 1 Hy.Bl. 270 at 279.

<sup>57</sup> [1919] 2 K.B. 475; cf. Sinclair v Bowles (1829) 9 B. & C. 92.

<sup>58</sup> [1919] 2 K.B. 475 at 479. Had the defendant claimed damages he would (at least as the law then stood) have recovered nothing for injury to his feelings: below, pp.987–994.

<sup>59</sup> cf. the rule that specific relief may be refused where the more appropriate remedy is in damages: below, pp.1020–1026.

<sup>60</sup> Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361. The payments were due under bills of exchange, so that common law the rule by which interest is not recoverable as general damages for non-payment of money did not apply: see below, p.784. For another case in which rescission was not justified as damages were an adequate remedy, see The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210. cf. also below, p.828.

<sup>61</sup> Harpum [1981] C.L.J. 47.

one case<sup>62</sup> compensation was allowed where the area of land sold was stated to be "about 1200 square yards" and was in fact 935 square yards. But the jurisdiction will not be exercised (so that specific performance will not be ordered) where the defect is "substantial"<sup>63</sup>; and the test for determining whether the defect is of this character appears to be whether adequate compensation can be made for it by a monetary adjustment.<sup>64</sup> The same test applies where the contract itself provides that errors and misdescriptions shall not annul the sale but shall give rise to a claim for compensation.<sup>65</sup> Such a clause can (unlike the equitable jurisdiction) be invoked even after the contract has been performed<sup>66</sup>; but (like the equitable jurisdiction) it is normally inapplicable where the defect is "substantial".<sup>67</sup> Cases concerning such clauses can be regarded as illustrating what later became known as the doctrine of fundamental breach. They would therefore now turn on the construction of the clause in question, rather than on any rule of substantive law making it impossible to exclude the right to rescind.<sup>68</sup> On the other hand, a clause of this kind is not subject to the test of reasonableness under ss.2 to 4 of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 since those sections do not apply to any contract so far as it relates to the creation or transfer of an interest in land.<sup>69</sup> This could be an important point where a developer entered into a contract for the sale of a house on written standard terms which would otherwise be subject to the requirement of reasonableness under s.3 of the Act.<sup>70</sup> It is not entirely clear whether the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 would apply to clauses of the kind here under discussion in contracts for the sale of land.<sup>71</sup>

A misdescription may not form part of the contract but be a misrepresentation inducing it; or it may originate as such a misrepresentation and be later incorporated in the contract. Under the Misrepresentation Act 1967, there is, in such a case, a right to rescind for misrepresentation,<sup>72</sup> but this is subject to the discretion of the court to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission.<sup>73</sup> Where the defect is not "substantial" the court will probably uphold the contract and award "damages"; and it seems likely that these will be assessed in much the same way as that in which "compensation" for misdescription was assessed in equity. The main difference between the old equitable and the new statutory powers is that the latter can be exercised even after conveyance.<sup>74</sup> The further question then arises whether, in cases of the present kind, a contract term restricting remedies for misdescription would be ineffective on the ground that it failed to satisfy the test of reasonableness imposed by s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967.<sup>75</sup> Before that Act, it was held that a term which excluded

<sup>62</sup> Aspinalls to Powell and Scholefield (1889) 60 L.T. 595.

<sup>63</sup> Re Fawcett and Holmes' Contract (1889) 42 Ch.D. 150; Jacobs v Revell [1900] 2 Ch. 858; Watson v Burton [1957] 1 W.L.R. 19; Strover v Harrington [1988] Ch. 390 at 411.

<sup>64</sup> Cato v Thomson (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 616, 618; Rudd v Lascelles [1900] 1 Ch. 815; if the defect is substantial the party prejudiced by it may, instead of rescinding, claim specific performance, but only without compensation: Durham v Legard (1865) 34 Beav. 611.

<sup>65</sup> Harpum [1992] C.I.J. 263.

<sup>66</sup> Bas v Helsham (1866) 1 L.R. 2 Ex. 72; Re Turner and Skelton (1879) 13 Ch.D. 130; Palmer v Johnson (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 351.

<sup>67</sup> Flight v Booth (1834) 1 Bing.N.C. 370; cf. Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495 (above, p.386).

<sup>68</sup> See above, p.225.

<sup>69</sup> Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, Sch.1, para.1(c). For attempts to exclude liability for misrepresentation, see above, p.385; below at n.75.

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.253.

<sup>71</sup> See above, pp.277–280.

<sup>72</sup> s.1(a); above, pp.375–376.

<sup>73</sup> s.2(2); above, p.357.

<sup>74</sup> s.1(b); above, p.377.

<sup>75</sup> As substituted by Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.8; above, p.385.

the right to rescind and the right to compensation entitled the vendor to enforce the contract without compensation.<sup>76</sup> Now such a term might be regarded as unreasonable in so far as it excluded the purchaser's right to compensation, or his right to rescind for a misrepresentation relating to a matter of substantial importance.<sup>77</sup> But if that matter was of only minor importance and the term, while excluding the right to rescind, provided for compensation, it is submitted that the requirement of reasonableness would normally be satisfied; for in such a case the term would not prejudice the purchaser. It would merely give contractual effect to the right that the vendor would have had, even in the absence of the term, to specific performance with compensation, or to the result that the court would be likely to reach in the exercise of its discretion to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission.<sup>78</sup>

These rules as to "compensation" in sales of land should be contrasted with the rule that a quantitative defect in delivery under a contract for the sale of goods generally justifies rescission,<sup>79</sup> even though it causes little prejudice to the buyer, and even though compensation for it may be quite easy to assess. It is, however, unlikely that this rule applies where a specific parcel of goods is sold and is said to contain a different quantity from that which it in fact contains,<sup>80</sup> e.g. where the sale is of "a cargo of 1,000 tons" in a named ship which actually contains only 950 tons. Such cases constitute the closest analogy to the land cases, so that the treatment of the two types of contract is not so radically different as might at first sight appear.

(c) RATIO OF FAILURE TO THE PERFORMANCE UNDERTAKEN. The higher the ratio of the failure is to the performance undertaken, the more likely it is that the court will regard the failure as substantial. Thus where a buyer of oil deliverable in two instalments without justification refused to accept one of them (and added that he would not accept any other delivery) it was held that the seller was entitled to rescind.<sup>81</sup> On the other hand, in the Maple Flock case<sup>82</sup> a contract provided for delivery of 100 tons of rag flock in instalments of 1½ tons at the rate of three instalments a week. The sixteenth instalment contained an excessive amount of chlorine and one reason why the court held that this breach did not entitle the buyers to rescind was that it related to a single instalment which bore only a small quantitative ratio to the contract as a whole.<sup>83</sup> Similarly, in the Hongkong Fir case,<sup>84</sup> a ship began service under a 24 month time charterparty. She was later found to be unseaworthy and to need extensive repairs which took altogether 20 weeks to complete. The charterers purported to rescind on a number of grounds,<sup>85</sup> one

<sup>76</sup> Re Courcier and Harrold's Contract [1923] 1 Ch. 565.

<sup>77</sup> Walker v Boyle [1982] 1 W.L.R. 495; Cremdean Properties Ltd v Nash (1977) 244 E.G. 547; South Western General Property Co v Marlon (1982) 263 E.G. 2631.

<sup>78</sup> See above, after n.73.

<sup>79</sup> See below, p.783.

<sup>80</sup> See Levi v Berk (1886) 2 T.L.R. 898 at 899; Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §21-033; Ellis v Hodder & Tolley Ltd (1914) 33 N.Z.L.R. 362.

<sup>81</sup> Warinco AG v Samor SpA [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 450.

<sup>82</sup> Maple Flock Co Ltd v Universal Furniture Products (Wembley) Ltd [1934] 1 K.B. 148; cf. Simpson v Crippin (1872) L.R. 8 Q.B. 14 (failure by buyer to take delivery). For such instalment contracts, the vague language of Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.31(2) gives virtually no guidance on the question when a breach justifies rescission. Contrast the very rigid rule laid down by s.30(1) with respect to short delivery (modified, in the case of non-consumer sales, by s.30(2A) as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.4(2)), below p.783.

<sup>83</sup> cf. Financings Ltd v Baldock [1963] 2 Q.B. 104; Eshun v Moorgate Mercantile Credit Co Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 722; The Seafloater [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 41; in further proceedings ([2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 341) the term in question was held to be a condition, so that its breach entitled the victim to rescind without having to show that the failure in performance was substantial.

<sup>84</sup> Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 26.

<sup>85</sup> See also below, pp.774, 777, 795.

of which was that the delay caused by the unseaworthiness was such as to "frustrate" their purpose in entering into the contract. One reason why this argument was rejected was that the ship was still available, after the completion of repairs, for 17 out of the original 24 months of the charterparty.<sup>86</sup>

(d) UNCERTAINTY AS TO FUTURE PERFORMANCE. In the case of continuing contracts, calling for repeated acts of performance over a period of time, the courts are influenced by the need to remove the uncertainty which may result from failure to perform some of those acts. In Bradford v Williams,<sup>87</sup> for example, the defendant's ship was chartered for one year from May to May; but in September the charterers wrongfully refused to provide a cargo. This refusal justified the defendant in putting an end to the contract as "no cross-action for damages would have fully compensated him".<sup>88</sup> In such a cross-action it might be alleged that he had failed to mitigate<sup>89</sup> by finding substitute employment for the ship. It would be hard for him to know for how long such employment should be sought, since, if the original charterparty had remained in force, the charterers might later have demanded further performance, and the shipowner would have been bound to have his ship available in response to such a demand. Again, the failure of a house-buyer to pay a deposit as required by the contract gives rise to uncertainty in depriving the vendor of an important safeguard against eventual default; and accordingly it justifies rescission by the vendor.<sup>90</sup>

By way of contrast, further reference may be made to the Hongkong Fir<sup>91</sup> case, where it was said that, once major repairs were begun, there was no reasonable ground for believing that the ship would not be available for service within a fairly short and predictable time.<sup>92</sup> In the Maple Flock case<sup>93</sup> the court similarly stressed that the sellers' business was well conducted, that the source of the defect could easily be tracked down, and that the likelihood of its recurrence was small. Such likelihood has also been stressed where a seller has sought to rescind an instalment contract because of the buyer's refusal to pay in accordance with its terms.<sup>94</sup> Similarly, the insolvency of a buyer who has failed to pay may justify the seller's refusal to perform (at least in the sense that he need no longer deliver on credit) if it is unlikely that the buyer or his trustee in bankruptcy will eventually be able to pay in accordance with the contract.<sup>95</sup> On the other hand, mere delay in payment will not of itself justify rescission. In the Decro-Wall case<sup>96</sup> an English company had been appointed "sole concessionaires" for the sale in the United Kingdom

<sup>86</sup> [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 40, per Salmon J. On this issue the Court of Appeal simply approved Salmon J.'s judgment without giving reasons of their own: see [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 61, 73.

<sup>87</sup> (1872) 1 L.R. 7 Ex. 259; The Sanko Iris [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487.

<sup>88</sup> (1872) 1 L.R. 7 Ex. 259 at 269.

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.976.

<sup>90</sup> Myton Ltd v Schwab-Morris [1974] 1 W.L.R. 331 (for disapproval of this case on another point, see above, p.763); Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 at 1430 (where the claim to rescind failed on the ground that the vendor should first have given notice of default); The Blankenstein [1985] 1 W.L.R. 435 at 446.

<sup>91</sup> [1962] 2 Q.B. 26.

<sup>92</sup> i.e. by September 1957: [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 40. cf. The Hermosa [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570, where it was held that a charterer was not entitled to rescind even though his "demand for reassurance" (p.580) was not met. The case seems near the line; the American principle of "adequate assurance of performance" (U.C.C. ss.2-609, Restatement 2d, Contracts §251) would be useful in such a situation. See also Rice v Great Yarmouth BC, The Times, July 26, 2000.

<sup>93</sup> [1934] 1 K.B. 148.

<sup>94</sup> Contrast Withers v Reynolds (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 882 with Mersey Steel and Iron Co v Naylor Benzon and Co (1884) 9 App.Cas. 434 and Freeth v Burr (1874) 1 L.R. 9 C.P. 208; below, pp.807-810.

<sup>95</sup> Ex p. Chalmers (1873) 1 L.R. 8 Ch.App. 289; Bloomer v Bernstein (1874) 1 L.R. 9 C.P. 588; Insolvency Act 1986, s.345(1) and (2); Leyland Daf Ltd v Automotive Products plc, The Times, April 6, 1993, affirmed, The Times, April 9, 1993.

<sup>96</sup> Decro-Wall International S.A v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361.

of decorative tiles manufactured by a French company. The English company was persistently (though only slightly) late in making payments under the contract. One reason<sup>97</sup> why this did not justify rescission by the French company was that the delays did not give it any reason to doubt that payment would be made as soon as the goods had been disposed of.

The need to remove uncertainty as to future performance is, again, one factor which helps to explain the distinction between Poussard v Spiers<sup>98</sup> and Bettini v Gye.<sup>99</sup> In the former case the defendants had engaged Mme Poussard to play the leading part of Friquette in a new opera which was to open at the Criterion Theatre on November 28, 1874; the engagement was to last for three months "providing the opera shall run for that period."<sup>1</sup> On November 23 Mme Poussard fell ill and on November 25 the defendants entered into a contract with a Miss Lewis. This provided that Miss Lewis was to be ready to play Friquette on November 28 if Mme Poussard had not recovered by then; and that, if Miss Lewis did perform on that day, she was to be engaged for four weeks, until December 25. On November 28 Mme Poussard "continued in bed and ill"<sup>2</sup> so that Miss Lewis performed and acquired the right to go on performing until December 25. On December 4 Mme Poussard had recovered and offered to take her place, but the defendants refused to take her back. The jury found that her illness was not so "material" as to entitle the defendants to rescind the contract; that the arrangement with Miss Lewis "as made" was reasonable; and that the defendants were liable in damages for their refusal to have Mme Poussard back at any time. But the court held that the defendants' refusal was justified and that they were not liable in damages. What chiefly influenced the court was that Mme Poussard's illness "was a serious one of uncertain duration"<sup>3</sup> and that the defendants could not put off the opening night till she had recovered. The court considered the alternative possibility that the defendants might have found a temporary substitute, but rejected it on the ground that "no substitute capable of performing the part adequately could be engaged except on the terms that she should be permanently engaged. . . ."<sup>4</sup> In fact Miss Lewis's engagement expired on December 25 and it would have been possible for the defendants to take Mme Poussard back after that date. This was (according to one of the reports)<sup>5</sup> the argument put forward by counsel for the claimant; and it evidently impressed the jury.<sup>6</sup> It is not at all clear from the judgment why it was rejected by the court.

<sup>97</sup> For another see above, p.771.

<sup>98</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410.

<sup>99</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 183.

<sup>1</sup> It in fact ran for more than three months.

<sup>2</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410 at 413.

<sup>3</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410 at 415.

<sup>4</sup> ibid.

<sup>5</sup> (1876) 24 W.R. 819.

<sup>6</sup> The damages awarded by the jury amounted to £83 and it is possible to guess how this figure was reached. Mme Poussard was engaged for three months (or 13 weeks) at £11 per week. Miss Lewis was engaged for four weeks at £15 per week. £83 is the difference between (a) the amount which Mme Poussard would have earned in the remaining nine weeks (£99), and (b) the extra amount which the defendants had had to pay to Miss Lewis (£4 per week for four weeks, or £16). Of course, this method of assessment cannot be supported in law as it overlooks, on the one hand, the fact that Mme Poussard was not liable to the defendants for the extra expense of hiring Miss Lewis (see below, p.776); and, on the other, the possibility that Mme Poussard might have mitigated by accepting another engagement. According to the report of the trial in The Times (November 22, 1875, p.11) Mme Poussard refused an offer of another engagement in December "thinking that her agreement with the defendants was still in force"; perhaps she was advised by a French lawyer who took the view that the contract could be rescinded only by a court order: see French Civil Code, art.1184. She finally obtained another engagement in Paris on February 28, 1875—the very day on which her engagement with the defendants expired.

In Bettini v Gye<sup>7</sup> the defendant, who was director of the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, engaged Bettini “to fill the role of primo tenor assoluto in the theatres, halls and drawing rooms . . . in Great Britain and Ireland” from March 30 to July 13, 1875, that being the period of the Covent Garden season in 1875. The contract provided that Bettini should sing “in concerts as well as in operas”; that he should not “sing anywhere out of the theatre” (i.e. Covent Garden) during 1875 without the written permission of the defendant “except at a distance of more than 50 miles from London and out of the season of the theatre”; and that he was “to be in London without fail at least six days before the commencement of his engagement for the purpose of rehearsals.” Bettini was prevented by temporary illness from being in London until March 28. He gave no advance notice of this delay to the defendant, and when he arrived in London the defendant refused to accept his services. In holding that this refusal was unjustified the court stressed two factors: first, that Bettini had been engaged to sing in operas and concerts for a 15-week season and the failure to attend at rehearsals could affect only a small part of this period<sup>8</sup>; secondly, that he had been “deprived of the power of earning anything in London from January 1st to March 30th.”<sup>9</sup> The court also said that the defendant “must . . . seek redress by a cross-claim for damages”.<sup>10</sup> This carries at any rate a hint that such a cross-claim had some chance of success, though it is hard to reconcile with the statement in Poussard v Spiers that the failure to appear in that case “having been occasioned by sickness was not any breach”.<sup>11</sup> But there are many other grounds for distinguishing between the two cases. Bettini was not engaged to play any particular part; there is no suggestion that any substitute was engaged to take his place; he was available when the season opened; there is nothing to show that his failure to arrive in London six days before then in any way affected the opening night; and once he did arrive, there was no uncertainty about his future availability. Bettini v Gye was decided on a demurrer, so that the facts were never established, and it is hard from the facts as stated to see any practical justification for the defendant’s attitude.

Even where a breach does create uncertainty as to future performance, the need to remove it may be overcome by the desire to prevent unjust enrichment. Thus in one case<sup>12</sup> it was held that long delay in payment of the final instalment due on a sale of land did not justify rescission by the vendor.

(e) ULTERIOR MOTIVES FOR RESCISSION. It sometimes happens that a party’s real motive for wishing to rescind is not that there has been some failure in performance, but that the contract was, or has because of market movements become, a bad bargain for him.<sup>13</sup> In such circumstances the courts will often (if the case is one to which the general requirement of substantial failure applies<sup>14</sup>) hold that the failure in performance is not sufficiently serious and so refuse to allow rescission. The underlying policy has been

<sup>7</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 183.

<sup>8</sup> It is this point rather than the fact that Bettini’s engagement was to sing in concerts and operas which should be stressed, for it is clear from the contract read as a whole that its main purpose was to engage Bettini for the Covent Garden season of 1875. There are many indications of this: for example, the dates of the engagement and the fact that the contract, though made in Milan on December 14, 1874, was headed “Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, London Year 1875.”

<sup>9</sup> At 188. Quære whether this in fact prejudiced Bettini; he may well have been taking part in an opera season elsewhere during this period.

<sup>10</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 183 at 189.

<sup>11</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 410 at 414.

<sup>12</sup> Cornwall v Henson [1900] 2 Ch. 298.

<sup>13</sup> cf. above, p.761.

<sup>14</sup> Where exceptions to the requirement apply, refusal to perform has often been allowed even though the motive for it fairly clearly was to escape from a bad bargain, e.g. Cunliffe v Harrison (1851) 6 Exch. 901, below, p.787; Arcos v Ronaasen [1933] A.C. 470, below p.793.

stated by Roskill L.J.: "Contracts are made to be performed and not to be avoided according to the whims of market fluctuation."<sup>15</sup>

The point is illustrated by Dakin v Oxley<sup>16</sup> where a shipowner in breach of contract had damaged the cargo, which, on arrival, was worth less than the freight. It was held that the cargo-owner was not justified in abandoning the cargo and refusing to pay freight. One reason given was that "It would be unjust and almost absurd that . . . the risk of a mercantile adventure should be thrown upon the shipowner by the mere accident of the value of the cargo [when undamaged] being worth little more than the freight."<sup>17</sup>

Similar considerations may also have influenced the decision in the Hongkong Fir case.<sup>18</sup> By the time the ship had been repaired, there had been a "catastrophic fall in the freight market"<sup>19</sup> to 13s. 6d. per ton, as against the 47s. per ton reserved in the charterparty.<sup>20</sup> In a 24 month charterparty the risk of such a fall in the freight market would normally be on the charterer; and the court was probably reluctant to allow him to throw it back on the shipowner by putting an end to the charterparty. It may also be relevant that the shipowner's breaches did not (so far as appears from the report) cause the charterer any loss at all.<sup>21</sup> But if a charterer can show that the owner's breach was a source of serious prejudice to him, he will not be prevented from rescinding merely because there has been a steep fall in the freight market. This is particularly true if his conduct shows that his real motive for rescinding was to avoid the prejudice caused by the breach, and not to escape from what has turned out to be a bad bargain.<sup>22</sup>

(f) OTHER FACTORS. The factors influencing decisions as to the availability of rescission by reason of the effects of a failure in performance cannot be exhaustively classified. Even where none of the factors discussed above is present, rescission may nevertheless be justified. In Aerial Advertising Co v Batchelor's Peas Ltd,<sup>23</sup> for example, the claimants agreed to conduct an advertising campaign for the defendants. On Armistice Day 1937 one of the claimants' aeroplanes set out with a banner bearing the message "Eat Batchelor's Peas." Unfortunately the aeroplane towed the banner over the main square of Salford, Lancashire, at the precise time when a large crowd was gathered there observing the two-minute silence. The effect of this breach of contract was described as "disastrous",<sup>24</sup> and it was held that the defendants were justified in refusing to accept further performance of the contract. Again, where a contract presupposes the continuation of a relationship involving personal confidence, it is possible for some isolated act of one party to destroy that confidence and so to justify rescission by the other.<sup>25</sup> In some of the cases, rescission was held to be justified because the nature or effects of the breach were regarded as sufficiently "serious" in ways that are hard to explain or even to

<sup>15</sup> The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 44 at 71; cf. The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1475.

<sup>16</sup> (1864) 15 C.B.(N.S.) 647.

<sup>17</sup> ibid. at 667-668; italics supplied.

<sup>18</sup> [1962] 2 Q.B. 26; above, p.773.

<sup>19</sup> ibid. at 39.

<sup>20</sup> [1961] 2 All E.R. at 261.

<sup>21</sup> On the contrary, the shipowner's breaches can be said to have benefited the charterer by relieving him for 20 weeks from the obligation to pay the high rate of hire reserved by the charterparty, since, while the ship was under repair, she was "off hire".

<sup>22</sup> cf. Federal Commerce Navigation Co Ltd v Molena Alpha Inc [1979] A.C. 757.

<sup>23</sup> [1938] 2 All E.R. 788.

<sup>24</sup> ibid. at 792.

<sup>25</sup> See Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 699, where it was held by a majority that rescission was not justified on the facts. cf. also the employers' right to rescind the original service agreement in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] A.C. 161 (above, p.289).

articulate.<sup>26</sup> Such a vague notion has its dangers, but it cannot be altogether eliminated from a discussion of this branch of the law.

4. Exceptions to the Requirement of Substantial Failure

The preceding discussion attempts to identify factors that influence decisions on the issue of substantial failure in performance; but it must be admitted that their practical operation is not easy to predict. In the interests of greater certainty, the law therefore recognises a number of exceptions<sup>27</sup> to the requirement of substantial failure. Inevitably, the resulting certainty has sometimes been achieved only at the expense of justice, so that these exceptions have attracted an increasing weight of criticism.

(1) Express provision for determination

(a) LITERAL ENFORCEMENT IN GENERAL. A contract may expressly provide that one party shall be entitled to rescind in the event of some specified failure by the other to perform. For example, a voyage charterparty may stipulate that the ship is expected to be ready to load at a named port on (or about) a specified date, and that if she fails to arrive there within (say) 10 days of that date the charterer shall be entitled to cancel; and a time charterparty may provide either that the owner shall be entitled to withdraw the ship if hire is not punctually paid, or that the charterer shall be entitled to cancel if the ship becomes unavailable for service for more than a specified number of days.<sup>28</sup> The purpose of such clauses is to prevent disputes from arising as to the often difficult question whether the failure in performance is sufficiently serious to justify rescission; and they take effect even though there is no substantial failure.<sup>29</sup> For example, under a clause in a time charterparty entitling the shipowner to withdraw the ship if the charter fails to pay hire by a specified day, the shipowner can exercise his right of withdrawal immediately on such failure<sup>30</sup>; and he can do this even though the charterer tenders payment very soon after it was due, even though the short delay in payment causes the shipowner little prejudice, and even though his motive for withdrawal is simply that the freight market has risen. Such clauses are literally enforced because, in cases of this kind, "certainty is of primary importance"<sup>31</sup>; while the charterer can mitigate the severity of the clause by insisting (if his bargaining position permits) on the inclusion of a so-called "anti-technicality" provision allowing days of grace or requiring notice of default before withdrawal.<sup>32</sup> The principle of literal enforcement similarly applies where a contract for the sale of land specifies a completion date and provides that, on the purchaser's failure

<sup>26</sup> See Bright v Ganas, 189 A. 427 (1936), where a servant forfeited all rights to pay for four-and-a-half years' service by writing a love-letter to his employer's wife.

<sup>27</sup> For a further special exception in the law of agency, see above, pp.745-747.

<sup>28</sup> The Span Terza (No.2) [1984] 1 W.L.R. 27; such a clause avoids the difficulties that arose in the Hong Kong Fir case [1962] 2 Q.B. 26, above p.773. For similar cancelling clauses in contracts for the sale of ships, see The Sulholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605; The Oro Chef [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509; cf. also Bettini v Gye (1876) 1 Q.B.11. 183 at 187.

<sup>29</sup> Such clauses are probably not within s.3(2)(b)(ii) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 for the reasons given on p.254, above, and because rescission under such clauses terminates the primary obligations of both parties; cf. The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 7, distinguishing between cancellation and exemption clauses.

<sup>30</sup> The Brimnes [1975] Q.B. 929; The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850; Rose, 30 C.L.P. 213; cf. The Chikuma [1981] 1 W.L.R. 314; Mann, 97 L.Q.R. 379-382.

<sup>31</sup> The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850 at 878; The Lutetian [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 140 at 159; cf. The Chikuma, above, at p.322.

<sup>32</sup> As in Libyaville [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 537; and in Federal Commerce and Navigation Co Ltd v Molena Alpha Inc [1979] A.C. 757. cf. The Laconia, above, at 878; The Rio Sun [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 489; [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 404; The Afros [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195.

to comply with any of the terms of the contract, the vendor is to be entitled to rescind. In one such case<sup>33</sup> the vendor declared the contract rescinded one minute after the time fixed for completion and the rescission was held to be effective, so that the purchaser was not entitled to specific performance on tendering the purchase price a mere ten minutes after that time. Again this conclusion was supported on the ground that “the parties should know with certainty that the terms of the contract will be enforced”.<sup>34</sup>

Although, for the reasons just given, the law normally gives literal effect to express provisions for determination, it does insist on compliance with three requirements. First, the party who relies on the express term as justifying rescission for a breach which is not serious must show that the term does, as a matter of construction, apply to that breach. Thus where a term in a four-year maintenance contract allowed one party to terminate in the event of the other’s breach of “any of its obligations under the contract”, it was held that even this emphatic language did not have this effect.<sup>35</sup> Secondly, the party seeking to terminate must act strictly in accordance with the terms of the clause. For example, a voyage charterparty may provide that the charterer can cancel if the ship is not at the port of loading by September 30. The charterer would not be entitled to cancel on September 29, even though at that time the ship was so far away from the port that she could not possibly get there the next day.<sup>36</sup> Conversely where a time charterparty gives the shipowner the right to give notice of withdrawal, if hire is not paid on the due day, he is not entitled to exercise that right before the end of that day, even though the bank at which payment was to be made had already closed so that the charterer could not possibly have made the payment in accordance with the contract.<sup>37</sup> Thirdly, the party relying on the express provision must terminate without undue delay. Thus, in cases of non-payment of hire by a time charterer it has been said that the shipowner must exercise his right to withdraw the ship “within a reasonable time after default”.<sup>38</sup>

(b) RELIEF AGAINST FORFEITURE IN CERTAIN CASES.<sup>39</sup> The willingness of the courts to give effect to express provisions for determination is, in the cases so far discussed, based on the assumption that the parties have bargained on more or less equal terms.<sup>40</sup> Where this is not the case, the law has developed restrictions on the right of a party to rely on an express provision for determination. This is the position where a lease entitles the landlord to forfeit if the tenant breaks any covenant; and where a regulated hire-purchase agreement<sup>41</sup> entitles the owner to terminate it if the hirer defaults in the

<sup>33</sup> Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514.

<sup>34</sup> ibid. at 519; cf. ibid. at 523; cf. Kazakstan Wool Processors (Europe) Ltd v Nederlandsche Credietverzekering Maatschappij NV [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 708 at 720.

<sup>35</sup> Rice v Great Yarmouth BC, The Times, July 26, 2000; it was admitted that the clause did not allow termination for a “trivial” breach. Cf. Wickman Ltd v Schuler AG [1974] A.C. 235, below, p.792.

<sup>36</sup> The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 164; cf. The Madeleine [1967] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 224 at 243.

<sup>37</sup> The Afvos [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195; cf. above, p.723. The form of a notice of default under an “anti-technicality” clause must similarly comply strictly with the requirements of that clause: The Pamela [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 249.

<sup>38</sup> The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850 at 872; The Balder London [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 489 at 892–893; The Scaptrade [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 425 at 430, affirmed without reference to this point [1983] 2 A.C. 699; The Orm Chef [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 509; cf. The Great Marine [1990] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 245 at 249 (right to cancel sale of ship, under an express term, lost by delay of one week). The rule is based either on waiver or on an implied term that the right to withdraw must be exercised within a reasonable time: see The Antaios [1985] A.C. 191. It seems to be restricted to cases of rescission under an express term: see Nichimen Corp v Gatoil Inc [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 46 at 54.

<sup>39</sup> Smith [2001] C.L.J. 178 (written before the decision of the House of Lords in the On Demand Information case, below, n.50).

<sup>40</sup> See The Scaptrade [1983] Q.B. 529 at 539–540 approved [1983] 2 A.C. 699.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.178.

payment of even a single instalment. In such cases the provision for determination would deprive a party who committed some quite minor breach of the benefit of a contract which he has for a long period performed satisfactorily; and the court may allow him a period of grace within which to make good his default.<sup>42</sup> Normally such "relief against forfeiture" only gives the party in breach extra time to perform<sup>43</sup>; but sometimes such relief is allowed even though the breach cannot be remedied at all. Thus where a tenant had innocently broken a covenant against subletting it was held that the landlord could not enforce a forfeiture clause, as the breach had not prejudiced him in any way.<sup>44</sup> Further statutory restrictions apply to a landlord's right to forfeit certain long leases of dwelling houses for non-payment by the tenant of rent or certain other charges.<sup>45</sup>

In some of the time charterparty cases discussed above, it was suggested that relief against forfeiture should be granted to a charterer who failed to pay hire on time, and that the exercise by the shipowner of his right to withdraw the ship under a withdrawal clause should be restricted accordingly.<sup>46</sup> But the House of Lords has rejected these suggestions<sup>47</sup> for two reasons. First, the courts should give effect to commercial agreements concluded (as time charters usually are) between parties who had bargained on equal terms. Secondly, the principle of relief against forfeiture was restricted to cases where the party in breach would, if the contract were literally enforced, be deprived of "proprietary or possessory rights",<sup>48</sup> while a time charter conferred only contractual rights, being merely a contract for services to be rendered by the shipowner.<sup>49</sup> The first of these lines of reasoning states a policy ground for restricting relief against forfeiture in commercial situations; the second specifies the legal technique for giving effect to that policy. In the charterparty cases both lines of reasoning supported the conclusion that there should be no relief against forfeiture. But in other situations the two lines of reasoning may tend to support diverging conclusions since a contract of a "commercial" nature may confer "proprietary or possessory rights" on the party in breach: for example where a finance lease is granted to that party of equipment used by him in the course of his business. It has been held that, in such a case, the court has power to grant relief against forfeiture and that such relief could be given even after the lessor had retaken possession of and resold the subject-matter of the lease.<sup>50</sup>

The distinction between terms which deprive a party of "proprietary or possessory rights" and those which deprive him only of contractual rights can, moreover, be a fine one. The point can be illustrated by contrasting two cases. In the Sport International case<sup>51</sup> it was held that relief against forfeiture was not available where A granted B a licence to use certain trade-marks and the contract provided that the licence was to determine on B's default. But in BICC plc v Burndy Corp<sup>52</sup> such relief was held to be available where an agreement by which certain patents were vested in A and B provided <sup>42</sup> See Consumer Credit Act 1974, ss.88, 89; requiring formal notice of termination and giving the hirer at least seven days to make good his default; and the rules relating to relief against forfeiture of leases: Law of Property Act 1925, s.146. cf. also the rules as to damages, discussed on pp.853–855, below. Relief was denied to a hirer, who had been a persistent defaulter, in Goker v NWS Bank plc [1990] C.C.L.R. 34.

<sup>43</sup> See Nutting v Baldwin [1995] 1 W.L.R. 201 at 208.

<sup>44</sup> Scala House & District Property Co Ltd v Forbes [1974] Q.B. 575.

<sup>45</sup> Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002, ss.167–170.

<sup>46</sup> The Afros [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 477 at 479, reversed on other grounds [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195; The Tropwind [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 232 at 234.

<sup>47</sup> In The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 and see the authorities cited above, p.778, n.31.

<sup>48</sup> The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 702; cf. SCI (Sales Curve Interactive) v Titus SARL [2001] EWCA Civ 591; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 416, at [47].

<sup>49</sup> The Scaptrade, above, at 702; Jones v Society of Lloyd's, The Times, February 2, 2000.

<sup>50</sup> On Demand Information plc v Michael Gerson (Finance) plc [2002] UKHL 13; [2002] 2 W.L.R. 919.

<sup>51</sup> Sport International Bussum BV v Inter-Footwear Ltd [1984] 1 W.L.R. 776; Harpum, 100 L.Q.R. 369.

<sup>52</sup> [1985] Ch. 232.

that, on B's default, he should assign his rights in the patents to A. No doubt the cases are technically distinguishable on the ground that the actual assignment of a patent involves a transfer of "property", while the termination of a contractual licence to use a trade-mark does not. But from a commercial point of view a licence to use such forms of "intellectual property" often serves the same purpose as an actual transfer; and the practical effect of the clause in each case was to deprive the party in default of the right to make use of the "property." Where, as in the BICC case, the courts have recognised the availability of relief against forfeiture in a commercial context, the policy stated in the charterparty cases (of giving effect to commercial agreements between parties bargaining on equal terms) has in effect been subordinated to the legal technique used in those cases to give effect to that policy. What was regarded in those cases as a necessary condition for the power to grant relief is regarded, in such cases as the BICC case, as a sufficient condition for the existence (though not for the exercise) of that power. It is, with respect, open to question whether this development is consistent with the emphasis on the requirements of commercial certainty in a number of House of Lords and Privy Council decisions concerned with express provisions for determination.<sup>53</sup>

The view that power to grant relief arises merely because forfeiture would deprive the party in breach of a proprietary or possessory interest is also hard to reconcile with the rules which apply where a purchaser of land fails to complete at the agreed time. By virtue of the conclusion of the contract, the purchaser acquires an equitable interest in the land; but if he fails to complete at the time stipulated in the contract and the vendor rescinds under an express term entitling him to do so on account of that breach, then the purchaser cannot get relief against forfeiture in the sense of obtaining an order of specific performance against the vendor.<sup>54</sup> At the most, he may be able to obtain "restitutionary . . . relief against forfeiture" by securing the return of a penal deposit.<sup>55</sup> The reason for this distinction is that the purpose of the express term is to "restore to the vendor his freedom to deal with the land as he pleases"<sup>56</sup> and relief by way of specific performance would (while restitutionary relief would not) make it impossible for the vendor to know with certainty when that freedom had indeed been restored.

(c) CONSUMER PROTECTION. An express cancellation clause in a standard contract between a commercial seller of goods or supplier of goods or services and a consumer may also be open to challenge under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 on the ground that it is "unfair" to the consumer and hence not binding on him.<sup>57</sup> The list of prima facie invalid terms given in the Regulations indeed refers only to cancellation clauses in contracts "of indeterminate duration"<sup>58</sup>, but as the list is "non-exhaustive" this restriction would not preclude the court from holding that a cancellation clause in a fixed-term contract was also unfair.

(d) INVALIDITY ON OTHER GROUNDS. It is arguable that in exceptional circumstances an "oppressive" cancellation clause may be open to attack at common law in accordance with the principles discussed in Chapter 7, or at least restricted in its operation so that the power to cancel can be exercised only on reasonable grounds.<sup>59</sup> Provisions entitling

<sup>53</sup> See The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850; The Chikuma [1981] 1 W.L.R. 314; The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694; Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514.

<sup>54</sup> Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514; the fact that the purchaser has been let into possession and has improved the land may entitle him to such relief: ibid. at 520.

<sup>55</sup> See below p.1008.

<sup>56</sup> Union Eagle case, above, at 520.

<sup>57</sup> SI 1999/2083, reg.8(1); above, pp.267–283.

<sup>58</sup> reg.5(5) and Sch.2, para.1(g).

<sup>59</sup> Timeload Ltd v British Telecommunications plc [1995] E.M.L.R. 459 at 467.

a party to refuse to make payments under a contract in default of exact performance by the other may also be invalid as penalties.<sup>60</sup>

(2) Entire and severable obligations<sup>61</sup>

(a) ENTIRE OBLIGATIONS. A contractual obligation is said to be "entire" when the contract requires it to be completely performed by one party (A) before the other (B) is to pay, or to render such other counter-performance as may have been agreed.<sup>62</sup> Complete performance by A is sometimes said to be a "condition precedent" to B's liability; but the cases are not necessarily concerned with disputes as to the order of performance.<sup>63</sup> Often the dispute arises because A's purported performance, though rendered in the stipulated order, is in some way incomplete or defective.

Where A fails to complete performance of an entire obligation, B is entitled to refuse to pay even though the deficiency in A's performance causes him little prejudice or none at all. At common law A is not even generally entitled to any other recompense for the partial performance which he has rendered. In Cutter v Powell<sup>64</sup> a seaman agreed to serve on a ship bound from Jamaica for Liverpool; he was to be paid 30 guineas "ten days after the ship arrives at Liverpool. . . provided he proceeds, continues and does his duty. . . from hence to the port of Liverpool." On August 2 the ship sailed from Jamaica; she arrived at Liverpool on October 9, but the seaman had died on September 20. It was held that his administratrix could not recover for the work he had done before his death; for the contract meant that nothing was to be paid unless and until he had served for the whole voyage. At the ordinary rates of pay then prevailing, he would have earned only £8 for such a voyage. The higher rate of pay seems to have been intended to throw the risk of his completing the voyage on him. Lord Kenyon C.J. said: "It was a kind of insurance".<sup>65</sup> The result was that the administratrix recovered neither the 30 guineas, nor a proportionate part of it, nor a reasonable sum for the six or seven weeks' service which the deceased had rendered. According to one case, the same rule applies even where a contract of employment is terminated by mutual consent.<sup>66</sup>

Similarly, where a contract for the carriage of goods by sea provides that freight is to become due on arrival of the goods at the agreed destination, the shipowner cannot recover either the stipulated freight, or freight pro rata, if he is compelled to abandon the voyage by perils of the sea and to discharge the cargo at an intermediate port.<sup>67</sup> The same

<sup>60</sup> See Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd v Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd [1974] A.C. 689; below, p.1006.

<sup>61</sup> Williams, (1941) 57 L.Q.R. 373 at 490. (This article must be read in the light of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943.)

<sup>62</sup> Such a term is not affected by Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.3(2)(b)(ii) for the reason stated at p.254, above; and also because B is not claiming to be entitled to render no performance "in respect of his contractual obligation": his case is rather that, before A's performance, he is not under any relevant obligation. Nor are the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (above, pp.267–283) likely to affect the effectiveness of such a term. Reg.8(1) applies to contracts between a commercial seller or supplier and a consumer and provides that unfair standard terms in such contracts do not bind the consumer. Any entire obligation which may be imposed by such a contract is likely to be that of the supplier. The Regulations do not apply to contracts relating to employment: see Dir.93/13, Recital 10, above, p.278, so that they would not apply to cases such as Cutter v Powell, below, n.64.

<sup>63</sup> cf. above, p.761.

<sup>64</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320; Stoljar, 34 Can.Bar.Rev. 288; Dockray, 117 L.Q.R. 626.

<sup>65</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320 at 324. Quære whether it was really insurance against the death of members of the crew, or against their desertion. For possible effects of the Apportionment Act 1870 and of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 in a case like Cutter v Powell, see below, pp.824, 914.

<sup>66</sup> Lambourn v Cruden (1841) 2 M. & G. 253.

<sup>67</sup> Vlietboom v Chapman (1844) 13 M. & W. 230; St. Enoch Shipping Co Ltd v Phosphate Mining Co [1916] 2 K.B. 624; cf. The Fort Kip [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 168.

rule applies where a ship is abandoned at sea and later saved by third parties<sup>68</sup> and it applies even though the shipowner's failure to get to the agreed destination is due, not to his breach, but to an excepted peril or to the act of a third party for whom he is not responsible.<sup>69</sup> The rule can be excluded by contrary provision in the contract, e.g. by one to the effect that freight is to be deemed to have been earned on loading.<sup>70</sup> In such a case, the shipowner can recover the freight even though the contract provides that it is to be paid on or after unloading: that provision affects only the time of payment, not the creation of the obligation to pay.<sup>71</sup>

The same principle is again illustrated by Sumpter v Hedges<sup>72</sup> where a builder agreed to build two houses for the defendant on the latter's land for a lump sum of £565. When the houses were still unfinished the builder told the defendant that he had run out of money and could not finish the work; and the defendant later completed the houses himself. It was held that the builder could not recover the agreed sum; nor could he recover a reasonable remuneration for his work as there was no evidence of a "new contract" to pay such a sum.<sup>73</sup>

As a general rule, a contract for the sale of goods is considered to impose an entire obligation with regard to the quantity contracted for.<sup>74</sup> If the seller fails to deliver the correct quantity the buyer is not bound to accept and pay (though if he does accept he must pay at the contract rate).<sup>75</sup> The rule applies where the seller delivers more than the quantity contracted for just as much as where he delivers less.<sup>76</sup> The rule is, however, subject to a number of qualifications. First, it can be varied by the provisions of the contract, e.g. by one calling for delivery of "about" the stipulated quantity, or for "five per cent more or less"<sup>77</sup> (though such a margin must not be exceeded).<sup>78</sup> Secondly, the rule does not permit rejection for a wholly trivial discrepancy, e.g. for an excess of 55 lbs, in a contract calling for delivery of 4,950 tons of wheat.<sup>79</sup> Thirdly, the rule is subject to a statutory exception which applies where the buyer does not deal as a consumer: in such a case he may not reject the whole of the quantity actually delivered on account of a shortfall or excess which is "so slight that it would be unreasonable for him to do so".<sup>80</sup> It seems that a defect may be "slight" for the purpose of this exception even though it is not wholly trivial within the common law exception stated above. The statutory exception applies only where the discrepancy is slight and it would be unreasonable for the buyer to reject. Thus it does not apply merely because the discrepancy is "slight,"

<sup>68</sup> The Kathleen (1874) L.R. 4 A. & E. 269; The Cito (1881) 7 P.D. 5; contrast Bradley v H Nemsom, Sons & Co [1919] A.C. 16 (where there was no abandonment).

<sup>69</sup> As in The Kathleen (1874) L.R. 4 A. & E. 269.

<sup>70</sup> The Dominique [1989] A.C. 1056; Crabtree [1989] L.M.C.L.Q. 289; The Karin Vatis [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 330.

<sup>71</sup> See the authorities cited in n.70; contrast The Lorna I [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 373 (where there was no stipulation as to when the freight was earned, but only one as to when it was to be paid).

<sup>72</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673; cf. Munro v Butt (1858) 8 E. & B. 738; Bolton v Mahadeva [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1009.

<sup>73</sup> For this requirement, see below, pp.819–820.

<sup>74</sup> See Oxendale v Wetherell (1829) 9 B. & C. 386–387; Reuter v Sala (1879) 4 C.P.D. 239; cf. Cobec Brazilian Trading & Warehousing Corp v Alfred C Toepfer [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386.

<sup>75</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(1). (It is assumed that the goods are not "unsolicited" within Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334, reg.24, above, p.9.) Conversely, the buyer cannot insist on delivery of less than he agreed to accept: Honck v Muller (1881) 7 Q.B.D. 92.

<sup>76</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(2).

<sup>77</sup> e.g. Re Thornett and Fehr and Yuills [1921] 1 K.B. 219; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(5).

<sup>78</sup> Tamvaco v Lucas (1859) 1 E. & E. 581.

<sup>79</sup> Shipton Anderson & Co v Weil Bros [1912] 1 K.B. 574.

<sup>80</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(2A), as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.4(2) (giving effect to the Law Commission's recommendation in Law Com. No.160 (1987) para.6.20). Where too much is delivered, the buyer can in any event reject the excess.

for it may nevertheless be commercially reasonable for the buyer to reject<sup>81</sup>; nor, where the discrepancy is not "slight," does the exception apply merely because it would be unreasonable for the buyer to reject (e.g., where his sole motive for rejection was to escape from a bad bargain<sup>82</sup>). The uncertainty caused by the vagueness of the statutory exception is mitigated by the fact that the exception can be excluded by contrary agreement<sup>83</sup>; and it is submitted that it would be so excluded where the contract had expressly stipulated for a margin and that margin had been exceeded. Finally, the rule entitling the buyer to reject merely on account of quantitative defects does not apply where the contract provides for delivery by instalments, so that, where short delivery is made of one instalment the buyer is not entitled to refuse to accept either future deliveries, or even the instalment in question.<sup>84</sup>

The rule that a party cannot recover anything for partial performance of an entire obligation also applies where that party was willing to complete performance but was justifiably prevented from completing by the other party, e.g. where an employee is dismissed for misconduct.

(b) SEVERABLE OBLIGATIONS. A contract imposes severable obligations if payment under it is due from time to time as performance of a specified part of the contract is rendered. This is the situation under contracts of employment, which typically provide for payment to be made at weekly or monthly intervals, even though the contract may be expressed to continue for longer periods. Similarly, in building contracts the rule in Sumpter v Hedges<sup>85</sup> is often excluded by provision for "progress payments", to be made as specified as stages of the work are completed. The principle can be further illustrated by contrasting Cutter v Pomell<sup>86</sup> with the case in which a seaman agrees to serve at a fixed rate per month; under such a contract, he can recover his pay for each completed month although he fails to complete the voyage for which he was engaged.<sup>87</sup> This would be so even though no money was actually to be paid over until the end of the voyage. On the same principle, a piece-rate worker does not forfeit wages already earned simply because it was agreed that nothing should actually be paid out to him till the end of each working week and he left or was lawfully dismissed before the end of the week.<sup>88</sup> Similarly, a contract for the sale of goods may be made severable by providing for delivery and payment in instalments. In all these cases, no more than the specified part of the performance need be rendered before the corresponding payment can be claimed. It is also true that, as a general rule, the specified part must be rendered in full. Thus an employee cannot at common law<sup>89</sup> recover his current pay if he is justifiably dismissed for misconduct during the period at the end of which he is to be paid.<sup>90</sup>

<sup>81</sup> e.g., because he has resold under a contract from which s.30(2A) is excluded: see below, at n.83.

<sup>82</sup> As in Gunliffe v Harrison (1851) 6 Ex. 901, below, p.787, where the excess (of 50 per cent) was far from "slight".

<sup>83</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1989, s.30(5).

<sup>84</sup> Regent OHG Aisenstadt und Barig v Francesco di Jermyn Street [1981] 3 All E.R. 327: such a case is governed by s.31(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979. For the contrast between s.31(2) and s.30(1), see above, p.773, n.82. Quaere whether s.30(1) should not apply to the short-delivered instalment itself.

<sup>85</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673; above, p.783.

<sup>86</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320; above, p.782.

<sup>87</sup> Taylor v Laird (1856) 25 L.J.Ex. 329; Button v Thompson (1869) L.R. 4 C.P. 330.

<sup>88</sup> Warburton v Heyworth (1880) 6 Q.B.D. 1.

<sup>89</sup> For the position under the Apportionment Act 1870, s.2, see below, p.824.

<sup>90</sup> Ridgway v Hungerford Market Co (1835) 3 A. & E. 171; Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339. Seem that he can recover remuneration which became due before dismissal though it was earned after a breach of duty justifying dismissal: Healey v SA Française Rubastic [1917] 1 K.B. 947. As to commission on transactions tainted by bribes, see above, p.746. For the position where the employee is not dismissed see below, pp.821–822.

Where a contract imposes severable obligations, a party who has fully performed the specified part can recover the corresponding payment even though his failure to complete the whole of the promised performance is a breach of contract. In Ritchie v Atkinson<sup>91</sup> a shipowner agreed to carry a cargo at a stipulated rate per ton. He carried only part of the cargo, and was entitled to recover a corresponding proportion of the freight. But he was later held liable in damages for failing to carry the rest of the cargo.<sup>92</sup> There is a similar liability in damages where performance of one of the specified parts is completed but is defective because it in some way falls short of the performance promised. For example, an employee may serve for the full payment period but fail or refuse, in the course of that period, to carry out some task which he was contractually obliged to perform. The employer is then entitled to damages in respect of that failure or refusal even though he may be bound to pay the agreed remuneration.<sup>93</sup> Whether he is so bound, and what other remedies may be available to him, are matters to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>94</sup>

(c) DISTINCTION BETWEEN ENTIRE AND SEVERABLE OBLIGATIONS. In discussions of the cases so far considered, it is sometimes said that the contracts are entire or severable. But this is misleading: what is entire or severable is a particular obligation<sup>95</sup> arising under the contract. The point is most easily illustrated by reference to contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. Suppose a shipowner agrees to carry 1,000 tons at a stated rate, due on delivery, for each ton carried to London. If he carries 1,000 tons to Southampton he is not entitled to any freight<sup>96</sup>; if he carries 750 tons to London he is prima facie entitled to three quarters of the freight<sup>97</sup>; and if he carries 1,000 tons to London but the goods arrive damaged, he will be entitled to full freight<sup>98</sup> unless the damage is so serious that the description under which the goods have been shipped ceases to apply to them: for example, where cement solidifies as a result of being damaged by water.<sup>99</sup>

The same point may be illustrated by further reference to Cutter v Powell: the obligation to serve for the whole voyage was entire, but it has been said that, if the

<sup>91</sup> (1808) 10 East 295.

<sup>92</sup> Atkinson v Ritchie, ibid. at 530.

<sup>93</sup> Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216, where the measure of damages was not in dispute. In Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 560 the measure of damages in case of an employee's refusal to perform the specified contractual duties for part of the agreed working time is said to be the wages for the "lost hours of work." cf. ibid. at 568. But these dicta were obiter (no claim for damages having been made); and strictly speaking the measure of damages should be the loss suffered by the employer, which is not necessarily the same as the wages for the lost hours. cf. below, pp.944, 1056–1057.

<sup>94</sup> See below, pp.786, 821–822.

<sup>95</sup> cf. Cobec Brazilian Trading & Warehousing Corp v Alfred C Toepfer [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 528 at 531 ("indivisible obligation"); affirmed [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386; Baltic Shipping Co Ltd v Dillon (1993) 176 C.L.R. 344 at 350.

<sup>96</sup> See above, pp.782–783; below, p.820.

<sup>97</sup> Ritchie v Atkinson (1808) 10 East 295. If the contract provides for a "lump sum" freight, the shipowner will, in such a situation, be entitled to the entire freight: Merchant Shipping Co v Armitage (1873) 1 L.R. 9 Q.B. 99; Thomas v Harrowing SS Co [1915] A.C. 58. He will also be entitled to the whole freight if the contract provides for freight to be computed by reference to the quantity taken on board though it is only payable after discharge of the cargo: see The Aries [1977] 1 W.L.R. 185; The Metula [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 5; unless the contract provides for a deduction to be made if the quantity delivered is less than that taken on board, as in The Olympic Brilliance [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 205.

<sup>98</sup> Dakin v Oxley (1864) 15 C.B.(N.S.) 646; The Brede [1974] Q.B. 233 (no freight was allowed in respect of a part of the goods that was lost: see [1972] 2 Lloyd's Rep. at 514, 519; but the Court of Appeal was concerned only with the part of the goods that was damaged: [1974] Q.B. at 245).

<sup>99</sup> Duthie v Hilton (1868) L.R. 4 C.P. 138; cf. The Caspian Sea [1980] 1 W.L.R. 48; Dakin v Oxley, above, at p.664; below, p.817; contrast Britannia Distribution Co Ltd v Factor Pace Ltd [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 420 at 423.

<sup>1</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320; above, p.782.

seaman had completed the voyage and had been guilty during it of occasional breaches of duty, then the administratrix could have enforced the contract,<sup>2</sup> subject to a deduction in respect of any loss caused by those breaches.<sup>3</sup> Again, a building contract may provide for payments as the work progresses, subject to a "retention fund" to be paid over on completion. There is then a series of severable obligations to complete each stage as well as an entire obligation to complete the whole.<sup>4</sup> In Sumpter v Hedges<sup>5</sup> the builder's obligation was entire with respect to the quantity of work to be done; but his claim would not have been dismissed merely because he had failed in some other way to comply with the contract, e.g. by completing a week late<sup>6</sup> or (unless the contract had expressly made his right to payment subject to his doing the work strictly in accordance with the contract)<sup>7</sup> by completing the buildings with minor defects. Thus in Hoening v Isaacs<sup>8</sup> the claimant contracted to redecorate and furnish the defendant's flat for £750. There were minor defects in the furniture, which could have been made good for £55. The defendant argued that the claimant was entitled to no more than a reasonable remuneration for work done in accordance with the contract. But the court held that he was entitled to be paid at the full contract rate (less the cost of making the defects good), as he had substantially completed the work. The obligation of a seller of goods is, again, generally entire as to quantity, but if the correct quantity is delivered he may be able to enforce the contract in spite of the fact that the goods are defective in quality.<sup>9</sup> Of course failure to perform an obligation which is not entire may give the other party a right to rescind on some other ground, e.g. that the failure is substantial; but it does not give him this right under the present rule.

In the cases so far discussed the distinction between entire and severable obligations is clearly settled either by the express terms of the contract or by commercial practice recognised by law. But there may be no rule of law on the point and the contract may be silent or self-contradictory, e.g. where A employs B to paint A's house for £1,000 but fails to say when it is to be paid; or where the contract provides for payment of "£200 per room payable on completion." In such cases the question whether a particular obligation is entire or severable is one of construction; and where a party agrees to do work under a contract, the courts are reluctant to construe the contract so as to require complete performance before any payment becomes due. "Contracts may be so made; but they require plain words to shew that such a bargain was really intended".<sup>10</sup> If the contract contains contradictory provisions the courts tend to give greater weight to those making the obligation to work a severable one. Thus where a contract provided (1) for payment at a fixed rate per month, but (2) that nothing was to be paid till performance was complete, the first clause prevailed over the second, i.e. the contract was construed

<sup>2</sup> Hoening v Isaacs [1952] 2 All E.R. 176 at 178.

<sup>3</sup> cf. Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216; Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 570 (no right to withhold pay for "bad work" without proof of loss). (For statutory restrictions on the right to deduct damages from wages, see Employment Rights Act 1996, Pt II, below, p.788, n.32.

<sup>4</sup> Hoening v Isaacs, above, at 181.

<sup>5</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673.

<sup>6</sup> ibid. at 676.

<sup>7</sup> Eshelby v Federated European Bank [1932] 1 K.B. 423.

<sup>8</sup> [1952] 2 All E.R. 176; approving Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee [1916] 1 K.B. 566, which had been doubted in Eshelby v Federated European Bank [1932] 1 K.B. 423; Williams v Raffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 1; below, p.787, n.23.

<sup>9</sup> e.g. below, pp.795-796.

<sup>10</sup> Button v Thompson (1869) L.R. 4 C.P. 330 at 342; cf. Roberts v Havelock; (1832) 3 B. & Ad. 404; Davidson v Jones-Fenleigh (1980) 124 S.J. 204.

as imposing severable obligations.<sup>11</sup> In one type of case this hostility towards entire obligations has been reinforced by statute: an agreement by a seaman to abandon his right to wages in case the ship is lost is void.<sup>12</sup>

The reason why the courts are reluctant to construe obligations to do work as entire is that such a construction will often lead to the unjust enrichment of the party receiving the partial or defective performance.<sup>13</sup> There is no such reluctance in contracts for the sale of goods: we have seen that the buyer is not generally bound to accept a different quantity from that contracted for<sup>14</sup>; nor is he bound, unless the contract so provides,<sup>15</sup> to accept delivery in instalments.<sup>16</sup> This state of the law does not give rise to any danger of unjust enrichment: if a buyer of goods rejects delivery of the wrong quantity, the goods will be returned to the seller. But even in this type of case rejection may cause a different type of hardship to the seller, namely that of throwing back on him the risk of market fluctuations. In Cunliffe v Harrison<sup>17</sup> a seller of wine delivered more than the agreed quantity. It was held that the buyer was not bound to accept any part of the wine, "although it may be that the refusal to take the wine was not bona fide but grounded upon the fact that the wine had fallen in price".<sup>18</sup>

(d) SO-CALLED DOCTRINE OF SUBSTANTIAL PERFORMANCE.<sup>19</sup> Cases such as Hoenig v Isaacs<sup>20</sup> are sometimes explained on the ground that the claimant had "substantially" performed an "entire contract".<sup>21</sup> It is submitted that the explanation is unsatisfactory since it is based on the error that contracts, as opposed to particular obligations, can be entire.<sup>22</sup> The basis of Hoenig v Isaacs is that the builder, even if he was under an entire obligation as to the quantity of work to be done, was under no such obligation as to its quality.<sup>23</sup> Defects of quality therefore fell to be considered under the general requirement of substantial failure, and on the facts there was no such failure.<sup>24</sup> To say that an obligation is entire means that it must be completely performed before payment becomes due. Suppose a contract is made to carry goods from Melbourne to London and the freight is payable on delivery in London. If the goods are carried only to Southampton, the carrier may have "substantially" performed; but he is not entitled to the freight.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>11</sup> See The Juliana (1822) 2 Dods. 504.

<sup>12</sup> Merchant Shipping Act 1995, s.38(1) (reversing the common law rule that freight was the "mother of wages").

<sup>13</sup> See below, pp.819–820.

<sup>14</sup> See above, p.783.

<sup>15</sup> On this question of construction, contrast Reuter v Sala (1879) 4 C.P.D. 239 with Brandt v Lawrence (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 344.

<sup>16</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.31(1).

<sup>17</sup> (1851) 6 Ex. 901.

<sup>18</sup> ibid. at 907; of course it is possible that the seller was not acting bona fide either but that he was trying to unload an excessive quantity on a falling market.

<sup>19</sup> Beck, 38 M.L.R. 413.

<sup>20</sup> [1952] 2 All E.R. 176; above, p.786.

<sup>21</sup> Geipel v Smith (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 404 at 411; cf. Dakin v Lee [1916] 1 K.B. 566 at 598; Sim v Rotherham MBC [1987] Ch. 216 at 253; Wiluszynski v Tower Hamlets L.B.C. [1989] I.C.R. 493 at 499; Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 1 at 8–10; no such view is in terms stated by the court in Hoenig v Isaacs, above.

<sup>22</sup> See above, p.785.

<sup>23</sup> Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 1 (where a subcontractor recovered instalments subject to a "small deduction for defective and incomplete items" (ibid. at 17) purports to follow Hoenig v Isaacs, but that case was concerned only with defective, not with incomplete, items.

<sup>24</sup> Contrast Lamson v Supasink (1984) Tr.L. 37 (where qualitative defects in kitchen installations were sufficiently serious to justify rescission).

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.782; cf. Metcalfe v Britannia Ironworks (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 423.

In relation to “entire” obligations, there is no scope for any doctrine of “substantial performance”.

(3) Conditions, warranties and intermediate terms

(a) STATEMENT OF THE DISTINCTION. English law has for some considerable time recognised a distinction between two classes of contractual terms: conditions and warranties. “Condition” is here used (in its promissory sense<sup>26</sup>) to refer to a contractual term, the breach of which gives the injured party the right to rescind the contract. Of course he need not rescind but may instead affirm; and he can claim damages whether he affirms<sup>27</sup> or rescinds.<sup>28</sup> A warranty, on the other hand, is a term “the breach of which gives rise to a claim for damages but not to a right . . . to treat the contract as repudiated,”<sup>29</sup> so that the injured party is not entitled to rescind merely<sup>30</sup> on account of such a breach.<sup>31</sup> The injured party can generally set up the damages to which he is entitled by reason of a breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price<sup>32</sup> and if they are equal to, or exceed, the price he will not have to pay anything. Such an outcome may seem to resemble rescission (in the sense of refusal to pay); but the process differs from rescission in that it requires the injured party to prove both the breach and his loss, while rescission requires him to prove no more than the breach.

(b) NATURE OF THE DISTINCTION. Earlier in this Chapter we saw that the phrases “condition precedent” and “concurrent condition” were used to make a point about the

<sup>26</sup> See above, p.62.

<sup>27</sup> e.g. Aruna Mills Ltd v Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 Q.B. 655; the test of affirmation seems to be the same here as in the law of misrepresentation so that mere lapse of time will not suffice: Allen v Robles [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1193; cf. above, p.385.

<sup>28</sup> See, e.g. Millar's Machinery Co Ltd v David Way & Son (1935) 40 Com.Cas. 204; Lesters Leather & Skin Co Ltd v Home & Overseas Brokers Ltd (1949) 82 Ll.L.Rep. 203; Heaven & Kesterton Ltd v Et Francois Altiac & Cie [1956] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 316; New India Assurance Co Ltd v Yeo Beng Chao [1972] 1 W.L.R. 786; Microbeads AG v Vinshurst Road Markings Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 218 at 225; cf. General Billposting Co v Atkinson [1909] A.C. 118; Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders and Shippers Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 459 at 473 (but see ibid. at 477); and cf. below, p.851.

<sup>29</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.61(1) (definition of “warranty”).

<sup>30</sup> See below, pp.804–805.

<sup>31</sup> cf. United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904, 945; and see below, p.796, n.13. For a possible statutory exception, see below, p.805.

<sup>32</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(1)(a); cf. the right of a buyer who “deals as consumer” (see s.61(5A) of the 1979 Act) in certain cases to “require the seller to reduce the price”, as an alternative to rescission for breach of condition, under s.48C(1)(a) of the 1979 Act (as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045, reg.5)). The measure of such price reduction is not, however, necessarily the same as the measure of damages under s.53(3): see below, p.952. For the right to set off damages against agreed sums to be paid under other types of contracts, see Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd v Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd [1974] A.C. 689. Sim v Rotherham MBC [1987] Ch. 216; UCB Leasing v Holtom [1987] R.T.R. 362; Connaught Restaurants Ltd v Indoor Leisure Ltd [1994] 1 W.L.R. 501; Eller v Grovecrest Investments Ltd [1995] Q.B. 272; cf. Miles v Wakefield MDC [1987] A.C. 539; for statutory restrictions, see Employment Rights Act 1996, Pt. II. The process is not available against a claim for freight under a voyage charterparty: The Brede [1974] Q.B. 233; The Aries [1977] 1 W.L.R. 185. Although this rule was described as “anomalous” in James & Co Scheepvaart en Handelsmij BV v Chinacrest Ltd [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 126 at 129, and as “arbitrary” in Dole Dried Fruit and Nut Co v Trustin Kerwood Ltd [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 309 at 310 it has been extended in various ways: The Cleon [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 587; RH & D International Ltd v SAS Animal Air Services Ltd [1984] 2 All E.R. 203; The Elena [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 425; The Khian Captain (No.2) [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 429; The Dominique [1989] A.C. 1059 (applying the rule to a repudiatory breach on account of which the charterer rescinded); United Carriers Ltd v Heritage Food Group (UK) Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 371 (domestic carriage); Britannia Distribution Co Ltd v Factor Pace Ltd [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 420 at 423. For the similar position under time charterparties, see Federal Commerce Navigation Co Ltd v Molena Alpha Inc [1978] Q.B. 927; affirmed without deciding this point [1979] A.C. 997; The Kostas Melas [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 18 at 25; The Cebu [1983] Q.B. 1005 at 1011–1012; The Aditya Vaibav [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 573.

order of performance.<sup>33</sup> At this stage, the word “condition” is used to make a different point, namely, one about the conformity<sup>34</sup> of the performance rendered with that promised. In the first of these two senses, the performance by one party may be a “condition precedent” to the liability of the other; in the second it is a term of the contract which is described as the “condition”. It is perfectly possible for a party to comply with a condition in one of these senses but not in the other: for example, a seller of goods by sample who has agreed to give credit may deliver the goods before being paid and so perform a “condition precedent,” but if the goods turn out not to correspond with the sample he will be in breach of “condition”.<sup>35</sup> The distinction was formerly obscured by use of the phrase “condition precedent” in cases concerned with conformity, rather than with order of performance<sup>36</sup>: thus “condition precedent” was used to refer both to a term of a contract and to an event, i.e. the prior or concurrent performance by one party before that of the other became due. The use of the same phrase in these two senses is, however, confusing since the effects of one party’s failure to perform a “condition precedent” or a “concurrent condition” differ in two ways from those of breach of “condition” (as opposed to warranty). First, a failure of the former kind only justifies refusal by the injured party to perform for so long as the failure continues<sup>37</sup>; while breach of condition justifies rescission in the sense of an outright refusal<sup>38</sup> to perform and to accept further performance from the party in breach. Secondly, the injured party’s right to refuse to perform so long as a condition precedent or concurrent condition remains unperformed can be exercised without any previous election by the injured party (whose position is simply that his performance is not yet due<sup>39</sup>); while such an election is required for the purpose of the more drastic remedy of rescission (in the sense of an outright refusal of the kind just described) for breach of condition.<sup>40</sup> Modern authority accordingly recognises the distinction between the two concepts<sup>41</sup> and tends<sup>42</sup> to use the phrase “condition” when discussing conformity, and “condition precedent” when discussing the order of performance. That usage is adopted in this Chapter so that “condition precedent” is contrasted with “concurrent condition” and “independent covenant”; while “condition” (without any qualifying adjective) is contrasted with “warranty” and “intermediate term”.<sup>43</sup>

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.761.

<sup>34</sup> Conformity includes time of performance: it is possible for performance to be rendered at the wrong time but in the right order: e.g. where goods are sold for cash on delivery on January 1 but are delivered on January 8.

<sup>35</sup> See below, p.792.

<sup>36</sup> e.g. Glaholm v Hays (1841) 2 Man. & G. 257, 267; Behn v Burness (1863) 3 B. & S. 751 at 755; Bentsen v Taylor [1893] 2 Q.B. 274 at 281.

<sup>37</sup> See above, pp.765–766.

<sup>38</sup> It is assumed that the time for “curing” the breach, under the rule stated at p.698 above, has expired.

<sup>39</sup> See The Good Luck, [1992] 1 A.C. 233 at 262.

<sup>40</sup> See below, p.754.

<sup>41</sup> e.g. State Trading Corporation of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 277 at 284 treating “condition” and “condition precedent” as distinct concepts; Treitel, 106 L.Q.R. 185; cf. Universal Bulk Carriers Ltd v Andre & Cie [2001] EWCA Civ 588; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 65 at [42]: “not a condition of the contract or a condition precedent to the performance by either party” (italics supplied).

<sup>42</sup> But not invariably: see, e.g. The Aktion [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 283 at 285; Soon Hua Seng Co Ltd v Glencore Grain Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 398 at 402; The Niizura [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 66 at 70. For failure to recognise the distinction, see also Alfred McAlpine plc v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 437 at 441, 444; requirement that insured must give notice of claim “as soon as possible” held not to be a “condition precedent” so that delay in giving such notice was no bar to a claim; but clearly notice had to be given before insurer could be held liable.

<sup>43</sup> See below, p.795.

(c) BASES OF THE DISTINCTION. The distinction between conditions and warranties was originally based on two factors. One was the intention of the parties, as expressed in the contract: hence the question into which category a stipulation fell was treated as one of construction.<sup>44</sup> But often the intention of the parties in this respect was not discoverable from the words used; and so the courts relied secondly on the general requirement of substantial failure in performance. If "performance of the stipulation [went] to the very root . . . of the contract",<sup>45</sup> then the stipulation was treated as a condition. We shall see that a term may also be treated as a condition on other grounds<sup>46</sup>; but the actually or potentially serious effects of breach are still taken into account in deciding, in cases of first impression, whether the term broken is to be classified as a condition.<sup>47</sup> If a contractual term<sup>48</sup> relates to "a substantial ingredient in the identity of the thing sold",<sup>49</sup> it will be classified as a condition, and its breach will entitle the victim to rescind, on the theory that it would be unjust to require him to accept and pay for something which differed in an important way from that for which he had contracted. A warranty, on the other hand, concerns some less important or subsidiary element of the contract. Its breach does not entitle the victim to rescind, on the theory that a minor breach can be adequately remedied by the payment of money.

This approach can be seen in a number of cases in which decisions were based on the commercial importance of the term to the injured party: for example, if a buyer said that he would not buy goods at all unless they had a certain quality, then this fact would tend to support the view that an undertaking with respect to that quality was a condition.<sup>50</sup> Where there is no such evidence of intention, the court will base its decision on its own view of the commercial importance of the term. The older authorities on this question must be treated with caution, because in them the word "warranty" was sometimes used to refer to what would now be called a "condition".<sup>51</sup> But the cases do establish that there are certain terms the breach of which prima facie gives rise to a right to rescind and which are therefore "conditions" in the terminology now current. In Behn v Burness<sup>52</sup> a ship was described in a charterparty as "now in the port of Amsterdam" when in fact she was elsewhere. It was held that the charterer was entitled to rescind: the statement was a condition because of the commercial importance which charterers usually attach to such descriptive statements. Similarly, a statement that a ship will sail on a certain day

<sup>44</sup> Glaholm v Hays (1841) 2 Man. & G. 257 at 266; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.11(3); cf. Tradax Export SA v European Grain & Shipping Co [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 100; George Hunt Cranes Ltd v Scottish Boiler & General Insurance Co Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1964; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 366, at [10, 11].

<sup>45</sup> Glaholm v Hays, above, at 268; cf. Bentsen v Taylor [1893] 2 Q.B. 274 at 281.

<sup>46</sup> See below, p.791.

<sup>47</sup> Thus the fact that the breach is not likely to cause serious prejudice can support the view that the term is not a condition: see State Trading Corporation of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277, below, p.799; Alfred McAlpine plc v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437 at 444; The Mercandian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563, at [14].

<sup>48</sup> See Hurlingdon & Leinster Enterprises Ltd v Christopher Hull Fine Art Ltd [1991] 1 Q.B. 564 at 586 (where the statement was held not to be a contractual term: above, p.355).

<sup>49</sup> Couchman v Hill [1947] K.B. 544 at 559.

<sup>50</sup> cf. Bannerman v White (1861) 10 C.B.(N.S.) 844; above, p.354.

<sup>51</sup> e.g. in Behn v Burness (1863) 3 B. & S. 751 at 755: "a warranty, that is to say a condition . . .". A similar (though not identical) usage has survived in insurance law: see, below, p.846; cf. Hadenfayre Ltd v British National Insurance Society [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 393 at 401. See also Food Act 1984, s.102(1)(a); Lambert v Lemis [1982] A.C. 225 at 273, 276, where Lord Diplock refers to the implied terms classified as conditions in s.14 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 as "warranties"; and see The Evia (No.2) [1983] 1 A.C. 736 at 765.

<sup>52</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 751; cf. The New Prosper [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 93 (statement as to ship's ability to comply with load port regulations); The Aegean Dolphin [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 178 (statement as to speed of cruise ship).

has been treated as a condition in a charterparty.<sup>53</sup> The same is true of a statement in a charterparty that the ship is "expected ready to load" on or about a certain day.<sup>54</sup> The commercial importance of such a statement is, indeed, reduced by the rule that the shipowner will not be in breach merely because the ship is not ready on or about the day named. The term is broken only if the statement was made dishonestly or without reasonable grounds,<sup>55</sup> so that it does not give the charterer any firm assurance as to the date of readiness. The classification of the statement as a condition can, however, be justified on the ground that a shipowner who has made such a statement dishonestly or without reasonable grounds, is in a poor position to complain of any prejudice which he may suffer as a result of rescission.<sup>56</sup>

The reasoning of the cases discussed above is based on the requirement of serious failure in performance; and emphasis on this requirement gave rise at one time to the view that a term could be a condition only if "every breach . . . [of it would] . . . deprive the party not in breach of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract".<sup>57</sup> But this view was rejected by the House of Lords in Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA, where Lord Roskill said that there were "many cases . . . where terms the breaches of which do not deprive the innocent party of substantially the whole benefit which he was intended to receive from the contract were nonetheless held to be conditions any breach of which entitled the innocent party to rescind".<sup>58</sup> The statement that "conditions . . . have the property that any breach of them is treated as going to the root of the contract"<sup>59</sup> must similarly be viewed with caution. It is accurate only in the sense that a breach of condition, like one going to the root of the contract, gives rise to a right to rescind; but that right arises, in the two cases, for different reasons. Where the breach actually "goes to the root of the contract", the right to rescind is intended to protect the injured party from serious prejudice; where the breach is one of condition, that right is intended to promote certainty, "without regard to the magnitude of the breach".<sup>60</sup> For this reason, breach of condition is here treated as an exception to, and not as an application of, the requirement of substantial failure in performance.

(d) EXPRESS CLASSIFICATION BY THE PARTIES. One basis for distinguishing conditions from warranties is the intention of the parties<sup>61</sup>; and the courts continue to rely on this factor where that intention can be ascertained.<sup>62</sup> Thus if a contract expressly says that a particular term is a condition,<sup>63</sup> that term will generally be so regarded; and the same is true where the contract expressly states that rescission will be available on breach of <sup>53</sup> Glaholm v Hays (1841) 2 Man. & G. 257; cf. Bentsen v Taylor [1893] 2 Q.B. 274 (statement that ship "now sailed or about to sail" held to be a condition).

<sup>54</sup> The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 164; Horton Rogers, 34 M.L.R. 190; Greig, 89 L.Q.R. 93; cf. The Mavro Vetrancic [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 580 at 584 (estimated time of ship's arrival); The Balcares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 225.

<sup>55</sup> Scrutton on Charterparties and Bills of Lading (20th ed.), pp.92-94.

<sup>56</sup> The Mihalis Angelos, above, at 205. The charterer could also rescind for misrepresentation: ibid. p.194.

<sup>57</sup> Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 69, per Diplock L.J.; cf. United Scientific Holdings v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 928.

<sup>58</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 724; cf. ibid. at 715-716, 718. On this point the House of Lords followed the reasoning of Megaw L.J. in the Court of Appeal: see [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 294 at 305. Lord Diplock himself took a similar view in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849. His earlier view is, perhaps, reflected in Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 391.

<sup>59</sup> Lombard North Central plc v Butterworth [1987] Q.B. 527 at 535.

<sup>60</sup> ibid. (referring, apparently, to terms which are conditions by express classification of the parties).

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.790.

<sup>62</sup> Astley Industrial Trust Ltd v Grimley [1963] 1 W.L.R. 584 at 590; Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 716.

<sup>63</sup> e.g. Dawson's Ltd v Bonnin [1922] 2 A.C. 413.

the term.<sup>64</sup> But if a term can be broken in a way which will cause only trifling (if any) loss, the court may hold that such a breach will not justify rescission even though the term is called a "condition" in the contract. In Wickman Ltd v Schuler AG<sup>65</sup> it was a "condition" of a four-year distributorship agreement that the distributor should visit six named customers once a week. The House of Lords held that the contract could not be rescinded merely because this term had been broken. The parties could not have intended the agreement to mean that a failure to make only one out of an obligatory total of some 1,400 visits should have such drastic results. More probably they had used "condition" in a nontechnical sense, to mean simply a term of the contract (as in the phrase "conditions of sale"). This view was supported by the fact that another clause in the contract conferred an express power of "determination" for any "material" breach: such a power can be exercised only if the breach is a "serious" one, in the sense discussed earlier in this Chapter.<sup>66</sup>

A term may be classified as a condition either by the express agreement of the parties or by law (i.e. by a previous judicial decision<sup>67</sup> or by statute<sup>68</sup>). One possible explanation of the cases in which a term has been classified by law as a condition is that the parties "have agreed . . . by implication of law"<sup>69</sup> that any breach of the term should give rise to the right to rescind. But this does not differ in substance from saying that there is a rule of law giving the injured party the right to rescind for the breach<sup>70</sup>: rescission is allowed, in these cases, even though the parties have not actually agreed that breach of the term should have this effect and even though the breach has not prejudiced the injured party seriously, or at all.

(e) STATUTORY CLASSIFICATION. In some cases the question whether a particular term is a condition or a warranty is determined by statute. The outstanding example of statutory classification is to be found in ss.12 to 15 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979,<sup>71</sup> which lay down in some detail which of the implied terms in a contract for the sale of goods are conditions and which are warranties. A full discussion of these provisions will be found in works on the sale of goods; but it is interesting to note that most of them are implied conditions (thus favouring the buyer's right to reject<sup>72</sup>); and a few of them may be mentioned here to illustrate the distinction between conditions and warranties. It is an implied condition that goods sold by description shall correspond with the

<sup>64</sup> Harling v Eddy [1951] 2 K.B. 739; George Hunt Cranes Ltd v Scottish Boiler & General Insurance Ltd [2001] F.W.C.A. Civ 1964; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 366.

<sup>65</sup> [1974] A.C. 235; Baker [1973] C.L.J. 196; Brownsword, 37 M.L.R. 104.

<sup>66</sup> See above, pp.770 et seq.; e.g. Gholite Ltd v Jasper Conran Ltd, The Times, January 28, 1998.

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.790.

<sup>68</sup> See below.

<sup>69</sup> Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849.

<sup>70</sup> cf. the discussion of "terms implied in law" as legal duties at pp.206–211, above.

<sup>71</sup> As amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, ss.1, 7(1) and Sch.2 para.5 and by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), reg.3.

<sup>72</sup> This is also true of the similar terms implied in other contracts for the supply of goods by Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973, ss.8–11 (as substituted by Consumer Credit Act 1974, Sch.4, para.35 and amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch.2, para.4) and by Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, ss.2–5, 7–10, as amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch.2, para.6. For further amendments of ss.4 and 9 of the 1982 Act and of s.10 of the 1973 Act (all of which deal with implied conditions as to the quality or fitness of goods), see Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, above, regs 7, 10 and 13. Contrast the Vienna Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (above, p.29) which has not yet been ratified by the UK. The Convention does not distinguish between conditions and warranties, but in art.49(1) makes the buyer's right to "declare the contract avoided" depend (generally) on a "fundamental breach" (as defined by art.25), thus favouring the seller. A full discussion of the complex system or remedies under the Convention is beyond the scope of this book.

contractual description,<sup>73</sup> that goods sold by sample shall correspond with the sample,<sup>74</sup> and (in certain cases) that goods shall be of satisfactory quality and fit for a particular purpose.<sup>75</sup> The right to rescind for breach of these implied conditions is subject to a statutory restriction to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>76</sup> There is an implied condition that the seller has the right to sell the goods,<sup>77</sup> but only an implied warranty that they are free from charges or incumbrances in favour of third parties.<sup>78</sup> To allow the seller to enforce the contract, when he had no right to sell, would generally<sup>79</sup> cause hardship to the buyer, as he would have to give the goods up to the true owner. But there is less hardship if the goods are subject to third party charges; these can simply be paid off so that the buyer can adequately and conveniently be compensated by damages.

The distinction between conditions and warranties does not apply to quantitative defects in the performance of a contract for the sale of goods. Subject to restrictions already discussed,<sup>80</sup> such defects justify rescission even though they cause little or no prejudice to the buyer.<sup>81</sup>

(f) TECHNICAL APPLICATIONS OF THE DISTINCTION. In some cases, rescission is allowed simply because the term broken has previously been classified as a condition. It is allowed even though there is no indication in the contract that the parties intended the remedy to be available, and even though the breach causes little prejudice, or none at all, to the injured party. Cases of this kind give rise to the question why the injured party should, in such circumstances, be entitled to rescind.

Sometimes, this result is justified by an argument based on hypothetical hardship. Rescission is allowed because the breach might have caused serious prejudice, irrespective of the question whether it actually did so. In one case,<sup>82</sup> for example, a seller of tinned fruit said to be packed in cases of 30 tins delivered cases of 24 tins. There was no evidence that this had caused any prejudice to the buyer, whose real motive for rejecting the goods was that they had arrived late; but this was not a matter for which the seller was responsible. The rejection was nevertheless held to be justified. Scrutton L.J. said: "a man who has bought . . . 30 tins to the case may have resold under the same description, and may be placed in considerable difficulty by having goods tendered to him which do not comply with the description under which he bought or under which he has resold".<sup>83</sup>

In other cases, no attempt is made to justify the result even by reference to such hypothetical hardship. Thus in Arcos Ltd v Ronaasen<sup>84</sup> timber was bought for the purpose of making cement barrels and was described in the contract as half an inch thick. Most of the timber delivered was in fact  $\frac{9}{16}$  in. thick, but this did not in the least impair its usefulness for making cement barrels. It was held that the buyers were nevertheless entitled to reject and it seems probable that their motive for wishing to do so was not that the timber did not comply with the description but that the market price

<sup>73</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.13.

<sup>74</sup> ibid., s.15.

<sup>75</sup> ibid., s.14.

<sup>76</sup> See below, p.800.

<sup>77</sup> ibid., s.12(1); an express term to this effect is likewise a condition: Barber v NSW Bank Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 641.

<sup>78</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.12(2).

<sup>79</sup> For an exception, see Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.12(3) (agreement to transfer only such title as seller or third party may have).

<sup>80</sup> See above, pp.783–784.

<sup>81</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(1) and (2).

<sup>82</sup> Re Moore & Co Ltd and Landauer Co [1921] 2 K.B. 519.

<sup>83</sup> ibid. at 525.

<sup>84</sup> [1933] A.C. 470.

of the timber had fallen. Similarly, goods may be sold on the terms that they will be (or have been) shipped within a particular month. Such a term is part of the description of the goods and if they are shipped by so much as a day before or after the stipulated period the buyer can reject.<sup>85</sup> He can do this even though the early or late shipment does not in the least affect the value of the goods or prejudice him in any way; and even though his motive for rejection is simply to escape from a bad bargain on a falling market. And it seems that a charterer can rescind for breach of the condition as to the position of the ship or as to the date when she will sail<sup>86</sup> even though the breach did not cause him any loss and even though his real motive for rescinding was that freight rates had fallen.<sup>87</sup>

Such decisions can perhaps be explained on the ground that they promote certainty. Once a term has been classified as a "condition", the injured party can safely rescind for breach of it, without having to consider the often difficult question whether the breach amounted to a "substantial" failure in performance. On the other hand, in some of the examples given above, the exercise of the right to rescind can occasion obvious hardship to the party in breach: it results in his having to bear a loss that was not caused by the breach at all, but by market movements. For this reason, there has been some judicial reaction against the authorities which give a wide scope to the right to rescind; and in contracts for the supply of goods that right has also been limited by legislation.

(g) RESTRICTIONS OF TECHNICAL APPLICATIONS. In Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen Tangen<sup>88</sup> Lord Wilberforce<sup>89</sup> said that some of the authorities just discussed<sup>90</sup> were "excessively technical and due for fresh examination in this House"<sup>91</sup>; and that generally, where goods are sold by description, the court should "ask whether a particular item in a description constitutes a substantial ingredient in the identity of the thing sold, and only if it does . . . treat it as a condition".<sup>92</sup> However, he recognised a possible exception in the case of "unascertained future goods (e.g. commodities) as to which each detail of the description must be assumed to be vital".<sup>93</sup> Since such goods often pass rapidly through many hands, the argument of commercial certainty is in such cases particularly strong: it is important for each buyer to be able to tell at once whether some defect or misdescription justifies rejection.

The judicial reaction against the excessively technical use of the right to rescind is illustrated by Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen Tangen itself. The case arose out of the subcharter of a tanker then under construction and therefore not yet named. In the contract, she was accordingly described as "Yard No. 354 at Osaka . . ." (the name of the shipbuilder). She was built elsewhere, but by a company under Osaka's control and in accordance with the physical specifications in the subcharter. The tanker market fell and the subcharterers sought to reject, but it was held that they were not entitled to do so. The phrase "Yard No. 354 at Osaka" was not part of the description but a mere substitute for a name: it was a means of identification, which, in the circumstances, had <sup>85</sup> Bowes v Shand (1877) 2 App.Cas. 455. The duty to tender conforming shipping documents (e.g. in performance of a c.i.f. contract) is similarly a condition: The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 40 at 70; Soon Hua Seng Co v Glencore Grain Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 398; Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §19-142.

<sup>86</sup> Behn v Burness (1863) 3 B. & S. 751; Glaholm v Hays (1842) 2 Man. & G. 257.

<sup>87</sup> This seems to have been the position in Glaholm v Hays, above.

<sup>88</sup> [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989; cf. Sanko SS Co Ltd v Kano Trading Co Ltd [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 156.

<sup>89</sup> With whom Lords Simon and Kilbrandon agreed.

<sup>90</sup> i.e. Re Moore & Co Ltd and Landauer Co [1921] 2 K.B. 519 and Behn v Burness, above, "as interpreted."

<sup>91</sup> [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989, 998. cf. the criticism of the effects of breach of "warranty" in insurance law (above, p.790, n.51) in Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852 at 893-894.

<sup>92</sup> [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989 at 998.

<sup>93</sup> ibid.

not failed. The effect of the case is to reintroduce the requirement of substantial failure into this branch of the law by making it part of the definition of a “description”<sup>94</sup>; and by thus narrowing the scope of an implied term which is undoubtedly a condition, i.e. the term requiring the goods to correspond with the contractual description.

(h) INTERMEDIATE OR INNOMINATE TERMS. The courts have also achieved a result similar to that just described by reducing the number of terms which are to be classified as conditions. They have done so by recognising that the distinction between conditions and warranties is not exhaustive. As Diplock L.J. has said: “There are many . . . contractual undertakings . . . which cannot be categorised as being ‘conditions’ or ‘warranties’. . . . Of such undertakings, all that can be predicated is that some breaches will and others will not give rise to an event which will deprive the party not in default of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain.”<sup>95</sup> These “intermediate or innominate terms”<sup>96</sup> differ from conditions, in that their breach does not of itself give rise to a right to rescind; and from warranties in that the injured party’s remedy is not even prima facie restricted to damages. He can rescind for breach of an intermediate term if, but only if, the requirement of substantial failure is satisfied.<sup>97</sup> Thus it has been held that a shipowner’s undertakings in a charterparty to provide a seaworthy ship<sup>98</sup> and to use reasonable despatch<sup>99</sup> are not conditions, so that the mere fact that they are not performed will not entitle the charterer to rescind. The same is true of the charterer’s obligation to load within the time stipulated in the charterparty, so that the mere fact of delay will not justify rescission by the shipowner.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, it has been held that a time-charterer’s obligation to repair the ship before redelivery is not a condition, so that his failure to repair does not, of itself, justify the shipowner’s refusal to accept redelivery<sup>2</sup>; and it is probable that his breach ordering the ship to embark on a voyage which is illegitimate (because it cannot be completed within the period of the charter) will not of itself entitle the shipowner to rescind.<sup>3</sup> Some terms implied by statute seem also to fall into the category of intermediate terms. This seems to be true of the terms implied by the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 into contracts for the supply of services, that the services will be carried out with due care and skill and in a reasonable time; for the Act describes them simply as “terms”<sup>4</sup> (as opposed to the “conditions” and “warranties” implied into contracts for the supply of goods by the same Act).<sup>5</sup>

There was formerly some doubt on the question whether the category of intermediate terms existed in relation to contracts for the sale of goods. One view was that, as the Sale

<sup>94</sup> See above at n.92.

<sup>95</sup> Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kamasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 70.

<sup>96</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 714.

<sup>97</sup> e.g. Freeman v Taylor (1831) 8 Bing. 124; cf. The Antaios [1985] A.C. 191 at 200 (“fundamental breach of an innominate term”); Federal Commerce & Navigation v Molena Alpha [1979] A.C. 757, esp. at 779; The Honam Jade [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 38. In insurance law there is the further possibility that breach by the insured of an intermediate term relating to a claim may entitle the insurer to reject that claim but not to avoid the whole policy: see Alfred McAlpine plc v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 437 at 444; The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275 at [14]; [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 563.

<sup>98</sup> Hongkong Fir case, above; cf. The Ymnos [1982] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 574; The Torenia [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 210 at 217.

<sup>99</sup> Clipsham v Vertue (1843) 5 Q.B. 265; MacAndrew v Chapple (1886) 1 L.R. 1 C.P. 643.

<sup>1</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401; The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210.

<sup>2</sup> Attica Sea Carriers Corp v Ferrostaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 250 at 253, 256.

<sup>3</sup> The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1476, where it was not necessary to decide the point as the owner was entitled to rescind on the ground stated at p.808, below.

<sup>4</sup> Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, ss.13, 14.

<sup>5</sup> ibid. ss.2–5 and 7–10; for amendments, see above, p.792, n.72.

of Goods Act 1979 referred only to two classes of terms (conditions and warranties), the further category of intermediate terms was impliedly excluded. But this view was rejected in The Hansa Nord.<sup>6</sup> Citrus pulp pellets had been sold for £100,000 under a contract which provided for "shipment to be made in good condition." Part of the goods had not been so shipped; and this fact reduced by some £20,000 the market value of the whole which would, if the goods had been sound, have been £86,000 at the time of their arrival.<sup>7</sup> The buyers rejected the goods which were later resold pursuant to a court order and eventually reacquired by the original buyers for just under £34,000. The buyers then used the goods for the originally intended purpose of making cattle food, though the defective part of the goods yielded slightly lower extraction percentages than sound goods would have done. The Court of Appeal held that rejection was not justified. The provision as to shipment in good condition was neither a condition nor a warranty but an intermediate term; and there was no finding that the effect of its breach was sufficiently serious to justify rejection. The buyers seem to have tried to reject, not because the utility of the goods was impaired, but because they saw an opportunity of acquiring them at well below the originally agreed price. In these circumstances their only remedy was in damages: they were entitled to the difference in value between damaged and sound goods at the agreed destination.<sup>8</sup>

The category of intermediate terms is thus established and is of general application. Its existence does, however, give rise to two further problems:

(i) Are there three categories of terms? This is a largely terminological problem.<sup>9</sup> The general view is that there are three classes of contractual terms: conditions, the breach of which at common law<sup>10</sup> invariably gives rise to a right to rescind; warranties, the breach of which gives rise only to a right to damages; and intermediate terms, the breach of which gives rise to a right to rescind if it is sufficiently serious, but otherwise sounds only in damages. There is, however, some support for the alternative view that there are only two categories: conditions and other terms.<sup>11</sup> This view is based on the argument that the injured party may be entitled to rescind even for a breach of warranty, if the effect of the breach is sufficiently serious. There is, as we shall see, considerable force in this argument<sup>12</sup> and if it is correct a warranty may be said to resemble an intermediate term, in that the availability of rescission as a remedy for breach of either type of term depends on the seriousness of the breach. Nevertheless, the weight of authority supports the continued existence of the threefold division of contractual terms.<sup>13</sup> It is respectfully

<sup>6</sup> [1976] Q.B. 44; Reynolds, 92 L.Q.R. 17; Weir [1976] C.L.J. 33; cf. The Aktion [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283.

<sup>7</sup> [1976] Q.B. 44 at 55–56, 68.

<sup>8</sup> ibid. at 63–64.

<sup>9</sup> The Ymnos [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 574 at 583.

<sup>10</sup> For statutory exceptions see below, p.800.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. in The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 44 at 60 where Lord Denning M.R. says that the court has to ask only two questions: (i) is the term broken a condition; (ii) if not, did the breach go to the root? But he also recognises warranty as a separate category at 59–60 and at 61 he expressly distinguishes between the three categories of terms.

<sup>12</sup> See below, pp.807–808.

<sup>13</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 725 (where Lord Roskill, with whom three of the other members of the House of Lords agreed, referred to a "third class of term"); Regent OHG Aisenstadt und Barig v Francesco of Jermyn Street [1981] 3 All E.R. 327 at 334; The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 563, at [13]; cf. Lord Diplock's division of stipulations as to time into three categories in United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 943. His statement in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849 of a general rule subject to two exceptions similarly amounts to a three-fold classification; for similar statements by Lord Diplock in other cases, see Bremer Vulkan Schiffbau und Maschinenfabrik v South India Shipping Corp [1981] A.C. 909 at 980–981; The Nema [1982] A.C. 724 at 744; The Afivos [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195 at 203; The Mavro Vetrancic [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 580 at 583.

submitted that this is the preferable view since the distinction between warranties and intermediate terms remains for practical purposes an important one. Even if, in extreme cases, rescission is available for breach of warranty, there is at least a prima facie rule that the normal remedy for such a breach is by way of damages. In relation to intermediate terms, there is no such prima facie rule; so that (to put the matter at its lowest) there is a greater likelihood that rescission will be available for breach of an intermediate term than for breach of warranty.

(ii) Scope of the category of intermediate terms. Granted that the threefold classification of terms does exist, the question then arises into which category particular terms should be placed. In discussing this question we shall assume that the parties have not expressly classified the term in the contract itself; and that the court will generally apply a previous judicial classification of the term.<sup>14</sup> Our concern here is therefore with previously unclassified terms. Since judicial classification of a term as a warranty is rare,<sup>15</sup> the important issue is whether a previously unclassified term is to be classified as a condition or as an intermediate term. This issue is a difficult one because it gives rise to a conflict between two policies.

