The first of these policies is to restrict the right to rescind to cases in which the breach causes serious prejudice to the injured party, and so to prevent a party from rescinding for ulterior motives (such as his wish “of escaping from an unwelcome bargain”<sup>16</sup>) or on grounds that have been criticised as “excessively technical.”<sup>17</sup> This policy favours the classification of terms as intermediate. It is illustrated by the Hongkong Fir<sup>18</sup> case, the Hansa Nord<sup>19</sup> and by a number of later decisions. In Tradax Internacional SA v Goldschmidt SA<sup>20</sup> the words “four per cent foreign matters” in a contract for the sale of barley were held to amount only to an intermediate term, so that the buyer was not allowed to reject merely because the goods were certified to contain 4.1 per cent foreign matters. Slynn J. said that “in the absence of any clear agreement or prior decision that this was to be a condition, the court should lean in favour of construing this provision as to impurities as an intermediate term, only a serious and substantial breach of which entitled rejection.”<sup>21</sup> This policy can, indeed, be displaced by evidence of contrary intention.<sup>22</sup> But where there is no such evidence of the intention of the parties, the policy of leaning in favour of classifying stipulations as intermediate terms can be said to promote the interests of justice by preventing the injured party from rescinding on grounds that are technical or unmeritorious.

The second policy, by contrast, emphasises the requirement of commercial certainty; and it in turn favours the classification of terms as conditions. Such a classification makes it unnecessary to go into the difficult questions of fact and degree which arise in determining whether a breach is “serious and substantial.”<sup>23</sup> And once a term has been <sup>14</sup> Occasionally the court may wish to reconsider such a classification: cf. Lord Wilberforce’s suggestion in Reardon-Smith Line Ltd v Hansen Tangen [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989 at 998, above, p.794.

<sup>15</sup> For an example of such a classification, see The Captain George K [1970] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 21.

<sup>16</sup> The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1475.

<sup>17</sup> Reardon-Smith Line Ltd v Hansen Tangen [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989 at 998; above, p.794.

<sup>18</sup> [1962] 2 Q.B. 26; above, p.795.

<sup>19</sup> [1976] Q.B. 44; above, p.796.

<sup>20</sup> [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604.

<sup>21</sup> ibid. at 612; cf. below, p.800, n.46; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 109 at 113, and Federal Commerce & Navigation v Molena Alpha [1979] A.C. 757; Nynhead Developments Ltd v Fibreboard Containers Ltd [1999] 1 E.G.L.R. 7.

<sup>22</sup> The fact that there was evidence of such intention appears to be the best ground for distinguishing Tradax Internacional SA v Goldschmidt SA, above, from Tradax Export SA v European Grain & Shipping Co [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 100: see Benjamin’s Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §18–238; see also The Zeus V [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 587.

<sup>23</sup> Tradax Internacional SA v Goldschmidt SA [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604 at 612.

classified as a condition, the breach of such a term will, in a future case, enable the injured party to know, as soon as the breach has been committed, that he is entitled to rescind: he will not need to show anything about its effects. These considerations prevailed in Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA.<sup>24</sup> A contract for the sale of soya bean meal provided that the goods were to be delivered during June. Delivery was to begin on a day in that month to be chosen by the buyers and was to be made free on board on a ship provided by the buyers at a US Gulf port to be selected by the sellers. The contract went on to require the buyers to give at least 15 days' notice of the ship's readiness to load the goods. It was held that this term was a condition, so that the sellers were entitled to rescind on the ground that the notice reached them five days too late. Two justifications for this classification were given. First, the sellers could not, as a practical matter, perform their own obligation of nominating a port until the buyers had given them notice of the ship's readiness to load<sup>25</sup>; but later cases show that, though this factor is relevant to the classification of the term,<sup>26</sup> it is not decisive, so that terms have been classified as conditions even where there was no such interdependence between the obligations of the parties.<sup>27</sup> The second, and more important, point was that the classification promoted certainty,<sup>28</sup> for it enabled the sellers to tell, immediately on receipt of the notice of the ship's readiness to load, whether they were bound to deliver.

Failure to adhere to similar time-tables laid down by commodity contracts and charterparties has, in a number of other cases, likewise been held to amount to a breach of condition.<sup>29</sup> One explanation for this special treatment of time clauses is that "as to such a clause there is only one kind of breach possible, namely to be late"<sup>30</sup>, while terms that have been classified as intermediate are typically such as might be broken in various ways, some trivial and some serious.<sup>31</sup> This is, for example, true of the shipowner's undertaking of seaworthiness in a charterparty; but it is equally true that delay may be trivial or serious; and the law does not always give the injured party the right to rescind for delay which is not serious: we have, for example, seen that a charterer is not in breach of condition merely because he has failed to load within the time stipulated in the charterparty.<sup>32</sup> Stipulations as to the time of performance can, however, be put into a separate category on the ground that breach by delay is particularly easy to establish: if the injured party has received no performance by the due day, there can be no doubt about the fact of delay; while qualitative breaches (such as unseaworthiness) can give rise

<sup>24</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711.

<sup>25</sup> cf. Gill & Duffus SA v Société pour l'Exportation des Sucres SA [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 332.

<sup>26</sup> Universal Bulk Carriers Ltd v Andre & Cie [2001] EWCA Civ 588; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 65, at [40].

<sup>27</sup> The Mavro Vetranc [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 580 at 583; Michael J Ward v FedEx International Inc [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 289 at 298; The Niizura [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 66 at 71; The Seaflower [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 240.

<sup>28</sup> ibid., at 254.

<sup>29</sup> e.g. Krohn & Co v Mitsui & Co Europe GmbH [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 419; Toepfer v Lenersan-Poortman NV [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 143; cf. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 (so far as it relates to the notice under clause 22 of the contract); Portara Shipping Co v Gulf Pacific Navigation Co Ltd [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 180; Nichimen Corp v Gatoil Overseas Inc [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 46; The Naxos [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1337, Treitel [1991] L.M.C.L.Q. 147; for time stipulations in charterparties, see The Niizura [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 66 (distinguished in the Universal Bulk case, above, n.26) and The Seaflower, above, n.27. And see the authorities cited in nn.25 and 27, above.

<sup>30</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 715.

<sup>31</sup> ibid. cf. The Ymnos [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 574 at 584.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.795; cf. Lord Wilberforce's statement that a charterer's deliberate delay in loading of only one day "can appropriately be sanctioned by damages:" Suisse Atlantique case [1967] 1 A.C. 361 at 423 (below, p.806).

to many disputed issues of fact. Delay is also of obvious commercial importance in dealings with commodities, which can fluctuate rapidly in value. It is this combination of the ease of establishing the breach without legal proceedings and of its likely commercial importance which accounts for the readiness of the courts to treat stipulations as to the time of performance in contracts for the sale of commodities as conditions, so that any breach of them will justify rescission.

It follows from the above reasoning that a stipulation as to the time of performance will not invariably be treated as a condition. It may, for example, not be so treated precisely because the context shows that its due performance is not of vital importance<sup>33</sup>; or because to give the injured party the right to rescind for any breach of it would make the contract unworkable<sup>34</sup> or because the contract provides that damages are to be the sole remedy for failure to comply with the stipulation<sup>35</sup>; or because failure by one party to perform the stipulation did not create any uncertainty as to the time at which the other party would have to perform<sup>36</sup>; or because the stipulation did not specify a precise time for performance, or enable that time to be precisely ascertained in the light of later events,<sup>37</sup> so that its classification as a condition would not promote certainty. Thus the House of Lords has held that a stipulation requiring a seller to give notice "without delay" of the occurrence of circumstances entitling him to invoke a prohibition of export clause was an intermediate term only.<sup>38</sup> In a later decision at first instance, on the other hand, a term in a contract of sale required the seller to give the buyer a notice appropriating goods to the contract "as soon as possible after vessel's sailing".<sup>39</sup> This term was held to be a condition and the earlier decision<sup>40</sup> was distinguished on the ground that in it the House of Lords had been concerned with a stipulation governing the machinery of termination while the later case was concerned with a stipulation governing the machinery of performance.<sup>41</sup> But the explanation is not entirely convincing<sup>42</sup> since an important question in relation to either kind of term is whether the breach of it entitles the injured party to treat the contract as at an end. The main justification for classifying the term as a condition is that this will significantly promote certainty by enabling the buyer to know exactly when delay on the seller's part in giving the notice will justify him (the buyer) in rescinding the contract.<sup>43</sup> Vague expressions such as "without delay," or "as soon as possible" do not enable him to know this, and <sup>33</sup> State Trading Corporation of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 (where the stipulation was contained in one contract but related to a different contract between the same parties which was not to be performed for six months and was relatively unimportant in terms of money); The Ballenita [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 445 at 464-465; The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1475; Alfred McAlpine plc v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437 at 441 ("merely ancillary" time stipulation).

<sup>34</sup> As in The Honam Jade [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 39 (where strict compliance with the timetable was impossible in chain contracts).

<sup>35</sup> As in The Aragon [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 61.

<sup>36</sup> Universal Bulk Carriers Ltd v Andre & Cie [2001] EWCA Civ 588; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 65 at [40].

<sup>37</sup> For terms enabling the time so to be ascertained, see Thieffer v Lenersan-Poortman NV [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 143; The Naxos [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1337.

<sup>38</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA, above, n.29, so far as it relates to the notice under cl.21 of the contract; cf. Tradax Export SA v Italgrani di Francesco Ambrosio [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 112 at 120.

<sup>39</sup> The Post Chaser [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 695.

<sup>40</sup> See above, at n.38.

<sup>41</sup> [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 695 at 700; cf. McDougall v Aeromarine of Emsworth Ltd [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1126 (duty to deliver within a reasonable time).

<sup>42</sup> For the difficulty of reconciling the two cases here under discussion, see Concordia Trading BV v Richco International Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 475 at 481.

<sup>43</sup> See Tradax Export SA v Italgrani di Francesco Ambrosio [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 112 at 120.

stipulations containing such words should not be classified as conditions<sup>44</sup> in the absence of express provisions to that effect<sup>45</sup> or of other evidence that the parties clearly intended them to take effect as such.

The foregoing discussion shows that there is considerable support both for the view that the court should “lean in favour”<sup>46</sup> of classifying contractual stipulations as intermediate terms, and for the view that commercial certainty sometimes requires their classification as conditions. The second of these views was applied in Bunge Corp v Tradax Export S.A.<sup>47</sup>; but the first was not rejected: on the contrary, Lord Wilberforce said that “the courts should not be too ready to interpret contractual clauses as conditions”<sup>48</sup>; while Lord Roskill recognised “the modern approach of not being over-ready to construe terms as conditions unless the contract clearly requires the court to do so.”<sup>49</sup> The effect of the decision is not to discard, but rather to qualify, that approach by emphasising the importance traditionally attached in certain commercial contracts to exact compliance with stipulations as to the time of performance.<sup>50</sup> Stipulations of this kind are now likely to be classified as conditions if they are sufficiently precise; and other terms may also be so classified if exact performance of them is regarded as commercially vital<sup>51</sup> or if there is evidence either from the commercial setting or from the course of negotiations that the parties intended them to have the force of conditions.<sup>52–53</sup> Where a term does not fall within any of these three categories, the judicial attitude continues to be one of not being “too ready” to classify it as a condition. Such other terms are therefore likely to be classified as intermediate, so that rescission will be allowed only where the breach causes serious prejudice to the injured party.

(i) STATUTORY RESTRICTION ON RIGHT TO RESCIND FOR BREACH OF CONDITION. As a result of amendments to the Sale of Goods Act 1979 made in 1994, the buyer’s right to rescind a contract for the sale of goods is restricted where the buyer does not deal as consumer; further restrictions on that right where the buyer does deal as consumer are imposed by amendments of the 1979 Act made in 2002. Similar restrictions apply to

<sup>44</sup> Alfred McAlpine Ltd v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2001] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 437; The Beursgracht [2001] EWCA Civ 2051; [2002] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 574, at [43, 44].

<sup>45</sup> As in George Hunt Cranes Ltd v Scottish Boilers & General Insurance Co Ltd [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 65 at [28].

<sup>46</sup> Tradax Internacional S.A v Goldschmidt S.A [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604 at 612; cf. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 109 at 113; Federal Commerce & Navigation v Molena Alpha [1979] A.C. 757; State Trading Corporation of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 277 at 283; The Silva Plana [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 371 at 375; The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1475; Alfred McAlpine Ltd v BAI (Run-off) Ltd [1998] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 694 at 700, affirmed, above n.44; Universal Bulk Carriers Ltd v Andre & Cie [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 65 at [28].

<sup>47</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 714, above, p.798.

<sup>48</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 714 at 715.

<sup>49</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 714 at 727; cf. also Tuepfer v Lenersan Poortman NV [1980] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 143 at 147; The Ymnos [1982] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 574 at 583; The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1475.

<sup>50</sup> Cf. Bomes v Shand (1877) 2 App.Cas. 455; above, p.794.

<sup>51</sup> The Post Chaser [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 695 may be explicable on this ground: see p.700 of the report; or on the ground of concessions made in that case: see British & Commonwealth Holdings plc v Quadrex Holdings Inc [1989] Q.B. 842 at 857. The arbitrators’ finding as to the commercial importance of compliance with the stipulation was a second ground for the decision in The Naxos [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1337; cf. The New Prosper [1991] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 93 at 99; Petrotrade Inc v Stinnes Handel GmbH [1995] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 142 (place of delivery in f.o.b. contract vital to buyers as they had to provide a ship there); Mamidoil-Jetoil Greek Petroleum Company SA v Okta Crude Oil Refinery AD [2002] EWHC 2462 (Comm), [2003] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1 at [34].

<sup>52</sup> <sup>53</sup> e.g. Tradax Export SA v European Grain & Shipping Co [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 100; Bergerco USA v Vegoil Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 440; cf. also Michael J Warde v FedEx International Inc [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 284 at 288.

other contracts for the supply of goods; but for the sake of brevity the following discussion will deal only with cases of sale.

(i) Buyer not dealing as consumer. S.15A<sup>54</sup> of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 applies where the buyer does not deal as consumer and where he would be entitled to reject by reason of a breach of condition implied into the contract under the Sale of Goods Act 1979 as to correspondence with description or sample and as to quality.<sup>55</sup> S.15A provides that if, in such cases, the seller can show<sup>56</sup> that the breach is "so slight that it would be unreasonable"<sup>57</sup> for the buyer to reject the goods, then the breach is "not to be treated as a breach of condition but may be treated as a breach of warranty"<sup>58</sup>; when it is so treated the buyer's remedy will therefore be in damages. This exception to the general common law rule that breach of condition automatically justifies rescission is "not intended as a major alteration in the law".<sup>59</sup> Its scope is, in particular, limited in the following ways.

First, it applies only to contracts for the supply of goods: the law relating to breach of condition, in for example, time or voyage charterparties,<sup>60</sup> is unaffected. Secondly, it applies only to breaches by the supplier: a case such as Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA<sup>61</sup> would not be affected since the breach was committed by the buyer. Thirdly, it applies only to breach of certain implied terms: the right to reject for breach of an express condition<sup>62</sup> is not affected. Fourthly, it applies only to breach of the statutorily implied terms listed above.<sup>63</sup> It does not apply to any other terms which may be implied by statute,<sup>64</sup> nor to terms implied as a matter of common law. Fifthly, the exception is excluded where "a contrary intention appears in, or is to be implied from, the contract",<sup>65</sup> Such an implication may arise from the nature of the contract or from its commercial setting. It is, for example, envisaged that the exception will for this reason not apply to breaches of such time clauses in commercial contracts as have been classified as conditions<sup>66</sup> (though the wording of the new s.15A can scarcely be said to make this point clear). Sixthly, the exception does not apply where the buyer deals as consumer: such a buyer is not well placed to dispose of defective goods on the market, so that it is important to preserve his unqualified right to reject for breach of the statutorily implied conditions.<sup>67</sup>

Where a case falls within s.15A, two requirements must be satisfied<sup>68</sup> before the buyer is deprived of his right to reject for breach of condition: the breach must be "slight" and <sup>54</sup> Inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.4(1) giving effect to recommendations of the Law Commission in Law Com. 160 (1987), para.4.21. For similar provisions relating to other contracts for the supply of goods, see Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973, s.11A and Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s.5A, as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch. 2, paras 4 and 6.

<sup>55</sup> i.e. the terms implied by ss.13, 14 and 15 of the 1979 Act: above p.792.

<sup>56</sup> The burden of proof is on the seller: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.15A(3) (above n.54).

<sup>57</sup> ibid. s.15A(1)(b).

<sup>58</sup> ibid. s.15A(1).

<sup>59</sup> Law Com. No.160 para.4.21 (on which s.15A is based).

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.790.

<sup>61</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711, above, p.798.

<sup>62</sup> As, for example, in Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenue-Izegem PI B.4 [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 (so far as it relates to cl.22).

<sup>63</sup> See above at n.55.

<sup>64</sup> e.g. by Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.12(1) (such a breach might be "slight" if it affected part only of the goods sold).

<sup>65</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979 s.15A(2).

<sup>66</sup> Law Com. No.160, para.4.24; e.g. Bomes v Shand (1877) 2 App. Cas. 455, above, p.794.

<sup>67</sup> See Law Com. No.160, Scot. Law Com. No.104, §§4.09-4.15.

<sup>68</sup> Law Com. No. 160, para.4.21 ("slight and it is unreasonable . . .").

it must be "unreasonable for [the buyer] to reject" the goods. The policy underlying these requirements is similar to that on which the development of the category of intermediate terms is based<sup>69</sup>: it is to prevent the buyer from rejecting on unmeritorious grounds (though his motives for rejection are said not to be relevant).<sup>70</sup> But it should not be thought that, where the section applies, it has the effect of turning the implied conditions to which it refers into intermediate terms. The section only precludes the buyer from rejecting where the breach is "slight"; and a breach which is too serious to be "slight" may nevertheless not be serious enough to deprive the buyer of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract.<sup>71</sup> Where the breach falls between these extremes, the buyer's right to reject for breach of condition is not affected by s.15A, even though a similar breach would not give him a right to reject for breach of an intermediate term. The question just when a breach is so slight as to make it unreasonable for the buyer to reject the goods remains to be settled by judicial decision; and the vagueness of s.15A on this point is a source of regrettable uncertainty. It is, for example, far from clear how a case such as Arcos Ltd v Ronaasen<sup>72</sup> would now be decided. The difference between half an inch and  $\frac{9}{16}$  of an inch is by no means obviously "slight" (at least as a proportion); and if it were not slight the buyer would not be deprived of his right to reject merely because it was unreasonable for him to reject or because his motive for rejection was to escape from what had turned out to be a bad bargain because of a fall in the market.<sup>73</sup>

S.15A is, it is submitted, an unfortunate provision which manages to fall between two stools. On the one hand, the section undermines the certainty which classification of the implied terms in question as conditions was intended to provide. It is no answer to this argument to say that the limitation on the right to reject which the section imposes will not often apply: the point is that it is hard to predict when it will apply, so that a buyer's legal adviser will not be able to answer that question with certainty.<sup>74</sup> Nor is it an answer to say that the limitation can be excluded by implied agreement<sup>75</sup>: it is, again, impossible to predict with certainty when such an implication will be made. On the other hand, the section scarcely goes far enough to promote justice: for this purpose, the right to reject should be restricted to serious breaches<sup>76</sup> and not merely excluded if the breach is slight. If a case like Arcos Ltd v Ronaasen<sup>77</sup> would not be affected by s.15A, the right to reject could still be exercised so as to cause injustice. Even if the section did cover all cases in which it would be unjust to allow the buyer to reject, it would be extraordinarily partial in its operation. Rescission by a seller can lead to just as much injustice as rejection by the buyer; but the section does nothing to limit the exercise by a seller of a right to rescind. It is submitted that the section has sacrificed certainty without attaining justice.

<sup>69</sup> See above, p.795.

<sup>70</sup> Law Com. No.160, paras 4.18 and 4.19.

<sup>71</sup> This is the test for determining when a breach of an intermediate term gives rise to a right to rescind: Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 70.

<sup>72</sup> [1933] A.C. 470, above, p.793.

<sup>73</sup> See above, at n.70.

<sup>74</sup> For a similar view in an analogous context, see Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 519. The Law Commissions do not explain their statement that "the uncertainty will be more apparent than real:" Law Com. No.160, para.4.23.

<sup>75</sup> ibid.

<sup>76</sup> cf. The Vienna Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods Acts ss.49(1) and 25 (above, p.792 n.72).

<sup>77</sup> [1933] A.C. 470; above at n.72.

(ii) Buyer dealing as consumer. Ss.48A to 48C<sup>77a</sup> of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 specify a number of “additional rights”<sup>77b</sup> available to a buyer who “deals as consumer”<sup>77c</sup> where the goods<sup>77d</sup> do not conform to the contract of sale at the time of delivery.<sup>77e</sup> For this purpose goods do not conform to the contract where the seller is in breach of the conditions implied into the contract under the Act as to correspondence with description or sample, or as to quality<sup>77f</sup>; or where he is in breach of an express term.<sup>77g</sup> The first of these “additional rights” (conferred by s.48B) is one to require the seller to repair or replace the goods,<sup>77h</sup> subject to specified limitations.<sup>77i</sup> Where these limitations apply, so that the right is not available, or where the seller has failed to comply with the buyer’s requirement to repair or replace the goods within a reasonable time,<sup>77j</sup> then the buyer has the right (under these sections) to rescind the contract with regard to the non-conforming goods.<sup>77k</sup> The buyer’s right to reject goods for breach of condition is also limited in that, if he requires the seller to repair or replace the non-conforming goods under the above provisions, then he must not reject the goods for breach of condition<sup>77l</sup> until he has given the seller a reasonable time to repair or replace the goods.<sup>77m</sup> The right of the buyer who deals as consumer to “rescind the contract” under ss.48A and 48C is also, in effect, subject to the discretion of the court. S.48E provides (inter alia) that, where the buyer has claimed to rescind under s.48C, then if the court decides that another remedy under s.48B or 48C, (e.g. price reduction) is appropriate, the court may give effect to that other remedy.<sup>77n</sup> These restrictions on the buyer’s right to reject and to “rescind the contract” at first sight come into conflict with the policy underlying s.15A, of preserving the consumer’s unqualified right to reject for breach of condition. The conflict is, however, more apparent than real since the rights here under discussion are “additional” to his right to reject for breach of condition under the provisions of the Act which governed that right before the “additional rights” were created.<sup>77o</sup> There is nothing in ss.48A to 48C to compel the consumer to require repair or replacement or to seek to rescind under these new sections; and the restrictions here discussed on his remedies do not extend to cases in which the buyer simply rejects for breach of condition under the rules stated earlier in this Chapter,<sup>77p</sup> without seeking to assert any of the “additional rights” given to him by those sections.

(j) OTHER RESTRICTIONS ON RESCISSION FOR BREACH OF CONDITION. The right to rescind for breach of condition may be limited in the following further ways.

<sup>77a</sup> Inserted into the Act by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), reg.5, implementing Directive 1999/44.

<sup>77b</sup> Heading to new Pt 5A of the 1979 Act.

<sup>77c</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.61(5A), cross-referring to the definition in the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 discussed at p.247, above.

<sup>77d</sup> Second hand goods and certain auction sales are excepted by amendments to s.12(2) of the 1977 Act made by reg.14; above p.247.

<sup>77e</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48A(1)(b).

<sup>77f</sup> ibid. s.48F, referring to ss.13–15.

<sup>77g</sup> ibid. s.48F (“express term”).

<sup>77h</sup> ibid. ss.48A(2)(a) and 48B.

<sup>77i</sup> ibid. s.48B(3) and (4).

<sup>77j</sup> ibid. s.48C(2).

<sup>77k</sup> ibid. s.48C(1)(b).

<sup>77l</sup> ibid. s.48D(1), (2)(a).

<sup>77m</sup> ibid. s.48D(1), (2)(a).

<sup>77n</sup> ibid. s.48E(3), (4).

<sup>77o</sup> ibid. s.48E, which in effect enables the court to override the buyer’s choice of remedies provided by ss.48B and 48C, does not apply where the buyer’s choice is to pursue a remedy other than any of these specified in those sections.

<sup>77p</sup> See p.788, above.

(i) Exemption clauses. The right to rescind may be excluded by a clause which validly excludes all liability for breach of condition; or by a “non-rejection” or “non-cancellation” clause which bars the right to rescind without affecting the right to damages.<sup>78</sup> This power to exclude the right to rescind is subject to the rules discussed in Chapter 7, which limit the effectiveness of exemption clauses. In a contract for the supply of goods, a clause purporting to deprive a person who deals as a consumer of the right to reject for breach of the conditions implied by the Sale of Goods Act 1979 will generally have no effect.<sup>79</sup> If the person to whom the supply is made does not deal as consumer, the effectiveness of a non-rejection clause in a contract for the supply of goods will commonly be subject to the test of reasonableness<sup>80</sup>; while in a contract between a commercial seller of goods or supplier of goods or services and a consumer a standard term excluding or limiting the consumer’s right to reject or cancel will not bind the consumer if it is unfair.<sup>81</sup> It is submitted that, in applying these tests of reasonableness and fairness to non-rejection and non-cancellation clauses the courts may be influenced by the likely effects of the breach (as viewed at the time of contracting), and so take into account the factors which determine whether a failure in performance is sufficiently “substantial” to give rise to a right to rescind. A similar point can be made with regard to the process of strict construction which is applied to exemption clauses in certain cases of particularly serious breach.<sup>82</sup> If the effect of a breach of condition is wholly to frustrate the injured party’s purpose in making the contract, the clause may be held not to apply to the breach at all<sup>83</sup>; and if it is so construed, the injured party will once again be entitled to rescind where the breach gives rise to a substantial failure in performance.

(ii) Consumer sales. Where a buyer who “deals as consumer” claims rescission under s.48C of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, the court may instead award him a price reduction. This discretion, and its limits, have already been discussed.<sup>84</sup>

(iii) Misrepresentation incorporated as condition. Where a person has been induced to enter into a contract by a false statement of fact, his right to rescind for misrepresentation is subject to the discretion of the court under s.2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967,<sup>85</sup> to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission. It is arguable that this discretion can be exercised even where the misrepresentation which induced the contract is later incorporated in it as a condition. But the better view seems to be that the subsection applies only to the right to rescind a contract for misrepresentation, and that it has not affected the right to rescind for breach.<sup>86</sup>

(k) RESCISSON FOR BREACH OF WARRANTY? Once a term is classified as a “condition” any breach of it at common law gives right to a right to rescind. It might be thought, conversely, to follow from the definition of “warranty”<sup>87</sup> that, once a term had been classified as a warranty, then a claim for damages was the only remedy for its breach. But

<sup>78</sup> e.g., The Aegean Dolphin [1992] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 178.

<sup>79</sup> See above, pp.251–252.

<sup>80</sup> See above, pp.254–255.

<sup>81</sup> Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (above, p.267), reg.5(1); cf. Sch.3, para.1(b) and (q).

<sup>82</sup> See J. Aron & Co (Inc) v Comptoir Wegimont [1921] 3 K.B. 435 for the application of these principles to non-rejection clauses.

<sup>83</sup> See pp.225 et seq., above.

<sup>84</sup> Above, p.803.

<sup>85</sup> See p.357, above.

<sup>86</sup> See above, p.377.

<sup>87</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.61(1) (below at n.91); cf. ibid. s.11(3); above, p.788.

there are three situations in which the injured party may be able to rescind for breach of warranty.

(i) Misrepresentation incorporated as warranty. A statement of fact made before the contract may give rise to a right to rescind the contract for misrepresentation, and this right will survive the subsequent incorporation of the statement in the contract as a warranty.<sup>88</sup> But if the breach is of relatively small importance, it seems likely that the court will exercise its discretion under s.2(2) of the Misrepresentation Act 1967<sup>89</sup> to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission.

(ii) Substantial failure. It has been suggested<sup>90</sup> that breach of warranty may justify rescission where it leads (or amounts) to a substantial failure in performance. There is at first sight some difficulty in applying this suggestion to contracts for the sale of goods. The difficulty arises because “warranty” is defined in the Sale of Goods Act 1979 as an agreement “collateral to the main purpose of [the] contract, the breach of which gives rise to a claim for damages but not to a right to reject the goods. . . .”<sup>91</sup> On the other hand, it is arguable that the rule allowing rescission for a “substantial” failure in performance is a rule of common law, preserved by s.62(2) of the Act “except in so far as . . . inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act”. In The Hansa Nord<sup>92</sup> this subsection was invoked in support of the view that the statutory classification of terms into conditions and warranties was not exhaustive. It can similarly be used to support the view that the Act does not exhaustively state the effects of breach of warranty.<sup>93</sup> If in particular circumstances such a breach leads to a substantial failure in performance, the prima facie rule<sup>94</sup> that damages are the only remedy for breach of warranty should be displaced and rescission should be allowed.

(iii) Consumer sales. Under ss.48A and 48C of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, a buyer who deals as consumer has, in circumstances described earlier in this Chapter,<sup>94a</sup> a right to “rescind the contract”<sup>94b</sup> with regard to non-conforming goods. Goods which do not conform to the contract are those in relation to which there is a breach of either the terms implied by ss.13 to 14 of the 1979 Act or of “an express term”.<sup>94c</sup> The former are necessarily breaches of condition but the latter may be a breach of warranty. Under these sections, the buyer may therefore have a “right to rescind” for breach of warranty. This right is, however, subject to the power of the court to proceed as if the buyer had instead sought another remedy (such as price reduction) made available by those sections.<sup>94d</sup>

(4) Breach of fundamental term

In the law relating to exemption clauses, a distinction is drawn between conditions and fundamental terms. Breach of a fundamental term and breach of condition both give rise

<sup>88</sup> Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.1(a); above, pp.375–376.

<sup>89</sup> See above, p.357.

<sup>90</sup> Astley Industrial Trust Ltd v Grimley [1963] 1 W.L.R. 584 at 599. The term broken in this example would now be a condition under Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s.9(4) if the party in breach acted in the course of a business.

<sup>91</sup> s.61(1).

<sup>92</sup> [1976] Q.B. 44.

<sup>93</sup> ibid. at 83.

<sup>94</sup> See above, p.797.

<sup>94a</sup> Above, p.803.

<sup>94b</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.48A(2)(b)(ii) and 48C(1)(b).

<sup>94c</sup> ibid., s.48F.

<sup>94d</sup> ibid., s.48E(3) and (4).

to a right to rescind regardless of the actual effects of the breach.<sup>95</sup> The main differences between them are that (1) words which are sufficient to exclude liability for breach of condition will not necessarily cover breach of a fundamental term<sup>96</sup> and (2) some of the factors which limit the right to rescind for breach of condition may not similarly limit the right to rescind a fundamental term.<sup>97</sup> Neither of these points is directly relevant to the present discussion, which concerns the question whether any right to rescind ever existed at all.

Usually, the effect of breach of a fundamental term will be serious, so that in most cases the right to rescind for such a breach will amount to an application of the requirement of substantial failure. But this is not necessarily the case, for in this branch of the law a development has taken place resembling that discussed in relation to breach of condition.<sup>98</sup> Certain terms in particular contracts have been classified by authority as fundamental terms. Once this has happened, any breach of such a term gives rise to a right to rescind, irrespective of its consequences. For example, in contracts for the carriage of goods by sea<sup>99</sup> the term as to the route to be followed has been classified as fundamental.<sup>1</sup> Any unjustified departure from that route by the carrier amounts to deviation and justifies rescission by the injured party. This is so even though the deviation is "for practical purposes irrelevant".<sup>2</sup> The right to rescind here constitutes an exception to the requirement of serious failure in performance; it can be criticised<sup>3</sup> and defended<sup>4</sup> on similar grounds to those which have been discussed in relation to the corresponding exception in the case of breach of condition.

The possibility that breach of a fundamental term may justify rescission, even though it causes no prejudice to the injured party, is further illustrated by Pilbrow v Peerless De Rougemont & Co<sup>5</sup> where a client contracted with a firm of solicitors for the provision of legal services by a solicitor. The services provided were rendered by an employee who, unknown to the client was at the time not a solicitor,<sup>6</sup> but they were up to the standard of a competent solicitor and the client was "not . . . disadvantaged by what has happened". Nevertheless it was held that the case was not one of merely "defective performance" but one of "non-performance of a contract to provide legal services by a solicitor".<sup>7</sup> It followed that the client was not liable for the unpaid balance of the firm's fees. This harsh result can perhaps be accounted for by the need to encourage the highest standards of behaviour of solicitors in their relation with clients; and it was to

<sup>95</sup> For this reason "fundamental term" is sometimes used in the same sense as condition, i.e. to mean any term, the breach of which justifies rescission: see Millicamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 at 1427; Metro Meat Ltd v Fures Rural Pty Ltd [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 13 at 17; Hurst v Bryk [1999] Ch. 1 at 9; and cf. below, n.1.

<sup>96</sup> See above, pp.226–232.

<sup>97</sup> See below, pp.817–818.

<sup>98</sup> See above, pp.793–794.

<sup>99</sup> And probably by land: above, p.229, n.36.

<sup>1</sup> Hain SS Co Ltd v Tate & Lyle Ltd (1936) 41 Com.Cas. 350. Lord Diplock in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 850, appears to classify deviation as a breach of condition; but, at least in the law relating to exemption clauses, the effect of deviation seems still to differ from that of an ordinary breach of condition: cf. above, p.229, n.46.

<sup>2</sup> Suisse Atlantique case [1967] 1 A.C. 361 at 423.

<sup>3</sup> See Farr v Hain SS Co 121 F.2d 940 at 944 (1941), cf. above, p.229.

<sup>4</sup> In that it promotes certainty (above, pp.797–798), and on grounds stated at pp.228–230, above.

<sup>5</sup> [1999] 3 All E.R. 355.

<sup>6</sup> The employee was not negligent in taking on the work: ibid., at 360.

<sup>7</sup> ibid.; this amounts to the equivalent of saying that there was a breach of a fundamental term, though this phrase is not used in the judgment.

some extent mitigated by the fact that the client made no claim for the return of the part of the fee that he had already paid.<sup>8</sup>

(5) Deliberate breach

A breach will not justify rescission merely because it is deliberate. For example, a shipowner could not rescind a charterparty merely because the charterer had deliberately and in breach of contract delayed in loading for one day: such a breach “can appropriately be sanctioned by damages”.<sup>9</sup> A deliberate breach may, indeed, represent a perfectly honest attempt by the “guilty” party to do his best in the interests of the other party: for example, where a builder who is unable to obtain some minor component called for by the specifications, and who cannot quickly get into touch with the owner, on his own initiative uses a substitute of equal quality. The deliberate nature of the breach is, therefore, not decisive<sup>10</sup>; but it is sometimes relevant to the existence of the right to rescind.

(a) FRAUD. A deliberate breach may amount to fraud and may justify rescission on that ground. This would be the position where a vendor of land knowingly overstated its area and the statement became a term of the contract. In such a case the purchaser can rescind<sup>11</sup> and the vendor cannot compel him to take the land with “compensation,”<sup>12</sup> even though the breach was not “substantial,” so that the latter remedy would have been available, had the misdescription been made innocently.<sup>13</sup> Where, however, the fraud relates to a matter which is not in itself an essential part of the bargain, the right to rescind for fraud appears to be restricted by factors similar to the requirement of serious breach. Thus fraud on the part of an insured with regard to a minor matter not affecting the validity of his claim has been held not to give the insurer the right to rescind the policy for that fraud.<sup>14</sup>

(b) REPUDIATION. The fact that the breach is deliberate may justify rescission on the ground that it is evidence of “an intention no longer to be bound by the contract”,<sup>15</sup> and so amounts to a repudiation, or to an offer to rescind the contract which the other party may accept and so terminate the contract.<sup>16</sup> Thus in Withers v Reynolds<sup>17</sup> an instalment contract provided for cash on delivery. The buyer announced his intention of paying after delivery for all future instalments, and it was held that this justified the seller’s refusal to make further deliveries. Similarly, the buyer would have been entitled to rescind if the

<sup>8</sup> The claim was for £1,800; the amount already paid was £800. The question whether the client had a restitution claim for the latter sum was left open at p.361; see below, p.1053.

<sup>9</sup> Suisse Atlantique case [1967] A.C. 361 at 435; cf. Rhymney Ry v Brecon & Merthyr Tydfil Junction Ry (1900) 69 L.J.Ch. 813 at 819; Decro-Wall International S.A v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 at 369.

<sup>10</sup> Nynehead Developments Ltd v Fibreboard Containers Ltd [1999] 1 E.G.L.R. 7.

<sup>11</sup> Flight v Booth (1834) 1 Bing.N.C. 370 at 376.

<sup>12</sup> Re Terry & White's Contract (1886) 32 Ch.D. 14 at 29; Shepherd v Croft [1911] 1 Ch. 521 at 531; Re Belcham & Gawley's Contract [1930] 1 Ch. 56.

<sup>13</sup> See above, p.772.

<sup>14</sup> The Mercadian Continent [2001] EWCA Civ 1275; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563, at [35].

<sup>15</sup> Freeth v Burr (1874) L.R. 9 C.P. 208 at 213; cf. Warinco AG v Samor SpA [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 450; The Product Star (No.2) [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 397 at 407; Thompson v Coroon (1993) 66 P. & C.R. 445 at 449; Cantor Fitzgerald International v Callaghan [1999] 2 All E.R. 411 at 420. Contrast The Aktion [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283.

<sup>16</sup> Bradley v H Newsom, Sons & Co [1919] A.C. 16 at 52.

<sup>17</sup> (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 882.

seller had demanded payment in advance for all future deliveries.<sup>18</sup> Conversely, the supplier of a computer system was held to be guilty of a repudiation where, after a dispute had arisen between him and his customer, he fitted and activated a device which made the system unusable.<sup>19</sup> Again, unseaworthiness is not of itself a ground on which a charterer is entitled to rescind a charterparty: in general, it has this effect only if it produces a substantial failure in performance. But in the Hong Kong Fir case it was said that the charterer could have refused to accept the ship if the unseaworthiness had been discovered on or before her delivery and the shipowner had refused to comply with a request to put the matter right within a reasonable time.<sup>20</sup> Such refusal would have been evidence of the shipowner's intention to be no longer bound by the contract. Conversely, the giving by time charterers of an order for a voyage which is illegitimate because the voyage cannot be completed within the period of the charter will not of itself entitle the owner to rescind,<sup>21</sup> but he will become entitled to do so if the charterers' "persistence in it . . . showed that they did not intend to perform the charter."<sup>22</sup> After The Hansa Nord,<sup>23</sup> a similar rule could, it is submitted, be applied where a seller of goods refused to put right a defect discovered before delivery, even though it did not amount to a breach of condition.<sup>24</sup>

On the other hand, the mere fact that a party has deliberately refused what the contract required him to do is not sufficient to show that he intended no longer to be bound by the contract; for he may have acted in good faith, honestly but mistakenly believing that the terms of the contract justified his refusal.<sup>25</sup> In Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd<sup>26</sup> a purchaser of land purported to withdraw on a ground which, on the true construction of a somewhat obscure term in the contract, did not justify his withdrawal; but the House of Lords held that he had not repudiated, for he had acted in the bona fide belief that he was entitled to withdraw and had indicated throughout that he would perform if it should be decided that his interpretation of the contract was wrong.<sup>27</sup> The decision was not unanimous, but it is respectfully submitted that the view of the majority is to be preferred. To regard a refusal to perform as a repudiation in such circumstances would unduly hamper parties in negotiating the settlement of a contractual dispute; for it would expose each of them to the danger that any forthright assertion of his view of their relative rights and duties could, if it turned out to be wrong, justify rescission by the other party. The same principle can apply where a party makes a demand which goes beyond his rights: e.g. where a seller in good faith claims a price higher than that to which he is under the

<sup>18</sup> Total Oil Great Britain Ltd v Thompson Garages (Biggin Hill) Ltd [1972] 1 Q.B. 318 at 322; cf. Nottingham BS v Eurodynamics Systems [1995] F.S.R. 605 (so far as it holds the defendant guilty of wrongful repudiation).

<sup>19</sup> Rubicon Computer Systems Ltd v United Paints Ltd (2000) 2 T.C.L.R. 453.

<sup>20</sup> [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 56, 64; cf. Stanton v Richardson (1872) L.R. 7 C.P. 421, affirmed (1875) 45 L.J.C.P. 78. It is assumed that the breach is not purely trivial.

<sup>21</sup> See above, p.795.

<sup>22</sup> The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1476.

<sup>23</sup> [1976] Q.B. 44; above, p.796.

<sup>24</sup> Mantovani v Carapelli SpA [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 63 at 72 ("persisted in and amounted to a refusal"); affirmed [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 375.

<sup>25</sup> Spettabile Consorzio Veneziano, etc., v Northern Ireland Shipbuilding Co Ltd (1919) 121 L.T. 628 at 635; James Shaffer Ltd v Findlay Durham & Brodie [1953] 1 W.L.R. 106.

<sup>26</sup> [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277; Carter [1980] C.L.J. 256; Nicol and Rawlings, (1980) 43 M.L.R. 696; cf. The Hazelmoor [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 351; The Lutetian [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 140 at 159; Spencer v Marchington [1988] I.R.L.R. 392; Nottingham BS v Eurodynamics Systems [1995] F.S.R. 605 (in so far as it holds that the claimant had not repudiated).

<sup>27</sup> Contrast Agrokor AG v Tradigrain [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 497 (unfounded assertion that performance was impossible said to amount to a repudiation).

contract entitled.<sup>28</sup> By way of contrast, a party's refusal to perform, unless his demand for a change in the terms of the contract are accepted by the other party, has been held to amount to a repudiation.<sup>29</sup>

One factor relevant to the issue of intention to be no longer bound by the contract is that the party alleged to have such an intention had acted on legal advice which was later held by the court to be mistaken. In Mersey Steel & Iron Co v Naylor Benzon & Co<sup>30</sup> a buyer of steel under an instalment contract refused, on the basis of such advice, to pay for one instalment. It was held that this refusal did not justify rescission by the seller since in these circumstances the buyer's refusal to pay was not evidence of his intention no longer to be bound by the contract.<sup>31</sup> But the fact that the party refusing to perform did so on the basis of legal advice is relevant only to his intention to be no longer bound. It therefore does not rule out the possibility that the refusal may give rise to a right to rescind on the grounds stated in the immediately following discussion.<sup>32</sup>

(c) SUBSTANTIAL BREACH. The injured party's right to rescind on account of the deliberate nature of the breach is not restricted to cases in which that breach is evidence of the other party's intention no longer to be bound by the contract. That party "may intend to fulfil [the contract] but may be determined to do so only in a manner substantially inconsistent with his obligations".<sup>33</sup> If so, the injured party can rescind: for example, a buyer can rescind a contract to deliver goods by instalments if over half the goods are seriously defective. He can do so even though the seller's breach is not deliberate or even negligent, and even though the seller protests that he intends to fulfil the contract.<sup>34</sup> Similarly, where a shipowner wrongfully refused to perform a charter-party except in such a way as made further performance useless to the charterer, the latter was entitled to rescind. It made no difference that the shipowner subjectively intended to perform his part (it being in his interest to do so as freight rates had fallen).<sup>35</sup> Thus if the breach has the effect of substantially depriving the injured party of what he bargained for, it is not necessary to show that the party in breach intended not to fulfil the contract. But proof of such intention may be sufficient to establish the right to rescind where the effect of the breach is less drastic<sup>36</sup>: for example, where an employer refused to honour part of the contractual salary package although the part in question "was not in the context of the overall package very great".<sup>37</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Vasmani v Italian Motors (Sales and Services) Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 270.

<sup>29</sup> Dymock v Todd [2002] UKPC 50; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 849.

<sup>30</sup> (1884) 9 App.Cas. 434; cf. Payzu Ltd v Saunders [1919] 2 K.B. 581; Peter Dumenil & Co Ltd v James Ruddin Ltd [1953] 1 W.L.R. 815; Smeets & Maxwell Ltd v Universal News Ltd [1964] 2 Q.B. 699; Panchaud Frères SA v R Pagnan & Fratelli [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 394; Toeffer v Gremer [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 118; Bunge GmbH v CCV Landbouwbeland [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 458. Contrast Dymock v Todd, above, where non-payment of a fee was expressly stated in the contract to be a "fundamental breach".

<sup>31</sup> Lord Blackburn also refers (9 App.Cas. at 443) to the fact that the market price of the steel bought "had risen above the contract price." cf. above, pp.761, 777.

<sup>32</sup> Vasmani v Italian Motors (Sales and Services) Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 270 at 277; the breach may be "repudiatory" in the second, though not in the first, of the two senses distinguished at pp.853-854, below.

<sup>33</sup> Smyth & Co v Bailey Son & Co [1940] 3 All E.R. 60 at 72; Peter Lind & Co Ltd v Constable Hart & Co Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 248 at 254; The Splendid Sun [1981] Q.B. 694 at 713; Bliss v SE Thames Regional Health Authority [1985] I.R.L.R. 308.

<sup>34</sup> Millar's Karri & Jarrah Co (1902) v Weddell, Turner & Co (1909) 100 L.T. 128; cf. Robert A Munro & Co Ltd v Meyer [1930] 2 K.B. 312.

<sup>35</sup> Federal Commerce and Navigation v Molena Alpha [1979] A.C. 757; Carter [1979] C.I.J. 270.

<sup>36</sup> cf. Boymakers (Commercial) Ltd v Smith [1965] 1 W.L.R. 855, esp. at 858-859; Cantor Fitzgerald International v Callaghan [1999] 2 All E.R. 411.

<sup>37</sup> ibid., at 421.

There was formerly some support for a special rule in contracts of employment that "wilful disobedience of any lawful order is . . . a good ground of discharge."<sup>38</sup> But a single act of disobedience no longer of itself justifies dismissal. The test is whether the employee's act "shows a determination to disregard any essential term of his contract"<sup>39</sup>; in other words, the courts now apply in employment cases the normal rules governing deliberate breaches. Under these rules a teacher's refusal to supervise school meals has been held sufficiently serious to justify dismissal<sup>40</sup>; but a secretary's refusal to stay at a board meeting when her immediate superior walked out did not have this effect.<sup>41</sup> Dismissal may of course, also be justified by a long course of unsatisfactory conduct<sup>42</sup> (as opposed to a single act of deliberate disobedience).

(6) Unilateral contracts and options

So far we have been concerned with the effects of one party's failure to perform a promise, whether or not the failure amounts to a breach. A further possibility is that a party may fail to perform some act which he has not promised to perform, but the performance of which is a contingent condition<sup>43</sup> of the other party's liability. Such a condition must be strictly complied with. The rule may be illustrated by the case of a unilateral contract.<sup>44</sup> If A promises B £100 if B walks from London to York, B must walk all the way to York before he is entitled to the £100.<sup>45</sup> The requirement of strict performance can be explained on the ground that A has no other remedy than to withhold performance. He cannot recover damages if B fails to complete the walk, since B has made no promise.

The distinction between promises and conditions can apply also in relation to particular terms in bilateral contracts and has, in relation to such terms, given rise to differences of judicial opinion.<sup>46</sup> The question in each case is whether the term, on its true construction, imposes an obligation on one of the parties to do an act (e.g. to give a specified notice to the other) or whether its effect is merely to make the performance of the act a prerequisite of the accrual of the other party's liability. The authorities give little guidance on this question of construction, but at least the effect of the resulting distinction is clear. If the term in question is construed as a condition, the party seeking to rescind need not show that the other's failure to comply with the term prejudiced him seriously or at all. Yet where a term is construed as a promise such prejudice must, as a general rule,<sup>47</sup> be shown by a party who seeks to rescind.<sup>48</sup>

<sup>38</sup> Turner v. Mason (1845) 14 M. & W. 112 at 117.

<sup>39</sup> Gorse v. Durham CC [1971] 1 W.L.R. 775 at 781.

<sup>40</sup> Gorse v. Durham CC (above); cf. Miles v. Wakefield MDC [1987] A.C. 539 at 559–560; Wiluszynski v. Tower Hamlets LBC [1989] I.C.R. 493; below, p.791. In none of these cases was the employee in fact dismissed.

<sup>41</sup> Laws v. London Chronicle (Indicator Newspapers) Ltd [1959] 1 W.L.R. 698.

<sup>42</sup> Pepper v. Webb [1969] 1 W.L.R. 514; 85 L.Q.R. 325.

<sup>43</sup> See above, p.62.

<sup>44</sup> See above, p.37.

<sup>45</sup> It is assumed that A has not attempted to withdraw before B reaches York: see above, p.38.

<sup>46</sup> e.g. Shires v. Brock (1977) 247 F.G. 127 where the disputed term appears to have been treated by Goff and Buckley L.J.J. at 131 and 133 as a condition, but by Scarman L.J. at 133 as a promise; cf. United Dominion Trust Ltd v. Eagle Aircraft Ltd [1968] 1 W.L.R. 74, criticised by Atiyah, 31 M.L.R. 332 but approved in United Scientific Holdings Ltd v. Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 928, 945, 951. 'The contract in the United Dominion Trust case resembled one of suretyship; had it actually been one of suretyship, the claimants' delay in giving the specified notice would probably have discharged the defendants: cf. Midland Counties Finance Motor Co Ltd v. Stude [1951] 1 K.B. 346.

<sup>47</sup> i.e. in cases falling within the general rule discussed at pp.769–778, above, as opposed to the exceptions discussed at pp.778–811.

<sup>48</sup> e.g. Alfred McAlpine plc v. BAI (Run-off) Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 437.

The requirement that conditions which are not promises must be strictly complied with also applies to options to purchase. If the grantee fails to comply in any respect with a condition to which the exercise of the option is subject, he cannot enforce the option.<sup>49</sup> It makes no difference that the failure causes only insignificant prejudice, or none at all, to the grantor. Moreover, in the case of an option the rule applies even though the condition is the performance by the grantee of an obligation under another term of the agreement in which the option is contained. Thus in West Country Cleaners (Falmouth) Ltd v Saly<sup>50</sup> a lease gave a tenant an option to renew "providing all covenants herein contained have been duly observed and performed." The tenant had committed minor breaches of his covenant to paint the interior of his premises; and it was held that he was not entitled to exercise the option, even though it did not appear that the landlord was seriously prejudiced by the breaches. This application of the rule has been explained on the ground that "an option of this character is a privilege—a right which has always been treated by the law as requiring complete compliance with the terms and conditions upon which the option is to be exercised".<sup>51</sup> The severity of the rule is, however, mitigated in a number of ways. Thus the rule does not apply where a tenant was at one time in breach but has cured that breach by the time of the exercise of the option: e.g. if by that time he has paid off rent which had at an earlier stage been overdue.<sup>52</sup> The rule may also be displaced by a strict construction of the term imposing the condition, leading to the conclusion that there has been no failure to comply with it.<sup>53</sup>

5. Limitations on the Right to Rescind

The right to rescind may be excluded by the terms of the contract, e.g. by a non-rejection clause which, in accordance with the rules discussed in Chapter 7, is valid and on its true construction covers the breach which has occurred.<sup>54</sup> In such a case, no right to rescind ever arises.<sup>55</sup> Our present concern is with cases in which a right to rescind had at one stage arisen but in which it was later lost or limited: for example by waiver (or election), by part performance of the contract, by voluntary acceptance of a benefit, or under the Apportionment Act 1870. Where there are several breaches, each giving rise to a right to rescind, the fact that one such right has been lost does not necessarily bar the other or others.<sup>56</sup>

(1) Waiver or election

(a) DIFFERENT SENSES OF "WAIVER." Waiver is used in a number of senses, of which two<sup>57</sup> are relevant to the present discussion.

(i) Waiver in the sense of election. A party who is entitled to rescind may indicate that he will nevertheless perform his part of the contract. He is then said to have waived his right to rescind, or to have elected<sup>58</sup> to affirm the contract. For example, in Bentsen v

<sup>49</sup> Hare v Nicholl [1966] 2 Q.B. 160. The rule may be excluded by the terms of the option: see Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422, where the term which the grantee failed to perform was not a condition of the exercise of the option, but a promissory condition of the contract resulting from that exercise: cf. above, p.762.

<sup>50</sup> [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1485.

<sup>51</sup> ibid. at 1486.

<sup>52</sup> Bass Holdings Ltd v Morton Music Ltd [1988] Ch. 493.

<sup>53</sup> Little v Courage Ltd (1995) 70 P. & C.R. 469.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.221–241.

<sup>55</sup> e.g. The Aegean Dolphin [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 178.

<sup>56</sup> See Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders [1954] 2 Q.B. 459.

<sup>57</sup> For other senses, see above, pp.102–105.

<sup>58</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 397–398.

Taylor<sup>59</sup> a charterparty falsely described the ship as “now sailed or about to sail” from a specified port. This was a breach of condition<sup>60</sup> on account of which the charterer could have refused to load; but he said that he would nevertheless load, and then refused to do so. It was held that he was liable for failure to load as he had waived his right to rescind.<sup>61</sup> Conversely, in The Kanchenjunga<sup>62</sup> a charterer in breach of contract nominated a port which was unsafe because of the Gulf war between Iran and Iraq, but the shipowner nevertheless pressed him to load there, and then sailed away. It was held that the shipowner had waived the charterer’s breach and that he would have been liable in damages, if he had not been protected from such liability by a “war clause” in the charterparty. On the same principle, a shipowner loses his right to put an end to a charterparty under an express term entitling him to withdraw the ship for late payment of hire if he accepts such a payment knowing that the time for making it has passed<sup>63</sup>; a landlord loses the right to forfeit a lease for breach of covenant by the tenant if, knowing of the breach, he makes a demand for rent<sup>64</sup>; and a buyer of goods may lose the right to reject for breach of one implied condition if he has agreed with the seller that he will reject only for a breach of a different implied condition.<sup>65</sup> An important characteristic of waiver in the sense of election is that it bars only the injured party’s right to rescind: it does not deprive him of his right to damages for the breach. Thus the shipowner in The Kanchenjunga would have been entitled to damages if his ship had entered the port and suffered damage there as a result of the charterer’s breach.<sup>66</sup>

(ii) Distinguished from total waiver. The expression “total waiver” will here be used to refer to the situation in which a contracting party purports wholly to abandon rights under the contract.<sup>67</sup> It differs from waiver in the sense of election in that the injured party indicates that he is giving up, not merely his right to rescind, but also his right to damages<sup>68</sup> or to performance. S.11(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 recognises both types of waiver in providing that “where a contract of sale is subject to a condition to be fulfilled by the seller, the buyer may waive the condition, or may elect to treat the breach of condition as a breach of warranty and not as a ground for treating the contract as repudiated.”<sup>69</sup> Here “waive” is used to refer to total waiver (i.e. an abandonment by the buyer of his rights to rescind and to claim damages); while “elect” refers to waiver in the sense of election (i.e. to the buyer’s abandonment of the right to rescind, while

<sup>59</sup> [1893] 2 Q.B. 274.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.790.

<sup>61</sup> [1893] 2 Q.B. at 283, 285.

<sup>62</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391.

<sup>63</sup> The Brimnes [1975] Q.B. 929 at 954–956; The Libyaville [1975] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 537 at 554; cf. Modern Transport Co Ltd v Dunerice SS Co [1917] 1 K.B. 370 (submission of question whether hire was due to arbitration held to be a waiver of the right to withdraw). But there is no waiver if the late payment is made into the owner’s bank and rejected by him as soon as he learns of the payment: The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850; cf. John Lewis Properties v Viscount Chelsea [1993] 2 E.G.L.R. 77; and acceptance of an underpayment does not amount to waiver if there is still a reasonable possibility that the balance may be paid in time: The Mihalios Xilas [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1018.

<sup>64</sup> David Blackstone Ltd v Burnetts [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1487; Expert Clothing Service & Sales Ltd v Hillgate House Ltd [1986] Ch. 340 at 359. For an illustration of waiver by a purchaser of leasehold land see Aquis Estates Ltd v Minton [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1452 at 1596. Contrast Re a Debtor (No.13.A–10–1995) [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1127 (no waiver where rent is demanded before or on the breach in question).

<sup>65</sup> S N Kurkjan (Commodity) Brokers Ltd v Marketing Exchange for Africa Ltd [1986] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 614.

<sup>66</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 at 393, 397, 401.

<sup>67</sup> cf. Tipton Associates Ltd v Dilmun Shipping [1992] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 71, where the requirement of full performance of an entire obligation (above p.782) was displaced by waiver.

<sup>68</sup> Eis Soules & Cie v International Trade Development Co Ltd [1980] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 129 at 137–138; cf. Banning v Wright [1972] 1 W.L.R. 972; The Happy Day [2002] EWCA Civ 1068; [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 487, at [64]–[65], [67].

<sup>69</sup> Italics supplied.

keeping alive his right to damages). It might be better if the courts were to use “waiver” only to refer to total waiver, and to use some other term, such as “election” or “affirmation” to refer to waiver in the sense of election.<sup>70</sup> They have in fact used “waiver” to refer to them both, perhaps because of an important similarity between the two processes; but unfortunately this usage also obscures an equally important difference between them. It will be convenient, in discussing these points, to refer to the two processes respectively as “total waiver” and “waiver in the sense of election.”

(b) REQUIREMENT OF REPRESENTATION. The similarity between the two processes is that the operation of each depends on a “clear and unequivocal” representation.<sup>71</sup> In relation to total waiver, this requirement is discussed in Chapter 3.<sup>72</sup> Our present concern is with waiver in the sense of election: this also requires “an unequivocal act or statement”<sup>73</sup> by which the injured party clearly indicates that he intends, not to rescind, but to affirm, the contract. The reference to an “unequivocal act” shows that the injured party need not make an express statement of his intention to affirm: it is enough if he does some positive act from which that intention can be inferred. If the intention does not clearly appear from his words or conduct, there is no waiver. This is, for example, often the position where the injured party accepts defective performance subject to an express reservation of his rights<sup>74</sup> (though where several grounds of rescission exist and the reservation refers to only some of these, it will not preclude waiver of the others<sup>75</sup>). It has, similarly, been held that the right to rescind was not lost by waiver where a vendor of land, after the purchaser should have performed, said that he would consider a request for an extension of time<sup>76</sup>; where a buyer to whom short delivery had been made called for a “full tender”<sup>77</sup>; where a landlord, after the tenant had committed a breach of covenant, sent him a “negotiating document” designed to resolve the dispute<sup>78</sup>; where an employee continued, after the employer’s breach, to accept wages for such time as was reasonably necessary for him to consider his position<sup>79</sup>; and where the injured party merely called on the guilty party to reconsider his position and to withdraw his repudiation.<sup>80</sup> Nor is the right lost by mere failure to exercise it: such failure is not normally a sufficiently clear indication that the right will not be exercised.<sup>81</sup> But where, as a matter of business, it is reasonable to expect the injured party to act promptly,

<sup>70</sup> cf. Kammins Ballroom Ltd v Zenith Investments (Torquay) Ltd [1971] A.C. 850 at 882–883; State Trading Corp of India v Cie Française d'Importation et de Distribution [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 679 at 681.

<sup>71</sup> Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch. 457 at 501; The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 at 399; The Great Marine (No.1) [1990] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 245 at 249.

<sup>72</sup> See above, pp.107–109.

<sup>73</sup> The Mihalios Xilas [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1018 at 1024; cf. The Balder London [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 489; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Finagrain (etc.) S.A. [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 259 at 266; Cobec Brazilian Trading & Warehousing Corp v Alfred C Toepfer [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 386 at 392.

<sup>74</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Deutsche Conti Handelsgesellschaft mbH [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 45; cf. Nova Petroleum International Establishment v Trican Trading Ltd [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 312.

<sup>75</sup> The Wise [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 451.

<sup>76</sup> Prosper Homes v Hambros Bank Executor & Trustee Co (1979) 39 P. & C.R. 395.

<sup>77</sup> Cobec Brazilian Trading & Warehousing Corp v Alfred C Toepfer [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 386.

<sup>78</sup> Expert Clothing Services & Sales Ltd v Hillgate House Ltd [1986] Ch. 340.

<sup>79</sup> Bliss v SE Thames Regional Health Authority, [1987] I.C.R. 700.

<sup>80</sup> Yukong Line of Korea v Rendsburg Investments Co of Liberia [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604; for further proceedings, see The Times, October 30, 1997.

<sup>81</sup> See Tyrer & Co v Hessler & Co (1902) 7 Com.Cas. 166; Allen v Robles [1969] 1 W.L.R. 1193; cf. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Deutsche Conti Handelsgesellschaft mbH, above, n.74; The Scaptrade [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 425 at 430 (affirmed without reference to this point [1983] 2 A.C. 694); Cantor Fitzgerald International v Callaghan [1999] 2 All E.R. 411 at 423.

unreasonable delay in exercising the right to rescind may give rise to the inference that the contract has been affirmed.<sup>82</sup>

(c) NO REQUIREMENT OF ACTION IN RELIANCE. We saw in Chapter 3 that total waiver operated only where the party, to whom the representation giving rise to the waiver was made, had acted in reliance on that representation.<sup>83</sup> There is no similar requirement for the operation of waiver in the sense of election. The distinction is recognised in a number of cases<sup>84</sup> and the explanation for it seems to be as follows. In cases of total waiver, the injured party makes a promise wholly to give up his right to some or all of the performance due to him under the contract. Prima facie, this cannot be any benefit to him or any detriment to the party in breach, so that the promise is unsupported by consideration.<sup>85</sup> Action in reliance on the promise is necessary as a substitute for, or alternative to, consideration so as to give at least some legal effect to the promise.<sup>86</sup> In cases of the kind here under discussion, i.e. of waiver in the sense of election, the injured party has indicated that he is giving up only one of his remedies (i.e. rescission) but not any of his other remedies (by way of enforced performance or damages). Even if such an indication can be said to amount to a promise not to rescind, the process has never been considered to give rise to any problems of consideration.<sup>87</sup> The injured party is not necessarily in a worse position if he elects, instead of rescinding, to keep the contract in being and to claim damages. This may be more beneficial to him than rescission; and this possibility is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of consideration.<sup>88</sup>

Thus it is submitted that the difference in the requirements for the two types of waiver is supported by both authority and principle. It is, however, obscured by a number of factors. The first of these is the unfortunate use of "waiver" to describe both processes. This has resulted in the requirement of reliance being sometimes unnecessarily stated where waiver in the sense of election was under discussion (though inapplicable for want of a sufficiently clear representation)<sup>89</sup>; and occasionally such cases have been argued as if all the requirements of total waiver (including that of reliance) had to be satisfied.<sup>90</sup> The second is that some cases raise issues as to both types of waiver<sup>91</sup>; and in these the issue of reliance tends to be discussed generally, even in relation to the type of waiver to which it is not strictly relevant. The third is that "waiver" is sometimes

<sup>82</sup> The Scaptrade (above, n.81) [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 425 at 430 relying on the analogy of cases of fraudulent misrepresentation (above, p.385); The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850 at 872; The Balder London [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 489 at 491–493; above, p.751.

<sup>83</sup> See above, p.109.

<sup>84</sup> Edm J.M. Mertens & Co PVBA v Veevoeder Import Export Vimex BV [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 372 at 384; The Athos [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 74 at 87–88, affirmed on this point [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 127; The Scaptrade [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 425 at 430, affirmed on this point [1983] A.C. 694; Peter Cremer v Granaria BV [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 583 at 589; Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch. 457 at 493, 500–501; The Uhenbels [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 294 at 297; The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 399; Oliver Ashworth (Holdings) Ltd v Ballard (Kent) Ltd [2000] Ch. 12 at 27; The Happy Day [2002] EWCA Civ 1068; [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 487, at [67].

<sup>85</sup> See above, pp.99, 101–102.

<sup>86</sup> See above, pp.102–119.

<sup>87</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 398.

<sup>88</sup> cf. above, pp.101, 126–130.

<sup>89</sup> e.g. The Eurometal [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 337 at 341; cf. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Finagrain (etc.) S.A. [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 259 at 265.

<sup>90</sup> See The Post Chaser [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 695, esp. at 702 where Robert Goff J. points out the difference between the two doctrines; The Manila [1988] 3 All E.R. 843 at 854, where the point seems not to have been argued; The Wise [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 451.

<sup>91</sup> e.g. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v C Mackprang Jr [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 221; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Deutsche Conti Handelsgesellschaft mbH [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 45; Peter Cremer v Granaria BV [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 583.

used interchangeably with “estoppel,”<sup>92</sup> the operation of which does depend on action in reliance. That requirement is therefore assumed to exist where the decision can be based on either of these grounds and the court is not prepared to distinguish between them.<sup>93</sup>

(d) WHETHER KNOWLEDGE REQUIRED. There is some conflict in the authorities on the question whether a party can be said to have “waived” a right to rescind if he does not actually know of the existence of the right. Since the basis of waiver in the sense of election is that the injured party must be “taken to have affirmed”<sup>94</sup> the contract, it should follow that this type of waiver does require knowledge<sup>95</sup> by the injured party of the existence of the right to rescind.<sup>96</sup> This view is supported by Peyman v Lanjani<sup>97</sup> where the defendant had obtained a leasehold interest in a restaurant by means of a fraudulent impersonation, and later agreed to sell that interest. By reason of the fraud, the defendant’s title was defective and the buyer, with knowledge of the fraud but not of the fact that it gave him the right to rescind, paid £10,000 and went into possession of the restaurant as the defendant’s manager. It was held that the buyer had not lost the right to rescind; and one reason<sup>98</sup> for this conclusion was that he could not have elected to affirm the contract until he had become aware, not merely of the facts giving rise to the right to rescind, but of the existence of the right itself.<sup>99</sup> This reasoning does not apply to “total” waiver<sup>1</sup> which, far from being an affirmation of the original contract, generally amounts to an abandonment, or at least to a variation, of it.<sup>2</sup> Statements to the effect that a person can “waive” rights without being aware of their existence are best regarded as referring to such “total” waiver,<sup>3</sup> which is based on action in reliance by the party to whom the representation is made rather than on the subjective intention of the (allegedly affirming) party by whom it is made.

It is, however, possible for one party (A) so to conduct himself as to give the other (B) reasonable grounds for thinking that A has affirmed the contract; and B may form this belief even though A does not know of his right to rescind. If B proceeds to act in reliance on A’s apparent affirmation, A may (even though he has not actually affirmed)

<sup>92</sup> cf. above, p.115.

<sup>93</sup> See The Wise [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 451 at 460.

<sup>94</sup> Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders & Shippers Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 459 at 477.

<sup>95</sup> i.e. “actual knowledge or knowledge which a person deliberately refrains from acquiring.” Transcatlana de Comercio SA v Incrobasa Industrial e Comercio Brasileira SA [1995] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 215 at 219.

<sup>96</sup> Panchaud Frères SA v Etablissements General Grain Co Ltd [1970] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 53 at 57; The Mihailos Xilos [1979] 1 W.L.R. 1018 at 1023; Trustees of Henry Smith’s Charity v Wilson [1983] Q.B. 316 at 328; Cobec Brazilian Trading & Warehousing Corp v Alfred C Tuepfer [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 386 at 392. Chrisdell Ltd v Johnson [1987] 19 H.L.R. 406; The Manila [1988] 3 All E.R. 843; The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 at 398; The Happy Day [2002] EWCA Civ 1068, [2002] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 487 at [68].

<sup>97</sup> [1985] Ch. 457; applied in Transcatlana de Comercio SA v Incrobasa Industrial e Comercio Brasileira SA [1995] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 215, discussing both “waiver in the sense of election” (219) and estoppel (220). cf. in another context, Banner Industrial & Commercial Properties v Clark Paterson [1990] 2 E.G.L.R. 139; Fraser Shipping Ltd v Colton [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 586 at 594.

<sup>98</sup> A second was that there had been no unequivocal representation: see ibid. pp.501–502.

<sup>99</sup> Yukong Line of Korea v Rendsburg Investments Corp [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604 at 608, 609; HB Property Development Ltd v S of S for the Environment, etc. (1999) 78 P. & C.R. 108 at 114. Earlier decisions, discussed in Peyman v Lanjani, were in conflict on the question whether the injured party could affirm when he was aware only of the facts but not of the right. In The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 391 at 398 it was not necessary to discuss the conflict on this point since the injured party knew of the facts giving rise to the right to rescind and of the existence of the right.

<sup>1</sup> A point apparently overlooked in The Superhulls Cover Case (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 431 at 449.

<sup>2</sup> See above, pp.102–105.

<sup>3</sup> See Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v C Mackprang Jr [1979] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 221 at 230; contrast ibid. p.229; the case involved both types of waiver.

be estopped from denying that he has waived the right to rescind.<sup>4</sup> The effects of such an estoppel are the same as those of waiver in the sense of election, and both require an unequivocal representation. Their requirements differ,<sup>5</sup> however, in that this type of waiver requires knowledge by the injured party of the existence of the right to rescind but no reliance on the representation by the party in breach, while an estoppel of the kind described above does not seem to require any such knowledge<sup>6</sup> but does require action in reliance.<sup>7</sup> A party who does not know of the existence of the right to rescind may also lose it on one of the other grounds to be discussed below.<sup>8</sup>

(2) Part performance of the contract

(a) GENERALLY NO BAR. The fact that the party in breach has partly performed the contract does not of itself bar the right to rescind. For example, rescission is available where there has been partial performance of an entire obligation, as in Sumpter v Hedges.<sup>9</sup> Similarly, express provisions for determination often operate after part performance of the contract.<sup>10</sup>

The above illustrations concern exceptions to the requirement of serious failure in performance. In cases to which that requirement applies, the courts do sometimes take the fact of part performance into account so as to conclude that the failure is not sufficiently serious to give rise to a right to rescind at all.<sup>11</sup> But once the failure is found to be of the required degree of seriousness, the injured party will not lose the right to refuse to perform or to accept further performance<sup>12</sup> merely because the other party has partly performed the contract: for example, in Aerial Advertising Co v Batchelor's Peas Ltd<sup>13</sup> rescission was allowed after such part performance.

(b) EFFECT OF ACCEPTANCE ON BREACH OF CONDITION. Although part performance does not usually bar the right to rescind, there is a rule that, where this right is based on a breach of condition, it may be lost by conduct of the injured party consequent on the other party's defective performance of the contract. This rule is most clearly illustrated by s.11(4) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979,<sup>14</sup> which provides that where a buyer has "accepted"<sup>15</sup> goods under a contract which is not severable<sup>16</sup> "the breach of a condition to be fulfilled by the seller can only be treated as a breach of warranty, and not as a ground for rejecting the goods and treating the contract as repudiated." This rule differs from waiver in the sense of election (discussed above) and voluntary acceptance

<sup>4</sup> See Peyman v Lanjani [1985] Ch. 457 at 495, 501.

<sup>5</sup> The Happy Day [2002] EWCA Civ 1068; [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 487 at [64].

<sup>6</sup> i.e. of the existence of the right: see Peyman v Lanjani, above, at 495, 500. According to National Westminster Bank v Hart [1983] Q.B. 773, knowledge or notice of the facts is necessary; but in The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 399 there is said to be no need for "particular knowledge." See also Transcatallana de Commercio SA v Incrobasa Industrial e Commercio Brasileira [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 219 ("Estoppel operates on a different principle though knowledge may still play a role").

<sup>7</sup> Or, in cases of estoppel by representation, detrimental reliance: above, p.403.

<sup>8</sup> e.g. below, after n.13.

<sup>9</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673; above, p.836.

<sup>10</sup> e.g. above, p.779.

<sup>11</sup> e.g. in Boone v Eyre (1777) 1 Hy.Bl. 273n., above, p.770.

<sup>12</sup> For the effect of part performance on his right to recover back money paid, see below, pp.1050–1052.

<sup>13</sup> [1938] 2 All E.R. 786; above, p.777. Thorpe v Fasey [1949] Ch. 649 may at first sight suggest that there cannot be rescission after part performance; but the case is best explained on the ground that rescission was not available as the breach was not a serious one and time was not of the essence of the contract: below, p.827.

<sup>14</sup> As amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.3(2).

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.384.

<sup>16</sup> See above, p.784.

of a benefit (to be discussed below) in that it can apply even though the injured party has no knowledge of the breach.<sup>17</sup> A buyer of defective goods is, for example, deemed to have accepted them if he retains them after the lapse of a reasonable time without intimating to the seller that he has rejected them.<sup>18</sup> In determining what is, for this purpose, a reasonable time, the court will consider whether the buyer has had a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods<sup>19</sup>; but he may have accepted them, and so have lost the right to reject, even though he has not actually discovered the defect.<sup>20</sup> The general rule, then, is clear: "acceptance" bars the right to rescind a contract for breach of condition. But the rule is subject to three, and may be subject to four, qualifications.

(i) Partial rejection. A buyer of goods may have the right to reject all the goods even though only some of them are not in conformity with the contract. If he accepts some of the goods, he does not thereby lose his right to reject the rest.<sup>21</sup>

(ii) Incorporated misrepresentation. If a misrepresentation made before the contract is incorporated in the contract as a condition, the right to rescind the contract for misrepresentation survives and may be exercised in spite of the fact that the contract has been performed.<sup>22</sup> A buyer of goods might be able to exercise this right even though his right to rescind for breach<sup>23</sup> was barred by "acceptance." But the right to rescind for misrepresentation is subject to the court's discretion<sup>24</sup> to declare the contract subsisting and to award damages in lieu of rescission. It seems probable that the court will generally follow this course where the right to rescind for breach has been lost by "acceptance," though there may be cases of hardship to a buyer in which the court would not wish to confine him to a remedy in damages.

(iii) Serious breach. In Chapter 7 we saw that there was a "strong, though rebuttable, presumption"<sup>25</sup> that exemption clauses were not to be construed to cover certain particularly serious breaches. The distinction between various kinds of breaches there drawn is also relevant in considering the scope of the rule that acceptance bars the right to rescind for breach of condition.

One type of serious breach is that which makes "performance totally different from that which the contract contemplates".<sup>26</sup> As a matter of general common law, "execution" of a contract does not bar the right to rescind for a breach of this kind. This appears from Dakin v Oxley,<sup>27</sup> where the actual decision was that a charterer could not refuse to pay freight, after the goods had been carried to their destination, merely because they had been damaged in transit; but the court added that he would not be liable where "a valuable picture had arrived as a piece of spoilt canvas, cloth in rags, or crockery in broken shreds, iron all or almost rust, rice fermented or hides rotten".<sup>28</sup> The same general principle applies where the seller's breach is a breach of condition and its effect is wholly to deprive the buyer of what he bargained for. In Rowland v Divall<sup>29</sup> the

<sup>17</sup> The Kanchenjunga [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 391 at 398; Transcatlana de Commercio S.A v Incrobas Industrial e Comercio Brasileira S.A [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 220.

<sup>18</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.35(4) (as substituted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.2(1)).

<sup>19</sup> ibid., s.35(5).

<sup>20</sup> e.g. Bernstein v Pamson Motors (Golders Green) Ltd [1987] 2 All E.R. 220; Reynolds, 104 L.Q.R. 16; cf. Shine v General Guarantee Corp [1988] 1 All E.R. 911 (hire-purchase).

<sup>21</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.35A, as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.3(1).

<sup>22</sup> Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.1(a); above, pp.375-376.

<sup>23</sup> For the distinction between this right and the right to rescind for misrepresentation, see above, pp.369, 376.

<sup>24</sup> Misrepresentation Act 1967, s.2(2); above, pp.357, 377.

<sup>25</sup> Suisse Atlantique case [1967] 1 A.C. 361 at 427; above, p.234.

<sup>26</sup> Suisse Atlantique case, above, at 393.

<sup>27</sup> (1864) 15 C.B.(N.S.) 646; Pilbrow v Pearlless de Rougemont & Co [1993] 3 All E.R. 355, above, p.806.

<sup>28</sup> ibid. at 667; cf. The Caspian Sea [1980] 1 W.L.R. 48.

<sup>29</sup> [1923] 2 K.B. 500; and see further below, p.1053.

defendant sold a car which, unknown to him or to the buyer, had been stolen. The defendant was in breach of the implied condition that he had a right to sell the car but the buyer did various acts amounting to "acceptance" of the car<sup>30</sup> before it was traced by the police. It was held that the buyer could nevertheless rescind the contract (and so recover back the price paid) as "he did not get what he paid for—namely a car to which he would have title."<sup>31</sup> It is submitted that the position would be the same where beans were delivered under a contract to sell peas.<sup>32</sup> In such a case the buyer will not lose his right to rescind merely because his conduct amounts to "acceptance",<sup>33</sup> or would have amounted to "acceptance" if the seller had delivered peas which were not in accordance with the contract. Of course if the buyer knows that beans have been delivered and decides to keep them it may be possible to infer a new contract to buy beans.<sup>34</sup> But "acceptance" can take place without any knowledge of the breach, and "acceptance" without such knowledge should not (it is submitted) deprive the buyer of his right to rescind where the seller has delivered something "totally different" from the thing which he has contracted to sell.

The rule of construction discussed in Chapter 7 can also apply where the breach is serious in the wider sense of causing substantial prejudice to the injured party without making the performance rendered totally different from that bargained for.<sup>35</sup> In such a case, the right to rescind may be lost by "acceptance" in spite of the fact that the breach is sufficiently serious to prevent the party in breach from relying on an exemption clause. For example, a defect in the quality of goods may be sufficiently serious to justify the buyer in rejecting and to deprive the seller (as a matter of construction) of the benefit of an exemption clause. But the breach may nevertheless not be serious enough to allow the buyer to rescind after "acceptance" so as to recover back the money which he has paid.<sup>36</sup>

There are, finally, cases in which a party is prevented from relying on an exemption clause, because he has broken a fundamental term,<sup>37</sup> even though the breach does not deprive the injured party of what he bargained for at all: this would be the position where goods are safely carried to their destination in a ship which has deviated.<sup>38</sup> There is no doubt that in such a case the cargo-owner can rescind the contract. But he may nevertheless have to make some payment to the carrier under the rules to be discussed below.<sup>39</sup>

(iv) Consumer sales. A buyer who deals as a consumer may (subject to certain restrictions) require the seller to repair or to replace goods which do not conform to the contract by reason of the seller's breach of certain implied conditions or of an express term.<sup>39a</sup> The seller then has a reasonable time within which to comply with the buyer's requirement.<sup>39b</sup> During that time the buyer may not reject the goods for breach of

<sup>30</sup> He had painted it and sold it to a third party. As the law then stood, this amounted (or would, in the case of a breach of the implied conditions as to quality, have amounted) to acceptance, even without an opportunity of discovering the truth; see now above, p.384.

<sup>31</sup> [1923] 2 K.B. 500 at 504.

<sup>32</sup> Chanter v Hopkins (1838) 4 M. & W. 399 at 404.

<sup>33</sup> For the meaning of "acceptance", see above, p.384.

<sup>34</sup> Charterhouse Credit Co Ltd v Tolly [1963] 2 Q.B. 683 at 710.

<sup>35</sup> See above, pp.226–227.

<sup>36</sup> cf. Yeoman Credit Ltd v Apps [1962] 2 Q.B. 508.

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.227.

<sup>38</sup> See above, p.228. cf. above, p.806.

<sup>39</sup> See below, pp.820–821.

<sup>39a</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.48A, 48B and 48F; above, p.803.

<sup>39b</sup> ibid., s.48B(2)(a).

condition<sup>39c</sup>; but if by the end of the reasonable time the seller has failed so to comply, then the buyer may rescind the contract.<sup>39d</sup> Nothing in these provisions precludes the application of the rule that the right to rescind for breach of condition is lost by acceptance; but their structure makes it clear that a buyer does not accept goods merely by exercising his statutory right to require the seller to repair or replace them.

(c) PART PAYMENT. The above discussion is concerned with cases in which the part performance consists of something other than a payment of money. The mere fact that part of a sum of money due under a contract has been paid clearly does not bar the right to rescind if the payor then commits a repudiatory breach in failing or refusing to pay the balance.<sup>40</sup> The exercise of the right to rescind may, however, then give rise to a duty to return the part payment, in accordance with the rules to be discussed in Chapter 21.<sup>41</sup>

(3) Voluntary acceptance of benefit

This idea does not strictly limit, but rather attenuates, the right to rescind. Under it, the person who receives partial or defective performance does not lose the right to rescind the contract; but if he “voluntarily” accepts the defective performance he must make some payment for it. Thus in Christy v Rom<sup>42</sup> a contract was made to carry coal to Hamburg. The ship was prevented by restraints of princes from reaching Hamburg, and the master at the request of the consignees delivered some of the coal at Gluckstadt. It was held that the shipowner could recover freight in respect of the coal so delivered. In this case the shipowner recovered the full freight, but later cases state the rule that he is entitled only to freight pro rata itineris, i.e. for freight at the contract rate for the proportion of the voyage originally undertaken which was actually accomplished.<sup>43</sup>

The present principle applies only if the benefit is accepted “voluntarily.” A person is not considered to accept a benefit “voluntarily” if he merely takes possession of his own property. Thus a shipowner who discharges cargo at an intermediate port cannot recover freight pro rata merely because the cargo-owner has under protest taken possession of his own goods there.<sup>44</sup> In Sumpter v Hedges<sup>45</sup> the builder’s claim for the reasonable value of his work was dismissed on similar grounds. Such a claim would succeed only if a “new contract” to pay a reasonable sum could be inferred. No such inference could be drawn from the mere fact that the defendant had reoccupied his own land with the partly completed buildings on it; he had no real “option whether he will take the benefit of the work done or not.”<sup>46</sup> He did, however, “voluntarily” make use of certain loose materials left by the builder on the site and was held liable for the reasonable value of these materials.

The object of the requirement of a “new contract” is, no doubt, to protect the party receiving the partial or defective performance, who may be prejudiced by having to pay

<sup>39c</sup> ibid., s.48D(1) and (2)(a).

<sup>39d</sup> ibid., s.48C(1)(b) and (2)(b).

<sup>40</sup> Hillel v Christofores (1991) 63 P. & C.R. 301.

<sup>41</sup> See below p.1007.

<sup>42</sup> (1808) 1 Taunt. 300; cf. Lambourn v Cruden (1841) 2 M. & G. 253 at 256.

<sup>43</sup> See Scrutton on Charterparties (20th ed.), p.333. In exceptional circumstances the proper measure of recovery may be a reasonable sum, assessed independently of the contract rate: Mitchell v Darthez (1836) 2 Bing.N.C. 555. Obviously, a strict geographical apportionment would be inappropriate where part of the journey was much more expensive than the rest, e.g. because it led through the Panama Canal.

<sup>44</sup> Metcalfe v Britannia Ironworks Co (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 423; cf. above, p.782.

<sup>45</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673; above, p.783.

<sup>46</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673 at 676.

pro rata or a reasonable sum. He may have suffered loss in consequence of the failure in performance, and, if the failure does not amount to a breach, rescission may be his only remedy. Even if there has been a breach, the damages legally recoverable for it may fall short of the actual loss suffered. The victim may have stipulated for complete performance before payment precisely in order to protect himself against these risks.

On the other hand, the failure in performance may not cause any loss at all,<sup>47</sup> or it may cause a loss worth much less than the value of the partial or defective performance. In such cases the requirement of a "new contract" may lead to the unjust enrichment of the party by whom such performance has been received. Under the rule in Sumpter v Hedges a landowner may get nearly completed buildings for nothing. This did not actually happen in the leading case itself, in which considerable payments had been made to the builder on account of the work.<sup>48</sup> But in Bolton v Mahadeva<sup>49</sup> a builder recovered nothing for his defective performance of a contract to install a central heating system for £560, even though no part of this sum had been paid to him, the defects in his work cost only £170 to put right, and the house-owner's other damages were assessed at £15. Again, where a shipowner discharges goods at an intermediate port, the cargo-owner may get the benefit of having them carried a considerable distance for nothing. This possibility is strikingly illustrated by a case in which it was held that the cargo-owner was not bound to pay anything even though the failure to carry the goods to their destination apparently benefited him, the goods having been sold for more at the intermediate port than they were worth at the agreed destination.<sup>50</sup> At the same time the requirement of a new contract may bear very harshly on the party conferring the benefit; and therefore the requirement that acceptance of the benefit must be "voluntary" so as to support the inference of a new contract is, or may be, modified in a number of situations.

The clearest modification of the requirement can be seen in cases in which a seller of goods delivers the wrong quantity, e.g. a quantity less than that contracted for. In such a case the buyer can generally reject the goods<sup>51</sup> but if he "accepts" them he "must pay for them at the contract rate."<sup>52</sup> This acceptance need not be "voluntary" in the full sense, for the buyer may do acts amounting to "acceptance" before he knows of the defect in delivery.<sup>53</sup>

A second situation in which the requirement of "voluntary" acceptance may be modified arises where a carrier by sea deviates.<sup>54</sup> This undoubtedly gives the cargo-owner the right to rescind; but he may not exercise this right and may accept the goods after the carrier has carried them to their agreed destination. This acceptance of the goods is no more "voluntary" than taking possession of goods which have been discharged without their owner's consent at an intermediate port; but dicta in the House

<sup>47</sup> See below, at n.50.

<sup>48</sup> The value of the work done is stated to be "about £333" and the builder had received £219 (67 L.J.Q.B. 545) or £119 plus two horses worth £100 (46 W.R. 464). Hence the total enrichment of the defendant appears to have been at the most £114, against which any loss suffered by him should be set off. The actual result may not have been unjust; certainly the builder's claim for £230 (78 L.T. 378) or £222 (46 W.R. 464) seems excessive.

<sup>49</sup> [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1009.

<sup>50</sup> Hopper v Burness (1876) 1 C.P.D. 137; it was said that there was no hardship to the shipowner as "the proper remedy is by insurance of freight" (at 141).

<sup>51</sup> See above, p.783.

<sup>52</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(1). (It is assumed that the goods are not "unsolicited" within Consumer Protection (Distance Selling) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2334, reg.24; above, p.9.

<sup>53</sup> See above, pp.817-818.

<sup>54</sup> For deviation, see p.228.

of Lords in Hain SS Co Ltd v Tate & Lyle Ltd<sup>55</sup> support the view that the shipowner may in such a case be entitled to a reasonable freight. This is not necessarily the same as the stipulated freight, so that the risk of any fall in freight rates would be on the carrier; but it seems most unlikely that he would be allowed to rely on the deviation to secure the benefit of any rise in freight rates.

A third modification of the requirement that acceptance of the benefit must be "voluntary" may exist where breaches of a contract of employment are committed in the course of an industrial dispute. Such a breach may take the form, not only of an outright refusal to work, but also of a refusal merely to carry out certain specified tasks. If (as will often be the case) the refusal amounts to a repudiatory breach,<sup>56</sup> the employer is at common law entitled to dismiss the employee. But he may not exercise that power and instead follow one of three other courses of action. First, he may voluntarily accept such services as the employee is willing to render. In that case, he can at the very least deduct from the employee's wages, by way of damages, any loss which he has suffered as a result of the breach.<sup>57</sup> Even if he has not suffered any loss, he can deduct from the employee's pay such part of the agreed wages as is attributable to the work which the employee has refused to perform<sup>58</sup>: that amount (at least) will not have been earned by reason of the employee's failure to perform a condition precedent.<sup>59</sup> Secondly, he may tell the employee that he declines to accept the services (falling short of those due under the contract) which the employee is prepared to render, and actually does render. In that event, the employee is not entitled to pay for any period during which no services are rendered<sup>60</sup>; nor is he entitled to any pay for rendering services falling short of those due, even if the employer has not physically prevented him from rendering them.<sup>61</sup> Thirdly, the employer may accept the services which the employee is prepared to render, and do so, not voluntarily, but "of necessity"<sup>62</sup>: he may do this either because he has no practical choice (where he cannot in fact prevent the employee from gaining access to his place of work), or because he is required to accept the services offered in order to mitigate his loss.<sup>63</sup> In such a case there has been no "voluntary" acceptance of a benefit; but there is nevertheless some support for the view that the employer must pay a reasonable remuneration for the services actually rendered.<sup>64</sup> This view seems to be based on unjust enrichment rather than on a "new contract": the employer is liable because he has received a benefit, not because he has impliedly agreed to pay for it. The difficulty in accepting this view, however, arises precisely because in the case put the employer has not

<sup>55</sup> (1936) 41 Com.Cas. 350 at 358, 367, doubting contrary dicta in the Court of Appeal 34 Com.Cas. 259, 285. The dicta in the House of Lords are accepted in Scrutton on Charterparties, (20th ed.), p.260, and in Carver, Carriage of Goods by Sea (13th ed.), para.1197; for the basis of liability, see Carver on Bills of Lading (1st ed., 2001), §§9-046, 9-049. cf. Bornman v Tooke (1808) 1 Camp. 376. Contrast Pilbrow v Pearlless De Rougement & Co [1999] 3 All E.R. 355 at 360 (above, p.806; no claim for the reasonable value of the services rendered was made in that case).

<sup>56</sup> See above, p.806; below, p.843.

<sup>57</sup> Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216, where the action was not for the agreed wages, but for a declaration that the employer was not entitled to deduct damages: see Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 574-575; Napier, [1987] C.L.J. 44.

<sup>58</sup> Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC, above; McMullen, 51 M.I.L.R. 234; the contrary assumption made in Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC, above, at p.255 is no longer maintainable.

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.762.

<sup>60</sup> Ticehurst & Thompson v British Telecommunications [1992] I.C.R. 383.

<sup>61</sup> Wiluszynski v Tomer Hamlets LBC [1989] I.C.R. 493; McLean [1990] C.L.J. 28; Mead, 106 L.Q.R. 192; Macpherson v London Borough of Lambeth [1988] I.R.L.R. 470.

<sup>62</sup> Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 553.

<sup>63</sup> ibid. at 561; cf. below, p.978.

<sup>64</sup> ibid. at 553 (per Lord Brightman) and 561 (per Lord Templeman). The point is left open by Lord Brandon (at 552) and Lord Oliver (at 576).

rescinded the contract, so that prima facie the rights and duties of the parties continue to be governed by that contract.<sup>65</sup>

(4) Comparisons

It is interesting to compare the various liabilities of a party who receives partial or defective performance under the preceding qualifications of the right to rescind; of course, where the failure in performance amounts to a breach these liabilities are subject to his right to damages. A buyer who "accepts" goods which are defective in a way that amounts to a breach of condition is liable for the contract price. A buyer who accepts short delivery of goods is not liable for the contract price, but for payment at the contract rate. In neither case is it necessary for the "acceptance" to be fully "voluntary," as it may take place before the buyer knows of the failure in performance. A cargo-owner who takes delivery at an intermediate port is under no liability at all unless he acts "voluntarily"; and if he does act "voluntarily" he is liable for freight pro rata itineris, that is, not for the agreed freight but for a proportion of it at the contract rate. A landowner in a situation similar to that in Sumpter v Hedges is not liable at all unless he "voluntarily" accepts the benefit; but if this requirement is satisfied he is liable for a reasonable sum. A cargo-owner who takes delivery at the agreed destination after the carrier has deviated is liable (if at all) for a reasonable sum; and it seems that he is liable even though he did not act "voluntarily" but merely took possession of his own goods. An employer who accepts services falling short of those promised may similarly be liable for a reasonable sum, even though his acceptance of the services is not truly voluntary. The reasons for these distinctions have never been satisfactorily explained.

(5) Wrongful prevention of performance

A contract may provide that one party (A) is not to be paid until he completes performance. If, after A has begun to perform, the other party (B) wrongfully refuses to let him complete, A can, no doubt, claim damages for breach of contract.<sup>66</sup> Alternatively, he can claim a quantum meruit for the work he has done. In Planché v Colburn<sup>67</sup> A agreed to write a book on costume and ancient armour which was to appear in serial form in B's periodical. B stopped publishing the periodical when A had written the greater part of the work, and it was held that A was entitled to a quantum meruit. This rule differs from those just discussed<sup>68</sup> in that A's right to a reasonable remuneration does not depend on the receipt of any benefit by B. It applies only where B's refusal was wrongful. Thus an employee who is justifiably dismissed cannot at common law recover a quantum meruit or any part of his current salary<sup>69</sup>; and a contractor employed to do building work cannot recover anything for his work if it is done so badly as to justify the customer's refusal to allow him to complete.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>65</sup> Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 552 (per Lord Bridge), and cf. below, pp.1062–1063.

<sup>66</sup> It is assumed here that A could have completed but for B's wrongful refusal, so that the problem discussed at pp.766–769 above does not arise.

<sup>67</sup> (1831) 8 Bing. 14; cf. De Bernardy v Harding (1853) 8 Exch. 822; Inchbald v Western Neilgherry Coffee Co (1864) 17 C.B.(N.S.) 733.

<sup>68</sup> i.e. at pp.819–822, above.

<sup>69</sup> Ridgway v Hungerford Market Co (1835) 3 A. & E. 171; Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339, where it is said at p.364 that he cannot sue for a reasonable remuneration either. For the possible application of the Apportionment Act 1870, see below, pp.823–825.

<sup>70</sup> Whitaker v Dunn (1887) 3 T.L.R. 602.

(6) Both parties in breach

Where both parties are alleged to have committed breaches, each of which is claimed to be a ground for rescission, the first question to be considered is the order in which the alleged breaches have occurred. If A's breach occurred before B's, the normal position is that A's breach gives B a right to rescind, and, if B exercises that right, his subsequent failure to perform does not amount to a breach at all (even though it would have done so, if A had not committed the earlier breach).<sup>71</sup> It is, however, also possible for both parties simultaneously to commit breaches, each of which, standing alone, would justify rescission: for example, because each is a breach of condition. The normal rule in such cases is that each party is entitled to rescind on account of the other's breach.<sup>72</sup> There is however some support for a different conclusion where the two breaches are inter-related in the sense that the second consists of failure to perform a duty to avoid the consequences of the first. This was said to be the position in a line of cases concerning agreements to submit claims to arbitration. Where a claimant had committed a breach of such an agreement by undue delay in prosecuting his claim after it had been brought, it was held to be the duty of the respondent to apply to the arbitrator for directions to put an end to that delay. It was said to follow that "both claimant and respondent were in breach of their contractual obligations to each other"<sup>73</sup>; and neither can rely on the other's breach as giving him a right to treat the primary obligations of each to proceed with the reference as at an end".<sup>74</sup> This reasoning had the unfortunate practical consequence that an arbitration might be allowed to continue after so long a delay that a satisfactory trial was no longer possible. This problem has been discussed in Chapter 2, where a number of common law and statutory solutions to it were considered.<sup>75</sup> The present point is that the reasoning just quoted is, with respect, open to question; for if both parties are in breach it is by no means clear why it should follow that neither can rescind; it is equally possible to conclude that each party has the option to do so. Now that the reasoning of the arbitration cases has been made largely obsolete by statute,<sup>76</sup> it should no longer be regarded as justifying an exception to the general rule<sup>77</sup> that, where both parties are guilty of breaches justifying rescission, each should have the right to rescind. The justification for that general rule is, it is submitted, that no good purpose is served by holding parties to a contract after each of them has committed a repudiatory breach of it.

(7) Apportionment Act 1870

S.2 of this Act provides that "All rents, annuities, dividends and other periodical payments in the nature of income . . . shall . . . be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." By s.5 "annuities" includes "salaries and pensions"; and by s.7 the Act does not apply where it is "expressly stipulated that no apportionment shall take place." The Act raises a number of problems, three of which are relevant in the context of this Chapter.

<sup>71</sup> See above, p.767.

<sup>72</sup> State Trading Corporation of India v M. Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 286.

<sup>73</sup> cf. Arbitration Act 1996, s.40(2)(b), stating a more restricted duty.

<sup>74</sup> Bremer Vulkan u Maschinenfabrik v South India Shipping Co [1981] A.C. 909 at 987; this reasoning was affirmed, and the decision followed, in The Hannah Blumenthal [1983] 1 A.C. 854; cf. The Matija Gubec [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 31; The Boucraa [1944] 1 A.C. 486 at 521–522; The Frotnarte [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 461, referring to criticisms of the rule.

<sup>75</sup> See above, pp.10, 35.

<sup>76</sup> Arbitration Act 1996, s.41.

<sup>77</sup> Stated at n.72, above.

The first is what is meant by a "periodical" payment. It seems that this expression refers to a sum or sums payable under a contract at the end of a stipulated time, or at fixed intervals of time. A single lump sum payable for a specific piece of work would not be a periodical payment; and this is one reason why the Act would not apply to a case like Cutter v Pomell.<sup>78</sup> Nor would the payment be periodical merely because the contract stipulated the time within which the piece of work was to be done: thus the Act would not apply to a case like Sumpter v Hedges<sup>79</sup> even though the contract in that case contained a completion date.<sup>80</sup>

The second question is whether the Act entitles a person whose salary is payable at the end of a stipulated period to recover a proportionate part of the salary if he works for only part of the period. An Irish case supports the view that the Act does apply in such a case.<sup>81</sup> Similarly, in Moriarty v Regent's Garage Co,<sup>82</sup> the claimant was appointed director of the defendant company on the terms that "his fees for so acting shall be £150 per annum." Before the end of the year he ceased (without any breach of contract) to be a director, and the Divisional Court held that he could recover a proportionate part of his salary under the Act.<sup>83</sup> The Court of Appeal reversed this decision on procedural grounds and left open the question whether the Act would apply.<sup>84</sup> The point is of little practical importance because "the question of apportionment is now usually dealt with by using the words 'at the rate of' in the Articles".<sup>85</sup> Indeed, the Articles often go further and provide expressly that remuneration "shall be deemed to accrue from day to day".<sup>86</sup>

The third question is whether the Act can be invoked by a party in breach of contract, for example by an employee who leaves in breach of contract or who is lawfully dismissed (for breach of duty) during the period at the end of which he is to be paid. In several cases since the Act, claims by such employees for their current pay have failed, but the Act is not mentioned in any of them.<sup>87</sup> In Clapham v Draper<sup>88</sup> it was held that a landlord could not recover rent for part of a rent period during which he had wrongfully turned the tenant out. This might be thought to support the view that the Act could not be invoked by a party in breach of contract; but another possible explanation of the decision is that "The Act was never intended to deal with tortious interferences with the right of any person."<sup>89</sup> In Moriarty v Regent's Garage Co Lush J. said that he would "hesitate to agree"<sup>90</sup> with the view that an employee could base a claim on the Act if he were lawfully

<sup>78</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320; apportionment would also on such facts be excluded by the express terms of the contract: see above, p.782.

<sup>79</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673.

<sup>80</sup> See 67 L.J.Q.B. 545; 78 L.T. 378; 46 W.R. 464.

<sup>81</sup> Treacy v Corcorran (1874) I.R. 8 C.L. 40.

<sup>82</sup> [1921] 1 K.B. 423.

<sup>83</sup> cf. Thames Water Utilities v Reynolds [1996] I.R.L.R. 186. In two contrary decisions the Act was not mentioned: Re Central de Kaap Gold Mines (1899) 69 L.J.Ch. 18; McConnell's Claim [1901] 1 Ch. 728. In two further cases the Act was mentioned but held inapplicable to a claim by a single director because the articles provided for payment to all the directors of an annual lump sum to be divided between them in such proportion as they thought fit: Salton v New Beeston Cycle Co [1899] 1 Ch. 775; Inman v Ackroyd & Best [1901] 1 K.B. 613.

<sup>84</sup> [1921] 2 K.B. 766.

<sup>85</sup> ibid. at 779. It seems to have been assumed that the Articles had been incorporated in the contract of employment since they would not otherwise form part of the contract between the director and the company; above, p.586.

<sup>86</sup> See Companies Act 1985, s.8 and SI 1985/805, Table A, para.82.

<sup>87</sup> Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339; Healey v SA Française Rubastic [1917] 1 K.B. 947.

<sup>88</sup> (1885) Cab. & El. 484.

<sup>89</sup> Murphy v Wood [1941] 4 D.L.R. 454 at 457 (italics supplied).

<sup>90</sup> [1921] 1 K.B. 432 at 434.

dismissed, or left in breach of contract. McCordie J., while expressing “no opinion” on the point, puts the case of an employee whose salary is payable at the end of six months and who is lawfully dismissed in the last fortnight of that period. And he asks: “Is it right that he should be deprived of remuneration for five and a half months’ work because during the last fortnight he has done something for which he has been dismissed?”<sup>91</sup> It is submitted that a negative answer should be given to this question, and that there is nothing in the 1870 Act which makes it inapplicable to such a situation.<sup>92</sup>

6. Criticism<sup>93</sup>

The law relating to the effects of failure to perform is hard to state; and parts of it are still harder to justify.<sup>94</sup> Criticism can, in particular, be directed at some of the exceptions to the requirement that a failure in performance must be substantial if it is to justify rescission. A number of judicial restrictions<sup>95</sup> on the scope of these exceptions may have improved the law; but it is arguable that two major defects remain.

The first is that a party may still be entitled to rescind though the breach does not prejudice him seriously or at all, e.g. where the breach is of a term previously classified as a “condition,” or where a seller fails to deliver the correct quantity.<sup>96</sup> In such cases, the right to rescind can simply provide a party with an excuse for escaping from a bad bargain.<sup>97</sup> It would, it is submitted, be more satisfactory as a general principle to focus attention on the question whether damages were an adequate remedy for the breach; and to restrict exceptions to this general principle to cases in which the interests of commercial certainty require a clear recognition of the right to rescind for certain breaches, irrespective of their effects.<sup>98</sup> Some of the legislative limitations on the right to rescind<sup>99</sup> may have mitigated the defect in the law under which that right can be exercised on unmeritorious or technical grounds. But they have failed wholly to remove that defect while they have, on the other hand, undermined the virtue of certainty precisely in those commercial cases in which exceptions to the requirement of substantial failure in performance are intended to promote that virtue.<sup>1</sup>

The second main defect in the law is the rule in Sumpter v Hedges,<sup>2</sup> under which a party who has failed to complete performance may have no rights at all against the other party to the contract. This rule can plainly lead to the unjust enrichment of the latter party, and seems to go further than necessary for his protection. He should normally be liable to make some payment for that benefit, though he should be entitled

<sup>91</sup> [1921] 1 K.B. 432 at 448–449; cf. Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216, 255.

<sup>92</sup> cf. Williams, 57 L.Q.R. 381–383; Goff & Jones, The Law of Restitution (5th ed.), p.548; but see Matthews, 2 Legal Studies 302.

<sup>93</sup> Treitel, 30 M.L.R. 139.

<sup>94</sup> See especially the distinction between quantitative and qualitative defects in contracts for the sale of goods (above, p.793); and the distinctions between the various rights of a party who has failed to perform, under the limitations on the right to rescind (above, p.822).

<sup>95</sup> Especially Wickman Ltd v Schuler AG [1974] A.C. 235; The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 44 and Reardon-Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989.

<sup>96</sup> See above, pp.783, 787.

<sup>97</sup> e.g. in Cunliffe v Harrison (1851) 6 Ex. 901; Arcos Ltd v Ronausen [1933] A.C. 47; above, pp.787, 793.

<sup>98</sup> e.g. Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 (above, p.798); cf. also The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850; The Chikuma [1981] 1 W.L.R. 314 (above, pp.778–779).

<sup>99</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.15A and 30(2A), as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.4; and other legislation referred to above, p.801, n.54.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p.802.

<sup>2</sup> [1898] 1 Q.B. 673; above, p.783.

to a deduction in respect of any loss that he has suffered as result of the failure in performance.<sup>3</sup>

SECTION 4. STIPULATIONS AS TO TIME

1. In General

Failure to perform a stipulation as to time does not differ intrinsically from any other failure to perform; indeed a number of cases already discussed in this Chapter concern stipulations of this kind.<sup>4</sup> But the subject has a history and terminology of its own; and for this, perhaps not very satisfactory, reason it is usually discussed separately. Certain stipulations as to time are said to be “of the essence” of a contract. Any failure to perform such a stipulation justifies rescission; it makes no difference that the failure is trivial and causes little or no prejudice to the injured party. Where, on the other hand, a stipulation as to time is not of the essence, only a substantial or serious failure to comply with it will justify rescission.

The question whether a stipulation as to time is of the essence may be resolved by the terms of the contract itself. Time will obviously be of the essence if the contract expressly so provides.<sup>5</sup> The same is true if the contract provides that, in the event of one party's failure to perform within the stipulated time, the other is to be entitled to rescind<sup>6</sup>; or that the stipulation as to time is to be a condition.<sup>7</sup> In the absence of any contractual provisions on the point, the question is often determined by rules of law which have classified certain commonly found stipulations as to time in certain types of contracts as either being, or not being, of the essence. We have, for example, seen that in a charterparty failure by the shipowner to comply with a stipulation as to the time of sailing<sup>8</sup> or as to the ship's expected readiness to load<sup>9</sup> of itself justifies rescission; while the charterer's failure to load within the agreed time only has this effect if the delay is so serious as to frustrate the purpose of the contract.<sup>10</sup> Similarly, in a contract for the sale of goods a stipulation as to the time at which the seller is to deliver the goods is treated as of the essence of the contract<sup>11</sup>; while a stipulation as to the time at which the buyer is to pay for them is not normally so regarded (presumably because it is thought, rightly or wrongly, that late payment is unlikely to cause serious prejudice to the seller).<sup>12</sup> To the latter rule there are, however, many exceptions: it will, for example, be displaced if the goods are perishable<sup>13</sup>; if the buyer fails to comply with a stipulation as to the time of

<sup>3</sup> See Law Com. 121; not to be implemented: Law Commission, 19th Annual Report, para.2.11. See also McFarlane and Stevens, 118 L.Q.R. 596.

<sup>4</sup> e.g. Glaholm v Hays (1841) 2 Man. & G. 257; Bettini v Gye (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 183.

<sup>5</sup> See below, p.828.

<sup>6</sup> e.g. above, pp.778–779.

<sup>7</sup> i.e. in the sense discussed at pp.788 et seq., above; The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 703.

<sup>8</sup> Glaholm v Hays (1841) 2 Man. & G. 751; above, p.790.

<sup>9</sup> The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 164; above, p.791.

<sup>10</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401; above, p.795; below, p.862.

<sup>11</sup> Hartley v Hymans [1920] 3 K.B. 475 at 484; cf. Aruna Mills Ltd v Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 Q.B. 655; Toepfer v Lenersan Poortman NV [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 143 (time of tender of shipping documents). See also Bowes v Shand (1877) 2 App.Cas. 455 (where early shipment by the seller justified rejection; above, p.794).

<sup>12</sup> Martindale v Smith (1841) 1 Q.B. 389; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.10(1). For a similar rule as to the effect of delay in payment in a distributorship agreement, see Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361; cf. Figre Ltd v Mander [1999] Lloyd's Rep. I.R. 193 (time of payment of reinsurance premium not of the essence).

<sup>13</sup> See Maclean v Dunn (1828) 4 Bing. 722 at 728; Ryan v Ridley & Co (1902) 8 Com.Cas. 105; RV Ward Ltd v Bignall [1967] 1 Q.B. 534 at 550; Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48(3).

paying a deposit under a contract with “a very tight time scale”<sup>14</sup>; or if there are other indications of the intention of the parties to treat the stipulation as of the essence.<sup>15</sup> The position is similar with regard to stipulations as to the time of taking delivery: failure by the buyer to comply with such a stipulation will not normally entitle the seller to rescind<sup>16</sup>; but it will have this effect if the goods are perishable,<sup>17</sup> or if the buyer undertakes to provide the ship on which the goods are to be loaded but fails to do so within the agreed time,<sup>18</sup> or if he fails within the time specified by the contract to notify the seller of the ship’s readiness to load.<sup>19</sup>

Attempts have been made to formulate some general principle governing the legal classification of stipulations as to time. Thus it has been said, on the one hand, that “In modern English law time is prima facie not of the essence of the contract”<sup>20</sup>; and, on the other hand, that “Broadly speaking time will be considered of the essence in mercantile contracts.”<sup>21</sup> But the italicised words indicate the tentative nature of these generalisations; and (as a glance at the rules stated in the preceding paragraph shows) they are, with respect, of limited value.<sup>22</sup> The classification of stipulations as to time seems to be based on considerations of commercial convenience applicable in particular contexts, rather than on any general principle or presumption as to time being, or not being, of the essence.

2. Sale of Land

(1) At common law

At common law, stipulations which specified<sup>23</sup> the time of performance were normally regarded as “of the essence” of contracts for the sale of land.<sup>24</sup> Thus the purchaser could not enforce the contract if he was not ready to pay on the precise day fixed for payment; and the vendor could not enforce the contract if he was not ready to show good title on the precise day on which he had undertaken to do so.

(2) In equity

(a) GENERAL RULE. Equity did not follow the common law rule but took the view that stipulations as to time were not generally “of the essence” of contracts for the sale of land.<sup>25</sup> In one case, delay of as much as eight years was not considered fatal to the purchaser’s claim for specific performance.<sup>26</sup> The equitable rule, which now prevails,<sup>27</sup> is an application of the general requirement of substantial failure in performance. It is

<sup>14</sup> The Selene G [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 180 at 185. Contrast Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 at 1431 (deposit paid late by “mere oversight”).

<sup>15</sup> e.g., where payment was to be by irrevocable letter of credit to be opened within a stipulated time: see Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 725.

<sup>16</sup> Woolfe v Horne (1877) 2 Q.B.D. 355 (rags).

<sup>17</sup> Sharp v Christmas (1892) 8 T.L.R. 687 (potatoes).

<sup>18</sup> The Osterbek [1973] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 86.

<sup>19</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711; above, p.798.

<sup>20</sup> United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 940; British and Commonwealth Holdings plc v Quadrex Holdings Inc. [1989] Q.B. 842 at 857.

<sup>21</sup> Bunge Corp v Tradax Export SA [1981] 1 W.L.R. 711 at 716.

<sup>22</sup> cf. ibid. at p.729; The Peter Schmidt [1998] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 1 at 7.

<sup>23</sup> cf. below, p.828.

<sup>24</sup> Parkin v Thorold (1852) 16 Beav. 59 at 65; unless the contract, on its true construction, provided otherwise: Rightside Properties Ltd v Gray [1975] Ch. 72 at 89.

<sup>25</sup> Parkin v Thorold (1852) 16 Beav. 59; cf. Cole v Rose [1978] 3 All E.R. 1121; Graham v Pitkin [1992] 1 W.L.R. 423.

<sup>26</sup> Williams v Greatrex [1957] 1 W.L.R. 31.

<sup>27</sup> See below, p.830.

based on the view that delay in completing a contract for the sale of land does not normally deprive the injured party of the substance of his bargain, damages being an adequate remedy.<sup>28</sup> Hence the general rule is that delay will justify rescission only where it does cause serious prejudice to the other party.<sup>29</sup>

(b) EXCEPTIONS. The equitable rule just stated is subject to the following exceptions. For these exceptions to apply, the stipulation must specify a date or time for performance: they cannot apply where a contract merely provides for performance "as soon as practicable."<sup>30</sup>

(i) Term of the contract. If the contract expressly provides that time shall be of the essence, it must be performed within the stipulated time.<sup>31</sup> Where there is no such express provision the question whether time is of the essence of the contract is one of construction. A mere provision that the vendor shall produce an abstract of title within seven days has been held not to make time of the essence.<sup>32</sup> But in Harold Wood Brick Co Ltd v Ferris<sup>33</sup> a contract provided for completion by August 31 and added that "the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than September 15." This clause was held to make time of the essence of the contract.

(ii) Nature of the property. Time is of the essence in sales of short leaseholds<sup>34</sup> or reversionary interests;<sup>35</sup> since the former will depreciate and the latter appreciate rapidly with the passing of time. Generally, time will also be regarded as of the essence where the subject-matter of the contract is of a highly speculative nature.<sup>36</sup>

(iii) Commercial contracts. Under the general rules stated at the beginning of this section<sup>37</sup> time is often of the essence in commercial transactions. In such cases, equity does not interfere, as it does in contracts for the sale of land. But many contracts for the sale of land are nowadays regarded as "commercial"; and in such cases the general equitable rule that time is not of the essence of such contracts does not apply. Time has accordingly been held to be of the essence of a contract for the sale of a public-house as a going concern<sup>38</sup>; of a contract for the sale of land which the buyer wanted to develop quickly for business purposes<sup>39</sup>; and, it seems, of a contract for the sale of a brickfield.<sup>40</sup> On the other hand, it has been held that time was not of the essence of a contract to sell 34 plots of land as and when each was built on.<sup>41</sup> This result may be justified on the

<sup>28</sup> See above, p.771; Chancery Land Development v Wade's Development Stores (1987) 53 P. & C.R. 306.

<sup>29</sup> United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 942; cf. Amherst v James Walker Goldsmith & Silversmith Ltd [1983] Ch. 305; Metrolands Investments Ltd v JH Demhurst Ltd [1986] 3 All E.R. 659. These cases were concerned, not with breach, but with a landlord's delay in serving notice to increase rent under rent review clauses: they apply the prima facie rule that the stipulated time was not of the essence of the contract.

<sup>30</sup> British & Commonwealth Holdings plc v Quadrex Holdings Inc [1989] Q.B. 842 (not followed, on another point, in Behzadi v Shafisbury Hotels Ltd [1992] Ch. 1).

<sup>31</sup> e.g. Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 A.C. 275. cf. Country & Metropolitan Homes Surrey Ltd v Topclain Ltd [1996] Ch. 307 at 313; Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514, above, p.781.

<sup>32</sup> Roberts v Berry (1858) 3 D.M. & G. 284. cf., in the context of rent review clauses, Starmark Enterprises Ltd v CPL Distribution Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1252; [2002] 4 All E.R. 265.

<sup>33</sup> [1935] 2 K.B. 198.

<sup>34</sup> Hudson v Temple (1860) 29 Beav. 536.

<sup>35</sup> Newman v Rogers (1793) 4 Bro.C.C. 391; unless there is evidence of contrary intention: Patrick v Milner (1877) 2 C.P.D. 342.

<sup>36</sup> See Hare v Nicholl [1966] 2 Q.B. 130.

<sup>37</sup> See above, pp.826-827.

<sup>38</sup> Coslake v Till (1826) 1 Russ. 376; Lock v Bell [1931] 1 Ch. 35.

<sup>39</sup> Bernard v Williams (1928) 44 T.L.R. 436; cf. Hargreaves Transport Ltd v Lynch [1969] 1 W.L.R. 215.

<sup>40</sup> See Harold Wood Brick Co Ltd v Ferris [1935] 2 K.B. 198.

<sup>41</sup> Williams v Greatrex [1957] 1 W.L.R. 31.

ground that the completion date was “only a target.”<sup>42</sup> But it is hard to accept the further suggestion that a contract under which land is to be developed as a building estate is not a “commercial” contract. Indeed, the notion that some contracts for the sale of land are, while others are not, “commercial” is questionable now that land is an article of commerce, subject to violent fluctuations in value.<sup>43</sup> The crucial question should be whether delay causes substantial prejudice to the injured party, not whether the contract is “commercial.”

(iv) Conditional contracts. The performance by one party of some stipulated act may be a condition precedent either to the existence of the contract or to the obligation of the other party.<sup>44</sup> Where the very existence of the contract depends on a condition to be performed by one of the parties, that condition must be performed within the time expressly or impliedly fixed by the contract.<sup>45</sup> If no time is expressly fixed, the condition must be performed by the date fixed for completion<sup>46</sup>; if no date is fixed for completion, it must be performed within a reasonable time.<sup>47</sup> The equitable principle that time is not of the essence of a contract does not apply in these cases, for until the condition is performed the whole existence of the contract remains in doubt. For the same reason, an option can be exercised only within the time laid down in the agreement by which it was granted.<sup>48</sup>

(c) WAIVER. The general principle that the right to rescind may be lost by waiver<sup>49</sup> applies where time is (under the exceptions just discussed) of the essence of a contract for the sale of land. Accordingly the requirement of punctual performance may be waived by giving the party in breach a further period for performance after the expiry of the period specified in the contract. Such waiver only has the effect of substituting the extended time for the original time; it is “not an utter destruction of the essential character of time.”<sup>50</sup> Moreover, the mere fact that the injured party has not accepted the guilty party’s failure to perform as a repudiation does not amount to waiver. The fact that the contract has not been rescinded merely entitles the guilty party to “perform the contract according to its terms”<sup>51</sup>; and this is no longer possible after the expiry of the stipulated time.

3. Notice

Where, under the equitable rules, time is not of the essence of a contract for the sale of land, the injured party is not bound to wait indefinitely for performance: he can make

<sup>42</sup> ibid. at 35.

<sup>43</sup> United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 924; Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 519.

<sup>44</sup> See above, p.762.

<sup>45</sup> cf. Hare v Nicholl [1966] 2 Q.B. 130.

<sup>46</sup> Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co [1929] 1 Ch. 277; Aberfoyle Plantations v Cheng [1960] A.C. 115; aliter where the completion date is only a target date subject to the occurrence of the condition; Hargreaves Transport Ltd v Lynch [1969] 1 W.L.R. 215 at 220; and where the condition is subsequent (above, p.62) and time is expressly stated not to be of the essence, as in 29 Equities Ltd v Bank Leumi (UK) Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 1490.

<sup>47</sup> Re Longlands Farm [1968] 3 All E.R. 522.

<sup>48</sup> Hare v Nicholl [1966] 2 Q.B. 130; United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd v Eagle Aircraft Ltd [1968] 1 W.L.R. 74; United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 936.

<sup>49</sup> i.e. waiver in the sense of election; above, p.811.

<sup>50</sup> Barclay v Messenger (1874) 43 L.J. Ch. 449; Nichimen Corp v Gatoil Overseas Inc [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 46.

<sup>51</sup> Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 518.

time of the essence by giving notice, as soon as the other party is in default,<sup>52</sup> calling on the latter party to complete. The contract may specify the period of notice required for this purpose; if it fails to do so, the notice must allow a reasonable time for completion. What is a reasonable time is a question of fact.<sup>53</sup> If one party has constantly pressed the other to complete, he can rely on this fact to shorten the amount of time which must be allowed by the notice.<sup>54</sup> Once a proper notice has expired and not been complied with, the injured party can either sue to enforce the contract or rescind it. If the notice is invalid (or if none is given), the injured party can nevertheless seek specific performance, after lapse of a reasonable time,<sup>55</sup> but he can rescind the contract only if the delay is such as to amount to evidence of the other party's intention to repudiate the contract.<sup>56</sup> A notice, once given, binds both parties. Thus if one of them gives notice to complete but is not ready to do so when the notice expires, the other can rescind.<sup>57</sup>

Notice sometimes has similar effects at common law where the stipulation as to time is not of the essence.<sup>58</sup> For example, an unpaid seller of goods can make time of the essence by giving the buyer notice of his intention to resell the goods.<sup>59</sup> But it does not follow that notice is in all cases sufficient to give rise to a right to rescind. For example, under a charterparty, delay in providing a cargo is a ground for rescission only if it is so prolonged that it "frustrates" the injured party's object in entering into the contract.<sup>60</sup> The contract cannot be rescinded merely because the party in breach has failed to comply with a notice calling on him to perform within a reasonable time.<sup>61</sup> Similarly, a hire-purchaser's failure to pay instalments may not of itself be a ground for rescission; and it has been held that it could not be turned into such a ground by merely giving notice to the hirer that he would be assumed to have repudiated if he did not pay within a stated time.<sup>62</sup>

4. Law of Property Act 1925, s.41

This section, re-enacting s.25(7) of the Judicature Act 1873, provides: "Stipulations in a contract, as to time or otherwise, which according to rules of equity, are not deemed to be or to have become of the essence of the contract, are also construed and have effect at law in accordance with the same rules". It follows from the section that, in contracts for the sale of land, the equitable rules now prevail, so that stipulations as to time in such

<sup>52</sup> Behzadi v Shafisbury Hotels Ltd [1992] Ch. 1 disapproving dicta in British & Commonwealth Holdings plc v Quadrex Holdings Inc [1989] Q.B. 842.

<sup>53</sup> A notice giving only seven days was held in Behzadi's case, above, to be too short.

<sup>54</sup> Stickney v Keeble [1915] A.C. 386.

<sup>55</sup> Woods v Mackenzie Hill Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 613; cf. Cole v Rose [1978] 3 All E.R. 1121 (where the delay in performance was held not to be unreasonable).

<sup>56</sup> Graham v Pitkin [1992] 1 W.L.R. 403.

<sup>57</sup> Finkelkraut v Monohan [1949] 2 All E.R. 234; Quadrangle Development and Construction Co Ltd v Jenner [1974] 1 W.L.R. 68; Oakdown Ltd v Bernstein & Co (1985) 49 P. & C.R. 282.

<sup>58</sup> i.e. under the rules discussed on pp.826–827, above.

<sup>59</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48(3), as explained in R V Ward Ltd v Bignall [1967] 1 Q.B. 534. The Vienna Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (above, p.29) makes extensive use of this technique: see, e.g. Arts 47, 49 (1)(b), 63, 64 (1)(b).

<sup>60</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401; above, p.795; below, p.862.

<sup>61</sup> According to Re Olympia & York Canary Wharf (No.2) [1993] B.C.C. 159, notice can make time of the essence even with respect to the performance of an intermediate term, but failure to comply with the notice will not, in such a case, amount to a repudiatory breach unless it goes to the root of the contract. This reasoning reaches the same conclusion as that stated in the text, but by an unusual route. Normally, the statement that time is (or has become) of the essence means that failure to perform within the specified time justifies rescission; if the failure does not have this effect, the orthodox reason is that time is not (or has not been made) of the essence.

<sup>62</sup> Eshun v Moorgate Mercantile Credit Co Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 722.

contracts are no longer prima facie of the essence. It has been held that the section is not restricted to cases in which equity would have intervened before the Judicature Acts; it enables the courts also to take into account the subsequent development of equitable principles.<sup>63</sup> The section has the following effects.

First, delay is no longer a ground for rescission merely because it would formerly have been so regarded at common law.<sup>64</sup>

Secondly, a person can now recover damages where formerly he could not have done so. For example, a vendor of land may purport to rescind on the ground that the purchaser was not ready with the purchase money on the completion date. At common law the rescission would have been justified as the time of performance was of the essence of the contract. Under s.41, this is no longer the case, so that the purported rescission is wrongful and the purchaser is entitled to damages.<sup>65</sup>

Thirdly, delay in performance is a breach giving rise to liability in damages; and this is true even where in equity time is not of the essence. The authorities on this point were formerly in some confusion. It was clear that damages for delay were recoverable where the defendant was guilty of negligent or wilful default<sup>66</sup>; and there was some support for the view that the right to damages was restricted to such cases.<sup>67</sup> But this view was rejected by the House of Lords in Raineri v Miles,<sup>68</sup> where it was held that the purchaser of a house was entitled to damages for the vendor's delay in completion, whether or not that delay amounted to wilful default.

---

<sup>63</sup> United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1978] A.C. 904 at 925, 957; Baker, 93 L.Q.R. 529.

<sup>64</sup> Raineri v Miles [1981] A.C. 1050 at 1082–1083.

<sup>65</sup> Stickney v Keeble [1915] A.C. 386 at 404; Rightside Properties Ltd v Gray [1975] Ch. 72.

<sup>66</sup> e.g. Jones v Gardiner [1902] 1 Ch. 191; Phillips v Lamdin [1949] 2 K.B. 33.

<sup>67</sup> See Lock v Bell [1931] Ch. 35 at 44; e.g. Thorpe v Fasey [1949] Ch. 649; Woods v Mackenzie-Hill Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 613 at 615; cf. Babacomp Ltd v Rightside Properties Ltd [1973] 3 All E.R. 873 at 875.

<sup>68</sup> [1981] A.C. 1050; Samuels, 44 M.L.R. 100.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

BREACH

SECTION 1. WHAT AMOUNTS TO BREACH

A BREACH of contract is committed when a party without lawful excuse fails or refuses to perform what is due from him under the contract, or performs defectively or incapacitates himself from performing. Repudiation before performance has become due gives rise to special problems which are discussed at the end of this Chapter.<sup>1</sup>

1. Failure or Refusal to Perform

Failure or refusal to perform a contractual promise when performance has fallen due is prima facie a breach. This point looks obvious enough, but it does raise a number of problems.

The first is whether the stipulation which has not been complied with is indeed a promise, or only a condition. In the standard case of a unilateral contract, where A promises B £100 if B will walk to York,<sup>2</sup> B has not promised to do anything: his walking to York is merely a condition<sup>3</sup> of A's liability. Hence B commits no breach if he does not start the walk, or if, having started, he fails to complete it. But the distinction between the two types of stipulations is sometimes hard to draw.<sup>4</sup> It is, for example, not clearly settled whether an estate agent who is engaged to find a buyer for a house makes any promise to do anything<sup>5</sup>; and it is also possible for a person to commit a breach by failing to complete performance of an act which he was not originally bound to do if, by beginning performance, he impliedly promised to complete it.<sup>6</sup>

The second problem is whether performance has become due. Obviously performance is not due before the stipulated time: a promise to pay £100 tomorrow is not broken by failing to pay today. But greater difficulty arises where the contract, or the liability of one party, is subject to a condition. Where the contract is subject to a contingent condition precedent,<sup>7</sup> failure to perform is not a breach if the condition has not occurred; nor does the principal obligation of either party become due if one of them fails to bring about the condition on which the binding force of that obligation depends. At most, that party may be liable for breach of some subsidiary duty: for example, he is often under a duty not actively to prevent the occurrence of the condition; and he may be under a duty to make reasonable efforts to bring its occurrence about.<sup>8</sup> On the other hand, where the liability of A is subject to a promissory condition<sup>9</sup> to be performed by B, failure by B to

---

<sup>1</sup> See below, pp.857 et seq.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.37.

<sup>3</sup> i.e. in the contingent sense (above, p.62) as B makes no promise.

<sup>4</sup> cf. above, p.38; and see above, pp.810–811.

<sup>5</sup> See above, pp.40–41.

<sup>6</sup> See above, p.38.

<sup>7</sup> See above, p.62.

<sup>8</sup> See above, pp.62–66.

<sup>9</sup> See above, pp.762–763.

perform that promise not only puts B in breach<sup>10</sup> of his principal obligation, but also prevents A's obligation to perform his counter-promise from becoming due.

Thirdly, a contract may contain a promise by one party, but fail to make it clear exactly what (if anything) has been promised in return by the other. In Churchward v R<sup>11</sup> a contractor agreed with the Admiralty that he would for 11 years carry from Dover to Calais such mail as he should from time to time be asked to carry by the Admiralty or the Postmaster-General. He was not given any mail to carry and claimed damages. One reason why his claim failed was that the agreement did not oblige the Admiralty to employ him: it only obliged him to carry mail if the Admiralty asked him to do so. The agreement thus resembled a tender by the contractor and amounted to no more than an offer, which might be accepted by the Admiralty from time to time.<sup>12</sup> A document which in terms imposes an obligation on only one party may, indeed, by implication also oblige the other to do something which is not expressly stated. Thus it was said in Churchward v R that "Where there is an engagement to manufacture some article [for a customer] a corresponding engagement on the other party is implied to take it, for otherwise it would be impossible that the party bestowing his services could claim any remuneration."<sup>13</sup> Similarly, where a document is headed "contract of sale" and in terms only imposes an obligation on the seller to sell, the court might imply an obligation on the buyer to buy.<sup>14</sup> But no such implication will be made where the terms of the document or the surrounding circumstances negative any intention on the prospective buyer's part to give such an undertaking.<sup>15</sup>

Fourthly, a contract may clearly oblige a party to do something but fail to specify exactly what it obliges him to do. The question sometimes arises, for example, whether an employer is bound only to pay the agreed wages, or whether he must actually give the employee work. The traditional view is that generally the employer need only pay wages,<sup>16</sup> though this rule does not apply where one of the objects of the contract is to enable the employee to gain, or retain, a skill, or to keep his name before the public. Thus a person who employs a well-known actor must actually give him a part in the play for which he was engaged.<sup>17</sup> More recently, it has been said that the law in some cases recognises a "right to work"<sup>18</sup> and that the question whether the contract gives rise to such a right depends on its express or implied terms.<sup>19</sup> If the employee needs to work to acquire or retain a skill or reputation, this fact is likely to support an implication that the employer must actually give him work. It does not follow that this duty can be

<sup>10</sup> e.g. Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co [1952] 2 Q.B. 297; above, p.762.

<sup>11</sup> (1865) L.R. 1 Q.B. 173; cf. R. v Demers [1900] A.C. 109. Where neither party is by the terms of the contract obliged to do anything, the arrangement is likely not to be a contract at all for want of contractual intention: Carmichael v National Power plc [1999] 1 W.L.R. 2042, above, p.167.

<sup>12</sup> cf. above, pp.21–22.

<sup>13</sup> Churchward v R, above, at 195. cf. The Unique Mariner (No.2) [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 51–52.

<sup>14</sup> Firstpost Homes Ltd v Johnson [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1567 at 1574.

<sup>15</sup> ibid.

<sup>16</sup> Turner v Samdon [1901] 2 K.B. 653; cf. Delaney v Staples [1992] 1 A.C. 687, 692 (discussing so called "garden leave"); McClory v Post Office [1992] I.C.R. 758 (no obligation to provide opportunities for working overtime); Marshall (Cambridge) Ltd v Hamblin [1994] I.R.L.R. 260 (where the employee had resigned, so that there was no breach); Abrahams v Performing Rights Society [1995] I.C.R. 1028 (where the employer was not in breach as the contract gave him the option of paying in lieu of notice).

<sup>17</sup> Herbert Clayton & Jack Waller Ltd v Oliver [1930] A.C. 209.

<sup>18</sup> Langston v AUEW [1974] 1 W.L.R. 185; cf. Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 472 (exclusion from place of work an "immediate breach" though salary was paid for a further month). Even if the employer is not in breach by failing to provide work, he may be unable to restrain such an employee from working for others in breach of another term of the contract of employment: see Provident Financial Group plc v Hayward [1989] I.C.R. 160, below, p.1044. See also the "right to return to work" after maternity parental and paternity leave given by the legislation referred to on p.1030, below.

<sup>19</sup> William Hill Organisation Ltd v Tucker [1998] I.R.L.R. 313.

specifically enforced<sup>20</sup>; but an employer who breaks a duty to provide work may be liable in damages on that account.

Finally, there may be a breach if a party in substance refuses to perform, and paradoxically he may do this by insisting with too great literalness on the terms of the contract. "Working to rule" in order to disrupt the employer's business may therefore be a breach of a contract of employment.<sup>21</sup>

2. Defective Performance

The phrase "defective performance" arguably contains an element of self-contradiction, in the sense that a person who promises to do one thing does not perform if he does another. Where the "defect" in performance is of a particularly serious kind, the acts done by the party in breach may indeed amount or lead to non-performance rather than defective performance, as in the case of the seller who promises beans but delivers peas.<sup>22</sup> But where the performance rendered is of the same kind as that promised, differing from it only in point of time, quantity or quality, it is reasonable to refer to it as defective performance.<sup>23</sup> It undoubtedly amounts to a breach; but the effects of such a breach often differ from those of a complete failure or refusal to perform.<sup>24</sup>

3. Incapacitating Oneself

A person may break a contract by incapacitating himself from performing it. Thus a seller commits a breach of contract for the sale of a specific thing if he sells it to a third party<sup>25</sup>; and a shipowner commits a breach of a charterparty if he sells the ship to a third party "free from any . . . charter engagement".<sup>26</sup> But a person who is entitled to make a choice as to the method of performance does not incapacitate himself merely by declaring that he will perform in a way that is impossible. For example, a seller of generic goods does not put himself in breach merely by telling the buyer that he will make delivery from a source which does not exist.<sup>27</sup> He is normally<sup>28</sup> entitled and bound to deliver from another source, and is in breach only if he fails or refuses to do so.

A person is not incapacitated from performing a contract under which he is obliged to pay money, merely because he is insolvent.<sup>29</sup> If the contract is profitable, his trustee in bankruptcy will probably wish to enforce it and provide funds to discharge his obligations under it. Insolvency incapacitates a contracting party only if no assets are set aside out of his estate for the performance of the contract.<sup>30</sup> Where, after a contract has

<sup>20</sup> Langston v AUEW (No.2) [1974] 1 C.R. 510; below, p.1029.

<sup>21</sup> Secretary of State v ASLEF (No.2) [1972] 2 Q.B. 455; contrast Pomer Packing Casemakers Ltd v Faust [1983] Q.B. 471 (ban on overtime not a breach).

<sup>22</sup> Chanter v Hopkins (1838) 4 M. & W. 399 at 404; Pilbrow v Pearless De Rougemont & Co [1999] 3 All E.R. 355, above, p.806.

<sup>23</sup> The Stork [1955] 2 Q.B. 68 at 76; Leeds Shipping Co Ltd v Soc Française Bunge [1958] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 124 at 145; Pilbrow v Pearless De Rougemont & Co above, at 360 (customer who "asks for a pint of one make of bitter but is mistakenly provided with a pint of another").

<sup>24</sup> See above, pp.759–811, below, pp.1049–1057.

<sup>25</sup> Bondell v Parsons (1808) 10 East 359; Lovelock v Franklyn (1846) 8 Q.B. 371.

<sup>26</sup> Omnium D'Entreprises v Sutherland [1919] 1 K.B. 618.

<sup>27</sup> The Vladimir Ilich [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 322 at 329.

<sup>28</sup> In The Vladimir Ilich, above, the seller would not have been entitled to do this under the contract, since this provided that he was to give a "notice of appropriation" and that a valid notice of appropriation, once given, could not be withdrawn. But by treating the notice as invalid the buyer had precluded himself from relying on this provision.

<sup>29</sup> Re Agra Bank (1867) L.R. 5 Eq. 160.

<sup>30</sup> Ex p. Chalmers (1873) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 289; Bloomer v Bernstein (1874) L.R. 9 C.P. 588; cf. Sale Continuation Ltd v Austin Taylor & Co [1968] 2 Q.B. 849.

been made, one party to it is adjudged bankrupt, the other party may apply to the court for an order discharging obligations under the contract; and the court may make such an order on such terms as to payment of damages by the bankrupt or by the other party as appear to the court to be equitable.<sup>31</sup>

4. Without Lawful Excuse

There is no breach when non-performance of a contract is justified by some lawful excuse.

(1) Illustrations

In one sense, such an excuse for non-performance exists where one party is entitled to refuse to perform because the other has failed to perform a promissory condition precedent or a concurrent condition. In such cases, performance of the former party's obligation has never become due. This topic has already been discussed<sup>32</sup>; our present concern is with cases in which after an obligation has accrued, an extraneous event occurs which interferes with its performance. The event may interfere so seriously with performance that both parties are discharged under the doctrine of frustration (to be discussed in the next Chapter). But even where its effects are less drastic, it may still provide a party with an excuse for non-performance. Thus an employee who does not go to work because he is ill is not in breach,<sup>33</sup> even though the illness is not so serious as to frustrate the contract (so that performance must be resumed when the illness is over). Other extraneous circumstances may similarly justify refusal to perform, or to accept performance, at least in part. In one case it was, for example, held that the owner of a London café, who had engaged the claimants to give cabaret performances there, was justified in refusing to allow such performances to take place on the day on which King George V died, and on the following day, but not on the four days after that.<sup>34</sup> Again, if a farmer agrees to sell 500 tons of wheat to be grown on his farm and, through no fault of his, only 200 are produced, he is not liable for failing to produce the other 300 tons, though he will be liable in damages if he fails to deliver the 200 tons.<sup>35</sup> And a tenant is not in breach of a covenant to redevelop a site by a specified date if such redevelopment is prevented by an order listing a building on the site as of special architectural interest.<sup>36</sup>

Excuses for non-performance may be provided by the contract itself, which may contain "exceptions" absolving a party from his duty to perform if he is prevented from doing so by specified circumstances, such as strikes or similar delays. Failure to perform, if brought about by such events, is not a breach at all. The function of the "exception" is not to exclude liability for an assumed breach but rather to define the scope of the contracting party's obligations.<sup>37</sup>

A party relying on an excuse for non-performance must show that the excuse existed at the time of his refusal to perform: it is not enough for him to show that it arose or would (if the other party had not rescinded on account of the refusal) have arisen at some

<sup>31</sup> Insolvency Act 1986, s.345(1) and (2).

<sup>32</sup> See above, pp.762–763.

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.776 at n.11; below, p.875, but contrast above, p.776 at n.10. The excuse may extend to prevention by other causes: see Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216 at 254 (teacher locked in school lavatory "through no fault of his own").

<sup>34</sup> Minneveitch v Café de Paris (Londres) Ltd [1936] 1 All E.R. 884.

<sup>35</sup> Homell v Coupland (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 258; H R and S Sainsbury Ltd v Street [1972] 1 W.L.R. 834; Thornely [1973] C.L.J. 15; Goldberg, 88 L.Q.R. 464; cf. below, p.816.

<sup>36</sup> John Lewis Properties v Viscount Chelsea [1993] 2 E.G.L.R. 77.

<sup>37</sup> The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210; above, p.238.

later time.<sup>38</sup> Suppose, for example, that a seller of wheat of a certain description is about to deliver wheat of a different description. The buyer cannot at this stage rely on the non-conformity as a ground for rescinding the contract, for the seller is not actually in breach until he tenders non-conforming goods.<sup>39</sup> Once a defective tender has been made, the buyer is indeed entitled to reject it, but it still does not follow that he is entitled to rescind the contract; for if, within the time allowed for delivery, the seller can make a further good tender, the buyer is normally bound to accept it.<sup>40</sup>

(2) Whether excuse must be stated

The general rule is that a refusal to perform by a party who has an excuse for non-performance is not a breach, even though he did not state the excuse, or even know of it, at the time of the refusal. Thus an employer can lawfully dismiss an employee who has committed a breach of duty justifying dismissal, though he did not at the time of the dismissal know of the breach, and though at that time he gave some other, insufficient, reason, or no reason at all.<sup>41</sup> Similarly a buyer can reject goods, if there has been a breach of condition, even though he did not know of the breach; and the rejection will not be wrongful merely because at the time he mistakenly alleged breach of some other condition.<sup>42</sup>

The rule may sometimes be justifiable on the ground that it prevents the party in breach from benefiting from the concealment of his own wrong. But it can also cause surprise and even hardship to the party in breach, and it has therefore been limited in a number of ways. A party cannot rely on an excuse which he did not specify at the time of his refusal to perform "if the point which was not taken is one which if taken could have been put right."<sup>43</sup> This might be the position if the effect of a buyer's failure to state the ground which justified rejection was to deprive the seller of the opportunity of curing the defect and making a second good tender<sup>44</sup> within the time allowed for performance.<sup>45</sup> The case is even stronger if the buyer makes some groundless objection to the seller's tender and the seller incurs trouble or expense in investigating or seeking to cure that objection.<sup>46</sup> In such circumstances, an estoppel can arise, precluding the buyer from alleging the existence of another, sufficient, reason for his refusal to perform.

<sup>38</sup> British & Beningtons Ltd v NW Cachar Tea Co [1923] A.C. 48; above, pp.766–768; cf. The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293.

<sup>39</sup> Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co Ltd [1905] 2 K.B. 543, as explained in Taylor v Oakes, Roncoroni & Co (1922) 38 T.L.R. 349 at 351; and see above, p.766.

<sup>40</sup> See above, p.754.

<sup>41</sup> Ridgway v Hungerford Market Co (1835) 3 A. & E. 171; Baillie v Kell (1838) 4 Bing.N.C. 638; Spottiswood v Barrow (1850) 5 Ex. 110; Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339; Taylor v Oakes, Roncoroni & Co (1922) 38 T.L.R. 349 at 351 (affirmed ibid. 517); Cyril Leonard & Co v Simo Securities Trust Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 80; Glenore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 394; Stoczniia Gdanska S.A v Latvian Shipping Co (No.3) [2002] EWCA Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768 at [32]. The rule does not apply in cases of unfair dismissal (which need not be a breach of contract at all): see Earl v Slater & Wheeler (Airlyne) Ltd [1973] 1 W.L.R. 51; and cf. Polkey v AE Dayton Services Ltd [1988] A.C. 344 at 355–356.

<sup>42</sup> e.g. Arcos Ltd v E A Ronaasen & Sons [1933] A.C. 470.

<sup>43</sup> Heisler v Anglo-Dal Ltd [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1273 at 1278; André & Cie v Cook Industries Inc [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 463.

<sup>44</sup> See above, p.754.

<sup>45</sup> Hence the present exception does not apply where that time has expired by the time of the refusal: see Glenore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 395, where it was the buyer who was guilty of the wrongful repudiation.

<sup>46</sup> cf. The Lena [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 68 at 79; The Eurometal [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 337 at 341.

One controversial case goes further in holding that a buyer who failed to specify a defect in existence at the time of rejection could not later rely on it, even though the defect was one which the seller could not have cured and even though the seller did not in any way change his position in consequence of the buyer's original failure to specify it. This is the Panchaud Frères case,<sup>47</sup> where maize was sold under a contract which provided for shipment to be made in "June/July." The goods were shipped in August and the buyers could have rejected them on this ground. But they paid against documents which would, if carefully examined, have revealed the fact of late shipment; and when the goods arrived the buyers rejected them for defects of quality. This was a bad ground as the goods were sound when shipped and the sellers were not responsible for their subsequent deterioration. The buyers claimed their money back, and, three years after their rejection of the goods, they relied for the first time on the fact of late shipment. Their claim failed, no doubt because the court was impressed by the possibly harsh consequences of allowing the buyers at such a late stage to rely on an originally unstated excuse for non-performance. To allow the buyers to do this would, it was said, be inconsistent with a "requirement of fair conduct."<sup>48</sup> But the vagueness of this requirement makes it virtually impossible to tell which cases will be governed by it and which by the general rule that a party can rely on an originally unstated excuse for non-performance.<sup>49</sup> Hence other attempts have been made to explain the Panchaud Frères case. One suggestion is that the case was one of waiver<sup>50</sup> (in the sense of election)<sup>51</sup>; but this was rejected in the case itself on the ground that the buyers did not know of the late shipment when they accepted the documents.<sup>52</sup> Another view is that the buyers' conduct gave rise to an estoppel or equitable estoppel.<sup>53</sup> These doctrines, however, operate only if two requirements are satisfied: an unequivocal representation made by one party and reliance on it by the other.<sup>54</sup> In one later case<sup>55</sup> the argument based on estoppel accordingly failed on the ground that no such representation had been made; and in the Panchaud Frères case, even if the inference of a representation could be drawn from the buyers' acceptance of the documents, it is hard to see in what way the sellers had relied on that representation.<sup>56</sup> They certainly lost no chance of curing the defect in their tender, for when that tender was made such a cure was no longer possible. Probably the safest explanation of the case is that the buyers had lost their right to reject by acceptance<sup>57</sup> when they paid against documents which disclosed the fact of late shipment. It follows that the buyers could have relied on the fact of late shipment if they had

<sup>47</sup> Panchaud Frères SA v Établissement General Grain Co [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 53.

<sup>48</sup> [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 53 at 59.

<sup>49</sup> Perhaps for this reason, the decision is treated with some reserve in The Protonas C [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 390 at 392.

<sup>50</sup> V Berg & Son Ltd v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 499 at 502–503; Intertraded SA v Lesieur-Tortiaux [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509 at 513; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v C Muckprang Jr [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 221 at 225.

<sup>51</sup> See above, p.811.

<sup>52</sup> For the requirement of such knowledge, see above, p.815.

<sup>53</sup> This was the view of Lord Denning M.R. in the Panchaud Frères case itself: [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 53 at 56; cf. V Berg & Son Ltd v Vanden Avenne-Izegem, above, n.50, at 502–503; Intertraded SA v Lesieur-Tortiaux, above, at 515; The Manila [1988] 3 All E.R. 843 at 852.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.403, 107–110.

<sup>55</sup> Glencore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386.

<sup>56</sup> cf. Raiffeisen Hauptgenossenschaft v Louis Dreyfuss & Co [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 345 at 352, where the Panchaud Frères case was held inapplicable precisely because the requirement of reliance was not satisfied.

<sup>57</sup> BP Exploration Co (Libya) Ltd v Hunt [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783 at 810–811; affirmed without reference to this point [1983] 2 A.C. 352; Glencore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 396.

rejected the documents, even though they had, at the time of such rejection, given an inadequate reason, or none at all.<sup>58</sup>

5. Standard of Duty<sup>59</sup>

The question to be discussed under this heading is whether liability for breach of contract is strict, or whether it is based on fault in the sense of want of care, diligence or honesty.<sup>60</sup>

(1) Cases of strict liability

Many contractual duties are strict.<sup>61</sup> The most obvious illustration of this principle is provided by the case of a buyer who cannot pay the price because his bank has failed or because his expectation of raising a loan has not been fulfilled, or because he is prevented by exchange control regulations from remitting money to the place where he has agreed to pay,<sup>62</sup> or because his supply of the currency in which he has agreed to pay has become exhausted and cannot be replenished.<sup>63</sup> In such cases there is no doubt that he is liable<sup>64</sup>: inability to pay money, even if it occurs entirely without the fault of the party who was to make the payment, is not an excuse for failing to make the payment. The same principle of strict liability applies to the duty of a seller of generic goods to make delivery. It is no defence for him to say that he was prevented from making delivery because he was let down by his supplier<sup>65</sup> or because no shipping space was available to get the goods to their agreed destination.<sup>66</sup> A charterparty similarly imposes a strict duty on the charterer to provide a cargo, so that inability to find one is no excuse.<sup>67</sup> In all these cases, the principle of strict liability may be modified by the terms of the contract (for example, by a “force majeure” clause),<sup>68</sup> but unless this is done liability is quite independent of fault.

The principle of strict liability also applies to certain cases of defective performance. At common law, a carrier of goods by sea was held to give an “absolute” warranty of seaworthiness<sup>69</sup>: it was not enough for him to show that he had taken reasonable care to make the ship seaworthy. In practice, sea carriers often contracted out of this strict

<sup>58</sup> cf. V Berg & Son Ltd v Vanden Avenue-Izegem PVBA [1977] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 499.

<sup>59</sup> Treitel, in Bos and Brownlie (ed.), Liber Amicorum for Lord Wilberforce, p.185.

<sup>60</sup> When, in Target Holdings Ltd v Redfern [1996] A.C. 421 at 432, Lord Browne-Wilkinson said that liability was “fault-based,” he was concerned, not with the standard of liability, but with the rule that the defendant was “only liable for the consequences of the legal wrong.” That “wrong” might result from breach of a strict duty as well as from one of a duty based on “fault” in the sense described in the text.

<sup>61</sup> Ruineri v Miles [1981] A.C. 1050 at 1086.

<sup>62</sup> Universal Corp v Five Ways Properties Ltd [1979] 1 All E.R. 552.

<sup>63</sup> Congimex S.A.R.L. (Lisbon) v Continental Grain Export Corp (New York) [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 346.

<sup>64</sup> cf. Francis v Comcliff (1977) 33 P. & C.R. 368; Christy v Pilkington 273 S.W. 2d 533 (1954).

<sup>65</sup> Barnett v Javeri & Co [1916] 2 K.B. 390; P. J van der Zijden Wildhandel v Tucker & Cross Ltd [1975] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 240; Intertrades SA v Lesieur Torteaux SARL [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509; cf. The Al Tamfiq [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 598 (late delivery).

<sup>66</sup> Lewis Emanuel & Son Ltd v Sammut [1952] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 629.

<sup>67</sup> The Jello [1961] A.C. 135 (overruled on another point in The Johanna Oldendorff [1974] A.C. 479); The Zuho Maru [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 552; cf. Hills v Sughrue (1846) 15 M. & W. 252 (where it was the shipowner who undertook to find the cargo); The World Navigator [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 23 at 30, 31 (time of loading); The Athenasia Cominos [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 282 and The Giannis K [1998] A.C. 605 at 619, 624 (shipper's “warranty” that cargo is not dangerous).

<sup>68</sup> There was such a clause in the Wildhandel case above, n.65 but in the circumstances it did not apply so as to protect the seller.

<sup>69</sup> Steel v State Line SS Co (1877) 3 App.Cas. 72 at 86.

liability; and in many cases the duty is now reduced by statute to one of due diligence.<sup>70</sup>

Liability is, again, strict where goods delivered under a contract of sale are defective: for example, because they do not comply with the seller's undertakings as to quality.<sup>71</sup> It is no defence for the seller to show that he took all reasonable care to see that there were no defects,<sup>72</sup> or that he could not have discovered the defects because he was a retailer selling goods in packages sealed by the manufacturer.<sup>73</sup> The position appears to be the same where goods are supplied under a contract for the supply of goods other than one of sale, e.g. under one of hire or hire-purchase.<sup>74</sup>

A contractor who executes repairs or building work is also strictly liable for defects in components fitted by him. He is not exonerated by showing that the components were supplied by a reputable manufacturer and that the defects were latent so that they could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care.<sup>75</sup> Contracts of this kind contain both a supply of goods, and a service, element. Strict liability with regard to the supply element can be justified on the ground that this is closely analogous to sale; and also on the ground that it is the first link in a chain of contractual liability which will stretch back to the manufacturer, on whom the liability should properly rest. The customer has no rights against the manufacturer in contract, as there is no contract between them<sup>76</sup>; and, by making the contractor strictly liable to the customer, the law gives the contractor an incentive<sup>77</sup> to recoup the loss so incurred by claiming damages for breach of contract from the manufacturer from whom he had bought the components. The introduction of the manufacturer's strict "product liability"<sup>78</sup> directly to the customer weakens this argument for the contractor's strict liability in contract to the

<sup>70</sup> Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, s.3.

<sup>71</sup> e.g. with those implied under Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.14, as amended by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, ss.1 and 7(1) and Sch.2, para.5. For further amendments of s.14, see Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), reg.3; an element of fault enters into these provisions by virtue of the new s.14(2E)(a) by which a seller is not liable in respect of a "public statement" about specific characteristics of the goods if he "was not, and could not reasonably have been, aware of the statement".

<sup>72</sup> Frost v Aylesbury Dairy Co Ltd [1905] 1 K.B. 608; cf. Lockett v AM Charles Ltd [1938] 4 All E.R. 170; H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd [1978] Q.B. 791 at 799–800.

<sup>73</sup> Daniels v White & Son [1938] 4 All E.R. 258.

<sup>74</sup> See Supply of Goods (Implied Terms) Act 1973, s.10 (as substituted by Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.192 and Sch.4, para.35 and Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch.2, para.4); Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, ss.4 and 9, as substituted by Sale and Supply of Goods Act 1994, s.7(1) and Sch.2, para.6. The wording of these provisions is similar to that of Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.14, under which liability is clearly strict. cf. Wetterton Electric Ltd v Welsh Development Agency [1983] Q.B. 796 (strict liability for breach of implied undertaking in licence to occupy factory that premises are fit for occupier's purpose). For further amendments of the provisions of the 1973 and 1982 Acts cited in this note, see Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), regs 7, 10 and 13; an element of fault enters into these new provisions for reasons mutatis mutandis the same as those given in relation to sale of goods in n.71 above.

<sup>75</sup> G H Myers & Co v Brent Cross Service Co [1934] 1 K.B. 46; Young & Marten Ltd v McManus Childs Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 454; cf. Hancock v Brazier [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1317; Barclays Bank plc v Fairclough Builders Ltd [1995] Q.B. 214. In The Zinnia [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 211 at 218 the repairer's duty was said to be one to ensure that reasonable care in buying the components was exercised; but as he was found not to have taken such care the further question whether he might be strictly liable did not arise. It is not clear what standard of liability is imposed by Defective Premises Act 1972, s.1(1)(a).

<sup>76</sup> This position appears not to be affected by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 (above, p.581 at n.9) and p.655 at n.28.

<sup>77</sup> Even if the contractor were not liable to the customer, he might be able to claim damages in respect of the customer's loss under the principle applied in Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] A.C. 85, above, p.594; but the customer would have no legal right to require him to make such a claim.

<sup>78</sup> Consumer Protection Act 1987, Pt 1.

customer, but does not wholly deprive it of its force since “product liability” is subject to many important qualifications.<sup>79</sup> The “chain of liability” argument is also open to the objection that the chain may be broken by a valid exemption clause.<sup>80</sup> It has therefore been suggested that, if the manufacturer is willing to sell the components only on terms that exclude his liability, and this fact was known both to the contractor and to his customer, then the contractor would not be strictly liable to his customer for defects in those components.<sup>81</sup>

(2) Liability based on fault

Under the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, a person who supplies a service in the course of a business impliedly undertakes to “carry out the service with reasonable care and skill”.<sup>82</sup> Such liability is clearly based on fault; but the Act also preserves “any rule of law which imposes on the supplier a stricter duty”.<sup>83</sup> Hence the question whether the supplier’s liability is strict or is based on fault will continue to depend on distinctions drawn at common law.

Where the contract is one for the supply of services and components, liability for defects in the components is (as we have just seen) generally strict<sup>84</sup>; but the contractor’s liability with regard to other phases of his operation is often based on fault. For example, a car repairer’s duty with regard to the safe-keeping of a customer’s car is one of care only.<sup>85</sup> The standard of a building or repairing contractor’s duty with regard to the actual carrying out of the work that he is employed to do is less clear. In one of the relevant cases,<sup>86</sup> a sharp distinction was drawn between the “supply of goods” and “service” elements of the contract, and it seems to have been accepted that, in respect of the “service” element, the contractor’s duty was one of care only.<sup>87</sup> Similarly, a contract for the supply of goods may impose on the supplier a duty to supply not only the goods but also the service, or to repair defects in, them after they have been supplied. He will then be strictly liable in respect of defects in the goods when supplied, but his service or repair undertakings will impose duties of diligence only.<sup>88</sup>

Where the contract is one for the supply of services alone, liability is often based on fault. Thus the general rule is that contracts under which services are rendered by professional persons (such as solicitors, architects, accountants or doctors) impose duties

<sup>79</sup> e.g. those arising from the meaning given to “defect” by s.3 of the 1987 Act, the defences made available by s.4, and the definition of “damage” in s.5.

<sup>80</sup> As in Helicopter Sales (Australia) Pty Ltd v Rotor Works Pty Ltd [1974] 132 C.L.R. 1.

<sup>81</sup> In Young & Marten Ltd v McManus Childs Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 454 at 467; the suggestion is perhaps based on the fact that the building contract specified tiles which could be obtained only from a single manufacturer.

<sup>82</sup> s.13; Wilson v Best Travel Ltd [1993] 1 All E.R. 353.

<sup>83</sup> s.16(3)(a).

<sup>84</sup> See above, p.839. s.12(3)(a) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 provides that such contracts are contracts for the supply of services for the purposes of the Act; but it does not specify the standard of liability.

<sup>85</sup> See Hollier v Rambler Motors (AMC) Ltd [1972] 2 Q.B. 71; cf. Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd [1945] 1 K.B. 189; Smith v Eric S Bush [1990] 1 A.C. 831 at 843 (plumber).

<sup>86</sup> Young & Marten Ltd v McManus Childs Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 454.

<sup>87</sup> ibid. at 465; cf. H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd [1978] Q.B. 791 at 800; The Raphael [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 659 at 665. See also BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783 at 796 (affirmed [1983] 2 A.C. 352).

<sup>88</sup> BHP Petroleum Ltd v British Steel plc [1999] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 544 at 577, affirmed [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 133.

of care only.<sup>89</sup> In some at least of such cases, the person rendering the services obviously does not guarantee to produce a result: this is particularly clear in the case of the lawyer engaged to conduct litigation since one party must inevitably lose, and of the doctor since a person who provides medical treatment is not normally understood to guarantee its success.<sup>90</sup> All that such persons undertake is to perform the promised services with reasonable care and skill. The same is true of the architect to the extent that he undertakes to supervise the work of others, or the supply of materials by them: in performing this function he cannot be expected to do more than exercise a reasonable degree of professional care and skill.

But the position is different where an architect commits an error, not of supervision, but of design: there is considerable support for the view that, where he designs a structure, he gives an "absolute warranty"<sup>91</sup> that it will be fit for his client's purposes. Similarly, a person who in the course of a profession or business undertakes to design and supply an article has been held strictly liable for defects in that article.<sup>92</sup> Some dicta, indeed, suggest that liability is strict only where the contract contains a "supply" as well as a "service" element<sup>93</sup>; but this limitation on the incidence of strict liability may, with respect, be doubted. In some of the relevant authorities no defect in the components or raw materials was alleged<sup>94</sup>; and where a defendant is thus held liable for defects in services alone it would be strange if the standard of that liability depended on the existence of another obligation (i.e. to supply materials) in respect of which he was not in breach.

<sup>89</sup> e.g. Clark v Kirby-Smith [1964] Ch. 506 (solicitor); Bagot v Stevens, Scanlan & Co Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 197 (architect); O'Connor v Kirby [1972] 1 Q.B. 90 (insurance broker); McNealy v Pennine Insurance Co Ltd [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 18 (insurance broker); Stafford v Conti Commodity Services [1981] 1 All E.R. 691 (commodities broker); Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 All E.R. 1005 at 1010, varied [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1287 (surveyor); cf. Investors in Industry Commercial Property Ltd v South Bedfordshire DC [1986] 1 All E.R. 787 at 806 (not reported on this point in [1986] Q.B. 1034); Luxmoore-May v Messenger May Baverstock [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1009; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 (underwriting agent); Barclays Bank plc v Weeks, Legg & Dean [1999] Q.B. 309 and Midland Bank plc v Cox McQueen [1999] 1 F.L.R. 1002 (solicitors); UCB Corporate Services Ltd v Clyde & Co [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 259; Hone v Going Places Leisure Travel Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 947; The Times, August 6, 2001 (package holiday). See below, p.983, n.55 as to the first two cases cited in this note.

<sup>90</sup> See Eyre v Measday [1986] 1 All E.R. 488 and Thake v Maurice [1986] Q.B. 644, where doctors were held not to have guaranteed that sterilisation operations would make patients permanently sterile; though it was recognised that such a guarantee might be given. In the latter case, the doctor was held liable in negligence for failing to warn the patient that sterility might not be permanent. Contrast Gold v Haringey Health Authority [1988] Q.B. 481, where there seems to have been no contractual relationship, and failure to warn of a very slight risk did not give rise to liability in negligence as it was normal not to give such a warning. The defendants' liability in Allen v Bloomsburg Health Authority [1993] 1 All E.R. 651 was also evidently regarded as arising in tort: see the reference to "tortfeasor" at 658. For the persons to whom the doctor's tort liability is owed in such cases, see Goodwill v Pregnancy Advisory Service [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1379; above, p.618.

<sup>91</sup> Greaves & Co (Contractors) Ltd v Baynham Meikle & Partners [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1095 at 1101; IBA v EMI (Electronics) Ltd (1980) 14 Build.L.R. 1, especially at 47–48 (where the contract contained a supply of goods element but no defect in the goods was alleged).

<sup>92</sup> Samuels v Davies [1943] K.B. 526 (dentist supplying false teeth: here the "supply" element predominated and du Parq L.J. regarded the contract as one of sale); IBA v EMI (Electronics) Ltd (1980) 14 Build.L.R. 1 (contract to design and erect a television mast).

<sup>93</sup> Basildon DC v JE Lesser Properties [1985] 1 All E.R. 20 at 26 (not reported on this point in [1985] Q.B. 839); cf. Cynat Properties Ltd v Landbuild (Investments & Property) Ltd [1984] 3 All E.R. 513 at 523; Wimpey Construction UK Ltd v DV Poole [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 499 at 514 (no undertaking by designer as to quality and execution of the work); George Hawkins v Chrysler (UK) (1986) 38 Build.L.R. 36 (where the contract contained no supply element).

<sup>94</sup> There was no such allegation in the cases cited in n.92, above.

(3) Fault and excuses for non-performance

Failure to perform is not a breach where a supervening event either discharges a contract under the doctrine of frustration<sup>95</sup> or provides a party with an excuse for non-performance.<sup>96</sup> An event has this effect only if it occurs without the fault of the party relying on it. In cases of frustration, this requirement is expressed by saying that frustration must not be "self-induced".<sup>97</sup> Similarly, a party generally<sup>98</sup> cannot rely as an excuse for non-performance on an event that is due to his fault; e.g. a farmer who agreed to sell a quantity of wheat to be grown on his land could not rely on the fact that less was produced if this was due to want of proper cultivation.<sup>99</sup>

Excuses for non-performance may be provided by "exceptions" in the contract itself, and such provisions must be distinguished from exemption clauses. Where performance is prevented by an event specified in an "exception", there is no breach at all, while an exemption clause excludes or restricts liability once a breach has been established. One factor tending to put a provision into the category of "exceptions" is that the specified event was beyond the control of the party relying on the provision, and occurred without fault.<sup>1</sup> Here again fault is relevant in determining whether non-performance is excused or amounts to a breach.

(4) Conditional contracts

Where a contract is subject to a contingent condition,<sup>2</sup> two rules apply which to some extent make fault relevant to the issue of contractual liability. First, a party may be in breach if he deliberately prevents the occurrence of the condition.<sup>3</sup> Secondly, a party may be under some degree of duty to bring about the occurrence of the condition: for example where goods are sold "subject to" export or import licence. In such a case the duty of the party who is to obtain the licence is normally one of diligence only,<sup>4</sup> so that fault is again relevant to the question whether a breach of contract has been committed.

6. Breach Distinguished from Lawful Termination

A contract may give a party the right lawfully to terminate it by notice. If that party says to the other that he no longer intends to perform, it may be hard to tell whether he has broken or terminated the contract. In Bridge v Campbell Discount Co Ltd<sup>5</sup> a hire-purchase agreement gave the hirer the right to terminate it by notice. He wrote to the owners: "Owing to unforeseen circumstances I am sorry but I will not be able to pay any more payments . . . Will you please let me know when and where I will have to return the car. I am very sorry regarding this, but I have no alternative." The House of Lords held (by a majority) that he had not terminated but broken the contract, apparently because that

<sup>95</sup> See below, Chap.20.

<sup>96</sup> See above, pp.835–836.

<sup>97</sup> See below, p.905.

<sup>98</sup> Illness preventing performance of a contract of personal service may be an exception: cf. below, p.906.

<sup>99</sup> Lack of fault is mentioned, apparently as an essential ingredient of the excuse, in the cases discussed at p.835, above.

<sup>1</sup> The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210 at 230; above, p.238. cf. The Xantho (1877) 2 App.Cas. 503.

<sup>2</sup> See above, pp.62–66.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.64.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.65.

<sup>5</sup> [1962] A.C. 600; cf. United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd v Ennis [1968] 1 Q.B. 54; Marriott v Oxford & District Co-operative Society Ltd [1970] Q.B. 186; Comet Group v British Sky Broadcasting, The Times, April 26, 1991.

was his intention. "Why should the hirer apologise so humbly, twice, if he thought that he was merely exercising an option given to him by the agreement?"<sup>6</sup>

The analogous question has been raised whether a strike or other "industrial action" amounts to a breach of a contract of employment.<sup>7</sup> This depends in the first place on the exact form taken by the conduct in question. While "working to rule" may be a breach,<sup>8</sup> no breach is committed merely because employees who usually work overtime (without being under any contractual obligation to do so) refuse to continue the practice.<sup>9</sup> In the more common case of a refusal by employees to perform their contractual obligation to work, there is clearly a breach if the contract contains a "no strikes" clause.<sup>10</sup> The same is true if an employee stops work (whether in the course of a strike or not) without giving the notice required by the terms of the contract. If the contract does not contain a "no strikes" clause and if due notice of the strike has been given, one view is that the notice terminates the contract; but this is said<sup>11</sup> to be unrealistic since both parties would expect a return to work under the old contract (suitably modified) after the strike was over. A second view is that a strike notice operates as a lawful suspension of the contract, at least if the notice is no shorter than that required for lawful termination of the contract.<sup>12</sup> This view in turn gives rise to difficulties, particularly as the notion of "suspending" a contract is one with which English law is unfamiliar<sup>13</sup> and which the courts have not favoured.<sup>14</sup> The prevailing view, therefore, is<sup>15</sup> that generally a strike is a breach of contract and that it is, moreover, a "repudiatory breach",<sup>16</sup> i.e. one which at common law<sup>17</sup> entitles the employer to dismiss the employee. The employer's other remedies by way of damages and withholding pay have already been discussed.<sup>18</sup>

SECTION 2. EFFECTS OF BREACH

A breach of contract may entitle the injured party to claim damages, the agreed sum, specific performance or an injunction, in accordance with the principles discussed in Chapter 21. In appropriate circumstances he may be entitled to more than one of these <sup>6</sup> [1962] A.C. 600 at 615 (italics supplied); cf. p.674. Another reason for the decision may be that it was in the hirer's interest to establish that he was in breach: see below, p.1005.

<sup>7</sup> Foster, 34 M.L.R. 274.

<sup>8</sup> See above, p.834.

<sup>9</sup> Tramp Shipping Corp v Greenwich Marine Inc [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1042; cf. Power Packing Casemakers v Faust [1983] Q.B. 471.

<sup>10</sup> As in Rookes v Barnard [1964] A.C. 1129.

<sup>11</sup> By Donovan L.J. in Rookes v Barnard [1963] 1 Q.B. 623 at 682. The statement was approved in the House of Lords by Lord Devlin: [1964] A.C. 1129 at 1204, though the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed. See also Wedderburn, 25 M.L.R. at p.258; 27 M.L.R. at p.268.

<sup>12</sup> Morgan v Fry [1968] 2 Q.B. 710 at 728 per Lord Denning M.R.; cf. ibid. p.733, per Davies L.J.; O'Higgins [1968] C.L.J. 223. Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s.234A (as inserted by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.21 and amended by Employment Relations Act 1999, s.4 and Sch.3, para.11) requires at least seven days' notice to be given.

<sup>13</sup> See Daily Mirror Newspapers Ltd v Gardner [1968] 2 Q.B. 762; Gorse v Durham CC [1971] 1 W.L.R. 775. A contract can only be "suspended" if it contains a provision to that effect, as, for example, in Bird v British Celanese Ltd [1945] K.B. 336.

<sup>14</sup> Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187.

<sup>15</sup> Simmons v Hoover Ltd [1977] Q.B. 284; Napier [1977] C.L.J. 34; cf. Rookes v Barnard [1963] 1 Q.B. 623, 682 per Donovan L.J. (above, n.11). In Chappell v Times Newspapers Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 482 at 502 Lord Denning M.R. similarly said that going on strike "wilfully to disrupt the employer's undertaking" was a breach of contract.

<sup>16</sup> Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 562; Wiluszynski v Tower Hamlets LBC [1989] 1 C.R. 493 at 503.

<sup>17</sup> By statute, the dismissal may be unfair, even where it is not wrongful at common law: see Employment Rights Act 1996, s.94.

<sup>18</sup> See above, pp.821–822.

remedies: e.g. to an injunction and damages. Breach may also give the injured party the right to "rescind" the contract in circumstances which have been discussed in Chapter 18.<sup>19</sup> It is with this right and with the legal effects of its exercise that we are here concerned.

1. The Option to Rescind or Affirm

(1) No automatic termination

A breach which justifies rescission does not automatically determine the contract.<sup>20</sup> It only gives the victim the option either to rescind the contract or to affirm it and to claim further performance. This is generally the case, even if the contract says that it is to become "void" on breach.<sup>21</sup> Normally such a stipulation is construed<sup>22</sup> restrictively so as to prevent one party from relying on his own breach of duty to the other party.<sup>23</sup> The reason for the rule that termination depends on the injured party's election is that the guilty party should not be allowed to rely on his own wrong so as to obtain a benefit under the contract,<sup>24</sup> or to excuse his own failure of further performance, or in some other way to prejudice the injured party's legal position under the contract.<sup>25</sup> Thus the guilty party is not allowed to take advantage of the breach by arguing that the original contract is discharged, so as to be entitled to a quantum meruit for work done by him,<sup>26</sup> or that he need pay only at the market rate (below that fixed by the contract) for services rendered to him.<sup>27</sup> Nor is he allowed to rely on the breach so as to prevent the injured party from enforcing provisions in the contract which are advantageous to that party and which may operate after the breach (such as a valid exclusive dealing clause<sup>28</sup>); or so as

<sup>19</sup> See above, pp.759 et seq.

<sup>20</sup> Michael v Hart & Co [1902] 1 K.B. 482 at 490; Howard v Pickford Tool Co [1951] 1 K.B. 417 at 421; Heyman v Darwins Ltd [1942] A.C. 356 at 361; Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 at 368, 375, 381; Mayfair Photographic Supplies Ltd v Baxter Hoare & Co Ltd [1972] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 410 at 417; Lakshmijit v Sherani [1974] A.C. 605; The Odenfeld [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357 at 374; Great Atlantic Insurance Co v Home Insurance Co [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 219 at 229; The TFL Prosperity [1984] 1 W.L.R. 48 at 58; Lusograin Comercio Internacional de Cereas Ltda. v Bunge AG [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 654 at 658; Evening Standard Ltd v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 588 at 593, 595; The Simona [1989] A.C. 788 at 800; Fenton Insurance Ltd v Guthaer Versicherungsbank VVaG [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 172; cf. the overruling in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 of Harbutt's "Plasticine" Ltd v Wayne Tank & Pump Co Ltd [1970] 1 Q.B. 447. See Thompson, 41 M.L.R. 137, suggesting a possible reconsideration of the rule stated in the text.

<sup>21</sup> cf. Davenport v R (1877) 3 App.Cas. 115; New Zealand Shipping Co v Société des Ateliers, etc., de France [1919] A.C. 1; Cerium Investments Ltd v Evans, The Times, February 14, 1991. Automatic termination results only if the event on which the contract is expressed to come to an end occurs without breach of duty, as in Brown v Knomsley BC [1986] I.R.L.R. 102.

<sup>22</sup> e.g. Alghussein Establishment v Eton College [1988] 1 W.L.R. 587; for the status of the rule as one of construction, capable of being excluded by contrary provision, see Cheall v Apex [1983] 2 A.C. 180 at 189; Gyllenhammar & Partners International v Sour Brodogradvena Industrial [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 403; Micklefield v SAC Technology Ltd [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1002 at 1007; cf. The Bonde [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 144; Thornton v Abbey National plc, The Times, March 4, 1993.

<sup>23</sup> For the requirement that the duty must be owed to the other party, see Thompson v ASDA-MFI Group plc [1988] Ch. 241; contrast Cheall v Apex, above, (breach of duty to third party).

<sup>24</sup> See the Alghussein case, above, n.22.

<sup>25</sup> ibid.; contrast Cheall v APEX [1983] 2 A.C. 180 (breach of agreement with third party).

<sup>26</sup> Boston Deep Sea Fishing & Ice Co v Ansell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 339 at 364.

<sup>27</sup> Example based on Timber Shipping Co SA v London & Overseas Freighters Ltd [1972] A.C. 1 (where there was no breach).

<sup>28</sup> e.g. Decro-Wall International v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361; cf. Thomas Marshall (Exports) Ltd v Guinle [1979] Ch. 227; cf. WPM Retail v Laing [1978] I.C.R. 787 (employee preserving right to bonus after wrongful dismissal); Lusograin Comercio Internacional de Cereas Ltda v Bunge AG [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 654 (seller's right to "carrying charges" (below, p.1004) after repudiation by buyer). For exclusion of the rule by contrary agreement, see above, n.22.

to deprive the injured party of the chance of claiming specific relief,<sup>29</sup> or of obtaining a lien on the guilty party's property.<sup>30</sup>

(2) Employment contracts

In some situations, the general rule, that a repudiatory breach does not of itself terminate the contract, clearly applies to employment contracts. For example, in Rigny v Ferodo Ltd<sup>31</sup> an employer had committed such a breach by imposing a wage-cut. The employee nevertheless continued to work and it was held that the contract had not been terminated by the employer's unaccepted repudiation. It followed that employee was entitled to recover the difference between the wages paid and those due under the contract.

But there is some support for the view that the position is different where the employee does not continue to work for the employer after the repudiatory breach,<sup>32</sup> either because he has been wrongfully dismissed or because he has left in breach of contract. In such cases, it is sometimes said that wrongful repudiation by one party automatically terminates the contract, without any need for the injured party to exercise the option to rescind. One argument in support of this view is that, where the employee is no longer working for the employer (in consequence of the repudiation), the employment relationship has plainly come to an end,<sup>33</sup> even against the wishes of the injured party. But it does not follow from this that the contract of employment is similarly terminated<sup>34</sup>: the argument that the repudiating party should not be allowed to rely on his own wrong to deprive the injured party of valuable rights under the contract has as much force where the contract is one of employment as it has in relation to other contracts. A further argument for the view that a contract of employment is automatically terminated by repudiatory breach is that, if the contract were not so terminated, a wrongfully dismissed employee would be entitled to sue for his wages until the time of his election to terminate; whereas it is settled that his remedy is in damages and not by action for the agreed wages.<sup>35</sup> But this argument fails to distinguish between the continued existence of the contract, and the remedies for its breach.<sup>36</sup> This point is by no means restricted to contracts of employment. Suppose, for example, that a buyer wrongfully repudiates an instalment contract for the sale of goods by refusing to accept further instalments. If the seller elects to treat the contract as remaining in existence, it

<sup>29</sup> See Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 (where it was held that there was no automatic termination); Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 588.

<sup>30</sup> G Barker v Eynon [1974] 1 W.L.R. 462 (where again the view that termination is automatic was implicitly rejected).

<sup>31</sup> [1988] I.C.R. 29.

<sup>32</sup> Sanders v Ernest A Neale [1974] I.C.R. 565; Kolatsis v Rockware Glass Ltd [1974] 3 All E.R. 555 at 558; Gannon v Firth [1976] I.R.L.R. 415; cf. Hare v Murphy Bros Ltd [1974] I.C.R. 603 (where the contract seems to have been frustrated on the ground stated at p.844, below); R. v East Berkshire Health Authority, Ex p. Walsh [1985] Q.B. 152 at 161; Thomson, 38 M.L.R. 347; Napier [1975] C.L.J. 36.

<sup>33</sup> Micklefield v SAC Technology [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1002 at 1006; Delaney v Staples [1992] 1 A.C. 687 at 692; Wilson v St Helen's BC [1998] I.C.R. 1141 at 1152.

<sup>34</sup> Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 474 (doubted on this point in Ex p. Walsh, above); followed, though with reluctance, in Boyo v Lambeth LBC [1995] I.C.R. 727; cf. above, p.693; Micklefield v SAC Technology [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1002; Litster v Forth Dry Dock & Engineering Co Ltd [1990] 1 A.C. 546 at 568. Villella v MFI Furniture Centres Ltd [1999] I.R.L.R. 468 at 474. Conversely, the relationship may continue after the contract has come to an end if, after having accepted the employer's repudiation, the employee continues to work for the employer "on an entirely different basis" from that of the old contract: Eastbourne BC v Foster [2001] EWCA Civ 1091; [2002] I.C.R. 234.

<sup>35</sup> Gunton's case, above [1981] Ch. 448 at 474; Marsh v National Autistic Society [1993] I.C.R. 453; cf. Delaney v Staples [1992] 1 A.C. 687 at 693; cf. Cerberus Software Ltd v Romley [2001] EWCA Civ 78; [2001] I.C.R. 376.

<sup>36</sup> See below, p.1016, n.95.

does not follow that he can sue for the price of the undelivered instalments. His remedy is normally in damages, though the amount recoverable may depend on whether he elects to terminate.<sup>37</sup> Similarly, where a time charter is wrongfully repudiated by the charterer, the shipowner is not bound to accept the repudiation; but even if he elects to affirm his remedy may be in damages rather than for the agreed hire<sup>38</sup>: "It is . . . the range of remedies which is limited, not the right to elect."<sup>39</sup> The same is true of contracts of employment: it does not follow from the continued existence of the contract that a wrongfully dismissed employee's remedy is by action for the agreed sum.<sup>40</sup> Thus it is submitted that the general rule applies to such contracts, i.e., that a repudiatory breach by either party does not lead to automatic termination, but only gives the injured party an option to rescind the contract.<sup>41</sup>

(3) Insurance Contracts

In the law of insurance, "warranty" is used in a sense similar to that now more usually given to "condition:" i.e. to refer to a term, the breach of which justifies the injured party's refusal to perform.<sup>42</sup> But the exact legal effects of a breach of "warranty" in insurance law are not identical with those elsewhere given to a breach of "condition": in particular, there is no requirement in insurance law that an insurer who is the victim of a breach of "warranty" must take any steps to exercise his option to avoid liability. A statutory statement of this position is given in s.33(3) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, which provides that "A warranty is a condition which must be exactly complied with. If it be not so complied with, then . . . the insurer is discharged from liability as from the date of the breach of warranty." The effect of these words was considered in The Good Luck,<sup>43</sup> where a ship had been insured under a policy entitling the insurers to declare certain areas as prohibited and containing a "warranty" that the shipowner would comply with any such prohibition. The policy was assigned to a bank (to which the ship had been mortgaged) and the insurers undertook to notify the bank "promptly" if they "ceased to insure" the ship. Some months later the ship was struck by an Iraqi missile while trading in the Persian Gulf (which had been declared by the insurers to be a prohibited area) and became a constructive total loss. A claim on the policy having been rejected, it was held that the insurers were liable on their undertaking to the bank. They had "ceased to insure" the ship as soon as she had entered the prohibited area: this breach of "warranty" released the insurers automatically,<sup>44</sup> without any election on their

<sup>37</sup> See below, p.962.

<sup>38</sup> See below, pp.1017–1018.

<sup>39</sup> The Alaskan Trader (No.2) [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 645 at 651.

<sup>40</sup> e.g. Silvey v Pendragon plc [2001] EWCA Civ 784; [2001] I.R.L.R. 685.

<sup>41</sup> Simmons v Hoover Ltd [1977] Q.B. 284; Western Excavating (EEC) Ltd v Sharp [1978] Q.B. 761 at 769; Thomas Marshall (Exports) Ltd v Guinle [1979] Ch. 227; Guntton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] 1 Ch. 448; Rasool v Hepworth Pipe Co [1980] I.C.R. 494; London Transport Executive v Clark [1981] I.C.R. 355; Burdett-Coutts v Hertfordshire CC [1984] I.R.L.R. 91; Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 586 at 593, 595; Dietman v LB of Brent [1987] I.C.R. 737 (affirmed without reference to this point [1988] I.C.R. 842); cf. also Decro-Wall International S.A v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 at 369–370, 375–376, 380–381; Marsh v National Autistic Society [1993] I.C.R. 453 at 458; the same assumption seems to underlie Miles v Wakefield MDC [1987] A.C. 539, above, pp.792–793; Thompson, 97 L.Q.R. 8, 235; 98 L.Q.R. 423; 42 M.L.R. 91; McMullen [1982] C.L.J. 110.

<sup>42</sup> See above, p.788.

<sup>43</sup> [1992] 1 A.C. 233.

<sup>44</sup> cf. Hussain v Brown [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 627 at 630, where, because of this "draconian" consequence of breach, the court refused to hold the "warranty" to be a continuing one.

part.<sup>45</sup> This followed from the wording of s.33(3), by which the insurer “is discharged from liability as from the date of the breach of warranty.” These words should be contrasted with those of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, giving a buyer, in cases of breach of condition, “a right to treat the contract as repudiated”.<sup>46</sup> The principle of automatic discharge for breach of “warranty” in insurance law was explained by Lord Goff in The Good Luck on the ground that “fulfillment of the warranty is a condition precedent to the liability [or further liability] of the insurer”.<sup>47</sup> At first sight this gives rise to some difficulty, for if performance of the warranty were a condition precedent it would follow that the insurer never became liable at all; while s.33(3) says that he is “discharged”, thus suggesting that a pre-existing liability has been brought to an end. It may be that this difficulty can be resolved by reference to the special nature of an insurance contract. Such a contract differs from a more typical contract (such as one of sale) in which the parties bargain for an exchange of performances (i.e., of the goods for the price). In a contract of indemnity insurance the position is that the performance of one party (i.e., payment of the premium by the assured) is exchanged for the promise of the other<sup>48</sup> (i.e., that of the insurer to indemnify against the loss), and in the great majority of cases this promise does not have to be performed at all because the event insured against does not occur. The occurrence of this event is thus a contingent condition precedent<sup>49</sup> of the insurer’s liability to pay, while on breach of the “warranty” he is “discharged” from his conditional promise even before the event occurs.

(4) Restrictions on injured party’s choice

Although rescission depends (except in the insurance situation just discussed) on the election of the injured party, that party’s option is to some extent curtailed by the rule that the damages to which he is entitled may be reduced if he fails to take reasonable steps to mitigate his loss.<sup>50</sup> This rule will sometimes put pressure on the injured party to rescind, for one common way of mitigating loss is to make a substitute contract; and the effect of doing this will often be to put it out of the injured party’s power to perform the old contract. Where this is the case, the making of the substitute contract will involve the rescission of the original one. Thus if a wrongfully dismissed employee mitigates his loss by taking another job he will thereby be “taken to have accepted his wrongful dismissal as a repudiatory breach leading to a determination of the contract of service”.<sup>51</sup> The same would be true where a seller, on the buyer’s repudiation, disposed elsewhere of the subject-matter. In these cases the injured party is not under any legal obligation to make the substitute contract<sup>52</sup>; so that in this sense he remains free to choose between affirmation and rescission. But his freedom of choice is limited in that, if he acts unreasonably in failing to make such a contract, he will suffer a reduction in the damages to which he is entitled by reason of breach of the original contract.

<sup>45</sup> It follows that an insurer setting up breach of warranty as a defence does not thereby “rescind” the contract within the meaning of an exemption clause in the policy: HIH Casualty & General Insurance Ltd v New Hampshire Insurance Co [2001] EWCA Civ 735; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 39 at [122].

<sup>46</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.11(3).

<sup>47</sup> [1992] 1 A.C. 233 at 263; the words in square brackets do not occur in this report but do occur in [1991] 3 All E.R. 1 at 16 and in [1991] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 191 at 202.

<sup>48</sup> cf. below, p.1050.

<sup>49</sup> See above, p.62.

<sup>50</sup> See below, p.977.

<sup>51</sup> Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 468; Dietman’s case, above, n.41. The same result can follow where the employee continues to work for the employer “on an entirely different basis” from that of the repudiated contract: Eastbourne BC v Foster [2001] EWCA Civ 1091; [2002] I.C.R. 234.

<sup>52</sup> See below, p.977.

Conversely, the mitigation rules may require the injured party to accept performance from the party in breach even though it is not in accordance with the contract: e.g. they may require a buyer to accept late delivery.<sup>53</sup> In such a case, the mitigation rules again do not, strictly speaking, restrict the injured party's right to rescind, but they do require him, having rescinded, to enter into a new contract for late performance at the original price (subject to damages for delay).<sup>54</sup> The injured party does not commit any breach of duty by failing to enter into such a new contract, but his failure to do so will reduce the damages to which he is entitled for breach of the original contract. Hence his freedom of choice will, as a practical matter, be restricted, this time in the direction of putting him under pressure to accept performance, though subject to relatively minor modifications.

(5) Exercise of the option

The question whether the option to rescind has been exercised has been described as one of fact<sup>55</sup>; but this description assumes that a number of legal requirements have been satisfied. The prime requirement is that the behaviour of the injured party must unequivocally indicate his intention to exercise the option. Normally mere "silence and inactivity"<sup>56</sup> will not suffice for this purpose, but there is no absolute rule to this effect. Thus in Vitol SA v Norelf Ltd<sup>57</sup> a contract for the sale of propane was wrongfully repudiated by the buyer and, after receiving the repudiation, the seller made no attempt to take any of the steps which he would have been expected to take for the purpose of performing the contract,<sup>58</sup> if he were treating it as still in force. The House of Lords held that an arbitrator's finding that the seller had accepted the repudiation was not wrong in law; for, even if the seller's reaction to the breach could be described as "inactivity," it was in the circumstances not equivocal since it clearly conveyed to the buyer that the seller was treating the contract as at an end. The option will commonly be exercised by giving notice to this effect to the party in breach, and sometimes such notice must be given: for example, where the injured party seeks the return of property with which he has parted under the contract.<sup>59</sup> But there is plainly no such requirement where "inactivity" suffices for the exercise of the option; nor does notice seem to be necessary where the injured party has put it out of his power to perform the original contract by making a substitute contract to satisfy the mitigation requirement.<sup>60</sup> The option can also be exercised in the legal proceedings brought on the contract.<sup>61</sup> Obviously the victim affirms the contract by claiming specific performance but there is no inconsistency between claiming damages for a prior breach, or for the breach in question, and

<sup>53</sup> The Solholt [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 574 (affirmed, [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605).

<sup>54</sup> The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605, criticising Strutt v Whitnell [1975] 1 W.L.R. 870 for failing to observe the distinction drawn in the text.

<sup>55</sup> Kish v Taylor [1912] A.C. 604 at 617; Agrokor AG v Tradigrain SA [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 497 at 500.

<sup>56</sup> State Trading Corp of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 286; Glencore Grain Rotterdam BV v LORICO [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386 at 394. cf. below, pp.858–859.

<sup>57</sup> [1996] A.C. 800.

<sup>58</sup> Such as tendering shipping documents as "a precondition to payment of the price:" ibid. at 811. Contrast Jaks (UK) Ltd v Cera Investment Bank SA [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 89 at 96 (failure to take steps to perform another contract with a third party not sufficient).

<sup>59</sup> Lakshmijit v Sherani [1974] A.C. 605.

<sup>60</sup> Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 468.

<sup>61</sup> It can be exercised even after beginning of the proceedings: Tilcons Ltd v Land & Real Estate Investments Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 46.

exercising the option to rescind.<sup>62</sup> There are, moreover, cases in which the victim merely refuses to perform until the other party either cures his breach or (in the case of contracts calling for continuing performance) resumes performance in conformity with the contract. For example, an employer may refuse to pay wages, or to pay them in full, for so long as his employee refuses (in the course of “industrial action”) to perform his duties under the contract of employment. Such a temporary refusal on the employer’s part does not amount to an exercise by him of the option to rescind.<sup>63</sup>

If the victim accepts further performance after breach, he may be held to have affirmed, so that he cannot later rescind the contract.<sup>64</sup> He must, moreover, rescind the contract as a whole: for example, a tenant cannot remain on premises and ignore a particular term of the lease on the ground that the landlord had, in the past, failed to perform his obligations under that term.<sup>65</sup>

2. Effects of Rescission or Affirmation

(1) Rescission

Rescission by the victim is sometimes said to terminate the contract. But this statement can mislead, and it is best to consider the precise effects of rescission on the obligations of each party.

(a) ON OBLIGATIONS OF THE VICTIM. After rescission, the victim is no longer bound to accept or pay for further performance.<sup>66</sup> He is also entitled to refuse to make payments which had not yet fallen due at the time of rescission, e.g. because the other party’s performance was incomplete or defective<sup>67</sup>; and he is released from other obligations which, under the contract, were to be performed in the future: for example, a wrongfully dismissed employee is no longer bound by covenants in restraint of trade in his contract of employment.<sup>68</sup>

On the other hand, rescission does not operate retrospectively,<sup>69</sup> in the sense of liberating the victim from his duty to perform obligations which had accrued before rescission. For example, where freight under a charterparty is deemed earned on loading, the charterer remains liable to pay it even though he later justifiably rescinds on account of the shipowner’s repudiatory breach.<sup>70</sup> The victim may also himself have been in breach at the time of the other party’s repudiation, but not in such a way as to justify <sup>62</sup> General Billposting Co Ltd v Atkinson [1909] A.C. 118. Contrast United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd v Ennis [1968] 1 Q.B. 54 at 65, where it was said that the victim affirms by claiming a sum due under a provision in the contract fixing the amount payable in the event of breach, even though that provision was penal; sed quaere.

<sup>63</sup> Wiluszynski v Tomer Hamlets LBC [1989] I.C.R. 493; it is assumed that the breach justified rescission. For the different question whether failure to perform a condition precedent of itself entitles the injured party to rescind, see above, pp.765–766.

<sup>64</sup> Davenport v R (1877) 3 App.Cas. 115; cf. above, pp.811–816; an unsatisfied demand for performance does not have the same effect: below, p.856.

<sup>65</sup> Total Oil Great Britain Ltd v Thompson Garages (Biggin Hill) Ltd [1972] 1 Q.B. 318.

<sup>66</sup> Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849.

<sup>67</sup> e.g. above, p.783; SCI (Sales Curve Interactive) v Titus SARL [2001] EWCA Civ 591; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 416, at [28–33], [65].

<sup>68</sup> General Billposting Co Ltd v Atkinson [1909] A.C. 118; Briggs v Oates [1990] I.C.R. 473. cf. Thompson v Coroon (1993) 66 P. & C.R. 445; contrast Lawrence David Ltd v Ashton [1991] 1 All E.R. 384 (where it was not clear that the employer was in repudiatory breach).

<sup>69</sup> Hurst v Bryk [2002] 1 A.C. 185.

<sup>70</sup> The Dominique [1989] A.C. 1056; cf. Hurst v Bryk [2002] 1 A.C. 185 for a special application of this principle to a partner’s obligation to pay his share of the partnership liabilities incurred before, but falling due after, rescission.

that repudiation.<sup>71</sup> In such a case, the victim is, in spite of his own breach, entitled to rescind, but he remains liable in damages for the breach which he had himself committed before rescinding.<sup>72</sup>

The victim also continues to be bound, after rescission, by ancillary obligations of the kind to be described below,<sup>73</sup> and even by primary obligations where the contract expressly so provides.<sup>74</sup>

If, at the time of rescission, the victim has already performed, he may be entitled to recover back that performance. For example, a buyer who justifiably rejects goods for breach of condition is normally entitled to the return of the price.<sup>75</sup> To this extent, rescission has a retrospective effect. It is submitted that, where the victim would thus be entitled, after he has rescinded, to recover back money paid before rescission, he should also be relieved from liability to pay sums which had become due (but had not been paid) before rescission; for it would make no practical sense to hold him liable in one action for a payment which he could then claim back in another.<sup>76</sup>

(b) ON THE OBLIGATIONS OF THE PARTY IN BREACH. For the purpose of stating the effects of rescission on the obligations of the party in breach, it is necessary to distinguish between primary and secondary obligations.<sup>77</sup> The primary obligation is one to render the actual performance promised; the secondary obligation is one to pay damages for failure to perform the primary obligation.

The effect of rescission on the primary obligations of the party in breach is exactly the same as its effect on those of the victim: normally the party in breach is released from primary obligations which had not yet fallen due at the time of rescission,<sup>78</sup> but he remains liable to perform those which had already fallen due at that time,<sup>79</sup> except where a payment which he should have made before rescission was one which he could, if he had so made it, have recovered back, even on rescission for his own breach.<sup>80</sup>

The rules stated in the preceding paragraph can be excluded by contrary provision in the contract or by other evidence of contrary intention.<sup>81</sup> Thus even a primary obligation

<sup>71</sup> e.g. where the victim's own breach is a breach of an independent covenant (above, p.763); or one which is not sufficiently serious to justify rescission (above, pp.769–778); or one which occurs simultaneously with the other party's breach, as in State Trading Corp of India v M Golodetz [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 288.

<sup>72</sup> Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 390.

<sup>73</sup> See below, after n.83.

<sup>74</sup> See below, at n.81.

<sup>75</sup> See below, p.1052.

<sup>76</sup> cf. McDonald v Denys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 C.L.R. 457 (see below, p.1011) where a claim against the party in breach failed on similar reasoning, which should a fortiori protect the victim of the breach; and below, p.911.

<sup>77</sup> A distinction drawn by Lord Diplock in a number of cases, e.g. in Lep Air Services v Rolloswin Investments Ltd [1973] A.C. 331 at 354–355 and Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 848–849. cf. also below, p.1013, n.78.

<sup>78</sup> cf. above, p.849. It follows that there can be no specific enforcement of those primary obligations: see Walker v Standard Chartered Bank [1992] B.C.L.C. 535.

<sup>79</sup> Hyundai Shipbuilding & Heavy Industries Co v Pournaras [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 502; Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574; cf. Fielding & Platt Ltd v Najjar [1969] 1 W.L.R. 357 at 361; Lep Air Services v Rolloswin Investments Ltd [1973] A.C. 331 at 354–355; Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 844, 849; Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129; below, p.1012; The Trident Beauty [1994] 1 W.L.R. 161 at 164; SCI (Sales Curve Interactive) v Titus SARL [2001] EWCA Civ 591; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 416, at [35].

<sup>80</sup> McDonald v Denys Lascelles Ltd, above, n.76.

<sup>81</sup> Yasuda Fire & Marine Insurance Co of Europe v Orion Marine Insurance Underwriting Agency Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 525.

which has not yet fallen due can survive rescission if the contract so provides,<sup>82</sup> while liability for one which had fallen due will not survive if the contract validly provides that rescission is to be the sole remedy.<sup>83</sup>

Primary obligations must also be distinguished from ancillary ones, that is, those imposed by provisions which deal not with the performance to be rendered, but with such matters as the resolution of disputes arising out of the contract,<sup>84</sup> or the inspection by one party of records to be kept by the other for the purpose of ascertaining what rights and duties have come into existence under the contract.<sup>85</sup> Normally, such ancillary obligations are intended to survive rescission and are accordingly not released by it.<sup>86</sup>

The important difference between the effects of rescission on the obligations of the two parties is that the party in breach (unlike the victim) comes, as a result of rescission, under a secondary obligation to pay damages,<sup>87</sup> and that his liability in damages may relate both to breaches committed before rescission and to losses suffered by the victim as a result of the defaulting party's repudiation of future obligations.<sup>88</sup> Suppose, for example, that a hirer under a hire-purchase agreement fails to make the agreed payments in circumstances amounting to a wrongful repudiation and therefore giving the owner the right to terminate. If the owner does terminate, the hirer remains liable for instalments which had fallen due before termination, his primary obligation to pay these being unaffected<sup>89</sup>; but he is not liable for subsequent instalments, having been released by termination from his primary obligation to make these payments. On the other hand, the hirer is liable in damages for wrongful repudiation<sup>90</sup> and these may include compensation for loss suffered by the owner after, and as a result of, the premature termination of the agreement: for example, where he has to dispose of the goods elsewhere for less than the amount which would have been paid by the defaulting hirer if the agreement with him had run its full course.

For the purpose of these rules, it is important to distinguish between claims for damages (which can be brought in respect of future losses) and claims for agreed sums<sup>91</sup>

<sup>82</sup> Harbinger UK Ltd v GE Information Services Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 166 (a case of lawful termination by notice; but there seems to be no reason why a similar express provision should not take effect after rescission for breach).

<sup>83</sup> Malcolm-Ellis (Liverpool) v American Electronics Laboratory (1984) N.L.J. 500.

<sup>84</sup> Heyman v Darwins Ltd [1942] A.C. 356; cf. Arbitration Act 1996, s.7.

<sup>85</sup> The Yasuda Fire & Marine Insurance Co of Europe Ltd v Orion Marine Insurance Underwriting Agency Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 525.

<sup>86</sup> See the authorities cited in nn.84 and 85 above. The same view was taken by Phillips I.J. in Rock Refrigeration Ltd v Jones [1997] I.C.R. 938 of covenants in restraint of trade in an employment contract which had been wrongfully repudiated by the employer; but this is hard to reconcile with General Billposting Ltd v Atkinson [1908] A.C. 118 (above, p.849), on which the other two members of the court based their decision in the Rock Refrigeration case. For the different position where the contract is wrongfully repudiated by the person subject to the restraint, see Kall Kwick Printing (UK) Ltd v Rush [1996] F.S.R. 114.

<sup>87</sup> RV Ward Ltd v Bignall [1967] 1 Q.B. 534 at 548; Thorneley [1967] C.I.J. 168; Lep Air Services Ltd v Rolloswin Investments Ltd [1973] A.C. 331 esp. at 350; Lakshmi v Sherani [1974] A.C. 605; State Trading Corp of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 286; Carter, 1 J.C.I. 113 and 249.

<sup>88</sup> R Leslie Shipping Co v Welstead [1921] 3 K.B. 420; Yeoman Credit Ltd v Waragowski [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1124; Overystone Ltd v Shipway [1962] 1 W.L.R. 117; Bridge v Campbell Discount Co Ltd [1962] A.C. 600; Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129 at 1141; Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849 ("anticipatory secondary obligation"); The Rijn [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 267; Gill & Duffus SA v Berger Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 390; Novia Petroleum International Establishment v Tricon Trading Co [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 312; Malik v BCCI [1998] A.C. 20 at 36.

<sup>89</sup> Brooks v Beirnsstein [1909] 1 K.B. 98; Chatterton v Maclean [1951] 1 All E.R. 761; cf. The Almare Seconda [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 443; and see below, p.1011, n.56.

<sup>90</sup> cf. Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [2002] EWCA Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768 at [83] (damages in respect of failure to pay instalments which would have become due after rescission).

<sup>91</sup> See below, pp.1013-1014.

(which can be brought only in respect of sums that have become due at the time of rescission). The distinction is sometimes overlooked because there is a tendency to describe any claim for money as one for damages, even when it is actually a claim for the enforcement of a primary obligation to pay an agreed sum. The point can be illustrated by taking the common case of a contract of sale which requires the buyer to pay a deposit and which is rescinded by the seller after, and on account of, the buyer's breach in failing to pay that deposit. In such a case, the seller will be entitled to (i) the deposit as an agreed sum due at the time of rescission; and (ii) damages for the buyer's repudiatory breach,<sup>92</sup> e.g. for loss suffered because the seller can resell the property only for an amount which falls short of the contract price by more than the amount of the deposit. In such a case, it is not strictly accurate to say that the seller can "sue for damages including the amount of the unpaid deposit."<sup>93</sup> This statement is accurate only where the seller has rescinded on account of some other breach by the buyer before the buyer's primary obligation to pay the deposit had accrued. This was the position in The Blankenstein,<sup>94</sup> where a contract for the sale of three ships provided for the signing of a formal memorandum and for the payment of a deposit of $236,500 on such signing. The seller rescinded on account of the buyer's wrongful refusal to sign and resold the ships for $60,000 less than the original contract price. As the deposit was to be paid only on signing, the primary obligation to pay it never accrued.<sup>95</sup> But it was held that the seller was entitled to $236,500 as damages for the buyer's repudiation in wrongfully refusing to sign the memorandum. The majority of the Court of Appeal rejected the argument that the seller's damages should be no more than $60,000; and their view seems, with respect, to be correct. At the time of rescission, the seller had been deprived, by the buyer's breach, of his right to receive the full amount of the deposit. He thus became entitled to damages of a precisely ascertainable amount, and later events (i.e. the relatively favourable resale of the ships) should not be allowed to deprive him of that accrued right. Such events should be relevant to the assessment of damages only where, at the time of rescission, it is not possible to put an exact value on the injured party's loss.

It follows from the preceding discussion that there is no inconsistency between rescinding a contract for breach and at the same time claiming damages for that breach. Accordingly it has been held that damages can be recovered by a buyer who rejects goods because they are defective,<sup>96</sup> or delivered late<sup>97</sup>; by a wrongfully dismissed employee who has rescinded so as to free himself from a covenant in restraint of trade<sup>98</sup>; by a vendor of land who has rescinded because of the purchaser's failure to comply with a notice to complete<sup>99</sup>; and by a purchaser of land who has rescinded on account of the vendor's breach.<sup>1</sup> Rescission for breach differs in this respect from rescission for misrepresenta-

<sup>92</sup> See above, p.774.

<sup>93</sup> Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 at 1430.

<sup>94</sup> [1985] 1 W.L.R. 435; Carter, 104 L.Q.R. 207.

<sup>95</sup> The doctrine of "fictional fulfilment" of a condition against a party preventing its occurrence would support the argument that the buyer should be liable for the deposit as such, but that doctrine was rejected in Thompson v ASDA-MFI Group plc [1988] Ch. 241, above, p.66.

<sup>96</sup> Millar's Machinery Co Ltd v David Way & Son (1935) 40 Com.Cas. 204. cf. also the right of an unpaid seller to rescind (by exercising his right of resale) and claim damages: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48(4).

<sup>97</sup> The Al Tamfiq [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 598.

<sup>98</sup> General Billposting Co Ltd v Atkinson [1909] A.C. 118.

<sup>99</sup> Buckland v Farmar & Moody [1979] 1 W.L.R. 221; Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367.

<sup>1</sup> The contrary was held in Horsler v Zorro [1975] Ch. 302 but that decision was disapproved in Buckland v Farmar & Moody, above, and overruled in Johnson v Agnew, above. Horsler v Zorro had been convincingly criticised by Albery in 91 L.Q.R. 337; cf. Gummow, 92 L.Q.R. 5; Oakley [1980] C.L.J. 58; but see Dawson, 39 M.I.L.R. 241; Hetherington, 96 L.Q.R. 401, disputed by Jackson, 97 L.Q.R. 26.

tion, the effect of which is to treat the contract as if it had never existed.<sup>2</sup>

In discussing the effect of rescission on the obligations of the guilty party, we have so far assumed that the right to rescind has arisen under the general rules of law governing that right. It may, however, also arise under an express contractual provision, and such a provision may give the victim the right to rescind for some possibly quite minor breach. So far as the guilty party's primary obligations to perform are concerned, the exercise of such a right has exactly the same effects as the exercise of a right to rescind which has arisen under the general law: that is, in general accrued obligations remain due, while future ones (other than "ancillary" ones) are released.<sup>3</sup> But there is an important difference between the effects of rescission under the general law, and rescission under an express contractual provision, on the guilty party's secondary obligation to pay damages. Where the victim rescinds under the general law, he can recover damages for wrongful repudiation in respect of any loss suffered by reason of the premature determination of the contract<sup>4</sup> but he has (unless the contract otherwise provides<sup>5</sup>) no such right where he rescinds for a minor breach under an express contractual provision entitling him to do so.<sup>6</sup> Suppose, for example, that a hire-purchase agreement provides that the owner can terminate for any failure by the hirer to pay an instalment. If the owner terminates for the hirer's failure to pay two out of 24 instalments, he can sue for the two unpaid instalments, but not for any further ones which would have accrued later if he had not terminated the agreement.<sup>7</sup> Moreover, it was held in Financings Ltd v Baldock<sup>8</sup> that he cannot recover damages in respect of loss suffered by reason of the premature termination of the agreement. The reason for this is that, in the case put, the hirer's only breach is his failure to pay the two instalments. He is not, in addition, guilty of a repudiation of the whole contract, for which the damages for premature termination are recoverable where the right to rescind is governed by the general law. This restriction on the right to damages can, it is submitted, be supported on the policy ground that it alleviates the sometimes harsh operation of express provisions which allow a party to rescind even for a minor breach.<sup>9</sup>

The distinction between cases in which the right to rescind arises under general rules of law, and those in which it arises under express provisions may, however, itself give rise to difficulty. The reason for the difficulty lies in the fact that the terms "repudiation" or "repudiatory breach" (which are often used to describe breaches giving rise to the right rescind under general rules of law) can bear at least two meanings.<sup>10</sup> They can refer,

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.370 and cf. Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 395, 398, also disapproving the reasoning of Barber v Wolfe [1945] Ch. 187.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.850 at nn.78–79; for exceptions, see ibid. at nn.80–86.

<sup>4</sup> See above, p.851 at n.88.

<sup>5</sup> As in The Solholt [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 574 at 579 (affirmed without reference to this point, [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605).

<sup>6</sup> The crucial question is whether the injured party has a right to determine under the general law (as opposed to one specifically conferred by the contract). If he has such a right, he can recover damages for wrongful repudiation even though, in determining the contract, he relies on an expressly conferred contractual right: Yeoman Credit Ltd v Wragowski [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1124; Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Pournaras [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129; The Almare Seconda [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 433; an apparently contrary dictum in UCB Leasing Ltd v Holtom [1987] R.T.R. 362 at 368 is best explained on the ground that repudiation was not established (ibid.) so that there was no right to terminate except under the express provisions of the contract.

<sup>7</sup> Financings Ltd v Baldock [1963] 2 Q.B. 104 at 110; Brady v St Margaret's Trust [1963] 2 Q.B. 494; Charterhouse Credit Corp v Tolly [1963] Q.B. 683; UCB Leasing Ltd v Holtom [1987] R.T.R. 362.

<sup>8</sup> See above; Kalsep Ltd v X-Flow Ltd BV, The Times, May 3, 2001; Amer-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 C.L.R. 170 (discussing earlier Australian cases); Goode, 104 L.Q.R. 25; Beale, 104 L.Q.R. 355; Opeskin, 106 L.Q.R. 293.

<sup>9</sup> See above, p.779.

<sup>10</sup> The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465 at 1474.

first, to breaches which amount to an actual repudiation because they give rise to a substantial failure in performance<sup>11</sup> (and therefore to a right to rescind), or, secondly, to all breaches which give rise to a right to rescind, including those which have this effect under one of the many exceptions<sup>12</sup> to the requirement of substantial failure. In the second of these senses, a breach may be described as “repudiatory” (because it gives rise to a right to rescind) even though it does not amount to an actual repudiation: for example, a breach of condition<sup>13</sup> may be called “repudiatory” even though it does not cause serious (or indeed any) prejudice to the victim of the breach. Moreover, a term may be a condition on the sole ground that the parties have expressly classified it as such in their contract.<sup>14</sup> Where such a term is broken, it is just as plausible to say that the right to rescind has arisen under a general rule of law (i.e. the rule that breach of condition gives rise to a right to rescind) as to say that it has arisen under an express provision of the contract (i.e. the express classification by the parties of the term as a condition). A similar point can be made about stipulations as to the time of performance. Breach of such a stipulation justifies rescission if time is “of the essence” of the contract and this will be the position if (a) delay causes, or is likely to cause, serious prejudice to the victim of the breach,<sup>15</sup> or (b) the contract expressly provides that time is to be of the essence.<sup>16</sup> In the latter case it is, again, possible to say either that the right to rescind for failure to perform at the agreed time has arisen under a general rule of law (i.e. the rule giving rise to a right to rescind where time is of the essence) or that the right has arisen under an express provision of the contract (i.e. the provision making time of the essence). Financings Ltd v Baldock<sup>17</sup> may from this point of view be contrasted with Lombard North Central plc v Butterworth,<sup>18</sup> where a contract of hire provided (1) that the owner could terminate for any failure to pay instalments when due; and (2) that the time of payment was of the essence of the contract. It was held that the second of these provisions made the stipulation as to the time of payment a condition of the contract so that its breach entitled the owners not only to rescind but also to damages for the premature termination of the agreement. But the decision was reached with evident reluctance<sup>19</sup> since there was no substantial distinction between the facts of this case and those of Financings Ltd v Baldock.<sup>20</sup> In the Lombard case the two provisions summarised above were simply two ways of saying the same thing and the policy consideration of alleviating the harsh operation of express provisions for determination is no weaker where the contract contains two such provisions than where it contains only one. For this reason it is submitted that the earlier decision in Financings Ltd v Baldock is to be preferred<sup>21</sup>: i.e. that damages for premature determination should not be available

<sup>11</sup> See above, pp.769–778.

<sup>12</sup> See above, pp.778–811.

<sup>13</sup> See above, pp.788–805; SCI (Sales Curve Interactive) v Titus SARL [2001] EWCA Civ 591; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 416, at [19]; Stoczni Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co (No.3) [2002] EWCA Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768 at [76] (where there was also an actual repudiation).

<sup>14</sup> See above, pp.791–792.

<sup>15</sup> See above, pp.828–829 at nn.34–43.

<sup>16</sup> See above, p.828 at n.31.

<sup>17</sup> See above, n.8.

<sup>18</sup> [1987] Q.B. 527; Treitel [1987] L.M.C.L.Q. 143; Bojczuk [1987] J.B.L. 353; Nicholson, 1 J.C.L. 64; cf. also The Afivos [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195 at 203.

<sup>19</sup> See [1987] Q.B. at 546 (“with considerable dissatisfaction”) and at 540 (“not a result which I view with much satisfaction”).

<sup>20</sup> [1963] 2 Q.B. 683, above, p.853.

<sup>21</sup> For the same reason, Financings Ltd v Baldock, above, is (it is submitted) to be preferred to the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Canada in Keneric Tractor Sales Ltd v Langille [1987] 2 S.C.R. 440; Ziegel [1988] L.M.C.L.Q. 277, and 104 L.Q.R. 513.

merely<sup>22</sup> because the injured party has rescinded under express provisions giving him the right to do so.

The rules stated above assume that the injured party has, and has exercised, an option to rescind. We have seen that in the law of insurance an insurer may be discharged from liability automatically, without any such election on his part<sup>23</sup>; and where he is so discharged it does not follow that even the primary obligations of the other party are similarly discharged. Thus the assured can remain liable for premiums even though his breach of “warranty” has discharged the insurer.<sup>24</sup>

(2) Affirmation or failure to rescind

The victim may positively affirm the contract, or simply fail to exercise his option to rescind.<sup>25</sup> In either of these cases, the contract remains in force,<sup>26</sup> so that each party is bound to perform his primary obligations when that performance falls due.<sup>27</sup> It must, however, be recalled that, under the rules relating to the order of performance,<sup>28</sup> the effect of one party’s breach may be to prevent performance of the other’s obligations from falling due. For example, an employee may, in breach of contract, refuse to perform his duty to work and so give the employer a right to dismiss him.<sup>29</sup> The mere fact that the employer does not exercise that right does not lead to the result that the employer must continue to pay the agreed wages. On the contrary, he is under no such liability since performance of the employee’s duty to work is a condition precedent of the employer’s duty to pay.<sup>30</sup> The position is more complex where the employee’s breach takes the form, not of an outright refusal to work, but of a refusal merely to perform specified tasks while continuing to perform the remaining duties of his employment. This situation has already been discussed<sup>31</sup>; the only point which needs to be made here is that, if the employer voluntarily accepts such partial performance, he must pay for it at the contract rate,<sup>32</sup> while the employee is liable in damages for loss caused by his breach.<sup>33</sup> It is in this sense that the obligations of both parties “remain in force”.

The statement just made relates only to the obligations of the parties, and not to the remedies for their enforcement. To say that a party remains bound under the contract to do or to abstain from doing some act does not mean that these obligations can be enforced by an order of specific performance or by an injunction; and similarly to say that a party remains bound to make certain payments does not mean that an action for

<sup>22</sup> The injured party may be entitled to such damages by virtue of an express term giving him this right, even on rescission for a minor breach; but such a term runs the risk of being void as a penalty (below, p.929), as it was in the Lombard case, above, n.18.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.999.

<sup>24</sup> The Good Luck [1992] A.C. 233 at 263.

<sup>25</sup> Mere inaction does not necessarily amount to such failure: see this situation discussed on p.848 above, after n.56.

<sup>26</sup> e.g., Segap Garages Ltd v Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Ltd, The Times, October 24, 1989; BMBF (No.12) v Harland & Wolff Shipbuilding & Heavy Industries Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 862; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 385. These were cases of actual breach. The same rule applies in cases of anticipatory breach: below, pp.864–865.

<sup>27</sup> For certain effects of victim’s inability to perform, see above, pp.767–769.

<sup>28</sup> See above, pp.761–766.

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.810.

<sup>30</sup> See above, p.762.

<sup>31</sup> See above, p.821.

<sup>32</sup> i.e. he can make a pro rata deduction in respect of the unperformed services: Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539.

<sup>33</sup> Sim v Rotherham Metropolitan BC [1987] Ch. 216.

the agreed sum can be brought against him.<sup>34</sup> The circumstances in which these remedies are available are discussed in Chapter 21<sup>35</sup>; here it is necessary only to say that, in any of the cases just mentioned, the victim's only remedy may be an action for damages.

(3) Change of course

Once the victim has rescinded, he cannot later affirm and demand performance: this follows from the rule that rescission releases the defaulting party from his primary obligation to perform.<sup>36</sup> On the other hand, where the victim's original reaction to the breach is to press for performance, he plainly does not release the guilty party from any obligation; nor does he, by demanding performance after breach,<sup>37</sup> necessarily waive his right to rescind, since such a demand is not of itself a "clear and unequivocal" representation<sup>38</sup> that that right will not be exercised. So long as there are no other circumstances from which such a representation can be inferred, the victim can therefore still rescind if the other party does not comply with the demand for performance.<sup>39</sup>

A special application of the rule just stated is to cases in which the injured party has actually obtained an order of specific performance. If the defendant fails to comply with the order, one possible course of action open to the injured party is to apply to the court for enforcement of the order. There was formerly some support for the view that this was the only remedy available to him, and that he could not, after having obtained an order of specific performance, then rescind and claim damages.<sup>40</sup> But this view was rejected by the House of Lords in Johnson v Agnew.<sup>41</sup> In that case, vendors of land were (as the purchaser knew) relying on the proceeds of the sale to pay off a mortgage on the land. The purchaser failed to complete, even after specific performance had been ordered against her, with the result that the land was sold by the mortgagee. The vendors were therefore no longer able to enforce the order of specific performance (since they could no longer convey the land) and it was held that they were entitled to damages, not only under the special statutory power to award damages in lieu of specific performance,<sup>42</sup> but also at common law.<sup>43</sup> The reasoning of Johnson v Agnew is not, moreover, restricted to the situation in which failure to comply with the order of specific performance has disabled the party who had obtained it from performing his side of the bargain.

<sup>34</sup> Telephone Rentals v Burgess Salmon, The Independent, April 22, 1987.

<sup>35</sup> See especially below, pp.1013–1019.

<sup>36</sup> See above, p.851; Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 393; cf. Meng Leong Developments Pte Ltd v Jip Hong Trading Co [1985] A.C. 511. The position may be different where the party in breach denies the breach and maintains the continued existence of the contract: see Systems Control plc v Munro Corporate plc [1990] B.C.L.C. 659 at 666.

<sup>37</sup> Our concern here is with the victim's reaction to an actual breach. For the position in cases of anticipatory breach, see below, p.864.

<sup>38</sup> See above, pp.813–814; e.g. Yukong Line Ltd of Korea v Rendsburg Investments Co of Liberia [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 604.

<sup>39</sup> cf. Tilcon Ltd v Land and Real Estate Investments Ltd [1987] 1 All E.R. 615; Safehaven Investments Inc v Springbok Ltd (1995) 71 P. & C.R. 59 at [68]; Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [2002] EWCA Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768 at [100].

<sup>40</sup> See Capital & Suburban Properties Ltd v Swycher [1976] Ch. 319 and the authorities there cited; Dawson (1977) 93 L.Q.R. 232; Oakley [1977] C.L.J. 20.

<sup>41</sup> [1980] A.C. 367, disapproving Capital & Suburban Properties Ltd v Swycher, above.

<sup>42</sup> See below, pp.1046–1047; such damages had been awarded in Biggin v Minton [1977] 1 W.L.R. 701.

<sup>43</sup> Semble, the position would be the same if the order for specific performance were obtained, and then not complied with, by the purchaser. The contrary was decided in Singh v Nazeeer [1979] Ch. 474; but that case followed Capital & Suburban Properties v Swycher, above, which is now disapproved: above, n.41.

It is based on the general rules relating to the effects of repudiatory breach and therefore applies even where no such disability results. The right to damages is subject only to the qualification that, where an order of specific performance has not been complied with, the party who had obtained the order and now wishes to claim damages must apply to the court for the dissolution of the order “and ask the court to put an end to the contract”.<sup>44</sup>

SECTION 3. REPUDIATION BEFORE PERFORMANCE IS DUE

1. Doctrine of Anticipatory Breach

An “anticipatory breach”<sup>45</sup> is said to occur when, before performance is due, a party either renounces the contract or disables himself from performing it.<sup>46</sup>

Renunciation requires a “clear” and “absolute”<sup>47</sup> refusal to perform; this need not be express but can take the form of conduct indicating that the party is unwilling, even though he may be able, to perform. A repudiation may even be inferred from silence where it is a “speaking silence”<sup>48</sup>: for example, the previous conduct of a party in refusing to perform another related contract may give rise to the inference that he will refuse to perform the contract in question. His silence or inactivity can then be a repudiation of that contract unless he takes positive steps to dispel that inference.<sup>49</sup> The conduct must indicate to the other party that the party alleged to have renounced the contract is about to commit a breach of it: an indication given to a third party of an intention to commit a breach at an unspecified time in the future has been held not to amount to a renunciation.<sup>50</sup>

Disablement need not be “deliberate”,<sup>51</sup> in the sense that there may be an anticipatory breach even though it was not the party’s intention to disable himself from performing; but the disablement must be due to the party’s “own act or default”.<sup>52</sup> Such disablement is most clearly illustrated by cases in which a party does a positive act which is certain to prevent performance, such as disposing elsewhere of the specific thing<sup>53</sup> which forms the subject-matter of the contract.

Disablement may, however, also take the form of an omission. For example, a contract may be made for the sale of goods for future delivery, to be manufactured by the seller, or to be acquired by him from a third party, and the seller may fail to take any steps to

<sup>44</sup> [1980] A.C. 367 at 394; GKN Distributors v Tyne Tees Fabrication (1985) 50 P. & C.R. 403; Hillel v Christoforides (1991) 63 P. & C.R. 301.

<sup>45</sup> For criticism of this terminology, see Bradley v H Newsom, Sons & Co [1919] A.C. 16 at 53; The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 Q.B. 164 at 196. And see Dawson [1981] C.I.J. 83; Mustill, Butterworth Lectures, 1989–1990, 1.

<sup>46</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 438; cf. The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210; Tiplady, 89 L.Q.R. 465.

<sup>47</sup> The Hermosa [1982] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 570 at 572; cf. The Gregos [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1465; Jaks (UK) Ltd v Cera Investment Bank SA [1998] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 89 at 93.

<sup>48</sup> Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co (No.3) [2002] EWCA Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768, at [96].

<sup>49</sup> ibid.

<sup>50</sup> Laughton and Hawley v BAPP Industrial Supplies [1986] I.C.R. 245.

<sup>51</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati, above, at 438; contrast The Super Servant Tiro [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 149 at 155 (“deliberate or at least voluntary”), affirmed [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1.

<sup>52</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati, above, at 441; or (as in that case) from the act or default of another person to whom he had delegated performance of his contractual duty.

<sup>53</sup> Disposing of a thing which is not specific does not amount to disablement, for the seller may be able to perform, by supplying another thing of the contract description out of stock or from another source: Texaco Ltd v Eurogulf Shipping Co Ltd [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 541. cf. Alfred C Toepfer International GmbH v Itex Itagrani Export SA [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 360 (applying the same principle to disablement by a buyer).

manufacture the goods or to acquire them from the supplier. The failure will then amount to his "own . . . default" in the sense that he will have failed to do something that he was obliged by the contract to do in order to put himself into the position of being able to perform on the due date. But if a seller of goods to be acquired from a third party had duly contracted with that third party to acquire the goods, he would not be in anticipatory breach merely because it became highly unlikely that the third party would deliver them under his contract with the seller, so that the seller himself would, in turn, be unable to perform his contract with the buyer. A fortiori a seller is not in anticipatory breach merely because the buyer fears that the subject-matter of the sale, when delivered, will turn out to be defective.<sup>54</sup> Nor would a buyer be in anticipatory breach merely because, before the time fixed for payment, some external cause (such as exchange control, or the failure of a bank) made it virtually certain that he would be unable to pay on the due date. In the last three examples there is no disablement by the party's "own . . . default": hence the prospective inability does not amount to an anticipatory breach,<sup>55</sup> even though it would, if it persisted up to the time when performance was due, then amount to an actual breach.<sup>56</sup> Difficulties can obviously arise in deciding whether a prospective inability resulting from an omission is due to the party's "own . . . default." The difficulty is illustrated by the very case in which this requirement is stated, Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati.<sup>57</sup> In that case, a charterer was held to be in anticipatory breach of his obligation to provide a cargo, at the time fixed for loading, because of the prospective failure of a third party, with whom he had contracted for the supply of the goods, to deliver them within that time. This aspect of the case has been judicially described as "debatable"<sup>58</sup>; it can perhaps be explained on the ground that the charterer had failed to ensure that his supply contract was effective for the purpose of the performance of his own obligations under the charterparty.

Where one party has committed an anticipatory breach, the other has a choice. He can try to keep the contract alive by continuing to press for performance,<sup>59</sup> in which case the anticipatory breach will have the same effects as an actual breach. Alternatively, he can "accept" the breach, in which case his rights to damages and rescission are governed by the special rules to be discussed below.

2. Acceptance of the Breach

A breach can be accepted by bringing an action for damages; or by giving notice of intention to accept it to the party in breach. Conduct known to the party in breach will suffice even if no notice of it is given by the injured party.<sup>60</sup> Conversely, once the injured party has made it plain that he is treating the contract as at an end, he "does not need to do anything more".<sup>61</sup> Mere acquiescence or inactivity will often be equivocal and so fail to constitute an acceptance for this purpose.<sup>62</sup> But there is no absolute rule of law

<sup>54</sup> The Veracruz I [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 356; The P [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 470.

<sup>55</sup> FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301 at 327–328.

<sup>56</sup> This may be so even though the party in breach is in no way at fault, e.g. where his source of funds fails: see above, p.838.

<sup>57</sup> [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 and see below, p.862.

<sup>58</sup> FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom, above, at 323.

<sup>59</sup> Michael v Hart & Co [1902] 1 K.B. 482; Harvela Investments Ltd v Royal Trust of Canada (CI) Ltd [1986] A.C. 207 at 227.

<sup>60</sup> Vitol SA v Norelf Ltd [1996] A.C. 800, as to which see also n.64, below.

<sup>61</sup> Lefevre v White [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 569 at 574; statements in Société Générale de Paris v Milders (1883) 49 L.T. 55 at 57, which refer to the need to act on the notice of acceptance, can be explained as merely descriptive of the usual course of events.

<sup>62</sup> Cranleigh Precision Engineering Ltd v Bryant [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1293; State Trading Corp of India v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277 at 286; Lefevre v White [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 569 at 574, 576–577.

to this effect: for example, the fact of the injured party's having failed, in response to the breach, to take the steps which he would normally have been expected to take in the further performance of the contract may (in circumstances described earlier in this Chapter)<sup>63</sup> unequivocally indicate his acceptance of the breach.<sup>64</sup>

Acceptance of the breach must be complete and unequivocal.<sup>65</sup> A party cannot accept an anticipatory breach of one term in a contract while treating the contract as still in existence for other purposes.<sup>66</sup>

3. Effects of Accepting the Breach

(1) Damages for anticipatory breach

The most striking feature of the doctrine of anticipatory breach is that acceptance of the breach entitles the victim to claim damages at once, before the time fixed for performance. This rule was established in Hochster v De la Tour<sup>67</sup> where the defendant had agreed to employ the plaintiff as courier for three months from June 1, and repudiated the contract on May 11. The plaintiff was able to claim damages at once: he did not have to wait until June 1 before beginning his action. The main reason for the decision was that "if the plaintiff has no remedy for breach of contract unless he treats the contract as in force and acts upon it down to the 1st of June 1852, it follows that, till then, he must enter into no employment".<sup>68</sup> This reasoning has been justly criticised,<sup>69</sup> for the court could have held that the defendant's repudiation gave the plaintiff the option to rescind at once but did not entitle him to damages until June 1: there is no necessary connection between these two consequences of the repudiation.

Where the interval between repudiation and the time fixed for performance is a long one, there are also practical objections to the rule in Hochster v De la Tour, and these are particularly strong where the trial takes place well before the time fixed for performance. One such objection is that the rule may lead to a wrong quantification of damages. If a seller of goods to be delivered in three years' time repudiates and the buyer claims damages at once, the quantification of those damages may depend on the market price at the time fixed for delivery<sup>70</sup>; but if the case is tried before that time the court can only guess what that price will be. Another objection to the rule is that it results in an acceleration of the defendant's obligation; he will have to pay damages now, even though under the contract he was not to perform until some future time.<sup>71</sup> Thus if a debtor repudiates liability to repay future instalments of a debt, the creditor can claim damages at once, even though the instalments, or some of them, are not payable until a future

<sup>63</sup> See above, p.848.

<sup>64</sup> Vitol SA v Norelf Ltd, above, n.60. The case was treated in the lower courts as one of anticipatory breach, but, except in quotations from the judgments of those courts, no reference to this aspect of the case was made in the House of Lords.

<sup>65</sup> Harrison v Northwest Holt Group Administration [1985] I.C.R. 668; Jaks (UK) Ltd v Cera Investment Bank Ltd [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 89 at 94.

<sup>66</sup> This was one reason for the decision in Johnstone v Milling (1886) 16 Q.B.D. 460.

<sup>67</sup> (1853) 2 E. & B. 678.

<sup>68</sup> (1853) 2 E. & B. 678 at 689.

<sup>69</sup> See Williston, Contracts (3rd ed.), §§ 1300 et seq.; Corbin, Contracts, §§ 959 et seq.; Vold, 41 Harv.L.Rev. 340 suggests that anticipatory breach might be regarded as a tort; cf. Weir [1964] C.L.J. 231; but see Hoffmann, 81 L.Q.R. 116.

<sup>70</sup> See below, pp.959–960.

<sup>71</sup> If the injured party affirms the contract and sues for specific performance, the court may give judgment in his favour at once, but the judgment will not order the defendant to perform until the time fixed for performance arrives: see Hasham v Zenab [1960] A.C. 316.

day.<sup>72</sup> Of course in assessing those damages the court will allow the debtor “a discount for accelerated payment”.<sup>73</sup> Even more strikingly, the defendant will have to pay damages at once although at the time of the action his liability is still contingent and might never mature at all. Thus damages have been recovered for anticipatory breach of a husband’s promise to make a will leaving a life interest in property to his wife, although it was uncertain at the time of the action whether the wife would survive the husband.<sup>74</sup>

In spite of these objections, the rule in Hochster v De la Tour is well established<sup>75</sup> and at least two points can be made in its favour. First, the rule may help to minimise loss. In a case like Hochster v De la Tour, the injured party might in fact be more likely (whether or not he was bound) to keep himself ready to perform if he had no right to sue at once. The rule giving him that right provides at any rate some incentive for him to abandon the contract, and so to avoid this extra loss. Secondly, the rule may sometimes be necessary to protect the injured party: for example, if he has paid in advance for a promise of future performance which is then repudiated. In such a case the injured party could be seriously prejudiced if he had no claim against the other party until the time fixed for performance had arrived; for, having made the advance payment, he might lack the means to procure a substitute contract.

Acceptance of the breach affects not only the claimant’s entitlement to damages, but also the way in which those damages are assessed. The latter point is discussed in Chapter 21.<sup>76</sup>

(2) Rescission for anticipatory breach

(a) TYPES OF BREACH JUSTIFYING RESCISSION. An anticipatory breach, like an actual breach, can give rise to a right to rescind and that right arises immediately, i.e. before performance is due. Whether it does give rise to such a right depends on the factors discussed in Chapter 18.<sup>77</sup> Generally, therefore, the right to rescind will arise only if the prospective effects of the anticipatory breach are such as to satisfy the requirement of substantial failure in performance.<sup>78</sup> Thus a charterer’s advance announcement of a deliberate delay of one day in loading would not (any more than an actual delay of this kind<sup>79</sup>) justify rescission. In relation to actual breach, however, the requirement of substantial failure is subject to many exceptions<sup>80</sup>; and the question arises whether the right to rescind for anticipatory breach extends to cases falling within those exceptions.

<sup>72</sup> In the United States, the doctrine of anticipatory breach does not apply in this situation: see Williston, Contracts (3rd ed.), §1326; Restatement 2d, Contracts, §243 Ill. 4. The American rule is convincingly criticised by Corbin, Contracts, §962; and it seems that it would not be followed in England: see next note. There is some support for the American rule in Canada and Australia: see Melanson v Dominion of Canada General Ins Co [1934] 2 D.L.R. 459; MacKenzie v Rees (1941) 65 C.L.R. 1 at 16–18; Progressive Mailing House Pty Ltd v Tabali Pty Ltd (1985) A.L.J.R. 373 at 385.

<sup>73</sup> Lep Air Services Ltd v Rollosmin Investments Ltd [1973] A.C. 331 at 356; Re Park Air Services [1999] 1 All E.R. 673 at 676.

<sup>74</sup> Syngé v Syngé [1894] 1 Q.B. 466; cf. Frost v Knight (1872) L.R. 7 Ex. 111. The actual decision in the latter case has been made obsolete by Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1970, s.1; but quære whether it could still govern the time at which an order under s.2 could be made: cf. above, p.440.

<sup>75</sup> See Lep Air Services Ltd v Rollosmin Investments Ltd [1973] A.C. 331 at 356, 358; Woodar Investments Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 277 at 297; Gunton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 at 467; The Hazelmoor [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 351.

<sup>76</sup> See below, pp.962–964.

<sup>77</sup> See above, pp.759–811.

<sup>78</sup> See above, pp.769–778.

<sup>79</sup> See above, p.807.

<sup>80</sup> See above, pp.778–811.

There is one type of case in which a negative answer must clearly be given to this question, namely that in which the right to rescind exists by reason only of an express provision in the contract for determination.<sup>81</sup> We have seen that under such provisions in charterparties charterers cannot exercise their rights to cancel for late arrival of the ship, nor owners withdraw for non-payment of hire, merely because it has become certain that the ship will not arrive, or that the hire will not be paid in time: they are only entitled to rescind when the specified day has gone by without performance being rendered.<sup>82</sup> In The Afvos a shipowner gave notice (under such an express provision) of his intention to rescind on account of the charterer's failure to pay hire in time, but he did so while the charterer's breach was merely anticipatory; and Lord Diplock, in holding the purported rescission to be wrongful, said: "it is to fundamental breaches alone that the doctrine of anticipatory breach is applicable".<sup>83</sup> On the facts, the conclusion that the notice of rescission was premature cannot be doubted, for it is clear that the right to rescind for anticipatory breach does not apply to the particular exception to the requirement of substantial failure with which The Afvos was concerned, i.e. the exception under which rescission for actual breach is allowed because of an express provision for determination. But the mere fact that the right to rescind for anticipatory breach does not apply to one such exception does not support the conclusion that it cannot apply to any of them. Indeed, Lord Diplock himself has recognised that there can be a right to rescind for "an anticipatory breach of a fundamental term".<sup>84</sup> Yet such a breach is not necessarily a "fundamental breach" for it may occur without giving rise to a total or substantial failure in performance.<sup>85</sup> The same is true of a breach of a "condition," in the sense of a term any actual breach of which justifies rescission<sup>86</sup>; and Lord Diplock's suggestion in The Afvos,<sup>87</sup> that there can be no right to rescind for an anticipatory breach of condition may, with respect, be doubted. In part, the question whether there can be such a right is one of terminology. Lord Diplock has elsewhere defined "conditions" as terms the breach of which gives rise to the right to rescind because the parties have so "agreed, whether by express words or by implication of law".<sup>88</sup> Under this definition, express provisions for determination on non-performance are "conditions"; but a term is often classified as a "condition" by statute or by judicial decision<sup>89</sup> even though the parties have not expressly agreed that any breach of it is to give rise to the right to rescind. This group of conditions is in practice the more important group of such terms: and it is submitted that the right to rescind for anticipatory breach does extend to conditions of this kind. Thus in one leading case<sup>90</sup> on anticipatory breach the court asked first whether the prospective breaches were breaches of condition and (having reached the conclusion that they were not<sup>91</sup>) proceeded secondly

<sup>81</sup> See above, pp.778–782.

<sup>82</sup> See above, p.789.

<sup>83</sup> [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195 at 203.

<sup>84</sup> Harvela Investments Ltd v Royal Trust of Canada (CI) Ltd [1986] A.C. 207 at 226.

<sup>85</sup> See above, p.806; in Metro Meat Ltd v Fares Rural Co Pty Ltd [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 13 at 15 Lord Diplock seems to use "breach of a fundamental term" to refer simply to a breach evincing an intention not to perform in accordance with the agreed terms.

<sup>86</sup> See above, p.788. The exceptions, stated at p.800 above, to the right to rescind for breach of condition do not affect the present discussion.

<sup>87</sup> [1983] 1 W.L.R. 195 at 203.

<sup>88</sup> Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827 at 849; cf. above, pp.788–791.

<sup>89</sup> See above, pp.790–791.

<sup>90</sup> Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401.

<sup>91</sup> See below, nn.98, 99.

to the question whether they were sufficiently serious to justify rescission for anticipatory breach.<sup>92</sup> The first enquiry would have been unnecessary if the doctrine of anticipatory breach could never apply to breaches of condition.

(b) PROSPECTIVE EFFECT OF BREACH. In cases of anticipatory breach, the right to rescind may depend on the prospective effects of the breach. A question therefore arises as to what the injured party has to show to justify rescission. Is it enough for him to show that, at the time of rescission, he reasonably believed that the breach would, by the time fixed for performance, have acquired the character of a breach giving rise to the right to rescind? Or must he show that, at the time of rescission, it was already certain that the breach was going to be of this kind? This depends on the form taken by the anticipatory breach.

(i) Renunciation. The first form of anticipatory breach is by renunciation, i.e. by a "clear" and "absolute"<sup>93</sup> refusal to perform. This may be inferred from conduct where the party in breach has "acted in such a way as to lead a reasonable man to conclude that [he] did not intend to fulfil [his] part of the contract".<sup>94</sup> Whether conduct has this effect "is to be considered as at the time when it is treated as terminating the contract, in the light of the then existing circumstances".<sup>95</sup> The court therefore looks to the time of rescission to determine whether the injured party reasonably took the view that the refusal was sufficiently clear and absolute to give him the right to rescind.<sup>96</sup>

(ii) Prospective inability. Where a party is alleged to have committed an anticipatory breach by disabling himself from performing, the question whether the other party is entitled to rescind will generally depend on the seriousness of the resulting failure in performance. That failure being wholly prospective, its seriousness is more than usually a matter of speculation; but the injured party may nevertheless seek to rescind before the time fixed for performance. The problem arose in Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati<sup>97</sup> where a charterparty obliged the charterer to provide a cargo of 6,000 tons of scrap iron, to load it at the rate of 1,000 tons a day, and to complete the loading by July 21. He had failed to provide any cargo by July 18 and on that day the shipowners purported to rescind. The charterer's failure to provide a cargo was an actual breach, though not one which of itself justified rescission.<sup>98</sup> It seems that the charterer was also in breach of his obligation to load, for if loading were to be completed at the rate of 1,000 tons a day by July 21 it ought to have begun before July 18. However, perhaps because the obligation to complete loading still lay in the future, the breach was at least in part anticipatory<sup>99</sup>; and the question discussed<sup>1</sup> was whether this breach by the charterer, assuming it to be anticipatory, justified rescission by the shipowners on July 18. This depended on the seriousness of the breach: the shipowners had to show "that on July 18 the charterer was unable to load a cargo within such a time as would not have frustrated the venture".<sup>2</sup> It was not sufficient for them to show that on July 18 they had reasonable grounds for believing that such a frustrating delay would occur; they were justified in

<sup>92</sup> See below at n.2.

<sup>93</sup> The Hermosa [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 572.

<sup>94</sup> ibid. at 580.

<sup>95</sup> ibid. at 572.

<sup>96</sup> ibid., at 573; Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 439-440; The Sanko Iris [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487; Carter [1988] L.M.C.L.Q. 21.

<sup>97</sup> [1957] 2 Q.B. 401.

<sup>98</sup> [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 429. He was also in breach of his obligation to nominate a berth. Neither breach was one of condition: ibid. and cf. above, p.795.

<sup>99</sup> Devlin J. at 429 discusses whether this breach (which was also not one of condition) was actual or anticipatory and concludes that "it must be one or the other."

<sup>1</sup> See [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 436.

<sup>2</sup> [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 450.

rescinding only if they could prove that a delay of this kind would actually have occurred.<sup>3</sup>

This rule is likely to prove inconvenient in practice. It does not apply where the contract is alleged to be frustrated.<sup>4</sup> In one such case Scrutton J. said that "Commercial men must not be asked to wait till the end of a long delay to find out from what in fact happens whether they are bound by a contract or not; they must be entitled to act on reasonable commercial probabilities at the time when they are called upon to make up their minds."<sup>5</sup> In the Citati case Devlin J. held that this principle did not apply to "questions of breach of contract"<sup>6</sup>; and he added that "An anticipatory breach must be proved in fact and not in supposition."<sup>7</sup> One can to some extent justify the distinction between the two types of cases. Frustration leads only to discharge of the contract, while anticipatory breach can lead both to rescission and to liability in damages. It seems obviously unfair to hold one party (A) liable in damages, merely because the other (B) reasonably believed that A would be unable to perform, if it turns out that A is in fact able to perform at the appointed time. But it does not follow that B should not in these circumstances be entitled to rescind. On this point the reasoning of the Citati case is open to the same objection as that of Hochster v De la Tour<sup>8</sup>: it assumes that, in cases of anticipatory breach, the right to damages and the right to rescind necessarily arise at the same time. This is, however, no criticism of the actual decision in the Citati case, which appears to be consistent with the view here put forward; for the issue in the case was not whether the shipowners were liable for wrongful repudiation, but whether the charterer was liable in damages for an anticipatory breach of his obligation to load.

(iii) Prospective effects of actual breach. A reasonable belief that a substantial failure will occur is also sufficient to justify rescission where there has at the time of rescission been an actual breach which gives rise to uncertainty as to future performance. For example, where a ship is unseaworthy, "the charterer may rightly terminate . . . if the delay in remedying any breach is so long in fact, or likely to be so long in reasonable anticipation, that the commercial purpose of the contract would be frustrated".<sup>9</sup> In such a case the court need not fear that the shipowner will be held liable in damages merely because it was reasonably anticipated that he could not perform. His liability in damages is already established by reason of the actual breach; all that is in issue is the right of the injured party to rescind. That right should, it is submitted, depend on "reasonable anticipation" in cases of anticipatory, no less than of actual<sup>10</sup> breach.

(c) CONSEQUENCES OF RESCISSION. Where the injured party is entitled to, and does, rescind for anticipatory breach, two results follow. First, he is released from future obligations under the contract: this is so even though between acceptance of the anticipatory breach and the time fixed for performance the party in breach changes his

<sup>3</sup> ibid. at 449. The point appears to have been conceded.

<sup>4</sup> See below, pp.890–891.

<sup>5</sup> Embiricos v Sydney Reid & Co [1914] 3 K.B. 45 at 54.

<sup>6</sup> [1957] 2 Q.B. 401 at 449.

<sup>7</sup> ibid. at 450; Carter, 47 M.L.R. 422. cf. BV Oliehandel Jongkind v Coastal International Ltd [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 463 where the contract to some extent modified the English rule stated by Devlin J. in the Citati case. Contrast the American doctrine of "adequate assurance of performance" contained in U.C.C. s.2–609 and somewhat similar rules in civil law systems, e.g. German Civil Code §321.

<sup>8</sup> (1853) 2 E. & B. 678 at 679; above, p.859.

<sup>9</sup> Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 at 57 (italics supplied); Snia v Suzuki & Co (1929) 29 Com.Cas. 284 (the Citati case itself may have been of this kind: see above, p.862); cf. The Hermosa [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 580 (where a mere reasonable suspicion, as opposed to a reasonable conclusion, of future inability was held insufficient to justify rescission).

<sup>10</sup> See above, pp.774–776.

mind and offers after all to perform.<sup>11</sup> Secondly, the injured party is no longer bound to perform in order to establish his right of action on the contract; indeed he need not even show that he could at the time fixed for performance have performed a condition precedent to the other party's liability or a concurrent condition.<sup>12</sup>

4. Effects of Not Accepting the Breach

If the injured party does not accept the breach, he remains liable to perform,<sup>13</sup> and he retains the right to enforce the other party's primary obligations.<sup>14</sup> As a practical matter, he also keeps alive the possibility of securing actual performance of the contract without legal action. The fact that the injured party initially calls for performance does not prevent him from rescinding the contract on account of a later actual breach<sup>15</sup>; but there is a conflict of judicial opinion on the question whether, after the injured party has affirmed the contract, he can then change his mind while the breach remains anticipatory and still continues at the time of the injured party's later rescission. One view is that the injured party should not be allowed to change course in this way<sup>16</sup> since, if the guilty party had acted in reliance on the affirmation by making continued efforts to perform the contract, he would be prejudiced by that change of course.<sup>17</sup> But where no such prejudice is suffered,<sup>18</sup> it is hard to see why effect should not be given to the change of course in cases of anticipatory (as it is in cases of actual)<sup>19</sup> breach. Refusal to give it such effect could unduly prejudice the injured party. For one thing, such refusal could require that party to "engage in performance that is entirely pointless and wasteful"<sup>20</sup> while the other party's anticipatory breach continued. For another, the injured party's initial reaction to the anticipatory breach might well be to call on the guilty party to perform and this might be regarded as an affirmation of the contract. One way of protecting the injured party in such cases would be to hold that the demand did not of itself amount to an affirmation,<sup>21</sup> but this possibility might be ruled out on the facts: e.g. by the terms of the demand. In such cases the possible hardship to the guilty party has to be set against that to the injured party and it is submitted that, on balance, the preferable view<sup>22</sup> is that the injured party should not, as a general rule, be precluded by his initial affirmation from rescinding the contract, even while the breach remains anticipatory, if after the affirmation the guilty party persists in his refusal. Any hardship which this view might cause to the guilty party would be removed by holding that there could be no such

<sup>11</sup> Danube, etc., Ry v Xenos (1863) 13 C.B.(N.S.) 825; cf. Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361 at 382.

<sup>12</sup> See above, pp.766–769.

<sup>13</sup> See above, p.855.

<sup>14</sup> ibid.

<sup>15</sup> Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 228 at 236; cf. above, pp.856–857.

<sup>16</sup> This was the point actually decided in the Stocznia case, above; Treitel, 114 L.Q.R. 22. The decision was later set aside by the House of Lords: [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574 at 594 but without final resolution of the point here under discussion and see below, n.22.

<sup>17</sup> Stocznia case [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 228 at 235–236.

<sup>18</sup> No such prejudice could have been suffered in the Stocznia case, above, since the injured party had originally served notices of rescission; but as these were served under express provisions of the contract they formed (perhaps somewhat paradoxically) part of the process of affirmation.

<sup>19</sup> See above, p.856.

<sup>20</sup> Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 537 at 565, affirmed [2002] E.W.C.A. Civ 889; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 786.

<sup>21</sup> See Yukong Line Ltd of Korea v Rendsburg Investments Co of Liberia [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 604; above, p.795; Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 537 at 563–564; affirmed on this ground, above n.20, at [87]–[92].

<sup>22</sup> Expressed in the Stocznia case, above n.21, affirmed [2002] E.W.C.A. Civ 889, [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 768, leaving the present point open at [97]–[100] but inclining towards the view stated in the text above.

change of course where the original demand for performance was so expressed as to give rise to a waiver<sup>23</sup> of the right to rescind, or where it actually induced the guilty party to continue, in response to the demand, to make efforts to perform the contract.

A party who does not accept the breach cannot at common law get damages before the time fixed for performance<sup>24</sup>; and meanwhile he runs the risk of losing his right of action altogether. This could, for example, happen if the contract created a contingent right and events occurred to defeat that right between the time of the anticipatory breach and that fixed for performance.<sup>25</sup> The injured party will similarly lose his rights in respect of the anticipatory breach if he does not accept it and if, before performance from the guilty party has become due, that party withdraws his repudiation,<sup>26</sup> or lawfully puts an end to the contract, e.g. under an express cancelling clause.<sup>27</sup> The position is the same if, before that time, the contract was discharged by operation of law under the doctrine of frustration<sup>28</sup>; it would, in such a case, make no difference if the repudiating party had been unable to perform even if the frustrating event had not occurred.<sup>29</sup>

---

<sup>23</sup> cf. above, p.856.

<sup>24</sup> For a possible statutory power to award damages in such a case, if the contract was of a kind that is specifically enforceable, see below, pp.1046–1047.

<sup>25</sup> e.g. if in Synge v Synge [1894] 1 Q.B. 466, above, p.860, the wife had died before the husband without accepting the breach.

<sup>26</sup> Harrison v Northwest Holt Group Administration [1985] 1 C.R. 668.

<sup>27</sup> The Simona [1989] A.C. 788; cf. above, p.778.

<sup>28</sup> Avery v Bonden (1855) 5 F. & B. 714; (1856) 6 F. & B. 953; cf. The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 186; for frustration, see below, Chap.20.

<sup>29</sup> Continental Grain Export Corp v STM Grain Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 460 at 470.

CHAPTER TWENTY

FRUSTRATION<sup>1</sup>

UNDER the doctrine of frustration a contract may be discharged if after its formation events occur making its performance impossible or illegal, and in certain analogous situations.

SECTION 1. DEVELOPMENT

At one time most contractual duties were regarded as absolute, in the sense that supervening events provided no excuse for non-performance. In Paradine v Jane<sup>2</sup> a tenant was sued for rent and pleaded that he had for about two years of his tenancy been dispossessed by act of the King's enemies. This plea was held bad. "When the party by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may,<sup>3</sup> notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract".<sup>4</sup> This doctrine of absolute contracts works well enough (and continues to apply) where it would be reasonable, having regard to the nature of the contract or the circumstances in which it was made, to expect it to provide for the event.<sup>5</sup> But where this is not the case, the doctrine is no longer regarded as a satisfactory way of allocating the loss that is occasioned by supervening events.

The doctrine probably never applied where a contract called for personal performance by a party who died or was permanently incapacitated<sup>6</sup>; and another early exception to it was recognised in cases of supervening illegality.<sup>7</sup> In Taylor v Caldwell<sup>8</sup> Blackburn J. relied on the first of these exceptions, and on a number of others, as bases for formulating the general rule of discharge which has become known as the doctrine of frustration. The defendants in that case had contracted to hire out the Surrey Gardens and Music Hall "for the purpose of giving four grand concerts" on four designated days in the summer of 1861; the defendants were also to provide various side-shows and other entertainments in the gardens. The hirers agreed to pay £100 on the evening of each of the designated days and to provide "all the necessary artistes". Six days before the first concert was to have been given, the hall was destroyed by an accidental fire,<sup>9</sup> so that "it became impossible to give the concerts".<sup>10</sup> It was held that the defendants were not liable

---

<sup>1</sup> McElroy and Williams, Impossibility of Performance; Treitel, Frustration and Force Majeure; McKendrick, (ed.), Force Majeure and Frustration (2nd ed.).

<sup>2</sup> (1647) Aleyn 26; Ibbetson in Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel (Rose, ed.), p.3.

<sup>3</sup> i.e. if performance has not become illegal: below, p.887.

<sup>4</sup> At p.27.

<sup>5</sup> e.g. in Lewis Emanuel & Son Ltd v Summat [1959] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 629 (where the seller could reasonably have been expected to contract "subject to shipment," but did not do so); The Zuiho Maru [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 552.

<sup>6</sup> Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 at 836.

<sup>7</sup> Brewster v Kitchell (1691) 1 Salk. 198; Atkinson v Ritchie (1809) 10 East 530 at 534-535.

<sup>8</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826.

<sup>9</sup> Apparently caused by a careless plumber, who had left an unattended flame in the roof: The Times, June 12, 1861.

<sup>10</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 at 830.

in damages for the hirers' wasted advertising and other expenses. The contract had been discharged because, "the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless . . . some particular specified thing continued to exist", and in these circumstances it was "not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without the fault of the contractor".<sup>11</sup>

After being established in Taylor v Caldwell, the doctrine of frustration entered into a period of growth. It was extended to cases in which performance became impossible otherwise than through the perishing of a specific thing; and even to cases where performance did not become impossible at all but the commercial object, or purpose, of the contract was frustrated. In Krell v Henry<sup>12</sup> the defendant hired a flat in Pall Mall for the days on which the processions planned for the coronation of King Edward VII were to take place. His object was to see the processions, though this was not expressly stated in the contract.<sup>13</sup> The contract was frustrated when the processions were postponed because of the illness of the King. Performance was not physically impossible: the defendant could have used and paid for the flat on the days in question. But frustration was not restricted to physical impossibility: it also applied "to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things, going to the root of the contract, and essential to its performance".<sup>14</sup>

It can fairly be said that the defendant in Krell v Henry would have suffered unacceptable hardship if he had been held to the contract in the altered circumstances. But the courts have refused to extend the doctrine beyond this point; for to do so might enable a party to claim relief merely because circumstances had changed so as to turn the contract, for him, into a very bad bargain. In the British Movietonews case<sup>15</sup> the House of Lords rejected the view that a mere "uncontemplated turn of events"<sup>16</sup> (in that case, the cessation of war-time conditions in which the contract had been made) was a ground of frustration. Lord Simon said: "The parties to an executory contract are often faced, in the course of carrying it out, with a turn of events which they did not at all anticipate—a wholly abnormal rise or fall in prices, a sudden depreciation of currency, an unexpected obstacle to the execution, or the like. Yet this does not in itself affect the bargain which they have made".<sup>17</sup> More recently, Lord Roskill has similarly said that the doctrine of frustration was "not lightly to be invoked to relieve contracting parties of the normal consequences of imprudent commercial bargains".<sup>18</sup>

A less strict approach appears at first sight to have been taken by Lord Hailsham in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd, when he described the "proposition

<sup>11</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 at 833.

<sup>12</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740. See further p.885, below.

<sup>13</sup> In this respect Krell v Henry is unique among the "coronation seat" cases: the contracts in all the other reported cases expressly refer to one or both of the two planned processions.

<sup>14</sup> At p.748.

<sup>15</sup> British Movietonews Ltd v London and District Cinemas [1952] A.C. 166.

<sup>16</sup> [1951] 1 K.B. at 201, per Denning L.J.

<sup>17</sup> [1952] A.C. 166 at 185; cf. Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden [1979] Ch. 84 at 112–113; Watford BC v Watford RDC (1988) 86 L.G.R. 524 at 529. Lord Denning continued to adhere to the views expressed by him (above, n.16) in the British Movietonews case in spite of their disapproval in the House of Lords: see Staffs Area Health Authority v S Staffs Waterworks [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1387 at 1395 (decided by the majority of the court on other grounds: below, p.883); and cf. The Nema [1980] Q.B. 547 at 568, 127 (affirmed [1982] A.C. 724).

<sup>18</sup> The Nema [1982] A.C. 724 at 752; Atisa S.A. v Aztec A.G. [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 579 at 584; cf. Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noble Thorl GmbH [1962] A.C. 93 at 115; The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 8.

that the doctrine was not to be extended" as "untenable".<sup>19</sup> But the point of this observation was that the doctrine applied to contracts generally: thus suggestions that it did not apply to particular contracts, such as time charters, demise charters, and leases of land, have from time to time been rejected by the courts.<sup>20</sup> The actual decision in the National Carriers case was that events which temporarily prevented one of the parties from putting the subject-matter to its intended use were not sufficiently serious to frustrate the contract. In this respect, the case, so far from departing from, actually illustrates, the approach adopted in the British Movietonews case.

Since that case, there seems to have been some narrowing in the scope of the doctrine of frustration. Many factors account for this trend: the reluctance of the courts to allow a party to rely on the doctrine as an excuse for escaping from a bad bargain; the difficulty of drawing the line between cases of frustration and cases where liability for breach of contract is strict; the tendency of businessmen to "draft out" possible causes of frustration by making their own express provisions for obstacles to performance; and the practical difficulties to be discussed in the paragraph that follows. The trend is illustrated by the fact that the Second World War gave rise to few<sup>21</sup> reported cases in which contracts were held to be frustrated otherwise than by supervening illegality.<sup>22</sup> The Suez crisis of 1956 produced only two reported English cases in which frustration was successfully pleaded. Both these cases were later overruled.<sup>23</sup> When the Suez Canal was again closed in 1967, pleas of frustration met with no more success<sup>24</sup>; and the "energy crisis" resulting from further hostilities in the Middle East in 1973 did not lead to any reported cases in England in which frustration was even raised as a defence.<sup>25</sup> All this is not to say that the doctrine will not be applied where performance is actually prevented, as it was in a number of charterparty cases in which ships were trapped for long periods after the outbreak of hostilities between Iran and Iraq in 1980,<sup>26</sup> so that performance of the agreed services became impossible. In the Suez cases there was (with one exception<sup>27</sup>) no such prevention: performance merely became more onerous for the party alleging frustration. There is now a marked reluctance to apply the doctrine in such circumstances.

From a practical point of view, the doctrine of frustration gives rise to two related difficulties. The first is that it may scarcely be more satisfactory to hold that the contract is totally discharged than to hold that it remains in full force: often some compromise may be a more reasonable solution. Thus in some of the coronation seat cases the

<sup>19</sup> [1981] A.C. 675 at 689; cf. ibid. at 694, 712.

<sup>20</sup> Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] A.C. 435 (time charters); Blane Steamships Ltd v Minister of Transport [1951] 2 K.B. 965 (demise charters); National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 (leases of land).

<sup>21</sup> There were some, e.g. Morgan v Manser [1948] 1 K.B. 184.

<sup>22</sup> The Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32, the Denny, Mott case [1944] A.C. 265 and the Cricklewood case [1945] A.C. 221 were all cases of supervening illegality.

<sup>23</sup> Carapanayoti & Co Ltd v ET Green Ltd [1959] 1 Q.B. 131; overruled in the Tsakiroglou case [1962] A.C. 93; and The Massalia [1961] 2 Q.B. 278; overruled in The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226.

<sup>24</sup> For the Suez cases, see further p.879, below.

<sup>25</sup> cf. Sky Petroleum Ltd v VIP Petroleum Ltd [1974] 1 W.L.R. 576, where the only dispute was as to the injured party's remedy; no attempt was made to rely on frustration. In a number of American cases, it was argued (generally without success) that the contracts were discharged by these events on the ground of "impracticability"; e.g. in Eastern Airlines Inc v Gulf Oil 415 F. Supp. 429 (1975); for a case giving relief on this ground, see Aluminum Corp of America v Essex Group Inc 499 F. Supp. 53 (1980), below, p.884.

<sup>26</sup> The Evia (No.2) [1983] 1 A.C. 736; The Agathon [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 211; The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 400; The Chrysalis [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 503.

<sup>27</sup> i.e. The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226; but there the fact that the ship was trapped in the Canal did not lead to frustration as it was due to the charterer's prior breach of the contract: see below, p.904.

contracts provided that, if the procession were cancelled, the ticket-holder should be entitled to use the ticket on the day on which the procession eventually did take place.<sup>28</sup> Similarly, after 1956, contracts for the carriage or sale of goods began to specify which party was to bear any extra expense that might be incurred, should the Suez Canal again be closed.<sup>29</sup> In the absence of such express provisions, this kind of solution is not open to the courts: they have no power to modify contracts in the light of supervening events. The second difficulty is that the allocation of risks produced at common law by the doctrine of frustration is not always entirely satisfactory. In a case like Taylor v Caldwell it may be reasonable that neither party should be liable for loss of the benefit that the other expected to derive from performance, so that the one should not recover his loss of anticipated profits, nor the other the payments promised to him. But it does not follow that loss suffered by one party as a result of acting in reliance on the contract should equally lie where it falls. In Taylor v Caldwell the hirers' claim was not one for loss of profits, but only one for expenses thrown away in advertising and preparing for the concerts.<sup>30</sup> No doubt the defendants also incurred expenses on the side-shows and other facilities for entertainment, which the contract obliged them to provide.<sup>31</sup> It might be more satisfactory if such losses could be apportioned. At common law this was possible only where the contract expressly so provided: for example, in one of the coronation cases the contract provided that, if the procession was cancelled, the ticket-holder was to get his money back, less a percentage to cover the other party's expenses.<sup>32</sup> A more general, but still limited, power of adjustment now exists by statute, but it does not cover all cases in which some form of apportionment would seem to be desirable.<sup>33</sup>

SECTION 2. APPLICATIONS

1. Impossibility

Supervening impossibility of performance is the most obvious ground of frustration. The various ways in which it can arise are discussed below; but it must be emphasised at the outset that such impossibility is by no means invariably a ground of discharge. We shall see that even the destruction of the subject-matter of a contract does not necessarily discharge it<sup>34</sup>; and where liability for breach of contract is strict,<sup>35</sup> a party may be liable for failing to do the impossible. For example, a seller who has undertaken to ship goods to his buyer may be liable for failing to do so, even though the failure was due to lack

<sup>28</sup> For contracts containing such provisions, see Clark v Lindsay (1903) 19 T.L.R. 202 and Victoria Seats Agency v Paget (1902) 19 T.L.R. 16 (first contract).

<sup>29</sup> Achille Laura v Total Societa Italiana per Azioni [1969] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 65; DI Henry Ltd v Wilhelm G Clasen [1973] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 159.

<sup>30</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. at 827.

<sup>31</sup> But these expenses do not seem to have been wholly wasted: it appears from The Times, June 12, 1861, that the defendants continued, after the fire, to charge for admission to the Gardens. It also appears from The Times, June 13 and December 19, 1861 that the defendants were lessees of the Hall and that it was insured, so that they were to some extent protected against loss.

<sup>32</sup> Victoria Seats Agency v Paget, above, n.28 (second contract); cf. Elliott v Crutchley [1904] 1 K.B. 565, affirmed [1906] A.C. 7 (where a contract for the supply of refreshments on a steamer on the day of the naval review provided that the defendants were not to be liable if the review were cancelled "before any expense is incurred by the contractor" i.e. the claimant). The rule that advance payments could not be recovered back (below, p.911) no doubt produced a sort of rough apportionment, but in a way that was quite unrelated to any expenses actually incurred.

<sup>33</sup> See below, pp.911-916.

<sup>34</sup> See the discussion of frustration and risk at p.871, below.

<sup>35</sup> See above, pp.838-840.

of shipping space caused by events entirely beyond his control.<sup>36</sup> By contrast, a shipowner may be excused from liability under a charterparty if, after the time of contracting, his ship is disabled by an explosion which is not proved to be due to his fault.<sup>37</sup> The distinction between the two situations is not easy to put into words. In neither of them is the party claiming excuse at fault, so that lack of fault is not sufficient (though it is necessary<sup>38</sup>) to discharge the contract. It could be said that lack of shipping space was a risk undertaken by the seller in our first example, while in the second the explosion was not within the contractual risk taken by the shipowner; but this seems to amount to a restatement of the distinction rather than to an explanation for it. Another way of expressing the distinction is that in the first case the seller undertook that shipping space would be available, while in the second the parties merely assumed that the particular ship would remain available; and that it is impossibility resulting from the failure of such a common assumption that leads to discharge.

(1) Destruction of a particular thing

(a) ILLUSTRATIONS. The clearest illustration of frustration by the destruction of a particular thing is Taylor v Caldwell<sup>39</sup> itself, where it was the subject-matter of the contract which was destroyed. An agreement for the sale of specific goods is similarly avoided if, without the fault of either party, the goods perish before the risk has passed to the buyer.<sup>40</sup> For the present purpose, destruction need not amount to total annihilation. In Asfar & Co v Blundell<sup>41</sup> a cargo of dates was sunk and so affected by water and sewage as to become “for business purposes something else”,<sup>42</sup> though it was still sold for £2,400. The cargo-owner’s liability to pay freight was discharged as the merchantable character of the cargo had been destroyed.

Taylor v Caldwell shows that a contract may be frustrated by the destruction of only part of the subject-matter. The contract related to “the Surrey Gardens and Music Hall” and was discharged though only the Hall was destroyed, while the gardens remained in use as a place of entertainment.<sup>43</sup> The contract was frustrated because its main purpose (the giving of the concerts) had been defeated.<sup>44</sup> Partial destruction which does not defeat the main purpose of the contract will not frustrate it, though it may provide one party with an excuse for not performing in full<sup>45</sup> or give the other party the option to rescind.<sup>46</sup>

A contract may be frustrated where what is destroyed is not its subject-matter but something essential for its performance. For example, a contract to install machinery in a particular factory can be frustrated by the destruction of the factory,<sup>47</sup> even though its subject-matter is the machinery. The question whether something is essential for performance depends on the terms of the contract. Thus where an agency agreement

<sup>36</sup> Lewis Emanuel & Sons Ltd v Sammut [1959] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 629.

<sup>37</sup> Joseph Constantine SS Line v Imperial Smelting Corp Ltd [1942] A.C. 154; below, p.908.

<sup>38</sup> See below, p.904.

<sup>39</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826; above, p.866.

<sup>40</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.7; for risk, see p.871, below.

<sup>41</sup> [1896] 1 Q.B. 123.

<sup>42</sup> At p.128; cf. The Badagry [1985] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 395 at 399. Contrast Horn v Minister of Food [1948] 2 All E.R. 1036.

<sup>43</sup> See above n.31.

<sup>44</sup> cf. below, pp.873, 875, 879–880, 887, 890, 894–895.

<sup>45</sup> See above, p.835.

<sup>46</sup> See below, p.875.

<sup>47</sup> Appleby v Myers (1867) 1 L.R. 2 C.P. 651.

related to goods to be “manufactured or sold” by the owner of a factory it was held that destruction of the factory did not frustrate the agreement.<sup>48</sup>

(b) FRUSTRATION AND RISK. Even the destruction of the subject-matter of the contract will not necessarily frustrate it. In certain types of contracts, it will instead be governed by rules which determine when the “risk of loss” passes from one party to the other. Where these rules apply, the contract will not be frustrated by the destruction of the subject-matter, though it may be frustrated by other events (such as delay or illegality<sup>49</sup>). The effects of the risk rules are radically different from those of frustration. The difference can be summed up by saying that where the destruction leads to frustration it discharges all the contractual obligations of both parties, while where it is governed by the rules as to risk it discharges only some of the obligations of one party. At this stage,<sup>50</sup> two types of contracts will serve to illustrate the distinction.

(i) Sale of goods. Under a contract for the sale of goods, the general rule is that (unless otherwise agreed) risk passes with property.<sup>51</sup> Property may pass before delivery,<sup>52</sup> so that it is possible for the risk in goods to have passed to the buyer while they are still in the hands of the seller.<sup>53</sup> If the goods are destroyed after the risk has passed, the contract is not frustrated: on the contrary, the statement that the risk has passed means that the buyer must still pay the price, while the seller is discharged from his duty to deliver. But the seller is not necessarily discharged from all his obligations: he may, for example, have expressly or impliedly undertaken to transfer the benefit of insurance on the goods to the buyer, and this obligation would survive their destruction.<sup>54</sup> If goods are destroyed before the risk has passed, the contract is frustrated if the goods are specific,<sup>55</sup> or if they are to be taken from a particular source and all the goods from that source are destroyed.<sup>56</sup> If, on the other hand, the sale is of unascertained goods by description, the contract is not frustrated merely because the particular goods which the seller intended to supply under the contract were destroyed before the risk had passed. On the contrary, to say that the risk has not passed in this situation means that the seller is bound to deliver other goods of the contract description; and if he does so the buyer must accept and pay.

(ii) Building contracts. Under a building contract, the risk of the work is (unless otherwise agreed) on the builder until the agreed work is completed. Thus a contract to build a house or a factory would not be frustrated by destruction of the buildings before completion. On the other hand, where a builder agrees to do work on an existing building, e.g. to install new machinery in a factory, a distinction must be drawn.<sup>57</sup> If, before the work is finished, the factory is destroyed, the contract is frustrated<sup>58</sup>; but if only the machinery is destroyed there is no frustration and the builder will remain bound to complete the installation without extra charge.<sup>59</sup>

<sup>48</sup> Turner v Goldsmith [1891] 1 Q.B. 544.

<sup>49</sup> See below, pp.872–873, 887–888, 895–896.

<sup>50</sup> For the passing of risk and related problems in contracts for the sale of land, see below, pp.895–897.

<sup>51</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.20(1).

<sup>52</sup> e.g. under Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.18, r.1.

<sup>53</sup> Where the buyer “deals as consumer”, risk does not pass until the goods are delivered to the consumer: Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.20(4), as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045), reg.4; for the definition of “deals as consumer”, see s.61(5A) of the 1979 Act.

<sup>54</sup> e.g. Manbré Saccharine Co Ltd v Corn Products Co Ltd [1919] 1 K.B. 198.

<sup>55</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.7, above, p.870.

<sup>56</sup> See below, pp.875–876.

<sup>57</sup> Hudson, Building Contracts (11th ed.), §4.248; cf. in the United States, Butterfield v Byron 27 N.E. 667 (1891).

<sup>58</sup> Appleby v Myers (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 651.

<sup>59</sup> ibid. at 660.

(2) Death or incapacity

Certain "personal" contracts, such as contracts of employment, apprenticeship or agency, are discharged by the death of either party.<sup>60</sup> Even a commercial contract may involve reliance by one party on the personal skill of the other<sup>61</sup>; in which case the death of that party (though not that of the other) can discharge the contract. The same rules apply where a party is permanently incapacitated from performing such a contract. Thus a contract to write a book would be frustrated by the supervening insanity of the author<sup>62</sup>; and a contract to render services would be frustrated if continued performance involved a serious risk to the health of the person who had agreed to render them.<sup>63</sup> A contract may likewise be frustrated where it is the capacity of a party to receive performance that is affected by the supervening event: e.g. where a person who had booked a course of dancing lessons was so seriously injured that he could no longer dance<sup>64</sup>; but in contracts governed by the Regulations which apply to package travel it is an implied term that a consumer who is "prevented from proceeding with the package"<sup>65</sup> can transfer the booking to a suitably qualified person, so that the contract is not discharged by the supervening event. A contract may also be frustrated by the death or incapacity of a third party: for example, a contract between A and B to paint a portrait of C could be frustrated if C died before work on the portrait had begun.

(3) Unavailability

(a) IN GENERAL. A contract may be frustrated if its subject-matter, or a thing or person essential for the purpose of its performance, though not ceasing to exist or suffering permanent incapacity, becomes unavailable for that purpose. Thus charter-parties have been frustrated where the ship was seized, detained<sup>66</sup> or requisitioned,<sup>67</sup> and where cargo was unavailable because of a strike at the port of loading<sup>68</sup>; a contract for the sale of goods has been frustrated where the goods were requisitioned<sup>69</sup>; a contract to operate and share in the profits of an oilfield has been frustrated where the interests of both parties were expropriated by the government of the country in which the oilfield was situated<sup>70</sup>; and contracts for personal services have been frustrated where one of the parties fell ill<sup>71</sup> or was interned or conscripted.<sup>72</sup>

(b) TEMPORARY UNAVAILABILITY. A person or thing essential for performance may, as a result of the supervening event, be unavailable at the time fixed for performance, but become available later. Such temporary unavailability will most obviously frustrate the contract where it is clear from the terms or nature of the contract that it was to be performed only at, or within, the specified time, and that the time of performance was of the essence<sup>73</sup> of the contract. Thus a contract to play in a concert on a particular day

<sup>60</sup> cf. Cutter v Powell (1795) 6 T.R. 320; Whincup v Hughes (1871) L.R. 6 C.P. 78; above, pp.750, 782.

<sup>61</sup> cf. above, p.694.

<sup>62</sup> Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd (1874) L.R. 10 C.P. 125 at 145.

<sup>63</sup> Condor v The Barron Knights Ltd [1966] 1 W.L.R. 87.

<sup>64</sup> Parker v Arthur Murray Inc 295 N.E. 2d 487 (1973).

<sup>65</sup> Package Travel, Package Holidays and Package Tours Regulations 1992 (SI 1992/3288), reg.10(1).

<sup>66</sup> e.g. in the Gulf War cases (above, p.868, below, p.891), and in The Adelfa [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 466.

<sup>67</sup> e.g. Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] A.C. 435.

<sup>68</sup> The Nema [1982] A.C. 724.

<sup>69</sup> e.g. Re Shipton, Anderson & Co [1915] 3 K.B. 676.

<sup>70</sup> BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt [1983] 2 A.C. 352; below, p.913.

<sup>71</sup> e.g. Hurt v AR Marshall & Sons (Bulwell) Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1067.

<sup>72</sup> e.g. Morgan v Manser [1948] 1 K.B. 184.

<sup>73</sup> See above, p.826.

is frustrated by the performer's illness on that day.<sup>74</sup> Temporary unavailability may also frustrate a contract even though no fixed date is expressly specified for performance and even though a time is fixed but is not of the essence. In such cases, the contract may be frustrated, not by the mere fact, but by the length, of the delay in performance.

This possibility is illustrated by Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co,<sup>75</sup> where a charterparty was made in November 1871 for the carriage of rails from Newport to San Francisco; it provided that the ship was to proceed to Newport with all possible despatch. On her way there she went aground in January 1872 and was not repaired until the following August. The contract was held to have been frustrated by the length of the delay, in consequence of which the voyage which the ship was capable of making was substantially different from that envisaged in the contract. It was as if a ship chartered "to go from Newport to St. Michael's . . . in time for the fruit season"<sup>76</sup> did not become available till after the season was over. Contracts in cases of this kind are frustrated because performance at the end of the delay is no longer of any use to the party to whom it was to be rendered, i.e. to the charterer.

In another group of cases, the contract is frustrated for the different reason that, after the delay, the performance to be rendered by one party would be significantly more onerous for that party. This possibility is illustrated by Acetylene Co of GB v Canada Carbide Co,<sup>77</sup> where shipment of goods under a contract of sale was delayed for three years by war-time requisitioning of all the available shipping space. When performance again became physically possible, it was held that the seller was no longer bound to deliver, as market conditions had radically changed. Similarly, in Metropolitan Water Board v Dick, Kerr & Co<sup>78</sup> war-time restrictions imposed an indefinite delay on the performance of a contract to build a reservoir. It was held that the contract was frustrated since it was likely that there would be a total change in conditions by the time that the restrictions might be lifted.

Even where delay does not increase the costs of the party whose performance is affected by it, that party may be prejudiced for the different reason that rates of pay for the service which he was to render have increased substantially between the time of contracting and the end of the delay. This was the position in an American case<sup>79</sup> in which an actor had contracted to make a number of films. Performance was then delayed for a number of years while he served in the armed forces during the Second World War; and contract was held to have been discharged. One reason for this result was that, by the end of the delay, rates of pay for such work had radically changed, so that the actor would have been prejudiced by having to perform at the originally agreed rates. Similar reasoning appears to explain Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co,<sup>80</sup> where a ship was chartered for 12 months; it was contemplated, though not expressly provided, that the period would run from April 1915 to April 1916. She was requisitioned before delivery and the owners did not procure her release till September 1915. In an action by the charterer for damages for non-delivery, the House of Lords held the charterparty frustrated. The contract was, in substance if not in form, an April to April charter; and to hold the parties to a September to September charter would be to hold them to a contract which was "as a matter of business a totally different thing".<sup>81</sup> The reason for

<sup>74</sup> Robinson v Davison (1871) 1 L.R. 6 Ex. 269.

<sup>75</sup> (1874) 1 L.R. 10 C.P. 125.

<sup>76</sup> ibid. at 143.

<sup>77</sup> (1922) 8 L.L.Rep. 456.

<sup>78</sup> [1918] A.C. 119.

<sup>79</sup> Autry v Republic Productions 180 P. 2d 888 (1947).

<sup>80</sup> [1919] A.C. 435; cf. Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue SS Co Ltd [1926] A.C. 497.

<sup>81</sup> At p.460.

this view cannot have been that the delay prejudiced the charterers (for they were claiming performance). It seems rather to have been that the shipowners would have been prejudiced by the delay (if the contract had not been discharged) because freight rates had risen<sup>82</sup> so that by September they could have charged considerably more for their services than the amount payable under the original contract.<sup>83</sup>

In the cases so far considered, it was claimed that performance should be rendered in full when the temporary unavailability ceased. In other cases, involving long-term contracts, the claim was that the balance of the contract should then be performed. Obviously such a claim cannot succeed if the delay lasts, or is likely to last, for so long that no part of the agreed performance remains possible. Thus in Countess of Warwick SS Co v Le Nickel S.A.<sup>84</sup> the war-time requisition of a ship was held to frustrate a one year charter which, at the time of the requisition, still had six months to run, because it was unlikely that the ship would be released in time to render any substantial services under the charter. For the same reason, charterparties were frustrated in a number of cases in which ships became unavailable for service as a result of being trapped for long periods in the course of the Gulf War between Iran and Iraq.<sup>85</sup>

If, on the other hand, performance for some balance of the contract period remains, or is likely to remain, possible, the outcome of claims for that balance depends on the proportion of the interruption, or likely interruption, to the contract period: the greater that proportion is, the more likely it is that the contract will be frustrated. Thus in The Nema<sup>86</sup> a charterparty for six or seven voyages to be made from April to December was frustrated when, after the first voyage, a long strike at the loading port made it impossible to accomplish more than a further two voyages within the contract period. By contrast, in Tamplin SS Co Ltd v Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Co<sup>87</sup> the war-time requisition of a ship in February 1915 did not frustrate a five year charter which was not due to expire till December 1917: the majority of the House of Lords took the view that "there may be many months during which the ship will be available before the five years have expired".<sup>88</sup> The effect of such requisition must theoretically be determined at or near the time when it takes place.<sup>89</sup> In practice, the courts no doubt take later events into account, but the Tamplin case was decided before the end of the chartered period. Thus the House of Lords had to speculate as to the probable length of the requisition and indirectly as to the probable duration of the war. In the light of later events, the majority may have speculated wrongly. But this is no criticism of the decision, which has also been supported on another ground to be discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>90</sup>

Events such as illness, conscription or internment may interfere temporarily with the performance of long-term contracts involving personal service. Here again one test of frustration is the proportion which the interruption, or likely interruption, bears to the period specified in the contract. Thus in Morgan v Manser<sup>91</sup> a music hall artiste

<sup>82</sup> cf. Modern Transport Co Ltd v Dimeric SS Co [1917] 1 K.B. 370 at 376.

<sup>83</sup> This appears from the fact that £31,000 would have been awarded to the charterers by way of damages if the contract had not been discharged: see [1919] A.C. 435 at 441.

<sup>84</sup> [1918] 1 K.B. 372.

<sup>85</sup> The Evia (No.2) [1983] A.C. 736; The Agathon [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 211; The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 400; The Chrysalis [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 503.

<sup>86</sup> [1982] A.C. 724.

<sup>87</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397; cf. Port Line v Ben Line Steamers Ltd [1958] 2 Q.B. 146.

<sup>88</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 405.

<sup>89</sup> See below, p.891.

<sup>90</sup> See below, p.910.

<sup>91</sup> [1948] 1 K.B. 184 (where it is not clear what prejudice the artiste would have suffered by being held to the balance of the contract); cf. Unger v Preston Corporation [1942] 1 All E.R. 200 (a case very near the line).

employed a manager for ten years from 1938. He was conscripted in 1940 and demobilised in 1946. The contract was held to be frustrated since in 1940 it was likely that the artiste would remain in the Army for a very long time. On the other hand, in Nordman v Rayner & Sturgess<sup>92</sup> a long-term commission agency was not frustrated when the agent (an Alsatian with anti-German sympathies) was interned, since his internment was not likely to last long and in fact only lasted one month.

A contract of employment may be frustrated by the illness of the employee. This is true, not only where the contract is a long-term one, but also where it provides for determination by relatively short periods of notice, since even such a contract is often intended to give rise to an enduring relationship.<sup>93</sup> But temporary illness will not of itself frustrate a contract of employment<sup>94</sup>: it will have this effect only where it is so serious as to put an end to the possibility of performance "in a business sense",<sup>95</sup> e.g. by making resumption within a reasonable time a practical impossibility.<sup>96</sup> An illness which is not serious enough to frustrate the contract does, however, have a number of other legal effects. It gives the employee a temporary excuse for non-performance, and it may also give the employer an option to rescind.<sup>97</sup> Unless and until this option is exercised, the employee is prima facie entitled to wages during sickness.<sup>98</sup> This prima facie rule can be displaced by an express contrary provision, or by circumstances from which a contrary provision can be implied. To establish such an implied term, it is not necessary to show that the employee would, at the time of contracting, have agreed that he should not be paid during sickness.<sup>99</sup> The rule can be displaced by other circumstances: for example by the practice of the employers not to make such payments and the failure of the employee to claim them.<sup>1</sup>

(4) Failure of a particular source

A contract may be discharged where the subject-matter was to be obtained from a particular source which without the fault of either party becomes unavailable: e.g. where goods were to be taken from a particular crop which fails as a result of drought or disease; or where they are to be imported from a particular country and such import is prevented by war, natural disasters or prohibition of export. Such cases raise two questions: whether the failure frustrates the contract; and what is the position where the source only fails in part.

(a) WHETHER CONTRACT FRUSTRATED. The cases which raise this question can be divided into three groups.

(i) Express reference to source. Where the contract expressly provides that the goods are to be taken from the specified source, the contract is frustrated if that source fails. Thus

<sup>92</sup> (1916) 33 T.L.R. 87.

<sup>93</sup> Notcutt v Universal Equipment Co (London) Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 641; Howarth [1987] C.I.J. 47.

<sup>94</sup> Marshall v Harland & Wolff Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 899; Williams v Watson's Luxury Coaches [1990] 1 C.R. 536; cf. Mount v Oldham Corp [1973] Q.B. 309.

<sup>95</sup> Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd (1874) 1 L.R. 10 C.P. 124 at 145.

<sup>96</sup> e.g. Hart v A. R. Marshall & Sons (Bulwell) Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1067; Notcutt v Universal Equipment Co (London) Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 641.

<sup>97</sup> See above, pp.775–776, 835.

<sup>98</sup> Marrison v Bell [1939] 2 K.B. 187; Mears v Safecar Securities Ltd [1983] Q.B. 54 at 79. cf. Employment Rights Act 1996, s.64.

<sup>99</sup> Mears v Safecar Securities Ltd [1983] Q.B. 54 at 74, disapproving Orman v Saville Sportswear Ltd [1960] 1 W.L.R. 1065, and following O'Grady v Saper [1940] 2 K.B. 469.

<sup>1</sup> Mears v Safecar Securities Ltd, above.

in Homell v Coupland<sup>2</sup> a farmer sold 200 tons of potatoes to be grown on land specified in the contract. That crop largely<sup>3</sup> failed, and it was held that the contract was frustrated so that the farmer was not liable in damages for non-delivery. For this purpose it is assumed that the contract specifies an exclusive source of supply. Where it refers to several sources, the contract is not frustrated merely because one of them becomes unavailable.<sup>4</sup>

(ii) Source intended by one party only. Where the contract contains no reference to the source and only one of the parties intends to use that source, the failure of that source does not lead to frustration. Thus a contract for the sale of "Finland birch timber" was not frustrated merely because the seller expected to get supplies from Finland and could not do so because of the severing of trade routes after the outbreak of war in 1914. For all the buyer knew, delivery might have been made from stocks kept in England.<sup>5</sup> Nor is a contract frustrated merely because the seller is let down by his supplier. This is so even where that supplier is the sole producer of goods of the contract description, so long, at least, as the buyer was unaware of this fact.<sup>6</sup> The same rule applies where a buyer's source of payment fails. Thus a contract is not frustrated merely because the buyer intends (unknown to the seller) to pay with money to be remitted from a foreign country and the remittance is prevented or delayed by changes in that country's exchange control regulations.<sup>7</sup> A fortiori, a contract is not frustrated merely because of the buyer's supply of the currency in which payment was to be made has become exhausted.<sup>8</sup>

(iii) Source intended by both parties. The most difficult cases are those in which the contract makes no express reference to the source but both parties contemplate that it will be used. Such contracts are sometimes construed as containing an implied reference to the source<sup>9</sup>; but for this purpose it is not enough to show that the parties contemplated the source: they must have intended that that source (and no other), should be used.<sup>10</sup> There is little English authority on the question whether (in the absence of any evidence of such intention) the failure of a source which was merely contemplated by both parties will frustrate a contract. In one case, it was conceded that the partial failure of such a source released the seller in part.<sup>11</sup> The view that the total failure of a mutually contemplated source will frustrate the contract is sometimes said to be supported by Re Badische Co.,<sup>12</sup> where a contract for the supply of chemicals was held to be frustrated by illegality on the outbreak of war in 1914 because both parties intended the goods to be obtained from Germany. But this was a special case: it would clearly be contrary to public policy to allow such a contract to subsist; and this would be so whether the parties had specified the source or merely contemplated that it should be used. The problems raised where the supervening event makes the contract illegal differ significantly from

<sup>2</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 258.

<sup>3</sup> Not entirely: for a discussion of this aspect of the case, see below, p.877.

<sup>4</sup> e.g. Turner v Goldsmith [1891] 1 Q.B. 544; cf. The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1; and see below, p.892.

<sup>5</sup> Blackburn Bobbin Co Ltd v TW Allen Ltd [1918] 2 K.B. 467.

<sup>6</sup> Intertradox S.A v Lesieur Torteaux SARL [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509.

<sup>7</sup> Universal Corp v Five Ways Properties Ltd [1979] 1 All E.R. 552; cf. above, p.838. For an analogous situation, see Hole & Pugsley v Sumption [2001] N.L.J. 1851.

<sup>8</sup> Congimex SARI (Lisbon) v Continental Grain Export Corp (New York) [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 346 at 353; cf. Janus Paczy v Haendler & Nattermann GmbH [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 302.

<sup>9</sup> e.g. Ockerby & Co Ltd v Murdock (1916) 19 W.A.R. 1, affirmed (1916) 22 C.L.R. 420.

<sup>10</sup> See above, at n.4.

<sup>11</sup> Lipton Ltd v Ford [1917] 2 K.B. 647.

<sup>12</sup> [1921] 2 Ch. 331.

those which arise where it makes performance impossible<sup>13</sup>; and there is no clear English decision on the effect of failure of a mutually contemplated (but unspecified) source of supply. Where that source was contemplated by one party only, the courts have sometimes emphasised this fact in rejecting the defence of frustration<sup>14</sup>; and this may give some support to the view that the defence would succeed where the source was contemplated by both. On the other hand, in some such cases the commercial background may now be that it would be usual for the seller to protect himself against the contingency: e.g. by a prohibition of export clause. Where this is the position it is less likely that failure of even a mutually contemplated source would frustrate the contract.

(b) PARTIAL FAILURE. A contract for the sale of goods may specify the source from which the goods are to be taken, so that the total failure of that source would undoubtedly lead to frustration. Further problems can then arise if the source fails only in part.

(i) Effects in general. Such partial failure normally has three consequences. First, the seller is excused to the extent of the deficiency. This was the outcome in Homell v Coupland,<sup>15</sup> where the seller had delivered the small quantity actually produced,<sup>16</sup> and was held not to be liable for the rest of the quantity sold. Secondly, the seller is bound to deliver the quantity actually produced<sup>17</sup>; unless, perhaps, it is so small that it is uneconomical to harvest it.<sup>18</sup> Thirdly, the buyer is not generally bound to accept the quantity produced if it is less than that contracted for<sup>19</sup>; but as partial crop failures normally lead to a rise in prices this point is of little practical importance.

(ii) More than one contract. Additional complications arise where a seller has made a number of contracts to deliver goods from a specified source, and that source fails in part. For example, a farmer who reasonably expects his land to yield 1,000 tons agrees to sell 200 tons to each of five customers, and as a result of partial crop failure only 600 tons are produced; or a seller of goods to be taken from a foreign source similarly agrees to sell 200 tons to each of five customers, and, as a result of export restrictions, cannot obtain more than 600 tons. If total failure of the source would have frustrated the contracts,<sup>20</sup> what difference does it make that the failure was only partial?

One possible view is that it makes no difference, so that all the contracts are frustrated because the seller cannot perform them all in full. But this is unlikely to be accepted because it would enable the seller to keep the available goods and so to make a windfall profit from the rising prices likely to result from the shortage.<sup>21</sup> A second possibility is to say that none of the contracts is frustrated: if the seller delivered 200 tons to each of three buyers, his inability to deliver to the other two would be due to his voluntary act

<sup>13</sup> See below, p.887.

<sup>14</sup> Blackburn Bobbin Co Ltd v TW Allen Ltd [1918] 2 K.B. 467.

<sup>15</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 256; above, p.876.

<sup>16</sup> 79½ tons; some of this was produced on land other than that specified in the contract and to this extent the seller did more than he was obliged to do.

<sup>17</sup> HR and S Sainsbury Ltd v Street [1972] 1 W.L.R. 834; above, p.835.

<sup>18</sup> The contrary seems to have been held in International Paper Co v Rockefeller, 146 N.Y.S. 371 (1914); sed quare: such a case could be regarded as being, in substance, one of total failure of the source.

<sup>19</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.30(1). For qualifications of the buyer's right to reject, see above, pp.783–784.

<sup>20</sup> See Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Continental Grain Co [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 269, where this requirement was not satisfied.

<sup>21</sup> The view that all the contracts are frustrated may at first sight seem to be supported by Tennants (Lancashire) Ltd v CS Wilson & Co Ltd [1917] A.C. 495; but the only point actually decided was that no single buyer was entitled to delivery in full; and the seller was a middleman who would himself have had to pay the higher prices and so could not have profited from frustration.

or “election” and would therefore be incapable of frustrating his contracts with these two.<sup>22</sup> This view derives some support from an analogous case<sup>23</sup>; but it will be submitted later in this Chapter that there is no true “election” where, after the supervening event, the seller’s only choice is whether to perform one contract rather than another.<sup>24</sup> The argument that discharge is due to the seller’s “election” could also be met by imposing legal restrictions on his choice. This possibility leads to the third view, that some of the contracts are discharged. If this view were interpreted to mean that the seller must deliver to such buyers as were designated by law (e.g. by reference to the order in which their contracts were made or to the standard of reasonableness) it would not be open to the objection that the seller’s failure to deliver to the other buyers resulted from his “election”. A fourth view adopts the principle of pro rata division, so that in our examples the contracts would not be frustrated, but each buyer would receive 120 tons.<sup>25</sup> The difficulty with this view is that, under it, the contracts would be modified, rather than discharged<sup>26</sup>; and at common law the doctrine of frustration appears to be capable only of leading to a total discharge of the contract.<sup>27</sup> The principle of pro rata division does, however, have considerable support in cases in which the seller has relied on the partial failure of the source as discharging him, not under the common law doctrine of frustration, but under an express provision of the contract, such as a force majeure or prohibition of export clause. In such cases, there is support for two versions of the pro rata principle. One states negatively that no buyer is entitled to delivery in full<sup>28</sup>; the other states affirmatively that each buyer is entitled to his pro rata share, so that he would be entitled to damages if he received no delivery at all.<sup>29</sup> But there is also support for the view that, if the seller allocates all his supplies to earlier buyers, he is not liable if he delivers nothing to later ones.<sup>30</sup> Probably, the overriding test is whether the seller acted reasonably in allocating the available supplies. In applying this test, the court can have regard to circumstances other than the order in which the contracts were made, e.g. to the fact that the available quantity was “too small to be sensibly apportioned among relevant purchasers”.<sup>31</sup> Pro rata division is, of course, possible only where the subject-matter is physically divisible. Suppose that a farmer sold to each of five buyers “a calf to be born to my herd”, expecting that at least five calves would be so born, and that (for reasons beyond his control) only three calves were born. In such a case, pro rata division

<sup>22</sup> See below, pp.906–907.

<sup>23</sup> The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1, below, p.907.

<sup>24</sup> See below, pp.907–908.

<sup>25</sup> cf. in the United States UCC s.2-615(b). The rule there stated, that the seller can take into account “regular customers not . . . under contract,” does not seem to represent English law: see Pancommerce S.A v Veccheema BV [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 304. Much less are the English courts likely to accept the further rule stated in s.2-615(b) that the seller can take into account “his own requirements for further manufacture”: this seems inconsistent with Maritime National Fish Ltd v Ocean Trawlers Ltd [1935] A.C. 524, below, p.906; see generally Hudson, 31 M.I.L.R. 535.

<sup>26</sup> The Super Servant Two [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 148 at 158, affirmed [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1.

<sup>27</sup> See above, p.869; below, p.909.

<sup>28</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem P v BA [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 109 at 115, 128, 131 (where the exact method of division is left open); cf. Tennants (Lancashire) Ltd v CS Wilson & Co Ltd [1917] A.C. 495 at 511–512.

<sup>29</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v C Mackprang Jr [1979] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 221 at 224; the point is left open in Continental Grain Export Corp v STM Grain Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 460 at 472.

<sup>30</sup> Intertrader S.A v Lesieur Torteaux SARL [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 509; cf. Continental Grain Export Corp v STM Grain Ltd, above, at p.473; The Marine Star [1993] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 329 at 332–333; and (in another context) Cox v Banks [1995] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 434.

<sup>31</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Continental Grain Co [1983] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 269 at 293, citing Westfälische Genossenschaft GmbH v Seabright Ltd, unreported, per Robert Goff J.

would not work,<sup>32</sup> and it is submitted that, if the farmer delivered to the earliest three buyers, his contracts with the later two should be frustrated.<sup>33</sup>

(5) Method of performance impossible

(a) IN GENERAL. A contract may be discharged if it provides for a method of performance which becomes impossible. In Nicholl & Knight v Ashton Edridge & Co<sup>34</sup> a contract was made for the sale of cottonseed “to be shipped per steamship Orlando from Alexandria during . . . January”. The Orlando later went aground in the Baltic so that she could not get to Alexandria in January. It was held that the contract was frustrated since, in the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal, it was to be construed as providing for performance only in the stipulated manner. If the stipulated method had not been regarded as exclusive, the seller might have been obliged to perform in a different way, e.g. by shipping the goods on a different ship or at a later time.<sup>35</sup> Whether he would actually have been obliged to do this would then have depended on whether the substituted method of performance differed fundamentally from that originally undertaken. This appears from the Suez cases to be discussed below.

(b) THE SUEZ CASES. These cases arose because an agreed or contemplated method of performance became impossible when the Suez Canal was closed as a result of hostilities in the Middle East in 1956 and again in 1967. The first question was whether the parties had actually stipulated for the particular method of performance, or had only expected that it would probably be used. In Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noble Thorl GmbH<sup>36</sup> a contract was made for the sale of Sudanese groundnuts at an inclusive price to cover the cost of the goods, insurance and carriage to Hamburg. When the contract was made both parties expected that shipment would be via Suez, but the contract did not so provide. It was held that the contract was not frustrated by the closure of the Suez Canal, so that the seller ought to have shipped the goods via the Cape of Good Hope. Although this would have taken two and a half times as long as shipment via Suez and would have doubled the cost of carriage, the difference between the two methods of performance was not sufficiently fundamental to frustrate the contract.<sup>37</sup> If the difference had been of this kind, it seems that the contract could have been frustrated even though the method of performance was not specified in the contract but only contemplated by both parties.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>32</sup> See I Kings 3: 25.

<sup>33</sup> The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 is distinguishable on the ground that the defendant claimed discharge in respect of the earlier contract: see below, p.908.

<sup>34</sup> [1901] 2 K.B. 126; cf. Maine Spinning Co v Sutcliffe & Co (1918) 87 L.J.K.B. 382, discussed in Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §20-015.

<sup>35</sup> cf. in the United States, Meyer v Sullivan, 181 P. 847 (1919); U.C.C. s.2-614(1). This rule prevents the seller from making a profit out of frustration on a rising market: cf. below, pp.909-910.

<sup>36</sup> [1962] A.C. 93.

<sup>37</sup> See further below p.909, at n.28.

<sup>38</sup> cf., in another context, Florida Power & Light Company v Westinghouse Electric Corporation 826 F.2d 239 (1987), where the contemplated method of performing an obligation to remove irradiated fuel from a nuclear power station was by reprocessing and when this became impossible the obligation could be performed only by storing the fuel. The difference between these modes was held to be sufficiently fundamental to discharge the obligation since reprocessing would have yielded a profit to the contractor of some $18 million while storing the fuel would have imposed costs on him in the region of $80 million. And see Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 C.L.R. 337.

Where, on the other hand, there is no such fundamental difference, the contract may stand even if it does provide for performance by the method which becomes impossible. Thus it was suggested in the Tsakiroglou case<sup>39</sup> that the contract there would not have been frustrated even if it had provided for shipment via Suez. The same view is supported by a number of cases in which shipowners argued that voyage charters were frustrated because of the extra length and expense of the voyage via the Cape of Good Hope. In some of these cases the contracts expressly referred to Suez<sup>40</sup>; and even where there was no such reference it was no doubt an implied term that the ship should go via the Suez Canal as that was the usual and customary route when the contract was made.<sup>41</sup> Nevertheless the contracts were not frustrated,<sup>42</sup> so that the shipowners were bound to carry the goods at no extra charge by the longer, available, route. The difference between the two routes was not sufficiently fundamental, even though in one case<sup>43</sup> the voyage actually accomplished was twice as long as that originally contracted for and in another added nearly a third to the shipowner's anticipated costs.<sup>44</sup> The same principle can, on the other hand, favour the shipowner where the charterparty provides for payment by reference to the time taken to accomplish the voyage. In one such case<sup>45</sup> the charterer pleaded frustration but the plea was rejected: once again the court took the view that the voyage via the Cape was not fundamentally different from that via Suez, though exceeding it in length by about a third. To provide an illustration of frustration resulting from the closure of the Canal it is necessary to put a more extreme case, such as that of a contract to carry perishable goods from Port Sudan to Alexandria.

(6) Statute

A contract under which a person holds a public office can be discharged if the office is abolished by statute.<sup>46</sup>

(7) Impossibility and impracticability

(a) IMPRACTICABILITY DISTINGUISHED FROM IMPOSSIBILITY. The doctrine of frustration originated in cases where performance was said to have become "impossible". That is, in itself, something of a relative term. What is "impossible" depends partly on the current state of technology,<sup>47</sup> and partly on the amount of trouble and expense to which one is prepared to go to achieve it. It has been said that even Taylor v Caldwell was not a case of literal impossibility since "by the expenditure of huge sums of money" the music hall could probably have been rebuilt "in time for the scheduled concerts"<sup>48</sup>; but no reasonable businessman would have been expected to incur such expenditure. For this reason the current trend in the United States is to abandon the very words "impossible"

<sup>39</sup> [1962] A.C. 93 at 112; cf. Congimex Companhia Geral, etc. v Tradax Export S.A [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 687 at 692 (affirmed [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250).

<sup>40</sup> e.g. The Captain George K [1970] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 21; The Washington Trader [1972] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 463; 453 F. 2d. 939.

<sup>41</sup> Scrutton on Charterparties (20th ed.), p.256.

<sup>42</sup> See the authorities cited in n.40, above, and Glidden v Hellenic Lines Ltd, 275 F. 2d. 253 (1960); Transatlantic Finance Corp v U.S.A., 363 F. 2d. 312 (1966).

<sup>43</sup> The Captain George K, above, n.40.

<sup>44</sup> The Washington Trader, above, n.40.

<sup>45</sup> The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226.

<sup>46</sup> Reilly v R. [1934] A.C. 176.

<sup>47</sup> See the illustration of "absolute" impossibility given in Corbin on Contracts (1962), § 1325: "No-one can go to the moon."

<sup>48</sup> Fuller & Eisenberg, Basic Contract Law (3rd ed.), p.801.

and “impossibility” and to use instead the terms “impracticable” and “impracticability”.<sup>49</sup> This change seems, moreover, to be intended to widen the scope of the doctrine of discharge by supervening events.<sup>50</sup> “Impracticability” includes “extreme and unreasonable difficulty, expense, injury or loss”<sup>51</sup> to one of the parties. Examples include “A severe shortage of raw materials or of supplies due to war, embargo, local crop failure, unforeseen shutdown of major sources of supply or the like, which . . . causes a marked increase in cost. . . .”<sup>52</sup> The caveat is entered that “Increased cost alone does not excuse performance . . .”<sup>53</sup>—but it is suggested that a price increase “well beyond the normal range”<sup>54</sup> could lead to discharge. In England, dicta to the effect that a contract may be discharged if its performance becomes “impracticable” are occasionally found in the cases.<sup>55</sup> But the weight of English authority rejects this view. Thus it has been said in the House of Lords that “a wholly abnormal rise or fall in prices”<sup>56</sup> would not affect the bargain; and that “The argument that a man can be excused from performance of his contract when it becomes ‘commercially’ impossible seems to me a dangerous contention which ought not to be admitted unless the parties have plainly contracted to that effect”.<sup>57</sup>

(b) IMPRACTICABILITY GENERALLY NO EXCUSE. A number of cases illustrate the view that “impracticability” is not generally sufficient to frustrate a contract in English law. In Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban DC<sup>58</sup> contractors agreed to build 78 houses for a local authority in eight months for £94,000. Because of labour shortages, the work took 22 months and cost the contractors £115,000. They claimed that the contract had been frustrated and that they were therefore entitled to extra remuneration on a quantum meruit basis.<sup>59</sup> But the House of Lords rejected the claim as the events which caused the delays were within the ordinary range of commercial probability and had not brought about a fundamental change of circumstances. Lord Radcliffe said: “It is not hardship or inconvenience or material loss itself which calls the principle of frustration into play. There must be as well such a change in the significance of the obligation that the thing undertaken would, if performed, be a different thing from that contracted for”.<sup>60</sup> The Suez cases<sup>61</sup> similarly reject the argument that the greater expense caused to the party prejudiced by the closure of the Canal was a ground of frustration. In the words of Lord

<sup>49</sup> U.C.C. s.2-615; Restatement 2d, Contracts, §261.

<sup>50</sup> Neal-Cooper Grain Co v Texas Gulf Sulphur Co, 508 F. 2d. 283, 293 (1974) (“less stringent test of impracticability”); cf. Nora Springs Cooperative Co v Brandau, 247 N.W. 2d. 744 at 748 (1976).

<sup>51</sup> Restatement, Contracts, §454; Restatement 2d, Contracts, §261 Comment d.

<sup>52</sup> ibid.; U.C.C. s.2-615 Comment 4.

<sup>53</sup> U.C.C. s.2-615 Comment 4.

<sup>54</sup> Restatement 2d, Contracts, §261 Comment d.

<sup>55</sup> e.g. Horlock v Beal [1916] A.C. 486 at 492; The Furness Bridge [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 367 at 377; Nile Co for the Export of Agricultural Crops v H & J M Bennett (Commodities) Ltd [1986] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 555 at 581; cf. in another context, Moss v Smith (1859) 9 C.B. 94 at 103 (a dictum said to be of general application in Robert H Dahl v Nelson Donkin (1881) 6 App.Cas. 38 at 52); The Badagry [1985] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 395 at 399. See further Beatson in Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel (Rose, ed.), p.123.

<sup>56</sup> British Movietonews Ltd v London and District Cinemas [1952] A.C. 166 at 185.

<sup>57</sup> Tennants (Lancashire) Ltd v GS Wilson & Co Ltd [1917] A.C. 495 at 510 (where the sellers were excused by the express terms of the contract); cf. Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 570 at 508 (commodity contract not frustrated by closure of market); and see the cases discussed in the next paragraph.

<sup>58</sup> [1956] A.C. 696.

<sup>59</sup> See below, p.1064.

<sup>60</sup> [1956] A.C. 696 at 729; cf. Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden [1979] Ch. 84 at 113; Chaucer Estates v Fairclough Homes [1991] E.G.C.S. 65.

<sup>61</sup> See above, pp.879–880.

Simonds, "an increase of expense is not a ground of frustration".<sup>62</sup> Where performance would, in view of changed circumstances, cause not merely extra expense but acute personal hardship to one party, it has been said that "equitable relief may . . . be refused because of an unforeseen change of circumstances not amounting to legal frustration".<sup>63</sup> But in such cases the contract is not discharged: the defendant remains liable in damages even though specific performance is refused on the ground of severe hardship.<sup>64</sup>

(c) POSSIBLE EXCEPTIONS. Four types of cases to be discussed below may at first sight seem to give some support to the view that a contract can be frustrated by "impracticability". But it will be submitted that these cases are all explicable on other grounds and that they do not support the view that impracticability (in the sense of great financial or commercial hardship to one of the parties) is of itself sufficient to discharge a contract in English law.

First, there are the cases in which discharge is based, not on impracticability alone, but on this factor when it is combined with impossibility or illegality. One group of such cases is that already discussed,<sup>65</sup> in which long delays in performance resulted from war-time restrictions, and it was held that performance need not be resumed in the totally altered conditions which prevailed when those restrictions were removed. It could be said that performance at the later time was "impracticable"; but this was only one factor leading to discharge, the other being that, for a considerable period, the war-time conditions made performance actually impossible. Similar reasoning can apply where a supervening change in the law makes it illegal to perform a contract to render a service unless (for example) additional safety precautions are taken by the party who is to render it. The extra expense to be incurred by that party in taking those precautions may then be regarded as a kind of "impracticability", leading to discharge<sup>66</sup>; but this result will, more significantly, be based on the special considerations of public policy on which discharge is based in cases of supervening illegality<sup>67</sup>: in other words, it does not follow that the contract would be discharged if the same amount of extra expense were occasioned simply by commercial factors, without any element of supervening illegality.

<sup>62</sup> Tsakiroglou & Co v Noble Thorl GmbH [1962] A.C. 93 at 115; cf. Exportelisa S.A v Guiseppe Figli Soc Coll [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 433; Finland Steamship Co Ltd v Felixstowe Dock Ry Co [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 287, where no attempt was made to argue that a contract was frustrated by cost increases described at p.288 as "devastating"; and The Mercedes Envoy where no attempt was made to rely on frustration on the ground that a ship had been so severely damaged that it was "not commercially viable" to repair her: [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 559 at 563. Extreme cost increases might, however, be relevant where all that a party was bound to do was to take reasonable steps to produce a specified result. For example, in Brauer & Co (Great Britain) Ltd v James Clark (Brush Materials) Ltd [1952] 2 All E.R. 497 at 501 it was said that a seller would not be liable for failure to get an export licence if the cost of getting it were 100 times the contract price; the seller's duty in that case would have been limited to one to take reasonable steps (above, p.65) even if the contract had not been expressly "subject to export licence."

<sup>63</sup> Patel v Ali [1984] Ch. 283 at 288.

<sup>64</sup> See below, p.1026. In Patel v Ali, above, the defendant was required to pay £10,000 into court as a condition of the discharge of the order of specific performance against her.

<sup>65</sup> Metropolitan Water Board v Dick Kerr & Co [1918] A.C. 119; Acetylene Co of GB v Canada Carbide Co (1922) 8 L.L.Rep. 456; above, p.873; cf. Florida Power & Light Company v Westinghouse Electric Corporation 826 F.2d 239 (1987): impracticability coupled with impossibility in the contemplated method of performance (above, p.879, n.38).

<sup>66</sup> It seems to have been so regarded in William Cory v L.C.C. [1951] 1 K.B. 8, affirmed [1951] 2 K.B. 476. Similar considerations may in part account for the American decision in Florida Power & Light Co v Westinghouse Elec Corp 826 F.2d 239 (1987).

<sup>67</sup> See below, p.887.

Secondly, there are cases in which contracts were discharged, not under the general doctrine of frustration, but under express contractual provisions (such as force majeure or prohibition of export clauses) which excuse one party, or both, if a specified event prevents performance. Such clauses do not protect a party merely because supervening events make performance more difficult or more expensive for him<sup>68</sup>; nor do they normally protect him where he can perform in alternative ways and only one of them becomes impossible: for example, a seller who cannot obtain the goods that he had undertaken to deliver from the source intended by him (e.g. because of being let down by his supplier or because of an export embargo) must obtain them from other sources that remain available.<sup>69</sup> But this rule is subject to an exception which applies where it would be unreasonable to require the seller to perform in this way, because attempts to do so by him, and by other sellers similarly situated, would drive prices up to “unheard of levels”.<sup>70</sup> In one case of this kind, it was said that the seller need not make such an attempt where to require him to do so would be “impracticable and commercially unsuitable”.<sup>71</sup> These cases are, however, concerned, not with discharge under the general doctrine of frustration, but with discharge under express contractual provisions for supervening events.<sup>72</sup> Such a provision often operates in circumstances falling short of frustration under the general law.<sup>73</sup> Thus the fact that it may, on its true construction, cover “impracticability” does not support the view that the same circumstances would frustrate a contract which contained no such provision.

Thirdly it is arguable that impracticability may be a ground of discharge where the contract is one of indefinite duration. In Staffordshire Area Health Authority v South Staffordshire Waterworks Co<sup>74</sup> a hospital had in 1919 contracted to give up to a Waterworks Company its right to take water from a well, and the Company had in return promised “at all times hereafter” to supply water to the hospital at a fixed price specified in the contract. In 1975 the cost to the Company of making the supply had risen to over 18 times that fixed price and the Company gave seven months’ notice to terminate the agreement. It was held that this notice was effective. Lord Denning M.R. regarded the contract as frustrated by the change of circumstances which had occurred between 1919 and 1975. But this view is, with respect, open to question, as it was based on the very passage of his own judgment in the British Movietonews case which had there been disapproved by the House of Lords.<sup>75</sup> The preferable reason for the decision in the Staffordshire case is therefore that of the majority, who held that the agreement was, on

<sup>68</sup> See, for example, Brauer & Co (Great Britain) Ltd v James Clark (Brush Materials) Ltd [1952] 2 All E.R. 497; B & S Contracts & Designs Ltd v Victor Green Publications Ltd [1984] I.C.R. 419.

<sup>69</sup> e.g. Pf van der Zijden Wildhandel NV v Tucker & Cross Ltd [1975] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 240; Agrokur AG v Tradigrain SA [2000] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 497. For the possibility of excluding this rule by the terms of the clause, see The Morning Watch [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 383.

<sup>70</sup> Tradax Export SA v André & Cie [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 416 at 423; cf. André & Cie SA v Tradax Export SA [1983] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 254; Cook Industries v Tradax Export SA [1983] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 327 at 344, affirmed without reference to this point [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 454 and see generally Benjamin’s Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §19–136.

<sup>71</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PV BA [1978] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 109 at 115. cf. Owners of Steamship Matheos v Louis Dreyfus [1925] A.C. 654 at 666 (“commercially impracticable”).

<sup>72</sup> The same is true of Ford & Sons (Oldham) Ltd v Henry Leetham & Sons Ltd (1915) 21 Com.Cas. 55, which is nevertheless cited in support of the general principle of discharge by “impracticability” in U.C.C. s.2-615 Comment 4.

<sup>73</sup> See below, pp.900–901. For the significance of the distinction between discharge by frustration and under an express term, cf. also The Super Servant Two [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 148 at 149, [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1 at 8.

<sup>74</sup> [1978] 1 W.L.R. 1387; Rose, 96 L.Q.R. 177.

<sup>75</sup> [1952] A.C. 166, 185; above, p.867.

its true construction, intended to be of indefinite (and not of perpetual) duration<sup>76</sup>; hence the case fell within the general principle under which, in commercial agreements of indefinite duration, a term is often implied entitling either party to terminate by reasonable notice.<sup>77</sup> It follows from this reasoning that the decision would have gone the other way if the agreement had been for a fixed term, e.g. for 10 years. The agreement could then not have been terminated by notice before the end of the ten years, nor would an increase in the suppliers' costs during that period have been a ground of frustration. This view is supported by later authority<sup>78</sup> and seems also to be correct in principle: if parties enter into a fixed term fixed price contract they must be taken thereby to have allocated the risks of market fluctuations. If the parties are not prepared to accept these risks (or to accept them in full) they can adopt the now common practice of providing in the contract itself for flexible pricing.<sup>79</sup>

The three situations so far discussed should be distinguished from a fourth which arose in The Playa Larga.<sup>80</sup> Sugar had been sold by a Cuban state trading organisation to a buyer controlled by a state trading organisation in Chile. When the contract was made, Cuba and Chile were both ruled by Marxist governments; but before deliveries under the contract had been completed, the Marxist government in Chile was overthrown; diplomatic relations between the two countries were severed; and there was a complete breakdown of commercial relations between them. It was held that the contract was frustrated even though its performance had not become impossible in any of the senses discussed in this Chapter. The decision was, however, based, not on extreme hardship to the seller, but on the fact that, in the altered conditions, there was no possibility of the implementation of the contract on either side<sup>81</sup>; and the court concluded that, in these conditions, the contract was no longer intended to be binding. A breakdown of diplomatic and commercial relations between governments would not normally be a ground of discharge; but in The Playa Larga it had this effect because both contracting parties were controlled by the governments in question.

(d) INFLATION. In the cases so far discussed, increases in the cost of performing a particular contract have made that contract unprofitable to one party. A similar situation may arise where the general process of inflation reduces in real terms the benefit which that party expected to obtain under the contract. In the British Movietonews case "a sudden depreciation of currency" is listed as one of the unanticipated turns of events

<sup>76</sup> "At all times hereafter" was (obviously) not to be taken literally, but meant "at all times hereafter during the subsistence of the agreement." The majority view was followed in Tomer Hamlets LBC v British Gas Corp, The Times, March 23, 1982, affirmed, The Times, December 14, 1983, and approved in Watford DC v Watford Rural DC (1988) 86 L.G.R. 524 at 529.

<sup>77</sup> cf. above, p.749; contrast Watford DC v Watford Rural DC (1988) 86 L.G.R. 524, where it was held that no such term could be implied in an agreement to contribute variable amounts towards the maintenance of cemeteries; Islwyn BC v Newport BC (1994) 6 Admin. L.R. 386. For exclusion of an implied term permitting termination on reasonable notice by other words in the contract, see also Harbinger UK Ltd v GE Information Services Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 166 (software suppliers undertaking to provide maintenance services "in perpetuity": i.e., for so long as the users required, and were willing to pay for, the services).

<sup>78</sup> Kirklees MBC v Yorks Woollen District Transport Co (1978) 77 L.G.R. 448.

<sup>79</sup> See Superior Overseas Development Corp v British Gas Corp [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 262; Wates v GLC (1983) 25 Build L.R. 1 (below at n.84); Watford DC v Watford Rural DC (1988) 86 L.G.R. 524 at 548; Queensland Electricity Generating Board v New Hope Collieries Pty Ltd [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 205. In the American case of Aluminum Corp of America Inc v Essex Group Inc, 499 F. Supp. 53 (1980) relief was given even where a fixed term contract contained such a clause, the court substituting its own price-fixing formula for that agreed by the parties; but this seems to be an undue interference with a contract between parties of equal bargaining power.

<sup>80</sup> [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171.

<sup>81</sup> ibid at 188.

which do not frustrate a contract.<sup>82</sup> The passage continues to make the general point that a contract would cease to bind if a “fundamentally different situation” were to emerge. This may refer back to the illustrations, previously given in the passage, of events (such as currency fluctuations) which are stated not to frustrate a contract<sup>83</sup>; but more probably the reference is to other (i.e. to frustrating) events. Again, in Wates Ltd v GLC<sup>84</sup> a building contract to some extent protected the builder against inflation, by means of a price-escalation clause; and it was said that the fact that “inflation increased not [at] a trot or at a canter but at a gallop . . . was not so radical a difference from the inflation contemplated and provided for as to frustrate the contract”.<sup>85</sup> Thus the English authorities do not support the view that inflation is a ground of frustration, though the possibility that extreme (as opposed to merely severe) inflation may be capable of frustrating a contract cannot be wholly ruled out.<sup>86</sup> It is again open to a party who fears that he will be prejudiced by inflation to guard against this risk by an express term, e.g. by providing (if his bargaining position permits) for “index-linked” payments.<sup>87</sup>

(e) CURRENCY FLUCTUATIONS. A debtor whose obligations are defined by reference to a foreign currency cannot avoid liability to pay in full merely because the pound sterling has fallen in value in relation to that currency by an unexpectedly large amount.<sup>88</sup>

2. Frustration of Purpose

Frustration of purpose is, in a sense, the converse of impracticability. The two ideas resemble each other in that neither is concerned with cases in which performance has become impossible. Impracticability is normally<sup>89</sup> said to arise when a supplier of goods, services or other facilities alleges that supervening events have made performance of his own promise so much more burdensome to him that he should no longer be bound to render it. The argument of frustration of purpose, on the other hand, is normally put forward by the recipient of the goods, services or facilities<sup>90</sup>: it is that supervening events have so greatly reduced the value to him of the other party's performance that he should no longer be bound to accept it and to pay the agreed price. Such an argument succeeded in some of the cases which arose out of the postponement of the coronation of King Edward VII. We have seen that in Krell v Henry<sup>91</sup> the effect of the postponement was to discharge a contract for the hire of a flat overlooking the route of the proposed processions. The obvious danger of such a rule is that it can all too easily be invoked by a party for whom a contract has simply become a very bad bargain. Krell v Henry has

<sup>82</sup> [1952] A.C. 166 at 185.

<sup>83</sup> cf. Mann, The Legal Aspects of Money (5th ed.), pp.117–118.

<sup>84</sup> (1983) 25 Build.L.R. 1.

<sup>85</sup> ibid at 34.

<sup>86</sup> cf. Lord Roskill's reference in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina Northern Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 712, to “inflation” as one of the “circumstances in which the doctrine [of frustration] has been invoked, sometimes with success, sometimes without.”

<sup>87</sup> See Nationwide BS v Registry of Friendly Societies [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1226.

<sup>88</sup> Multiservice Bookbinding Ltd v Marden [1979] Ch. 84.

<sup>89</sup> See next note.

<sup>90</sup> Occasionally, the normal positions are reversed so that a buyer relies on impracticability where the cost to him of taking delivery has risen sharply (as in Mineral Park Land Co v Howard) 156 P. 458 (1916)) or a seller relies on frustration of purpose where supervening events affect his ability to realise the financial instruments by which payment is to be made (as in Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois and Power Sons & Co [1920] 1 K.B. 868).

<sup>91</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740 (above, p.867); McElroy and Williams, 4 M.L.R. 241; 5 M.L.R. 1.

therefore attracted much criticism<sup>92</sup>; but the decision can be justified<sup>93</sup> on the ground that the contract was, on its true construction, not merely one for the hire of the flat, but one to provide facilities for viewing the coronation processions.<sup>94</sup> The actual decision may be contrasted with an example given in one of the judgments: a contract to take a cab to Epsom on Derby day "at a suitable enhanced price"<sup>95</sup> would not be frustrated if the Derby were cancelled. Here the contract was evidently regarded as one to get the passenger to Epsom—not as one to get him to the Derby.

Similar reasoning distinguishes Krell v Henry from Herne Bay Steamboat Co v Hutton,<sup>96</sup> another of the coronation cases. A pleasure boat was hired "for the purpose of viewing the naval review and for a day's cruise round the fleet". The review, which formed part of the proposed coronation celebrations, was cancelled when the King fell ill, but the contract was not frustrated. It was construed simply as a contract for the hire of a boat; and it could still be performed although one of the motives of the hirer<sup>97</sup>—to carry passengers at high prices to see the review—was defeated.

Although the actual decision in Krell v Henry appears to be justifiable on the grounds stated above, the case has scarcely ever been followed in England. Normally, a contract is not frustrated merely because supervening events have prevented one party from putting the subject-matter to the use intended by him, even though that use was also contemplated by the other. Thus a contract by which a gas company agreed with a local authority to "provide, maintain and light" street lamps was not frustrated when war-time black-out regulations prohibited the lighting of such lamps,<sup>98</sup> since performance of the maintenance obligation ("which cannot be regarded as . . . trivial"<sup>99</sup>) remained possible.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, a contract for the sale of goods is not frustrated merely because the buyer's purpose to export the goods from, or to import them into, a particular country is defeated by export or import restrictions.<sup>2</sup> Perhaps the most striking illustration of the reluctance of the courts to apply the principle of frustration of purpose is provided by the Amalgamated Investment & Property<sup>3</sup> case, where it was held that a contract for the purchase of property for redevelopment was not frustrated when the buildings on the

<sup>92</sup> Blackburn Bobbin Co Ltd v TW Allen & Sons Ltd [1918] 1 K.B. 540 at 542 (affirmed [1918] 2 K.B. 467); Larrinaga v Société Franco-Américaine des Phosphates de Medulla (1923) 92 L.J.K.B. 455 at 459; cf. Maritime National Fish Ltd v Ocean Trampers Ltd [1935] A.C. 524 at 528; Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Toohey's Ltd (1943) 67 C.L.R. 169 at 191–194; Corbin on Contracts, §1355 at pp.464–465; Landon, 52 L.Q.R. 168; Gordon, ibid. p.326.

<sup>93</sup> See Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 C.L.R. 337 at 358.

<sup>94</sup> cf. The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 869, at [66] (contract for "a room with a view").

<sup>95</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740 at 750.

<sup>96</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 683.

<sup>97</sup> For the requirement that the purpose of both parties must be frustrated, see The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293.

<sup>98</sup> Leiston Gas Co v Leiston-cum-Sizewell Urban DC [1916] 2 K.B. 428; on the interpretation of express contractual provisions for such events, see Williams v Mercer [1940] 3 All E.R. 293 and contrast Egham & Staines Electricity Co Ltd v Egham Urban DC [1944] 1 All E.R. 107.

<sup>99</sup> Leiston case, [1916] 2 K.B. 428 at 433.

<sup>1</sup> For contrasting decisions on the effect of black-out regulations on contracts for the hire of electric advertising signs, see Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Toohey's Ltd (1943) 67 C.L.R. 169 (contract not discharged); 20th Century Lites v Goodman, 149 P. 2d. 88 (1944) (contract discharged).

<sup>2</sup> e.g. D McMaster & Co v Cox McEwen & Co, 1921 S.C. (HL) 1; Congimex SARL (Lisbon) v. Continental Grain Export Corp (New York) [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 346; Congimex Companhia Geral, etc., SARL v Tradux Export SA [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250; Bangladesh Export Import Co Ltd v Sucden Kerry SA [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1, where an additional ground for rejecting the buyer's plea of frustration was that the contract in terms imposed an obligation to obtain an import licence on the buyer.

<sup>3</sup> Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v John Walker & Son Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 164.

land were listed as being of special architectural or historic interest, so that redevelopment became more difficult or impossible and the property lost most of its value.<sup>4</sup>

Such cases show that “the frustrated expectations and intentions of one party to a contract do not necessarily, or indeed usually, lead to the frustration of that contract”.<sup>5</sup> They make it difficult to establish the defence of frustration of purpose; but they do not make it impossible. In Denny, Mott & Dickson v James B Fraser & Co Ltd<sup>6</sup> an agreement for the lease of a timber yard was made for the purpose of enabling the parties to carry out a contract between them for the sale of timber. When performance of the contract of sale was prohibited by war-time regulations, the House of Lords held that the agreement for the lease of the yard was also frustrated. The actual decision may to some extent rest on special policy considerations applicable to cases of supervening illegality; but other situations can be imagined in which the principle of frustration of purpose might also apply. For example, if premises were leased as a warehouse and supervening events made their use as such impossible for the whole period of the lease, it seems that the contract might be frustrated.<sup>7</sup> In such a case, the contract would be discharged, even though performance had not become impossible, because the supervening event had destroyed “some basic, though tacit assumption on which the parties had contracted”.<sup>8</sup>

3. Illegality

A contract may be discharged by a supervening prohibition if the prohibition would have made the contract illegal, had it been in force when the contract was made.<sup>9</sup>

The object of the doctrine of frustration in cases of supervening impossibility or of frustration of purpose is to provide a satisfactory method of allocating or distributing the loss caused by the supervening event. Where, however, a contract is affected by supervening illegality, the court has to take into account, not only the relative interests of the parties, but also the interests of the public in seeing that the law is observed<sup>10</sup>; and this public interest may sometimes outweigh the importance of achieving a fair distribution of loss. For this reason supervening illegality is a ground of discharge distinct from supervening impossibility, and is to some extent governed by special rules.

(1) Illustrations

(a) TRADING WITH THE ENEMY. The public interest considerations just mentioned are particularly strong where a contract becomes illegal as a result of the war-time prohibition against trading with the enemy. In the leading Fibrosa case<sup>11</sup> a contract for the sale of machinery to be shipped to Gdynia was frustrated when that port was occupied by the enemy during the Second World War. Although it might have been physically possible <sup>4</sup> The listing was said to have reduced the value of the property to £200,000—against a contract price of £1,710,000.

<sup>5</sup> Congimex Companhia Geral, etc., SARL v Tradax Export SA [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250 at 253.

<sup>6</sup> [1944] A.C. 265.

<sup>7</sup> This seems to be assumed in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 (below, pp.894–895), where the temporary nature of the interruption was stressed in rejecting the plea of frustration.

<sup>8</sup> Sir Lindsay Parkinson Ltd v Commissioners of Works [1949] 2 K.B. 632 at 665.

<sup>9</sup> See above, pp.438–439.

<sup>10</sup> This book deals only with discharge by supervening illegality which arises under English law. The justification for discharge where the illegality arises under foreign law (e.g. under a foreign prohibition of export or import) is somewhat different: see Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§18–303, 25–112.

<sup>11</sup> Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn, Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] A.C. 32.

to get the goods to the destination,<sup>12</sup> the contract was discharged because of the strong public interest in ensuring that no aid should be given to the enemy economy in time of war. The same principle applies where goods are to be imported from an enemy country: the contract is frustrated even though the enemy source is not specified in the contract but only contemplated by the parties.<sup>13</sup> The public interest principle is so strong in these cases that frustration by or as a result of the prohibition cannot be excluded even by an express provision in the contract.<sup>14</sup>

(b) OTHER PROHIBITIONS. The cases provide many illustrations of frustration by supervening prohibitions other than that against trading with the enemy. In the Denny Mott<sup>15</sup> case, for example, a contract for the sale of timber was frustrated by a war-time prohibition against dealing in goods of the contract description. Contracts can similarly be frustrated by prohibition of export or import, by restrictions on the movement of capital,<sup>16</sup> or by licensing requirements of the kinds to be discussed below. In these cases the public interest in seeing that the prohibition is observed is less strong than in the trading with the enemy cases<sup>17</sup>; and they differ from the trading with the enemy cases in two further ways. First, frustration results only if it is an actual term of the contract that the subsequently prohibited act is to be done. Thus a contract for the sale of goods may be frustrated by prohibition of export if it provides that the goods are to be exported,<sup>18</sup> but not merely because the buyer intended to export them, even though the seller knew this.<sup>19</sup> Secondly, frustration can be excluded by express contractual provisions. Thus provisions suspending performance in the event of prohibition of export are valid<sup>20</sup> since, so far from contravening the policy of the prohibition, they assume that it will be observed. Similar provisions in trading with the enemy cases are contrary to the public interest since they involve continuing relations with an enemy subject, and so may indirectly support the enemy economy.

(2) Supervening and antecedent prohibition

Under the rules stated above, frustration may result from a supervening prohibition, i.e. from one imposed by a law made after the contract was made.<sup>21</sup> If, at the time of contracting, the prohibition is already in force, the case is one of antecedent prohibition.

<sup>12</sup> The mere outbreak of war does not frustrate a contract: see The Chrysalis [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1469 (where the war was one to which the United Kingdom was not a party, so that no question of trading with the enemy could arise). The suggestion in Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574 at 600 that in the Fibrosa case "the outbreak of war frustrated the contract" is, with respect, open to question: it was not the outbreak of war, but the enemy occupation of the port of destination, which was the ground of frustration.

<sup>13</sup> Re Badische Co [1921] 2 Ch. 331; above, p.876.

<sup>14</sup> Ertel Bieber & Co v Rio Tinto Co Ltd [1918] A.C. 260; below, p.902.

<sup>15</sup> [1944] A.C. 265; above, p.887; cf Marsh v Glanvill [1917] 2 K.B. 87 at 91.

<sup>16</sup> See Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] Q.B. 728 at 749, though in that case there was no frustration: ibid. at 771–772; cf Wahda Bank v Arab Bank plc, The Times, December 23, 1992; for further proceedings in this case, see [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 470.

<sup>17</sup> cf Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§18–298 to 18–300.

<sup>18</sup> As in Andrew Miller & Co v Taylor & Co Ltd [1916] 1 K.B. 402 (see at 403, 417); but in that case the plea of frustration failed as the embargo was not permanent: as to this point see below, p.891, n.41.

<sup>19</sup> See above, p.886.

<sup>20</sup> See above, pp.65, 882; below, pp.900–901.

<sup>21</sup> For the present purpose, a prohibition is supervening if it was imposed after the contract even though the state of affairs on which it is based already existed when the contract was made, as in Gamerco SA v ICM/Fair Warning (Agency) Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1226, where a stadium in which a "rock concert" was to be given suffered before the contract was made from an undiscovered structural defect and use of the stadium for giving the concert was prohibited when the defect was discovered after the contract was made.

This may make the contract void ab initio for illegality,<sup>22</sup> but it will not bring about frustration. There is, however, also an intermediate situation in which at the time of contracting a law is in force under which the contract can be lawfully performed only with the consent of a public authority: e.g. if a licence to build, or to export or import goods, is obtained. Such a licence may be sought but refused after the contract is made; and it is then possible to regard the refusal as a supervening event which frustrates the contract.<sup>23</sup> But it is submitted that generally there will be no frustration in cases of this kind. The cases fall into three groups.

In the first, the parties intend to perform, or actually perform, without the required licence. In such cases, the contract is not frustrated but illegal ab initio.<sup>24</sup>

In the second, the parties intend to perform only if the required licence is obtained. Here the principal obligations under the contract are subject to the condition precedent that the licence will be obtained; and normally one of the parties (e.g. a seller of goods for export) will be under a duty to take reasonable steps to obtain the licence.<sup>25</sup> If he takes such steps but the licence is nevertheless refused, he is not liable in damages<sup>26</sup>; but the reason is not that he is prevented from performing (and so discharged) but that he has performed by doing all that was required of him. Equally, the buyer is not liable, but again the reason is not that his liability is discharged: it is that he never became liable because the seller was unable to deliver and so failed to perform a condition precedent to, or a concurrent condition of, the buyer's duty to accept and pay.<sup>27</sup> Thus although neither party is liable the contract is not frustrated.<sup>28</sup> An alternative possibility, in cases of this kind, is that the seller has undertaken absolutely to obtain a licence.<sup>29</sup> If he fails, he is liable in damages; and to avoid conflict with the rules as to illegal contracts it has been said that the seller's liability is based on a collateral contract that he will secure the licence.<sup>30</sup>

In the third group of cases the licensing requirement is in existence at the time of the contract and the parties intend to perform only if a licence is obtained; but afterwards there is a change in government policy with regard to the issue of such licences. If such a change leads to the refusal of licences which previously had been issued as a matter of course,<sup>31</sup> it is possible that the change of policy may be regarded as a supervening event

<sup>22</sup> See above, pp.433–435.

<sup>23</sup> This is a possible interpretation of a dictum in AV Pound & Co Ltd v MW Hardy Inc [1956] A.C. 588 at 604 that “further performance of the contract was excused”; for another interpretation, see n.28, below.

<sup>24</sup> See above, p.432.

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.65.

<sup>26</sup> Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §18–293.

<sup>27</sup> See above, pp.761–763.

<sup>28</sup> This is an alternative, and preferable, interpretation of the dictum in AV Pound & Co Ltd v MW Hardy Inc, cited above, n.23; the issue of frustration was specifically left open in that case. cf. Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§181–294 to 181–296. The question whether the contract is frustrated, or whether the parties escape liability on other grounds, is of more than academic interest: if there is no frustration the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 (below, pp.911–916) does not apply.

<sup>29</sup> Peter Cassidy Seed Co Ltd v Osuustukkukaupa Ltd [1957] 1 W.L.R. 273; Pagnan Spa v Tradax Ocean Transport SA [1987] 3 All E.R. 565; cf. Congimex Companhia Geral, etc. SARL v Tradax Export S.A [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250 (absolute duty to obtain licence undertaken by buyer). “Clear words” are required to impose such an absolute duty, especially where the law prohibiting performance is passed after the time of contracting: The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 191.

<sup>30</sup> Walton (Grain and Shipping) Ltd v British Italian Trading Co [1959] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 223 at 226; Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd v State Trading Co of India [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 434.

<sup>31</sup> cf. the example given in C Czarnikow Ltd v Centrala Handlu Zagranicznego “Rolimpex” [1979] A.C. 351 at 372 (dog and television licences); Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd v State Trading Corp of India [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 429; contrast Atisa SA v Aztec AG [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 579 (where the foreign government simply broke its contract to supply the seller).

which is capable of frustrating the contract.<sup>32</sup>

(3) Partial and temporary illegality

Partial and temporary illegality gives rise to two problems.

The first is whether it frustrates the contract. This depends (as in cases of partial impossibility<sup>33</sup>) on whether it defeats the main purpose of the contract. Thus in the Denny Mott case<sup>34</sup> a long-term agreement for the sale of timber provided that "to enable the aforesaid agreement to be carried out" the buyer should let a timber yard to the seller. When dealings in timber under the agreement were prohibited, it was held that the whole contract was frustrated, since its main object, namely trading in timber, had become illegal. Hence the seller could not enforce the part of it that related to the letting of the yard. But in Cricklewood Property Investment Trust Ltd v Leighton's Investment Trust Ltd<sup>35</sup> temporary war-time restrictions on building did not frustrate a 99-year building lease; for the illegality did not destroy the main object of the lease as there would probably be ample time for building after the war-time restrictions were removed.

The second question is whether illegality which does not frustrate the contract but affects only some subsidiary obligation excuses non-performance of that obligation. On principle it should have this effect. For example, a charterparty might provide that a ship should call at ten ports. If one of them became an enemy port, the shipowner could hardly be made liable for failing to call there, even if it were physically possible for him to do so.<sup>36</sup> Where temporary illegality does not discharge the contract,<sup>37</sup> it has similarly been held to provide an excuse for non-performance for so long as the prohibition lasted.<sup>38</sup> But in Eyre v Johnson<sup>39</sup> a tenant was held liable in damages for breach of his covenant to repair even though war-time regulations made it illegal for him to do the work. The better view, however, is that the tenant ought not to be held liable for refusing to do an act which subsequent legislation has made illegal. Though the lease as a whole is not frustrated, the illegality should provide the tenant with an excuse for non-performance of the part that has become illegal.<sup>40</sup>

4. Prospective Frustration

A claim that a contract has been discharged may be made before there actually has been any (or any sufficiently serious) interference with performance, on the ground that

<sup>32</sup> This was assumed in Maritime National Fish Ltd v Ocean Trampers Ltd [1935] A.C. 524 (where the plea of frustration failed for reasons discussed at pp.906–908, below); cf. also Walton (Grain and Shipping) Ltd v British Trading Co [1959] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 223 at 236 (where the seller was excused by a force majeure clause); Congimex S.A.R.L. (Lisbon) v Continental Grain Export Corp (New York) [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 386; Nile Co for the Export of Agricultural Produce v H & J.M. Bennett (Commodities) Ltd [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 555 at 581–582.

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.870.

<sup>34</sup> [1944] A.C. 265; cf. Nile Co for the Export of Agricultural Crops v H & J.M. Bennett (Commodities) Ltd [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 555 at 581 (foreign government imposing change on method of payment).

<sup>35</sup> [1945] A.C. 221.

<sup>36</sup> cf. Hindley & Co Ltd v General Fibre Co Ltd [1940] 2 K.B. 517.

<sup>37</sup> As in the Cricklewood case, above, n.35.

<sup>38</sup> Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] Q.B. 728 at 772 ("suspended but not discharged"); cf. John Lewis Properties v Viscount Chelsea [1993] 2 E.G.L.R. 77 (where it was not necessary to distinguish between impossibility and illegality).

<sup>39</sup> [1946] K.B. 481.

<sup>40</sup> Cricklewood case, above n.35, at 233, 244; Sturcke v SW Edwards Ltd (1971) 23 P. & C.R. 185 at 190; cf. Bremster v Kitchell (1691) 1 Salk. 198 ("the statute repeals the covenant"); Grimsdick v Sweetman [1909] 2 K.B. 740.

supervening events have made it highly probable that there will be such interference. The general rule is that the effect of those events must then be determined, not by waiting to see how they actually affect performance, but by reference to the time when they occur. The point is well illustrated by Embiricos v Sydney Reid & Co<sup>41</sup> where a Greek ship had been chartered for a voyage involving passage of the Dardanelles. On the outbreak of war between Greece and Turkey, it was held that the charterer was justified in treating the contract as frustrated, even though later the Turkish authorities unexpectedly announced that Greek ships were to be allowed through the straits during an "escape period" which would have made performance of the contract voyage possible. Similarly, where requisition interferes with performance of a charterparty, the question whether it frustrates the contract is to be determined by reference to the time of requisition.<sup>42</sup> The reason for the rule is that rights should not be left indefinitely in suspense.<sup>43</sup>

The rule is based on the assumption that the event is of such a kind that a reasonable view of its probable effect on the contract can be taken as soon as it occurs. Where this cannot be done, because the event is one which may equally well cause slight or serious interference with performance, the rule is necessarily subject to some qualification. This is, for example, the position where a strike of dockworkers interferes with performance of a charterparty.<sup>44</sup> The contract is not frustrated at once, as soon as the strike begins. It is "necessary to wait upon events—" <sup>45</sup>not, indeed, until the strike is over,<sup>46</sup> but until it has gone on for so long that a reasonable person would conclude that it was likely to interfere fundamentally with performance. This test determines not only the question whether the contract is frustrated, but also the date of frustration. The point arose in a number of cases in which ships which had been time-chartered were detained in the Shatt al Arab in the course of the Gulf War between Iran and Iraq.<sup>47</sup> That war is generally regarded as having begun on September 22, 1980; but at that time commercial opinion was that the war would soon be brought to an end and that foreign vessels would be speedily released. Later events falsified these forecasts and there was no doubt that the length of the detention which occurred was sufficient to frustrate the charterparties. But it was held that the contracts could be frustrated before the detention had actually gone on for this length of time, and that they were frustrated as soon as "a sensible prognosis of the commercial probabilities"<sup>48</sup> could be made, that the delay would continue for so long as to prevent the resumption of substantial services under the charterparties.<sup>49</sup> Similarly, where an employee suffered from a heart attack, his contract of employment was not discharged at once, but only when the effects of his heart attack

<sup>41</sup> [1914] 3 K.B. 45; so far as contra, Andrew Miller v Taylor & Co Ltd [1916] 1 K.B. 402 is criticised in Watts, Watts & Co Ltd v Mitsui & Co Ltd [1917] 2 A.C. 227 at 245.

<sup>42</sup> Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] A.C. 435; cf. also National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 706; Wong Lai Ying v Chinachem Investment Co (1979) 13 Build. L.R. 81.

<sup>43</sup> Bank Line case, above, at 454; cf. Embiricos v Sydney Reid & Co [1914] 3 K.B. 45 at 54, quoted above, p.863; Total Gas Marketing Ltd v Arco British Ltd [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 209 at 222.

<sup>44</sup> As in The Nema [1982] A.C. 724.

<sup>45</sup> [1982] A.C. 724 at 753.

<sup>46</sup> The Nema, above, at 753 ("businessmen must not be required to await events too long"); cf. Chakki v United Yeast Ltd [1982] 1 C.R. 140.

<sup>47</sup> The Evia (No.2) [1983] 1 A.C. 736; The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 400; The Chrysalis [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1469.

<sup>48</sup> The Evia (No.2) [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 334 at 346, affirmed [1983] 1 A.C. 736; The Wenjiang (No.2), above, at 408; cf. The Adelfa [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 466 (delay in unloading due to arrest of ship).

<sup>49</sup> Commercial arbitrators had fixed the date of frustration as October 4, 1980 in The Evia (No.2) above, and as November 24, 1980 in The Wenjiang (No.2), above, and in The Chrysalis, above. The courts expressed no opinion of their own as to the dates of frustration, merely holding that the arbitrators had applied the correct principle of law in fixing those dates.

could be assessed and "both sides accepted that . . . [he] was not going to work again".<sup>50</sup>

5. Alternatives

A contract is said to impose an alternative obligation when it gives a party the right to choose between two or more specified performances, (e.g. to deliver X or Y) or between two or more specified ways of rendering performance (e.g. to deliver X on any day in October<sup>51</sup>). The power of selection between the alternatives may be given to either party: for example, a contract providing for goods to be delivered during a specified month, or at a range of ports, may give the power to choose the date or place of delivery or shipment to either seller<sup>52</sup> or buyer.<sup>53</sup> The general rule is that if a supervening event makes one of such alternative performances impossible or illegal, the contract is not discharged so long as another remains possible and lawful.<sup>54</sup> For example, if a contract is to deliver goods at X or Y, delivery must be made at X if delivery at Y has become impossible; if shipment is to be made from X or Y, shipment must be made from X if shipment from Y has become impossible.<sup>55</sup> The general rule, and the qualifications of it to be discussed below, apply not only where the contract is alleged to have been frustrated, but also where a party relies on the supervening event as providing him with an excuse under an express term of the contract, such as a force majeure clause.<sup>56</sup>

The general rule can be excluded by an express provision in the contract, e.g. by a strike clause which on its true construction excuses a seller if the port from which he intended to ship becomes strikebound, even though shipment from other ports within the contractual range remains possible.<sup>57</sup> Nor does the general rule apply where the contract calls for performance X and gives the party who is to render it a liberty to substitute Y: e.g. where a charterparty names ship X as its subject-matter but entitles the shipowner to substitute another ship. Under such a contract, X is due unless the liberty to substitute another ship (Y) is exercised,<sup>58</sup> while in the case of a true alternative obligation one cannot at the time of contracting tell whether X or Y is due. Hence, in the case of a liberty to substitute, the destruction of X before Y had been substituted, or the destruction of Y after the substitution had been made, would discharge the contract.<sup>59</sup> The distinction is further illustrated by contrasting a case in which a charterparty required the charterer to load a cargo of wheat, and gave him an "option" of instead loading rye,<sup>60</sup> with one in which a charterparty required the charterer to load a cargo of wheat or rye.<sup>61</sup> A contract of the first kind is sometimes said to confer a

<sup>50</sup> Notcutt v Universal Equipment Co (London) Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 641 at 644.

<sup>51</sup> e.g. Ross T Smyth & Co (Liverpool) v WN Lindsay (Leith) [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1280 at 1283.

<sup>52</sup> ibid.

<sup>53</sup> e.g. David T Boyd & Co Ltd v Louis Louca [1973] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 209 (where no issue of discharge arose).

<sup>54</sup> Barkworth v Young (1856) 1 Drew. 1 at 25; Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food [1963] A.C. 691 at 730; cf. The Super Servant Two [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 148 at 157, affirmed [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1; for further difficulties arising from this case, see below, pp.907-908.

<sup>55</sup> The Furness Bridge [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 367; cf. Warinco AG v Fritz Mauthner [1978] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 151; The Safer [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 637 at 642.

<sup>56</sup> See above, p.883; cf. Warinco case, above, n.55.

<sup>57</sup> Sociedad Iberica de Molturacion SA v Tradax Export SA [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 545.

<sup>58</sup> The Marine Star [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 329; The Fjord Wind [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 307 at 328, affirmed [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 191.

<sup>59</sup> See The Badagry [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 395.

<sup>60</sup> Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food [1963] A.C. 691.

<sup>61</sup> Brightman & Co v Bunge y Born Limitada Sociedad [1924] 2 K.B. 619, affirmed on another ground [1925] A.C. 799.

“contractual option” while one of the second kind is said to give rise to a “performance option”.<sup>62</sup> Whatever terminology may be used to express the distinction, its effect (in the context of frustration) is clear. Supervening impossibility of loading wheat will discharge the contract in the first case (if the option to load rye has not been exercised when it became impossible to load wheat)<sup>63</sup>; but it will not have this effect in the second case even if the charterer has indicated that he intends to load wheat.<sup>64</sup>

An alternative obligation must also be distinguished from a contingent obligation: i.e. from one to do X but, if X is not done, to do Y.<sup>65</sup> Under such a contract, the primary obligation is to do X<sup>66</sup> and Y becomes due only if X is not performed and without any notice of election on the debtor’s part.<sup>67</sup> Clearly the obligation to do X is not affected if it becomes impossible to do Y. Whether supervening impossibility of doing X is a ground of discharge depends on the construction of the contract: the contract would be discharged if it meant that Y was to become due if the debtor in breach of contract failed to do X, but not if it meant that Y was to become due if for any reason X was not done.

6. Events Affecting only one Party’s Performance

In Taylor v Caldwell<sup>68</sup> the court was directly concerned only with the liability of the defendants, the performance of whose obligation to supply the Music Hall was made impossible by the fire. Yet the court clearly regarded the hirers as also having been discharged,<sup>69</sup> even though their principal obligation (to pay the agreed hire) had in no way become impossible. This is a common situation: in a typical bilateral contract one party undertakes to perform some act or abstention, while the other undertakes to pay for it. Supervening impossibility normally affects only the former undertaking (though illegality may affect either or both<sup>70</sup>). This fact was at one time thought to support the view that a time charter could not be frustrated by the unavailability of the ship: “if the shipowner’s object is to receive the chartered hire . . . he does not care how much the charterer’s adventures are frustrated, so long as he is able to pay”.<sup>71</sup> But the argument was rejected on the ground that the “common object”<sup>72</sup> of the parties was frustrated; for even the owner’s object “is not only to get hire but to afford services”.<sup>73</sup> The “common object” in all these cases is the exchange of the services or facilities to be provided by one party for the payment to be made by the other. The same reasoning applies to cases of frustration of purpose. In Krell v Henry<sup>74</sup> the common object of the parties was the <sup>62</sup> The Didymi and the Leon [1984] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 583, 587 per Sir John Donaldson M.R.; Staughton J., ibid. p.585, uses similar phrases to draw the somewhat different distinction between what is owed and how it is to be performed. A contractual term may also impose an obligation on one party to notify the other as to the way in, or time at, which performance is to be required. Such a term is distinct from one merely giving the former party an option: see Universal Bulk Carriers Ltd v Andre & Cie [2001] EWCA Civ 588; [2001] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 65, at [17].

<sup>63</sup> This follows from the reasoning of the Reardon Smith case, above, n.60.

<sup>64</sup> Brightman case, above, n.61 [1924] 2 K.B. 619, 637; cf. ibid. 630.

<sup>65</sup> See Deverill v Burnell (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 475, below, p.959.

<sup>66</sup> In this respect it differs from a “performance option” (above, at n.62).

<sup>67</sup> In this respect it differs from a “contractual option” (above, at n.62).

<sup>68</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826; above, p.866.

<sup>69</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 at 840 (“both parties are excused”).

<sup>70</sup> cf. Libyan Arab Foreign Bank v Bankers Trust Co [1989] Q.B. 728 at 749, recognising that “an obligation to pay money can be frustrated” by illegality.

<sup>71</sup> Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1991] A.C. 435 at 452.

<sup>72</sup> Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue SS Co Ltd [1926] A.C. 497 at 507; contrast Scanlan’s New Neon v Tooheys Ltd (1943) 67 C.L.R. 169 at 196–197.

<sup>73</sup> Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co Ltd [1919] A.C. 435 at 453.

<sup>74</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740; above, pp.867, 885.

provision of facilities for seeing the coronation processions: this was what one party intended to sell and the other to buy. It made no difference that the one expected to benefit by receiving a sum of money and the other by seeing the processions. Hence both parties are discharged even though the supervening event affects only the performance of one.

7. Special Factors Affecting Land

(1) Leases of land

It was formerly thought that a lease of land could not be frustrated<sup>75</sup> because, in giving the tenant the right to exclusive possession for the specified time, it created a legal estate in the land. This estate was regarded as the subject-matter of the contract and survived even if later events prevented the tenant from making any use of the premises. But the commercial reality is that, generally, the tenant bargains for use and occupation and not simply for a legal estate; and in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd<sup>76</sup> the House of Lords held that the doctrine of frustration could apply to leases of land.

At the same time it was emphasised that the frustration of a lease will be a very rare event.<sup>77</sup> One reason for this is that a lease for a long period of years is in the nature of a long-term speculation. Such a transaction is hard to frustrate since the parties must contemplate that circumstances may change radically during its currency, and so to a large extent take the risk of supervening events.<sup>78</sup> Nor would interruption of enjoyment which was likely to last for only a few years frustrate a lease for a long term, such as 99 years, since the ratio of the interruption to the whole would be too small.<sup>79</sup> Even the physical destruction of the premises would not usually frustrate since it would normally be covered by express provisions<sup>80</sup> in the lease, such as covenants to repair and to keep the premises insured. A further reason why frustration of leases is uncommon is that to hold a long-term lease frustrated by the destruction of the buildings on the land could, paradoxically, operate to the prejudice of tenants, especially in a period of rising land values. Frustration operates automatically,<sup>81</sup> so that its effect, in the case put, would be to deprive the tenant of a valuable site long before the end of the agreed term.

For these reasons, the House of Lords in the National Carriers<sup>82</sup> case did not disapprove any of the earlier decisions to the extent that they held that the leases in question were not frustrated.<sup>83</sup> In those cases it had been held that the leases were not discharged by the destruction of the premises by enemy action<sup>84</sup>; by the requisitioning of the premises<sup>85</sup>; by war-time legislation which prevented the tenant from residing on the premises<sup>86</sup> or from developing the land<sup>87</sup>; or by the death of the tenant of furnished

<sup>75</sup> See the authorities cited in nn.83–88, below.

<sup>76</sup> [1981] A.C. 675.

<sup>77</sup> ibid. at 692, 697.

<sup>78</sup> cf. below, p.898.

<sup>79</sup> cf. above, pp.874–875.

<sup>80</sup> cf. below, p.898.

<sup>81</sup> See below, p.909.

<sup>82</sup> [1981] A.C. 675.

<sup>83</sup> Though ibid. at 715 Matthey v Curling [1922] 2 A.C. 180 was described as “a singularly harsh decision from the tenant’s point of view.” But the harshness was mitigated by the tenant’s receipt of insurance moneys, in respect of the destruction, after the requisition.

<sup>84</sup> Redmond v Dainton [1920] 2 K.B. 256; Denman v Brise [1949] 1 K.B. 22; Cusack-Smith v London Corp [1956] 1 W.L.R. 1368.

<sup>85</sup> Whitehall Court Ltd v Ettlinger [1920] 1 K.B. 680; Matthey v Curling [1922] 2 A.C. 180; Swift v Macbean [1942] 1 K.B. 375.

<sup>86</sup> London & Northern Estates Ltd v Schlesinger [1916] 1 K.B. 20.

<sup>87</sup> Cricklewood Property and Investment Trust Ltd v Leighton’s Investment Trust Ltd [1945] A.C. 221.

rooms.<sup>88</sup> In the National Carriers case itself a tenant claimed that a ten-year lease of a warehouse had been frustrated when, four and a half years before the end of the term, the only access road to the premises had been closed by the local authority and had remained closed for 20 months. The claim was rejected on the ground that the interruption was not sufficiently serious to bring about frustration.<sup>89</sup>

The doctrine of frustration is most likely to apply where the lease is a short-term one for a particular purpose: e.g. where a holiday cottage which has been rented for a month is burnt down without the fault of either party. Similarly, the contracts in cases like Taylor v Caldwell<sup>90</sup> and Krell v Henry<sup>91</sup> could be frustrated, even if the transactions were expressed as leases and not (as they actually were) as licences. In Scotland the lease of a salmon fishery was held to be frustrated when construction of a nearby bombing range prevented the tenant from using the fishery<sup>92</sup>; and this case might now be followed in England. A lease could also be frustrated if "some vast convulsion of nature swallowed up the property altogether, or buried it in the depths of the sea"; or if, in the case of a building lease, "legislation were subsequently passed which permanently prohibited private building in the area or dedicated it as an open space for ever".<sup>93</sup>

The doctrine of frustration can apply to an agreement for a lease, no less than to an executed lease.<sup>94</sup>

Even where the lease is not frustrated, supervening events can nevertheless provide a party with an excuse for not performing a particular obligation imposed by the lease. In Baily v De Crespigny<sup>95</sup> a landlord covenanted that neither he nor his assigns would permit building on a paddock adjoining the land let. The paddock was then compulsorily acquired by a railway company, which built a station on it. It was held that the landlord was not liable in damages for breach of his covenant, first because on the true construction of the covenant "assigns" did not include assigns by compulsion of law; and secondly because it was impossible for him to secure performance of the covenant.<sup>96</sup> Similarly, a tenant who covenanted to build would not be liable in damages if war-time conditions or legislation made building impossible or illegal.<sup>97</sup>

(2) Sale of land

The doctrine of frustration applies to contracts for the sale of land,<sup>98</sup> but its operation in relation to such contracts is restricted by the rule that under such a contract risk of loss passes<sup>99</sup> (unless otherwise agreed) as soon as the contract is made. It follows that the

<sup>88</sup> Youngmin v Heath [1974] 1 W.L.R. 135.

<sup>89</sup> cf. above, p.868. See also, in the United States, Lloyd v Murphy, 153 P. 2d. 47 (1944).

<sup>90</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826; above, p.866.

<sup>91</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740; above, pp.867, 885.

<sup>92</sup> Tay Salmon Fisheries Co v Speedie, 1929 S.C. 593.

<sup>93</sup> Cricklewood case [1945] A.C. 221 at 229; cf. at 240.

<sup>94</sup> Denny, Mott & Dickson v James B Fraser & Co Ltd [1944] A.C. 265 (a decision not confined to Scots Law: see the National Carriers case [1981] A.C. 675 at 704); Rom Securities Ltd v Rogers (Holdings) Ltd (1968) 205 E.G. 427; cf. Property Discount Corp Ltd v Lyon Group Ltd [1981] 1 W.L.R. 300 at 305.

<sup>95</sup> (1869) L.R. 4 Q.B. 180.

<sup>96</sup> The actual decision seems to be very unjust. The landlord presumably got compensation from the railway company and was able to keep this for himself though the tenant's interests were prejudiced by the erection of the station.

<sup>97</sup> Cricklewood case [1945] at 233; Eyre v Johnson [1946] K.B. 481, contra, is doubted at p.890, above.

<sup>98</sup> This is assumed in Amalgamated Investment and Property Co Ltd v John Walker & Co Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 164, where, for reasons stated at pp.886–887, above, the contract was not frustrated.

<sup>99</sup> See above, p.871.

contract is not frustrated if the house or buildings on the land (for the sake of which it was bought) are destroyed or seriously damaged between contract and completion.<sup>1</sup>

The rule promoted certainty by making it unnecessary to ask whether partial destruction was sufficiently serious to bring about frustration.<sup>2</sup> On the other hand, it could cause hardship to the purchaser by making him bear the risk of losses occurring before he had possession and hence before he could take steps to safeguard the property. The hardship was mitigated by the fact that the purchaser had the benefit of the vendor's insurance<sup>3</sup>; but as he could not be sure of the adequacy of this insurance he would normally take out his own insurance as soon as contracts were exchanged. This position could lead to double insurance and hence to a windfall for insurers. The rule that risk passes on contract is therefore commonly varied by contract: for example, by provisions leaving the risk with the seller till completion, and giving a right to rescind the contract either to the purchaser if the property has become unusable for its purpose, or to the vendor if the property has been destroyed and he cannot get planning permission to rebuild it.<sup>4</sup>

The rule that risk passes on contract applies where the land is sold with buildings already on it. Where a developer sells land with a house to be built on it, the risk of the work remains (unless otherwise agreed) on the vendor until the work is completed, in accordance with the rules applicable to building contracts.<sup>5</sup> Hence destruction of the partly completed building does not frustrate the contract and the vendor must do the work again at no extra cost. But the contract may be frustrated on other grounds. Thus where a landslide not only destroyed a partly completed block of flats, but also delayed the construction work for two-and-a-half years, it was held that a contract for the sale of one of the flats was frustrated by the delay; for in the interval market conditions had changed to such an extent as to make performance at the end of the delay radically different from that originally undertaken.<sup>6</sup>

Specific performance of a contract for the sale of land can be ordered against the purchaser even though, after contract, a compulsory purchase order is made in respect of the land.<sup>7</sup> The contract is not frustrated because the risk of compulsory acquisition is on the purchaser from the time of the contract<sup>8</sup>; and because the court's order will result in the conveyance of the land to him, against payment of the price, so that he will in due course get the compensation payable by the acquiring authority. Where, in pursuance of the compulsory acquisition order, the land is taken over by the acquiring authority after completion has become due, but before the hearing, the court will not order specific performance, since it cannot order the vendor to convey, but the contract is not frustrated, so that the purchaser's failure to complete on the due day is a breach for which he is liable in damages.<sup>9</sup> The position is different where the land is sold with vacant possession and is actually requisitioned before completion is due. In such a case

<sup>1</sup> Paine v Meller (1801) 6 Ves. 349; E Johnson & Co (Barbados) Ltd v NSR Ltd [1991] A.C. 400 at 406. The rule is criticised by the Law Commission (see Law Com. No.191, para.4.2), but legislative reform is not recommended in view of the developments described at n.4, below.

<sup>2</sup> This is the test adopted in some of the United States: see Skelly Oil Co v Ashmore, 365 S.W. 2d. 582 (1963); Uniform Vendor and Purchaser Risk Act; Uniform Land Transactions Act, s.2-406. It may seem to be more just, but it is also less convenient, than the English rule.

<sup>3</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.47 (above, p.667).

<sup>4</sup> Law Society's Standard Conditions of Sale (1992) Conditions 5.1.1 to 5.1.4.

<sup>5</sup> See above, p.871.

<sup>6</sup> Wong Lai Ying v Chinachem Investment Co (1979) 13 Build. L.R. 81.

<sup>7</sup> Hillingdon Estates Co v Stonefield Estate Co [1952] Ch. 627. The mere making of such an order does not affect ownership of the land.

<sup>8</sup> See above, p.895.

<sup>9</sup> E Johnson Co (Barbados) Ltd v NSR Ltd [1997] A.C. 400.

it has been held, not only that the vendor cannot specifically enforce the contract<sup>10</sup> (since he cannot perform his obligation to give possession on the due date), but also that the purchaser can get back his deposit.<sup>11</sup> It must follow from this reasoning that the purchaser will not be liable in damages.

8. Fact or Law

The question whether frustration is a matter of fact or law used to be important in determining the respective functions of judge and jury. Trial by jury is now rare in civil cases; but the question whether frustration is a matter of fact or law is still important in determining whether a court can control an arbitrator's finding. Such a finding is generally conclusive on matters of fact,<sup>12</sup> but does not bind the court when determining appeals from arbitrators on points of law.

The point is illustrated by the Suez cases where such questions as the greater length and cost of a voyage round the Cape of Good Hope and its physical effect on the ship or the goods were clearly questions of fact. In the Tsakiroglou case<sup>13</sup> the arbitrator found, in general terms, that performance of the contract by shipping via the Cape was "not commercially or fundamentally different from" performance by shipping via Suez. The House of Lords agreed with this finding, but added that it did not bind the court as the question whether the difference was fundamental was one of law<sup>14</sup> or one of mixed law and fact.<sup>15</sup>

In Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd<sup>16</sup> the jury found that the delay caused by the stranding of the ship was "so long as to put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation"; and Bramwell B. described this finding as "all-important".<sup>17</sup> One possible distinction between this attitude and that of the House of Lords in the Tsakiroglou case is that the jury's finding related to the effect of a specific factor (delay) on the contract, whereas the arbitrator's findings were in general terms.<sup>18</sup> But a better distinction is that the relations between judge and jury differ from those between court and arbitrator. The question of frustration depends on the inference to be drawn from primary facts, i.e., from proved or admitted physical circumstances. The drawing of similar inferences was often left to juries, and for some purposes these inferences are called facts, or secondary facts.<sup>19</sup> But inferences of this sort are not treated as "facts" for the purpose of limiting the appellate or supervisory function of the court over lower tribunals. Thus when issues of negligence were left to juries, they might have been thought of as issues of fact. But appeals lie from findings of negligence made by courts whose decisions are subject to appeals only on points of law<sup>20</sup>; and the same is true of issues of frustration.

<sup>10</sup> Cook v Taylor [1942] Ch. 349.

<sup>11</sup> James Macara Ltd v Barclays Bank Ltd [1945] K.B. 148.

<sup>12</sup> See, e.g. Universal Petroleum Co Ltd v Handels und Transport Gesellschaft mbH [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 517.

<sup>13</sup> [1962] A.C. 93.

<sup>14</sup> cf. Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois and John Power Sons & Co [1920] 1 K.B. 168; Court Line Ltd v Dant Russell Inc [1939] 3 All E.R. 314 at 316; The Captain George K [1970] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 21; Peter Lind & Co Ltd v Constable Hart & Co Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 248 at 253; The Wenjiang [1982] 2 All E.R. 437; The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 400 at 402.

<sup>15</sup> [1962] A.C. at 116 at 123. The Chrysalis [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1469 at 1475.

<sup>16</sup> (1874) L.R. 10 C.P. 125, above, p.873.

<sup>17</sup> At 141.

<sup>18</sup> Tsakiroglou case above, n.13, at 130.

<sup>19</sup> See Benmax v Austin Motor Co Ltd [1955] A.C. 370; National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 688; The Adelfa [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 466 at 471.

<sup>20</sup> Goodhart, 74 L.Q.R. 402.

It does not follow from the description of the issue of frustration as one of law that the court will substitute its own view for that taken by an arbitrator merely because it disagrees with his conclusion. It will do so only if the arbitrator has applied the wrong legal test or, while purporting to apply the correct test, has reached a conclusion which no reasonable person would have reached on the primary facts as found.<sup>21</sup>

SECTION 3. LIMITATIONS

Even if an event occurs which would normally frustrate a contract under the rules so far considered, the doctrine of frustration may be excluded if the contract provides for the event; if the event was foreseen or foreseeable; or if it was due to the "fault" of one of the parties.

1. Contractual Provision for the Event

(1) In general

The object of the doctrine of frustration is to find a satisfactory way of allocating the risk of supervening events. There is, however, nothing to prevent the parties from making their own provisions for this purpose. Thus they can expressly provide that the risk of supervening events shall be borne by one of them and not by the other<sup>22</sup> or they can apportion it or deal with it in various other ways.<sup>23</sup> Such provisions exclude frustration<sup>24</sup>; and the same is true of an express term which, though it does not precisely cover the supervening event, shows that the parties had contemplated it and allocated the risk of its occurrence.<sup>25</sup>

A provision that excludes frustration may also be implied: for example, where the nature of the contract makes it clear that the parties intended the risk of supervening events to lie where it falls. In Larrinaga & Co v Société Franco-Américaine des Phosphates de Médulla<sup>26</sup> a contract was made in 1913 for the carriage of six cargoes of phosphates between March 1918 and November 1920. After the end of the First World War, the carriers argued that the contract was frustrated because of the altered shipping conditions then prevailing. The argument was rejected by the House of Lords. A contract of this kind, not to be performed for many years, was essentially speculative,<sup>27</sup> since each party had consciously taken the risk that conditions might alter. An implied agreement to exclude frustration may also be based on other characteristics of a transaction. In The Maira (No.2) agents had undertaken to manage a ship which was subsequently lost. It was held that this did not frustrate the management contract since the parties could hardly have intended "that the managers should be entitled to wash their hands of all duties concerning the vessel as soon as [it] was lost<sup>28</sup>:" they would be expected to attend to such matters as the repatriation of the crew and the settlement of claims arising out

<sup>21</sup> The Nema [1982] A.C. 724 (disapproving on this point The Angelia [1973] 1 W.L.R. 210); The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 400; The Chrysalis [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1469 at 1475; The Safer [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 637.

<sup>22</sup> Budgett v Binnington & Co [1891] 1 Q.B. 35 at 41; This v Byers (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 244. For an extreme case of this kind, see Claude Neon Ltd v Hardie [1970] Qd.Rep. 93.

<sup>23</sup> e.g. by provisions of the type mentioned at p.869, above, or by provisions for flexible pricing (above, p.884), as in Wates Ltd v GLC (1983) 25 Build. L.R. 1.

<sup>24</sup> Joseph Constantine SS Line Ltd v Imperial Smelting Corp Ltd [1942] A.C. 154 at 163; The Safer [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 637.

<sup>25</sup> Bangladesh Export Import Co Ltd v Sucden Kerry SA [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1.

<sup>26</sup> (1923) 92 L.J.K.B. 455.

<sup>27</sup> cf. above, p.2.

<sup>28</sup> [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 300 at 311, affirmed on other grounds [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 12.

of the loss. It is finally possible for legislation to provide for the implication of a term which excludes frustration.<sup>29</sup>

The general rule that frustration can be excluded by provision for the supervening event is not seriously disputed<sup>30</sup>; but the rule is subject to a number of qualifications.

(2) Qualifications

(a) TRADING WITH THE ENEMY. A contract may be frustrated by supervening illegality on the ground that it involves trading with the enemy; and such frustration is not excluded by a contrary provision in the contract. In Ertel Bieber & Co v Rio Tinto Co Ltd<sup>31</sup> an English company contracted to deliver copper ore to a German company from 1911 to 1919. It was held that the contract was wholly frustrated on the outbreak of war in 1914 even though it provided that, in the event of war, certain obligations should only be suspended; for to give effect to this provision would, for reasons stated earlier in this Chapter, be contrary to public policy.<sup>32</sup> The rule is based on the particular strength of the policy against giving aid to the economy of an enemy in time of war. It does not apply to express provisions which deal with other kinds of supervening illegality, such as prohibition of export. If, for example, a contract provides for a payment to be made in the event of such a prohibition,<sup>33</sup> or for suspension of the contract, followed by its termination if the prohibition is not lifted by the end of a specified period,<sup>34</sup> frustration is effectively excluded. Clauses of this kind are not contrary to public policy<sup>35</sup> since they assume that the prohibition is going to be observed, and since the continuation of the contractual relationship in cases of this kind does not have any tendency to subvert the purpose of the prohibition.

(b) PROVISION NARROWLY CONSTRUED. A clause may be literally wide enough to cover the event, but be held on its true construction not to have this effect. In Metropolitan Water Board v Dick, Kerr & Co<sup>36</sup> contractors agreed in July 1914 to construct a reservoir in six years; in the event of delays "however occasioned", they were to be given an extension of time. In February 1916, the contractors were required by a Government Order to stop work, and to sell their plant. It was held that the contract was frustrated although the events which had happened were literally within the delay clause. That clause was meant to apply to temporary difficulties, such as labour shortages, bad weather, or failure of supplies. It did not "cover the case in which the interruption is of such a character and duration that it vitally and fundamentally changes the conditions of the contract, and could not possibly have been in the contemplation of the parties to the contract when it was made".<sup>37</sup> A fortiori, an express provision in a contract for some

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.872, at n.65.

<sup>30</sup> A dictum in WJ Tatem Ltd v Gamboa [1939] 1 K.B. 132 at 138 suggests the contrary, but is immediately contradicted on the same page and at 139; below, pp.903, 923.

<sup>31</sup> [1918] A.C. 260; such clauses may also be narrowly construed, so as not to refer to war between the countries to which the contracting parties belong: Re Badische Co Ltd [1921] 2 Ch. 331 at 379; cf. Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32.

<sup>32</sup> [1918] A.C. at 286; above, p.888.

<sup>33</sup> e.g. Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd v State Trading Corp of India [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 427.

<sup>34</sup> e.g. in the Tsakiroglou case [1962] A.C. 93 at 95.

<sup>35</sup> Johnson Matthey case, above, at 434.

<sup>36</sup> [1918] A.C. 119; The Penelope [1928] P. 180 (approved, though with some reservations, in The Nema [1982] A.C. 724 at 754); cf. Pacific Phosphate Co Ltd v Empire Trading Co Ltd (1920) 36 T.L.R. 750; Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32 at 40; C Czarnikow Ltd v Centrala Handlu Zagranicznego Rolimpex [1979] A.C. 351; Wong Lai Ying v Chinachem Investment Co (1979) 13 Build. L.R. 81; The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 189; Notcutt v Universal Equipment Co (London) Ltd [1986] 1 W.L.R. 641 at 647; FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301.

<sup>37</sup> [1918] A.C. 119 at 126.

events which might otherwise frustrate it does not exclude the possibility of frustration by other events.<sup>38</sup>

(c) PROVISION INCOMPLETE. A clause may make some provision for the event which happens, but fail to make complete provision for it. In Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co<sup>39</sup> a shipowner was sued for damages for failing to deliver a ship due under a charterparty. He pleaded that the contract was frustrated by the requisition of the ship. The charterer argued that frustration was excluded by two clauses giving him, but not the owner, the option to cancel if the ship was commandeered by the Government or if she was not delivered by April 30, 1915. But the House of Lords held that the charterparty was frustrated. Lord Sumner said that a contract could not be frustrated by a contingency for which it made "full and complete"<sup>40</sup> provision; but he added: "A contingency may be provided for, but not in such terms as to show that the provision is meant to be all the provision for it. A contingency may be provided for, but in such a way as shows that it is provided for only for the purpose of dealing with one of its effects and not with all".<sup>41</sup> Requisition or delay might frustrate the charterparty, but would not necessarily have this effect, e.g. if performance were only delayed by one week. The cancelling clauses entitled the charterer to cancel even if the contract was not frustrated. He could escape liability in that event. It did not follow that the shipowner should remain liable if requisition or delay did amount to frustration.

This principle is further illustrated by Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co<sup>42</sup> where a charterparty provided that the ship should proceed with all possible dispatch (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted) to Newport. On the way there she was so badly damaged that she was not ready for service for eight months. The charterparty was held to be frustrated in spite of the provision excepting dangers and accidents of navigation. One possible explanation is that these words were not intended to cover so long a delay as had actually occurred.<sup>43</sup> But the reason given by the court was that the words of the exception "excuse the shipowner, but give him no right".<sup>44</sup> A delay caused by dangers and accidents of navigation might (but for the exception) have amounted either to a breach or to a frustrating event. The effect of the exception was to prevent the delay from constituting a breach. It did not deal with the effect of such delay as a possible frustrating event, and thus did not rule out frustration. To say that the shipowner is not liable for a delay does not lead necessarily to the conclusion that he can enforce the contract in spite of the delay.

(3) Provision for non-frustrating events

In its practical operation, the doctrine of frustration can give rise to two problems. It can be a source of uncertainty because it is often hard to tell whether the effect of supervening events on the contract is indeed sufficiently serious to discharge it. And it can be a source of hardship because, as a result of its narrow scope, a party may remain bound by a contract in spite of the fact that supervening events have made it substantially more burdensome or less beneficial than he could reasonably have expected. To avoid these

<sup>38</sup> Intertrader S.A. v Lesieur-Tortaux S.A.R.L. [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509 at 515.

<sup>39</sup> [1919] A.C. 435; cf. BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783 at 830 (affirmed [1983] 2 A.C. 352); The Evia [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 334 (affirmed [1983] 1 A.C. 736 at 767).

<sup>40</sup> [1919] A.C. 435 at 455.

<sup>41</sup> ibid. at 456.

<sup>42</sup> (1874) L.R. 10 C.P. 125.

<sup>43</sup> Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co Ltd v Commissioners of Works [1949] 2 K.B. 632 at 665.

<sup>44</sup> At 144. cf. Blane Steamships Ltd v Minister of Transport [1951] 2 K.B. 965, where the words of the charterparty excused the charterer but were held to give him no rights.

difficulties, the contract may provide for discharge on the occurrence of specified events (for example by prohibition of export, or by other events beyond the control of the parties or of one of them)<sup>45</sup> and such a provision may take effect whether or not the effect of the event is such as to frustrate the contract under the general law. Such a clause may either give one of the parties the option to cancel the contract,<sup>46</sup> or provide for its automatic determination.<sup>47</sup> A clause of the latter kind has been described as a “contractual frustration clause”.<sup>48</sup> The point of this description is, however, simply that the effect of the clause resembles that of frustration, in giving rise to automatic discharge.<sup>49</sup> The question whether the clause operates in the events which have happened depends simply on its construction<sup>50</sup> and not on the tests of frustration developed by the general law; and, if the clause does come into operation, the contract is discharged under one of its express terms and not under the general doctrine of frustration.<sup>51</sup>

2. Foreseen and Foreseeable Events<sup>52</sup>

(1) In general

Where the parties can at the time of contracting foresee the risk that a supervening event may interfere with performance, the normal inference is that their contract was made with reference to that risk. If, for example, the event would make performance more expensive for one party, he is likely to increase his charges; if, on the other hand, it would frustrate the other's purpose, he is likely to reduce the amount that he is willing to pay. Having thus allocated the risk by their contract, the parties should not be discharged if the event indeed occurs<sup>53</sup>; the loss caused by the event should lie where it falls. As Vaughan Williams L.J. has said, “The test [of frustration] seems to be whether the event which causes the impossibility was or might have been anticipated . . .”<sup>54</sup> Many other dicta similarly support the view that a contract cannot be frustrated by foreseen or foreseeable events<sup>55</sup>; and in other jurisdictions pleas of frustration have been rejected on

<sup>45</sup> Such a clause is normally construed so as to protect the party relying on it only if he has taken all reasonable steps to avoid the operation of the event or to mitigate its results: see Channel Island Ferries Ltd v Sealink UK Ltd [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 323; The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 196; contrast (on the point of construction) The Morning Star (No.2) [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 383.

<sup>46</sup> e.g. Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1918] A.C. 119.

<sup>47</sup> e.g. in the Tsakiroglou case: [1962] A.C. 93 at 95.

<sup>48</sup> Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVBA [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 at 112.

<sup>49</sup> See below, p.909.

<sup>50</sup> See, e.g. Hoecheong Products Ltd v Cargill Hong Kong Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 584; The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171.

<sup>51</sup> Agrokro AG v Tradigrain SA [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 497 at 504. Hence the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 (below, pp.911–916) will not apply. Nor would such clauses be subject to the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 since they are clauses defining duties rather than exemption clauses (above, pp.248–249). Nor would they normally be open to attack under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (above, p.267) since a term operating only in circumstances beyond control of the party relying on it would not normally be unfair: cf. Sch.2, para.1(g) (“except where there are serious grounds . . .”).

<sup>52</sup> Hall, 4 Legal Studies, 300.

<sup>53</sup> See Comptoir Commercial Anverso v Power, Son & Co [1920] 1 K.B. 868 at 895, 901.

<sup>54</sup> Krell v Henry [1903] 2 K.B. 740 at 752.

<sup>55</sup> Bailey v De Crespigny (1869) 1 L.R. 4 Q.B. 180 at 185; Braemont SS Co Ltd v Andrew Weir (1910) 15 Com. Cas. 101 at 110; Tamplin case [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 424; Bank Line case [1919] A.C. 435 at 458; Re Badische Co Ltd [1921] 2 Ch. 331 at 379; Cricklewood case [1945] A.C. 221 at 228; Fareham case [1956] A.C. 696 at 731; Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 699 at 725; The Hannah Blumenthal [1983] 1 A.C. 854 at 909; Gamerco SA v ICM (Fair Warning) Agency Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1226 at 1231; Bangladesh Export Import Co Ltd v Sucden Kerry SA [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 6; Lloyd v Murphy 153 P. 2d. 47, 50 (1944); cf., in the context of setting aside consent orders in the light of supervening events, S v S [2002] N.L.J. 398.

this ground.<sup>56</sup> There is no English case in which this was the sole ground for rejecting the plea; but it has been held that a party cannot rely, as a ground of frustration, on an event which was, or should have been, foreseen by him but not by the other party. In Walton Harvey Ltd v Walker & Homfrays Ltd<sup>57</sup> the defendants granted the claimants the right to display an advertising sign on the defendants' hotel for seven years. Within this period the hotel was compulsorily acquired, and demolished, by a local authority acting under statutory powers. The defendants were held liable in damages. The contract was not frustrated because the defendants knew, and the claimants did not, of the risk of compulsory acquisition. "They could have provided against that risk, but they did not".<sup>58</sup>

There is thus considerable support both in principle and in the authorities for the view that foresight or foreseeability of the supervening event excludes frustration. Nevertheless, that proposition is subject to a number of significant qualifications.

(2) Qualifications

(a) TRADING WITH THE ENEMY. A contract may be frustrated by supervening illegality resulting from the war-time prohibition against trading with the enemy, in spite of the fact that the war was a foreseeable event. Even an express provision against frustration does not save the contract in such a case<sup>59</sup>; and the policy considerations which justify this rule apply just as strongly where the event was or should have been foreseen. Thus contracts made in the summer of 1939 could be frustrated as a result of the outbreak of war with Germany in September although this event was foreseeable.<sup>60</sup>

(b) DEGREE AND EXTENT OF FORESEEABILITY. The inference that the parties contracted with reference to the event (and so took the risk of its occurrence) can be drawn only if the event was either actually foreseen or if the degree of foreseeability was a very high one. It is not sufficient for the low degree of foreseeability which constitutes the test of remoteness in tort<sup>61</sup> to be satisfied. In this sense, it was no doubt "foreseeable" that King Edward VII (who was 60 years old at the time) might fall ill on the day fixed for his coronation.<sup>62</sup> To support the inference of risk-assumption, the event must be one which any person of ordinary intelligence would regard as likely to occur. Moreover, the event or its consequences must be foreseeable in some detail. It is not sufficient that a delay or some interference with performance can be foreseen if the delay or interference which occurs is wholly different in extent. We have seen that this distinction restricts the scope of express provisions for a supervening event<sup>63</sup>; and there is no reason why it should not equally apply in relation to events alleged to have been foreseeable or foreseen. It is submitted that the points made above as to the degree and extent of foreseeability provide the best explanation for cases, in which it was said that a contract could be frustrated by foreseen or foreseeable events.

<sup>56</sup> Baetjer v New England Alcohol Co, 66 N.E. 2d. 748 (1946); Glidden v Hellenic Lines, 275 F. 2d. 253 at 256 (1960).

<sup>57</sup> [1931] 1 Ch. 274.

<sup>58</sup> ibid. at 282.

<sup>59</sup> See above, p.899.

<sup>60</sup> But see Taylor, The Origins of the Second World War.

<sup>61</sup> See below, p.967.

<sup>62</sup> cf. the express provisions made in some of the contracts for the possibility of postponement: e.g. Victoria Seats Agency v Paget (1902) 19 T.L.R. 16. According to D.N.B., 2d Supp. p.591, "A few days before the date appointed for the great ceremony rumours of the King's ill-health gained currency and were denied."

<sup>63</sup> See above, pp.899-900.

One such case is W. J. Tatem Ltd v Gamboa.<sup>64</sup> During the Spanish Civil War, the defendant, as agent for the Republicans, chartered a ship for 30 days from July 1 "for the evacuation of civil population from North Spain". Hire was to be paid at the rate of £250 per day "until her redelivery to the owners", but was to cease if the ship was "missing". On July 14 the ship was seized by the Nationalists, who kept her until September 7, so that she was not redelivered to the owners till September 11. The charterers had paid hire in advance up to July 31, but the owners claimed further hire from August 1 to September 11. Goddard J. rejected the claim on the ground that the charterparty was frustrated. The actual decision can be justified on the ground that it was not foreseeable that the ship would be detained "not only for the period of her charter but for a long period thereafter".<sup>65</sup> But Goddard J. added that the contract would have been frustrated even if that risk had been foreseen. "If the true foundation of the doctrine [of frustration] is that once the subject-matter of the contract is destroyed or the existence of a certain state of facts has come to an end, the contract is at an end, that result follows whether or not the event causing it was contemplated by the parties".<sup>66</sup> But it is submitted that a contract is not necessarily at an end if the existence of a certain state of facts has come to an end; for the parties may have been engaged in a deliberate speculation on this point.<sup>67</sup> A similar objection applies to the more recent suggestion<sup>68</sup> that an event can frustrate a contract, even though it "was or ought to have been foreseen", if it was "outside the scope of the contract on its true construction". It is submitted that it would be wrong first to construe the contract and then to have regard to the fact that the event was foreseen; for that fact must be of crucial importance in determining "the scope of the contract", i.e. whether the parties took the risk of the occurrence of the event. Where they actually foresaw the event, the more natural inference is that each of them took that risk unless the contract expressly protected him. In WJ Tatem Ltd v Gamboa the contract did not expressly protect the defendant from liability if the ship were seized and detained. The inference that he accepted the risk of these events (to the extent to which they were foreseen<sup>69</sup>) is strengthened by the fact that the contract did expressly protect him against another foreseen risk, namely, that the ship might be lost; in that event his liability to pay hire was to cease.<sup>70</sup>

Another such case is The Eugenia.<sup>71</sup> In September 1956, the defendants wished to charter the owners' ship to carry iron goods from Russian Black Sea ports to India. At that time "mercantile men realised that there was a risk that the Suez Canal might be closed"<sup>72</sup> because of the Suez crisis. The agents of the parties appreciated this risk and each made a suggestion for dealing with it.<sup>73</sup> But when the charterparty was concluded on September 19, nothing was expressly said about the risk of closure. The reason may be that before November 16 "mercantile men would not have formed any conclusion as to whether the obstructions in the Canal were other than temporary".<sup>74</sup> The actual decision was that the contract was not frustrated by the closure of the Canal on October

<sup>64</sup> [1939] 1 K.B. 132.

<sup>65</sup> ibid. at 135.

<sup>66</sup> ibid. at 138; cf. The Captain George K [1970] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 21 at 31.

<sup>67</sup> cf. above, pp.2, 898.

<sup>68</sup> Nile Co for the Export of Agriculture Crops v H & JM Bennett (Commodities) Ltd [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 555 at 582.

<sup>69</sup> See above, at n.65.

<sup>70</sup> The shipowners may have found it easier to insure against loss than against detention and have distinguished for this reason between the effect of the two events.

<sup>71</sup> [1964] 2 Q.B. 226.

<sup>72</sup> [1963] 2 Lloyd's Rep. at 159. The facts are more fully stated in this report.

<sup>73</sup> ibid.

<sup>74</sup> ibid. at 162.

31, resulting in the detention of the ship: the charterers could not rely on the detention as it was due to their prior breach of contract and thus "self-induced"<sup>75</sup>; nor on the extra length of the voyage as the difference between a voyage via the Canal and one via the Cape was not sufficiently fundamental.<sup>76</sup> But Lord Denning M.R. also seemed to reject the further argument that frustration might have been excluded on the ground that at the time of contracting the closure of the Canal was foreseeable. He said: "It has often been said that the doctrine of frustration only applies where the new situation is 'unforeseen' or 'unexpected' or 'uncontemplated' as if that were an essential feature. But it is not so. The only thing that is essential is that [the parties] should have made no provision for it in the contract".<sup>77</sup> But these remarks are obiter and it is respectfully submitted that this aspect of the decision can be explained on other grounds. At the time of contracting, the risk of the Canal's being closed for a very considerable time was not foreseen; nor was it foreseeable on the high standard of foreseeability<sup>78</sup> required to exclude frustration. To the extent that the parties did foresee the risk, they seem to have allocated it by the terms of the charterparty. This provided that the voyage was to be paid for by the time it took,<sup>79</sup> so indicating an intention to throw the risk of delay on the charterers. There seems to be no reason why the court should, by applying the doctrine of frustration to foreseen events, reverse such an allocation of risks deliberately made by the contracting parties.

(c) CONTRARY INDICATIONS. The inference that the parties have assumed the risk of foreseen (or readily foreseeable) events is only a prima facie one and can be excluded by evidence of contrary intention. The parties may foresee an event and intend, if it occurs, "to leave the lawyers to sort it out"<sup>80</sup>; or they may actually provide that if the event occurs they will then determine how it is to affect the contract.<sup>81</sup> If the lawyers cannot "sort it out" or if the parties cannot reach agreement, the contract may then be frustrated even though the event was foreseen.

Similar reasoning explains Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel Ltd<sup>82</sup> where a charterparty was frustrated although the parties foresaw that the ship might be requisitioned and actually made some provision for this event. But it is by no means clear that the parties foresaw a requisition of such long duration as would frustrate the contract. Even if they did foresee this, the very fact that they had made some provision for the event complicated the issue. The contract entitled the charterer to cancel on requisition (so that the risk of the event was clearly not meant to be on him); but it made no reference to the effect of requisition on the liability of the owner. One could infer from this silence that the parties had decided to throw the risk of requisition on him, or that they had not thought about its effect on his liability at all. If the latter inference is correct, the contract could be frustrated although requisition was foreseen, and the House of Lords so held. The normal inference that parties take the risk of foreseen events was displaced by the special terms of the contract.

<sup>75</sup> See below, p.905.

<sup>76</sup> See above, p.880.

<sup>77</sup> [1964] 2 Q.B. at 239; cf. Transatlantic Finance Corp v US 363 F.2d. 312 at 318 (1966); Opera Co of Boston v Wolf Trap Foundation for the Performing Arts 817 F.2d. 1094 at 1101-1102 (1986).

<sup>78</sup> See above, p.902.

<sup>79</sup> The contract was in the form of a "time charter trip" which has become common: see The Cebu [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 302 at 305.

<sup>80</sup> The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226 at 234.

<sup>81</sup> Autry v Republic Productions 180 P.2d. 888 (1947).

<sup>82</sup> [1919] A.C. 435; above, p.900.

3. Self-induced Frustration

A party cannot rely on "self-induced frustration",<sup>83</sup> that is, on frustration due to his own conduct or to the conduct of those for whom he is responsible.<sup>84</sup>

(1) Events brought about by one party's conduct

The doctrine of frustration obviously does not protect a party whose own breach of contract actually is, or brings about, the frustrating event. Nor does it protect him if the breach is only one of the factors leading to frustration. Thus a charterer who in breach of contract orders a ship into a war-zone, so that she is detained, cannot rely on the detention as a ground of frustration.<sup>85</sup> Similarly, unseaworthiness amounting to a breach of contract may cause delays in the prosecution of the voyage; and if war intervenes, so that the voyage cannot be completed, the carrier will be liable in damages<sup>86</sup>; such cases show that even an omission (i.e. failure to make the ship seaworthy) can sometimes exclude frustration.<sup>87</sup> The doctrine likewise does not apply where the circumstances alleged to have brought it into operation result partly from the breach of one party and partly from that of the other, e.g. where both breaches contribute to an allegedly frustrating delay.<sup>88</sup>

Where the allegedly frustrating event results from one party's deliberate act, that party cannot rely on it as a ground of frustration, even though the act is not in itself a breach of the contract<sup>89</sup>; but the other party may be able to rely on it for this purpose. Thus where an employee has been prevented from performing the agreed work because he has been imprisoned for a criminal offence, the employer can rely on this circumstance as a ground of frustration, so as to defeat a claim by the employee for unfair dismissal; and he can do this even though the offence had no connection with the employment, so that its mere commission did not amount to a breach of the contract.<sup>90</sup> But an attempt by the employee to set up the imprisonment as a ground of frustration,

<sup>83</sup> Bank Line case, above, n.82, at p.452; Sudbrook Trading Estate Ltd v Eggleton [1983] 1 A.C. 444 at 497; Swanton, 2 J.C.L. 699.

<sup>84</sup> Frustration is not self-induced where the cause of the delay is the act of a third party for whom the defendant is not responsible: see The Adelfa [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 466, 471; nor merely because one of the parties is an enterprise controlled by a State which has by some legislative or executive act prevented performance of the contract or made it illegal: C Czarnikow Ltd v Centrala Handlu Zagranicznego "Rolimpex" [1979] A.C. 351 at 372; The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 192.

<sup>85</sup> The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226; The Lucille [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 244; cf. Mertens v Home Freeholds Co [1921] 2 K.B. 526.

<sup>86</sup> See Monarch SS Co v A/B Karlshamn Oljefabriker [1949] A.C. 196. The position is different where the breach has no causal connection with the frustrating event: The Silver Sky [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 95 at 98.

<sup>87</sup> cf. Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v John Walker & Sons Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 164 (failure to take any steps to obtain planning permission).

<sup>88</sup> The Hannah Blumenthal [1983] 1 A.C. 854, rejecting suggestions in The Splendid Sun [1981] Q.B. 694 at 703, The Argonaut [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 214 at 221, and The Kehera [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 29 that there could be frustration "by mutual default." In The Hannah Blumenthal the plea of frustration failed on the further ground that the delay did not produce a radically different state of affairs; cf., on this point, Stockport MBC v O'Reilly [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 70. And see above, p.10 for a statutory solution of the problem which arose in The Hannah Blumenthal.

<sup>89</sup> Denmark Production Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 699; Black Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 446 at 457.

<sup>90</sup> Harrington v Kent CC [1980] I.R.L.R. 353; FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301; Hare v Murphy Bros [1974] I.C.R. 603 at 607; contra Norris v Southampton CC [1982] I.C.R. 177. Whether the imprisonment actually frustrates the contract depends on such circumstances as the length of the sentence and the nature of the employment: see Chakki v United Yeast Ltd [1982] I.C.R. 140 and FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom, above.

in an action against him by the employer on the contract, would fail<sup>91</sup> on the ground that the employee could not rely on self-induced frustration.

(2) Negligence

Lord Simon has put the case of a prima donna who failed to perform a contract because she had lost her voice through carelessly catching cold. He seemed to incline to the view that she could rely on frustration so long as the incapacity "was not deliberately induced in order to get out of the engagement".<sup>92</sup> This result can perhaps be justified by the difficulty of foreseeing the effect of conduct on one's health.<sup>93</sup> But it is submitted that generally negligence should exclude frustration: for example, the plea should have failed in Taylor v Caldwell<sup>94</sup> if the fire had been due to the negligence of the defendants, for in such a case it would be unjust to make the other party bear the loss. Similarly, a shipowner cannot rely on the loss of his ship as a ground of frustration of a contract to carry goods in her if the loss is due to his negligence.<sup>95</sup> These examples show that "negligence" in this context is not restricted to "breach of an actionable legal duty": it includes "an event which the party relying on it had means and opportunity to prevent but nevertheless caused or permitted to come about".<sup>96</sup>

(3) Choosing between several contracts

Where a party has entered into a number of contracts, supervening events may deprive him of the power of performing them all, without depriving him of the power of performing one or some of them. He may then claim that one or more of the contracts are frustrated because the supervening event was one for which he was not responsible; but in two cases such claims have failed.

The first is Maritime National Fish Ltd v Ocean Trawlers Ltd,<sup>97</sup> where the defendants operated a fleet of five trawlers for fishing with otter trawls. Three of the trawlers were owned by the defendants through their subsidiaries,<sup>98</sup> while two, of which one was the St Cuthbert, were chartered from other owners. The use of otter trawls without licence was illegal, and because of a change in government policy<sup>99</sup> the defendants secured only three out of the five licences for which they had applied. Having allocated two of these to two of their own trawlers and one to the other chartered trawler,<sup>1</sup> they argued that the charter of the St Cuthbert had been frustrated. The argument was rejected by the Canadian courts on the ground that the defendants had taken the risk of not getting licences for all five trawlers, the licensing requirement being known both to them and to the owners of the St Cuthbert at the time of contracting. The Privy Council, though not dissenting from this view, preferred to base its decision on the ground that frustration was self-induced: "it was the act and election of [the defendants] which prevented the

<sup>91</sup> cf. Sumnall v Stott (1984) 49 P. & C.R. 367 (imprisonment of tenant no excuse for failing to perform covenant to "reside constantly" at farmhouse).

<sup>92</sup> Joseph Constantine SS Co v Imperial Smelting Corp Ltd [1942] A.C. 154 at 166–167.

<sup>93</sup> Restatement 2d, Contracts, §262 Comment (a).

<sup>94</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826. Lack of "fault" is mentioned in the passage at 833 quoted at p.867, above.

<sup>95</sup> See The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1.

<sup>96</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 10.

<sup>97</sup> [1935] A.C. 524.

<sup>98</sup> See [1934] 1 D.L.R. 621 at 623; [1934] 4 D.L.R. 288 at 299.

<sup>99</sup> See above, p.889.

<sup>1</sup> See the references in n.98, above.

St Cuthbert from being licensed for fishing with an otter trawl".<sup>2</sup> On the facts, there clearly was such an election, for the defendants could have allocated one of the three licences to the St Cuthbert rather than to one of their own trawlers. But suppose that the defendants had operated only the two chartered trawlers, had obtained only one licence, and that the licensing requirement had been introduced after both charterparties were concluded. The question would then have arisen whether their choice to allocate their only licence to one of the trawlers would have been an "election", so as to exclude the doctrine of frustration in relation to the charter of the other.

An affirmative answer to a similar question was given in The Super Servant Two,<sup>3</sup> where a contract was made to carry the claimants' drilling rig in one of two ships, the Super Servant One or the Super Servant Two, at the carrier's option. The Super Servant Two was lost and the carrier claimed that the contract was frustrated by this event because the Super Servant One was the subject of another fixture and hence not available for the purposes of performing the carrier's contract with the claimants. The argument was rejected on the ground that the carrier's decision to use the Super Servant One for the purpose of performing the other contract amounted to an "election" by him, thus precluding his reliance on the loss of the Super Servant Two as a ground of frustration, even if that loss was in no way due to his fault. Three grounds for the decision appear from the judgments but it is submitted with great respect that none of them is wholly convincing. First, it was said that the Maritime National Fish case had established that a party could not rely on frustration where his failure or inability was due to his "election"; and that the Court in The Super Servant Two should follow that decision.<sup>4</sup> It is, however, submitted that the two cases are readily distinguishable: in the Maritime National Fish case it was possible for the charterer to perform all the contracts which he had made with the owners of the other trawlers, even though only three licences had been allocated to him; while in The Super Servant Two it was no longer possible, after the loss of the ship, for the carrier to perform all the contracts which he had made to carry drilling rigs during the period in question. Secondly, it was said that, if the carrier were given the choice which of the contracts he would perform, frustration of the other or others could come about only as a result of the exercise of that choice, and such a position would be inconsistent with the rule that frustration occurs automatically, without any election by either party.<sup>5</sup> Again, it is submitted that this line of reasoning is not conclusive since the rule that frustration operates automatically is subject to qualification precisely in cases of allegedly self-induced frustration<sup>6</sup>: we have seen, for example, that the imprisonment of an employee is a circumstance on which the employer, but not the employee, can rely as a ground of discharge,<sup>7</sup> so that discharge cannot in such cases be described as automatic. Even where the rule that frustration operates automatically does apply, we shall see that this rule forms one of the least attractive aspects of the doctrine of frustration,<sup>8</sup> so that it is one which should not be extended. Moreover, the element of "election" could be eliminated if the question which of the contracts was to be discharged were left to be determined, not by the free choice of the promisor, but by a rule of law: e.g. by a rule to the effect that the various contracts

<sup>2</sup> [1935] A.C. 524 at 529.

<sup>3</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1, affirming [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 148; McKendrick [1990] L.M.C.L.Q. 153.

<sup>4</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 10, 13 (rejecting the contrary submission made in earlier editions of this book).

<sup>5</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 9, 14.

<sup>6</sup> See below, p.910.

<sup>7</sup> Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301, discussed at p.905, above.

<sup>8</sup> See below, pp.909-910.

should for this purpose rank in the order in which they were made.<sup>9</sup> It may, from this point of view, be relevant that, in The Super Servant Two, some of the contracts which the carrier chose to perform (by the use of his other ship during the relevant period) had not been made "at any rate finally"<sup>10</sup> until after the contract with the claimants, and that, even after the loss of the Super Servant Two, the carrier had continued to negotiate for extra fees to be paid under one of those contracts, "before finally allocating the Super Servant One to the performance of these contracts".<sup>11</sup> The third reason given for the decision is that "It is within the promisor's own control how many contracts he enters into and the risk should be his".<sup>12</sup> But this point seems to undermine the whole basis of the doctrine of frustration: it has just as much force where the promisor enters into a single contract as where he enters into two or more, with different contracting parties. This, indeed, is the fundamental objection to the reasoning of The Super Servant Two, and it is submitted that the rationale of the doctrine should lead to discharge of some of the contracts where the supervening event (which makes it impossible to perform them all) occurs without the fault of the party claiming discharge.<sup>13</sup> Consistency with the reasoning of the Maritime National Fish case could be preserved by holding that which contracts were to be discharged should depend, not on the election of the party who can no longer perform, but on a rule of law. On this view, the actual decision in The Super Servant Two could be justified by reference to the order in which the various contracts with the carrier were made.

(4) Burden of proof

The onus of proving that frustration is self-induced is on the party who alleges that this is the case. In Joseph Constantine SS Line v Imperial Smelting Corp Ltd<sup>14</sup> a ship was disabled by an explosion so that her owners were prevented from performing their obligations under a charterparty. The charterers' claim for damages was rejected: the House of Lords held that the shipowners were discharged by frustration without having to disprove fault and in spite of the fact that the cause of the explosion was never explained. A possible objection to the rule is that the charterers were much less likely than the owners to be able to show how the explosion occurred. This reasoning does, indeed, prevail in one group of cases: a person to whom goods have been bailed, and who seeks to rely on their destruction as a ground of frustration of the contract of bailment, must show that the destruction was not due to any breach of his duty as a bailee.<sup>15</sup> But, this special situation excepted, the rule as to burden of proof laid down in the Joseph Constantine case, can be defended on the ground that, more often than not, catastrophic events which prevent performance do occur without the fault of either party. To impose the burden of disproving fault on the party relying on frustration is therefore less likely than the converse rule to lead to the right result in the majority of cases.

<sup>9</sup> cf. above, p.878.

<sup>10</sup> [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 9.

<sup>11</sup> ibid. at 13.

<sup>12</sup> [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 148 at 158 (at first instance); the reasoning of this judgment was approved on appeal in [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1.

<sup>13</sup> cf. Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Continental Grain Co [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 269 at 292-293; the treatment of the 92 tonnes in Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem PVB.A [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 at 115; and see above, p.878.

<sup>14</sup> [1942] A.C. 154; Stone, 60 L.Q.R. 262. A contrary dictum in FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301 at 319 seems to have been made per incuriam.

<sup>15</sup> The Torrenia [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 210 at 216.

SECTION 4. EFFECTS OF FRUSTRATION<sup>16</sup>

1. General

Frustration terminates a contract automatically at the time of the frustrating event.<sup>17</sup> The court may therefore hold that the contract was frustrated even though the parties for some time after the event went on behaving as if the contract still existed.<sup>18</sup> “Whatever the consequences of the frustration may be upon the conduct of the parties, its legal effect does not depend on their opinions, or even knowledge, as to the event”.<sup>19</sup> Accordingly, “what the parties may say or do” has been described as “only evidence, and not necessarily weighty evidence, of the view to be taken of the event by informed and experienced minds”.<sup>20</sup> This does not mean that the courts disregard the views of the parties as to the effect of the event: thus in one case Lord Sumner said: “Both [parties] thought its result was to terminate their contractual relations . . . and as they must have known more about it than I do there is no reason why I should not think so too”.<sup>21</sup> The true position is that “the parties’ beliefs are not determinative, but nor are they irrelevant”.<sup>22</sup>

As frustration operates automatically, it is generally thought to terminate the contract without any election by either party: in this respect it differs from breach, which enables the victim to choose whether to treat the contract as discharged.<sup>23</sup> It follows that frustration can be invoked by either party, and not only by the party likely to be adversely affected by the frustrating event. Suppose, for example, that a ship under charter is requisitioned so that the charterer does not receive the promised performance (i.e., the services of the ship). Frustration may, paradoxically be claimed by the shipowner, even though the charterer is perfectly willing to pay the agreed hire<sup>24</sup>; for if the compensation paid by the Government for the requisition exceeds that hire, the shipowner will actually profit from frustration. The courts are understandably reluctant to allow the doctrine of frustration to be used in this way. Thus the rejection of the plea of frustration in the Tamplin<sup>25</sup> case has been explained precisely on the ground that the House of Lords saw no good reason why the shipowner should be allowed to make a profit of the kind just described.<sup>26</sup> It seems that the seller in the Tsakiroglou<sup>27</sup> case would have made a similar profit if his plea of frustration had been upheld, for the market price of the goods had risen by more than the extra cost of carriage via the Cape of Good Hope<sup>28</sup>; and this fact may have had some influence on the decision that the contract remained in force. But

<sup>16</sup> Williams, The Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943.

<sup>17</sup> Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue SS Co Ltd [1926] A.C. 497 at 505; BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783 at 809 (affirmed [1983] 2 A.C. 352); The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 1 at 8, 9, 14.

<sup>18</sup> cf. The Agathon [1982] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 211 at 213; GF Sharp & Co v McMillan [1998] 1 R.L.R. 632.

<sup>19</sup> Hirji Mulji case, above, at 509; cf. Morgan v Manser [1948] 1 K.B. 184 at 191.

<sup>20</sup> Hirji Mulji case, above.

<sup>21</sup> Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] A.C. 435 at 460. See also Black Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 446 at 457 where the fact that a party had “affirmed the contract” was said to exclude frustration.

<sup>22</sup> The Wenjiang (No.2) [1983] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 400 at 408.

<sup>23</sup> FC Shepherd Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301 at 327.

<sup>24</sup> e.g. Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] A.C. 435.

<sup>25</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397; above, p.874.

<sup>26</sup> Metropolitan Water Board v Dick Kerr & Co [1918] A.C. 119 at 129; cf. also Port Line Ltd v Ben Line Steamers Ltd [1958] 2 Q.B. 146.

<sup>27</sup> [1962] A.C. 93; above, p.879.

<sup>28</sup> Shortly after the end of the shipment period, the market price of the goods had risen by £18 15s. per ton above the contract price, while the cost of shipment via the Cape was only £7 10s. per ton more than the cost of shipment via Suez.

in other cases the rule of automatic termination has, no doubt, enabled a party to profit from frustration.<sup>29</sup> It is doubtful whether such a result is necessary, and it might be better if frustration only gave an option to terminate to any party who is prejudiced by the supervening event in the sense of not receiving the now impossible performance (or, in cases of frustration of purpose, of not being able to use the subject-matter for its intended purpose). There is, indeed, some support for this view in the cases relating to self-induced frustration. Where an event is brought about by the deliberate act of one party (not amounting in itself to a breach), that party cannot rely on it as frustrating the contract; but the other party may be able so to rely on it. This is, for example, the position where an employee is imprisoned for a criminal offence and so unable to perform his part of a contract of employment. The employer can invoke frustration in such circumstances<sup>30</sup>; but the employee cannot do so since a party cannot rely on self-induced frustration.<sup>31</sup>

2. Problems of Adjustment<sup>32</sup>

The common law starts with the principle that frustration discharges the parties only from duties of "future performance".<sup>33</sup> Rights accrued before frustration therefore remain enforceable while those which would, but for the frustrating event, have accrued after the time of discharge do not become due. These rules sometimes caused hardship which has been mitigated both by common law developments and by statute.

(1) Rights accrued before frustration

(a) COMMON LAW. The rule that rights which had accrued before frustration remain enforceable can be illustrated by supposing that in Taylor v Caldwell<sup>34</sup> the fire had occurred after the first, but before the second, of the four specified days. The rest of the contract would then have been discharged, while each party would have remained liable for any failure to perform obligations which had fallen due on the first day. But the application of this principle could lead to injustice where one party's performance under the contract had become due before the frustrating event while that of the other was only to be rendered thereafter; for in such a case the former party would have still to perform, without getting what he had bargained for in return. For example, in Chandler v Webster<sup>35</sup> a contract for the hire of a room overlooking the proposed route of King Edward VII's coronation processions provided for payment of £141 15s. in advance: this was due, and £100 of it had been paid, before the day on which the processions were cancelled. The hirer was held liable to pay the remaining £41 15s. as the payment had fallen due before the contract was frustrated; while his claim to recover back the £100 already paid on the ground of "total failure of consideration"<sup>36</sup> was rejected<sup>37</sup>: it was

<sup>29</sup> A striking illustration is The Isle of Mull, 278 F. 131 (1921); cf. also Nickoll & Knight v Ashton Edridge & Co [1901] 2 K.B. 126 (above, p.879) where the market price of the goods rose above the contract price so that the seller seems to have made a profit out of frustration.

<sup>30</sup> FC Shepherd & Co v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301; above, p.905.

<sup>31</sup> ibid.

<sup>32</sup> Stewart and Carter [1992] C.I.J. 66.

<sup>33</sup> Joseph Constantine case [1942] A.C. 154 at 187; cf. The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 18 ("further liability").

<sup>34</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826, above, p.866.

<sup>35</sup> [1904] 1 K.B. 493; cf. Buckland, 46 Harv.L.Rev. 1281.

<sup>36</sup> See below, p.1049.

<sup>37</sup> cf. Blakeley v Muller & Co [1903] 2 K.B. 760 n. (referred to in The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 869 at [65], [76] under its alternative name of Hobson v Pattenden & Co); Civil Service Co-operative Society v General Steam Navigation Co [1903] 2 K.B. 756.

thought that the failure of consideration was not total as frustration released the parties only from further performance, and did not make the contract void ab initio. But this aspect of Chandler v Webster was overruled in the Fibrosa case.<sup>38</sup> An English company had agreed to sell machinery to a Polish company for £4,800, of which £1,600 was to be paid in advance. When £1,000 had been paid, the contract was frustrated by the German occupation of Gdynia after the outbreak of war in 1939. The House of Lords held that the Polish company could recover back the £1,000 since the consideration for the payment had wholly failed: no part of the machinery had been delivered. Liability to pay the outstanding £600 must likewise have been discharged, for it would have been futile to require the buyer to make a payment which he would then immediately have been entitled to recover.<sup>39</sup>

But this solution was defective in two ways. First, it applied only where the consideration had wholly failed.<sup>40</sup> In Whincup v Hughes<sup>41</sup> a father apprenticed his son to a watchmaker for six years at a premium of £25. After one year the watchmaker died. The father could not recover back any part of the premium as the failure of consideration was only partial. Secondly, to allow the payor to recover back the whole of his advance payment might in turn cause injustice to the payee, who might (and in the Fibrosa case did) use the advance payment to finance the initial stages of the contract. If, in consequence of frustration, that expenditure was wasted, the resulting loss would fall entirely on the payee.

(b) STATUTE. To remedy the defects just described, s.1(2) of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 lays down three rules:

(i) Sums payable. All sums payable under the contract before the time of discharge cease to be payable on frustration: thus in Chandler v Webster the claim for the unpaid £41 15s. would now fail.

(ii) Sums actually paid. All sums actually paid in pursuance of the contract before the time of discharge are recoverable from the payee “as money received by him to the use of the” payor. As the subsection does not refer to “total failure of consideration”, this statutory right to recover back money arises even where the failure is only partial, for example, in such cases as Whincup v Hughes.

(iii) Expenses. If the party to whom sums were paid or payable in pursuance of the contract has before the time of discharge incurred expenses in or for the purpose of the performance of the contract, the court may allow him to retain or recover the whole or any part of the sums so paid or payable; but the court cannot allow him to retain or recover more than the actual amount of his expenses. The court can make an award in respect of expenses under s.1(2) only if the contract contains a stipulation for prepayment; a party who incurs expenses without asking for a prepayment, or who incurs greater expenses than the amount of the prepayment, does so at his own risk.<sup>42</sup>

The court is not bound to make any award in respect of expenses and has a discretion as to the amount of the award. This discretion is subject to two upper limits: the award

<sup>38</sup> Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn, Lawson, Combe, Barbour Ltd [1943] A.C. 32; above, pp.887–888. This point seems to have been overlooked in Re Goldcorp Exchange Ltd [1995] A.C. 74 at 103, where the Privy Council repeats what is in substance the reasoning of Chandler v Webster, without referring either to that case or the Fibrosa case.

<sup>39</sup> cf., in another context, McDonald v Denys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 C.L.R. 457, above, p.850; Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32 at 53.

<sup>40</sup> cf. below, pp.1049–1051.

<sup>41</sup> (1871) L.R. 6 C.P. 78.

<sup>42</sup> An award in respect of expenses can be made under s.1(2) only where a sum of money was paid or payable to the party who has incurred expenses. Where that party has received a “payment in kind” a similar result may be reached under s.1(3)(a): below, p.915.

must not exceed either the amount of the expenses incurred, or the amount of the stipulated prepayment.<sup>43</sup> No doubt in exercising its discretion the court will be influenced by the degree to which the expenses have been made useless by the frustrating event. If machinery made for one customer can easily be sold to another, very little will be awarded; if it cannot be disposed of except as scrap, the court is likely to make a substantial award. Even in such a case, however, the court will not necessarily award the maximum amount available under the Act. Suppose that in the Fibrosa case the seller had received a prepayment of £1,600 and had incurred expenses of exactly that amount. Under the common law rule he would have had to pay back the whole £1,600, and this was unjust because it left him to bear the entire loss of the wasted expenditure. If, under the Act, the court were to allow him to retain the whole £1,600, this could be equally unjust as it would leave the buyer to bear the whole of that loss. In the exercise of its discretion under s.1(2) the court could split the loss (instead of merely shifting it from one party to the other) in such proportions as it thought just.<sup>44</sup>

In exercising its discretion under s.1(2), the court can also take account of the fact that expenses have been incurred by the payor. This was the position in Gamerco SA v ICM/Fair Warning (Agency) Ltd,<sup>45</sup> where the promoter of a "rock concert" had made an advance payment to the performers and the contract was then frustrated. Exercising a "broad discretion",<sup>46</sup> the court allowed the promoter to recover the payment in full, without any deduction in respect of expenses incurred by the performers for the purpose of the performance of the contract.<sup>47</sup> It did so on the grounds that the promoter had also incurred expenses which not only exceeded the prepayment<sup>48</sup> but also amounted to about nine times those incurred by the performers,<sup>49</sup> and that each set of expenses had been wholly wasted.

(2) Rights not yet accrued

(a) COMMON LAW. At common law, rights not yet accrued at the time of frustration are unenforceable.<sup>50</sup> If a builder agrees to build a house for £100,000 payable on completion he cannot recover the £100,000 if the contract is frustrated before completion. This rule is perfectly reasonable: it would be unjust to make the building-owner pay the full price for an unfinished house. But, further, at common law the builder could not recover anything at all for partial performance before frustration. He could not recover a quantum meruit as no agreement to pay a proportionate sum for doing part of the work could be implied in the teeth of an express agreement for payment on completion. Thus in Cutter v Powell<sup>51</sup> a seaman whose wages were to become due on completion of a voyage

<sup>43</sup> Proceeds of insurance payable to the claimant by reason of the frustrating events must be disregarded: s.1(5).

<sup>44</sup> s.1(2) refers to "the whole or any part of the sums so paid or payable." Legislation in other jurisdictions provides for equal division of the loss: British Columbia Frustrated Contracts Act 1974, s.5(3); New South Wales Frustrated Contracts Act 1978, s.11(2)(b)(ii) and cf. s.13; South Australian Frustrated Contracts Act 1988, ss.3(3), 7(2)(c); but equal division is not necessarily appropriate in all circumstances: New South Wales Act, above, s.15; South Australian Act, above, s.7(d).

<sup>45</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1226.

<sup>46</sup> ibid. at 1236.

<sup>47</sup> s.1(5), above, also required the court to disregard the fact that both parties had insured against cancellation and received payments under those policies.

<sup>48</sup> The promoter's expenses exceeded $450,000; the prepayment amounted to $412,500.

<sup>49</sup> The performers' expenses appear to have been about $50,000.

<sup>50</sup> The M Vatan [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 416 at 426.

<sup>51</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320.

died during it: his executrix recovered nothing for the services he had rendered. And in Appleby v Myers<sup>52</sup> engineering contractors agreed “to make and erect the whole of the machinery” in the defendant’s factory “and to keep the whole in order for two years from the date of completion”. After part of the machinery had been erected, an accidental fire destroyed the factory with such of the machinery as was already in it, and frustrated the contract. It was held that the contractors could recover nothing for the machinery which they had erected. The general view is that this result is unsatisfactory<sup>53</sup> and that the builder should get something for his work.

(b) STATUTE. The common law rule stated above was modified by s.1(3) of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943, which provides that “Where any party to the contract has, by reason of anything done by any other party thereto in, or for the purpose of, the performance of the contract, obtained a valuable benefit (other than a payment of money to which [s.1(2)] applies) before the time of discharge, there shall be recoverable from him by the said other party such sum (if any), not exceeding the value of the said benefit to the party obtaining it, as the court considers just, having regard to all the circumstances of the case”<sup>54</sup> and in particular to (a) the amount of any expenses incurred by the benefited party before the time of discharge, and (b) “the effect, in relation to the said benefit, of the circumstances giving rise to the frustration of the contract”. Thus if A agrees to decorate B’s house for £2,500 payable on completion but dies after decorating half the house, A’s estate can recover something.

(i) Measure of recovery. The measure of recovery under s.1(3) was the main issue in BP (Exploration) Libya Ltd v Hunt.<sup>55</sup> The case arose out of an elaborate agreement between BP and Mr Hunt for the exploitation of an oil concession in Libya belonging to Mr Hunt. BP were to do all the work of exploration and to provide the necessary finance; they were also to make certain “farm-in” payments in cash and oil. In return, they were to get a half share in the concession; and, as soon as the field began to produce oil, they were to receive “reimbursement oil” (to be taken out of Mr Hunt’s share) until they had recouped 125 per cent of their initial expenditure. A large oil field was discovered and oil began to flow from it in 1967; but in 1971 the contract between BP and Mr Hunt was frustrated when their interests in the concession were expropriated by Libyan decrees. At this time, BP had received only about one-third of the “reimbursement oil” to which they were entitled in respect of their initial expenditure; and they brought a claim under s.1(3) of the 1943 Act. The claim was allowed by Robert Goff J., whose decision was (subject to relatively minor modifications<sup>56</sup>) upheld by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. The learned judge held that, in considering a claim under s.1(3), the court must proceed in two stages: it must first identify and value the benefit obtained, and then assess the just sum (not exceeding the value of the benefit) which it was proper to award. At the first stage, he held that “benefit”, on the true construction of s.1(3), referred, not to the cost of performance incurred by the claimant,

<sup>52</sup> (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 651.

<sup>53</sup> cf. above, pp.819–820 for criticism of the rule that nothing can be recovered for partial performance of an entire obligation. One practical justification for that rule in cases of breach may be that it puts pressure to perform on the party in breach, but that argument cannot apply where performance is prevented by an event for which neither party is responsible.

<sup>54</sup> But not to the proceeds of insurance payable to the claimant by reason of the frustrating event: s.1(5).
<sup>55</sup> [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783; affirmed [1981] 1 W.L.R. 236, [1983] 2 A.C. 352; Baker [1979] C.L.J. 266.

<sup>56</sup> Recovery of a “farm-in” payment of $2m in cash had been allowed under s.1(3) when it plainly should have been allowed under s.1(2): see [1981] 1 W.L.R. 236 at 240; [1983] 2 A.C. 352 at 370; and see below, n.59.

but to the end product received by the other party.<sup>57</sup> In the case before him, that end product was the enhancement of the value of Mr Hunt's share in the concession resulting from BP's work; but because s.1(3)(b) required the court to have regard to "the effect, in relation to the said benefit, of the circumstances giving rise to . . . frustration", the value of that benefit had to be reduced to take account of the expropriation. In view of this fact, the total benefit obtained by Mr Hunt was the net amount of oil he had received from the concession, plus the compensation paid to him by the Libyan government. Of this total, half was attributed to BP's efforts and half to Mr Hunt's original ownership of the concession. The value of this benefit was quantified at some $85m. In assessing the "just sum" to be awarded, however, Robert Goff J. adopted a criterion which he had rejected in valuing the benefit, viz. the cost to BP of the work to the extent that it was done for Mr Hunt. To this was added the value of the "farm in" oil<sup>58</sup> and the resulting total was then reduced by the amount of the reimbursement oil already received by BP. On this basis, the just sum was some $34.67m<sup>59</sup> and, as the valuable benefit exceeded this amount, BP recovered the just sum in full.

(ii) Definition of "valuable benefit". It follows from the definition of valuable benefit as an "end product" that s.1(3) will not apply merely because the claimant has incurred trouble and expense for the purpose of the performance of the contract.<sup>60</sup> On the other hand, there can be a valuable benefit within s.1(3) even though no physical thing has been transferred by the claimant to the defendant. Thus in BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt the services rendered by BP to Mr Hunt constituted at least part of the benefit. In the case of a contract to paint a house, there would similarly be a valuable benefit if the contract was frustrated by illegality after half the work had been done.<sup>61</sup> In such cases the improvement to the defendant's property can be said to be an "end product;" but there are other contexts in which the definition of "valuable benefit" as an "end product" would be inappropriate: e.g. where the contract was one of the hire of a chattel. Such a contract is not intended to leave any "end product" in the hands of the hirer, who can nevertheless be said to have benefited if he has had the use of the chattel for part of the agreed period before the contract is frustrated. It would be unfortunate if s.1(3) were held to be inapplicable in such a case merely because of the definition of valuable benefit adopted in the different context of BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt. Similarly, it is submitted that s.1(3) should now apply on facts such as those in Cutter v Powell<sup>62</sup>: the defendants would have had the benefit of the seaman's services during part of the voyage, even though it might not be easy to identify any "end product" resulting from those services.

(iii) Destruction of the benefit. The machinery of the Act worked satisfactorily in BP (Exploration) Libya Ltd v Hunt because the valuable benefit, even when reduced in the light of the frustrating event, exceeded the just sum. But the position would have been <sup>57</sup> For this reason a claim for the "time value of money"—i.e. for the use that Mr. Hunt could have made of the proceeds of the sale of the oil—was rejected for it was not shown that he did make such use. But interest on the award from the time of frustration was allowed under Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, s.3; see now Supreme Court Act 1981, s.35A(1), below, p.995.

<sup>58</sup> This value seems also to be relevant to the identification of the benefit.

<sup>59</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 236, 241; this contrasts with the figure of some $35.40m in [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783, 827. The difference is not explained and may be due to the adoption of different currency conversion factors at first instance and in the Court of Appeal.

<sup>60</sup> This was precisely the position in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B. & S. 826: see above, p.866. For the court's power to allow the recipient of the benefit to deduct expenses, see below, p.915.

<sup>61</sup> Illustration given by Lord Simon L.C. when introducing s.1(3): HL Deb., June 29, 1943, Col. 139.

<sup>62</sup> (1795) 6 T.R. 320, above, pp.912–913; unless the contract was literally one of insurance: see above, p.782 and below, pp.917–918. The "just sum" should not be based on the exceptionally high rate of pay contracted for, but on current market rates (see above, p.782).

different if the expropriation had occurred immediately before oil had begun to flow and if no compensation for expropriation had been paid. On the reasoning of the judgment, there would then have been no valuable benefit (beyond the “farm-in” oil); for that reasoning has regard to “the circumstances giving rise to the frustration” within s.1(3)(b) in valuing the benefit rather than in assessing the just sum. The same reasoning is adopted in an example which closely resembles Appleby v Myers<sup>63</sup>: “Suppose that a contract for work on a building is frustrated by a fire which destroys the building and which therefore destroys a substantial amount of the work already done by the plaintiff. Although it might be thought just to award the plaintiff a sum assessed on a quantum meruit basis, the effect of s.1(3)(b) will be to reduce the award to nil. . . .”<sup>64</sup> If this is right, Appleby v Myers would not be affected by the Act; but in view of the evident reluctance with which the learned judge reached this conclusion it is submitted that an alternative interpretation of s.1(3) is to be preferred. This would make the destruction of the benefit relevant, not to the identification of the benefit, but to the assessment of the just sum. Two points seem to support such an interpretation. First, s.1(3) applies where a valuable benefit has been obtained before the time of discharge: thus to identify the benefit in a case like Appleby v Myers the court must look at the facts as they were before, and not after, the fire. The partly completed installation would at least prima facie be a benefit, since completion of the installation would be likely to cost less after part of the work had been done. Secondly, there is the structure of the subsection. This begins by setting out the circumstances in which the court has power to make an award (i.e. when a valuable benefit has been obtained) and then provides guidelines for the exercise of that power. The guideline contained in s.1(3)(b) is introduced by the words “such sum as the court thinks just having regard to . . .”; and these words seem to link the guideline to the exercise rather than to the existence of the court’s discretion. This interpretation cannot cause any injustice, for if the court thinks that very little or nothing should be awarded it can exercise its discretion to that effect; and for this purpose the court can take the destruction of the benefit into account so as to split the loss in such proportions as the court thinks just.<sup>65</sup> But if such destruction necessarily led to the conclusion that no valuable benefit had been obtained before frustration, the court would have no discretion to award anything at all. It would be a pity if this useful discretion were restricted in a way that is neither clearly required by the words of the subsection nor necessary to promote justice.

(iv) Relationship between s.1(2) and 1(3). The power to make an award in respect of a valuable benefit under s.1(3) is, in theory, additional to the power to make an award in respect of expenses under s.1(2). Thus if a party who has incurred expenses has also both conferred a valuable benefit and received (or stipulated for) a prepayment he can claim under both subsections. But any amount awarded in respect of expenses will be taken into account in deciding how much should be awarded in respect of valuable benefit, and vice versa.<sup>66</sup> If the party who has incurred expenses has received a valuable benefit other than money (for example, a “prepayment” in kind) he cannot make any claim in respect of expenses under s.1(2) as that subsection only applies where a sum of money is paid or

<sup>63</sup> (1867) L.R. 2 C.P. 651.

<sup>64</sup> [1979] 1 W.L.R. 783 at 801 (italics supplied); cf. Parsons Bros Ltd v Shea (1966) 53 D.L.R. 2d 36, decided under a Newfoundland Act in similar (but not identical) terms to those of the English Act. It may also be significant that in the illustration of the half-painted house given by Lord Simon L.C. (above, n.61) the ground of frustration was illegality so that the benefit of having “got your house half painted” was not destroyed.

<sup>65</sup> Under the British Columbia, New South Wales and South Australian Acts referred to on p.912, n.44, the loss would be split equally; but s.1(3) of the English Act gives a more flexible discretion.

<sup>66</sup> See s.1(3)(a).

payable. But the court can reach much the same result under s.1(3), for it can take the expenses into account in deciding how much the recipient of the valuable benefit should pay for it.<sup>67</sup>

(3) Casus omissus?

Under s.1(2), sums of money payable before frustration cease to be payable on frustration. The subsection is restricted to payments of money. S.1(3), by contrast, provides for restitution claims in respect of other benefits, e.g. where A renders services or transfers property to B before frustration. But nothing in s.1(3) in terms releases A where before frustration he ought to have performed an obligation to do something other than to pay cash, has failed to do so, and would, if he had performed, have been entitled to make a claim for restitution under s.1(3). Thus if A has promised to make an advance payment in cash and has failed before frustration to do so, he is released by s.1(2); but if the stipulated payment had been in kind he would not be released by s.1(3). Nor can he, in the latter case, neutralise his liability by making a claim under s.1(3), for B has not “by reason of anything done [by A] obtained a valuable benefit . . . before the time of discharge”. On the contrary, B has failed to obtain an expected benefit by reason of something not done by A. B may after the time of discharge obtain a benefit by suing A, but this does not bring the case within s.1(3) as the benefit is obtained too late. Nor would it help A to argue that before the time of discharge B had a valuable benefit, namely, his right to sue A, for this benefit would not have been obtained “by reason of anything done [by A] in or for the purpose of the performance of the contract”. It is hard to believe that these consequences were intended. The failure of the Act in these circumstances to provide for the release obligations other than those to pay money seems to be a casus omissus.

(4) Special cases

(a) SEVERABILITY. A contract may provide for one party to make payments from time to time in response to specified parts of the other's performance. The common law rule was that, if the contract was frustrated, such payments as were due at the time of frustration could be recovered. In Stubbs v Holymell Ry<sup>68</sup> a consulting engineer was appointed for 15 months for £500 payable in five equal quarterly instalments. After two quarters he died. His administrator successfully claimed the £200 due to him at the date of his death. But he could have recovered nothing more had the deceased worked for another two months in the next quarter. Under the 1943 Act he can do so. S.2(4) provides that if parts of a contract which have been wholly performed can properly be severed from the remainder, they are to be treated as separate contracts; and that the provisions of s.1 (discussed above) shall apply to the remainder of the contract.

S.2(4) also affects the rights of a person to recover back money paid under such a contract. At common law money could be recovered back if paid for some severable part of the consideration which had wholly failed, even though the consideration for the whole payment had not failed.<sup>69</sup> If in Stubbs v Holymell Ry the whole £500 had been paid in advance, £200 could have been recovered back as no work at all was done by the deceased in the last two quarters; but nothing could have been recovered back in respect of the third quarter, if the deceased had done so much as a week's work in it. Now money paid in respect of the third quarter could be recovered back, but the personal representative could claim under section 1(3) in respect of the work done by the deceased in that week. An obligation may also be severable by statute under the provisions of the Apportionment Act 1870.<sup>70</sup>

<sup>67</sup> ibid.

<sup>68</sup> (1867) L.R. 2 Ex. 311.

<sup>69</sup> See Tyrie v Fletcher (1777) 2 Cowp. 666 at 668; Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.84(2) (divisible insurance policies); below, pp.1050–1051.

(b) CONTRARY AGREEMENT. The common law rule that money is recoverable on the ground of total failure of consideration can be excluded by contrary agreement: the money may be paid out-and-out, with the intention that the payee shall keep it in any event.<sup>71</sup> The provisions of the Act can similarly be excluded by contrary agreement<sup>72</sup>; whether a term has this effect depends on its construction. In BP Exploration (Libya) Ltd v Hunt<sup>73</sup> the contract provided that the defendant was not to be personally liable to repay any advances and that BP's rights were to be exercisable only against the defendant's share of the oil. This provision did not exclude the Act as, on its true construction, it was not intended to deal with the risk of expropriation but with the different risk that no oil might be found.

(c) EXCLUDED CONTRACTS. The Act does not apply to:

(i) Voyage charterparties and other contracts for the carriage of goods by sea.<sup>74</sup> The object of this exception is to preserve two rules which are well established and known in the trade: first, that freight which has become due or been paid before frustration remains due and (if paid) cannot be recovered back, even though the cargo is lost<sup>75</sup>; and, secondly, that a person who contracts to carry goods by sea to a specified port cannot recover freight pro rata, even if he is forced by events outside his control to discharge them at an intermediate port.<sup>76</sup>

(ii) Contracts of insurance.<sup>77</sup> This exception preserves the rule that there can, in general, be no apportionment of premiums under an insurance policy once the risk has begun to run. The essence of a contract of insurance is that "the contract is for the

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.823.

<sup>71</sup> Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32 at 43, 77. The common law rule could still apply: e.g. to contracts excluded from the operation of the Act by s.2(5)(c), below, p.918.

<sup>72</sup> s.2(3). Contract terms excluding the common law rule stated at n.71, above, would not be subject to the requirement of reasonableness under Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.3(2)(b)(ii) (above, p.254) since in the case of a frustrated contract there would be no "contractual obligation" to perform. They might, however, in a standard consumer contract be subject to the requirement of fairness under Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (above, p.267): see Sch.2 para.1(o). Contract terms excluding the 1943 Act would not be subject to the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, being "authorised" by s.2(3) of the 1943 Act and so excepted from the 1977 Act by virtue of s.29(1)(a) of that Act (above, p.266); but they could be subject to the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, for although these Regulations do not apply to "mandatory statutory . . . provisions" (reg.4(2)(a)) the provisions of the 1943 Act are (by reasons of s.2(3)) not "mandatory". The fact that s.2(3) permitted the parties to exclude the provisions of the 1943 Act would, however, be relevant to the question whether a term to this effect was "unfair" for the purposes of the 1999 Regulations.

<sup>73</sup> [1983] 2 A.C. 352.

<sup>74</sup> s.2(5)(a) provides that the Act shall not apply "to any charterparty, except a time charterparty or a charterparty by way of demise, or to any contract (other than a charterparty) for the carriage of goods by sea." These words make it clear that the Act does not apply to voyage charterparties, but leave open the question whether it applies to a "time charter trip" (above, p.904). The answer may depend on the degree of particularity with which the contract describes the voyage.

<sup>75</sup> Byrne v Schiller (1871) L.R. 6 Ex. 319; unless the contract provides the contrary, as in The Oliva [1972] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 458; contrast The Lorna I [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 373 where, on the true construction of the contract, freight was not to become due till after the frustrating event. Freight may be earned before it is payable: above, p.783.

<sup>76</sup> St Enoch Shipping Co Ltd v Phosphate Mining Co [1916] 2 K.B. 625; above, p.782.

<sup>77</sup> s.2(5)(b).

whole entire risk, and no part of the consideration shall be returned".<sup>78</sup> Thus if a ship is insured but lost in some way not covered by the policy after part of the period of insurance has run, no part of the premium can be recovered back. This is obviously in accordance with the intention of the parties, for such a contract is essentially speculative. Had the ship been lost by one of the perils insured against on the first day, the insurer would have had to bear the whole loss. Conversely, he can keep the whole premium if the ship is lost by a peril that is not covered by the policy at any time during the period of insurance.

(iii) Certain contracts for the sale of goods. S.2(5)(c)<sup>79</sup> provides that the 1943 Act shall not apply to two types of such contracts.

First, it does not apply to "any contract to which s.7 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 . . . applies". Under s.7 of that Act, an agreement to sell specific goods is avoided if the goods perish without any fault on the part of the seller or buyer before the risk<sup>80</sup> has passed to the buyer. That is, the buyer is not liable for the price and neither party is liable in damages. The same result would normally follow from the common law rules of frustration, since the destruction of specific goods would frustrate the contract. The cases in which the 1943 Act would (if it were not excluded by s.2(5)(c)) make a difference are those in which there has been an advance payment or part-delivery.

If the buyer pays in advance but does not get any of the goods, he can recover back his payment on the ground of total failure of consideration.<sup>81</sup> The exclusion of the Act does not affect this right, but it does prevent the seller from setting off any expenses which he may have incurred, e.g. in putting the goods into a deliverable state.

Part-delivery followed by frustration raises two problems. First, a buyer of a specific parcel of goods may have paid the whole price in advance and received only part-delivery. He probably cannot recover back any part of the payment at common law as the failure of consideration is not total.<sup>82</sup> Nor can he rely on the 1943 Act, as that is excluded. It has been suggested that he may be able to recover back a proportionate part of the advance payment simply on the ground that the undelivered goods are still at the seller's risk,<sup>83</sup> but this suggestion would give rise to difficulty where the price was not readily apportionable between the delivered and the undelivered parts.<sup>84</sup> Secondly, a seller may have delivered part of the goods and been paid nothing. As the 1943 Act is excluded, he cannot rely on it to recover anything in respect of the valuable benefit obtained by the buyer. He may be able to recover something at common law if a new contract can be implied from the buyer's keeping the goods after frustration. But it would be hard to imply such a contract if the buyer no longer had the goods, e.g. because he had used or resold them before frustration.

The 1943 Act secondly does not apply to "any other contract for the sale, or the sale and delivery, of specific goods, where the contract is frustrated by reason of the fact that the goods have perished". These words seem to refer to a case which would not fall within s.7 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, because the risk has passed to the buyer. It is difficult to imagine how in such a case the contract could be frustrated by the perishing of the goods. Perhaps the point of excepting such a case from the 1943 Act is to make

<sup>78</sup> Tyrie v Fletcher (1777) 2 Cowp. 666 at 668. For a contractual provision displacing the normal rule, see The M Vatan [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 416.

<sup>79</sup> As amended by Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.63 and Sch.2, para.2.

<sup>80</sup> See above, p.871.

<sup>81</sup> Logan v Le Mesurier (1846) 6 Moo.P.C. 116.

<sup>82</sup> It is assumed that the value of the part undelivered is not readily apportionable to the whole: see below, p.1051.

<sup>83</sup> Atiyah, Sale of Goods (10th ed.), p.363.

<sup>84</sup> e.g. if a contract for the sale of specific machinery to be delivered in sections is frustrated after payment in full and part delivery.

it clear that the buyer is liable for the whole price and that there is no power to order restitution or to apportion expenses.

S.2(5)(c) can produce some entirely capricious distinctions.

The 1943 Act is excluded only where the goods are specific. Suppose that a farmer agrees to sell 200 tons out of a crop to be grown on his land, and the crop is destroyed by events for which he is not responsible.<sup>85</sup> As the goods are not specific,<sup>86</sup> the 1943 Act is not excluded and the farmer can set off his expenses of cultivating the crop<sup>87</sup> against any advance payment made by the buyer. But if an agreement were made to sell an identified parcel of 200 tons after the crop had been lifted, the goods would be specific so that the 1943 Act would be excluded. Hence if the agreement in such a case had provided that the farmer was to put the goods into sacks, and if the goods had been destroyed before this operation had been completed, the farmer would have to return the whole of any advance payment made by the buyer,<sup>88</sup> and have no right to deduct any part of the expenses of packaging.

The 1943 Act is excluded only where the cause of frustration is the perishing of the goods. Thus the Act applies where the contract is frustrated by illegality or requisition.

The reason for these distinctions is far from clear; and one might ask why contracts for the sale of goods were singled out for separate treatment at all. As a matter of abstract justice, there seems to be no reason why the powers of restitution and apportionment provided by the Act should apply to a contract to build a house but not a contract to supply a specific piece of machinery. The main reason for not applying the Act to contracts for the sale of goods is that in such contracts certainty is more important than justice; and the certainty which the rules as to the passing of risk is meant to provide would be disrupted if their effects could be modified by the exercise of the discretionary powers conferred on the courts by the 1943 Act. But on this view contracts for the sale of goods should have been wholly excluded from the operation of the 1943 Act. Their partial exclusion does not satisfy the requirements of either certainty or justice.

(d) COMMERCIAL AGENTS. Under the Regulations which govern contracts between "commercial agents"<sup>89</sup> and their principals, certain rights to "compensation" or "indemnity" accrue to the agent or to his estate on his death or on his serious disability preventing further performance of the contract.<sup>90</sup> The content of these rights differs significantly from the consequences of frustration under the 1943 Act. They can, for example, take account of the agent's loss of commission and of expenses incurred by him

<sup>85</sup> See Howell v Coupland (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 258; above, p.876.

<sup>86</sup> Mellish L.J. in Howell v Coupland at 262 called the potatoes "specific things," but they were clearly not "specific goods" within the definition given in s.61(1) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 ("identified and agreed upon at the time a contract of sale is made"): see Re Wait [1927] 1 Ch. 606 at 631; and cf. above, p.875: the agreement was for the sale of an unidentified part of a future crop. The point is not affected by the amendment of the definition of "specific goods" (above) by the Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995, s.2(d): that amendment widens the definition so as to include "undivided share, specified as a fraction or percentage," of such goods. In the example given in the text, the goods were not specified in this way but as a fixed quantity out of the bulk.

<sup>87</sup> At least if incurred after the contract. In Howell v Coupland 25 of the 68 acres of the defendant's land at Whaplode had been sown before the contract; quære whether such expenditure would be recoverable under the Act.

<sup>88</sup> Under the rule in the Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32; above, p.911.

<sup>89</sup> Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/3053), as amended by SI 1993/3173 and SI 1998/2868; above, p.709.

<sup>90</sup> regs 17 and 18. The effect of frustration by other events is governed under reg.16 by the general law of frustration.

or of loss suffered by him,<sup>91</sup> in circumstances in which no claim in respect of a valuable benefit or allowance in respect of expenses could be made under the Act<sup>92</sup>; and (unlike rights under the Act) they cannot be excluded by the contract.<sup>93</sup>

SECTION 5. JURISTIC BASIS<sup>94</sup>

1. Theories of Frustration

Much discussion is to be found in the cases as to the so-called theoretical or juristic basis of the doctrine of frustration. The first puzzle is why judges have devoted so much attention to this question. Perhaps the reason is that they have felt the need to justify in some way their departure from the doctrine of absolute contracts. The second puzzle is to know exactly what the discussion is about. Two questions have become, perhaps inevitably, intertwined: why are contracts frustrated, and when?<sup>95</sup> Discussions of the juristic basis of the doctrine of frustration attempt sometimes to justify the doctrine, and sometimes to evolve some general formula for describing the conditions in which it operates. The main theories of frustration found in the cases are as follows.

(1) Implied term

The first theory is that the contract is discharged because it impliedly provides that in the events which have happened it shall cease to bind. This theory is put forward by Lord Loreburn in the Tamplin case. "No court has absolving power"<sup>96</sup> but the court will not regard an obligation as absolute if the parties themselves did not intend it to be absolute. If they "must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist . . . a term to that effect will be implied".<sup>97</sup>

In a purely subjective sense this theory is clearly untenable. The implication would have to arise at the time of contracting and at that time the parties are unlikely to have any view as to the effects on the contract of the supervening event; and after the event has occurred, the parties might well have no common view as to its effects: for example, one party might well take the view that it should, and the other that it should not, discharge the contract. Even if the parties could reach some agreement on the point, they would probably not agree to total, unconditional discharge. As Lord Wright has said, "they would almost certainly on the one side or the other have sought to introduce reservations or qualifications or compensations".<sup>98</sup>

<sup>91</sup> reg.17(3)(a) (subject to a limit of one year's commission under reg.17(4)) and 17(7)).

<sup>92</sup> e.g. because no valuable benefit had been obtained by the principal or no stipulation for prepayment to the agent had been made.

<sup>93</sup> reg.19.

<sup>94</sup> McNair, 56 L.Q.R. 173; Legal Effects of War, pp.143, et seq.

<sup>95</sup> Thus in Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban DC [1956] A.C. 696 at 729 Lord Radcliffe said that "Frustration occurs whenever" the changed circumstances make performance "radically different from that which was undertaken." This seems to deal with the second of the questions put in the text; but it has also been regarded as providing an answer to the first: e.g. in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 688, 717.

<sup>96</sup> Tamplin case [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 404.

<sup>97</sup> ibid., at 403.

<sup>98</sup> Denny, Mott case [1944] A.C. 265 at 275; cf. Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187 at 1196; Atisa SA v Aztec AG [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 579 at 586 (describing the implied term theory as "now rejected."); FC Shepherd & Co Ltd v Jerrom [1987] Q.B. 301 at 322; The Super Servant Two [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 145 at 154, affirmed [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1; The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 869, at [73] ("not realistic"); cf. Trakman, 46 M.L.R. 39. For a possible power of the court to introduce "reservations" etc. by means of an implied term while holding the contract not frustrated, see The Maira (No.2) [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 300 at 311 (affirmed on other grounds [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 12).

In fact Lord Loreburn did not put forward a purely subjective version of the implied term theory. He said: "From the nature of the contract it cannot be supposed that the parties as reasonable men intended it to be binding on them under such altered conditions. . . ."<sup>99</sup> But in this form, the implied term theory loses its chief attraction, which is that frustration merely gives effect to the intention of the parties themselves. As Lord Radcliffe has said: "By this time it might seem that the parties themselves have become so far disembodied spirits that their actual persons should be allowed to rest in peace. In their place there rises the figure of the fair and reasonable man. And the spokesman of the fair and reasonable man, who represents after all no more than the anthropomorphic conception of justice, is and must be the court itself".<sup>1</sup>

(2) Just solution

Lord Sumner once described the doctrine of frustration as "a device by which the rules as to absolute contracts are reconciled with a special exception which justice demands".<sup>2</sup> Lord Wright in the Denny, Mott case, found "the theory of the basis of the rule"<sup>3</sup> in this statement; he added that the doctrine of frustration did not depend on the possibility of implying a term, but was "a substantive and particular rule which the common law has evolved".<sup>4</sup> And in the Constantine case he said: "The court is exercising powers, when it decides that a contract is frustrated, in order to achieve a result which is just and reasonable".<sup>5</sup> This "just solution" theory does not purport to explain why the courts sometimes abandon the doctrine of absolute contracts: it simply says that they do so. The theory should not, moreover, be interpreted to mean that the courts can do what they think just whenever a change of circumstances causes hardship to one party: it does not supersede the strict rules which determine the scope of the doctrine of frustration.<sup>6</sup> Nor does it determine the type of relief which can be given. When a contract is frustrated, both parties are at common law discharged, though the "just solution" might be an apportionment of loss.

(3) Foundation of the contract

This theory was stated by Lord Haldane in the Tamplin case. "When people enter into a contract which is dependent for the possibility of performance on the continued availability of a specific thing, and that availability comes to an end by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the parties, the contract is prima facie regarded as dissolved. . . . Although the words of the stipulation may be such that the mere letter would describe what has occurred, the occurrence itself may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation".<sup>7</sup> In WJ Tatem Ltd v Gamboa<sup>8</sup> Goddard J. regarded this as "the surest ground on which to rest the doctrine of frustration".

<sup>99</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 404.

<sup>1</sup> Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban DC [1956] A.C. 696 at 728.

<sup>2</sup> Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue SS Co Ltd [1926] A.C. 497 at 510. In the Bank Line case [1919] A.C. 435 at 455 he had supported the implied term theory.

<sup>3</sup> [1944] A.C. 265 at 275.

<sup>4</sup> [1944] A.C. 265 at 274.

<sup>5</sup> [1942] A.C. 154 at 186; cf. National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 696; The Super Servant Two [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at 8.

<sup>6</sup> See above, pp.867, 881–882. cf. The Fjord Wind [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 307 at 328, affirmed [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 191.

<sup>7</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 406. Lord Haldane's was a dissenting speech.

<sup>8</sup> [1939] 1 K.B. 132 at 137.

At first sight this theory has the merit of simplicity as it does not involve speculation as to the intention of the parties. It is particularly appropriate where performance depends on the continued availability of a specific thing. But in other cases the metaphor "foundation" is unhelpful. How can one tell whether passage through the Suez Canal is the "foundation" of a charterparty? What is the "foundation" of a contract in which the parties take a deliberate risk as to the continued availability of a specific thing or existence of some state of affairs? Such questions can, in the last resort, only be resolved by construing the contract. If this is so, there is no real difference between the "foundation" theory and the "implied term" theory in its objective sense. Indeed, exponents of one sometimes use the language of the other. Thus in the Tamplin case Lord Loreburn, after stating the implied term theory, said that the court "can infer from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances that a condition which is not expressed was a foundation on which the parties contracted".<sup>9</sup>

(4) Construction

All the theories so far stated depend in the last resort on the construction of the contract: to this extent, they "shade into one another".<sup>10</sup> After stating the implied term theory, Lord Loreburn proposed, as the ultimate test: "what, in fact, is the true meaning of the contract?"<sup>11</sup> Similarly, in Taylor v Caldwell, Blackburn J. said "the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible. . . ." <sup>12</sup> Construing the contract and implying a term are in these cases only alternative ways of describing the same process. Similarly, the "foundation" theory raises a question of construction whenever it is at all doubtful what the "foundation" of the contract is. And Lord Wright, in the course of stating the "just solution" theory, said: "What happens is that the contract is held on its true construction not to apply at all from the time when the frustrating circumstances supervene".<sup>13</sup> It seems that this is the most satisfactory explanation of the doctrine of frustration.

(5) Failure of consideration

This theory is sometimes used to explain why both parties are discharged in the situation (discussed earlier in this Chapter<sup>14</sup>) in which the supervening event makes the performance of only one party impossible. Thus destruction of a specific thing may make performance of the supplier's obligation impossible; but it has no such effect on the recipient's obligation to pay, and it can be said that the latter is discharged by failure of consideration,<sup>15</sup> i.e. because he does not receive the performance for which he bargained. In England, however, these cases are explained on the ground that the "common object" of the parties is frustrated.<sup>16</sup> Moreover, in so far as the present theory suggests that the

<sup>9</sup> [1916] 2 A.C. 397 at 404.

<sup>10</sup> National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 693.

<sup>11</sup> [1916] A.C. 397 at 404.

<sup>12</sup> (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 at 833.

<sup>13</sup> Denny, Mott case [1944] A.C. 265 at 274; cf. The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226 at 239; The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293 at 235.

<sup>14</sup> See above, pp.893-894.

<sup>15</sup> This explanation is commonly given in the United States: e.g. Earn Line SS Co v Sutherland SS Co Ltd, 254 F. 126, 131 (1918); Corbin, Contracts, §§1320, 1322; Restatement 2d, Contracts, Introductory Note to Chap.11, p.310.

<sup>16</sup> Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue SS Co Ltd [1926] A.C. 497 at 510; above, p.893.

failure of consideration must be total<sup>17</sup> it is plainly wrong since frustration can occur in cases of partial destruction or after part performance; and the theory has for this reason been rejected in the House of Lords.<sup>18</sup>

2. Practical Importance

It is sometimes asked whether the above theoretical discussion has any practical importance. It seems to have none.<sup>19</sup> A number of possibilities must be discussed.

(1) In W. J. Tatem Ltd v Gamboa Goddard J. said that the contract would be frustrated although the parties foresaw that the ship would be seized and detained. He even said: "If the foundation of the contract goes, it goes whether or not the parties have made a provision for it".<sup>20</sup> These statements could only be made by an adherent of the "foundation" theory. But the first has been doubted earlier in this Chapter,<sup>21</sup> while the second was qualified later in the judgment: "Unless the contrary intention is made plain, the law imposes this doctrine of frustration".<sup>22</sup>

(2) In the Davis Contractors case, Lord Reid said that no review was possible of the arbitrator's decision on the "foundation" theory, as the question whether the "foundation" had disappeared was one of fact; while such review was possible on the "implied term" or "construction" theories, as implication and construction were questions of law.<sup>23</sup> But a question of law would be involved even on the "foundation" theory if the question: what is the "foundation"? is itself one of construction. And after the Tsakiroglou case<sup>24</sup> it is difficult to argue that the right to review an arbitrator's decision is restricted by any particular theory.

(3) In the Davis Contractors case, Lord Reid said that there might be a further practical difference between the "implied term" and "construction" theories. On the latter theory "there is no need to consider what the parties thought or how they or reasonable men in their shoes would have dealt with the new situation if they had foreseen it. The question is whether the contract which they did make is, on its true construction, wide enough to apply to the new situation: if not, then it is at an end".<sup>25</sup> But in construing the contract the court does not wholly disregard the intention of the parties. The court may not have to ask: what would the parties have said, had they thought of the frustrating event? But it does have to ask: in what circumstances did the parties intend the contract to operate? In answering this question, the court no doubt applies an objective test<sup>26</sup>; but it is only after the question has been answered that the intention of the parties becomes irrelevant: that is, it is not necessary to go on and ask whether they would have agreed to discharge or to some compromise. But this question does not arise under the implied term theory either, as frustration at common law always results in total discharge of the contract.

<sup>17</sup> For total failure of consideration, see above, p.911; below, p.1049.

<sup>18</sup> National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 687, 702.

<sup>19</sup> This seems to be the view of Lords Wilberforce and Roskill in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] A.C. 675 at 693, 717. Lord Hailsham (ibid. at 687) regards "the theoretical basis of the doctrine as clearly relevant to the point under discussion"; but he does not specify in what respect it is relevant.

<sup>20</sup> [1939] 1 K.B. 132 at 138.

<sup>21</sup> See above, pp.899, n.30, 903.

<sup>22</sup> [1939] 1 K.B. 132 at 139.

<sup>23</sup> Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban DC [1956] A.C. 696 at 720; cf. above, pp.333–334.

<sup>24</sup> [1962] A.C. 93; see generally above, p.897.

<sup>25</sup> [1956] A.C. 696 at 721.

<sup>26</sup> cf. above, p.198.

3. Frustration and Mistake

Frustration is sometimes compared with mistake of the kind which nullifies consent<sup>27</sup> because the supposed subject-matter of the contract does not exist or is fundamentally different from the subject-matter as it was believed to be. Thus in Krell v Henry<sup>28</sup> a contract for the hire of a room overlooking the route of the coronation processions was frustrated when the processions were later cancelled; in Griffith v Brymer<sup>29</sup> a similar contract was held void for mistake when the processions had already been cancelled before the contract was made.

This analogy is interesting and sometimes helpful; but it should not be pressed too far. Mistake and frustration are “different juristic concepts”,<sup>30</sup> the one relating to the formation and the other to the discharge of contracts. Their factual bases are different in that mistake requires the parties to entertain an affirmative belief in the existence of the subject-matter, or of a state of affairs, when it in fact no longer exists. In cases of frustration, the parties often have no affirmative belief as to the event: they need not believe that it will not occur. Moreover, events which frustrate a contract would not necessarily make it void for mistake if, unknown to the parties, they had already happened when the contract was made. It is, for example, open to doubt whether Griffith v Brymer has survived later developments in the law of mistake.<sup>31</sup> Again, parties may validly agree on a contractual term “requiring one of them to do the impossible”,<sup>32</sup> e.g. on a term requiring a seller of goods to deliver them from a named ship at a specified port which the ship was incapable of entering. The seller would then be liable for failing to deliver in accordance with that term; but he could be discharged if after the time of contracting an event happened which made it impossible for the ship to get into the port, e.g. “if a sudden storm had silted up the harbour”<sup>33</sup> there. The law seems to be less ready to hold a contract void for mistake than discharged by frustration, perhaps because it is, in general, easier to be sure of present facts than to foresee future events,<sup>34</sup> or because a contracting party is more likely, on the true construction of the contract, to have undertaken responsibility for an existing, than for an unexpected future, state of affairs.<sup>35</sup>

<sup>27</sup> See above, pp.286–298. Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd v Crédit du Nord S.A. [1989] 1 W.L.R. 255 at 264 (“related areas”); William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire CC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1016 at 1039; Grains & Fournages S.A. v Huylton [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 628 at 630 (“analogous concepts”). See also the reference to Krell v Henry [1903] 2 K.B. 740 in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] A.C. 161 at 226 and the words “whether as to existing or future facts” ibid. at 226–227; and the reliance on frustration cases in the mistake case of The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689, at [61]–[76]. This view of the relationship between the two doctrines seems not to have been shared by Blackburn J., whose judgment in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B. & S. 826 is generally regarded as having established the doctrine of frustration. His judgment, given only four years later, in the mistake case of Kennedy v Panama, etc. Royal Mail Co (1867) L.R. 2 Q.B. 580 contains no reference to Taylor v Caldwell even though that case was cited to the court in Kennedy’s case at 581. The extent to which frustration cases are a safe guide to the solution of problems of mistake was also qualified in The Great Peace itself: see below, n.31.

<sup>28</sup> [1903] 2 K.B. 740.

<sup>29</sup> (1903) 19 T.L.R. 434.

<sup>30</sup> Constantine case [1942] A.C. 154 at 186; cf. Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] A.C. 161 at 237; Fibrosa case [1943] A.C. 32 at 77.

<sup>31</sup> See above, p.288. The view that the test for a mistake which nullifies consent is stricter than that of frustration appears to be supported by The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689 at [83] (test of frustration “may not be adequate in the context of mistake”). Hence the analogy between the two doctrines drawn in that case in the passages referred to at n.27 above is, at best, imperfect.

<sup>32</sup> The Epaphus [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 215 at 218; The New Prosper [1991] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 93 at 99.

<sup>33</sup> The Epaphus [1987] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 215 at 220. cf. Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] A.C. 161 at 218 per Lord Atkin, approving the formulation by counsel (Sir John Simon K.C.).

<sup>34</sup> cf. McAlpine Humberoak Ltd v McDermott International (1992) 58 Build.L.R. 1.

<sup>35</sup> The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689 at [85].

The legal effects of the two doctrines are also distinct. At common law, mistake makes a contract void ab initio, while frustration discharges it only from the time of the frustrating event.<sup>36</sup> In equity, indeed, the courts at one time claimed a power to set contracts aside for certain kinds of mistake which did not make them void at law.<sup>37</sup> But the Court of Appeal has recently held that there is no such power,<sup>38</sup> and even if this view were to be rejected by the House of Lords and the equitable jurisdiction were to be again recognised, its operation would still differ from that of frustration in two ways. First, the equitable power in cases of mistake was regarded as discretionary while frustration discharges a contract automatically, by operation of law, without any scope for judicial discretion; frustration moreover results in total discharge, while the equitable jurisdiction was to set the contract aside on terms.<sup>39</sup> It is, finally, clear from the wording<sup>40</sup> of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 that the powers of adjustment conferred by that Act apply only to discharge by supervening (and not to invalidity on the ground of antecedent) events.<sup>41</sup>

---

<sup>36</sup> See above, pp.286, 909.

<sup>37</sup> See above, p.319.

<sup>38</sup> The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689.

<sup>39</sup> See above, pp.320, 909.

<sup>40</sup> s.1(1) ("where a contract . . . has become impossible of performance or been otherwise frustrated").

<sup>41</sup> Somewhat similar adjustments could perhaps have been made in the exercise of the former equitable jurisdiction to rescind on terms contracts affected by mistake not sufficiently fundamental to avoid the contracts at law. But in The Great Peace [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2002] 4 All E.R. 689 it was held that this jurisdiction no longer existed (above, pp.319–320) and recognised at [161] that the 1943 Act did not apply to cases of mistakes making contracts void.

REMEDIES<sup>1</sup>

A BREACH of contract is a civil wrong. To break a contract can also occasionally be a criminal offence<sup>2</sup>; and some statutes penalise dangerous or deceptive conduct which may amount<sup>3</sup> to a breach of contract. Conviction in such cases makes the offender liable not only to punishment, but also to an order requiring him to pay compensation for any personal injury, loss or damage resulting from the offence.<sup>4</sup> In most cases, however, a breach of contract will involve only civil liability; and our sole concern in this Chapter will be with remedies available in civil proceedings. In such proceedings, the injured party may claim either specific relief, or damages or restitution.

A claim for specific relief is one for the actual performance of the defaulting party's undertaking. Where that undertaking is one to pay a sum of money, a claim for specific relief is made by the common law action for an agreed sum; where the undertaking is one to do some other act, or to forbear from doing something, a claim for specific relief is made by the equitable remedies of specific performance or injunction. A claim for damages is one for compensation in money for the fact that the claimant has not received the performance for which he bargained. This is the remedy most frequently discussed in the reported cases, and the bulk of this Chapter is therefore devoted to it. A person who has performed his part of the contract but has not received the agreed counter-performance may, finally, claim back his performance or its reasonable value. These restitutionary remedies are not confined to cases of breach of contract; but as they are often available in such cases they can conveniently be considered in this Chapter.

SECTION 1. DAMAGES

The action for damages is always available, as of right, when a contract has been broken. It should, from this point of view, be contrasted with claims for specific relief and for restitution, which are either subject to the discretion of the court or only available if certain conditions (to be discussed later in this Chapter) are satisfied. An action for damages can succeed even though the victim has not suffered any loss: in that event, it will result in an award of nominal damages. The effect of such an award may simply be to establish what the rights and liabilities of the parties under a contract are, though for

<sup>1</sup> Beale, Remedies for Breach of Contract; Treitel, Remedies for Breach of Contract: a Comparative Account; Harris, Campbell and Halson, Remedies in Contract and Tort (2nd ed); Burrows, Remedies for Torts and Breach of Contract, 2nd ed.

<sup>2</sup> For example, cutting off a tenant's gas supply may be an offence: McCall v Abelesz [1976] Q.B. 585 (as to which see below p.988, n.98); the offence may be committed even though the tenant is not a contractual tenant, so that there is no breach of contract: Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s.1(1); R. v Yuthiwattana (1985) Cr.App.R. 55; R. v Burke [1991] 1 A.C. 135; cf. National Minimum Wage Act 1998, s.31. See further, Treitel in Essays in Memory of Sir Rupert Cross, pp.82–92.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s.1; Consumer Protection Act 1987, Pt.II: under these provisions, offences may be committed even though no contract is ever made or broken. Sometimes, the law also provides administrative remedies in respect of conduct that may amount to a breach of contract: e.g. under Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.67(1)(a).

<sup>4</sup> Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s.130; cf. also Consumer Protection Act 1987, s.41 and p.369, above.

this purpose the action for a declaration now provides a more convenient remedy. Generally the victim will claim damages for a substantial loss; and our concern is with the law governing the award of such damages. We shall consider, first, the general principles which govern awards of damages; secondly, the way in which damages are assessed or quantified; thirdly, certain rules limiting the damages which can be recovered; and finally, contractual provisions purporting to establish in advance the amount that can be recovered (or retained) by the victim.

1. General Principles

(1) Damages are compensatory

Damages are awarded to compensate the claimant.<sup>5</sup> Three aspects of this principle require discussion at this point.

(a) LOSS TO CLAIMANT<sup>6</sup> THE CRITERION. As a general rule, damages are based on loss to the claimant and not on gain to the defendant<sup>7</sup>; but there are significant exceptions to this rule.

(i) Illustrations of the general rule. In a Scottish case,<sup>8</sup> a financier broke a contract to invest £15,000 in the business of a timber merchant and instead invested the same sum in a distillery. It was held that the timber merchant's damages were based on the loss to his business and not on the much larger profits which the financier had derived from the distillery. Similarly, where a shipowner in breach of contract withdraws his ship from a charterparty, damages are based on the charterer's loss, and not on any profit that the shipowner may make from other employment of the ship.<sup>9</sup> Likewise, an employee who left in breach of contract to take up a better paid job would not be liable to account to his employer for the extra pay, but only to compensate him for any loss that he may have suffered. The same principle again applies where a person who has agreed to sell goods for future delivery for £x fails to deliver because he has disposed elsewhere of the goods for £x + 100. If the buyer can in fact get goods of the same description for £x or less at the time fixed for delivery, he will have suffered no loss and will get no (substantial) damages: it is irrelevant that the seller has, in a sense, made a profit of £100 out of the breach.<sup>10</sup> It also follows from the general rule that damages are not awarded merely on the ground that the defendant has by the breach saved himself expense. Where, for example, the claimant had bargained and paid for a deluxe delivery service but had received only a standard service, it was held that damages were based, not on the extra amount paid for the former service, but on the difference between the market value of

<sup>5</sup> Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Kamsing Knitting Factory [1979] A.C. 95 at 104.

<sup>6</sup> For exceptional cases in which the claimant can recover damages in respect of a third party's loss see above, pp.593 et seq.

<sup>7</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch.106 at 332; The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605 at 608; cf. The Ypatiama [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 286 at 297. The Law Commission, in its report on Aggravated, Exemplary and Restitutionary Damages Law Com. No.247 (1997), para.6.2.6 does not propose any legislative change in either the general common law rule or the exceptions to be discussed below in cases of breach of contract. The rest of the report is not to be implemented: see Kuddus v Chief Constable of the Leicestershire Constabulary [2001] UKHL 29; [2002] 2 A.C. 122, at [35]. See also Jones, 99 L.Q.R. 443, Friedmann, 80 Col.L.Rev. 504, Farnsworth, 94 Yale L.J. 1339; Birks, [1987] L.M.C.L.Q. 421; Friedmann, 104 L.Q.R. 383; Birks, 1990–1991 Butterworth Lectures 55; cf. Stoljar, 2 J.C.L. 1.

<sup>8</sup> Teacher v Calder (1889) 1 F.(H.L.) 39; see also Transocean Maritime Agencies S.A Monegasque v Pettit 1997 S.C.L.R. 534.

<sup>9</sup> The Siboen and the Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 293 at 337.

<sup>10</sup> Acme Mills v Johnson 133 S.W. 784 (1911); cf. The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605, where the buyer's damages were nominal as he had failed to mitigate (below, p.978) and it was irrelevant that the seller (who was in breach) had made a profit on resale.

what was bargained for and what had been provided. It was up to the claimant to prove what this difference was, and in the absence of such proof he could recover no more than nominal damages.<sup>11</sup>

(ii) Exceptions. In some situations, there is no doubt that a contract breaker must hand over to the victim any gain resulting from the breach. If, for example, the subject-matter of a sale is land, the vendor is, after the conclusion of the contract, considered to hold the land as trustee for the purchaser; and if the vendor wrongfully resells the land to a third party, the purchaser is entitled to the proceeds of that sale, even though they may exceed his loss.<sup>12</sup> Again, an account of profits may be ordered against a person who wrongfully uses another's trade secret or confidential information<sup>13</sup>; and this remedy is, no doubt, available where the wrongful use amounts to a breach of a contract of (for example) employment.<sup>14</sup> Where a breach of contract amounts also to breach of a fiduciary obligation, damages may similarly be based on the defendant's profit.<sup>15</sup> For example, an agent who commits a breach of his fiduciary duty by taking a bribe,<sup>16</sup> or by selling his own property to a principal, when he has been employed to buy for him, is liable to account for any profit made in this way.<sup>17</sup>

The defendant's profit is also relevant where, in breach of contract, he uses, or interferes with, another's property without, at first sight, inflicting on the latter any loss. In one case<sup>18</sup> the buyer of a floating dock failed, in breach of contract, to remove it from its berth. He argued that no substantial damages should be awarded because the sellers would not have made any use of the berth. Lord Denning rejected the argument saying that "the test of the measure of damages is not what the plaintiffs have lost, but what benefit the defendant obtained by having the use of the berth". But the actual award was based on the fair rental value of the berth, and can be explained on the basis that the plaintiffs lost the chance of reletting it. It seems that if the defendant had made a greater profit, he would not have been liable for it<sup>19</sup>; conversely, he is liable for the reasonable rental value even though the profit that he has actually made from the premises is less.<sup>20</sup>

(iii) Borderline cases. One group of cases which gives rise to difficulty in the present context concerns breaches of contractual restrictions on the development or use of land.

<sup>11</sup> White Arrow Express Ltd v Lamey's Distribution Ltd [1995] N.L.J. 1504. According to Samson & Samson v Proctor [1975] N.Z.L.R. 665, a builder may be liable to his customer for expenses saved through failure to comply with the agreed specifications; but no reason is given for this departure from the general rule that damages are based on loss to the claimant.

<sup>12</sup> See Lake v Bayliss [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1073. cf. also Housing Act 1988, ss.27 and 28(1), under which damages in tort of wrongful eviction are based on benefit to landlord: Tagro v Cufane [1991] 1 W.L.R. 378, 385–387; such damages are not recoverable from the landlord's agent: Sampson v Wilson [1996] Ch. 39.

<sup>13</sup> Peter Pan Mfg Corp v Corsets Silhouette Ltd [1964] 1 W.L.R. 96; Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers (No.2) [1990] A.C. 109 at 262, 288. cf. Law Com. No.110, paras 4.86 and 6.114(2)(b).

<sup>14</sup> cf. Printers & Finishers Ltd v Hollamby [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1.

<sup>15</sup> Mathew v T.M Sutton Ltd [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1455; Tung Man Sit v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] A.C. 514 (where the claimant elected to claim damages for breach of trust rather than an account of profits); cf. Nottingham University v Fishel [2000] I.C.R. 1462 at 1489.

<sup>16</sup> Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 A.C. 324; above, p.746.

<sup>17</sup> Regier v Campbell-Stuart [1939] Ch. 766; cf. now Estate Agents Act 1979, s.21 (above, p.746).

<sup>18</sup> Penarth Dock Engineering Co Ltd v Pount [1963] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 359; cf. in tort, Swordheath Properties Ltd v Tabet [1979] 1 W.L.R. 285; Ministry of Defence v Ashman [1993] 2 E.G.L.R. 102; Ministry of Defence v Thompson [1993] 2 E.G.L.R. 107; Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Corp [2002] UKHL 19; [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 843, at [87] ("user principle") and see the payment which a court may order a person to make on obtaining an "access order" under Access to Neighbouring Land Act 1992, s.2(5)(a) (gain to applicant) and (b) (loss to respondent).

<sup>19</sup> cf. Strand Electric and Engineering Co Ltd v Brisford Entertainments Ltd [1952] 2 Q.B. 246 at 252, 256.

<sup>20</sup> Tung Man Sit v Capacious Investments Ltd [1996] A.C. 514 (above, n.15).

In the Wrotham Park<sup>21</sup> case, a developer had acquired land subject to a restrictive covenant which had been imposed for the benefit of an adjoining estate. In breach of the covenant, the developer built houses on the land; this did not diminish the value of the estate, but its owners nevertheless recovered substantial damages for the breach, amounting, not to the whole of the developer's profits on the sale of the houses, but to 5 per cent of that profit. This percentage was said to represent "such sum of money as might reasonably have been demanded by the plaintiffs from [the defendant] as a quid pro quo for releasing the covenant".<sup>22</sup> But a different result was reached in the later Bredero Homes<sup>23</sup> case, where a developer had bought land from two local authorities under a contract providing that no more than 72 houses were to be built on the land, and then, in breach of that contract, built 77 houses there. The breach caused no loss to the vendors and the Court of Appeal held that the defendant was liable for no more than nominal damages. At the same time, the Wrotham Park case was treated as having been correctly decided,<sup>24</sup> and the question arises, how the two cases are to be reconciled.

One possibility is to say that the award in the Wrotham Park was based on restitutionary rather than on compensatory principles,<sup>25</sup> that such restitutionary principles apply only if there is either a fiduciary relationship or an invasion of the claimant's proprietary interests, that neither of these conditions was satisfied in the Bredero Homes case, while the second may have been satisfied in the Wrotham Park case.<sup>26</sup> But the view that the award in this case was based on restitutionary grounds was rejected in Jaggard v Sawyer<sup>27</sup> where the compensatory principle stated in the Wrotham Park case was reaffirmed and damages were awarded on that principle (i.e., for the loss of a bargaining opportunity<sup>28</sup>) against defendants who, in breach of covenant, used part of the garden of their house in a private road to obtain access to a house which they had built on adjoining land. The question then arises why no similar damages were available to the claimants in the Bredero Homes case. A possible answer to this question is that the damages in the Wrotham Park case were awarded, not at common law, but in equity, in lieu of the injunction<sup>29</sup> which the claimants sought as soon as they became aware of the breach but which the court in its discretion refused to grant.<sup>30</sup> In the Bredero Homes case, by contrast, no attempt was ever made to restrain the breach by injunction; five years went by after the breach before any proceedings in respect of it were taken; during that time the defendants had disposed of all the houses so that an injunction was no longer available against them<sup>31</sup>; and the only claim made was one for damages at common law.

<sup>21</sup> Wrotham Park Estate Co v Parkside Homes Ltd [1974] 1 W.L.R. 798, approved in Stoke-on-Trent City Council v W & J Wass Ltd [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1406. cf. Bracewell v Appleby [1975] Ch. 408 (tort); General Tire & Rubber Co v Firestone Tyre & Rubber Co [1975] 1 W.L.R. 819 (patent infringement—a claim for an account of profits was not pursued); Sharpe and Waddams, 1 O.J.L.S. 290.

<sup>22</sup> [1974] 1 W.L.R. 798, at 815.

<sup>23</sup> Surrey CC v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361; Birks, 109 L.Q.R. 518; O'Dair, I.R.L.J. 31.

<sup>24</sup> This is clear from the judgments of Steyn and Rose L.J.J., while Dillon L.J. does not expressly dissent from this view.

<sup>25</sup> [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361 at 1369–1370, per Steyn L.J.

<sup>26</sup> In that the defendant had violated a restrictive covenant that ran with the land; this could be described as a property interest "in the broadest sense:" [1993] 1 W.L.R. at 1371.

<sup>27</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269; followed in Gafford v Graham (1998) 76 P.&C.R. D18.

<sup>28</sup> For use (with approval) of this phrase, see Attorney-General v Blake [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 281. The argument that the damages in Jaggard v Sawyer should have been nominal was, paradoxically, put forward by the claimant, whose object was to show that damages were an inadequate remedy and that she should therefore be granted specific relief: cf. below, p.1022.

<sup>29</sup> See below, p.1046.

<sup>30</sup> [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361 at 1336, this was also the reasoning (expressly approved ibid. at 1368) of Ferris J. at first instance: [1992] 3 All E.R. 303.

<sup>31</sup> Jaggard v Sawyer, above, at 290. Specific relief would be unavailable on the principle stated at pp.1028–1029 below.

At first sight, the difficulty with this explanation is that the House of Lords has, since the Wrotham Park case, held that the principles governing the assessment of damages are the same whether the award is made in equity (in lieu of specific enforcement) or at common law.<sup>32</sup> This difficulty can be overcome by arguing that it is only when damages are claimed in respect of the same breach that the principles of assessment are the same at common law and in equity, and that, while equity can award damages in respect of future breaches which it has jurisdiction to restrain<sup>33</sup> (as in the Wrotham Park case), there was no similar possibility in the Bredero Homes case<sup>34</sup> where no further breaches could be committed by the defendants as they no longer owned any of the houses. It is also arguable that the very fact that an injunction was no longer available in the Bredero Homes case made the claimant's bargaining opportunity worthless and so justified the conclusion that damages at common law should be no more than nominal.<sup>35</sup> This reasoning, however, seems to be based on the assumption that the value of the bargaining opportunity is to be assessed as at the time of the hearing; prima facie the more appropriate time for assessing that value would seem to be the time of breach.<sup>36</sup>

In Attorney-General v Blake (to be more fully discussed below) three members of the majority of the House of Lords accordingly took the view that "so far as the Bredero Homes Ltd decision is inconsistent with the approach adopted in the Wrotham Park case, the latter is to be preferred".<sup>37</sup> This seems to mean that, in principle, damages for loss of claimants' bargaining opportunity could now be claimed on facts such as those of the Bredero Homes case; but the guarded nature of the statement leaves open the two questions (1) how much that opportunity would have been worth (given that an injunction was no longer available), and (2) by reference to what time that opportunity should be valued. If the relevant time is (as suggested above) the time of breach, then the effect of the views expressed in Blake's case on the Bredero Homes case would be to reverse the outcome in the latter case.

(iv) Discretionary account of profits. The compensatory principle was recognised but a discretionary exception to it was created in Attorney-General v Blake.<sup>38</sup> While employed as a member of the security services, Blake passed secret information to agents of the Soviet Union, in breach not only of the terms of his employment but also of the Official Secrets Act 1911; he was convicted of offences under that Act and sentenced to 42 years' imprisonment. He escaped from prison and fled to Moscow where, over 20 years later, he entered into an agreement with an English publisher for the publication of his autobiography. Although the information in the book was no longer confidential<sup>39</sup> at the time of the delivery of his manuscript and of the publication of the book, the disclosure of the information amounted to both a further offence under the 1911 Act and a further breach of Blake's contract with the Crown. This breach, however, caused no material loss to the Crown in respect of which compensatory damages could have been recovered and, after publication, the remedy by way of injunction, which could have been sought before

<sup>32</sup> Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367, below, p.1048.

<sup>33</sup> See below, p.1046.

<sup>34</sup> Even at common law, damages for future breaches can be recovered in cases of accepted anticipatory breach, but this possibility was not relevant in the Bredero Homes case, where the only breaches committed by the defendant lay in the past.

<sup>35</sup> Jaggard v Sawyer above, p.291.

<sup>36</sup> cf. below, p.959.

<sup>37</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 283, per Lord Nicholls with whose speech Lords Goff and Browne-Wilkinson agreed; cf. ibid. at 298, per Lord Hobhouse dissenting; contrast ibid. at 291 per Lord Steyn.

<sup>38</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268.

<sup>39</sup> So that the case did not fall directly within the exception (to the general rule that damages are compensatory) referred to on p.928 above at n.13.

then, was no longer available; nor could the case be brought within any of the qualifications of the compensatory principle which have been described above.<sup>40</sup> The House of Lords nevertheless held, by a majority, that where (as in Blake's case) damages were not a "sufficient"<sup>41</sup> remedy, the court should "exceptionally" be able to "grant the discretionary remedy of requiring a defendant to account to the plaintiff for benefits derived from his breach of contract".<sup>42</sup> This development was based on the analogy of the discretionary remedies by way of specific relief in equity, which are available also where damages are not an adequate (or the most appropriate)<sup>43</sup> remedy for breach. Two questions arise in relation to such discretionary remedies: when does the discretion exist and when will it be exercised? In relation to the equitable remedies by way of specific relief, the uncertainty that could arise from their discretionary nature is much reduced by the accumulation of case-law which not only indicates which types of contracts can (and which cannot) be specifically enforced<sup>44</sup> but also lists factors to be taken into account in determining when the discretion to order specific relief will be exercised<sup>45</sup>; the overriding principle is that this discretion is "to be governed so far as possible by fixed rules and principles".<sup>46</sup> In relation to the new discretion created by Blake's case, there can be no guidance on the first of these points since that discretion applies to breaches of contract generally<sup>47</sup>; and with regard to the second point Lord Nicholls says that "no fixed rules can be prescribed"<sup>48</sup> with regard to the exercise of the discretion. He is prepared only to give the "general guide" that this depends on "whether the plaintiff had a legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity"<sup>49</sup>; but this formula does little to reduce the resulting uncertainty, since every contracting party can be said to have a "legitimate interest" in the performance of a contractual promise made to him.<sup>50</sup> Some further guidance of a negative nature is, however, provided. An account of profits is not to be available merely because the defendant is guilty of either "skimped performance"<sup>51</sup> (the difference in value between what was and what should have been provided being the normal measure of damages in such a case)<sup>52</sup> or of breach of a negative obligation "by doing the very thing he has promised not to do"<sup>53</sup>; nor merely because the breach was "cynical and deliberate" or "enabled the defendant to enter into a more profitable contact elsewhere"<sup>54</sup>; nor merely because, by entering into such a contract "the defendant put it out of his power to perform his contract with the plaintiff".<sup>55</sup> But as no positive indications are given as to when the new discretion to

<sup>40</sup> Under headings (ii) and (iii) on pp.928–929 above.

<sup>41</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. at 285.

<sup>42</sup> ibid., at 284–285 per Lord Nicholls, who (ibid. 284) preferred the phrase "account of profits" to "the unhappy expression 'restitutionary damages'".

<sup>43</sup> See below, p.1025; cf. the use by Lord Nicholls in Blake's case of the phrase "most appropriate" at 285.

<sup>44</sup> See below, pp.1029–1037.

<sup>45</sup> See below, pp.1026–1029.

<sup>46</sup> See below, p.1026.

<sup>47</sup> It goes beyond the situations referred to at n.40 above.

<sup>48</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268, at 285.

<sup>49</sup> ibid., at 285.

<sup>50</sup> In this respect, the "legitimate interest" in receiving performance differs from that in continuing performance, referred to in a different context at p.1017 below.

<sup>51</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 286.

<sup>52</sup> White Arrom Express Ltd v Lamey's Distribution Ltd [1995] N.L.J. 1504, above, pp.927–928.

<sup>53</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268, at 286. In the Court of Appeal "restitutionary damages" (see n.42, above) were said to be available in this situation and in cases of "skimped performance". These suggestions were doubted in the 10th edition of this book at p.869 and were rejected in the House of Lords not only by Lord Nicholls (above) but also by Lord Steyn at 291.

<sup>54</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 286.

<sup>55</sup> ibid.

order an account of profits will be exercised, the creation of that discretion remains a source of considerable uncertainty.<sup>56</sup>

With regard to this uncertainty, a number of points can, however, be made in relation to Blake's case. First, the facts of that case can fairly be described as not merely exceptional, but as extreme; and it is hard to take issue with the outcome on those facts. Secondly, on such facts there would normally be other ways (not available on the special facts) of stripping the wrongdoer of his profits: e.g. by a confiscation order<sup>57</sup> if Blake had at the relevant time been amenable to the jurisdiction of the English criminal courts, or by an injunction if that remedy had been sought in time. Thirdly, in the factual context the argument in favour of certainty lacks its usual force. Certainty in rules of contract law is intended to enable parties to rely on such rules in regulating their conduct; and there is little plausibility and even less merit in the argument that, in deciding to break his contract with the Crown, Blake relied (or should have been encouraged to rely) on the rule that damages were compensatory. But although these points may justify the actual decision in Blake's case, they cannot entirely dispell the concern caused by the ill-defined discretionary exception to the compensatory principle that was there created. Lord Hobhouse, in his dissent, referred to the "disruptive"<sup>58</sup> consequences that could follow from attempts "to extend the decision of the present exceptional case to commercial situations so as to introduce restitutionary rights beyond those presently recognised by the law of restitution".<sup>59</sup> Such consequences could, for example, follow where a party to a commercial contract decided to commit a breach of it with a view to making a profit even after he has compensated the other party for his loss. It is hard to see why in such a case the law should "confer a windfall on the injured party"<sup>60</sup> by awarding such profits to him in excess of his loss or, a fortiori, why it should make such an award where he has suffered no loss at all. It seems from the terms of Lord Nicholls' speech that the discretion created in Blake's case is not intended to extend to cases of this kind<sup>61</sup>; and it is further to be hoped that Lord Hobhouse's warning will be heeded and that the discretion will be confined within narrow limits.

One restriction on the scope of that discretion is inherent in its nature. It applies only where the defendant has made an actual profit and so does not extend to cases in which the defendant has made a losing bargain and his breach merely avoids or reduces that loss by an amount exceeding the compensatory damages recoverable by the injured party.

(b) WHAT CONSTITUTES LOSS. For the present purpose, loss includes any harm to the person or property of the claimant, and any other injury to his economic position. The question to what extent harm to the person includes injury to feelings is discussed later in this Chapter.<sup>62</sup> Harm to property covers damage to or destruction of particular things, while injury to the claimant's economic position includes any amount by which he is worse off than he would have been if the contract had been performed. For example, if a seller in breach of contract fails to deliver the goods, or to deliver them on time, the buyer prima facie suffers loss in not having the goods, or in not having them at the agreed time.

<sup>56</sup> cf. Beatson, 118 L.Q.R. 377.

<sup>57</sup> See above, p.502.

<sup>58</sup> [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 299. cf. Surrey CC v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361 at 1370.

<sup>59</sup> ibid., at 299; Lord Hobhouse appears to have in mind cases of the kind referred to at n.40 above.

<sup>60</sup> Surrey CC v Bredero Homes Ltd, above, at 1370.

<sup>61</sup> See above, at n.54.

<sup>62</sup> See below, pp.987-991.

(i) Overall position taken into account. In determining whether the victim has suffered loss, his overall position is taken into account.<sup>63</sup> Relevant factors include any benefits which he may have obtained under the broken contract, and his release from obligations under it. If, for example, a buyer has not yet paid and is released from his obligation to do so by the seller's wrongful failure to deliver, his loss will prima facie be the value of the goods less the price; and if he has agreed to pay no more than the goods are worth he may have suffered no loss at all. Whether this is indeed the position may turn on disputed questions of fact and it is then up to the defendant to show that the claimant's position is no worse than it would have been if there had been no breach.<sup>64</sup>

The court will similarly take the claimant's overall position into account in determining the basis on which damages are to be assessed: it will not generally order the defendant to pay an amount which will actually make the claimant's position better than it would have been if the contract had been performed. The principle is illustrated by Phillips v Ward<sup>65</sup> where a surveyor in breach of contract failed to draw his client's attention to the fact that the roof timbers of a house, which the latter was about to buy, were rotten. It was held that the client was not entitled to damages based on the cost of making the defects good. Such an award would put him into a better position than that in which he would have been if the contract had not been broken; for it would enable him to have a new roof with new timbers, which would be less expensive to maintain than an old roof with sound timbers. Hence the client was entitled to recover only the difference between the price that he paid and the value of the house when he bought it<sup>66</sup>; or the difference between the price actually paid and that which would have been paid if the surveyor had made his report with due care.<sup>67</sup>

The principle that the claimant's overall position should not be made better than it would have been, if the contract had not been broken, is, however, subject to a number of qualifications. First, it is not inflexibly applied where costs are actually incurred by the claimant in remedying the breach.<sup>68</sup> In Harbutt's "Plasticine" Ltd v Wayne Tank & Pump Co Ltd<sup>69</sup> the claimant's factory was burnt down as a result of the defendant's breach of contract. It was held that the claimant could recover the cost of rebuilding the factory without making any allowance for the fact that he would then have a new (and therefore

<sup>63</sup> e.g. The Baleares [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 130 (and see [1991] 2 All E.R. 110). cf. below, p.980.

<sup>64</sup> See Featherstone v Wilkinson (1873) L.R. 8 Ex. 122, as explained by Steyn L.J. in The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 232–234.

<sup>65</sup> [1956] 1 W.L.R. 471.

<sup>66</sup> See Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1297 at 1305, 1306; Burrows, 47 M.L.R. 357; Trenl v Ernest W Gibson & Partners (1984) 272 E.G. 68 Westlake v Bracknell DC (1987) 19 H.L.R. 375 (where it is not clear whether the damages were awarded in contract or in tort); Cross v David Martin & Mortimer [1989] 1 E.G.L.R. 154; Stewart v Rapley [1989] 1 E.G.L.R. 159; Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421; Heatley v William Brown [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 289; Gardner v Marsh & Parsons [1997] 1 W.L.R. 489; Shaw v Fraser Southwell [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 633; Berry v Newport BC [2000] 2 E.G.L.R. 26. Where the client pays more than the valuation, such excess may be irrecoverable: see Lucas v Ogden [1988] 2 E.G.L.R. 176.

<sup>67</sup> Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1297 at 1302; on the facts of this case the two formulae stated in the text would have yielded the same result, for the actual value of the property was assumed to be the amount that the buyer would have paid, if the surveyor's report had been accurate. In appropriate circumstances, further damages may be recoverable for such a breach. Thus in Patel v Hooper & Jackson [1999] 1 All E.R. 992 the defect which the surveyor's report should have revealed made the house uninhabitable, and the client recovered the reasonable costs of extricating himself from the transaction and damages in respect of discomfort suffered in the course of this process (cf. above, p.987).

<sup>68</sup> See further, p.945, below.

<sup>69</sup> [1970] 1 Q.B. 447, followed on this point in Bacon v Cooper Metals Ltd [1982] 1 All E.R. 397, and Dominion Mosaics & Tile Co Ltd v Trafalgar Trucking Co Ltd [1990] 2 All E.R. 246, though overruled on another point in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] A.C. 827.

more valuable) factory. The case can be explained on the ground that the claimant had no reasonable alternative but to rebuild, or that he did so in order to mitigate his loss.<sup>70</sup> Secondly, the principle was modified where a client had suffered loss in consequence of bad investment advice given by the defendant and had, before suffering the loss, spent some of the income produced by the investments on living expenses. This expenditure yielded no permanent benefit to the client and did not have to be brought into account since the very object of the contract was to produce an increased income for the client, so that it was foreseeable that he might spend that income, or part of it, in a way that left no product of permanent benefit to him.<sup>71</sup> Thirdly, the principle in Phillips v Ward does not require the court to take into account benefits derived by the claimant under some contract with the defendant, other than the one which has been broken. Thus if the claimant makes two contracts with the defendant, any profit made by the claimant in consequence of the performance of one of those contracts will not have to be brought into account in assessing his damages in respect of the breach of the other.<sup>72</sup>

(ii) Intended use of subject-matter. It is sometimes argued that a claimant has suffered no loss because, even if the contract had been performed, he would not have used the subject-matter profitably, or at all. In one case,<sup>73</sup> contractors were sued for agreed damages<sup>74</sup> for delay in delivering warships to the Spanish government. The delay being prima facie a source of loss, it was held to be no defence that warships are not put to profitable use, or that the ships, if delivered on time, would probably have been sunk in a naval battle in which the fleet which they were to have joined suffered defeat. However, his intended use of the subject-matter may affect the amount of his loss: this is, for example, the case where a buyer of goods has made a subsale of the very goods comprised in the original sale.<sup>75</sup> Similarly, by statute a landlord cannot recover damages for breach of his tenant's obligation to repair if the tenant can prove that the landlord was going to demolish the premises.<sup>76</sup>

(c) BREACH HAVING NO ADVERSE EFFECT. A further consequence of the compensatory principle is that the claimant cannot recover substantial damages if the breach has not adversely affected his position; for "damages are designed to compensate for an established loss and not to provide a gratuitous benefit to the aggrieved party".<sup>77</sup> Another way of putting the point is that "A breach of contract may cause a loss but is not itself a loss in any meaningful sense".<sup>78</sup> This aspect of the principle is most readily illustrated by the case in which a seller of goods wrongfully fails to deliver on a falling market. If the buyer has not paid and if, at the time fixed for delivery, he can buy substitute goods more cheaply elsewhere, the breach will prima facie have had no adverse effect on him, so that he will not be entitled to substantial damages. Similarly, a shipowner cannot get substantial damages for breach of the charterer's obligation to load if he finds alternative and more profitable employment for the ship.<sup>79</sup> Nor can a buyer recover substantial

<sup>70</sup> See below, p.978.

<sup>71</sup> R. v Investors Compensation Scheme, Ex p. Bowden [1995] Q.B. 107, reversed on other grounds [1996] A.C. 261.

<sup>72</sup> Brown v KMR Services Ltd [1995] 4 All E.R. 598 at 640.

<sup>73</sup> Clydebank Engineering Co v Don Jose Ramos Isquierdo y Castaneda [1905] A.C. 6.

<sup>74</sup> See below, pp.999 et seq.

<sup>75</sup> Re R & H Hall Ltd and WH Pim Jr & Co's Arbitration (1928) 139 L.T. 50; below, p.949.

<sup>76</sup> Landlord and Tenant Act 1927, s.18(1).

<sup>77</sup> Ruxley Electronics and Construction Co Ltd v Forsyth [1996] A.C. 344 at 357.

<sup>78</sup> Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 534.

<sup>79</sup> Staniforth v Lyall (1830) 7 Bing. 169.

damages merely because the seller delivers goods which are not of the contract description if they are in fact no less valuable than goods which are of the contract description.<sup>80</sup>

The same principle was applied in Ford v White<sup>81</sup> where the claimants bought a house and adjoining plot for £6,350 after being advised by their solicitors that they could build on the plot. The solicitors had negligently and in breach of contract overlooked a covenant against building on the plot. The property subject to the covenant was in fact worth £6,350 but it would have been worth an extra £1,250 if there had been no covenant. It was held that the solicitors were not liable for this sum.<sup>82</sup> The claimants would not have bought at all, had they been told of the covenant (so that they did not lose the chance of a good bargain); nor had they paid more for the property than it was actually worth.

So far it has been assumed that the claimant has suffered no loss at all. He similarly cannot recover in respect of a loss which he does suffer if he would have suffered the same loss, even if there had been no breach. This situation is discussed later in this Chapter<sup>83</sup>; it would have arisen in Ford v White if the property had, because of the covenant, been worth less than £6,350, but it had been shown that the claimants would nevertheless have paid that sum for it, even with knowledge of the covenant.<sup>84</sup>

(d) NO PUNITIVE DAMAGES. Punitive (or exemplary) damages can be awarded in certain tort cases.<sup>85</sup> The purpose of such damages is not to compensate the claimant, nor even to strip the defendant of his profit,<sup>86</sup> but to express the court's disapproval of the defendant's conduct,<sup>87</sup> e.g. where he has deliberately committed a wrong (such as defamation<sup>88</sup>) with a view to profit.

As a general rule punitive damages cannot be awarded in a purely contractual action,<sup>89</sup> since the object of such an action is not to punish the defendant but to compensate the claimant.<sup>90</sup> Punitive damages are not available even though the breach was committed deliberately and with a view to profit. If the court is particularly outraged by the

<sup>80</sup> Taylor v Bank of Athens (1922) 27 Com.Cas. 142.

<sup>81</sup> [1964] 1 W.L.R. 885.

<sup>82</sup> It seems that, if the property had been resold, the solicitors would have been liable for expenses incurred in connection with, and loss suffered on, resale: cf. County Personnel (Employment Agency) Ltd v Pulker [1987] 1 W.L.R. 916; Hayes v James and Charles Dodd [1990] 2 All E.R. 815.

<sup>83</sup> See below, p.974.

<sup>84</sup> cf. Sykes v Midland Bank Executor & Trustee Co Ltd [1971] 1 Q.B. 113; A.I.G., 87 L.Q.R. 10. Seamble, it would not be enough to show that the claimants might have bought for the same price even if they had been told the truth: cf. Brikom Investments Ltd v Carr [1979] Q.B. 467 at 483.

<sup>85</sup> See Lord Devlin's speech in Rookes v Barnard [1964] A.C. 1129; Kuddus v Chief Constable of the Leicestershire Constabulary [2001] UKHL 29; [2002] 2 A.C. 122.

<sup>86</sup> In Stoke-on-Trent City Council v W & J Wass Ltd [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1406 at 1414 the damages in the Wrotham Park case [1974] 1 W.L.R. 798, were described as "something akin to . . . exemplary damages for breach of contract," perhaps because the defendant's profit was taken into account in assessing them; but the purpose of the award was compensatory: above, p.929.

<sup>87</sup> cf. CPR 1999, Glossary, definition of "exemplary damages," making the point that such damages "go beyond compensating" the victim.

<sup>88</sup> Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome [1972] A.C. 1027.

<sup>89</sup> Perera v Vandiyar [1953] 1 W.L.R. 672; Paris Oldham & Gustra v Staffordshire BG [1988] 2 E.G.L.R. 39; Reed v Madon [1989] Ch. 408; Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [15], per Lord Steyn, dissenting on the main issue in that case and see below, n.91. Law Com. No.247 (1997) para.6.3.19 recognises and recommends no change in the rule that punitive damages are not available for breach of contract. McBride, 1995 Anglo-American Law Review 369, questions the reasons for the rule.

<sup>90</sup> Calabar Properties Ltd v Stitcher [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287 at 297; Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth [1996] A.C. 344 at 352, 365, 373.

defendant's conduct, it can sometimes achieve much the same result by awarding damages for injury to the claimant's feelings.<sup>91</sup> In theory such damages are meant to compensate the claimant for mental suffering, rather than to punish the defendant. But in practice the distinction is often hard to draw and—from the defendant's point of view—to perceive.<sup>92</sup> However, where the claimant has a cause of action both in tort and for breach of contract, he may be able to recover punitive damages by framing the claim in tort. For example, a landlord who unlawfully evicts his tenant is guilty both of a breach of contract and of a trespass; and punitive damages have been awarded in such a case.<sup>93</sup> Another type of case in which a defendant seeks to profit from a deliberate wrong which is both a breach of contract and a tort is that in which he gives a fraudulent warranty as to the subject-matter of a contract of sale. In the United States, punitive damages have been awarded in such a case<sup>94</sup>; but in England conflicting views have been expressed on the question whether such damages can be awarded in an action based on fraud even if the action is brought in tort.<sup>95</sup> It can be argued, on the one hand that the tort of deceit is generally one from which the defendant seeks to profit, so that it falls into the category of wrongs for which punitive damages are available<sup>96</sup>; and, on the other, that deceit generally involves the wrongdoer in criminal liability and that he should not suffer double punishment by being in addition ordered to pay punitive damages.<sup>97</sup>

Punitive damages should be distinguished from multiple damages which may sometimes be awarded to coerce the defendant rather than to express disapproval of his conduct. This seems to be the purpose of the statutory provision by which a tenant who wrongfully holds over after having been given notice to quit can be held liable for twice the annual value of the land for the period of his wrongful occupation.<sup>98</sup>

(2) Compensation for what?

The principle that damages are compensatory gives rise to the question: for what is it that the victim of a breach of contract is entitled to be compensated? This question calls

<sup>91</sup> See below, pp.988–991. cf. the suggestion in McCall v Abelesz [1976] Q.B. 585, 594 that damages for injury to feelings could now be awarded in a case like Perera v Vandiyar, above; Law Com. No.247, para.6.1.2, preferring the phrase “damages for mental distress” to “aggravated damages” in cases of this kind. CPR 1999, Glossary, uses “aggravated damages” and treats them as “compensation.”

<sup>92</sup> See, for example, Chelini v Nieri 196 P.2d 915 (1948) where damages of $10,000 for injury to feelings were awarded for breach of contract against a Californian embalmer.

<sup>93</sup> Drane v Evangelou [1978] 1 W.L.R. 455; cf. Guppys (Bridport) v Brookling (1984) 269 E.G. 846 (nuisance and landlord's breach of covenant to repair); McMillan v Singh (1984) 17 H.L.R. 120 (where the claim seems to have been in contract only, but the tenant was said at 125 also to have had a claim in tort); Millington v Duffy (1984) 17 H.L.R. 232. Ramdath v Oswald Daley [1993] 1 E.G.L.R. 82: exemplary damages for wrongful eviction awarded against landlord but not against his agent unless the latter stood to gain personally from the wrong.

<sup>94</sup> Grandi v Le Sage 399 P.2d 285 (1965).

<sup>95</sup> Mafu v Adams [1970] 1 Q.B. 548; Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome, above, n.85, at 1076, 1131; Metall und Rohstoff AG v ACLI Metals (London) Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 598 at 612; Smith Kline & French Laboratories Ltd v Long [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1; Kuddus v Chief Constable of the Leicestershire Constabulary [2001] UKHL 29; [2002] 2 A.C. 122, at [43]; ibid., at [84] leaves the point open.

<sup>96</sup> It is arguable that punitive damages for fraudulent warranties are no longer necessary in view of the recognition in Attorney-General v Blake [2001] 1 A.C. 268 (above, p.930) of the possibility of awarding an account of profits in certain cases in breach of contract; see Kuddus v Chief Constable of the Leicestershire Constabulary [2001] UKHL 29; [2002] 2 A.C. 122, at [109]; but in breach of contract cases the latter remedy is exceptional and discretionary.

<sup>97</sup> Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 418–423.

<sup>98</sup> Landlord and Tenant Act 1730, s.1. cf. Oliver Ashmorth (Holdings) Ltd v Ballard Kent Ltd [2000] Ch. 12, discussing Distress for Rent Act 1737; National Minimum Wage Act 1998, s.21(3).

for an analysis of the various types of losses for which the victim of a breach of contract can recover damages<sup>99</sup>; and it also gives rise to certain related problems.

(a) LOSS OF BARGAIN. The object of damages for breach of contract is to put the victim “so far as money can do it . . . in the same situation . . . as if the contract had been performed”.<sup>1</sup> In other words, the victim is entitled to be compensated for the loss of his bargain, so that his expectations arising out of or created by the contract are protected. This protection of the victim’s expectations must be contrasted with the principle on which damages are awarded in tort: the purpose of such damages is simply to put the victim into the position in which he would have been, if the tort had not been committed.<sup>2</sup> Of course, in many tort actions the victim can recover damages for loss of expectations: e.g. for loss of expected earnings suffered as a result of personal injury, or for loss of expected profits suffered as a result of damage to a profit-earning thing. But these expectations exist quite independently of the tortious conduct which impairs them<sup>3</sup>: it is the nature of most torts to destroy or impair expectations of this kind, rather than to create new ones. Tortious misrepresentation does, indeed, create new expectations, but the purpose of damages even for that tort is to put the victim into the position in which he would have been, if the misrepresentation had not been made, and not to protect his expectations by putting him into the position in which he would have been, if the representation had been true.<sup>4</sup> Such damages may be awarded in respect of losses which the victim could have avoided if he had been told the truth, and here again there is a sense in which the victim will recover damages for “loss of a chance”,<sup>5</sup> but it is the chance of avoiding loss rather than that of making a profit for which he will be compensated. He may even be compensated for loss of profit if the tort impairs expectations which exist independently of it. In East v Maurer<sup>6</sup> the claimant was interested in buying a hairdressing salon and was induced to buy one belonging to the defendant by the latter’s fraudulent representation. It was held that the claimant could recover (inter alia) damages in respect of another such business in which he would have invested his money if the representation had not been made, but not the profits which he would have made out of the defendant’s business, if the representation relating to it had been true. In a contractual action, on the other hand, damages are recoverable as a matter of course for loss of the expectations created by the very contract for breach of

<sup>99</sup> Fuller and Perdue, 46 Yale L.J. 52, 373; cf. Burrows, 99 L.Q.R. 217; Owen 4 O.J.L.S. 393. For judicial recognition of the distinctions drawn in the following discussion, see The Alecas M [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 82 at 84 (reversed, without reference to this point, [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 120).

<sup>1</sup> Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex. 850, 855; Senate Electrical Wholesalers Ltd v Alcatel Submarine Networks [1999] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 423 at 430, citing other statements to the same effect. Atiyah’s emphasis in 94 L.Q.R. 193 on reliance loss and restitution (discussed below), fails adequately to account for the principle stated in the dictum quoted in the text above; or indeed for the availability of the action for the agreed sum (below, pp.1013–1019) or other specific relief (below, pp.1013–1046).

<sup>2</sup> cf. above, p.7. For an exception (now severely restricted in scope) see the discussion at pp.608–616, above of Junior Books Ltd v The Veitchi Co Ltd [1983] 1 A.C. 520; and see next note.

<sup>3</sup> This is also true in the “disappointed beneficiary” cases such as White v Jones [1995] 2 A.C. 207, above pp.616–618.

<sup>4</sup> See above, pp.359–362.

<sup>5</sup> John W Pryke v Gibbs Hartley Cooper Ltd [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 602 at 621.

<sup>6</sup> [1991] 1 W.L.R. 461; Marks, 108 L.Q.R. 387; Oakley, [1992] C.I.J. 9. cf. Clef Aquitaine S.A.R.L v Laporte Materials (Barrom) Ltd [2001] Q.B. 488, above, p.361 (damages in respect of more favourable terms which could, but for the representation, have been negotiated with the representor himself).

which the action is brought.<sup>7</sup> That is why damages of this kind are the distinctive feature of a contractual action.

It follows from the principle of compensating the victim for loss of his bargain that the first and crucial question is to determine exactly what had been bargained for, or, in other words, the exact scope of the duty broken by the defendant. This was the question discussed in South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd<sup>8</sup> ("the S.A.A.M.CO case"). Loans of money had been made on the security of properties which had been valued by the defendants who had been engaged by the lender to make these valuations. In breach of their duty to carry out the valuations with due care, the defendants had overvalued the properties, which then also fell in value, in line with the general weakness in the property market. On the borrowers' default, the lenders realised the securities but recovered less than the amounts that they had lent. The House of Lords held that the valuers were liable for loss suffered by the lenders to the extent of the overvaluation but not for any loss beyond this amount which had been suffered by reason of the fall in the market value of the properties after the making of the loan. The point can be illustrated by supposing that a sum of £8 million had been lent on the security of a property valued at £10 million but actually worth only £6 million and that, on the borrower's default, the property (having fallen in value after the loan) yielded no more than £1.5 million. In such a case, the valuers would be liable, not for the £6.5 million lost by the lender,<sup>9</sup> but only to the extent of the £4 million by which they had overvalued the security. This follows from the general principle<sup>10</sup> that a wrongdoer is liable only for "those consequences which are attributable to that which made the act wrongful"<sup>11</sup>; and in the case of a breach of contract the definition of what "made the act wrongful" necessarily depends on the way in which the contractual duty is defined. In the S.A.A.M.CO case, the duty was merely one to provide information (as to the value of the security) on which it was then up to the lenders to decide upon their course of action<sup>12</sup>; and the valuer was held liable for no more than the adverse consequences of his failure to take reasonable care as to the accuracy of that information. Such a duty was distinguished by Lord Hoffmann<sup>13</sup> from a duty to advise a client as to a course of action: a defendant who commits a breach of a duty of this kind (by failing to take reasonable care in giving the advice) will be liable for all foreseeable loss suffered in consequence of the client's taking the advice. Liability in such a case could therefore extend to loss suffered by reason of a fall in the market value of the subject-matter acquired in reliance <sup>7</sup> In The Unique Mariner [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 54 it is said that damages in contract are assessed "on the usual principle of restitutio in integrum." This might suggest that the claimant is to be restored to his pre-contract position; but the method of assessment actually adopted in that case was such as to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been if the contract had been performed.

<sup>8</sup> [1997] A.C. 191; for subsequent proceedings, see Nykredit Bank v Edward Erdman Group [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1627.

<sup>9</sup> Contrast Kenny & Good Pty Ltd v MGICA [2000] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 25 (High Court of Australia).

<sup>10</sup> A possible exception, applicable where the wrong is a misrepresentation which is, or is to be treated as being, fraudulent is recognised in [1997] A.C. at 215 and discussed at p.362 above; for another possible explanation of these cases, see below at n.14.

<sup>11</sup> [1997] A.C. 191 at 213.

<sup>12</sup> ibid. at 214; the extent of liability for failure to provide accurate information obviously depends on the information that should have been provided: see Bristol & West BS v Fancy & Jackson [1997] 4 All E.R. 582 at 621 (distinguishing a solicitor's duty in this respect from that of a valuer).

<sup>13</sup> [1997] A.C. 191 at 214; all the other members of the House of Lords agreed with Lord Hoffmann's speech; Nykredit case, above n.8 at 1638; "advice" ibid. at 1631 seems to be used to refer to the valuation. cf. Bristol & West BS v Mothew [1998] Ch. 1 at 11 (case of failure by a solicitor to provide correct information).

on the advice.<sup>14</sup> The distinction follows from the way in which the defendant's duty is defined; it "has nothing to do with questions of causation<sup>15</sup> or any limit or 'cap' imposed upon damages which would otherwise be recoverable".<sup>16</sup> Those limits cut down liability for losses for which a defendant is prima facie responsible<sup>17</sup>; our present concern is with the extent of his duty and hence of his prima facie responsibility.

The distinction just drawn between limiting damages and defining a duty can give rise to difficulty, particularly in relation to liability in tort for negligence. Here the rule that a defendant is not liable for unforeseeable loss has been explained on the ground that such loss is too remote; but it can equally well be explained on the ground that the defendant is under no duty to cause unforeseeable loss.<sup>18</sup> In the present group of negligent valuation cases, however, the two issues are clearly distinct: the "scope of the duty" depends on the true meaning of the contract (which clearly imposes some duty) while the test of remoteness depends on what consequences the valuer could have contemplated as likely to result from failure to make the valuation with due care.<sup>19</sup> If that test were applied, the valuer would be liable for the market loss; the effect of the "scope of duty" test is that in the "information" (as opposed to the "advice") cases he is under no prima facie liability for that loss because he has undertaken no duty with regard to the desirability or prudence of the transaction.<sup>20</sup>

Considerable difficulty can also arise in distinguishing, for the present purpose, between "advice" and "information". This difficulty arises, in the first place, from the ambiguity of the word "advise": this may be used to mean either "advise that . . ." or "advise to . . ." In the former sense, its primary meaning is "to provide information" while in the latter sense it is "to recommend a course of action . . ." The duty to provide what is commonly called legal "advice" may, for example, be no more than one to provide information: e.g. to the existence of restrictions on the use of land. The giving of such information does not involve any recommendation as to the commercial prudence of proceeding with a transaction, such as a loan on the security, or a purchase, of the land in question.<sup>21</sup> The second source of the difficulty lies in the fact that a person who expressly undertakes to give information may, by performing that duty, also impliedly give advice.<sup>22</sup> If, for example, A says to B "the girders of this bridge are sound", that statement may well, in the context, mean "you can safely cross", and so amount to advice as well as to information. Similarly, in the Aneco case<sup>23</sup> brokers had

<sup>14</sup> The misrepresentation cases referred to in n.10, above, could be brought within this principle by arguing that the purpose of misrepresentation, like that of advice, was to induce the transaction leading to the loss. cf. Intervention Board for Agriculture Products v Leidis [2000] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 144.

<sup>15</sup> In this respect the case differs from those discussed at pp.364–366, above and 951–952 below where the question of recoverability of damages in respect of falls in market value depended on factors other than the definition of the defendant's duty.

<sup>16</sup> Nykredit Bank v Edward Erdman Group [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1627 at 1638; Platform Home Loans Ltd v Oyston Shipways Ltd [2000] 2 A.C. 190 at 208, 213; though the same case may raise an issue both as to the definition of the duty and as to a "cap" on damages, as in Bank of Credit & Commerce (Overseas) Ltd v Price Waterhouse (No.3), The Times, April 2, 1998.

<sup>17</sup> See below pp.964 et seq.

<sup>18</sup> See Lord Hobhouse's discussion in Platform Home Loans Ltd v Oyston Shipways Ltd [2000] 2 A.C. 190; [1999] 1 All E.R. 835 at 847 of The Wagon Mound [1961] A.C. 388; cf. Aneco Reinsurance Underwriting Ltd v Johnson & Higgins Ltd [2001] UKHL 51 at [10–12]; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 929.

<sup>19</sup> See below, p.965.

<sup>20</sup> cf. Lord Hobhouse's statement in the Platform Home Loans case, above, at 848 that the "development" in the SAAMCO case (above n.8) was to apply the "scope of duty" reasoning to "quantification of damages" as opposed to "kinds or categories of damage".

<sup>21</sup> See Lloyds Bank plc v Crosse & Crosse [2001] EWCA Civ 366; [2001] P.N.L.R. 34; Dent v Davis Blank Furniss [2001] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 534.

<sup>22</sup> See the Aneco case, above, n.18 at [1], [17], [32]; Lord Millett dissented.

<sup>23</sup> See above, n.18.

wrongly told a client that reinsurance against the risk which the client was about to underwrite was available in the market. Their duty was held to be one to "advise on the availability of reinsurance cover in the market, without which the transaction would not have gone ahead"<sup>24</sup> and they were therefore liable for the full loss suffered by the client as a result of having entered into that transaction.

The above discussion is concerned only with one type of expectation, namely that of receiving the promised performance. A contract can, however, give rise to two quite separate expectations: that of receiving the promised performance and that of being able to put it to some particular use. For example, a buyer of goods (such as machinery or raw materials) may expect not only to receive the goods but also to use them for manufacturing purposes. If the seller fails to deliver, the buyer is entitled to damages based on the value of the goods that he should have received and also<sup>25</sup> to damages for loss of profits<sup>26</sup> suffered as a result of not receiving the promised delivery.

(b) RELIANCE LOSS. An alternative principle is to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been if the contract had never been made, by compensating him for expenses incurred (or other loss suffered) in reliance on the contract. Sometimes the expenses are of a kind which the claimant must incur if he is to perform his part of the contract: for example, a contract for the sale of goods may provide that the seller is to deliver the goods at the buyer's premises; and if the buyer wrongfully refuses to accept them when they are tendered there, the seller can recover the expenses of delivery as an element of reliance loss. But sometimes wasted expenses may be recoverable as reliance loss even though the claimant was not, under the contract, actually obliged to incur them: in McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission,<sup>27</sup> for example, the defendants were held liable for breach of a contract that there was a wrecked tanker lying in a specified position<sup>28</sup>; and the claimants recovered, inter alia, the £3,000 which it had cost them to send out a salvage expedition to look for the tanker.

So far it has been assumed that the reliance loss is incurred after the contract was made; but even expenditure incurred before then may be recoverable on this basis. In Anglia Television Ltd v Reed<sup>29</sup> the defendant broke his contract to take a leading part in the claimants' television play: and he was held liable for £2,750 spent by the claimants on the production before they had entered into the contract with him. Although the claimants had not incurred this expenditure in reliance on their contract with the defendant, it could be said that they had relied on that contract in allowing the expenditure to be wasted: in other words, in forbearing to look for another leading actor to take the part until it was too late. The pre-contract expenditure in such cases is recoverable because it leads to a loss which, after breach, can no longer be avoided.<sup>30</sup>

Pre-contract expenditure may also be recoverable if it was incurred in reliance on an agreement before that agreement had become a legally binding contract. In Lloyd v Stanbury<sup>31</sup> a person who had contracted to sell land was accordingly held liable for certain expenses incurred by the purchaser in reliance on the agreement while it was still subject to contract.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>24</sup> At [1].

<sup>25</sup> See The "Hé aux Moines" [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 262 (where in fact loss of profits was not proved).

<sup>26</sup> Provided that these are not too remote: below, pp.964 et seq.

<sup>27</sup> (1951) 84 C.L.R. 377, esp. 411.

<sup>28</sup> See above, pp.295-296.

<sup>29</sup> [1972] 1 Q.B. 60; A.L.G., 88 L.Q.R. 168; Ogus, 35 M.L.R. 423; Clarke [1972] C.L.J. 22.

<sup>30</sup> CCC Films (London) Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films Ltd [1985] Q.B. 16; Owen [1985] C.L.J. 24; Burrows, 100 L.Q.R. 27.

<sup>31</sup> [1971] 1 W.L.R. 535.

<sup>32</sup> See above, p.52.

(c) RESTITUTION.<sup>33</sup> A claim for restitution is not strictly one for “damages”<sup>34</sup> since its purpose is not to compensate the claimant for a loss, but to deprive the defendant of a benefit. The simplest case of restitution arises where a seller has been paid in advance and then fails to deliver. He is bound to restore the price and the effect of this is to put both parties into the position in which they would have been if the contract had not been made. A restitution claim obviously differs from a loss of bargain claim, which is meant to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been if the contract had been performed. It also differs from a claim for reliance loss, which is meant to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been if the contract had not been made, and which will often leave the defendant in a worse position. In practice there is considerable overlap between reliance and restitution. Performance by the claimant is a form of reliance which often benefits the defendant; and the requirement in restitution claims that the defendant must have “benefited” from that performance is a somewhat elastic one.<sup>35</sup> There may also be an overlap between loss of bargain and restitution where the amount paid by the injured party is the only evidence of the value of what he ought to have received; and in such a case that amount, or an “appropriate proportion”<sup>36</sup> of it will be the prima facie measure of the expectation loss which he suffers as a result of the defendant’s failure to perform, or to perform in full.

(d) RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN LOSS OF BARGAIN, RELIANCE LOSS AND RESTITUTION. The relationship between the three types of claim so far discussed is a complex one, but it seems to be governed by the following principles.

(i) Claimant’s choice. Where more than one type of claim is available the choice between them (if it has to be made) is the claimant’s, who cannot be forced by the defendant to make one of the available claims rather than another. Suppose that a seller has been paid in advance and then fails to deliver. The buyer can choose between claiming the return of his money (restitution) and the value of the goods at the time fixed for delivery (loss of bargain). Obviously he will take the former course if he has made a bad bargain and the latter if he has made a good bargain. If the seller could force him to choose restitution, the buyer could easily be deprived of the benefit of a good bargain.

(ii) Limitations on claimant’s choice. It does not follow from the mere fact of breach that the three types of claim are always available, or that they are available in full.

The claim for loss of bargain damages is, in principle, always available. But to make good such a claim the injured party must prove the value of his expectations. If he cannot do so with reasonable certainty, he may be limited to his reliance and restitution claims. The point may be illustrated by further reference to McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission<sup>37</sup> where the claimants sought damages for loss of their bargain, alleging that the value of the supposed tanker and its contents (for which they had paid £285) would have been £300,000. This basis for quantifying damages was dismissed as “manifestly absurd”<sup>38</sup>; and the claimants recovered their payment of £285 (restitution) plus the £3,000 spent on their fruitless salvage expedition (reliance loss).

At the other extreme, the claimant’s right to claim restitution is severely limited, in particular by the rule that he can (in general) recover back money paid under the contract only if there has been a total failure of consideration. This rule will be discussed

<sup>33</sup> See further, below, pp.1049–1064.

<sup>34</sup> Portman BS v Hamlyn Taylor Neck [1998] 4 All E.R. 202 at 205; cf. above p.931, n.42.

<sup>35</sup> See especially above, p.822; below, p.1062.

<sup>36</sup> Peninsular & Orient SNGo v Youell [1997] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 136 at 141; below, p.1057.

<sup>37</sup> (1951) 84 C.L.R. 377.

<sup>38</sup> ibid. at 411.

later in this Chapter<sup>39</sup>; but a point to be emphasised here is that, if restitution is available, it is no objection to such a claim that it will leave the claimant better off than he would have been, if the contract had been performed. Indeed, this will be the result of a successful restitution claim whenever the claimant has made a bad bargain, e.g. by paying more for goods than they are worth.

Claims for reliance loss occupy an intermediate position. The Court of Appeal has held that such claims are normally available when a reliance loss has been suffered; and that the injured party is entitled to choose between such a claim and one for loss of bargain damages.<sup>40</sup> One type of case in which he will claim reliance loss is where he cannot prove the value of his expectations. This is no doubt why reliance loss was claimed in Anglia Television Ltd v Reed<sup>41</sup>: the claimants could not prove what profit (if any) they would have made out of the play. Similarly, in McRae's case the claimants could not prove the value of the supposed tanker, and nevertheless recovered £3,000 by way of reliance loss. But they should not have been awarded the whole of this reliance loss if the defendants could have proved that the tanker, had it existed, would have been worth only £2,000. In such a case the claimant would have lost £1,000, even if there had been no breach; and where the claimant has in this way made a bad bargain, the court will not shift that loss to the defendant by allowing the claimant to recover the whole of his wasted expenditure.<sup>42</sup> It has been held that the burden of proof on this issue is on the defendant: in other words, it is not up to the claimant to show that his venture would have been profitable but up to the defendant to show that it would have been unprofitable.<sup>43</sup> As much of the relevant information on this issue will usually be more readily available to the claimant than to the defendant, it is likely that the defendant will find this burden a hard one to discharge.

By contrast, a claimant who claims restitution can shift a loss flowing from the fact that he has made a bad bargain (and not from the breach) to the defendant. The reason for this result is that the defendant would otherwise be enriched; and there is no such enrichment merely because a claimant's reliance loss exceeds the value of his bargain.

(iii) Whether claims can be combined. There is sometimes said to be an inconsistency between combining the various types of claim so far discussed. An award which seeks to put the claimant into the position in which he would have been if the contract had been performed cannot, on this view, be combined with one which seeks to put him (or both parties) into the position which would have existed, if the contract had not been made. But the courts have not accepted this kind of reasoning and have, in appropriate cases, allowed the claims to be combined. In one case<sup>44</sup> machinery was bought, paid for and installed. The buyer rejected the machinery because it was not in accordance with the contract; and he recovered the price (restitution), installation expenses (reliance loss) and his net loss of profits resulting from the breach (loss of bargain).

The true principle is not that there is any logical objection to combining the various types of claim, but that the claimant cannot combine them so as to recover more than

<sup>39</sup> See below, pp.1049–1057.

<sup>40</sup> Cullinane v British "Rema" Mfg Co [1954] 1 Q.B. 292 at 303; Anglia Television Ltd v Reed [1972] 1 Q.B. 60 at 63–64; CCC Films (London) Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films Ltd [1985] Q.B. 16 at 32; cf. Lloyd v Stanbury [1971] 1 W.L.R. 535 at 547; The Selda [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 729.

<sup>41</sup> [1972] 1 Q.B. 60.

<sup>42</sup> See C & P Haulage v Middleton [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1461; Bonlay Logging v Domtar [1978] 4 W.W.R. 105; cf. CCC Films (London) Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films [1985] Q.B. 16 at 38.

<sup>43</sup> CCC (London) Films Ltd v Imperial Quadrant Films [1985] Q.B. 16; cf. Commonwealth of Australia v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 66 A.L.J.R. 123; Treitel, 108 L.Q.R. 226.

<sup>44</sup> Millar's Machinery Co Ltd v David Way & Son (1935) 40 Com.Cas. 204; cf. Snia Soc. di Navigazione v Suzuki & Co (1924) 18 Ll.L.R. 333 at 336–337; Naughton v O'Callaghan [1990] 3 All E.R. 191 at 198; and see above, p.852.

once for the same loss.<sup>45</sup> Suppose that a buyer has paid in advance for goods which are not delivered. He obviously cannot recover both his payment (restitution) and the full value of the goods at the time fixed for delivery (loss of bargain). The point has been well put by Corbin: “full damages and complete restitution . . . will not both be given for the same breach of contract”.<sup>46</sup>

The principle against double recovery also applies where a claimant seeks both reliance loss and damages for the loss of his bargain. If the claimant in McRae's<sup>47</sup> case had been able to establish the value of the hypothetical tanker, he should clearly not have been entitled to that amount and to the £3,285, for he would have had to spend the latter amount to acquire the former. Similarly, in Cullinane v British “Rema” Manufacturing Co Ltd<sup>48</sup> the defendants sold a clay pulverising machine, warranting that it could process clay at six tons per hour. The buyer claimed damages for breach of this warranty under two heads: first, the capital cost of the machine and its installation and, secondly, loss of profits. It was held that the buyer could not recover under both of these heads as “a claim for loss of profits could only be founded upon the footing that the capital expenditure had been incurred”.<sup>49</sup> To allow the buyer to recover the capital expenditure and also his full profit would give him damages twice over for the same loss. It was however not established that the profits which would have been derived from the machine over the whole of its useful “life” would have exceeded its capital cost. If this had been proved the buyer could, according to a decision of the High Court of Australia, have recovered (a) the capital cost of the machinery less its actual value; plus (b) the excess of the estimated profits over the sum calculated under (a).<sup>50</sup> This alone would put the buyer into as good a financial position as if the contract had been performed.

A problem of double recovery again arose in George Mitchell (Chesterhall) Ltd v Finney Lock Seeds Ltd,<sup>51</sup> where a seed merchant sold defective seed to a farmer so that the latter's crop failed. It was said that the damages included “all the costs incurred by the [farmer] in the cultivation of the worthless crop as well as the profit [he] would have expected to make from a successful crop if proper seeds had been supplied”.<sup>52</sup> Here “profit” must mean the proceeds of a successful crop less the cost of cultivating such a crop, for that cost would have been incurred by the farmer even if the seed had not been defective, so that he would be over-compensated if it were not taken into account in computing the profit.

(e) INCIDENTAL AND CONSEQUENTIAL LOSS. The victim of a breach of contract can often recover loss which does not fit easily into the categories so far discussed.

First, he may incur expenses after a breach has come to his attention, such as the administrative costs of buying a substitute<sup>53</sup> or of sending back defective goods. Such expenses are hardly incurred in reliance on the contract; and they will in this Chapter be called “incidental” loss.<sup>54</sup>

<sup>45</sup> Peninsular & Orient SN Co v Youell [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 141.

<sup>46</sup> Corbin on Contracts, § 1221. cf. The Unique Mariner [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 53; Tang Man Sit v Capacious Investment Ltd [1996] A.C. 514; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 C.L.R. 344 at 345.

<sup>47</sup> (1951) 84 C.L.R. 377; Salvage Association v CAP Financial Services [1995] F.S.R. 654 at 683.

<sup>48</sup> [1954] 1 Q.B. 292; Macleod [1970] J.B.L. 19; Stoljar, 91 L.Q.R. 68.

<sup>49</sup> [1954] 1 Q.B. 292 at 302.

<sup>50</sup> TC Industrial Plant Pty Ltd v Robert's (Queensland) Ltd [1964] A.L.R. 1083.

<sup>51</sup> [1983] A.C. 803.

<sup>52</sup> ibid. at 812.

<sup>53</sup> See, e.g. Robert Stewart & Sons Ltd v Carapanayoti [1962] 1 W.L.R. 34.

<sup>54</sup> cf. U.C.C. s.2-715(1).

Secondly, the injured party may suffer “consequential” loss. This expression is used in the law of contract in a number of senses. It may mean simply loss of profits<sup>55</sup> (as opposed to the mere failure to obtain the thing contracted for): in this sense it is merely an element of expectation loss. Alternatively, it may refer to reliance loss: e.g. to the expense wasted by a seller in delivering goods which the buyer wrongfully refuses to accept. But the expression is also used (and will be used here) to refer to further harm, such as personal injury or damage to property, suffered as a result of breach: for example, where a cow is sold under a warranty of soundness but is diseased and infects other cattle of the buyer, which die. The seller is prima facie liable for the loss of the other animals,<sup>56</sup> even though, when the buyer put the cow with them, the possibility of disease, or the risk of its spreading, was not present to his mind at all. In this situation he cannot have relied on the cow’s not being diseased, since reliance presupposes an affirmative belief. Nor can it be said that he expected not to lose the other animals; he simply did not expect to lose them, which is a wholly different state of mind.

2. Quantification

Damages always consist of a sum of money, so that the loss has to be quantified in terms of money. This process is variously referred to as “quantifying” or “measuring” or “assessing” damages; it gives rise to a number of problems.

(1) The bases of assessment

(a) RELIANCE AND RESTITUTION. Relatively little difficulty arises where the injured party claims reliance loss or restitution. In the first case, the basis of assessment is the cost to him of his action in reliance on the contract; and in the second it is generally<sup>57</sup> the benefit obtained by the defendant under the contract. These assessments are particularly straightforward where the claimant has expended or the defendant received a sum of money. Where the reliance loss or the benefit to be “restored” consists of goods or services, a reasonable value must be placed on them. This may give rise to practical difficulties, but there is no doubt about the principle on which such assessment proceeds.

(b) LOSS OF BARGAIN. Where the injured party claims to be put into “the same situation . . . as if the contract had been performed”,<sup>58</sup> there are two distinct bases of assessment:

(i) “Difference in value” and “cost of cure.” The distinction between these two bases is strikingly illustrated by an American case<sup>59</sup> in which a coal company took a mining lease of farmland, covenanting to restore the land to its original state at the end of the lease. The cost of doing the work would have been $29,000, but the result of not doing it was to reduce the value of the land by only $300. Damages for the company’s failure to do the work were assessed at the latter sum. In English law damages for breach of a

<sup>55</sup> See Hotel Services Ltd v Hilton International Hotels (UK) Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 750 at 755; Watford Electronics Ltd v Sanderson Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 317; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 696, at [36], [43]; these cases discuss the meaning of “consequential loss” in exemption clauses.

<sup>56</sup> Smith v Green (1875) 1 C.P.D. 92; cf. The Batis [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 345 (expenses incurred in complying with directions wrongfully given by party in breach).

<sup>57</sup> Not always: see, e.g. Planché v Colburn (1831) 8 Bing. 14 (above, p.822), where there is no evidence that the defendant benefited at all; and see below, p.1062.

<sup>58</sup> Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex. 850 at 855.

<sup>59</sup> Peevyhouse v Garland Coal Co 382 P. 2d 109 (1962); cf. Attica Sea Carriers Corp v Ferrrosaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 250. For compensation for mining subsidence (available independently of contract), see Coal Mining Subsidence Act 1991, ss.2, 10, 22, 26; Coal Industry Act 1994, s.42.

tenant's covenant to repair are by statute assessed on a "difference in value" basis.<sup>60</sup> Apart from such statutory provisions, the law starts with certain prima facie assumptions for choosing between the two bases<sup>61</sup>; but these assumptions can be displaced. The point can be illustrated by reference to contracts for the supply of goods and for the execution of building work.

Where a seller delivers goods which are not of the contract quality, the damages are prima facie assessed on a difference in value basis, so that the buyer can recover "the difference between the value of the goods . . . and the value they would have had"<sup>62</sup> if they had been in accordance with the contract. But the rule is only a prima facie one and if the defect in the goods is cured at a reasonable cost there is little doubt that the cost of such cure can be awarded.<sup>63</sup> This is the position in analogous hire-purchase cases<sup>64</sup> and there seems to be no reason for not applying the same rule to sales.<sup>65</sup> Even the cost of an attempted cure which fails—such as veterinary fees spent on a sick animal which nevertheless dies—can be recovered.<sup>66</sup>

A defendant who is in breach of an obligation to do building work is prima facie liable on a "cost of cure" basis: i.e. he must pay for the cost of putting the defects right or of completing the work.<sup>67</sup> This, again, is only a prima facie rule, which can be displaced where the cost of putting the defect right would be out of all proportion to the advantage which cure would confer on the injured party. This would, for example, be the position where components not in accordance with the contractual specifications had been built into a structure which would have to be substantially demolished to effect a cure<sup>68</sup>; where the cost of cure was greater than the value of the whole building<sup>69</sup>; or where execution of the promised building work would confer no economic benefit at all on the claimant.<sup>70</sup> In such cases, difference in value (if any<sup>71</sup>) would form the normal<sup>72</sup> basis of assessment.<sup>73</sup> This basis of assessment is, in turn, liable to be displaced by further

<sup>60</sup> Landlord and Tenant Act 1927, s.18; Culworth Estates Ltd v Society of Licensed Victuallers (1991) 62 P. & C.R. 211. But in the absence of evidence as to difference in value, cost of repairs is a "starting point": Drummond v SU Stores (1980) 258 E.G. 1293 at 1294; cf. below, n.65.

<sup>61</sup> Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1441.

<sup>62</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3) below, p.885; The Athenian Harmony [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 410 at 419.

<sup>63</sup> Where a buyer who deals as consumer has a "right to reduce the purchase price" under ss.48A and 48C of the 1979 Act (as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045, reg.5), the measure of such reduction does not appear to be either difference in value or cost of cure: see below, p.952.

<sup>64</sup> e.g. Charterhouse Credit Co Ltd v Tolly [1963] 2 Q.B. 683 at 711–712.

<sup>65</sup> Jacovides v Constantinou, The Times, October 27, 1986 (a sale of land case where damages were awarded for misrepresentation apparently having contractual effect). In Keeley v Guy McDonald (1984) 134 New L.J. 522 the cost of repairing an unmerchantable car was awarded as the difference in value between the car as it was and as it would have been if it had been merchantable.

<sup>66</sup> Harling v Eddy [1951] 2 Q.B. 739.

<sup>67</sup> Mertens v Home Freeholds [1921] 2 K.B. 526; Hoenig v Isaacs [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1360; William Cory & Sons v Wingate Investments Ltd (1978) 248 E.G. 687; cf. Radford v de Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262 (breach of covenant to build a boundary wall); Calabar Properties Ltd v Stitches [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287; and see, in insurance law, Pleasurama v Sun Alliance [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 389.

<sup>68</sup> e.g. Jacob & Youngs v Kent 129 N.E. 889 (1921).

<sup>69</sup> cf. Morris v Redland Bricks Ltd [1970] A.C. 652.

<sup>70</sup> James v Hutton [1950] 1 K.B. 9 (where performance of the defendant's promise to restore a shop front to its pre-contract appearance would not have affected its value).

<sup>71</sup> There being no such difference in James v Hutton, above, the damages were held to be nominal.

<sup>72</sup> For a possible exception in cases of "deliberate" breach, see Glaer v Schwartz, 176 N.E. 616 (1913).

<sup>73</sup> See Jacob & Youngs v Kent, above; McGregor on Damages (16th ed.), §1150; Hudson, Building Contracts (11th ed.), §8.120; Keating, Building Contracts (6th ed.), p.220; The Rozel [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 160 (breach of charterer's undertaking to repair a ship); GW Atkins Ltd v Scott (1996) 46 Con. L.R. 14; analogous tort cases support the same view: e.g. Jones v Goody (1841) 8 M. & W. 146; Darbishire v Warran [1963] 1 W.L.R. 1067; RC Taylor (Wholesale) Ltd v Hepworth Ltd [1977] 1 W.L.R. 659.

circumstances. There is some support in the authorities for the view that the claimant can recover damages on the higher cost of cure basis if he can show either that he has in fact incurred that cost or that he will incur it by getting the work done.<sup>74</sup> He is, however, required to act reasonably to mitigate his loss,<sup>75</sup> and it is submitted that he would have failed to do so if he had insisted on cure even though its cost was wholly disproportionate to the resulting benefit to him. Where this is the position, he should recover only on a difference in value basis.<sup>76</sup> For this purpose, the disproportion would have to be a clear one, since the mitigation rules only require the injured party to act reasonably. Cost of cure which is actually incurred or going to be incurred may therefore be recoverable where the effect of cure on the value of property is speculative<sup>77</sup>; and where the cost of cure, though not resulting in any improvement to the property, is not excessive in relation to the initial value of the property.<sup>78</sup>

Damages against a surveyor who fails to draw his client's attention to defects in a house which the client buys in reliance on the surveyor's report are prima facie based on difference in value and not on cost of cure.<sup>79</sup> The reason for this rule is that the surveyor gives no warranty as to the condition of the house: he undertakes only to conduct the survey with reasonable care and skill.<sup>80</sup> The rule may be displaced by special circumstances: e.g. cost of cure may be recoverable if cure is undertaken in a reasonable effort to mitigate loss<sup>81</sup>; and the client may also be able to recover costs reasonably incurred in extricating himself from the transaction.<sup>82</sup>

(ii) Cases where cure is not undertaken. Where the claimant is prima facie entitled to damages based on cost of cure, the further question arises whether he can recover this amount (where it exceeds difference in value) even though he does not undertake cure, or propose to do so. There is, at least apparently, some conflict in the authorities on this point. The starting principle is that the cost of cure can be recovered in such cases since, in general, the court is not concerned with the use which the claimant makes of his damages.<sup>83</sup> But this principle is subject to significant qualifications. First, the fact that the injured party has decided not to effect cure is relevant to the issue whether it would have been reasonable for him to do so; if not, cost of cure will be irrecoverable under the mitigation rules already discussed.<sup>84</sup> Secondly, the conduct of the injured party after the breach may affect the basis of assessment: for example, if he has disposed of the defective or damaged subject-matter without effecting cure, the court is likely to conclude that

<sup>74</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106, 332, 335; Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262. For the position in tort, see Heath v Keys, The Times, May 28, 1984; Ward v Cannock Chase DC [1986] Ch.546; cf. Minscombe Properties v Sir Alfred McAlpine & Son (1986) 279 E.G. 759 (where the development potential of the damaged property was taken into account). Contrast Wiggell v School for Indigent Blind (1882) 8 Q.B.D. 357 (difference in value); and, see Harris, Ogus and Phillips, 95 L.Q.R. 581. For the possible relevance of this factor to a claim for damages in respect of a third party's loss, see above, pp.594, 601.

<sup>75</sup> See below, pp.977-979.

<sup>76</sup> cf. for example Darbishire v Warran, above, n.73; The Maersk Colombo [2001] EWCA Civ 117; [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 275 at [32] (also a tort case).

<sup>77</sup> Sunshine Exploration Ltd v Dolly Varden Mines Ltd (1969) 8 D.L.R. (3d) 441.

<sup>78</sup> Corbin on Contracts, §1091. The position may be the same even where the work would actually reduce the value of the property: ibid. §1089.

<sup>79</sup> See above, p.933.

<sup>80</sup> Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1439.

<sup>81</sup> Cross v David Martin & Mortimer [1989] 1 E.G.L.R. 154.

<sup>82</sup> Heatley v William Brown [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 289; cf. County Personnel (Employment Agency) Ltd v Alan R Pulver & Co [1987] 1 W.L.R. 916 (negligent solicitor).

<sup>83</sup> Ruxley Electronics and Construction Co Ltd v Forsyth [1996] A.C. 344 at 359; cf. ibid. at 372; and see the cases discussed at pp.947-948, below in which damages are based on market prices.

<sup>84</sup> Ruxley Electronics case, below; for this aspect of mitigation, see above, p.945.

what he has lost is difference in value rather than cost of cure.<sup>85</sup> In such cases, therefore, difference in value will be the more appropriate basis of assessment.

(iii) Both bases may lead to same result. The two bases of assessment will not invariably lead to diverging results. For example, in Dean v Ainley<sup>86</sup> a vendor of land broke her contractual undertaking to seal a patio so as to prevent water from leaking into a cellar. The purchaser recovered the cost of doing the promised work, and this sum was variously described as the “cost of the works”,<sup>87</sup> or as the extent to which the property was “clearly less valuable”<sup>88</sup> as a result of the vendor’s failure to perform her undertaking. Where the only reliable evidence of difference in value is cost of cure,<sup>89</sup> the two methods of assessment will lead to the same practical result.

Sometimes the process of assessment can with equal plausibility be described as being based on difference in value or cost of cure. This is the position where a buyer is entitled to the difference between the contract and the market price of goods which the seller has failed to deliver.<sup>90</sup> It makes no difference whether such damages are described as the cost of curing the seller’s breach or as the difference in value between what the buyer has received (i.e. nothing) and what he should have received (i.e. the goods). The buyer is, moreover, entitled to such damages whether or not he has actually made the substitute purchase.<sup>91</sup>

(iv) Other loss. The “difference in value” and “cost of cure” bases are not the only possible ones on which loss of bargain damages may be assessed. The point is well illustrated by Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth,<sup>92</sup> where a builder had contracted to build a swimming pool in his customer’s garden. The contract required the pool to have a maximum depth of seven feet, six inches but the pool actually built had a maximum depth of only six feet, nine inches. This breach of the contract did not significantly affect the value of the pool; nor, since the pool remained, in spite of the breach, perfectly safe and serviceable, would the cost of rebuilding it to the stipulated depth have been reasonably incurred, being wholly disproportionate to the benefit to be obtained by carrying out these operations. Thus the customer was entitled neither to “difference in value” nor to “cost of cure” damages; but it did not follow that he was not entitled to any substantial damages whatsoever. The trial judge had awarded him £2,500 for “loss of amenity” and this award was allowed to stand by the House of Lords,<sup>93</sup> even though it was recognised that in most building contract cases no such damages are available to the customer.<sup>94</sup> This aspect of the case is perhaps best explained

<sup>85</sup> Calabar Properties Ltd v Sticher [1984] 1 W.L.R. 297 at 229; cf. Hole & Hole (Sayers Common) Ltd v Harrisons Ltd [1973] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 345 (damaged building not repaired but demolished for redevelopment purposes); Leppard v Excess Insurance Co Ltd [1979] 1 W.L.R. 512 (an insurance case in which it was clear that reinstatement was not going to be effected); Charterhouse Credit Ltd v Tully [1963] 2 Q.B. 683, disapproving Yeoman Credit Ltd v Apps [1962] 2 Q.B. 508, so far as contra; GW Atkins Ltd v Scott (1996) 46 Con. L.R. 14. In Perry v Sidney Phillip & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1297 it was conceded that cost of cure (which was not effected or intended to be effected) was not the appropriate basis for assessing damages against a negligent surveyor; for the proper basis of assessment in such a case, see above, p.933 at nn.66–67.

<sup>86</sup> [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1729; cf. Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1435; The Rozel [1994] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 160 at 167.

<sup>87</sup> [1987] 1 W.L.R. 1729 at 1736.

<sup>88</sup> ibid. at 1738.

<sup>89</sup> e.g. Stewart v Rapley [1989] 1 E.G.L.R. 159.

<sup>90</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.51(3), below, p.947 at n.98.

<sup>91</sup> cf. Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc. v MacLaine Watson & Co (No.2) [1990] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 441 at 443 (seller’s damages); and (in tort) Dominion Mosaics & Tile Co Ltd v Trafalgar Trucking Co Ltd [1990] 2 All E.R. 246.

<sup>92</sup> [1996] A.C. 344; Coote [1997] C.L.J. 537.

<sup>93</sup> At 359; cf. Lord Lloyd’s scepticism at 374 as to the amount of the award.

<sup>94</sup> ibid. per Lord Lloyd; cf. below, pp.988, 990 at n.18.

either on the ground that the building contractor had not challenged this part of the award, or on the ground that, in contracts for making "home improvements", damages can (by way of exception to the general rule applicable to building contracts) include compensation for the customers "disappointed expectations"<sup>95</sup> arising from the contractor's failure to provide the degree of comfort or enjoyment which, to the contractor's knowledge, it was the customer's object to obtain.<sup>96</sup>

(2) Actual and market values

Where damages are based on difference in value (or on the cost of a substitute) they may be assessed by reference either to actual or to market values. There is said to be a "market" for goods if they can be freely bought or sold at a price fixed by supply and demand.<sup>97</sup>

(a) WHERE THERE IS A MARKET, the loss is prima facie quantified by reference to it; but other factors may also have to be taken into account.

(i) Non-delivery. If a seller of goods fails to deliver, the buyer can go into the market and buy substitute goods at the prevailing price. Thus his damages will prima facie be based on the amount (if any) by which the market price exceeds the contract price.<sup>98</sup> It is irrelevant that the seller has disposed of the goods to a third party for less than the market price.<sup>99</sup> Similarly, where breach by a carrier results in a failure of the goods to reach the agreed destination, the injured party's damages are based on the market value of the goods at that destination when they should have been delivered there.<sup>1</sup>

The principle of assessment by reference to the market price normally applies even though the injured party has resold an equivalent quantity of goods at a different price, in the expectation of receiving those due under the contract. Such a subsale does not reduce the damages if it is made below the market price<sup>2</sup> for the buyer is nevertheless "entitled to recover the expense of putting himself into the position of having those goods [i.e. those which the seller has failed to deliver], and this he can do by going into the market and purchasing them at the market price".<sup>3</sup> So long as the subsale was not of the identical goods bought under the main contract, the buyer might have been able to supply his sub-buyer from some other source before the market rose. He could then have resold the goods bought from the defendant to a third party and made a further profit. Conversely the subsale will not increase the damages if it was made above the

<sup>95</sup> [1996] A.C. 344 at 374.

<sup>96</sup> ibid. pp.360–361, per Lord Mustill; cf. Freeman v Niroomand (1996) 52 Con. L.R. 116; and see below, pp.989–991.

<sup>97</sup> Dunkirk Colliery Co v Lever (1878) 9 Ch.D. 20; WL Thompson Ltd v Robinson (Gunmakers) Ltd [1955] Ch. 177; Charter v Sullivan [1957] 2 Q.B. 117. A "black" market may be taken into account: Mouatt v Betts Motors Ltd [1959] A.C. 71; but not a "monopoly market" fixed by a government: The Texaco Melbourne [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 303 at 312, reversed on other grounds [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473.

<sup>98</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.51(3); cf. The Elena D'Amico [1980] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 75 (failure to provide a ship under charterparty); Murray v Lloyd [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1060 (market cost of substitute accommodation awarded against negligent solicitor).

<sup>99</sup> cf. Barry v Davis [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1962, where s.51(3) was applied by analogy to the case of an auctioneer's wrongful refusal to knock goods down to the highest bidder (above, pp.11, 142).

<sup>1</sup> Rodocanachi Sons & Co v Milburn Bros (1876) 18 Q.B.D. 67; The Texaco Melbourne [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473 at 479; cf. Watts, Watts & Co v Mitsui & Co Ltd [1917] A.C. 227. Expenses saved by the shipper, such as the freight that he would have had to pay if the goods had duly arrived and (in case of failure to ship) insurance premiums are deducted from the amount recoverable on the principle of taking the claimant's overall position into account (above p.933).

<sup>2</sup> Williams Bros. v ET Agius Ltd [1914] A.C. 510; cf. Rodocanachi, Sons & Co v Milburn Bros (1886) 18 Q.B.D. 67; Brading v F McNeill & Co Ltd [1946] Ch. 145.

<sup>3</sup> Williams Bros v ET Agius Ltd above, at 531.

market price, even if the seller knew that the buyer intended to resell.<sup>4</sup> The buyer's extra loss is either not caused by the seller's breach, but by the buyer's failure to go into the market; or it is irrecoverable as the buyer ought to have mitigated by going into the market to buy a substitute to satisfy his sub-buyer.<sup>5</sup> Once again, however, the position would be different if the subsale had been "of the self-same thing"<sup>6</sup>; for in that case the buyer would not have been able to satisfy his sub-buyer with substitute goods. Consequently, he would have lost his profit on the subsale and could have recovered that loss, so long as it was not too remote.<sup>7</sup>

(ii) Late delivery. Where delay in delivery is a ground of rejection, and the right to reject is exercised, damages are assessed in the same way as for non-delivery.<sup>8</sup> But where late delivery is accepted, damages are assessed on a different basis, the contract price being irrelevant. The buyer's complaint in such a case is not that he has to go into the market to buy a substitute for more than he had originally agreed to pay. It is that he has got the goods at a time that was less advantageous to him than the delivery time fixed by the contract. If he intended, on receipt of the goods, to resell them in the market, he will accordingly have lost the amount by which their market value when they were delivered to him was less than their market value when they should have been delivered; and this amount will be recoverable provided that the chance of resale is not too remote a contingency.<sup>9</sup> It is, however, disputed whether a buyer's damages will be reduced if he has resold the goods for more than the market price at the time of actual delivery. In Wertheim v Chicoutimi Pulp Co<sup>10</sup> wood pulp was sold for delivery in September/November but not delivered till the following June. The market price per ton was 70s. at the time fixed for delivery and 42s. 6d. at the time of actual delivery. Prima facie the buyers' loss was therefore 27s. 6d. per ton. But they had resold the pulp at 65s. per ton and were able to pass it on to their sub-buyers at that price. The Privy Council held that the sellers could rely on the subsale to reduce the damages to 5s. per ton. To allow the buyers to recover 27s. 6d. would, it was said, enable them to make a profit out of the breach. But this is hard to fit in with the principles normally governing the assessment of damages.<sup>11</sup> Two possibilities exist in cases of this kind. First, the buyer has resold the very goods comprised in the main contract.<sup>12</sup> If so he has admittedly not lost 27s. 6d. per ton but it is difficult to see that he has lost anything at all; he would not have been free to sell the pulp in the market at 70s. per ton as he was bound to deliver it to his sub-buyer. Secondly, the buyer has resold an equivalent quantity. If so the subsale should be disregarded. Had the pulp been delivered in September/November it could have then been sold to a third party, and the sub-buyer could still have been satisfied with an

<sup>4</sup> Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 459 at 489.

<sup>5</sup> cf. below, p.976; Mobil North Sea Ltd v PJ Pipe & Valve Co [2001] EWCA Civ 741; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 289 at [30] (mitigation and causation "closely allied" concepts). The burden of proof on the issue whether the injured party ought to have mitigated is on the party in breach, whichever of the above rationales of the "market rule" is adopted: see Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] EWCA Civ 55; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 822, at [41].

<sup>6</sup> Williams Bros v E T Agius Ltd [1914] A.C. 510 at 523; cf. Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al-Essa [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1272; The Ines [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 144 at 159.

<sup>7</sup> See below, pp.965 et seq.; Re R & H Hall Ltd and WH Pim Jr (1928) 139 L.T. 50, where the contract itself expressly provided for resale, and it was not suggested that the resale prices were "out of the ordinary course of business": ibid. at 54; The Honam Jade [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 38.

<sup>8</sup> e.g. The Almare Seconda [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 433; cf. above, p.826.

<sup>9</sup> See below, pp.966–967, 974. In tort it has been held that this amount is not recoverable as damages for detention where the claimant's purpose was not to resell the goods but to use them for manufacturing purposes: Brandeis Goldschmidt & Co Ltd v Western Transport Ltd [1981] Q.B. 864.

<sup>10</sup> [1911] A.C. 301.

<sup>11</sup> Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 K.B. 11 at 23.

<sup>12</sup> cf. Williams Bros v E T Agius Ltd [1914] A.C. 510 at 530.

equivalent quantity bought in June at 42s. 6d. per ton. It is improbable that the buyer would have kept the pulp throughout this period on a falling market. On the other hand, if (in view of the delay) the buyer "had bought other goods and used them for the sub-contract he would have been left with the goods delivered at the time when the market price was 42s. 6d. instead of when it was 70s".<sup>13</sup> Nor is it right to say that the buyer would make a profit out of the breach of contract if he were awarded 27s. 6d. a ton. He would make a profit out of the advantageous subsale.

(iii) Defective delivery: in general. Where defective goods are delivered, and are not (or can no longer be) rejected, the buyer's loss is prima facie the difference between the actual value of the goods that he has received and the value that they would have had if they had been in accordance with the contract.<sup>14</sup> As in cases of late delivery, the difference between the contract and the market price is not relevant<sup>15</sup>; the buyer's complaint is not that he will have to buy an equivalent elsewhere, but that he has got something of lower value than that which he should have received. A subsale is again ignored<sup>16</sup>; unless it is of the very goods comprised in the original contract.<sup>17</sup>

A case of defective delivery which gives rise to much difficulty is Bence Graphics International Ltd v Fasson UK Ltd.<sup>18</sup> Vinyl film had been sold for use in the buyers' business of manufacturing decals which their customers attached to containers used in the carriage of goods. It was a term of the contract of sale that the decals were to have a "life" of five years; and this term was broken so that the film delivered was "worthless".<sup>19</sup> The defect being not immediately apparent, the buyers used the film for making decals; these were in turn defective, so that the buyers were faced with many complaints from their customers, though only with one relatively minor<sup>20</sup> claim; this was settled by the buyers who were compensated in this respect by the sellers. At first instance, the buyers recovered the whole of the price that they had paid since the film delivered had no value and since there was no evidence, other than the price, of the value which it would have had, if it had been in conformity with the contract. On appeal it was held by a majority that the sellers were liable for no more than the price of a small quantity of film which the buyers had returned,<sup>21</sup> plus the amount of the buyers' liability to the ultimate users of the decals; any loss in excess of this amount was regarded as too remote.<sup>22</sup> It may, however, with respect be doubted whether the case gave rise to any issue of remoteness. If a seller contracts to deliver an ounce of gold for £210 (its market value) and instead delivers an ounce of base metal worth only £5, there is no doubt that he is liable for £205; and this liability is not subject to any test of remoteness.<sup>23</sup> That test would apply only if he had suffered some further loss as a result (for example) of his use of the subject-matter; but no such claim was in issue in the Bence Graphics case.<sup>24</sup> A pure "difference in value" claim could, indeed, sometimes be resisted on the ground that the

<sup>13</sup> Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 K.B. 11 at 23–24.

<sup>14</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3). For application of the same principle where goods arrive damaged as a result of a carrier's breach, see Vinmar International Ltd v Theresa Navigation SA [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at [56].

<sup>15</sup> cf. Commercial Fibres (Ireland) Ltd v Zabiada [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 27.

<sup>16</sup> Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 K.B. 11.

<sup>17</sup> As in Champanhac Ltd v Waller Ltd [1948] 2 All E.R. 724.

<sup>18</sup> [1998] Q.B. 87; Treitel, 113 L.Q.R. 188.

<sup>19</sup> [1998] Q.B. 87 at 108, where it is also said that the sellers "always accepted" this.

<sup>20</sup> Relating to 349 out of over 100,000 decals produced.

<sup>21</sup> Worth £22,000; £564,328 had been paid for the whole amount supplied.

<sup>22</sup> This follows from the reliance by the majority on the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex. 341 (below p.965) and Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(2), which is thought to embody that rule.

<sup>23</sup> See below, p.972.

<sup>24</sup> It would have arisen if the buyers' customers had made unexpectedly large claims against them.

buyer had not lost that difference because he had passed the subject-matter on to a sub-buyer for a price which took no account of the defect. But this would be the position only where the subsale was of the very goods comprised in the contract and could be performed only by delivery of those goods.<sup>25</sup> In such a case the goods in the buyer's hands would be worth the amount for which he had resold them; but where the subsale is not of those very goods, the buyer does suffer the "difference in value" loss since he could have used other goods to satisfy his sub-buyer and would then have been left with the goods bought under the broken contract. If he succeeds in disposing of those goods under an advantageous subsale, then it should be "immaterial that by some good fortune with which the [sellers] have nothing to do he has been able to recoup himself what he paid for those goods".<sup>26</sup> This was the position in the Bence Graphics case, where the buyers were under no obligation to their customers to use the material supplied by the sellers.<sup>27</sup> From this point of view, the decision is open to the same criticisms as those which have been discussed above in relation to Wertheim's case.<sup>28</sup> It is respectfully submitted that the buyers' claim in the Bence Graphics case should have been upheld<sup>29</sup> and that any "windfall" which they might in this way have obtained would have been obtained by the grace of those of their customers, who had made no claims against them. There seems to be no reason why this indulgence should benefit the sellers who in breach of contract had delivered goods which they admitted to be worthless and who had received a price based on the warranted quality of those goods.

Where the market value of the goods has fallen between the making of the contract and the defective delivery, the buyer will normally wish to reject; for in this way he will be able to avoid the loss resulting, not from the breach, but from the fall in the market. If, however, he has lost the right to reject, his only remedy will be in damages, and those damages are prima facie recoverable only in respect of the defect, and not in respect of the fall in the market. In one case,<sup>30</sup> a contract for the sale of beans stipulated for shipment by the end of August but the seller delivered a September shipment. By the time of breach the market value of the beans had fallen some £2,000 below the contract price, so that the buyer would certainly have rejected if he had known of the defect in time. But he had "accepted"<sup>31</sup> the goods and it was held that the damages to which he was entitled were no more than nominal as there was no difference between the market value of an August and a September shipment and as the fall in the value of the goods since the time of contracting was not a loss which had resulted<sup>32</sup> from the seller's breach. There may, however, in cases of this kind, be a defect, not only in the goods, but also in the documents which the seller is obliged by the contract to tender<sup>33</sup> and the buyer may have accepted the documents without knowing of the defects in them,<sup>34</sup> paid the price, and so have been deprived (whether as a matter of law or of business<sup>35</sup>) of the chance to

<sup>25</sup> See above, at n.17.

<sup>26</sup> Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 K.B. 11 at 18.

<sup>27</sup> per Morland J. at first instance, unreported, December 14, 1994, Transcript, p.10.

<sup>28</sup> [1911] A.C. 301; above, p.949.

<sup>29</sup> Subject only to a deduction in respect of the claim referred to in n.21, above. In The Selda [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 729 at 733, the Bence Graphics case was cited with approval, but not on the point here under discussion.

<sup>30</sup> Taylor v Bank of Athens (1922) 27 Com.Cas. 142.

<sup>31</sup> See above, pp.384, 816.

<sup>32</sup> Within Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(2).

<sup>33</sup> Especially under c.i.f. contracts, as to which see above, pp.675, 768.

<sup>34</sup> For the significance of this point, see Vargas Pena v Peter Cremer GmbH [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 392, below, n.36.

<sup>35</sup> This was the position in Kmei Tek Chao v British Traders [1954] 2 Q.B. 459.

reject the goods. In such a case the buyer can get damages on the footing that the defect in the documents was the cause of his losing the chance to reject the goods on a falling market; and he can do so even though the fact that the goods are not of the contract description has in no way affected their value.<sup>36</sup> For this reason it has been rightly said that there is "little merit"<sup>37</sup> in such a claim; and it is available only where there is a defect both in the documents and in the goods, each giving rise to an independent right to reject.<sup>38</sup>

(iv) Defective delivery: consumer sales. Where non-conforming goods are delivered to a buyer who deals as consumer, the buyer has in certain circumstances the right to require the seller "to reduce the purchase price of the goods in question to the buyer by an appropriate amount".<sup>39</sup> This concept of a price reduction is taken from the Civil law, where the price of non-conforming goods is reduced in the proportion which the actual value of the goods bears to the value which they would have had, if they had been in conformity with the contract.<sup>40</sup> Such a reduction is not the same as the "difference in value" measure discussed above<sup>41</sup>: the Civil law price reduction would yield more than that measure if the buyer had agreed to pay more than the value of the goods if they had been in conformity with the contract, and less if the buyer had agreed to pay less than that value.<sup>42</sup> It remains to be seen whether the English courts will, in interpreting the phrase "an appropriate amount", apply the Civil law principle of proportionate price reduction. Even if they do apply it, the buyer will not be prejudiced where the price reduction would yield less than difference in value, since the right to a "price reduction" is additional<sup>43</sup> to his other rights in respect of the breach. For the same reason, a buyer who claims a price reduction is also not precluded from claiming damages for consequential losses<sup>44</sup> such as personal injury caused by defects in the goods.

(v) Refusal to accept and pay. If a buyer of goods refuses to accept and pay for goods sold to him, the seller can go into the market and sell the goods at the prevailing price. He will then prima facie lose the amount (if any) by which the contract price exceeds the

<sup>36</sup> James Finlay & Co Ltd v NV Kwik Hoo Tong HM [1929] 1 K.B. 400; Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 459; Kleinjan & Holst NV Rotterdam v Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH [1972] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 11; The Kastellon [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 203. Contrast Vargas Pena v Peter Cremer GmbH [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 394 where such damages were held not to be available to a buyer who knew of the defect in the documents when he accepted them, for in that situation the loss was not caused by the breach but by the buyer's decision to accept the documents.

<sup>37</sup> The Kastellon, above, at 207 (where the seller was not to blame for the defect in the documents).

<sup>38</sup> Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§19–182 to 19–193; Procter & Gamble Philippine Manufacturing Corp v Kurt A Becher [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 21; Treitel [1988] L.M.C.L.Q. 457. The principle on which "market loss" damages were denied in the "negligent valuation" cases (such as the South Australian Asset Management case [1997] A.C. 191, above p.938) does not apply in the present group of cases in which (1) the question is one of causation, while in those cases no such question arises (above, p.939); and (2) the scope of the seller's duty is always the same (to tender conforming documents relating to conforming goods), while those cases turn entirely on the scope of the valuer's duty (i.e. on whether it is one to inform or one to advise): see Benjamin, op.cit., §19–197.

<sup>39</sup> s.48C(1) and (2), as inserted by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002, SI 2002/3045, reg.5, implementing Dir.1999/44.

<sup>40</sup> See German Civil Code (BGB) §472; Vienna Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods, Art.50 lays down the same formula.

<sup>41</sup> i.e. in Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3), above, p.950.

<sup>42</sup> Suppose that the goods would have been worth £15.00 if in conformity with the contract but because of their non-conformity they are worth only £10.00. Under the formula stated in n.40, above, price reduction would yield £2.00 if the price had been £6.00, and £7.00 if the price had been £21.00. Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3) would yield £5.00 whatever the price was.

<sup>43</sup> Heading before Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48A, as inserted by the Regulations referred to at n.39 above.

<sup>44</sup> See above, p.943.

market price<sup>45</sup>; and it is normally<sup>46</sup> irrelevant that the seller has actually resold for a different price.<sup>47</sup> If the market price exceeds the contract price, the seller generally suffers no loss. But this is not always true. The contract may provide for an advance payment without which the seller himself cannot get the goods. If the buyer fails to make this payment, the seller suffers loss even though the market price has risen above the contract price: he loses a good bargain because he is not in a position to take advantage of a rising market. Subject to the rules of remoteness,<sup>48</sup> the buyer will be liable for such a loss.<sup>49</sup> The market may also be relevant where the buyer's breach takes the form of delay in taking delivery. If the contract provides that the price is to depend on the market price at the time of taking delivery, and that price falls between the time when delivery should have been, and when it was, taken, the seller will be entitled to damages in respect of that difference.<sup>50</sup>

(b) WHERE THERE IS NO MARKET, the loss must be quantified in some other, and sometimes more speculative, way.<sup>51</sup>

(i) Failure to deliver. If a seller or carrier fails to deliver goods which cannot be replaced by buying in the market, the court must assess the loss as best it can: relevant factors include the cost of the goods and of their carriage, and a reasonable profit.<sup>52</sup> Where the goods have actually been resold, the resale price is evidence of their value, but not conclusive evidence. The weight of the evidence will depend on such factors as the interval between the wrong and the resale and the extent of fluctuations in the market price of other similar goods.<sup>53</sup> When the court takes the latter factor into account, it may be said to have regard to a substitute market; and a similar process is sometimes adopted where there is no market at the place where delivery should have been made, but there is a market for goods of the kind in question elsewhere. It may be reasonable for the injured party to resort to that other market,<sup>54</sup> and damages may then be based on the cost of doing so at the time of breach.<sup>55</sup>

Where goods are bought for use, the cost of acquiring a substitute is in principle the correct measure. In one case this was assessed as the scrap value of the goods, and this assessment, though described in the Court of Appeal as "surprising"<sup>56</sup> was held not to be incorrect in principle. At first sight, the scrap value might seem to be an inappropriate

<sup>45</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.50(3). For administrative expenses, see above, p.943.

<sup>46</sup> i.e. subject to the qualifications stated (in the converse case of breach by the seller) on p.884, above, at nn.6-7.

<sup>47</sup> Campbell Mostyn Provisions Ltd v Barnett Trading Co [1954] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 65; Texaco Ltd v Eurogulf Shipping Co Ltd [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 541 at 546; cf. Jamal v Moolla Dawood Son & Co [1916] 1 A.C. 175 (shares).

<sup>48</sup> See below, pp.965-974.

<sup>49</sup> cf. Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co Ltd [1952] 2 Q.B. 297.

<sup>50</sup> cf. Addax Ltd v Arcadia Petroleum Ltd [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 493.

<sup>51</sup> cf. Luxmoore-May v Messenger May Baverstock [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1009 at 1027.

<sup>52</sup> O'Hanlan v GW Ry (1865) 6 B. & S. 484; Schulze v GE Ry (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 30; The Texaco Melbourne [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473 at 479; cf. The Pegase [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 175 at 183 (late delivery); Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc. v MacLaine Watson & Co (No.2) [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 441 at 443. cf. Quorum A/S v Schramm [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 147 at [100] et seq. (assessment of reduction in value of work of art as a result of fire damage).

<sup>53</sup> Contrast France v Gaudet (1871) L.R. 6 Q.B. 196 and Stroud v Austin & Co (1883) Cab. & El. 119 with The Arpad [1934] p.189 and The Athenian Harmony [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 410 at 416.

<sup>54</sup> The reasonableness of such action will depend on (inter alia) the distance of the market from the place where delivery was to have been made: see Lesters Leather & Skin Co Ltd v Home Overseas Brokers Ltd (1949) 82 Ll.L.Rep. 203 at 205.

<sup>55</sup> So that loss due to currency fluctuations after that time will not be taken into account: see The Texaco Melbourne [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473.

<sup>56</sup> The Alecos M [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 120 at 125; Treitel, 107 L.Q.R. 364.

measure where goods were, to the seller's knowledge, bought for use, since it can hardly represent the cost of acquiring a substitute. But the case can perhaps be explained on the ground that the goods in question were a spare part which was not immediately needed by the buyer and might never have been needed by him. In these circumstances the purchase of a substitute by the buyer might have been an unreasonable augmentation of his loss<sup>57</sup> which would be irrecoverable under the mitigation rules.<sup>58</sup>

(ii) Failure to accept and pay. If there is no market, the seller's damages for non-acceptance would prima facie be quantified by reference to the actual proceeds of a substitute sale,<sup>59</sup> so long as that transaction was in all the circumstances a reasonable one. As in the case of failure to deliver, the substitute transaction would be evidence of the value of the goods at the time of breach only if it was concluded at, or close to, that time. If the seller did not resell, the value of the goods left on his hands would have to be assessed according to the general criteria stated above<sup>60</sup>; and his damages would prima facie be the amount (if any) by which the contract price exceeded that value.

(c) OTHER LOSS. The market and other related rules just stated do not form the limit of recovery. They deal only with the problem of valuing one element of the claimant's loss, namely his expectation of getting either the goods or the price. In addition, the claimant may be able to recover damages for loss of profits. Suppose that a seller has wrongfully failed to deliver goods which the buyer has subsold at a profit. Even if the resale price is not good evidence of value,<sup>61</sup> it may nevertheless be taken into consideration in assessing the buyer's damages for loss of profits. Under the rules of remoteness, however, the seller is liable for loss of resale profit only<sup>62</sup> if he knew or could have contemplated<sup>63</sup> that the goods were required for resale,<sup>64</sup> and even then he is not liable for loss of an extraordinary profit unless he is notified of the possibility that such a profit may accrue.<sup>65</sup> If, on the other hand, there is no market and the resale price is good evidence of the value of the goods the seller's liability is based on the amount of it, quite irrespective of his state of knowledge.<sup>66</sup> Where the seller is in breach by reason of a defect in the goods, the buyer may similarly (and subject to the rules of remoteness) be able to recover from the seller damages which he has paid, or for which he has become liable, to his sub-buyer in respect of the defect.<sup>67</sup>

The possibility of claiming additional damages for loss of profits also exists where a buyer wrongfully refuses to accept and pay for goods. Here the seller may expect both to get the price and to make a profit; and he may lose the profit even though he manages to resell the goods for exactly the same (or even a higher) price to another buyer. The point may be illustrated by cases in which car-dealers have claimed damages for loss of profits from customers who had agreed to buy cars and then in breach of contract

<sup>57</sup> Rusley Electronics and Construction Co Ltd v Forsyth [1996] A.C. 344 at 321–372.

<sup>58</sup> See below, p.978.

<sup>59</sup> Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444; cf. The Noel Bay [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 361 (damages for charterer's repudiation based on substitute voyage).

<sup>60</sup> At n.52.

<sup>61</sup> e.g. because the interval between the breach and the resale was too long, as in The Arpad, above, n.53.

<sup>62</sup> Schulze v GE Ry (1887) 19 Q.B.D. 30.

<sup>63</sup> See below, pp.965–974.

<sup>64</sup> Borries v Hutchinson (1865) 18 C.B.(N.S.) 445; Grébert-Borgnis v Nugent (1885) 15 Q.B.D. 85; Patrick v Russo-British Grain Export Co Ltd [1927] 2 K.B. 535; Household Machines v Cosmos Exporters Ltd [1947] 1 K.B. 217; J Leavey & Co Ltd v GH Hirst & Co Ltd [1944] K.B. 24.

<sup>65</sup> See below, p.969.

<sup>66</sup> See below, pp.973–974.

<sup>67</sup> Total Liban SA v Vital Energy SA [2001] Q.B. 643.

refused to accept them. Three situations can be distinguished. First, the sale is of a new car and the supply of cars of the contract description at the dealer's disposal exceeds the demand. Here the dealer's claim will succeed<sup>68</sup>; for he would, if the original customer had not defaulted, have been able to make a sale both to him and to the second customer: hence he would have made two profits,<sup>69</sup> one of which has been lost. Secondly, the sale is of a new car and the demand for cars of the contract description exceeds the supply available to the dealer. Here his claim will fail<sup>70</sup>; for the number of sales that he can make depends on the number of cars that he can get and not on the number of customers that he can find. Hence the default of the original customer does not reduce the number of profits that he can earn. Thirdly, the sale is of a second-hand car. In Lazenby Garages Ltd v Wright,<sup>71</sup> it was held that a second-hand BMW car was a "unique" object; and as the car was resold for more than the original price to a second customer, the original customer (who had refused to take it) was not liable for loss of profit. No such loss had been suffered in respect of the car in question; and the possibility that the dealer might have sold a different car to the second customer was dismissed as too remote.<sup>72</sup> Whether it is too remote perhaps depends on the type of car concerned. If the car had been of a kind more commonly sold after use as a "fleet" car, the dealer's chance of selling another (virtually identical) car to a second customer might have been regarded as sufficiently great to satisfy the test of remoteness. Even where the original customer is not liable for loss of profits, any expense of negotiating the second sale can presumably be recovered from him as "incidental" loss.<sup>73</sup>

(3) Speculative damages

A contracting party can recover damages if he can show that the breach has caused<sup>74</sup> him to lose the chance of gaining benefit. So long as the contingencies on which that chance depends are not wholly within the control of the party in breach,<sup>75</sup> the injured party can recover damages for loss of such a chance; he need not show that it was certain that he would have got the benefit if the contract had been performed. Thus damages can be

<sup>68</sup> WL Thompson Ltd v Robinson (Gunmakers) Ltd [1955] Ch. 177; cf. Re Vic Mill [1913] 1 Ch. 465. For the application of similar principles to contracts other than sale, where supply exceeds demand, see Inter-Office Telephones Ltd v Robert Freeman & Co Ltd [1958] 1 Q.B. 190; Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1428; Western Web Offset Printers Ltd v Media Ltd, The Times, October 10, 1995.

<sup>69</sup> cf. Jebson v E & W India Dock Co (1875) L.R. 10 C.P. 300.

<sup>70</sup> Charter v Sullivan [1957] 2 Q.B. 117.

<sup>71</sup> [1976] 1 W.L.R. 459.

<sup>72</sup> See below, pp.965 et seq.

<sup>73</sup> See above, p.943.

<sup>74</sup> For the requirement of causation, see Allied Maples Group Ltd v Simmons & Simmons [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1602 at 1623; North Sea Energy Holdings NV v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483 at 494; Bank of Credit and Commercial International v Ali (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 82; [2002] I.C.R. 1258 esp. at [42], [65] and [97].

<sup>75</sup> See Lavarack v Woods of Colchester Ltd [1967] 1 Q.B. 278. Quaere, whether Blackpool & Fylde Aero Club Ltd v Blackpool BC [1990] 1 W.L.R. 1195 (above, p.15) was not a case of this kind. Where a payment such as an employee's bonus is at the employer's discretion, the decision whether to pay it is not wholly within the latter's control if the discretion must be exercised in good faith: Clark v BET [1997] I.R.L.R. 348. In Commonwealth of Australia v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1992) 66 A.L.J.R. 123, loss of profits on future contracts which the defendants would probably have awarded to the injured party (without being bound to do so) were taken into account in assessing damages. But the claim was for reliance loss and the lost chance was taken into account for the purpose of the rule that such loss is recoverable only to the extent to which it will not leave the injured party better off than he would have been, if the contract had been performed: above, pp.941–942. It does not follow that damages would have been awarded for loss of the chance.

recovered for loss of the chance of taking part in a beauty contest,<sup>76</sup> for loss of the chance of earning tips,<sup>77</sup> for loss of the chance of obtaining pension benefits which depend on the exercise of discretion by a government department<sup>78</sup>; for loss of the chance of appealing against an arbitration award<sup>79</sup>; for loss of the chance of avoiding or of successfully contesting a criminal prosecution<sup>80</sup>; and for loss of the chance (of which clients had been deprived by the negligence of solicitors acting for them in property transactions) of bringing a claim against a third party<sup>81</sup> or of negotiating terms which could have protected the clients from liabilities to third parties.<sup>82</sup> The concept of loss of a chance is also used where the chance is not one of gaining some specific benefit or of avoiding some specific harm. In this more generalised sense,<sup>83</sup> damages for loss of a chance can be recovered for loss of profits expected to arise from transactions not yet concluded at the time of breach. A carrier of samples who delays in delivering them may thus be liable for loss of profits on contracts which the owner might have made, had he got the samples in time.<sup>84</sup> And a person who breaks a contract to deliver a profit-earning thing may be liable for the profits which the other party might have made by using the thing.<sup>85</sup>

The quantification of damages in such cases is necessarily speculative.<sup>86</sup> It depends on the value of the expected benefit and the likelihood of the claimant's actually getting it. The chance of winning a beauty contest is obviously worth less than the full prize. In deciding how much the chance is worth the court will consider (1) the number of contingencies on which it depends: "the more contingencies, the lower the value of the chance"<sup>87</sup>; and (2) the likelihood of their being satisfied in the claimant's favour: the greater this likelihood, the higher the value of the chance.<sup>88</sup>

The injured party may, as a result of the breach, save the cost of getting the chance. That cost must then be deducted from the damages for loss of the chance, so that no such damages will be recoverable if the cost saved is equal to or greater than the value of the chance.<sup>89</sup>

<sup>76</sup> Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 K.B. 786, described in Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Ali (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 82; [2002] I.C.R. 1258 at [63] as "not ultimately a case of third party volition at all, but it seems to have been treated as if it was"; cf. Watson v Ambergate, etc., Ry (1851) 15 Jur. 448. Contrast McGlory v Post Office [1992] I.C.R. 758 (no damages for loss of chance to work overtime); Reece, 59 M.L.R. 188.

<sup>77</sup> Manubens v Leon [1919] 1 K.B. 208.

<sup>78</sup> Scally v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1992] 1 A.C. 294.

<sup>79</sup> Corfield v Boshier & Co [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 163.

<sup>80</sup> Acton v Graham Pearce & Co [1997] 3 All E.R. 909.

<sup>81</sup> Harrison v Bloom Camillin (No.2) [2000] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 89.

<sup>82</sup> Allied Maples Group Ltd v Simmons & Simmons [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1602; cf. Stovold v Barlows, The Times, October 30, 1995 (loss of chance of concluding a sale).

<sup>83</sup> See Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Ali (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 82; [2002] I.C.R. 1258 at [64].

<sup>84</sup> e.g. Simpson v L & NW Ry (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 274; below, p.970.

<sup>85</sup> e.g. Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd [1949] 2 K.B. 528; below, pp.965–966.

<sup>86</sup> The requirement of causation stated at n.74 above is satisfied only if the chance lost is "a real or substantial" chance as opposed to a speculative one": see the authorities cited in that note. But the value of even a "real or substantial" chance is necessarily speculative, depending on the factors stated at nn.87 and 88, below.

<sup>87</sup> Hall v Meyrick [1957] 2 Q.B. 455, 471 (actual decision reversed on another ground, ibid. 474); Obagi v Stanborough (Developments) (1995) 69 P. & C.R. 573; First Interstate Bank of California v Cohen Arnold & Co. [1995] E.G.C.S. 188; Ministry of Defence v Wheeler [1998] 1 All E.R. 790.

<sup>88</sup> e.g. Dickinson v Jones Alexander & Co [1993] 2 F.L.R. 521; cf. Allied Maples Group Ltd v Simmons & Simmons [1999] 1 W.L.R. 1602 at 1622–1623.

<sup>89</sup> Supwell v Bass [1910] 2 K.B. 486, as explained in Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 K.B. 786 at 796 (foals to be born not shown to be worth more than stud fee).

The court will award speculative damages where no other course is, in the nature of things, open to it. It will not do so where the claimant could have provided evidence as to the value of the bargain that he has lost, and has simply failed to do so.<sup>90</sup>

(4) Taxation

The value of the claimant's loss may be affected by the incidence of taxation. In BTC v Gourley<sup>91</sup> a person who was injured by the negligence of the defendant's servants, and claimed damages for loss of earnings. It was estimated that, but for the accident, the injured party would have earned £37,000. Had he actually earned this sum, it would have been taxed and £6,000 would have been left to him. But had he been awarded damages of £37,000 he could have kept the whole amount, since damages for loss of earnings resulting from personal injury are not taxable. The House of Lords held that the proper measure of damages was £6,000, that being the amount of the injured party's actual loss. Gourley's case was an action in tort, but the same principle can apply where the liability is contractual, e.g. in assessing damages for wrongful dismissal.<sup>92</sup>

The reason for the rule is that the injured party ought not to make a profit out of the wrong by getting tax-free damages to compensate for loss of a benefit which would have been taxable. Thus the rule applies only if two conditions are satisfied. First, the damages must be compensation for loss of a taxable income or gain, and not simply for loss of a capital asset. Thus the rule would probably not apply if a buyer of goods claimed the amount by which their market value exceeded the contract price. These damages are meant to compensate him for failure to obtain a capital asset (out of which he might make a profit or a loss.)<sup>93</sup> Secondly, the damages themselves must not be taxable in the hands of the victim of the breach.<sup>94</sup> Damages for wrongful dismissal are now taxable to the extent that they exceed £30,000.<sup>95</sup> Hence such damages must be reduced by reference to the claimant's income-tax liability where his loss of income is less than £30,000<sup>96</sup>; where it is more, the court will assess his net loss and then award such sum as, after tax on the sum so assessed, would be equal to that loss.<sup>97</sup>

The rule in Gourley's case has been much criticised. It is said to involve a paradox: for revenue purposes damages for loss of earnings are treated as compensation for loss of a

<sup>90</sup> Clark v Kirby-Smith [1964] Ch. 506, 512.

<sup>91</sup> [1956] A.C. 185; Jolowicz [1959] C.L.J. 85; Tucker, ibid. 185; Hall, 73 L.Q.R. 212; Smith, 1956 S.L.T. 13; Baxter, 19 M.L.R. 373; Bishop and Kay, 103 L.Q.R. 211. cf. Otter v Church, Adams, Tatham & Co [1953] Ch. 280 (death duties). Cooper v Firth Brown Ltd [1963] 1 W.L.R. 418 (national insurance contributions); Dems v NCB [1988] A.C. 1 (compulsory pension contribution).

<sup>92</sup> Beach v Reed Corrugated Cases Ltd [1956] 1 W.L.R. 807; Re Houghton Main Colliery [1956] 1 W.L.R. 1219; Phipps v Orthodox Unit Trusts Ltd [1958] 1 Q.B. 314. Contrast the position in cases of breach of trust: Bartlett v Barclays Bank Trust Co [1980] Ch. 515; Re Bell's Indenture [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1217; cf. John v James [1986] S.T.C. 352 (liability to account for breach of fiduciary duty under contract).

<sup>93</sup> cf. Spencer v MacMillan's Trustees, 1958 S.C. 300; Lim Foo Yong Ltd v Collector of Land Revenue [1963] 1 W.L.R. 295. But if goods are sold by a trader, damages for non-acceptance are taxable as receipts of his trade and so not subject to reduction in respect of tax: Deeny v Gonda Walker Ltd (No.2) [1996] 1 W.L.R. 426 at 432.

<sup>94</sup> Diamond v Campbell-Jones [1961] Ch. 22; PC Producers v Dalton [1957] R.P.C. 199; Herring v BTC [1958] T.R. 401; Raja's Commercial College v Gian Singh & Co Ltd [1977] A.C. 312; Dickinson v Jones Alexander & Co [1993] 2 F.L.R. 521. Deeny v Gonda Walker Ltd (No.2) [1996] 1 W.L.R. 426.

<sup>95</sup> Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, ss.148, 188(4), as amended by Finance Act 1988, s.74. Payments in lieu of damages for dismissal must be distinguished from payments made as part of an agreed variation of a contract which continues after the variation: such payments are taxable even if they are less than £30,000: see McGregor v Randall [1984] 1 All E.R. 1092.

<sup>96</sup> Parsons v BNM Laboratories Ltd [1964] 1 Q.B. 95.

<sup>97</sup> Bold v Brough, Nicholson & Hall Ltd [1964] 1 W.L.R. 201; Shove v Downs Surgical plc [1984] I.C.R. 582; Lee, 47 M.L.R. 471; Stewart v Glentagart 1963 S.C. (Ct. of Sess.) 300.

capital asset, since otherwise they would be taxable; while in assessing damages they are treated as compensation for loss of income, since otherwise the claimant's tax liability would be irrelevant.<sup>98</sup> A possible solution of this paradox is to say that the damages compensate the claimant for loss of earning capacity, which is a capital asset whose value depends on (amongst other things) the incidence of taxation.<sup>99</sup> Other criticisms are concerned with the practical effects of the rule. It is said that the rule enables the defendant to take advantage of wholly extraneous circumstances (e.g. that the claimant has a large private income); that it makes the assessment of damages highly speculative; and that the rule may make it cheaper to break a contract than to perform it. But similar criticisms could be made of other rules relating to damages, which have so far remained immune from them. Thus a seller can sometimes take advantage of an extraneous event, such as a subsale made by the buyer, in reducing damages for non-delivery<sup>1</sup>; speculative damages are by no means uncommon<sup>2</sup>; and it may often be cheaper to break a contract than to perform it: for example, where damages are assessed on a difference in value basis amounting only to a small fraction of the cost of performance.<sup>3</sup> The rule in Gourley's case has therefore survived the criticisms which have been levelled against it; and it can be supported<sup>4</sup> on the ground that it gives effect to the principle that damages are meant only to compensate the claimant for his actual loss.

A breach of contract may actually reduce the victim's tax liability. The amount of the reduction is then deducted from the damages for the breach, on the principle that the benefit of having to pay less tax in fact mitigates the victim's loss.<sup>5</sup>

(5) Alternatives

Where a contract entitles the party in breach to perform in alternative ways, damages are, as a general rule, assessed on the assumption that he would have performed in the way that is least burdensome to himself and least beneficial to the other party.<sup>6</sup> Thus if a voyage charterparty gives the charterer the power to choose between a number of different ports of discharge, damages for his failure to load will be assessed on the assumption that he would have chosen the most distant port and so have reduced the shipowner's profit.<sup>7</sup> Similarly, where a supplier of goods has an option as to the exact quantity to be delivered, damages for non-delivery will be based on the assumption that he would have delivered the smallest permissible quantity.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>98</sup> Jolowicz, above, n.91.

<sup>99</sup> Tucker, above, n.91. Damages for personal injury are not taxable as capital gains: Taxation of Chargeable Gains Act 1992 s.51(2).

<sup>1</sup> See above, p.949.

<sup>2</sup> See above, p.955.

<sup>3</sup> See above, p.944.

<sup>4</sup> See Law Reform Committee, 7th Report (1958) Cmnd. 501.

<sup>5</sup> Levison v Farin [1978] 2 All E.R. 1149; below, pp.980–982.

<sup>6</sup> Abrahams v Herbert Reich Ltd [1922] 1 K.B. 477; Withers v General Theatre Corp [1933] 2 K.B. 536; The Rijn [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 267; the rule may be excluded by express contrary stipulation: Yeoman Credit Ltd v Wragg [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1124; Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Bunge Corp [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 108, affirmed without reference to this point [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 476.

<sup>7</sup> Kaye S/N Co Ltd v W & R Barnett Ltd (1932) 48 T.L.R. 400; The Rijn [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 267 at 270; cf. Phoebe D Kyriamou Co v Wm H Pim Jr [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 570; The World Navigator [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 23 at 33.

<sup>8</sup> Re Thornett & Fehr and Yuills Ltd [1921] 1 K.B. 219. cf. the statement of the common law position in Page v Combined Shipping & Trading Co [1997] 3 All E.R. 656 at 660 (where the rule was displaced by Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993, SI 1993/3053, reg.17(7)). Where the contract does not clearly specify the supplier's options, these will have to be determined by the court as a matter of construction, as in Paula Lee Ltd v Robert Zehil Ltd [1983] 2 All E.R. 390.

The general rule just stated is subject to a number of qualifications. A contract of sale may, for example, give the seller an option as to the time of delivery by allowing him to deliver at any time chosen by him in a stated month. In such a case, damages for non-delivery will prima facie be assessed by reference to the market price at the end of the period. They will not be assessed by reference to the time during it when the market was lowest<sup>9</sup>; for such a rule would give rise to too much uncertainty. Moreover, the party who has the option may declare before breach that he will exercise it in a particular way. Damages will then be assessed on that basis<sup>10</sup> if the effect of the declaration is to bind him contractually to perform in the specified way.<sup>11</sup>

The above rules only apply where the obligation of the defendant is truly alternative. In Deverill v Burnell<sup>12</sup> the defendant undertook to transmit the proceeds of certain drafts to the plaintiff if they were paid; "and if the drafts should not be paid, the defendant should either return the same to the plaintiff or pay him the amount". The drafts were not paid but the defendant neither returned them nor paid the amount. In an action for the amount of the drafts the defendant argued that the obligation was alternative; that he could perform by returning the drafts; and that, as these were worthless, he was liable only for nominal damages. But he was held liable for the full amount. His undertaking was "not in the strictest sense an alternative promise, but a promise that the defendant would return the bills, and if he did not return them he would pay the amount of them".<sup>13</sup> The distinction is between a promise by A to do "X or Y" and a promise to do "X but, if X is not done, to do Y". In the first case, it is not possible to tell whether X or Y is due till A has exercised his choice between them; in the second, X is due but if X is not done (whether as a result of A's choice or for some other reason), then Y becomes due.<sup>14</sup> The defendant's obligation to pay (i.e. to do Y) was of the second kind: it was a contingent, rather than an alternative, one and became absolute on the occurrence of the condition, i.e. on failure to return the bills.

(6) Time for assessment

In times of fluctuating costs and values, it is important to know by reference to what point of time damages will be assessed.

(a) TIME OF BREACH. The starting principle is, or is generally assumed to be, that damages are assessed by reference to the time of breach. For example, where a buyer of goods fails to accept and pay for them [or a seller fails to deliver] the damages are prima facie the difference between the contract price and the market price "at the time or times when the goods ought to have been accepted [or delivered], or (if no time was fixed for acceptance [or delivery]) at the time of the refusal to accept [or deliver]".<sup>15</sup> The same principle of assessment by reference to the time of breach has been applied where a vendor of land wrongfully refused to convey.<sup>16</sup> The theory behind the rule is that any

<sup>9</sup> cf. Harlow & Jones Ltd v Panex (International) Ltd [1967] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509; Phoebus D Kyprianou Co v William H Pim Jr, above (buyer's breach); Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§20–111, 20–129.

<sup>10</sup> See The Delian Spirit [1972] 1 Q.B. 103 at 111–112; Shipping Co of India Ltd v Naviera Letasa S.A [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 132; Toprak Mahsulleri Ofisi v Finagrains Cie Commerciale [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 98.

<sup>11</sup> Contrast The Rijn, above, n.7, at 270 (where the declaration was not of this kind).

<sup>12</sup> (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 475.

<sup>13</sup> ibid. at 477.

<sup>14</sup> cf. above, p.892.

<sup>15</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.50(3), 51(3); cf. Jamal v Moolla Dawood Sons & Co [1916] 1 A.C. 175; The "Hé aux Moines" [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 262; Phillips v Ward [1956] 1 W.L.R. 471 at 474, 475, 478; Amerena v Burling [1993] E.G.C.S. 28; The Texaco Melbourne [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 473 at 476; and see above p.953, n.55.

<sup>16</sup> Diamond v Campbell-Jones [1961] Ch. 22 at 36; Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444 at 457.

loss suffered by reason of market movements after the time of breach is not caused by the breach, but rather by the injured party's failure to mitigate<sup>17</sup> by making a substitute contract. Since under the mitigation rules the claimant need only act reasonably, it follows that even the principle of assessment by reference to the time of breach is applied with some latitude. In C Sharpe & Co Ltd v Nosawa<sup>18</sup> a contract for the sale of peas required the seller to deliver on "about July 21" but no delivery was made. Goods of the precise contract quality were not available in the market. It was held that the buyers had "a reasonable time to consider their position"<sup>19</sup>; and accordingly the damages were assessed by reference to the market price of similar goods at the end of July.<sup>20</sup>

The principle of assessment by reference to the time of breach is based on two assumptions: that the injured party knows of the breach as soon as it is committed, and that he can at that time take steps to mitigate the loss which is likely to flow from it. Where the facts falsify these assumptions, the courts will depart from the principle, and assess the damages by reference to "such other date as may be appropriate in the circumstances".<sup>21</sup> In particular they will have regard to the time when the breach was, or could have been discovered; and to the question whether it was possible or reasonable for the injured party to make a substitute contract immediately on such discovery.

(b) TIME OF DISCOVERY OF BREACH. The injured party may not have known of the breach when it was committed and may have been unable, acting with reasonable diligence, to discover it at that time. The damages will then prima facie<sup>22</sup> be assessed by reference (at the earliest<sup>23</sup>) to the time when that party, so acting, could have made the discovery. For example, a seller may first "appropriate" goods to the contract by indicating which particular goods he intends to deliver under a contract for the sale of unascertained goods, and then deliver them. If those goods are not in conformity with the contract, the seller will be in breach at the time of appropriation, but the damages are prima facie assessed by reference to the later time of delivery.<sup>24</sup> Where goods are sent to the buyer in sealed packages, the damages may be assessed by reference to the even later time, at which it is reasonable to expect the packages to be opened and their contents examined.<sup>25</sup> Similarly, where a builder does defective work and damages are based on cost of cure, they will normally be assessed by reference to the time when the

<sup>17</sup> See below, p.977.

<sup>18</sup> [1917] 2 K.B. 814; cf. The Good Friend [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 586 at 596; Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 441 at 447.

<sup>19</sup> [1917] 2 K.B. 814 at 821; cf. Techno Land Improvements Ltd v British Leyland (UK) Ltd (1979) 252 E.G. 805 at 809; The Playa Larga [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 181.

<sup>20</sup> For similar reasons of convenience, the contract itself may provide for assessment by reference to a date other than that of breach: see, for example Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Vanden Avenne-Izegem P/VBA [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 109 at 117; Lusograin Comercio Internacional de Cereais Ltda v Bunge AG [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 654 at 658.

<sup>21</sup> Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 401; County Personnel (Employment Agency) Ltd v Pulver [1987] 1 W.L.R. 916; South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 221; quaere, whether time of breach was the appropriate time in Mahoney v Purnell [1996] 3 All E.R. 61 at 95–96. cf. Habton Farms v Nimmo [2003] E.W.C.A. Civ 68.

<sup>22</sup> The rule is only a prima facie one and will not apply to the extent that delay in discovering the breach had no adverse effect on the injured party's position: cf. above, p.934 and see Re Bell's Indenture [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1217 (a case of breach of trust).

<sup>23</sup> For assessment by reference to later times, see the following paragraphs (c) to (f) of the text.

<sup>24</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.53(3).

<sup>25</sup> Van den Hurk v R Martens & Co Ltd [1920] 1 K.B. 850; cf. The Hansa Nord [1976] Q.B. 44 (damages assessed by reference to time of arrival, though breach occurred on shipment); cf. above, pp.364–365 for similar principles governing damages in tort for misrepresentation.

customer, acting with reasonable diligence, could have discovered the defect.<sup>26</sup> Delay in discovering the defect may affect not only the time but also the very basis of assessment; for if at the time of discovery the cost of cure is disproportionately high in relation to the value of a sound building, or if cure has become as a practical matter impossible, the court will award damages on a difference in value basis.<sup>27</sup>

(c) POSSIBILITY OF ACTING ON KNOWLEDGE OF BREACH. Even if the injured party knows of the breach, it may be impossible for him to act on that knowledge by making a substitute contract so as to reduce the loss. For example, a buyer might wrongfully refuse to pay for goods after they had been despatched to him, and it might be impossible for the seller to resell them until they had reached their destination. In such a case the damages would be assessed by reference to the time at which the seller could reasonably resell, and not to the time of the buyer's refusal to pay.<sup>28</sup>

Impossibility of acting on knowledge of the breach may also be due to the fact that the buyer lacks the means to buy a substitute on a rising market. In Wroth v Tyler<sup>29</sup> the defendant had contracted to sell his house for £6,000. The sale was to be completed in October 1971, when the value of the house had risen to £7,500; but in July 1971 the defendant had wrongfully repudiated the contract. The buyers started proceedings for specific performance and damages; judgment was given in January 1973, when the house was worth £11,500. It was held that specific performance should not be ordered<sup>30</sup>; that damages should be awarded in lieu<sup>31</sup> and that these should be assessed by reference to the value of the house at the time, not of breach, but of judgment,<sup>32</sup> i.e. not at £1,500 but at £5,500. Since the buyers had (as the defendant knew)<sup>33</sup> no financial resources beyond the £6,000 they had raised to buy the house, they could not act on their knowledge of the breach by making a substitute purchase on a rapidly rising market.

(d) REASONABLENESS OF ACTING ON KNOWLEDGE OF BREACH. Even where it is possible for the injured party to make a substitute contract on discovering the breach, it may not be reasonable to expect him to do so because at that time there is still a reasonable probability that the defendant will make good his default. In such cases damages are prima facie assessed by reference to the time when that probability ceased to exist.<sup>34</sup> Thus if a seller of goods, after the delivery date has gone by, assures the buyer that he will deliver, but then declares his final inability to perform, the damages will be assessed by reference to the market at the date of that declaration.<sup>35</sup> Again, the injured

<sup>26</sup> East Ham BC v Bernard Sunley Ltd [1966] A.C. 406; subsequent increases in cost may be taken into account if it is reasonable to delay the work: see (in tort) Dodd Properties (Kent) Ltd v Canterbury CC [1980] 1 W.L.R. 433; London Congregational Union Inc v Harriss [1985] 1 All E.R. 334, varied on other grounds [1987] 1 All E.R. 15; and see Feldman and Libling, 75 L.Q.R. 271; Duncan Wallace, 96 L.Q.R. 101; Waddams, 97 L.Q.R. 445; Duncan Wallace, 98 L.Q.R. 406; Waddams, 1 O.J.L.S. 134.

<sup>27</sup> Applegate v Moss [1971] 1 Q.B. 406; King v Victor Parsons Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 801.

<sup>28</sup> See Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §20–128; cf. Shearson Lehman Hutton Inc v MacLaine Watson & Co Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 647 (dealings suspended at time of alleged breach).

<sup>29</sup> [1974] Ch. 30; for further discussion see below at n.37 and below, pp.972, 1048.

<sup>30</sup> See below, p.1026.

<sup>31</sup> See below, p.1047.

<sup>32</sup> For the possibility of assessment by reference to an even later time, see Grant v Dawkins [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1406.

<sup>33</sup> Wroth v Tyler [1974] Ch.30 at 57; but for this fact, the loss might (at least in part) have been too remote: below, p.972.

<sup>34</sup> Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262; Johnson Matthey Bankers Ltd v State Trading Corp of India [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 427 at 437–438. cf. in tort, IBL Ltd v Coussens [1991] 2 All E.R. 133. cf. Habton Farms v Nimmo [2003] EWCA Civ 68.

<sup>35</sup> Barnett v Javeri & Co [1916] 2 K.B. 390.

party may continue to press for performance after the agreed time, but finally elect to terminate on account of the breach: in such a case damages are assessed by reference to the date of termination.<sup>36</sup> A similar principle applies where the injured party brings an action for specific performance: thus a further explanation of the decision in Wroth v Tyler<sup>37</sup> is that the buyers could not be expected to make a substitute contract so long as their claim for specific performance was being maintained.<sup>38</sup> The same is true where an order of specific performance has actually been made but is not complied with, so that the injured party is eventually driven to abandon his attempt to enforce performance and to seek his remedy in damages: these are then assessed "as at the date when . . . the contract is lost".<sup>39</sup>

(c) LATE PERFORMANCE. If the party in default performs late and the other party suffers loss by reason of the delay, the damages for that loss will be assessed by reference to the date when performance actually was (and not by reference to the date when it should have been) rendered.<sup>40</sup>

(f) DAMAGES FOR ANTICIPATORY BREACH. The victim of an anticipatory breach can either continue to press for performance, or "accept" the breach.<sup>41</sup>

(i) Breach not accepted. If the injured party does not accept the breach, the principles (discussed above) as to the time for assessment apply. Assuming that subsequent events have not deprived the injured party of his right to damages,<sup>42</sup> the general rule is that those damages will be assessed by reference to the time when the contract ought to have been performed<sup>43</sup> and not by reference to the time of repudiation. The injured party is under no obligation to "accept" the breach. It follows that if the market moves so as to increase his loss between the time of repudiation and the time fixed for performance, he is entitled to damages assessed by reference to the latter time.<sup>44</sup>

(ii) Breach accepted. Where the injured party does accept the breach, he can start his action before the time fixed for performance; but the principle of assessment by reference to that time applies even in this type of case.<sup>45</sup> If the action comes to trial before the time fixed for performance, the damages will therefore necessarily be speculative, as they will be based on forecasts or guesses as to future market movements.<sup>46</sup> But where the injured party accepts the breach, the principle of assessment by reference to the time fixed for performance is subject to an important qualification: his damages will be reduced if, after accepting the breach, he fails to take

<sup>36</sup> Toprak Mahsulleri Ofisi v Finagrain Cie Commerciale [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 98; The Aktion [1987] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283.

<sup>37</sup> [1974] Ch. 30.

<sup>38</sup> Wroth v Tyler, above, as explained in Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262 at 1285–1286; Meng Leong Development Pty Ltd v Jip Hong Trading Co Pte Ltd [1985] A.C. 511; Domb v Isoz [1980] Ch. 548 at 559, where the injured party had bought another house before abandoning his claim for specific performance. This was said (at 559) to be irrelevant—presumably because, so long as that party was pursuing his claim for specific performance, it could not be said that the second house had been bought as a substitute for the first.

<sup>39</sup> Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 401; cf. Suleman v Shahsavari [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1181; Johnson & Co (Barbados) Ltd v NSR Ltd [1997] A.C. 400 at 411–412.

<sup>40</sup> Ozalid Group (Export) Ltd v African Continental Bank Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 231.

<sup>41</sup> See above, pp.857–865. Garnac Grain Co Inc v Faure & Fairclough Ltd [1968] A.C. 1130 at 1140.

<sup>42</sup> See above, pp.864–865 and below under heading (iii).

<sup>43</sup> Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Kamsing Knitting Factory [1979] A.C. 91.

<sup>44</sup> Tredgar Iron & Coal Co Ltd v Hamthorn Bros & Co (1902) 18 T.L.R. 716; under U.C.C. s.2–610(a) the injured party may await performance only "for a commercially reasonable time."

<sup>45</sup> Roper v Johnson (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 167; Melachrino v Nicholl & Knight [1920] 1 K.B. 693 at 699.

<sup>46</sup> As in Roper v Johnson, above.

reasonable steps to mitigate his loss.<sup>47</sup> Under this rule, the injured party may, and if there is a market generally will, be required to make a substitute contract; and his damages will be assessed by reference to the time when that contract should have been made. This will usually be the time of acceptance of the breach<sup>48</sup> (or such reasonable time thereafter as may be allowed under the rules stated above<sup>49</sup>). If it is disputed whether a substitute contract could indeed have been made, the burden of proving that the injured party could have made such a contract lies on the party in breach. If that burden is not discharged, the damages will prima facie be assessed by reference to the time fixed for performance.<sup>50</sup>

(iii) Effect of events after repudiation. Under the rules just stated, market movements after acceptance of an anticipatory breach may be relevant to the assessment of damages; but it is further possible for the very existence of the right to damages to depend on events (other than such a breach) that occur, or will probably occur, between acceptance of the breach and the time fixed for performance. This possibility is illustrated by cases in which charterparties gave charterers a right to cancel if the ship was not ready to load at a named port by a specified date, and the charterers then committed anticipatory breaches by purporting to cancel before that date. In The Simona<sup>51</sup> it was held that a shipowner who affirmed the contract in such circumstances was not entitled to damages if the charterer then lawfully cancelled again, after the cancelling date. From the emphasis placed in that case on the fact of affirmation,<sup>52</sup> it appears that the shipowner's claim could have succeeded if, instead of affirming, he had accepted the original wrongful cancellation as an anticipatory breach. But in The Mihalis Angelos<sup>53</sup> it was said that the shipowner's damages for such a wrongful<sup>54</sup> cancellation would (even if he had so accepted it) have been merely nominal, since in that case it was already clear at the time of that cancellation that the ship could not possibly have reached the port of loading by the specified date. Hence the charterer could have relied on the point that he would have been entitled to cancel on the ship's late arrival; and as it was found that he would certainly have exercised that right, the contract was of no value to the shipowner.<sup>55</sup> In The Simona it was, indeed, also accepted that the ship was not ready to load by the time of the second cancellation,<sup>56</sup> but it does not appear that this prospective inability was already clearly established at the time of the original (wrongful) cancellation. Hence if that cancellation had been accepted as an anticipatory breach, it would not at the time of that acceptance have been clear that the shipowner's rights under the contract were

<sup>47</sup> See below, p.977.

<sup>48</sup> Roth & Co v Taysen Townsend & Co (1895) 1 Com.Cas. 240; (1896) 12 T.L.R. 211.

<sup>49</sup> See C Sharpe & Co Ltd v Nosama [1917] 2 K.B. 814; above p.960; Kaines (UK) Ltd v Oesterreichische Warenhandels-gesellschaft Automaten etc [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1.

<sup>50</sup> Roper v Johnson (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 167. cf., in tort, Geest plc v Lansiquot [2002] UKPC 48; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 3111 at [13–14].

<sup>51</sup> [1989] A.C. 788.

<sup>52</sup> ibid. at 800–801; cf. above, p.865.

<sup>53</sup> [1971] 1 Q.B. 164; George [1971] J.B.L. 109.

<sup>54</sup> The actual decision was that the cancellation was justified by the shipowner's breach of condition: above, pp.790–791; cf. Walkinshaw v Diniz [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 165.

<sup>55</sup> [1971] 1 Q.B. 164 at 209–210; cf. ibid. 196, 202–203; cf. The Noel Bay [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 361 at 365; The World Navigator [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 23 at 32; North Sea Energy Holding NI v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483 at 496.

<sup>56</sup> The Simona [1989] A.C. 788 at 800.

worthless<sup>57</sup>; and the charterer could not have relied on the fact that they subsequently became worthless, since this state of affairs could have been induced by his wrongful repudiation, which could have led the shipowner to abandon any efforts which he might (but for the repudiation) have made to get the ship ready for loading by the cancelling date.

An important feature of the cases just discussed is that a cancelling clause gives the charterer an "independent option" to cancel if the ship is not ready to load by the specified date: it does "not impose any contractual obligation on the owners to commence loading by the cancelling date".<sup>58</sup> In other words, the right to cancel under such a clause is exercisable on the occurrence or non-occurrence of an event, and does not depend on any breach by the shipowner. The reasoning of The Mihalis Angelos would not apply (so as to reduce damages to a nominal amount) where the charterer's case was that he would have been entitled to rescind on account of the shipowner's future breach; for once the shipowner had accepted the charterer's earlier repudiation and so rescinded the contract for that anticipatory breach,<sup>59</sup> the shipowner would be relieved of any further obligation to perform, so that his failure to perform on the due day could no longer be a breach.<sup>60</sup>

3. Methods of Limiting Damages

To compensate the injured party fully for all loss that can, in some sense, be said to flow from a breach of contract would often lead to undesirable results. The point can be illustrated by reference to a case, said to have been decided early in the 17th century, "where a man going to be married to an heiress, his horse having cast a shoe on the journey, employed a blacksmith to replace it, who did the work so unskilfully that the horse was lamed, and, the rider not arriving in time, the lady married another; and the blacksmith was held liable for the loss of the marriage".<sup>61</sup> This result has rightly been called absurd.<sup>62</sup> Such complete protection of the injured party's interests would either deter the other party from entering into the contract at all, or lead to an undue raising of charges. The law has therefore developed a number of rules for the purpose of limiting damages for breach of contract.

<sup>57</sup> The crucial date for this purpose is "the date of acceptance of the repudiation" (The Mihalis Angelos, above, at p.210, italics supplied): not, it is submitted, "the date of repudiation" (The Seaflower [2000] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 37 at 44) since it is only acceptance of a wrongful repudiation that rescinds a contract (above, p.783), so that, before such acceptance, the victim of the wrongful repudiation will not have freed himself from further obligations under the contract. There is nothing in the report of The Seaflower to indicate that the victim (the shipowner) had accepted the repudiation; he seems, on the contrary, to have continued to make efforts to perform, and the limitation on his right to damages in that case can be explained on this ground. The event, or non-event, giving rise to the charterer's right to cancel in this case (failure to obtain a third party's approval) was also a breach since the shipowner had guaranteed that he would obtain the approval. For further proceedings in this case, see [2001] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 341. The same principles were applied by analogy in Chiemgauer Membran und Zelthau GmbH v New Millennium Experience Co Ltd, The Times, January 16, 2001, to termination without cause under an express term of the contract.

<sup>58</sup> The Simona [1989] A.C. 788 at 795.

<sup>59</sup> Gill & Duffus SA v Berger & Co Inc [1984] A.C. 382 at 391, below, p.767. After this case, apparently contrary dicta in Regent OHG Aisstadt und Barig v Francoise of Jermyn Street [1981] 3 All E.R. 327 and Bremer Handelsgesellschaft mbH v JH Rayner & Co [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 216 at 224, 229 can no longer be supported.

<sup>60</sup> cf. above, at n.57.

<sup>61</sup> Referred to in British Columbia Saw-Mill Co Ltd v Nettleship (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 499 at 508.

<sup>62</sup> ibid.

(1) Remoteness

A defendant is not liable for loss which is "too remote". The test of remoteness is whether the loss was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties; the application of this test gives rise to many problems.

(a) THE "REASONABLE CONTEMPLATION" TEST IN GENERAL. The general rules on this topic were formulated in Hadley v Baxendale.<sup>63</sup> A shaft in the plaintiffs' mill broke and had to be sent to the makers at Greenwich to serve as a pattern for the production of a new one. The defendants agreed to carry the shaft to Greenwich but, as a result of their breach of the contract, its delivery was delayed so that there was a stoppage of several days at the mill. The plaintiffs claimed damages of £300 in respect of their loss of profits during this period. At the trial the case was left generally to the jury, who returned a verdict of £50 for the plaintiffs. The defendants successfully applied for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Alderson B. stated the principles in accordance with which the jury should have been directed: "The damages . . . should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e. according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach".<sup>64</sup> Here the stoppage was not the "natural" consequence of the delay: it could not have been contemplated by a carrier that delay in delivering the shaft would keep the mill idle. "In the great multitude of cases of millers sending off broken shafts to third persons by a carrier under ordinary circumstances, such consequences would not, in all probability, have occurred".<sup>65</sup> The plaintiffs might have had a spare shaft<sup>66</sup> or been able to get one.<sup>67</sup> Nor could the stoppage, though it was no doubt anticipated by the plaintiffs, have been contemplated by both parties at the time of contracting as the probable result of breach. "The only circumstances here communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time the contract was made were that the article to be carried was the broken shaft of a mill, and that the plaintiffs were the millers of that mill".<sup>68</sup> The defendants were not told that any delay by them would keep the mill idle. If they had been told this, they might have attempted to limit their liability "and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them".<sup>69</sup>

These principles were reformulated in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd.<sup>70</sup> The defendants sold a boiler to buyers who, as the defendants knew, wanted it for immediate use in their laundry business. The boiler was delivered some five months after the agreed date, so that the buyers suffered loss of profits. Asquith L.J. said that the test of remoteness was whether the loss was "reasonably foreseeable as liable to

<sup>63</sup> (1854) 9 Exch. 341; Simpson, 91 L.Q.R. 272-277; Danzig, 4 Journal of Legal Studies 249; Pugsley 126 N.I.L.J. 420; Barton, 7 O.J.L.S. 40.

<sup>64</sup> (1854) 9 Exch. 341 at 354.

<sup>65</sup> ibid. at 356.

<sup>66</sup> ibid.

<sup>67</sup> 23 L.J.Ex. at 180.

<sup>68</sup> (1854) 9 Exch. at 355. This statement is hard to reconcile with the account of the facts given at 344: "The plaintiffs' servant told the [defendants'] clerk that the mill was stopped and that the shaft must be sent immediately." In the Victoria Laundry case [1949] 2 K.B. 528 at 537 Asquith L.J. said that the court "rejected this evidence"; but it is hard to see how the court could do this on an application for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. The more likely explanation of the apparent discrepancy is that the defendants were not told the crucial fact that the mill would remain idle if the shaft was delayed. According to 18 Jur. 358, "Although there was evidence that the defendant knew that the mill was standing still, he did not know that this was for want of the shaft." result from the breach".<sup>71</sup> This depended on the state of the defendant's knowledge. Every defendant had imputed to him knowledge of what happens in the ordinary course of things. He might also have actual knowledge of special circumstances, which would enable a reasonable man to foresee extraordinary loss. Here the defendants knew that the buyers wanted the boiler for immediate use in their business: they were thus liable for loss of profits that would ordinarily result from such use. But they were not liable for loss of exceptionally lucrative government contracts, which the buyers would have been able to make if they had received the boiler in time: they knew nothing of these contracts and could not reasonably have foreseen such loss.<sup>72</sup> The same reasoning would apply in the converse case of a buyer's breach, so that the seller could not recover damages in respect of his loss of profit to the extent that this was exceptionally large by reason of his having secured a supply of the goods in question at an unusually low price.<sup>73</sup>

<sup>69</sup> (1854) 9 Ex. 341 at 355.

<sup>70</sup> [1949] 2 K.B. 528.

The judgment in this case, and in particular the phrase "reasonably foreseeable as liable to result" gave rise to the view that the same test of "reasonable foreseeability" that governs remoteness in tort applies also in contract. But this view can no longer be accepted after the decision of the House of Lords in The Heron II.<sup>74</sup> In that case a ship was chartered to carry sugar from Constanza to Basrah. At the time of contracting, the charterer intended to sell the sugar as soon as it reached Basrah. The shipowner did not actually know this; but he did know that there was a market for sugar at Basrah, and "if he had thought about the matter he must have realised that at least it was not unlikely that the sugar would be sold in the market at market price on arrival".<sup>75</sup> The shipowner in breach of contract deviated and reached Basrah nine days late. During these nine days the market price of sugar at Basrah fell; and it was held that the charterer was entitled to damages for the loss suffered by reason of the fall in the market.<sup>76</sup> On the one hand, the House of Lords rejected the argument that in contracts for the carriage of goods by sea damages for delay were governed by a special rule, under which losses were too remote unless they were "reasonably certain" to result.<sup>77</sup> On the other hand, the House also rejected the view that the test of remoteness in contract was "reasonable foreseeability", at least if this phrase referred to the very low degree of probability required to satisfy the test of remoteness in tort.<sup>78</sup> Lord Reid said that the Victoria Laundry case was wrong in laying down this test for contract.<sup>79</sup> But when Asquith L.J. there referred to "loss reasonably foreseeable as liable to result"<sup>80</sup> he may have had a higher degree of probability in mind; and in this sense his judgment was (subject to one qualification<sup>81</sup>)

<sup>71</sup> ibid. at 539.

<sup>72</sup> cf. Kpohravor v Woolwich BS [1996] 4 All E.R. 119; The Mass Glory [2002] EWHC 27 (Comm); [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 245, and, in the tort of conversion, Saleslease Ltd v Davis [1999] 1 W.L.R. 1664; Sandeman Coprimar S.A v Transito y Transportes Integrales SL [2003] EWCA Civ 113 at [31] (conversion and negligence).

<sup>73</sup> See North Sea Energy Holdings NV v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 418, at 438, affirmed [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483; the actual decision was that there was no breach by the buyer as the contract was ineffective by reason of the failure without his default of a condition precedent.

<sup>74</sup> Sub nom. Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 350; Pickering, 31 M.L.R. 203.

<sup>75</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 382.

<sup>76</sup> That loss amounted to some £4,000, which was less than the freight charge of about £9,000. In Hadley v Baxendale and the Victoria Laundry case this relationship was reversed: the losses considerably exceeded the amounts paid under the contracts to the defendants.

<sup>77</sup> The Parana (1877) 2 P.D. 118 at 123, overruled in The Heron II.

<sup>78</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 385, 411, 425; cf. 413; The Rio Claro [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 173 at 175; Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al Essa (No.2) [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1083 at 1088; Cartwright [1996] C.L.J. 488.

<sup>79</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 389.

<sup>80</sup> A phrase also used in Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 732 at [84].

<sup>81</sup> At one point in the Victoria Laundry case ([1949] 2 K.B. 528 at 540) Asquith L.J. suggested that the test was whether the occurrence of the loss was "on the cards." This test was rejected in The Heron II [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 390, 399, 415, 425.

approved by the other members of the House of Lords. Various expressions are used in The Heron II to describe the degree of probability required to satisfy the test of remoteness in contract. There must be a "serious possibility"<sup>82</sup> or a "real danger"<sup>83</sup> or a "very substantial"<sup>84</sup> probability of loss; it must be "not unlikely"<sup>85</sup> or "easily foreseeable"<sup>86</sup> that loss will occur. The result of the decision is that a higher degree of probability is required to satisfy the test of remoteness in contract than in tort. When used in contract cases, the word "foreseeability" refers to this higher degree of probability.

The distinction established in The Heron II between the tests of remoteness in contract and tort was further considered in H. Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd.<sup>87</sup> The defendants in that case supplied to the claimants a hopper for storing pig food; they failed, in breach of contract, to provide for proper ventilation, so that the food became mouldy and many of the pigs died from a rare intestinal disease. Swanwick J. ordered damages to be assessed for the value of the pigs which had died, for the claimants' expenses in dealing with the infection, and for "loss of sales and turnover". This judgment was affirmed on appeal, but for divergent reasons which give rise to three main difficulties. The first is to determine exactly what test of remoteness was applied. Lord Denning M.R. said that the higher degree of foreseeability stated in The Heron II applied only where the claim was for purely financial loss; where it was for physical damage the test of remoteness was the same in contract as in tort. He accordingly found for the claimants on the ground that the tort test was satisfied, even though that laid down in The Heron II was not: it was enough that the defendants could have foreseen a "slight possibility"<sup>88</sup> that eating mouldy food might make the pigs ill. Orr and Scarman L.JJ., on the other hand, took the view that there neither was nor should be any distinction between financial loss and physical damage for the purpose of remoteness. Their decision was based on the view that the test of remoteness laid down in The Heron II was satisfied as the defendants could have contemplated a "serious possibility"<sup>89</sup> that the pigs might become ill as a result of the defect in the hopper. The second difficulty is to account for the way in which the Court of Appeal dealt with Swanwick J.'s award of damages for "loss of sales and turnover".<sup>90</sup> This award was upheld but, in what seems to be a reference to it, Lord Denning M.R. said that the claimants were not entitled to damages "for loss of profit on future sales or future opportunities of gain"<sup>91</sup>; while Orr and Scarman L.JJ. agreed with Lord Denning in the result, but "by a different route".<sup>92</sup> It is not easy to reconcile these positions with each other or with the different ways (discussed above) in which the members of the Court formulated and applied the test of remoteness. Lord Denning's views on these points might seem to lead to the conclusion that there should be no recovery at all for "loss of sales and turnover",<sup>93</sup> while the

<sup>82</sup> ibid. at 414-415; Malik v BCCI [1998] A.C. 20 at 37.

<sup>83</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 425; cf. Bates v Barrow [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 680 at 691; The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 173.

<sup>84</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 388.

<sup>85</sup> ibid. at 383.

<sup>86</sup> ibid. cf. Berryman v Hounslow LBC, The Times, December 16, 1996.

<sup>87</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791.

<sup>88</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791 at 804.

<sup>89</sup> ibid. 812; Orr L.J. expressed his agreement with the reasoning of Scarman L.J. In Saleslease Ltd v Davis [1999] 1 W.L.R. 1664 the foreseeability test was applied to financial loss resulting from conversion; there was no discussion of any relevant difference between tort and contract rules of remoteness.

<sup>90</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791 at 793.

<sup>91</sup> ibid. at 804.

<sup>92</sup> ibid. at 806.

<sup>93</sup> Since this loss was financial and the test in The Heron II was (in Lord Denning's view) not satisfied.

reasoning of Orr and Scarman L.JJ. makes it hard to understand why they agreed with Lord Denning's conclusion that there should be no recovery "for loss of profit on future sales".<sup>94</sup> The most plausible reconciliation of the apparent conflict is that the claimants recovered damages for loss of the profits that they would have made from the pigs which had died, but not for loss of further profits which they would have been able to make (if the hopper had not been defective) by rearing and selling additional animals. The third difficulty is to determine whether, in the view of Orr and Scarman L.JJ., the test of remoteness in contract differs from that in tort. At one point, Scarman L.J. said that it was "absurd that the test of remoteness of damage should, in principle, differ according to the legal classification of the cause of action"; and that the law did not "differentiate between contract and tort save in situations where the agreement, or the factual relationship, of the parties with each other requires it in the interests of justice".<sup>95</sup> But he also accepted that "the formulation of the remoteness test is not the same in tort and contract because the relationship of the parties in a contract situation differs from that in tort".<sup>96</sup> It differs because, as Lord Reid said in The Heron II, a contracting party "who wishes to protect himself against a risk which to the other party would appear to be unusual, . . . can direct the other party's attention to it before the contract is made. In tort, however, there is no opportunity for the injured party to protect himself in that way. . . ."<sup>97</sup> Perhaps one may conclude that, where the same facts give rise to liability in both contract and tort, the claimant will be entitled to damages in respect of loss falling within the (to him more favourable) tort test<sup>98</sup>; and that the same may be true even where the cause of action arises in contract alone but the claimant does not in fact have the opportunity of protecting himself to which Lord Reid refers in The Heron II. Subject to these qualifications, the distinction drawn in that case between the contract and tort tests of remoteness continues to apply.<sup>99</sup>

(b) LOSS OCCURRING IN THE ORDINARY COURSE OF THINGS. A defendant is (even without knowledge of special circumstances) liable if the loss occurs "in the ordinary course of things", that is, if the probability of its occurrence comes up to the standard described in The Heron II. On this ground it has, for example,<sup>1</sup> been held that a person who agrees to supply or repair an obviously profit-earning thing is liable for loss of profits resulting from delay<sup>2</sup>; that a seller of poisonous cattle-food is liable for loss of the cattle to which it is fed<sup>3</sup>; that a merchant who sells defective seed to a farmer is liable for loss of the expected crop<sup>4</sup>; that a supplier of defective components to a manufacturer is liable for loss of business suffered by the latter when customers, dissatisfied with the

<sup>94</sup> Since (in their view) the Heron II test was satisfied.

<sup>95</sup> ibid. at 806; cf. Bates v Barrow Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 680 at 691.

<sup>96</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791 at 806.

<sup>97</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 385-386, cited in the Parsons case [1978] Q.B. 791 at 806. Torts (such as wrongful interference with goods) may, where they are preceded by negotiations between the victim and the wrongdoer, constitute an exception to Lord Reid's general statement, quoted in the text above.

<sup>98</sup> cf. Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 418 (where both tests seem to have been satisfied).

<sup>99</sup> The Pegase [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 175 at 181, where H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd [1978] Q.B. 791 does not seem to have been cited; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 185 ("less restricted in tort").

<sup>1</sup> For further examples, see The Almara Seconda [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 433; The Good Luck [1992] 1 A.C. 233; The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 192.

<sup>2</sup> Fletcher v Tayleur (1855) 17 C.B. 21; Wilson v General Iron Screw Colliery Co Ltd (1887) 47 L.J.Q.B. 239; cf. Mira v Aylmer Square Investments Ltd [1990] 1 E.G.L.R. 45.

<sup>3</sup> Pinnock Bros v Lewis & Peat Ltd [1923] 1 K.B. 690; Ashington Piggeries Ltd v Christopher Hill Ltd [1972] A.C. 441; cf. Cointat v Myham & Son [1913] 2 K.B. 220; above, p.435.

<sup>4</sup> George Mitchell (Chesterhall) Ltd v Finney Lock Seeds Ltd [1983] 2 A.C. 803; and see above, p.943.

end-product, do not place repeat orders<sup>5</sup>; and that a person who sells goods to which he has no title, and which are later taken away from the buyer, is liable for money spent on repairing the goods.<sup>6</sup> On the other hand, it has been held that money spent on improvements to a house could not be recovered from a vendor who refused to convey<sup>7</sup> or from a builder as a result of whose breach of contract the house collapsed.<sup>8</sup> The line between repairs and improvements can obviously be a fine one; and where property is bought for restoration or development expenses incurred for this purpose would not be too remote.<sup>9</sup> In the last resort, the question whether the present test of remoteness has been satisfied is one of fact<sup>10</sup>; though the question whether the correct test has been applied is one of law.<sup>11</sup>

A defendant is not normally liable for a loss which is likely to occur in the ordinary course of things if it is not suffered<sup>12</sup>; nor for a loss which is suffered if it is too remote. But these rules are qualified where the claimant actually suffers a loss which is too remote while the defendant could have anticipated that he would have suffered another, smaller, loss. In Cory v Thames Ironworks Co<sup>13</sup> the defendants agreed to sell the hull of a floating boom derrick, but delivered it six months late. The defendants expected the buyers to use the hull as a coal store, and, if it had been so used, the buyers would, as a result of the delay, have lost £420. But, unknown to the defendants, the buyers intended to use the hull for a revolutionary method of transferring coal from colliers to barges, and lost profits of £4,000. The buyers admitted that they could not recover £4,000 and claimed £420. The court held the defendants liable for the latter sum, rejecting their argument that, as the £420 represented a loss not actually suffered, they were not liable even to this extent. There was "no hardship or injustice"<sup>14</sup> in making the sellers liable for the smaller sum when the buyers had lost a larger amount.<sup>15</sup> It is more doubtful whether damages can be recovered if the loss actually suffered is different in kind from that which would have occurred in the ordinary course of things. Suppose A sells poisonous cattle-food to B, who eats it himself in the course of an unforeseeable nutritional experiment, and dies. Can his executor sue A for the loss of a cow?

(c) KNOWLEDGE OF SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES. In Hadley v Baxendale it was suggested that the defendants might have been liable for the mill owners' loss of profits if they had known, at the time of contracting, that their delay would keep the mill idle. But mere knowledge of special circumstances is no longer regarded as sufficient.<sup>16</sup> Something more must be shown; and attempts have been made in later cases to define that additional requirement. In one case, Blackburn J. said that "in order that the notice [of special circumstances] may have any effect, it must be given under such circumstances

<sup>5</sup> GKN Centrax Gears Ltd v Matbro Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 555.

<sup>6</sup> Mason v Burningham [1949] 2 K.B. 545; cf. Bunny v Hopkinson (1859) 27 Beav. 565.

<sup>7</sup> Lloyd v Stanbury [1971] 1 W.L.R. 535.

<sup>8</sup> King v Victor Parsons Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 801.

<sup>9</sup> cf. below, pp.970-971 as to loss of profit.

<sup>10</sup> Bulk Oil (Zug) AG v Sun International Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 531 at 544.

<sup>11</sup> The Yanxilas (No.2) [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 676 at 682.

<sup>12</sup> Sunley (B) & Co Ltd v Cunard White Star Ltd [1940] 1 K.B. 740; North Sea Energy Holdings NV v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483.

<sup>13</sup> (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 181.

<sup>14</sup> (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 181 at 190.

<sup>15</sup> Building & Civil Engineering Holidays Scheme Management Ltd v Post Office [1966] 1 Q.B. 247 at 261; the recovery of "ordinary" profits in the Victoria Laundry case (above, pp.965-966) illustrates the same point.

<sup>16</sup> e.g. Kemp v Intasan Holidays Ltd (1988) 6 Tr.L. 161 (package tour operator not liable for discomfort suffered by holiday-maker because of asthmatic condition of which his wife told travel agent in casual conversation while booking holiday).

as that an actual contract arises on the part of the defendant to bear the exceptional loss".<sup>17</sup> But it is now clear that there need be no express contract to bear the exceptional loss.<sup>18</sup> Liability for loss caused by known special circumstances can perhaps be based on an "implied undertaking . . . to bear it",<sup>19</sup> but the reference seems to be to an undertaking implied in law (and not in fact), and so to mean that the defendant is liable for the exceptional loss, irrespective of any actual agreement to bear it.<sup>20</sup>

Simpson v L & NW Ry<sup>21</sup> illustrates the circumstances in which such liability can arise. The defendants had contracted to carry samples of cattle-food from an agricultural show at Bedford to another at Newcastle. They had an agent on the showground at Bedford specifically to attract such custom; the goods were marked "must be at Newcastle by Monday certain" but no express reference was made in the contract of carriage to the Newcastle show. The samples failed to arrive "by Monday" and did not reach Newcastle until after the show there was over. It was held that the defendants were liable for loss of the profits which the owner of the samples would have made, had the samples reached Newcastle in time. This should be contrasted with an example given in a 19th century case: a barrister going to Calcutta, where he had briefs awaiting him, could not sue the carriers for getting him there late, even if they knew why he is going to Calcutta.<sup>22</sup> The distinction between the cases lies in the nature of the two contracts. In the first, the contract was in substance one to carry samples to the Newcastle show—not simply to Newcastle. In the second the contract was one to carry the barrister to Calcutta—not to the Calcutta law sittings. Liability depends on "some knowledge and acceptance by one party of the purpose and intention of the other in entering the contract".<sup>23</sup>

The party in breach may know only some of the circumstances which lead to extra loss. He may then be liable for so much of that loss as he could have anticipated on the basis of the facts known to him, but not for further loss which results from other circumstances of which he was unaware.<sup>24</sup> In such cases, there is no rigid separation between the two rules in Hadley v Baxendale<sup>25</sup> and the defendant's liability increases with his degree of knowledge. Thus one reason why some loss of profits was recovered in the Victoria Laundry case, but none in Hadley v Baxendale, was that in the former the defendants knew that the boiler was wanted for immediate use, while in the latter case they did not know that want of the shaft would keep the mill idle. In The Heron II the defendants' knowledge that there was a sugar market at Basrah sufficed to make them liable for loss due to market movements there. Similarly, delay in the arrival of a

<sup>17</sup> Horne v Midland Ry (1873) 1 L.R. 8 C.P. 131 at 141 (where this requirement was not satisfied); cf. Coastal International Trading Ltd v Maroil Ltd [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 92 at 97; contrast Laceys Footwear (Wholesale) Ltd v Bowler International [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 369 at 377 (loss of ordinary profits within contemplation of parties).

<sup>18</sup> Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1428 at 1448; cf. Hydraulic Engineering Co Ltd v McHaffie, Goslett & Co (1878) 4 Q.B.D. 670 at 674; The Heron II [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 422; The Pegase [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 175 at 182; Panalpina International Transport Ltd v Densil Underwear Ltd [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 187.

<sup>19</sup> Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank, above n.18.

<sup>20</sup> cf. above, p.207.

<sup>21</sup> (1876) 1 Q.B.D. 274; Jameson v Midland Ry. (1884) 50 L.T. 426.

<sup>22</sup> BC Sam-Mill Co Ltd v Nettleship (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 499 at 510; cf. The Panalpina case, above, n.18, where a carrier knew that goods were wanted for the Christmas trade but delivered them too late.

<sup>23</sup> Weld-Blundell v Stephens [1920] A.C. 956 at 980; contrast GKN Centrax Gears Ltd v Matbro Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 555 at 580.

<sup>24</sup> Borries v Hutchinson (1865) 18 C.B.(N.S.) 445; cf. International Minerals & Chemicals Corp v Karl O Helm AG [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 102 (exchange loss recoverable as damages for late payment in a currency known not to be "the currency of [the seller]"); Danecroft Jersey Mills v Criegee, The Times, April 14, 1987; The Forum Craftsman [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 85–86; Jackson v Royal Bank of Scotland [2000] C.L.C. 1457.

<sup>25</sup> Kpohravor v Woolwich Building Society [1996] 4 All E.R. 119 at 128; Hotel Services Ltd v Hilton International (UK) Ltd [2000] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 750 at 755.

chartered ship at a loading port may cause loss to a charterer who intended to buy a cargo there, if the market rises during the period of the delay: the shipowner's liability in respect of such loss will depend on the degree of his knowledge of the market and of the charterer's arrangements in relation to the buying of the cargo.<sup>26</sup> And where a bank wrongfully dishonoured a customer's cheque, it was held liable to the customer for injury to his business reputation since it knew him to be a trader, but not for the further loss suffered by the customer when the particular transaction in respect of which the cheque had been drawn, and further business opportunities, were lost, since these were circumstances of which the bank neither was, nor could have been, aware on the basis of the facts known to it.<sup>27</sup> The point is further illustrated by two cases in which vendors wrongfully refused to convey land which the purchasers intended to redevelop. In the first,<sup>28</sup> the vendor was held liable for loss of development profits as he knew that the purchaser intended himself to carry out the development; in the second,<sup>29</sup> the vendor was not liable for such loss as he knew only that the purchaser was a dealer in real estate and not that he intended to develop the land.

What the defendant should have deduced from the facts known to him is generally judged by the standard of the reasonable person. Thus in Hadley v Baxendale the defendants could not reasonably have deduced from the facts known to them<sup>30</sup> that their delay would keep the mill idle, as the millers might have had a spare shaft.<sup>31</sup> In the Victoria Laundry case it would have been mere fantasy to suppose that the buyers kept a spare boiler.

In deciding what the defendant should reasonably have deduced from the facts known to him, the court can also take into account the commercial capacity in which he contracted. Thus a supplier of electricity to a building contractor cannot be expected to foresee the full consequences of a power failure on a complex construction project on which the contractor is engaged.<sup>32</sup> Similarly, in Hadley v Baxendale the defendants were general carriers and less well able to foresee the effects of delay than the defendants in the Victoria Laundry case, who were qualified engineers and knew more than the uninstructed layman of the purposes for which boilers of the kind in question were likely to be used.<sup>33</sup> But even a carrier can be made liable for loss of the chance of making profits on resale<sup>34</sup> and for loss of profits suffered by a manufacturer through non-delivery of raw materials known to be wanted for manufacturing purposes.<sup>35</sup> Similarly, a carrier who specialises in a particular trade may have imputed to him "a greater knowledge of the relevant market than might have been appropriate in different circumstances",<sup>36</sup> and so be liable for loss suffered by the other contracting party in consequence of movements in that market.

<sup>26</sup> Contrast The Rio Claro [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. with The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215. See also The Eurus [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 351.

<sup>27</sup> Kpohraror v Woolwich Building Society [1996] 4 All E.R. 119.

<sup>28</sup> Cottrill v Steynning & Littlehampton Building Society [1966] 1 W.L.R. 753; cf. G & K Ladenbau (UK) Ltd v Crawley & de Reya [1978] 1 W.L.R. 266; Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al-Essa [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1272.

<sup>29</sup> Diamond v Campbell-Jones [1961] Ch. 22; cf. Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al-Essa (No.2) [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1083.

<sup>30</sup> See above, p.965.

<sup>31</sup> cf. Gee v Lancs. & Yorks. Ry. (1860) H. & N. 211 (carrier ignorant that manufacturer had no stocks of raw material); The Pegase [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 175.

<sup>32</sup> Balfour Beatty Construction (Scotland) v Scottish Power, 1994 S.L.T. 807 (H.L.).

<sup>33</sup> [1949] 2 K.B. 528 at 540.

<sup>34</sup> e.g. The Heron II [1969] 1 A.C. 350; Panalpina International Transport Ltd v Densil Underwear Ltd [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 187.

<sup>35</sup> Monte Video Gas Co v Clan Line Steamers Ltd (1921) 37 T.L.R. 866; The Pegase [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 175; cf. The Ocean Dynamic [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 88.

<sup>36</sup> The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 215 at 227.

A claimant may suffer extra loss because his financial position is such that he cannot avoid the adverse consequences of the breach. Damages can be recovered for such loss if the defendant knew of the claimant's lack of means and if the extra loss resulting from it "was such as might reasonably be expected to be in the contemplation of the parties as likely to flow from a breach of the obligation undertaken".<sup>37</sup>

(d) WHAT MUST BE "CONTEMPLATED". In tort cases, it is often said that the defendant is liable if he could have foreseen the type or kind of loss suffered, even though he could not have foreseen its extent or quantum.<sup>38</sup> Similar reasoning was used in Wroth v Tyler.<sup>39</sup> The defendant argued that he should not be liable for the full difference between the contract price and the market price because, though he could have contemplated some rise in house prices, he could not have contemplated the exceptionally large rise which occurred between 1971 and 1973. In rejecting this argument Megarry J. said that a defendant might escape liability for a "type or kind of loss"<sup>40</sup> which he could not have contemplated; but that there was no support in the authorities "for the alleged requirement that the quantum should have been in contemplation".<sup>41</sup> The distinction between "type" and "quantum" is, however, an elusive one; and the Victoria Laundry<sup>42</sup> case is hard to reconcile with the view that contemplation of the "quantum" is necessarily irrelevant. The most obvious description of the "type" of loss there within the defendants' contemplation was "loss of business profits"; and for some such loss they were held liable. The reason why they were not held liable for all the lost profits appears to be that those on the government contracts exceeded ordinary profits to an unforeseeable extent. It has been said that "loss of ordinary profits" is "different in kind from that flowing from a particular contract"<sup>43</sup>; but this suggestion gives rise to the difficulty that, in the last resort, all profit arises from some "particular contract". Wroth v Tyler is, it is submitted, best explained on the ground that the problem posed by the increase in house prices was not one of remoteness at all but one of quantification. The same is true of a later case in which a member of Lloyd's recovered underwriting losses from his agent as damages for breach of contract committed by the agent in pursuing a "high risk" strategy. This type of loss was foreseeable and not too remote: its amount was a matter of quantification and so not subject to any requirements of foreseeability.<sup>44</sup>

<sup>37</sup> Muhammed Issa el Sheik Ahmed v Ali [1947] A.C. 414, as explained in Monarch SS Co v Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] A.C. 196 at 224; cf. Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co Ltd [1952] 2 Q.B. 297; Wroth v Tyler [1974] Ch. 30 (as explained at p.961, above). Robbins of Putney Ltd v Meek [1971] R.T.R. 345; Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1297; contrast Pilkington v Wood [1953] Ch. 770 (where defendant did not know of claimant's overdraft), and Rammade Ltd v WJ Emson & Co, The Times, July 11, 1986 (which may be explicable on the same ground).

<sup>38</sup> e.g. Smith v Leech Brain & Co Ltd [1962] 2 Q.B. 405 at 415; cf. Muirhead v Industrial Tank Specialities Ltd [1986] Q.B. 507 at 532.

<sup>39</sup> [1974] Ch. 30; above, p.961.

<sup>40</sup> [1974] Ch. at 61; cf. GKN Centrax Gears Ltd v Matbro Ltd [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 555 at 568 ("loss of a certain kind").

<sup>41</sup> [1974] Ch. 30 at 61; cf. The Rio Claro [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 173 at 175 (but the loss suffered was said at 176 to have been of a "different category" from that which could have been contemplated).

<sup>42</sup> [1949] 2 K.B. 528; above, p.965. cf. also The Forum Craftsman [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 85-86; The Marine Star (No.2) [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 629 at 636 (reversed on other grounds [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 383).

<sup>43</sup> Brown v KMR Services Ltd [1995] 4 All E.R. 598 at 621; North Sea Energy Holdings NV v Petroleum Authority of Thailand [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 418 at 438, affirmed [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 483; quaere whether the loss in the Victoria Laundry case indeed flowed from inability to secure a "particular contract," as opposed to a type of business.

<sup>44</sup> This seems to be the view of Hobhouse L.J. (with whom Ralph Gibson L.J. agreed) in Brown v KMR Services Ltd [1995] 4 All E.R. 598 at 642-643. See below pp.973-974 for discussion of the scope of the reasonable contemplation test.

The view that a defendant is liable if he could contemplate the type of loss, as opposed to its degree, was again put forward in H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd.<sup>45</sup> The defendants were held liable for the loss of the pigs because they could have contemplated that, as a result of their breach, the pigs would become ill<sup>46</sup>; it was not necessary for them to have contemplated that the pigs would suffer from the particular disease which affected them, and which turned out to be fatal. One explanation for this aspect of the case is that, where physical harm is caused, there is no need to show that its degree should have been anticipated.<sup>47</sup> An alternative (and, it is submitted, preferable) explanation of the Parsons case is that the only thing which the defendants failed to foresee was the manner in which the injury to the pigs might be caused.<sup>48</sup> On this view, no issue arose as to the distinction between type and degree of loss.

(e) SCOPE OF THE "REASONABLE CONTEMPLATION" TEST. "Reasonable contemplation" is a test of remoteness and not one of quantification.<sup>49</sup> It determines whether a claimant is entitled to compensation for a particular item of loss, but not how that loss is to be translated into money terms. If a seller of goods fails to deliver them, there is no doubt that he is liable for the loss that the buyer has suffered in simply not having the goods. Where there is a market, the buyer's loss will prima facie be valued by reference to that market<sup>50</sup>; and this process of valuation does not raise any issue as to what was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties.<sup>51</sup> In such cases, it is sometimes said that market fluctuations are always foreseeable; but this is either a fiction<sup>52</sup> or just another way of saying that foreseeability is, for purposes of quantification, irrelevant. It follows that the damages are not affected by the fact that the rise or fall in the market has been an unusually sharp one, or that it was due to circumstances which were not within the contemplation of the parties.<sup>53</sup> The same reasoning applies where a seller delivers defective goods: the buyer is entitled to the amount by which the value of the goods is reduced by reason of the defect and no question of remoteness arises in relation to this loss. Such a question could arise only in respect of further consequential loss, such as loss suffered by the buyer through his use of the goods.<sup>54</sup> Yet another illustration of the distinction here drawn is provided by Wroth v Tyler where the buyer was undoubtedly entitled to compensation for his loss in not getting the house, and the question how much the house was worth at the relevant date was simply one of quantification. A question of remoteness might have been raised in that case if the buyer had, in addition, lost a profit that he could have made by reselling the house or by

<sup>45</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791; above, p.935; P.V.B., 94 L.Q.R. 171.

<sup>46</sup> [1978] Q.B. 791 at 812.

<sup>47</sup> ibid. at 813.

<sup>48</sup> See [1978] Q.B. 791 at 813.

<sup>49</sup> For this distinction, see Re National Coffee Palace Co (1883) 24 Ch.D. 367 at 372: JD D'Almeida Araujo Ltd v Sir Frederick Becker & Co Ltd [1953] 2 Q.B. 329. The distinction is said to be between "remoteness" and "measure" of damages, but in view of the ambiguity of the latter term, this usage has given rise to difficulties: see NV Handel etc. v English Exporters Ltd [1955] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 69 at 72 (affirmed ibid. at 317).

<sup>50</sup> See above, p.948.

<sup>51</sup> cf. The Marine Star (No.2) [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 629 at 635 (reversed on other grounds [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 383).

<sup>52</sup> i.e. if it relates to particular fluctuations.

<sup>53</sup> e.g. Kwei Tek Chao v British Traders Ltd [1954] 2 Q.B. 459. Similar reasoning applies where there is no market, so that the loss has to be quantified by reference to the factors described at p.953, above.

<sup>54</sup> The distinction between the two situations here discussed is reflected in ss.53(3) and (2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979; so far as contra, Bence Graphics International Ltd v Fasson UK Ltd [1998] Q.B. 87 is doubted at pp.950–951, above.

redeveloping the site; but no attempt was made to show that any such loss had been suffered.

All this is not to say that loss due to market movements can never be subject to the "reasonable contemplation" test. It was so subject in The Heron II<sup>55</sup> where the charterer had lost, not the goods, but the chance of going into the market to sell them on a particular day. The question was whether that chance was something that the shipowner could have contemplated; and, once this issue had been settled in the charterer's favour, no serious attempt seems to have been made to show that market fluctuations in general, or the particular fluctuations which occurred, were unpredictable, so as to make the loss too remote.<sup>56</sup> In two of the speeches, it is said that the fall in the market was not due to "any unusual or unpredictable factor"<sup>57</sup>; and it may be possible to infer that, had it been due to some such factor, this might have affected the result. But it is submitted that a similar argument should not prevail where the market rule is used simply as a test of quantification.

(2) Causation

The statement that a claimant cannot recover damages because the breach "caused him no loss" is sometimes found in the cases (already mentioned) in which a state of affairs was clearly brought about by the breach, but was not disadvantageous to the claimant.<sup>58</sup> Our present concern, however, is with cases in which there is a breach, followed by a state of affairs clearly disadvantageous to the claimant, but the defendant argues that the breach did not bring about that state of affairs. For example, a shipowner may be technically in breach of contract because his ship was not equipped with a proper medicine chest; but if the ship later foundered in a storm, the owners of goods on board could not claim that the breach was the cause of their loss.<sup>59</sup> Similarly, the mere fact that a company continues to trade in consequence of its auditor's breach of duty in auditing its accounts does not make the auditor liable for losses incurred in the course of such trading: the auditor's breach is not an effective cause of the loss<sup>60</sup>; and the stigma which an employee may suffer as a result of his employer's breach of contract<sup>61</sup> will not give him the right to damages in respect of loss of employment prospects if he fails to prove that the stigma was the cause of such loss.<sup>62</sup> Another reason why loss may be held not to have been caused by the breach is that it would have been suffered even if the breach had not been committed. This was, for example, the position where solicitors acting for a mortgage lender committed a breach of contract and a breach of trust by parting with the lender's money before they should have done so; and the lender later suffered loss, not because the money had been paid over too soon, but; because the security turned out to be inadequate. It was held that the solicitors were not liable for this loss since the

<sup>55</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350; cf. The Ulyanovsk [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 425 at 433.

<sup>56</sup> Contrast dicta in Smeed v Foord (1859) 1 E. & F. 602 at 616 and (in argument) 608. It is submitted that these dicta would not now be followed. The actual decision can be explained on the ground that, at the time of contracting, the defendant could not have contemplated that his delay in delivering the threshing machine would deprive the claimant of the chance of going into the market to sell his crop; for the claimant might have been expected to hire a substitute.

<sup>57</sup> [1969] 1 A.C. 350 at 394, 417.

<sup>58</sup> See above, p.934.

<sup>59</sup> See Monarch SS Co v Karlshamn Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] A.C. 196 at 226.

<sup>60</sup> Galoo v Bright Grahame Murray [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1360. cf. Seddington v Coleys Professional Services, The Times, June 2, 1995 (tort); Bank of Credit & Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd v Price Waterhouse (No.3), The Times, April 2, 1998; Equitable Life Assurance Society v Ernst & Young, The Times, February 24, 2003.

<sup>61</sup> Below, p.991.

<sup>62</sup> BCCI v Ali (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 82; [2002] I.C.R. 1258.

lender had got exactly the charge it had bargained for, and since it would have suffered exactly the same loss, even if the solicitors' breach had not been committed.<sup>63</sup> The same reasoning applies where an agent without authority purports to contract on behalf of his principal with a third party and is liable to that third party for breach of implied warranty of authority.<sup>64</sup> The normal measure of damages for this breach is the amount that the principal would have had to pay, had he been bound by the contract and not performed it. But if the principal is utterly insolvent the damages are no more than nominal. The third party has not lost anything through the breach of warranty, for, had the agent had authority, the third party would have acquired only an empty right against the principal.<sup>65</sup> The loss is not caused by the breach in such cases since it would not have been averted if the defendant had duly performed his contract.<sup>66</sup>

(a) CONCURRENT CAUSES GENERALLY. In all the above cases, the defendant is not liable for a loss which is not caused by the breach at all; but a claimant can often recover damages although the breach is not the sole cause of the loss. As Devlin J. has said: "If a breach of contract is one of two causes, both co-operating and both of equal efficacy, . . . it is sufficient to carry a judgment for damages".<sup>67</sup> One such situation has already been mentioned: the victim of a breach of contract can recover damages for a loss caused partly by the breach and partly by his own lack of means (so long as the loss is not too remote).<sup>68</sup> Again, unseaworthiness is hardly ever the sole cause of a maritime loss: the shipowner is liable though ordinary sea perils have co-operated with unseaworthiness to produce the loss.<sup>69</sup> But he would not be liable if the unseaworthiness led to a delay and the ship then ran into a typhoon as such a catastrophe may occur anywhere<sup>70</sup> and as the delay would not be causally "of equal efficacy" with the typhoon. Nor is the party in breach liable for a loss in fact wholly caused by an extraneous supervening event, even though, if that event had not occurred, the same loss, or part of it, would have been caused by the breach.<sup>71</sup> Further problems of mitigation and contributory negligence, which arise where the concurrent cause is the victim's own conduct, are discussed below.<sup>72</sup>

<sup>63</sup> Target Holdings Ltd v Redferns [1996] A.C. 421; cf. Stratton Ltd v Weston, Financial Times, April 11, 1990; Banque Keyser Ullman SA v Skandia (UK) Ins Co Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 249; The World Navigator [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 23; Brown v KMR Services Ltd [1995] 4 All E.R. 598 (the 22% reduction); cf. also Sykes v Midland Bank Executor & Trustee Co Ltd [1971] 1 Q.B. 113; A.L.G., 87 L.Q.R. 10; County Natwest v Pinsent & Co [1994] 3 Bank. L.R. 4; and Smindle v Harrison [1997] 4 All E.R. 705 (where damages were awarded for breach of fiduciary duty); Freeguard v Rogers, The Times, October 22, 1998.

<sup>64</sup> See above, p.738.

<sup>65</sup> Richardson v Williamson (1871) L.R. 6 Q.B. 276 at 279; Weeks v Probert (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 427 at 439; Re National Coffee Palace Co (1883) 24 Ch.D. 367 at 372.

<sup>66</sup> cf. Hilton v Barker Booth & Eastwood [2002] EWCA Civ 723; The Times, June 6, 2002.

<sup>67</sup> Heskell v Continental Express Ltd [1950] 1 All E.R. 1033 at 1048; disapproved on another point in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] A.C. 465 at 532; cf. Vimar International Ltd v Theresa Navigation Co Ltd [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 1 at [43].

<sup>68</sup> See above, p.972. In tort the loss resulting from the claimant's lack of means has been said to arise from a "separate and concurrent cause": Liesbosch Dredger v SS Edison [1933] A.C. 449 at 460. But this position is viewed with some scepticism in Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1297 at 1302, 1305, 1307 and is now much qualified even in tort cases: see Dodd Properties (Kent) Ltd v Canterbury CC [1980] A.C. 433; Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401 at 417; Matlock v Man [1993] R.T.R. 13; for an application of The Liesbosch in contract, see: Rummale Ltd v Emson & Co, The Times, July 11, 1986, as to which see above, p.972, n.37.

<sup>69</sup> Smith, Hogg & Co Ltd v Black Sea Insurance Co Ltd [1940] A.C. 997.

<sup>70</sup> Monarch Steamship case [1949] A.C. 196 at 215.

<sup>71</sup> Beoco Ltd v Alfa Laval Co Ltd [1995] Q.B. 137.

<sup>72</sup> See below, pp.977, 978, 980, 982–987.

(b) INTERVENING ACTS OF THIRD PARTY. Where loss results partly from the breach and partly from the act of a third party, the party in breach is nevertheless liable for the loss if (but only if)<sup>73</sup> the third party's act was "foreseeable" on the standard of probability which governs remoteness in contract.<sup>74</sup> Thus a shipowner who in time of impending war commits breach of a charterparty is liable for the resulting loss though it was aggravated by government action<sup>75</sup>; a person who in breach of contract recommends a dishonest stockbroker is liable for loss caused by the broker's dishonesty<sup>76</sup>; a solicitor engaged to advise on legal aspects of a commercial transaction is similarly liable for loss suffered by his client in consequence of the act or default of the other party to the transaction if the solicitor's negligence consisted precisely in failing to take steps to safeguard the client against the risk of such loss<sup>77</sup>; and a house-painter who in breach of contract leaves his client's house unlocked is liable for the value of goods taken from it by thieves.<sup>78</sup> These cases show that, although remoteness and causation are "quite different concepts"<sup>79</sup> (so that a loss may be too remote even though it is clearly caused by the breach)<sup>80</sup> nevertheless "some of the relevant considerations are the same".<sup>81</sup>

In Weld-Blundell v Stephens<sup>82</sup> a client employed an accountant to investigate the affairs of a company and wrote him a letter defaming two of the company's directors. The accountant's partner negligently dropped the letter in the company's office, where it was picked up by the manager and shown to the two directors. They recovered heavy damages for libel from the client who, in turn, claimed this amount from the accountant as damages for breach of contract. The House of Lords gave two reasons for dismissing the claim. First, the client's liability for defamation existed quite apart from the breach of contract, which simply brought that liability to the directors' attention.<sup>83</sup> Secondly, the loss was not caused by the breach, but by the act of the manager in showing the letter to the directors, and this act was not one which the defendant could have foreseen. The view that the manager's act was not foreseeable may be regarded with some scepticism, particularly as the jury found that it was the defendant's duty to keep the letter secret. But it forms one basis of Weld-Blundell v Stephens. The case does not support the proposition that a party who breaks a contract can escape liability for loss caused partly by his breach and partly by a foreseeable intervening act.

(3) Mitigation

Two ideas are usually discussed under this heading. The first is that the claimant cannot recover damages for a loss that he ought to have avoided. He is said to be under a "duty to mitigate". This expression will be used here even though it is open to the objection that breach of the "duty" gives rise to no legal liability<sup>84</sup> but only reduces the amount

<sup>73</sup> The Silver Sky [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 95.

<sup>74</sup> See above, pp.965–968.

<sup>75</sup> Monarch Steamship case [1949] A.C. 196.

<sup>76</sup> De la Bere v Pearson Ltd [1908] 1 K.B. 280; cf. T v Surrey CC [1994] 4 All E.R. 577 (child-minder); Partridge v Morris [1995] F.G.C.S. 158 (architect recommending builder); Sasea Finance Ltd v KPMG [2000] 1 All E.R. 676 (auditor failing to warn company of senior executives' fraud).

<sup>77</sup> British Racing Drivers' Club v Hextall Erskine & Co [1996] 3 All E.R. 667.

<sup>78</sup> Stansbie v Troman [1948] 2 K.B. 48; cf. Marshall v Rubypoint Ltd [1997] E.G.C.S. 12.

<sup>79</sup> cf. Fairchild v Glenhaven Funeral Services Ltd [2002] UKHL 22, [2003] A.C. 32 at [54] ("unrelated to causation").

<sup>80</sup> As in Bates v Barrom Ltd [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 680.

<sup>81</sup> The Yanxilas (No.2) [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 676 at 682; The Eurys [1998] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 351 at 362.

<sup>82</sup> [1920] A.C. 956.

<sup>83</sup> cf. Clark v Kirby-Smith [1964] Ch.506.

<sup>84</sup> The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605 at 608; Lomnicka, 99 L.Q.R. 495; The Good Friend [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 586, 597; The Alecos M [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 120 at 124.

that the claimant can recover. The second idea is that the claimant has to give credit for certain benefits accruing to him in consequence of the breach. Here it can be said that his loss is in fact mitigated.

(a) THE DUTY TO MITIGATE has two aspects: first, the claimant must take reasonable steps to minimise his loss; and secondly he must forbear from taking unreasonable steps that increase his loss.<sup>85</sup> It follows from the principle on which the “duty” to mitigate is based that the duty will normally arise only when the claimant has become aware of the breach.<sup>86</sup> It has been suggested that, where the claimant has not actually become aware of the breach, the duty will not arise merely because he was careless in failing to discover it; but that such carelessness might be relevant for other purposes: e.g. in making the loss (or part of it) too remote or in reducing the amount recoverable on the ground of contributory negligence.<sup>87</sup> These techniques would normally lead to much the same result as the principles of mitigation; but it is submitted that there is no compelling reason for holding that those principles can never apply where the claimant had, but failed to take, clear opportunities of discovering the breach: e.g. where a buyer is warned of the need to test the goods but fails to do so.

(i) Minimising loss.<sup>88</sup> If the claimant fails to take reasonable steps to minimise his loss, he cannot recover anything in respect of extra loss due to that failure. Commonly, he is required to make a substitute contract. For example, where a seller of goods fails to deliver, the buyer must go into the market<sup>89</sup> at the relevant time<sup>90</sup> to buy substitute goods. If he fails to do so he cannot recover any further loss that he may suffer because the market continues to rise or because he is deprived of the opportunity of making a profit out of the use or resale of the goods.<sup>91</sup> Conversely, a seller of shares who kept them after the buyer’s breach could not recover any extra loss that he might suffer as a result of a later fall in the market.<sup>92</sup> On the same principle, a wrongfully dismissed employee must make reasonable efforts<sup>93</sup> to find a comparable job. The injured party is, however, required to mitigate in this way only if the new transaction would be a true substitute for the old one. Where, for example, a customer wrongfully repudiates a contract for the provision of services at a time when the injured party has spare capacity, then the possibility of that party’s making another contract with a new customer will not be taken into account: such a new contract will not be a true substitute for the broken contract since the injured party would, but for the breach, have been able to perform both contracts.<sup>94</sup>

Where the breach has induced the injured party not to claim sums due to him from third parties, the mitigation rules may require him to assert these claims.<sup>95</sup> But this is

<sup>85</sup> For the burden of proof on this issue, see below, p.1018 at n.19.

<sup>86</sup> The Superhulls Cover Case (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 431 at 461.

<sup>87</sup> ibid. at 462; below, p.982.

<sup>88</sup> Bridge, 105 L.Q.R. 398.

<sup>89</sup> If there are several markets, a transaction in any market that it was reasonable for the injured party to use can form the basis of assessment: Gebrüder Metelmann GmbH & Co KG v NBR (London) Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 614, a case of buyer’s breach.

<sup>90</sup> See above, pp.959–964.

<sup>91</sup> Hussey v Eels [1990] 2 Q.B. 227 at 233 (“deemed mitigation”); cf. The Marine Star (No.2) [1994] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 629 at 635 (reversed on another ground [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 383); The Elena D’Amico [1980] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 75 at 79 (charterparty); and see above, p.948.

<sup>92</sup> Jamal v Moolla Dawood Sons & Co [1916] 1 A.C. 175 at 179; cf. Bristol & West BS v Fancy & Jackson [1997] 4 All E.R. 582 at 623 (delay in realising security).

<sup>93</sup> See Clark v BET [1997] I.R.L.R. 348 (senior employee unlikely to get other employment).

<sup>94</sup> Western Web Offset Printers Ltd v Independent Media Ltd, The Times, October 10, 1995; cf. above, pp.965–966.

<sup>95</sup> St Albans City & District Council v International Computers Ltd [1996] 4 All E.R. 481 (the £484,000 claim).

subject to the overriding rule that he need only take such steps as are reasonable: he therefore does not need to take steps which would involve him in complicated litigation<sup>96</sup> or which would ruin his commercial reputation<sup>97</sup> or which would involve him in unreasonable expense or inconvenience.<sup>98</sup>

Sometimes the injured party will be required to mitigate by accepting from the party in breach a performance which differs in some way from that originally bargained for. Thus where a charterer fails to load the agreed cargo, the shipowner may be bound to mitigate by accepting the charterer's reasonable offer of alternative cargo, even at a lower rate<sup>99</sup>; where a seller agrees to give credit and then refuses to deliver except for cash, the buyer may be bound to mitigate by accepting such delivery instead of buying against the seller on a rising market<sup>1</sup>; and where a seller cannot deliver at the agreed time the buyer may be required to mitigate by accepting late delivery.<sup>2</sup> In these cases, any loss suffered by the injured party by reason of the difference between the performance rendered and that originally bargained for can easily and adequately be allowed for in damages. He is not required to mitigate by accepting an offer of modified performance which purports to extinguish his right to such damages.<sup>3</sup> Nor is the injured party bound to mitigate by accepting an offer of modified performance if the modification causes him substantial prejudice: for example, a buyer of goods need not mitigate by accepting the seller's tender of goods of a lower quality than contracted for, even with an allowance for the inferiority.<sup>4</sup> On a somewhat similar principle, an employee who has been wrongfully dismissed need not accept an offer of re-employment involving a reduction in status,<sup>5</sup> or a lower grade of work<sup>6</sup>; nor need he accept the former employer's offer to take him back, even on the original terms, if the wrongful dismissal occurred in circumstances of personal humiliation, e.g. on a charge of misconduct made before others.<sup>7</sup>

(ii) Not augmenting loss. If the claimant acts unreasonably in attempting to mitigate, he cannot recover extra loss which he suffers as a result.<sup>8</sup> Thus in general he should not, for example, spend more on curing a defect in performance than the subject-matter without the defect would be worth<sup>9</sup>; nor should he continue to incur expense for the purpose of tendering performance after the other party has clearly indicated that he will refuse to accept it. But these are only general rules: the crucial question in each case is whether the claimant has acted reasonably. The point is strikingly illustrated by Banco

<sup>96</sup> Pilkington v Wood [1953] Ch. 770; The Ines [1995] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 144 at 159.

<sup>97</sup> James Finlay & Co Ltd v NV Kwik Hoo Tong HM [1929] 1 K.B. 400; cf. London & South of England Building Society v Stone [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1242 (building society not required to enforce borrower's personal covenant).

<sup>98</sup> The Griparion [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 533; Hussey v Eels [1990] 2 Q.B. 227.

<sup>99</sup> Harries v Edmonds (1845) 1 Car. & K. 686.

<sup>1</sup> Payzu Ltd v Saunders [1919] 2 K.B. 581; contrast Harlow & Jones Ltd v Panex International Ltd [1967] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509 at 530 (claimant "not bound to nurse the interests of the contract breaker").

<sup>2</sup> The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605.

<sup>3</sup> Shindler v Northern Raincoat Co Ltd [1960] 1 W.L.R. 1038; cf. Strutt v Whitnell [1975] 1 W.L.R. 870 (said in The Solholt [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 605 at 609 to turn "on its own special facts").

<sup>4</sup> Heaven & Kesterton Ltd v Et François Albiac & Cie [1956] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 316 at 321.

<sup>5</sup> Yetton v Eastwood Froy Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 104.

<sup>6</sup> cf. Edwards v SOGAT [1971] 1 Ch. 354.

<sup>7</sup> Payzu Ltd v Saunders [1919] 2 K.B. 581 at 589; in the absence of such circumstances it was held in Brace v Calder [1895] 2 K.B. 253 that an offer of re-employment should have been accepted.

<sup>8</sup> The Borag [1981] 1 W.L.R. 274; Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al-Essa [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1272 at 1276 (the reasoning of the case is obsolete on its facts in view of Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.3, below, p.999).

<sup>9</sup> cf. above, pp.945-946; Darbishire v Warran [1963] 1 W.L.R. 1067—a tort case; Grant v Dawkins [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1406; for an exception see O'Grady v Westminster Scaffolding Ltd [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 238—another tort case.

de Portugal v Waterlow & Sons Ltd.<sup>10</sup> The defendants had contracted to print banknotes for the Bank of Portugal, and in breach of contract delivered a large number of these to a criminal, who put them into circulation in Portugal. On discovering this, the Bank withdrew the issue and undertook to exchange all the notes in question for others. The defendants argued that they were liable only for the cost of printing the notes: any further loss was due to the Bank's own act.<sup>11</sup> But the House of Lords, by a majority, held the defendants liable for the full face value of the notes as the conduct of the Bank was reasonable, having regard to its commercial obligations towards the public.<sup>12</sup> A similar result was reached where a manufacturer of soft drinks had been supplied with contaminated ingredients. It was held that, in withdrawing and destroying products containing the ingredient, the manufacturer had acted reasonably to protect its reputation, even though the contamination posed only a negligible risk to health; and that the supplier of the ingredient was liable for the manufacturer's wasted costs.<sup>13</sup>

On the same principle, the claimant may be able to recover amounts paid in reasonable settlement of a liability to a third party incurred in consequence of the breach.<sup>14</sup> Conversely, if the claimant decides to resist a claim brought against him by a third party as a result<sup>15</sup> of the breach, he may be able to recover legal expenses incurred in the proceedings between him and the third party. Thus a buyer can recover from the seller costs reasonably incurred in defending an action brought against him by a sub-buyer on account of a defect for which the seller is liable.<sup>16</sup> Similarly a person who sues an agent for breach of implied warranty of authority can recover costs thrown away in a previous action brought against the principal on the assumption that the agent had the authority he claimed to have.<sup>17</sup> But the costs must be reasonably incurred: the claimant cannot recover them if he persists in litigating when it is clear that he has no chance of success.<sup>18</sup>

Finally, it is possible for steps taken in performance of the duty to mitigate to be reasonable, but actually to increase the loss. For example, a buyer who accepts a seller's anticipatory breach is bound to mitigate by buying a substitute in the market at the time of acceptance. If, when he makes the substitute purchase, the market price exceeds the contract price, he can recover the excess. This is so even though by the time fixed for delivery the market price has fallen below the contract price so that the buyer, if he had not performed the duty to mitigate, would have suffered no loss at all.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>10</sup> [1932] A.C. 452.

<sup>11</sup> Portuguese currency was not convertible into gold; the bank had a monopoly of issuing notes as legal tender; and, although the amount of notes it could issue was limited by law, the limit had not been reached.

<sup>12</sup> cf. above, p.978 at n.97; and see Buildings and Civil Engineering Holidays Scheme Management Ltd v Post Office [1966] 1 Q.B. 247 (where the claim was not in contract).

<sup>13</sup> Britvic Soft Drinks Ltd v Messer UK Ltd [2002] 1 Lloyd's Rep 20 at [114]; affirmed without reference to this point [2002] EWCA Civ 548; [2002] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 321.

<sup>14</sup> Biggin & Co Ltd v Permanite Ltd [1951] 2 K.B. 314; Bulk Oil (Zug) AG v Sun International Ltd [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 531 at 544; Royal Brompton NHS Trust v Hammond [1999] N.L.J. 89; General Foods Inc Panama v Slobodovna Plovdiva Yugoslavia [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 688; Britvic case, above n.13 [2002] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 20 at [127]; contrast Anglian Water Services Ltd v Cramshaw Robbins & Co [2001] B.I.R. 173 (where loss of this kind was too remote).

<sup>15</sup> See The Antaios [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 284 at 299.

<sup>16</sup> Hammond & Co v Bussey (1887) 20 Q.B.D. 79; Agius v Great Western Ry [1899] 1 Q.B. 413; Lloyd's & Scottish Finance Ltd v Modern Cars & Caravans (Kingston) Ltd [1966] 1 Q.B. 764; Bowmaker (Commercial) Ltd v Day [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1396; cf. The Saragasso [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412.

<sup>17</sup> Hughes v Graeme (1864) 33 L.J.Q.B. 335; Godwin v Francis (1870) L.R. 5 C.P. 295; Farley Health Products v Babylon Trading Co, The Times, July 29, 1987.

<sup>18</sup> Pom v Davies (1861) 1 B. & S. 220; Baxendale v London, Chatham & Dover Ry (1874) L.R. 10 Ex. 38.

<sup>19</sup> Melachrinov v Nicholl & Knight [1920] 1 K.B. 693 at 697.

(b) MITIGATION IN FACT. Loss is sometimes said to be mitigated where some benefit in fact accrues<sup>20</sup> to the claimant as a result of the breach.<sup>21</sup> If, for example, he is released from his own obligation to perform, this fact is taken into account in deciding how much, if anything, he has lost.<sup>22</sup> Or he may benefit from performing his duty to mitigate, e.g. by finding a job comparable to that from which he was wrongfully dismissed.<sup>23</sup> Here again his earnings in the other job will be taken into account in assessing his damages for wrongful dismissal.<sup>24</sup> The principle underlying such cases is that the purpose of an award of damages is “to compensate [the claimant] for his loss, not to enrich him”.<sup>25</sup>

There is a further group of cases in which the claimant benefits from doing something that he was not required to do in performance of his duty to mitigate: for example, a wrongfully dismissed employee may take a job involving a reduction in status. His actual earnings in that job are taken into account in assessing damages, even though it was a job that he was not required to take in performance of his duty to mitigate.<sup>26</sup> But some benefits of this kind are not taken into account; and the distinction between the two kinds of benefit is illustrated by Lavarack v Woods of Colchester Ltd.<sup>27</sup> The claimant was wrongfully dismissed from his employment with the defendants and so freed from a provision in his contract with them that he should not, without their written consent, be engaged or interested in any other concern (except as a holder of investments quoted on a stock exchange). After his dismissal, he (1) took employment with the X Co at a lower salary than he had earned with the defendants; (2) acquired half the shares in the X Co; and (3) invested money in shares in the Y Co. The value of the shares in both companies having risen, it was held that the increase in the value of the X Co shares, but not that of the Y Co shares, must be taken into account in reducing the claimant’s damages. The former was regarded as a disguised remuneration, while the latter was “not a direct result of his dismissal” but a “collateral benefit”.<sup>28</sup>

The question whether a benefit is “collateral” or a “direct result” of the breach can give rise to difficult problems of causation. In British Westinghouse Co v Underground Electric Rys Co of London,<sup>29</sup> A agreed to supply B with turbines of a stated efficiency but supplied less efficient ones, which used more coal. B accepted and used them, reserving his right to claim damages. After some years, and before A’s turbines were worn out, B replaced them with others. These were so much more efficient than A’s would have been, even had they been in accordance with the contract, that, over the whole period

<sup>20</sup> e.g. Platt v London Underground Ltd, The Times, March 13, 2001. “Benefit” here includes avoided loss: The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 171 at 203.

<sup>21</sup> This principle presupposes that loss has been suffered in consequence of a wrong. It does not apply to a restitution claim based, not on any wrongdoing, but simply on the fact that a payment has been made under a void contract (below, p.1057): Kleinport Benson Ltd v Birmingham CC [1997] Q.B. 380.

<sup>22</sup> See above, p.869. See also Levison v Farin [1978] 2 All E.R. 1149; C & P Haulage v Middleton [1983] 1 W.L.R. 1461.

<sup>23</sup> cf. Evans Marshall & Co v Bertola [1976] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 17.

<sup>24</sup> e.g. Cerebus Software Ltd v Rowley [2001] EWCA Civ 74; [2001] I.C.R. 376; unless the contract otherwise provides, as in Gregory v Wallace [1998] I.R.L.R. 387. For the position in cases of unfair dismissal (which generally does not involve any breach of contract) see Employment Rights Act 1996, s.123(4).

<sup>25</sup> Longden v British Coal Corp [1998] A.C. 653 at 662; cf. in tort, Dimond v Lovell [2002] 1 A.C. 384.

<sup>26</sup> See above, p.978; see Edwards v SOGAT [1971] Ch. 354; S of S for Employment v Wilson [1978] 1 W.L.R. 568; cf. Techno Land Improvements Ltd v British Leyland (UK) Ltd (1979) 252 E.G. 805 at 809; The Concordia C [1985] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 55; The Fanis [1994] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 633; cf. Mobil North Sea Ltd v P J Pipe & Valve Co [2001] EWCA Civ 741; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 289, at [30].

<sup>27</sup> [1967] 1 Q.B. 278.

<sup>28</sup> ibid. at 290; cf. Aruna Mills Ltd v Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 Q.B. 655 at 669; Hodge v Clifford Cowling & Co [1990] 2 F.G.L.R. 89; Mobil North Sea Ltd v P J Pipe & Valve Co [2001] EWCA Civ 741; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 289.

<sup>29</sup> [1912] A.C. 673; cf. Erie County Natural Gas Co v Carroll [1911] A.C. 105; Levison v Farin [1978] 2 All E.R. 1149; Merrett v Capitol Indemnity Corp [1991] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 169.

during which A's turbines might have been expected to last, B actually used less coal than he would have done with turbines of the efficiency stated in the contract. The House of Lords held that B was under no duty to mitigate by buying new turbines.<sup>30</sup> But as he had bought the new turbines in consequence of A's breach, the financial advantage he gained by using them had to be set off against the cost of buying them. As B's savings in coal exceeded that cost, he recovered nothing in respect of it. This was so even though it could be argued that the benefit thus obtained by B was only in part the result of the breach; for the turbines originally contracted for had become obsolete so that a reasonable businessman would have replaced them even if they had been in accordance with the contract.<sup>31</sup> On the other hand, B had also, before replacing the turbines, suffered loss because the cost of operating them was greater than it would have been if they had been in accordance with the contract. This loss was not diminished as a result of the purchase of the new turbines and was accordingly recoverable.<sup>32</sup>

In the British Westinghouse case, it was said that a benefit is taken into account only if it is "one arising from the consequences of the breach".<sup>33</sup> It follows from this requirement that damages will not be reduced by reason of any insurance taken out by the injured party against the consequences of the breach<sup>34</sup> (unless the contract provides that the injured party's sole remedy is to be against the insurer<sup>35</sup>); or by reason of the fact that the victim is compensated for the loss under some other contract with a third party,<sup>36</sup> or that gratuitous benefits have been conferred on the victim in respect of the

<sup>30</sup> In this respect the case differs from Bellingham v Dhillon [1973] Q.B. 304 (a tort case purporting to follow the British Westinghouse case and approved in Dimond v Lovell [2002] 1 A.C. 384).

<sup>31</sup> [1912] A.C. 675 at 691.

<sup>32</sup> ibid. at 688.

<sup>33</sup> ibid. at 690.

<sup>34</sup> cf. Bradburn v Great Western Ry (1874) L.R. 10 Ex. 1; The Yasin [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 45; Brown v KMR Services [1994] 4 All E.R. 385, 399 (varied on other grounds [1995] 4 All E.R. 598); Europe Mortgage Co v Halifax Estate Agencies [1996] E.G.C.S. 84; Bristol & West BS v Christie [1996] E.G.C.S. 60. Other techniques for avoiding double recovery in such cases are illustrated by Arab Bank plc v John D Wood [2000] 1 W.L.R. 857 and Amec Civil Engineering Ltd v Cheshire CC [1999] B.L.R. 303. For other benefits, see Foxley v Olton [1965] 2 Q.B. 306 (national assistance); Hemson v Downs [1970] 1 Q.B. 73 (state retirement pension); Basnett v J & A Jackson [1976] I.C.R. 63 (redundancy payment); McCamley v Cammell Laird Shipbuilders Ltd [1990] 1 W.L.R. 963 (voluntary payment from employer for injury at work); Smoker v London Fire and Civil Defence Authority [1991] 2 All E.R. 449 (employee's contributory disability pension); Hopkins v Norcross [1994] I.C.R. 11 (occupational pension scheme); contrast Parsons v BNM Laboratories [1964] 1 Q.B. 95; and Nabi v British Leyland (UK) Ltd [1980] 1 W.L.R. 529 (unemployment benefit); Gaskill v Preston [1981] 3 All E.R. 427 (family income supplement); Plummer v PW Wilkins [1981] 1 W.L.R. 831 and Lincoln v Hayman [1982] 1 W.L.R. 488 (supplementary benefit); Westwood v S of S for Employment [1985] A.C. 20 (unemployment and earnings related benefit); Hussain v New Taplow Paper Mills [1988] A.C. 514 (sickness benefit under insurance paid for by employer); Colledge v Buss Mitchells & Butler Ltd [1988] I.C.R. 125 (voluntary payment which would not have been made but for the accident); Baldwin v British Coal Corp. The Times, May 11, 1994 (supplementary payment to compensate for inadequate notice of termination); Administration of Justice Act 1982, s.5; Social Security Administration Act 1992, s.82 (social security benefits to be deducted from victim's damages, but to be paid by wrongdoer to Secretary of State); Beriello v Felixstowe Dock & Ry Co [1989] 1 W.L.R. 695 (payments from foreign State benefit fund which were recoverable by the fund out of the damages); Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (No.3) [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1206 (liabilities discharged out of Lloyd's central funds). See generally Parry v Cleaver [1970] A.C. 1.

<sup>35</sup> Mark Romlands Ltd v Berni Inns Ltd [1986] Q.B. 211, where the party in breach was a tenant who had paid for the insurance by way of an "insurance rent": hence the normal justification for disregarding insurance moneys (viz. that the injured party had paid for the insurance) did not apply. This was also the position in Bristol & West BS v May, May & Merrimans (No.2) [1998] 1 W.L.R. 306.

<sup>36</sup> Gardner v Marsh Parsons [1997] 1 W.L.R. 489. For a possible qualification of this principle where a settlement agreement between one of two wrongdoers and the victim on its true construction covers the loss resulting from both breaches, see the discussion at p.573 above of Heaton v Axa Equity and Law Life Assurance Society plc [2002] UKHL 15; [2002] 2 A.C. 329, where the agreement was held to release the other wrongdoer.

loss by a third party<sup>37</sup> who was under no legal obligation to act in this way.<sup>38</sup> Nor will damages be reduced merely because the injured party has resold the defective subject-matter for more than the contract price. In Hussey v Eels<sup>39</sup> the claimants had been induced to buy a house as their home by a misrepresentation<sup>40</sup> that there had been no subsidence. More than two years later, they decided to demolish the house and resold the site for one and a half times the price which they had paid, having obtained planning permission for two dwellings on the site. On the assumption that this resale yielded a profit<sup>41</sup> to the claimants, it was held that this was not to be taken into account: the wrong which had caused their loss had not also caused the gain as the resale was "not . . . part of a continuous transaction of which the purchase . . . was the inception".<sup>42</sup> Similarly, where a buyer is entitled to damages based on the market price, those damages will not normally be reduced on the ground that he has made a good bargain by buying a substitute below the market price. But if a buyer who has rightfully rejected goods then buys those very same goods from the seller below the market (and the contract) price, this fact will be taken into account to reduce or extinguish the seller's liability.<sup>43</sup>

(4) Contributory negligence<sup>44</sup>

Where the injured party fails to perform the "duty" to mitigate, his damages are reduced because it can be said that he is at fault in failing to avoid loss. He may also be at fault in the sense of actually helping to bring about the loss or the event causing it. In the law of tort, such conduct is called "contributory negligence". At common law, it in some cases totally barred the injured party's tort claim, while in others it was completely ignored, so that he recovered in full. The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 now provides that, where a person suffers damage as a result partly of his own "fault" and partly of the "fault" of another person, his claim is not to be defeated, but his damages are to be reduced in proportion to his degree of responsibility. Two questions arise for discussion here.

The first is whether the common law doctrine of contributory negligence applied in contract at all. Usually it did not,<sup>45</sup> for a contracting party is not bound to guard against breach. He may, indeed, be required to take steps to avoid the consequences of a known breach; but this follows from the rules as to mitigation, or the maxim volenti non fit injuria, rather than from the doctrine of contributory negligence. Where, however, a breach of contract was also a tort, the doctrine of contributory negligence was not excluded merely because there was a contractual relationship between the parties. Thus

<sup>37</sup> Not where the benefit is conferred by the party in breach: Williams v BOC Gases Ltd [2000] I.C.R. 1181; cf., in tort, Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 A.C. 350.

<sup>38</sup> Merrett v Capitol Indemnity Corp [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 169; cf. (in tort) Giles v Thompson [1994] 1 A.C. 142 at 166, where the point is left open.

<sup>39</sup> [1990] 2 Q.B. 227.

<sup>40</sup> Not incorporated in the contract, so that the cause of action was in tort; but the judgment is based on earlier decisions in contract cases.

<sup>41</sup> This depended on the cost of comparable accommodation at the time of the resale, as "The plaintiffs were not property speculators but residents:" [1990] 2 Q.B. 227 at 233; cf. (in tort) Dominion Mosaics & Tile Co Ltd v Trafalgar Trucking Co Ltd [1990] 2 All E.R. 246 at 252.

<sup>42</sup> [1990] 2 Q.B. 227 at 241; cf. Needles Financial Services v Taber [2002] 3 All E.R. 501.

<sup>43</sup> R. Pagnan Fratelli v Corbisa Industrial Agropacuararia Ltd [1970] 1 W.L.R. 1306; this case differs from the British Westinghouse case (which it purports to follow) in that the opportunity to buy the goods more cheaply would never have arisen but for the seller's breach.

<sup>44</sup> Williams, Joint Torts and Contributory Negligence, §59; Swanton, 55 A.L.J. 278.

<sup>45</sup> The Shinjitsu Maru (No.5) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1270 at 1287 (where this was conceded); cf. The Nogar Marin [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 412 (where the point was not argued).

a carrier, when sued for negligently injuring a passenger, could no doubt rely on the passenger's contributory negligence.

The second question is whether the Act of 1945 applies in cases of breach of contract. This depends on the interpretation of the definition of "fault" in the Act as "negligence, breach of statutory duty, or other act or omission which gives rise to liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence".<sup>46</sup> It has been argued that this includes all negligence, whether contractual<sup>47</sup> or tortious, and all other acts giving rise to liability in tort.<sup>48</sup> But the word "other" supports the view that negligence is here used in its tortious sense.<sup>49</sup>

It does not, however, follow from this interpretation of "fault" that the Act can never apply to cases of breach of contract. Two further distinctions must be drawn. The first is between breaches of contract that are, and those that are not, negligent. Here the phrase "negligent breach of contract" refers to situations in which liability arises for breach of a contractual duty of care<sup>50</sup>—not to cases in which liability for breach of contract is strict,<sup>51</sup> but the breach happens to have been committed negligently.<sup>52</sup> The second distinction is between breaches of contract which amount also to torts and those which do not. The content of a contractual duty of care is often the same as that of the duty of care which the law of tort would impose, even if there were no contract between the parties; and in such cases the same careless conduct prima facie gives rise to liability both for breach of contract and in tort.<sup>53</sup> For example, a careless statement inducing a contract may give rise to liability in tort for misrepresentation and in contract for breach of collateral warranty.<sup>54</sup> The liability of many professional persons for breach of the duties of care that they owe to their clients similarly arises both in contract and tort.<sup>55</sup> The same is true of duties arising out of a number of other contractual relationships, such as those between carrier and passenger, employer and employee, bailor and bailee,

<sup>46</sup> s.4. For an extension to include "product liability" see Consumer Protection Act 1987, s.6.

<sup>47</sup> See below, at n.50 and 53–56.

<sup>48</sup> Williams, above (n.44).

<sup>49</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852, CA, affirmed, without reference to this point, ibid at 880 et seq.; Newman, 53 M.L.R. 201. cf. (in another statutory context) Société Commerciale de Réassurance v ERAS International Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570.

<sup>50</sup> Quinn v Burch Bros (Builders) Ltd [1966] 2 Q.B. 370, 378–379 (affirmed on other grounds ibid. at 381).

<sup>51</sup> cf. above, pp.838–840.

<sup>52</sup> Quinn v Burch Bros (Builders) Ltd, above, at pp.378–379.

<sup>53</sup> Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 193.

<sup>54</sup> Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801, approved on the point that liability could, on such facts, arise in contract and tort in The Maira (No.3) [1990] 1 A.C. 637 at 650 (reversed on other grounds ibid. at 672, et seq.).

<sup>55</sup> Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801 at 819 (disapproving on this point Bagot v Stevens, Scanlan & Co [1966] 1 Q.B. 197); Arenson v Arenson [1977] A.C. 405 at 420–421; Batty v Metropolitan Realisations Ltd [1978] Q.B. 554 (disapproved as to damages in D & F Estates Ltd v Church Commissioners for England [1989] A.C. 177). The Zephyr [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 529 at 537; Dunbar v A & B Painters [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 616 at 620 (affirmed [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 38); Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852 at 860 (affirmed on other grounds ibid. at 880 et seq.); Duncan Stevenson Macmillan v AW Knott Becker Scott Ltd [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 98 at 101; Islander Trucking Ltd v Hogg Robinson & Gardner Mountain (Marine) Ltd [1990] 1 All E.R. 826; Murphy v Brentwood DC [1991] 1 A.C. 398 at 465; The Superhulls Cover Case (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 431; Harvest Trucking Co Ltd v PB Davies [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 638 at 643; Punjab National Bank v De Boirville [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1138; Barclays Bank plc v Quinecare Ltd [1992] 4 All E.R. 363; Société Commerciale de Réassurances v ERAS (International) Ltd [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 570 at 599; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145; First National Provincial Bank Ltd v Humberts [1995] 2 All E.R. 673; South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd [1997] A.C. 191 at 211; or occupier of premises and visitor.<sup>56</sup> The breach will not, however, amount to a tort where the imposition of a tortious duty would be "so inconsistent with the applicable contract that . . . the parties must be taken to have agreed that the tortious remedy is to be limited or excluded".<sup>57</sup> This possibility is illustrated by a case<sup>58</sup> in which a building subcontractor had entered into a direct contract with the building owner (and not merely into one with the main contractor<sup>59</sup>). The court inferred from the nature of this arrangement that the parties had intended the relationship between owner and subcontractor to be governed by the contract alone, so that the subcontractor was not liable to the owner in tort. It follows from these distinctions that three categories of cases must be considered in discussing the application of the 1945 Act to cases involving breach of contract.<sup>60</sup>

(i) The defendant without negligence commits a breach of a strict contractual duty; his conduct does not also amount to a tort; and the claimant is careless. For example, A contracts with B to repair B's car. In doing the work, A without negligence<sup>61</sup> fits components which are defective. B is injured as a result partly of the defect and partly of his own negligent driving. The Act does not apply: A's conduct, being neither negligent nor an act or omission giving rise to liability in tort, must fall outside the

---

Nykreditbank v Edward Erdman Group [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1327 at 1368; Holt v Payne Skillington (1996) 77 B.L.R. 51, where it was said that the tort duty could be more extensive than the duty imposed by the contract, but the tort claim failed on the pleadings. After the Henderson case, it seems that a solicitor's liability for negligence will prima facie arise in both contract and in tort: see Bristol & West BS v Mothew [1998] Ch.1 at 25, 26; for earlier conflicting authorities on this point (many of which are discussed but none of which is expressly overruled in the Henderson case, above), see Groom v Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194; Clark v Kirby-Smith [1964] Ch. 506, disapproved on this point in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801 at 819; Midland Bank Trust Co Ltd v Hett, Stubbs & Kemp [1979] Ch. 384; DW Moore & Co Ltd v Ferrier [1988] 1 W.L.R. 276; Lee v Thompson [1989] 2 E.G.L.R. 151; Bell v Peter Browne & Co [1990] 2 Q.B. 495; Rome v Turner Hopkins & Co [1980] N.Z.L.R. 550; Kaye 100 L.Q.R. 680.

<sup>56</sup> Bagot v Stevens, Scanlan & Co Ltd, above, at pp.204–205; cf. Matthews v Kuwait Bechtel Corp [1959] 2 Q.B. 57; Sayers v Harlow Urban DC [1958] 1 W.L.R. 623; Johnson v Coventry Churchill International Ltd [1992] 3 All E.R. 14 at 22–23; The Agia Skepi [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 467 at 472; The Angelic Grace [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 87 at 91; Spring v Guardian Insurance plc [1995] 2 A.C. 296 at 320, cf. 340. But where the same facts are alleged to give rise to a claim in contract and in tort, the injured party cannot, after failing in contract, succeed by simply reclassifying his claim as one in tort: Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong Hing Bank [1986] A.C. 80 at 107; The Maira (No.3) [1990] 1 A.C. 637 at 650 (reversed on other grounds ibid. at 672 et seq.); Reid v Rush and Tompkins Group plc [1990] 1 W.L.R. 212; The Good Luck [1990] 1 Q.B. 818 at 900 (reversed on other grounds, [1992] 1 A.C. 233); cf. McNerney Lambeth LBC [1989] N.L.J.R. 114 (no claim in tort at common law where claim for breach of implied covenant under Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s.11 failed).

<sup>57</sup> Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 A.C. 145 at 194.

<sup>58</sup> Greater Nottingham Co-operative Society Ltd v Cementation Piling & Foundation Ltd [1989] Q.B. 71; cf. Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong, Hing Bank [1986] A.C. 80 at 107; Welsh Technical Services v Haden Young (1987) 37 Build.L.R. 130; Sonat Offshore SA v Amerada Hess Development Co [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 145 at 159; Parker-Tweedale v Dunbar Bank plc [1990] 2 All E.R. 577 at 587; Johnstone v Bloomsbury Health Authority [1992] Q.B. 333; Scally v Southern Health & Social Services Board [1992] 1 A.C. 294 at 303; Ashmore v Corp of Lloyd's [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 563 at 568; Aiken v Stewart Wrightson Members Agency Ltd [1995] 1 W.L.R. 1281; The Hellestont Ardent [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 547 at 593.

<sup>59</sup> cf. above, p.608.

<sup>60</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1986] 2 All E.R. 488 at 508 (affirmed without reference to this point [1989] A.C. 852).

<sup>61</sup> This is no defence to an action for breach of contract; above, p.839.

definition of "fault".<sup>62</sup> Hence at common law the result will, in a contract case,<sup>63</sup> depend on which party's conduct caused the loss. Thus in Lambert v Lewis<sup>64</sup> a dealer supplied a defective trailer coupling to a customer who went on using it after it was obviously<sup>65</sup> broken. Eventually there was an accident when the coupling gave way. It was held that the dealer was not liable to the customer: the accident had been caused by the customer's continued use of the coupling with knowledge of its condition, and not by the fact that it was defective when sold.

(ii) The defendant commits a breach of a contractual duty of care; his conduct does not also amount to a tort, because the relations of the parties are intended to be governed by the contract alone<sup>66</sup>; and the claimant is also careless. In De Meza v Apple<sup>67</sup> an auditor carelessly made a mistake in completing certain certificates, with the result that the client suffered loss through being underinsured. The client was also careless and his damages were reduced under the Act. The case seems to have been regarded as falling into the present category<sup>68</sup>; but it is equally plausible to say that the auditor's liability for professional negligence arose in both contract and tort.<sup>69</sup> On that view, the case would belong to our third category: this was said to be the position in a more recent case involving a careless insurance broker, and it was further said that the Act would not apply to cases in the second category, where the defendant was liable only in contract but not in tort.<sup>70</sup>

(iii) The defendant commits a breach of a contractual duty of care; his conduct also amounts to a tort; and the claimant is also careless. The Act can apply to such a situation: for example, where the claimant is injured partly through his own carelessness and partly through circumstances amounting both to a breach of contract by the defendant and to a breach of his duties as an occupier of dangerous premises<sup>71</sup>; or where loss is caused partly by the professional negligence of the defendant, amounting both to a breach of

<sup>62</sup> Basildon DC v JE Lesser Properties [1985] Q.B. 839 (as explained in Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852 at 865, affirmed ibid. at 880 et seq., without reference to this point); The Good Luck [1990] 1 Q.B. 818 at 904; (where the actual decision was that the defendant was not liable either in contract or in tort, so that the issue of contributory negligence did not arise; reversed on other grounds [1992] 1 A.C. 233); Tenant Radiant Heat Ltd v Warrington Development Corp [1988] E.G.L.R. 41 at 43; Barclays Bank plc v Fairclough Building Ltd [1995] Q.B. 214; UCB Corporate Services Ltd v Clyde & Co [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 257 at 268; Anglian Water Services Ltd v Cramshaw Robbins & Co Ltd [2001] B.L.R. 173.

<sup>63</sup> In tort cases the result depended at common law on the question who had the "last opportunity" of avoiding the accident: see Williams, op. cit. (above, p.983), Ch.9.

<sup>64</sup> [1982] A.C. 225. See also Young v Purdy [1996] 2 F.L.R. 795.

<sup>65</sup> Failure to discover a defect which could have been discovered by taking reasonable steps may also amount to contributory negligence: Nitrigin Eirann Teoranta v Inco Alloys Inc [1992] 1 W.L.R. 498 at 506.

<sup>66</sup> See nn.57 and 58 above.

<sup>67</sup> [1974] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 508 (affirmed [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 498 where the applicability of the Act was left open); Quinn v Burch Bros (Builders) Ltd [1966] 2 Q.B. 370 at 380–383.

<sup>68</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1986] 2 All E.R. 488 at 508, as to which see below, n.70.

<sup>69</sup> See above, n.55.

<sup>70</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852 at 866 (affirmed without reference to this point ibid. at 880 et seq.) where De Meza v Apple, above, n.67 was cited at 861 without disapproval; Raflatac v Eade [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 506; Rowe v Turner Hopkins & Co [1980] N.Z.L.R. 550. The Law Commission has recommended that in cases of this kind the claimant's damages should be reduced on account of his contributory negligence, except where the contract expressly or by implication excludes this defence. Law Com. No.219 (1993) paras.4.7–15, 23–25; the proposal does not extend to sums payable under a valid liquidated damages clause (below, p.999): ibid., para.4.26–27.

<sup>71</sup> Sayers v Harlow Urban DC, above, n.56; cf Targett v Torfaen BC [1992] 3 All E.R. 27.

contract and to a tort against his client, and partly by that client's own carelessness<sup>72</sup>: e.g. where a mortgage lender suffers loss partly because of the negligence of a valuer engaged by him in overvaluing the security and partly because of the lender's own imprudent lending policy.<sup>73</sup> There was formerly some support for the view that, even in cases in this category, the Act applied only where the claim was framed in tort.<sup>74</sup> But this view has been rightly rejected<sup>75</sup> as it is not supported by the definition of "fault" in the Act, and as it would be unsatisfactory<sup>76</sup> in enabling an injured party to evade the Act by simply suing in contract where he also had a claim in tort. On the other hand the Act would not apply where, though both contracting parties were careless, the court took the view that the loss was entirely caused by the carelessness of one: e.g. that of the client<sup>77</sup> or that of his professional adviser.<sup>78</sup>

In the three situations so far discussed, the defendant is guilty of a breach of contract and the claimant's conduct is careless; but that conduct does not amount to a legal wrong against the defendant. Where the loss to each party results in part from a breach of contract committed by one of them (A) against the other (B) and in part by an independent legal wrong committed by B against A, then the losses may be apportioned<sup>79</sup> (quite apart from the Act) on the ground that they resulted from two independent actionable wrongs. Each party can then recover in respect of his own loss to the extent that it was caused by the other's wrongful act.<sup>80</sup> This was, for example, held to be the case where goods belonging to the tenant of part of a warehouse, and the warehouse itself, were damaged as a result partly of the tenant's breach of covenant to repair and partly of omissions of the landlord giving rise to liability in tort. Each party was held liable for the other's loss to the extent that it had been caused by his own

<sup>72</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher [1989] A.C. 852, affirmed without reference to this point ibid. at 880 et seq. but not followed in Australia: Astley v Austrust Ltd [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 758; The Superhulls Cover Case (No.2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 431; cf. The Moonacre [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 501, where the plea of contributory negligence failed as the client was not careless; Paul Tudor Jones Ltd v Cramley Colosso Ltd [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 619 at 638; Maes Finance Ltd v AL Phillips & Co, The Times, March 25, 1997; Bristol & West BS v Fancy & Jackson [1997] 4 All E.R. 582 at 625; Sumitomo Bank Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert S.A. [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 487; Nationwide BS v JR Jones [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 614.

<sup>73</sup> The reduction of damages on account of the claimant's contributory negligence is in such cases calculated on the loss actually suffered (the "basic loss") and not on the lower amount for which the defendant is responsible under the "scope of duty" test (above, pp.938–940). Platform Home Loans v Oyston Shipways Ltd [2000] 2 A.C. 190.

<sup>74</sup> Sole v WJ Hallt [1973] Q.B. 574; The Shinjitsu Maru (No.5) [1985] 1 W.L.R. 1270; cf. Basildon DC v JE Lesser (Properties) Ltd [1985] Q.B. 839 at 849, 30 (as to which see above, p.985 n.62); Andrews [1986] C.L.J. 8; Burrows, 101 L.Q.R. 161; Spowart-Taylor, 49 M.L.R. 102.

<sup>75</sup> Forsikringsaktieselskapet Vesta v Butcher, above; [1989] A.C. 852 (where at 875 in the Court of Appeal, Neill J.J. acknowledged the error of his former contrary view in The Shinjitsu Maru (No.5), above); cf. Wheeler v Copas [1981] 3 All E.R. 405 (where no express reference to the Act is made in the report). The Law Commission's proposal (above at n.70) seems to extend to this situation, even though it is already covered by the 1945 Act.

<sup>76</sup> This was admitted in The Shinjitsu Maru (No.5), above, at p.1288.

<sup>77</sup> O'Connor v BD Kirby & Co [1972] 1 Q.B. 90 where the trial court's view that the client should recover two-thirds of the loss was described at 99 as "somewhat novel"; cf. Quinn v Burch Bros (Builders) Ltd [1966] 2 Q.B. 370; Mint Security Ltd v Blair [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 188, 201; County Ltd v Girozentrale Securities [1996] 3 All E.R. 834; Kapur v JW Francis & Co (No.2) [1999] Lloyd's Rep. P.N. 834.

<sup>78</sup> UCB Corporate Services Ltd v Clyde & Co [2000] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 256 at 265.

<sup>79</sup> It is an open question whether there can be such apportionment where B's loss is caused partly by A's legal wrong against B and partly by conduct by B amounting to a legal wrong against a third party (C): see Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.2) [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 218 at 230, 236 (reversed on another point [2002] UKHL 43; [2003] 1 All E.R. 173), where the wrongs committed by A against B and by B against C amounted, not to breach of contract, but to the tort of deceit.

<sup>80</sup> For a special exception to this principle in the law of carriage of goods by sea, see The Fiona [1994] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 506.

wrong.<sup>81</sup> The position would have been the same if the wrongs of both parties had been breaches of contract,<sup>82</sup> e.g. if the tenant had undertaken to do internal and the landlord external repairs and the damage had been due to the failure of both to perform their respective undertakings. But the present line of reasoning cannot apply where only one party (the defendant) was guilty of a legal wrong, while the conduct of the claimant which is alleged to have contributed to his loss did not amount to such a wrong.<sup>83</sup>

All the situations so far discussed must be distinguished from those in which the defendant's contractual undertaking is to compensate the claimant for a loss not brought about by any act or omission on the part of the defendant at all: for example, where a bank issues travellers' cheques to a customer and promises to compensate him for their face value in the event of his losing them. If the loss is due to the customer's failure to guard against loss, the bank may, if the contract so provides,<sup>84</sup> escape liability for the loss; but such cases raise no issues of contributory negligence as no wrong, leading to the loss, is committed by the bank.

(5) Other restrictions

(a) INJURED FEELINGS AND REPUTATION.<sup>85</sup> A claimant can sometimes<sup>86</sup> recover damages in tort for injury to his feelings, far exceeding any financial loss suffered by him. In Hurst v Picture Theatres Ltd<sup>87</sup> the claimant was forcibly ejected from a cinema seat for which he had paid 6d. He recovered £150 in an action for assault and false imprisonment. In substance this was compensation for the indignity he had suffered.

(i) Injured feelings: general principle. In a contractual action, the right to recover such damages is restricted by the decision of the House of Lords in Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd,<sup>88</sup> where a company wrongfully dismissed its manager in a way that was "harsh and humiliating".<sup>89</sup> He recovered damages for loss of salary and commission, but not for the injury to his feelings caused by the manner of his dismissal. One possible justification for

<sup>81</sup> Tenant Radiant Heat Ltd v Warrington Development Corp [1988] 1 F.G.L.R. 41; distinguished from contributory negligence cases in The Good Luck [1990] 1 Q.B. 818, 904 (reversed on other grounds [1992] 1 A.C. 233); applied in W Lamb Ltd v J Jarvis & Sons plc [1999] 60 Con. 1.1.R. 1.

<sup>82</sup> Where each party commits a tort, the outcome was governed at common law by the "last opportunity" rule (above n.63) and is now governed by the 1945 Act.

<sup>83</sup> Rafalac Ltd v Eade [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 507 at 510, where the defendant's wrong was also said at 511 to have been the "dominant cause" of the loss.

<sup>84</sup> Braithwaite v Thomas Cook Travellers Cheques Ltd [1989] Q.B. 553; contrast El Awadi v Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA [1990] 1 Q.B. 606.

<sup>85</sup> Jackson, 26 I.C.L.Q. 502; Enochong (1996) 16 O.J.L.S. 617.

<sup>86</sup> For a list of such cases, see McGregor, Damages (16th ed.), §90. They include assault, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, deceit (Archer v Brown [1985] Q.B. 401), and trespass to land where it is deliberately committed with the intention to molest or annoy: cf. Wilkes v Wood (1763) Lofft 1. Such damages are also available for unlawful discrimination under Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.66(4), Race Relations Act 1976, s.57(4) and Disability Discrimination Act 1995, ss.8(4), 25(2); cf. the position under Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1992, s.149(2), but contrast that in cases of unfair dismissal, now governed by Employment Rights Act 1996, s.123(1); Norton Tool Co Ltd v Temson [1972] I.C.R. 510. Quære whether negligent or innocent torts or torts of strict liability give rise to a claim for injury to feelings. By s.1A of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976, as amended by Administration of Justice Act 1982, s.3, damages of up to £10,000 (Damages for Bereavement (Variation of Sum) (England and Wales) Order, SI 2002/644) for "bereavement" are available in certain cases in respect of the death of the claimant's spouse or unmarried minor child.

<sup>87</sup> [1915] 1 K.B. 1. cf. Ministry of Defence v Cannock [1995] I.C.R. 918 (tort damages for dismissal, contrary to EC Directive, on ground of pregnancy).

<sup>88</sup> [1909] A.C. 488.

<sup>89</sup> At 493.

the rule is that such injury is not within the contemplation of the parties and is thus too remote; but an employer considering the effects of such a dismissal could surely contemplate injury to the employee's feelings.<sup>90</sup> More probably the rule results from a failure to distinguish between punitive (or exemplary) damages (which are not generally available in a contractual action) and damages for injured feelings (which are meant to compensate the claimant for a loss, though it is not a pecuniary one).<sup>91</sup> Whatever may be the basis of the rule, it continues to restrict the damages recoverable in an action for wrongful dismissal.<sup>92</sup>

Such damages normally consist of the amount which the employee would have earned during the period of notice which the employer was legally obliged to give to bring the contract lawfully to an end.<sup>93</sup> By statute, further compensation may be recoverable for unfair dismissal even where such notice is given; and the relevant legislation<sup>94</sup> subjects awards of such compensation to specified financial limits. In Johnson v Unisys Ltd,<sup>95</sup> an employee who had recovered the maximum amount available under this legislation (some £11,600) then sought to recover further damages (of some £400,000) at common law, alleging that the manner of his dismissal constituted a separate breach of contract which had caused him to suffer a mental breakdown and consequent loss of earnings. The House of Lords rejected the claim on the ground that it would be wrong to allow the financial limit laid down by the statutory scheme for compensation for unfair dismissal to be evaded by giving the dismissed employee a "parallel remedy [at common law] which is subject to no such limit".<sup>96</sup> It seems that, in cases not governed by any such statutory scheme, the House of Lords would be prepared to review the principle in Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd<sup>97</sup>; and this is a point important because that case, though strictly an authority only on damages for wrongful dismissal, has also been regarded as the basis of the wider principle that damages for injured feelings cannot, in general, be recovered in a contractual action.<sup>98</sup> That principle has recently been applied so as to preclude the recovery of damages by a company director in respect of mental distress and anxiety suffered by him as a result of alleged breaches of duty by a firm of solicitors engaged by

<sup>90</sup> See below, p.992 at n.50.

<sup>91</sup> See above, p.935 and Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [15] per Lord Steyn, dissenting on the main issue in that case; for the distinction in tort cases, see McCarty v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1965] 2 Q.B. 86; Joyce v Sengupta [1993] 1 W.L.R. 337 at 347.

<sup>92</sup> Shove v Downs Surgical plc [1984] I.C.R. 532; Bliss v S.E. Thames Regional Health Authority [1987] I.C.R. 700, overruling Cox v Phillips Industries Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 638; Rae v Yorkshire Bank [1988] F.L.R. 1 (so far as it relates to damages for "humiliation"); Carty, 49 M.L.R. 240. The rule is viewed with scepticism, even in the context of wrongful dismissal, in Johnson v Gore Wood [2002] 2 A.C. 1 at 50 per Lord Cooke, dissenting on this point. Under the proposals in Law Com. No.247 (1997), para.6.1(2), damages for mental distress to reflect the conduct of the defendant are to be available in contractual actions.

<sup>93</sup> Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [41]; Boardman v Copeland BC [2001] EWCA Civ 888.

<sup>94</sup> Employment Rights Act 1996, Pt X.

<sup>95</sup> See above, n.5.

<sup>96</sup> ibid., at [56, 57]; cf. ibid., at [2], [80], Lord Steyn dissenting on this point.

<sup>97</sup> See, apart from this criticism of Addis' case in Lord Steyn's dissent on this point, the views of Lord Nicholls at [2] and Lord Hoffmann at [43].

<sup>98</sup> cf. Kenny v Preen [1963] 1 Q.B. 499; Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1444; Branchett v Beunty [1992] 3 All E.R. 910 at 916; The Italia Express [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 281 at 293; French v Barclays Bank [1998] I.R.L.R. 646; Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [69]; Furley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 732, at [16], [34], [47], [54]. Semble the conduct of the landlord in Kenny v Preen, above, would now be an offence under Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s.1 (replacing Rent Act 1965, s.30), but breach of that section gave rise at common law to no separate civil claim: McCall v Abelesz [1976] Q.B. 585. See now Housing Act 1988, s.27.

him and the company to carry through the purchase of development land by the company.<sup>99</sup>

(ii) Exceptions. The principle stated above is, however, only a general one; and it is subject to many qualifications. First, damages can be recovered for pain and suffering for a breach of contract which causes personal injury.<sup>1</sup> Such an award takes account of the claimant's mental anguish and to this extent includes damages for injured feelings.<sup>2</sup> Moreover, it seems that personal injury can include physical or mental illness resulting from injury to feelings and that damages for such illness can be recovered,<sup>3</sup> so long as they are not too remote.<sup>4</sup> Secondly, damages can be recovered for physical inconvenience. Thus in Bailey v Bullock<sup>5</sup> a solicitor who negligently failed to take proceedings for the recovering of his client's house was held liable for the inconvenience (but not the indignity) that the client suffered in having to live for nearly two years with his wife's parents. Similarly, damages for inconvenience, but not for distress, can be recovered from a surveyor who in breach of contract with his client fails to draw attention to defects in a house which the client, in reliance on the surveyor's report, buys for personal occupation<sup>6</sup>; and a lessor or premises for use as solicitors' offices has been held liable for the "discomfort" caused by his breach of a repairing covenant.<sup>7</sup> It is obviously not easy to distinguish sharply between these two kinds of injury<sup>8</sup>; and damages for distress resulting from the discomfort can be recovered in such cases.<sup>9</sup> Thirdly, damages for distress or vexation can be awarded in a group of cases in which at least one of the "major and important"<sup>10</sup> objects of the contract was to provide enjoyment, security, comfort or sentimental benefits. Such awards have, for example, been made against a travel agent who broke his contract to provide a couple with accommodation for their honeymoon<sup>11</sup>; against a package-tour operator who provided accommodation falling short of the standard promised and so spoil his client's holiday<sup>12</sup>; against a carrier for breach of a contract to convey guests to a wedding<sup>13</sup>; against a photographer for breach

<sup>99</sup> Johnson v Gore Wood & Co [2002] 2 A.C. 1.

<sup>1</sup> e.g. Godley v Perry [1960] 1 W.L.R. 9.

<sup>2</sup> See H West & Sons Ltd v Shephard [1964] A.C. 326.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. Chelini v Nieri 196 P. 2d 915 (1948); and see below, p.993 at n.56.

<sup>4</sup> Remoteness would depend on the employer's knowledge of the employee's mental state (and so of the likelihood of his suffering mental illness in consequence of the breach) at the time of contracting, not at that of breach: see above p.965 at n.64. This point accounts for rejection of the claim in Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [29] by Lord Steyn on the ground of remoteness; the same view is taken by Lord Millett, ibid., at [70].

<sup>5</sup> (1950) 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 791; Hobbs v London & South Western Ry (1875) L.R. 10 Q.B. 111; Mafo v Adams [1970] 1 Q.B. 548; Wallace v Manchester CC, The Times, July 23, 1998.

<sup>6</sup> Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1287; Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421; Patel v Hooper & Jackson [1999] 1 W.L.R. 1792; Heatley v William Brown [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 289 must be explained on the ground that the damages were awarded for inconvenience rather than for distress. "Inconvenience" seems here to refer to physical inconvenience: see the rejection of the claim for "inconvenience and humiliation" (the two being evidently regarded as distinct) in Rae v Yorkshire Bank [1988] F.I.R. 1 (wrongful dishonour of a cheque).

<sup>7</sup> Larkhouse Investments Ltd v Temple House [1999] B.L.R. 297.

<sup>8</sup> Watts v Morrow, above.

<sup>9</sup> cf. McCall v Abelesz [1976] Q.B. 585 at 594, where "mental upset and distress" and "inconvenience" seem to be used interchangeably.

<sup>10</sup> Furley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 737 at [24].

<sup>11</sup> Cook v Spanish Holiday Tours Ltd, The Times, February 6, 1960.

<sup>12</sup> Jarvis v Swan Tours Ltd [1973] Q.B. 233; cf. Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 1468; Wings Ltd v Ellis [1985] A.C. 272 at 287; Spencer v Cosmos Air Holidays Ltd, The Times, December 6, 1989; Peninsular & Orient SN Co v Youell [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 141; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 C.L.R. 144; Leitner v TUI Deutschland GmbH & Co AG [2002] All E.R. (EC) 651; and (in tort) Ichard v Frangoulis [1977] 1 W.L.R. 556.

<sup>13</sup> Chandle v East African Airways Corp [1964] E.A. 78.

of a contract to take wedding photographs<sup>14</sup>; against a cemetery for breach of a contract to grant exclusive burial rights<sup>15</sup>; and against a landlord for breach of his covenant to repair, which left a flat so damp as to make it uninhabitable.<sup>16</sup> The award of damages for "loss of amenity" where a contract to build a swimming pool for the customer's personal use was broken by building the pool to less than the stipulated depth<sup>17</sup> can be explained on the same ground; and this explanation also accounts for the view that an architect who designs a house for his client's personal occupation is liable for failing to incorporate in the design agreed features, such as an impressive entrance hall and wide staircase, thus depriving the client of the pleasure which he expected to derive from these features.<sup>18</sup> The distinction between cases in which damages are awarded on the present ground and those in which they are awarded for physical inconvenience (under the second exception, discussed above) sometimes hard to draw. The point is illustrated by Farley v Skinner<sup>19</sup> where the claimant had, before buying a house as his retirement home, engaged a surveyor whom he had specifically instructed to report on the question whether the house would be affected by aircraft noise. The surveyor in breach of contract carelessly failed to provide accurate information on this point and the purchaser recovered damages in respect of the market adverse effect which such noise had on the peace and tranquillity of the property, even though the price paid for it by him did not exceed its market value. The main ground for the decision is that one important (though not the sole) object of the contract was to provide "pleasure, relaxation and peace of mind"<sup>20</sup>; but there is also support in the speeches for the view that the award could have been supported on the ground that the claimant had suffered physical inconvenience (and not merely distress or vexation) in having to put up with the unexpected level of noise.<sup>21</sup> The question whether one of the main objects of the contract is to provide "pleasure, relaxation and peace of mind" can also give rise to difficulty in borderline cases. Thus in one case damages for distress were awarded against the seller of a new car which broke down and would not restart, so that the buyer suffered "a totally spoilt day comprising nothing but vexation",<sup>22</sup> while in another it was held that no such damages were available for breach of a contract to repair a car.<sup>23</sup> Again, in Farley v Skinner it was said that the case was "not 'an ordinary surveyor's contract'"<sup>24</sup> and considerable emphasis was placed on the fact that the contract had specifically referred to aircraft noise. It seems that, but for this fact the surveyor would have been liable only for pecuniary consequences and inconvenience resulting from physical defects in the property itself, as opposed to the vexation caused by adverse environmental factors.<sup>25</sup> Fourthly, the same conduct may amount both to a breach of contract and to a tort; and

<sup>14</sup> Diesen v Samson 1971 S.L.T. (Sh.Ct.) 49.

<sup>15</sup> Reed v Madon [1989] Ch.408.

<sup>16</sup> Calabar Properties Ltd v Sticher [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287; cf. Inglis v Cant [1987] C.L.Y. 1132 (delay and defects in renovation of house); Chiodi v De Marney [1988] 2 E.G.L.R. 64 (breach of statutory repairing covenant).

<sup>17</sup> Ruxley Electronics Ltd v Forsyth [1999] A.C. 344 (above, p.947) described in Johnson v Gore Wood Co [2002] 2 A.C. 1 at 37 as an "unusual case" but applied in Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 732 where the damages in the Ruxley case were said at [21] to have been awarded for "disappointment".

<sup>18</sup> This follows from the overruling in Farley v Skinner, above, of Knott v Bolton (1995) 45 Con.L.R. 127.

<sup>19</sup> See above, n.17.

<sup>20</sup> Farley v Skinner, above, at [24].

<sup>21</sup> ibid., at [30], [38], [54], [105].

<sup>22</sup> Bernstein v Pamson Motors (Golders Green) Ltd [1987] 2 All E.R. 220 at 231; the case was later compromised when the manufacturers agreed to compensate the buyer in full: see (1987) N.L.J. 1194. cf. Jackson v Chrysler Acceptance Ltd [1978] R.T.R. 474 (defects in car bought for touring holiday).

<sup>23</sup> Alexander v Rolls Royce Motors Ltd [1996] R.T.R. 95.

<sup>24</sup> See above, n.17 at [42], referring to Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1442.

<sup>25</sup> See especially Farley v Skinner, above n.17, at [44], [54–57].

where this is the case the claimant can sometimes recover damages for distress by suing in tort even though such damages would not be available in an action for breach of contract. Thus a tenant cannot recover damages for distress in respect of his landlord's breach of covenant for "quiet enjoyment"<sup>26</sup> (this phrase referring here to the tenant's exercise of the right granted by the lease, rather than to his deriving pleasure from it)<sup>27</sup>; but if a landlord so terrifies and abuses his tenants that they leave the premises he can be held liable in tort for their distress.<sup>28</sup>

(iii) Injury to reputation. In Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd<sup>29</sup> it was further held that, in an action for wrongful dismissal, the employee could not recover damages for the loss that he might suffer because the dismissal made it more difficult for him to get another job. But the view that damages in such an action cannot be recovered for loss of employment prospects, or for injury to reputation, was hard to justify; and "may no longer be law".<sup>30</sup> In Malik v BCCF<sup>31</sup> the House of Lords held that such "stigma damages" were in principle recoverable by former employees of a bank which had collapsed in consequence of corruption and dishonesty in which the employees had not been involved; though the employees' claim ultimately failed as they were unable to establish that the stigma was the cause of the rejection of any job applications which had been made by them; or that any future ones had a sufficiently real chance of success to justify an award for damages for loss of a chance; or that, if such a chance existed, the stigma was the cause of its loss.<sup>32</sup> The damages which they could have recovered if they had been able to establish any of these points would have been recoverable in respect, not of injury to feelings, but in respect of financial loss<sup>33</sup>; and they would have been recoverable, not for wrongful dismissal, but for breach of the employer's implied undertaking not without reasonable cause so to conduct itself as to destroy the relationship of trust and confidence between itself and its employees.<sup>34</sup> According to a further distinction drawn in Malik's case, the employee can recover such damages where the effect of the breach is "positively to damage" his job prospects, but not where its effect is merely a "failure to improve them".<sup>35</sup> It is, however, respectfully submitted that the possibility of the employer's being held liable for loss of the latter kind should not be ruled out, particularly where the employment involves training or similar features intended to enhance the employee's prospects. It was, for example, established even before Malik's case that an apprentice who was wrongfully dismissed before the end of his period of training was entitled to damages for diminution of his future prospects since "the very object of an apprenticeship agreement is to enable the apprentice to fit himself to get better employment".<sup>36</sup>

There are many other situations in which damages can be awarded for loss of employment prospects or for injury to reputation resulting from a breach of contract.

<sup>26</sup> Branchett v Beany [1992] 3 All E.R. 910 at 916.

<sup>27</sup> Kenny v Preen [1969] 1 Q.B. 499 at 511.

<sup>28</sup> Sampson v Floyd [1989] 2 E.G.L.R. 49 as explained in Branchett v Beany [1992] 3 All E.R. 910 at 918. In Johnson v Gore Wood & Co [2002] 2 A.C. 1 (above p.920) no attempt seems to have been made to argue that the claim for damages for mental distress might have been made in tort. This may account for Lord Bingham's statement at 38 that "on the argument presented on this appeal" the general principle should not be "further restricted". The duty alleged to have been broken by the solicitors was claimed to have arisen "in contract and tort": see ibid., at 18.

<sup>29</sup> [1909] A.C. 488.

<sup>30</sup> Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480, at [70].

<sup>31</sup> [1998] A.C. 20.

<sup>32</sup> BCCI v Ali (No.2) [2002] EWCA Civ 82; [2002] I.C.R. 1258.

<sup>33</sup> See [1999] 4 All E.R. 83.

<sup>34</sup> See above, p.206.

<sup>35</sup> [1998] A.C. 20 at 37.

<sup>36</sup> Dunk v George Waller & Sons Ltd [1970] 2 Q.B. 163.

First, a trader can recover damages for injury to his business reputation, e.g. if his reputation suffers because his wholesaler supplies him with defective goods<sup>37</sup>; on the same principle a travel agent can recover damages for loss of "goodwill" from a shipowner who breaks his contract to supply accommodation for passengers on a pleasure cruise.<sup>38</sup> A similar rule applies where a bank wrongfully dishonours its customer's cheque. It has long been settled that, if the customer is a trader, he can recover general damages for the resulting injury to his business reputation.<sup>39</sup> A person who was not a trader was formerly thought to be entitled to no more than a nominal amount unless he proved special damages, i.e. particular items of loss resulting from the bank's breach.<sup>40</sup> But this view no longer prevails now that "the credit rating of individuals is as important for their personal transactions . . . as it is for those who are engaged in trade".<sup>41</sup> Hence such persons, too, can now recover general damages in respect of injury to what may be called their financial reputation<sup>42</sup> resulting from the wrongful dishonour of a cheque.<sup>43</sup> Secondly, an actor or author can recover damages for "loss of publicity", that is, for loss of the chance to enhance his reputation,<sup>44</sup> and also for injury to his existing reputation.<sup>45</sup> Thirdly, a person who is wrongfully expelled from a trade union can recover damages for the resulting loss of employment opportunities.<sup>46</sup> Finally, it has been suggested that a claimant should be entitled to damages for injury to reputation where the contract "had as its purpose, or one of its purposes, the protection of the claimant against the sort of damage suffered".<sup>47</sup> Thus damages of this kind were said to be recoverable for breach of a contract not to broadcast a programme concerning the activities of the claimants until after the publication of a report concerning those activities.<sup>48</sup>

(iv) "Anxiety". There is a separate rule that damages cannot be recovered for the "anxiety" which a breach of contract may cause to the injured party.<sup>49</sup> The rule is "not . . . founded on the assumption that such reactions are not foreseeable, which they surely are or may be, but on considerations of policy".<sup>50</sup> The policy consideration here referred to seems to be that anxiety is an almost inevitable concomitant of expectations

<sup>37</sup> Cointat v Myham & Son [1913] 2 K.B. 220.

<sup>38</sup> Anglo-Continental Holidays Ltd v Typaldos Lines (London) Ltd [1967] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 61.

<sup>39</sup> Rolin v Steward (1854) 14 C.B. 595 at 605; Wilson v United Counties Bank Ltd [1920] A.C. 102 at 112.

<sup>40</sup> Gibbons v Westminster Bank [1939] 2 K.B. 882.

<sup>41</sup> Kpohraror v Woolwich Building Society [1996] 4 All E.R. 119 at 124. The claimant in this case was a trader, so that it was not strictly necessary to decide the present point.

<sup>42</sup> Not for "loss of reputation simpliciter": Kpohraror's case, above, at 125. The phrase "financial reputation" is used in the text to avoid the awkwardness of referring to the "business reputation" of someone who is not in business.

<sup>43</sup> Kpohraror's case, below, at 124.

<sup>44</sup> Herbert Clayton & Jack Waller Ltd v Oliver [1930] A.C. 209; Joseph v National Magazine Co Ltd [1959] Ch. 14; Malcolm v Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Oxford, The Times, December 19, 1990.

<sup>45</sup> Malik v BCCI [1998] A.C. 20, overruling Withers v General Theatre Corp Ltd [1933] 2 K.B. 536. For subsequent proceedings in Malik's case, see above, p.991 at n.32.

<sup>46</sup> Edwards v SOGAT [1971] Ch. 354 at 378-379.

<sup>47</sup> Cambridge Nutrition Ltd v B.B.C. [1990] 3 All E.R. 523 at 540.

<sup>48</sup> Cambridge Nutrition case, above; cf. McLeish v Amoo-Gutfried & Co, The Times, October 13, 1993.

<sup>49</sup> Cook v Smiften [1967] 1 W.L.R. 457; Hutchinson v Harris (1978) 10 Build L.R. 19; Reed v Madon [1989] Ch. 408, 426 and, so far as it relates to "anxiety", Johnson v Gore Wood & Co [2002] 2 A.C. 1. In Kemp v Sober (1851) 1 Sim.(N.S.) 517 (where the running of a girls' school in breach of covenant was restrained) Lord Cranworth said at 520: "The feeling of anxiety is damage." But the better explanation is that an injunction to restrain breach of a negative stipulation can be granted without proof of damage: Tipping v Eckersley (1855) 2 K. & J. 254; Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App.Cas. 709 at 729; below, p.1040.

<sup>50</sup> Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 W.L.R. 1421 at 1445; Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 732 at [82].

based on promises, so that a contracting party must be deemed to take the risk of it.<sup>51</sup> Damages for anxiety or mental stress cannot, therefore, be recovered for breach of a contract made in the course of, or in connection with, a business and resulting in the failure of that business,<sup>52</sup> or for breach of contract by a bank in wrongly debiting a customer's account<sup>53</sup>; or for breach of contract by a broker, causing financial loss to his client.<sup>54</sup> On the other hand, such damages can be recovered if the very purpose of the contract is to secure relief from an existing state of anxiety, e.g. where a solicitor in breach of contract failed to take necessary steps in non-molestation proceedings, so that the molestation of his client continued.<sup>55</sup> Moreover, if actual mental illness results from anxiety, damages can be recovered in respect of it, so long as it is not too remote.<sup>56</sup>

(v) Nature of claims for non-pecuniary loss. Where damages are recoverable for "disappointment" resulting from failure to perform an obligation to provide enjoyment, security or peace of mind, it is sometimes said that the basis of such recovery is that the claimant was, by the breach, "deprived of the contractual benefit to which he was entitled".<sup>57</sup> Such language is, with respect, entirely appropriate in the context of such awards, which compensate the claimant in respect of a loss which he has in fact suffered, though the loss is non-pecuniary in nature. But phrases such as that quoted above could, if taken out of that context, be read as supporting the view that the mere fact of breach of contract, even though no loss of any kind had flowed from it, gave rise to a claim for substantial damages; and this view would, with respect, be inconsistent with a number of the rules or principles on which such claims are based. One such principle is that just discussed, that damages for breach of contract cannot be recovered merely in respect of the "anxiety" or "disappointment" that may be caused by the breach.<sup>58</sup> Another, discussed earlier in this Chapter, is that damages cannot be recovered in respect of a breach which has no adverse effect<sup>59</sup>; and, in particular, the application of this principle to cases in which the injured party has made a losing bargain,<sup>60</sup> e.g. where he is a buyer who has agreed to pay (but has not yet paid) more than the subject-matter is worth; nor can a buyer recover substantial damages in respect merely of the non-conformity of the goods delivered to him if those goods are worth no less than they would have been, if he had been in conformity with the contract.<sup>61</sup> In none of these cases are damages recoverable merely because the injured party has not received the benefit of the promised performance; and it is submitted that they support the view that "damages should not be awarded, unless perhaps nominally, for the fact of a breach of contract as distinct from the consequences of breach".<sup>62</sup> Of course the adverse consequences need not be of a

<sup>51</sup> Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2001] I.C.R. 480 at [70].

<sup>52</sup> Hayes v James & Charles Dodd [1990] 2 All E.R. 815; Soh, 105 L.Q.R. 43. A fortiori, such damages cannot be recovered by a corporate claimant: Firststeel Cold Rolled Products v Anaco Precision Products, The Times, November 21, 1994.

<sup>53</sup> McConville v Barclays Bank, The Times, October 13, 1993.

<sup>54</sup> R. v Investors Compensation Scheme, Ex p. Bowden [1994] 1 W.L.R. 17, reversed on other grounds [1995] Q.B. 107, in turn reversed without reference to the present point [1996] A.C. 261.

<sup>55</sup> Heywood v Wellers [1976] Q.B. 446; cf. Dickinson v Jones Alexander & Co [1993] 2 F.L.R. 521; contrast Hartle v Lacey [1997] C.I.Y. 3839 (solicitor employed for conveyancing purposes).

<sup>56</sup> Cook v Swinfen, above, n.49 Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] Q.B. 801 at 822; Attia v British Gas plc [1988] Q.B. 304 (where it is not clear whether the claim was in contract or in tort).

<sup>57</sup> Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49; [2002] 2 A.C. 732 at [106]; cf. ibid., at [86].

<sup>58</sup> See above p.992 at nn.49 and 50.

<sup>59</sup> See above, pp.934-935.

<sup>60</sup> ibid., cf. above, pp.948-949.

<sup>61</sup> Taylor v Bank of Athens (1922) 27 Com. Cas. 142.

<sup>62</sup> Farley v Skinner, above n.57, at [40] per Lord Clyde. For the application of the same principle to cases where the breach causes loss to a third party but none (beyond the bare fact of breach) to the promisee, see Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd [2001] 1 A.C. 518 at 534, per Lord Clyde; above, p.601.

financial kind, as is shown by the many exceptions, discussed above<sup>63</sup> to the general rule that damages for breach of contract cannot be recovered for injured feelings; but these cases do not negative the requirement that some adverse consequence to the claimant (other than mere "anxiety" or "disappointment") must flow from the breach in order to sustain an award of substantial damages. Nor is the present point affected by the fact that even a losing bargain might (in appropriate circumstances)<sup>64</sup> be specifically enforceable, though it would be somewhat eccentric for the injured party to seek specific enforcement of such a contract. The award of specific relief would not be open to the objection that could be levelled at an award of damages in such a case, i.e. that such an award would result in a "gratuitous benefit to the aggrieved party",<sup>65</sup> since the order of specific performance would be conditional on his performing his part of the bargain (i.e., on paying the "excessive" price) if he had not already done so.

(b) NON-PAYMENT OF MONEY. The general rule of common law was that interest could not be recovered as damages for failure to pay a debt when due. This rule applied both where the debtor wholly failed to pay and was sued for the debt, and where he paid voluntarily but after the due day.<sup>66</sup> At common law,<sup>67</sup> interest could be awarded only if the debt arose out of a mercantile security or if there was an agreement to pay interest<sup>68</sup> in the events which had happened.<sup>69</sup> Two major modifications of the common law rule have been made by legislation, but these have not abolished the rule, so that its operation still calls for discussion.

(i) Statutory interest. The first such modification is the right to "statutory interest" which arises under the Late Payments of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998. The Act applies only<sup>70</sup> to contracts for the supply of goods and services where each party is acting in the course of a business<sup>71</sup> The rules laid down by the Act are highly complex; but its central provision is that it is an implied term of a contract to which it applies that "statutory interest" will be payable on any "qualifying debt" created by the contract (i.e. broadly, on the price payable under the contract).<sup>72</sup> Statutory interest starts to run from the day after the date agreed for payment in the contract or, in default of such agreement, 30 days after either the performance of the supplier's obligation or notice of the amount of the debt (whichever is later).<sup>73</sup> Since statutory interest is available by virtue of an implied term, the supplier is in principle entitled to it as of right; but where

<sup>63</sup> See above, pp.989–991.

<sup>64</sup> i.e., subject to the restrictions discussed at pp.1019 et seq., below.

<sup>65</sup> Ruxley Electronics Ltd v Forsyth [1996] A.C. 334 at 357.

<sup>66</sup> London, Chatham & Dover Ry v South Eastern Ry [1893] A.C. 429; La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104; Alex Lawrie Factors Ltd v Modern Injection Moulds Ltd [1981] 3 All E.R. 658 at 683; The Lips [1988] A.C. 395 at 423; Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444 at 456.

<sup>67</sup> Interest can be awarded by way of ancillary relief and for breach of fiduciary duty in equity, and on damages and on salvage in Admiralty: see La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104 at 115; Mathew v TM Sutton Ltd [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1455.

<sup>68</sup> Higgins v Sargent (1823) 2 B. & C. 348.

<sup>69</sup> See Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444 (where the event on which interest was to be paid was held not to have occurred).

<sup>70</sup> In this respect the Act falls short of implementing the Law Commission's recommendations in its Report on Interest (Law Com. 88).

<sup>71</sup> s.2(1); for definition of "business" see s.2(7); for definition of "goods and services", see s.2(2) and (3); contracts of service and apprenticeship are excluded by s.2(4). The Act was brought into force in stages: see now Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act (Commencement No.5) Order (SI 2002/1673), listing earlier commencement orders.

<sup>72</sup> s.1(1) and (2); "qualifying debt" is defined in s.3; for the treatment of obligations to make an "advance payment," see s.11.

<sup>73</sup> s.4, especially subss. (2), (3) and (5). The rate of statutory interest is 8% above the Bank of England's official dealing rate: Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Rate of Interest) (No.3) Order 2002 (SI 2002/1675).

by reason of his conduct the interests of justice so require, the court can remit such interest wholly or in part.<sup>74</sup> The parties remain free, in general, to make their own contractual provisions with regard to interest and the Act does not place any restrictions on their power to do so after the debt has been created.<sup>75</sup> But their right to contract out of the Act before that time<sup>76</sup> is restricted in that contract terms are, to the extent to which they purport to exclude or restrict the right to statutory interest or to vary it, void unless they provide for a “substantial remedy” for late payment of the debt.<sup>77</sup> Moreover, no reliance can be placed on any contract term purporting to postpone the time at which a qualifying debt would otherwise be created unless that term satisfies the requirement of reasonableness under the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977<sup>78</sup>; this provision applies whether the contract in which the term is contained was the contract creating the debt or one made before or after that contract.<sup>79</sup> The scope of the Act is, as its title indicates, restricted in that it applies only to contracts in which each party acts in the course of a business and only to contracts for the supply of “goods” and “services”.<sup>80</sup> The latter expression may cover financial services; but consumer credit agreements and contracts intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge or other security are specifically excepted from the provisions of the Act.<sup>81</sup>

(ii) Discretionary interest. The second modification of the common law rule dates back to 1833, and is now contained in s.35A of the Supreme Court Act 1981. This gives the courts a discretionary power to award interest when giving judgment for a debt or damages<sup>82</sup>; and where proceedings are brought for recovery of a debt and the defendant pays the debt before judgment.<sup>83</sup> The court in exercising this discretion will look at the overall position of the injured party in consequence of the breach. Thus if he retains the income of property sold till payment, the court will not award him interest on the price, since this would amount to allowing double recovery.<sup>84</sup> Unlike the right to “statutory interest” under the 1998 Act, the discretion to award interest under the 1981 Act applies to all contracts; but it is subject to a number of limitations. If the contract has been rescinded by the injured party before payment under it from the party in breach has become due, no action for debt will be available to the injured party<sup>85</sup>; and in such a case the statutory discretion to award interest will be exercisable only in relation to the damages to which that party is entitled.<sup>86</sup> This restriction (which appears to apply also to the right to “statutory interest” under the 1998 Act<sup>87</sup>) is a significant one: the

<sup>74</sup> s.5.

<sup>75</sup> ss.7(2) and 8(5).

<sup>76</sup> s.7(2).

<sup>77</sup> s.8(1), (3) (4); for the definition of “substantial remedy,” see s.9. The use of standard terms which would be void under these provisions may be restrained by injunction on the application of a “representative body”, i.e. one representing the interests of “small and medium-sized enterprises”: see Late Payment of Commercial Debt Regulations 2002, SI 2002/1674 (implementing Dir.2000/35), reg.3; and see Explanatory Note for definitions of the phrases quoted above.

<sup>78</sup> s.14, bringing such a term within Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.3(2)(b) even where it is not contained in “written standard terms”.

<sup>79</sup> This follows from the reference in s.14(3) to the definition of “contract term” in s.10(1).

<sup>80</sup> s.2(1).

<sup>81</sup> s.2(5).

<sup>82</sup> See Supreme Court Act 1981, s.35(A)(1) as amended by Administration of Justice Act 1982, s.15 and Sch.1, Pt I. Pts II and IV of the Schedule confer the same powers on county courts and arbitrators; see Practice Direction [1983] 1 All E.R. 934.

<sup>83</sup> Supreme Court Act 1981, above, s.35A(3); for power to award interest on damages under s.35A, see Edmunds v Lloyds Italico [1986] 1 W.L.R. 492.

<sup>84</sup> Janred Properties Ltd v Ente Nazionale Italiano per il Turismo [1989] 2 All E.R. 444 at 456.

<sup>85</sup> See above, pp.850–851.

<sup>86</sup> Janred Properties case, above, n.84.

<sup>87</sup> Since in the case put there can be no “qualifying debt” within ss.1(1) and 3 of the 1998 Act.

damages suffered on a purchaser's default in completing a contract for the sale of a house are prima facie the difference between the contract price and the proceeds of resale,<sup>88</sup> a much smaller sum than the contract price. The statutory discretion to award interest under the 1981 Act does not moreover, extend to the case where an overdue debt is paid before any proceedings for recovery of the debt have begun.<sup>89</sup>

(iii) Interest and other loss as damages. A person who is entitled to statutory interest under the 1998 Act is, in addition, entitled to a relatively modest fixed sum,<sup>90</sup> intended to compensate him for the cost incurred by reason of the delay in payment. Subject to this qualification, neither of the statutory provisions described above enables the courts to award more than interest; and at common law the general rule was formerly thought to be that a debtor who defaulted was not liable for any other loss even though he knew that the creditor would be ruined by his default.<sup>91</sup> Long ago this rule was described by Jessell M.R. as "not quite consistent with reason"<sup>92</sup>; and its scope is now considerably restricted in the light of two distinctions. The first is that between claims for interest and claims for other types of loss suffered in consequence of the delay in payment; the second is that between "general" and "special" damages. The latter distinction is, in turn, used (in the present context) in two senses.<sup>93</sup> In the first sense, "general" damages are those recoverable under the first rule in Hadley v Baxendale,<sup>94</sup> while "special" damages are those recoverable under the second rule in that case; in the second sense, "general" damages are those which can be recovered without proof of loss, while "special" damages are those which can be recovered only as compensation for loss which the claimant can show that he has actually suffered.<sup>95</sup>

Common law claims for interest are prima facie claims for "general" damages in both these senses: loss of interest clearly arises (in the words of the first rule in Hadley v Baxendale) "according to the usual course of things from such breach of contract itself"<sup>96</sup>; and, under the statutory provisions described above an award of interest can be made without proof that any loss of interest has been suffered. In The Lips<sup>97</sup> the House of Lords had limited the general common law rule (that interest was not normally recoverable as damages for delay in payment) to claims for interest by way of "general" damages in the two senses just described. It follows that damages for loss of interest can be recovered at common law if the claimant can show (i) that such loss has actually been suffered, and (ii) that this loss was at the time of contracting within the reasonable contemplation of the defendant, so as to satisfy the second rule in Hadley v Baxendale.<sup>98</sup> For example, in Wadsworth v Lydall<sup>99</sup> the defendant was late in making a payment of

<sup>88</sup> See above, p.954.

<sup>89</sup> As in The World Symphony [1991] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 251, aff'd without reference to the point [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 115; cf. IM Properties plc v Dalgleish [1999] Q.B. 297 (same principle applied to damages). There is no such restriction on the right to "statutory interest" under the 1998 Act.

<sup>90</sup> Late Payment of Commercial Debt (Interest) Act 1998, s.5A, inserted by Late Payment of Commercial Debts Regulations 2002 (SI 2000/1674), reg.2(4) implementing Dir.2000/35; the fixed sum ranges from £40 where the debt is less than £1,000 to £100 where the debt is £10,000 or more.

<sup>91</sup> Fletcher v Tayleur (1855) 17 C.B. 21 at 29; Williams v Reynolds (1865) 6 B. & S. 495 at 505; British Columbia Saw-Mill Co Ltd v Nettleship (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 499 at 506.

<sup>92</sup> Walls v Smith (1882) 21 Ch.D. 243 at 257; Mann, 101 L.Q.R. 30; Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026 at 1041.

<sup>93</sup> International Minerals & Chemical Corp v Karl O Helm AG [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 103.

<sup>94</sup> See above, p.965.

<sup>95</sup> International Mineral & Chemical Corp v Karl O Helm AG [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 103.

<sup>96</sup> Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch. 341 at 354.

<sup>97</sup> [1988] A.C. 395 at 423, 429.

<sup>98</sup> See above, p.965; International Minerals & Chemical Corp v Karl O Helm AG [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 103–105; Knibb v NCB [1987] Q.B. 906 at 913; Dods v Coopers Creek Vineyards [1987] N.Z.L.R. 530.

<sup>99</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 598; approved in La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104.

£10,000 due to the claimant and needed by him (as the defendant knew) for completing the purchase of a farm as his home. As a result, the claimant incurred interest (and other) charges; and it was held that these were recoverable as damages for late payment. The interest recovered in this way was interest incurred by the claimant<sup>1</sup>: not interest forgone by him. It is the latter type of loss which is irrecoverable at common law even though it occurs (as it normally does) “according to the usual course of things” within the first rule in Hadley v Baxendale.<sup>2</sup>

According to The Lips, the common law rule precluding recovery of interest applies only to claims for interest as damages for late payment of money.<sup>3</sup> Claims for other losses suffered as a result of late payment are therefore not affected by the rule; and such claims are claims for “special” damages in the sense that they can succeed only if the claimant proves his loss. On the other hand, such losses “are subject to the same rules as apply to claims for damages for breach of contract generally”,<sup>4</sup> so that damages in respect of such losses can be recovered if either rule in Hadley v Baxendale is satisfied: they do not have to be “special” in the first of the two senses distinguished above, i.e. in the sense of falling within the second rule of remoteness laid down in that case. For example, late payment of money due in a foreign currency may cause loss to the claimant because of exchange rate fluctuations. Such loss is recoverable even if only the first (and not the second) rule in Hadley v Baxendale is satisfied.<sup>5</sup>

Where the claimant can show that he has suffered loss (other than loss of interest) as a result of the defendant's failure to pay money when due, he will have suffered “special” damage in our second sense (i.e. of loss actually proved). Many cases in which the courts have awarded damages can be explained by saying that the damages were “special” in this sense, and that, being claims for damages other than interest, they were subject only to the ordinary rules of remoteness. Such damages can be recovered from a banker who wrongfully repudiates liability, or delays in making payments due, under a letter of credit,<sup>6</sup> or who wrongfully fails to honour a customer's cheque<sup>7</sup>; from a buyer of goods who fails to provide a confirmed credit in accordance with the terms of the contract of a sale<sup>8</sup>; from a person who breaks a contract to subscribe for debentures in a company or who fails to pay calls on shares<sup>9</sup>; from a hire-purchaser or instalment buyer whose wrongful failure to pay instalments amounts to a repudiation of the contract<sup>10</sup>; and perhaps from any person who breaks a contract to lend or advance money.<sup>11</sup>

The decision in Wadsworth v Lydall,<sup>12</sup> and the restriction in The Lips of the original common law rule to claims for interest by way of general damages, are welcome

<sup>1</sup> cf. Nykreditbank v Edward Erdman Group [1997] 1 W.L.R. 1627 at 1637.

<sup>2</sup> e.g. The World Symphony, above, n.89.

<sup>3</sup> [1988] A.C. 395 at 424; cf. IM Properties plc v Cape & Dalgleish [1999] Q.B. 297 at 307 (where no such claim was made).

<sup>4</sup> [1988] A.C. 395 at 424.

<sup>5</sup> ibid. International Minerals & Chemical Corp v Karl O Helm AG [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81.

<sup>6</sup> Prehn v Royal Bank of Liverpool (1870) L.R. 5 Ex. 92; Larios v Bonany y Gurety (1873) L.R. 5 P.C. 346; Urquhart Lindsay & Co v Eastern Bank Ltd [1922] 1 K.B. 318; Ozalid Group (Export) Ltd v African Continental Bank Ltd [1979] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 231.

<sup>7</sup> Rolin v Steward (1854) 14 C.B. 595.

<sup>8</sup> Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co Ltd [1952] 2 Q.B. 297; Urquhart Lindsay & Co v Eastern Bank Ltd [1922] 1 K.B. 318, 323; above, p.762.

<sup>9</sup> Wallis Chlorine Syndicate Ltd v American Alkali Co Ltd (1901) 17 T.L.R. 565.

<sup>10</sup> Yeoman Credit Ltd v Wragowski [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1124 at 1128; Overstone Ltd v Shipway [1962] 1 W.L.R. 117; cf. p.851, above.

<sup>11</sup> See Sedgwick, Damages (9th ed.), s.622; Corbin, Contracts, §1065.

<sup>12</sup> [1981] 1 W.L.R. 598; above, at n.99.

developments: they both recognise and mitigate the unsatisfactory nature of that rule as it was formerly understood.<sup>13</sup> But even after the statutory and common law developments so far described, we are left with cases which could still fall within the common law rule that interest cannot be recovered for late payment of a debt. This could be the position where there was no right to "statutory interest" under the 1998 Act because the contract in question was not one for the supply of goods or services,<sup>14</sup> and where the statutory discretion to award interest under the 1981 Act could not be exercised because the debtor had paid late but before proceedings for recovery of the debt had been started. The common law rule which could lead to such a result was criticised in the very case in which the House of Lords first recognised its existence<sup>15</sup>; and that criticism was repeated when the House of Lords in 1984 reluctantly recognised the continued existence of the rule.<sup>16</sup> In times of high inflation or high interest rates, the rule can cause real hardship to a creditor; and it cannot be justified by reference to any of the general principles governing damages for breach of contract. No doubt the new right to "statutory interest" will remove that hardship in many cases; and in cases to which that right does not extend the creditor can protect himself by expressly stipulating for interest. In one case where a contract contained no such express stipulation the court nevertheless construed the contract as containing a promise to pay interest.<sup>17</sup> The decision is a further (and welcome) indication of the courts' dislike of the rule. Its abolition has been recommended by the Law Commission<sup>18</sup>; but in view of Parliament's failure to implement this recommendation in full,<sup>19</sup> it is unlikely that what remains of the rule will be reversed by judicial decision.<sup>20</sup>

(iv) Late payment of damages. The discussion so far has been concerned with damages for late payment of a debt. Where a defendant incurs liability in damages and unjustifiably delays in paying those damages, there is a statutory power to award interest on the damages<sup>21</sup>; but there is "no such thing as a cause of action in damages for late payment of damages".<sup>22</sup> This may be true even if the damages are a fixed sum payable under a valid liquidated damages clause.<sup>23</sup> Such a clause does not necessarily fix the time when the payment is to be made; and where no such time is fixed, delay in paying the fixed sum is not, of itself, a breach of contract. Where the clause fixes both the amount payable and the time of payment, it seems that special damages for late payment can be recovered, subject to the usual tests of remoteness.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>13</sup> See above, p.996 at nn.91 and 92.

<sup>14</sup> As in Wadsworth v Lydall [1981] 1 W.L.R. 598, where the payment was due under an agreement for the dissolution of a partnership.

<sup>15</sup> London, Chatham & Dover Ry v South Eastern Ry [1893] A.C. 429 at 437 (per Lord Herschell L.C.); Mann, 101 L.Q.R. 30.

<sup>16</sup> La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104; Bowles and Whelan, 48 M.L.R. 235. As the principal debt was paid after arbitration proceedings had commenced, interest could now be awarded on the facts of the case under the provisions of the Administration of Justice Act 1982, s.15 and Sch.1, Pt 1; but at the relevant time those provisions were not yet in force.

<sup>17</sup> FG Minter v Welsh Health Technical Services Organization (1980) 13 Build. L.R. 1. Contrast Alsabah Maritime Services v Philippine International Shipping Corp [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 291 where a provision in an agency agreement that "no other charges will be made . . ." was held to exclude interest.

<sup>18</sup> Report on Interest (Law Com. 88) paras 35–44.

<sup>19</sup> See above, p.994 n.70.

<sup>20</sup> La Pintada [1985] A.C. 104.

<sup>21</sup> See above, p.995 at nn.82 and 83.

<sup>22</sup> The Lips [1988] A.C. 395 at 425; Rammade Ltd v WJ Emson & Co Ltd, [1987] R.T.R. 72; The Arrus and Hoegh Rover [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 131; The Italia Express [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 281 at 292.

<sup>23</sup> This was the position in The Lips, above.

<sup>24</sup> The Lips [1988] A.C. 395 at 427.

(c) FAILURE TO MAKE TITLE TO LAND. A special rule formerly governed the damages recoverable by a purchaser of land if the contract went off through a defect in the vendor's title. In Bain v Fothergill,<sup>25</sup> the House of Lords held that the purchaser could only get damages in respect of his expenses in investigating the title. He could not get damages for loss of his bargain or for expenses incurred otherwise than in investigating the title. The rule was subjected to much criticism<sup>26</sup> and it was abolished by s.3 of the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 in relation to contracts made after September 27, 1990. It remains possible for the vendor by the terms of the contract to limit his liability for breach by reason of a defect in his title. The Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 would not apply to such a term either (a) in the case of a private sale, because the vendor's liability would not be "business liability"<sup>27</sup>; or (b) in the case of a sale in the course of a business (e.g. by a property developer) because the relevant provisions<sup>28</sup> of the Act do not apply to "any contract so far as it relates to the creation or transfer of an interest in land".<sup>29</sup> The Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 likewise do not apply against private sellers and it is doubtful whether they apply to a simple contract for the sale of land.<sup>30</sup> A term excluding or restricting the vendor's liability for making a misrepresentation as to his title could, however, be ineffective if it did not satisfy the requirement of reasonableness imposed by s.3 of the Misrepresentation Act 1967.<sup>31</sup>

4. Damages Fixed by Contract

A contract may provide for the payment of a fixed sum on breach. Such a provision may serve the perfectly proper purpose of enabling a party to know in advance what his liability will be; and of avoiding difficult questions of quantification and remoteness. On the other hand the courts are reluctant to allow a party, under such a provision, to recover a sum which is obviously and considerably greater than his loss. They have therefore divided such provisions into two categories: penalty clauses, which are invalid,<sup>32</sup> and liquidated damages clauses, which will generally be upheld.

(1) Distinction between penalty and liquidated damages

A clause is penal if it provides for "a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party"<sup>33</sup> to force him to perform the contract. If, on the other hand, the clause is a genuine attempt by the parties to estimate in advance the loss which will result from the breach, it is a liquidated damages clause. This is so even though the stipulated sum is not precisely equivalent to the injured party's loss. It seems that, if the stipulated sum is a genuine pre-estimate of the actual loss, the clause is valid even though part of that loss is irrecoverable because it is too remote<sup>34</sup>; and that it is similarly not penal if it

<sup>25</sup> (1874) 1 L.R. 7 H.L. 158.

<sup>26</sup> As long ago as Day v Singleton [1899] 2 Ch. 320 at 329 ("anomalous"); see generally Law Com. No.166.

<sup>27</sup> Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.1(3); above, p.246.

<sup>28</sup> i.e. those of s.3, above, p.253.

<sup>29</sup> ibid. s.1(2) and Sch.1, para.1(b); above, p.264.

<sup>30</sup> See above, pp.278–279, 281.

<sup>31</sup> As amended by the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, s.8; above, p.385.

<sup>32</sup> Unless in a form which parties to the kind of contract are, by legislation, required to use: Golden Bay Realty Pte Ltd v Orchard Twelve Investments Pte Ltd [1991] 1 W.L.R. 981.

<sup>33</sup> Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] A.C. 79 at 86.

<sup>34</sup> Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1428 at 1448.

stipulates for payment to a contracting party of an actual loss that is likely to be suffered, not by him, but by a third party.<sup>35</sup>

The question whether a clause is penal or a pre-estimate of damages depends on its construction and on the surrounding circumstances at the time of contracting (not at the time of breach).<sup>36</sup> In answering this question, the fact that the payment is described in the contract as a "penalty" or as "liquidated damages" is relevant, but not decisive.<sup>37</sup> Clauses in identical terms may be held penal or not, according to the subject-matter of the contracts and to the circumstances in which the contracts were made.<sup>38</sup>

In Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd<sup>39</sup> Lord Dunedin formulated four rules of construction:

(a) "It will be held to be a penalty if the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach": to quote a rather far-fetched example, a clause in a contract to do building work worth £50 would be penal if it provided that the builder should pay £1 million if he failed to do the work.<sup>40</sup>

(b) "It will be held to be a penalty if the breach consists only<sup>41</sup> in not paying a sum of money, and the sum stipulated is a sum greater than the sum which ought to have been paid". A clause making a debtor liable to pay £1,000 if he failed to pay £50 on the due day would thus be penal. One explanation formerly given for this rule was that the only amount recoverable, as damages for failure to pay money when due, was interest, when available by statute or by special agreement<sup>42</sup>; but this reasoning is no longer convincing now that special damages can be recovered for loss caused by such a breach.<sup>43</sup> Alternatively, it was suggested that the rule was based on an equitable jurisdiction to reform unconscionable bargains<sup>44</sup>; but this explanation, too, is suspect, for the rule applies even though the contract is fair.<sup>45</sup> Where the bargain is a fair one, the courts are reluctant to apply the present rule. In Wallis v Smith<sup>46</sup> £5,000 was payable "on any substantial breach" of a contract to develop land as a building estate; one of the terms of the contract was that the defendant should pay £500 on signing the agreement. When the defendant wholly repudiated the contract, he was held liable for the £5,000. The court was able to escape from the present rule by adopting a narrow construction of the clause and holding that failure to pay the £500 was not a "substantial" breach.

The rule does not apply merely because a contract under which a sum of money is payable in instalments provides that, on default of any payment, the whole balance is to

<sup>35</sup> See Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd v Panatown Ltd (1998) 58 Const. L.R. 58 at 92, reversed, on other grounds [2001] 1 A.C. 518; that payment would have to be held by the payee for the third party, above, p.606.

<sup>36</sup> Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] A.C. 79 at 87; Philips Hong Kong v Attorney-General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 Build.L.R. 41.

<sup>37</sup> Kemble v Furren (1829) 6 Bing. 141 ("liquidated damages" held penalty); Elphinstone v Monkland Iron & Coal Co Ltd (1886) 11 App.Cas. 332 ("penalty" held liquidated damages); cf. Pagnan & Fratelli v Coprosol SA [1981] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 283.

<sup>38</sup> Contrast Phonographic Equipment (1958) Ltd v Muslu [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1379 with Lombank Ltd v Excell [1964] 1 Q.B. 415.

<sup>39</sup> [1915] A.C. 79 at 87-88.

<sup>40</sup> Clydebank Engineering Co v Don Jose Ramos Isquierdo y Castaneda [1905] A.C. 6 at 10.

<sup>41</sup> See Thus P Gonzales Corp v FR Waring (International) Pty Ltd [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 160 at 163 (rule inapplicable where breach consists of buyer's failure to accept and pay).

<sup>42</sup> [1915] A.C. 79 at 87.

<sup>43</sup> See above, pp.996-997.

<sup>44</sup> [1915] A.C. 79 at 87.

<sup>45</sup> As in Betts v Burch (1859) 4 H. & N. 506. This case was decided in a common law court before the Judicature Acts 1873-75; but the same rule was recognised, if reluctantly, in the Chancery Division after 1875: Wallis v Smith (1882) 21 Ch.D. 243.

<sup>46</sup> (1882) 21 Ch.D. 243.

become immediately due.<sup>47</sup> Such a clause is said to accelerate, and not to increase, the liability of the debtor. But early payment in fact is generally more expensive to the debtor; and a provision for an extra payment equal in value to this expense would be undeniably penal.<sup>48</sup> In strict logic, such acceleration clauses should therefore fall within Lord Dunedin's second rule; the fact that they have been held not to do so is a further indication of the courts' reluctance to apply that rule. The parties can also circumvent this rule by providing that a high sum is to be paid as the contract price, subject to a discount if payment is made by a specified date; or by providing for the payment to be made by a third party under a performance bond.<sup>49</sup> These provisions for acceleration, for discounts, and for payments by third parties may be perfectly fair; and the relative ease with which Lord Dunedin's second rule can, by use of them, be evaded suggests that it serves no useful purpose and should be abandoned. Cases of real extortion could still be dealt with under Lord Dunedin's first rule; and it seems that under this rule an acceleration clause may be penal.<sup>50</sup> The foregoing submissions derive support from the judicial treatment of clauses which increase the rate of interest payable by a borrower in default. Such clauses are not penal if they operate prospectively only and if the increase is no more than a "modest"<sup>51</sup> one. The reason for this view is that the very fact of the borrower's default makes him a less good credit risk from the time of default and therefore provides a "good commercial reason"<sup>52</sup> for the increase. Even though such a stipulation may not be a genuine estimate of damage, it will therefore not be "in terrorem" of the offending party and hence not penal except where the increase is an "exceptionally large"<sup>53</sup> one.

(c) There is a presumption (but no more than a presumption) that a clause is penal when "a single lump sum is made payable . . . on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage". Under this rule, a sum is not presumed to be penal if it is expressly proportioned to the seriousness of the breach, e.g. if a lease provides for payment of £100 per acre<sup>54</sup> of land not restored to its former condition, or if a contractor agrees to pay £500 per week for delay.<sup>55</sup> Such stipulations are only penal if extravagant.

On the other hand, a sum payable on one of several events will be treated as penal if one of those events is the non-payment of a smaller sum,<sup>56</sup> or if one event is bound to cause greater loss than another.<sup>57</sup> A sum may, therefore, be regarded as penal if it might have become due on a trifling breach, even though the breach which actually occurred

<sup>47</sup> Protector Loan Co v Grice (1880) 5 Q.B.D. 529; Wallingford v Mutual Society (1880) 5 App.Cas. 685; cf. Sport International Bussum BV v Inter-Footwear Ltd [1984] 1 W.L.R. 776 at 793, and White & Carter (Councils) Ltd v McGregor [1962] A.C. 413, where it was conceded that the acceleration clause was valid; The Angelic Star [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 122; contrast O'Dea v Allstates Leasing Systems (WA) Pty Ltd (1983) 57 A.L.J.R. 172; Muir, 10 Sydney L.R. 503.

<sup>48</sup> A stipulation for accelerated payment of a loan plus interest for the whole contractual period was said to be penal in The Angelic Star [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 122 at 125.

<sup>49</sup> See below, p.1004.

<sup>50</sup> This seems to be the best explanation for Wadham Stringer Finance Ltd v Meany [1981] 1 W.L.R. 39 at 48, where such a clause was said to be subject to the rules as to penalties, though it was not penal in effect.

<sup>51</sup> Lordsvale Finance Ltd v Bank of Zambia [1996] Q.B. 752 at 767.

<sup>52</sup> ibid. at 763.

<sup>53</sup> ibid. at 767.

<sup>54</sup> Elphinstone v Monkland Iron & Coal Co (1886) 11 App.Cas. 332.

<sup>55</sup> Clydebank Engineering case [1905] A.C. 6; Philips Hong Kong v Attorney-General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 Build.L.R. 41. Such a provision will not operate where the contract is totally abandoned (since if it did so operate the payments would have to go on for ever): British Glanzstoff Mfg Co v General Accident, etc. Co [1913] A.C. 143.

<sup>56</sup> As in Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing. 141; cf. Duffen v FRABO SpA [2000] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 180 at 196.

<sup>57</sup> Wilson v Love [1896] 1 Q.B. 626 (on such facts, see now Agricultural Holdings Act 1986, s.24); cf. below, pp.1004–1005.

was quite a serious one, and one for which the sum could be regarded as a genuine pre-estimate.<sup>58</sup> In this way, the rule can invalidate perfectly fair bargains. The courts will do their best to avoid such results by construing the contract so as to make the sum payable only on major breaches, for which it is a valid pre-estimate.<sup>59</sup> Even where this construction is not possible, it is submitted that the validity of the clause should depend on what is likely to be its normal operation. It should not be struck down merely because, in extraordinary circumstances (which have not in fact occurred), the stipulated sum might greatly exceed the claimant's loss.<sup>60</sup>

(d) "It is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage that the consequences of breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties". Thus in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd itself the defendants bought tyres and agreed with the sellers that they would not (i) tamper with the manufacturer's marks; (ii) sell to the public below list price<sup>61</sup>; (iii) sell to any person "suspended" by the sellers; (iv) exhibit or export the tyres without the seller's written consent. They further agreed to pay £5 to the sellers for every tyre sold or offered in breach of the agreement. The defendants sold to the public below list price. It was held that the provision for payment of £5 per tyre was not penal. The presumption that a sum payable on several events was penal was "rebutted by the very fact that the damage caused by each and every one of those events, however varying in importance, [was] of such an uncertain nature that it cannot be accurately ascertained".<sup>62</sup> But even in such circumstances the sum will be penal if it is extravagant.<sup>63</sup>

(2) Effects of the distinction

Often the stipulated sum will exceed the claimant's loss. In such a case, the claimant can nevertheless recover that sum if the stipulation is a liquidated damages clause, while if it is a penalty he cannot recover the stipulated sum but only the amount to which he would have been entitled if the contract had not contained the penalty clause.<sup>64</sup> This follows from the nature of the distinction between the two kinds of provision. Two further possibilities, however, require discussion.

First, a clause may be intended to provide for payment of a sum below the estimated loss. Such a clause is not invalid as a penalty as its object is not to act in terrorem. In Cellulose Acetate Silk Co Ltd v Widnes Foundry (1925) Ltd<sup>65</sup> a contract for the construction of an acetone recovery plant provided that if completion was delayed the contractors were to pay "by way of penalty £20 per working week". The plant was completed 30 weeks late, during which period the owners suffered losses of £5,850. It was held that they could recover £600 only. Both parties must have known that the actual loss would exceed £20 per week, so that one object of the clause was to limit the contractors' liability. But it was not a pure limitation clause, for the contractors would still have had

<sup>58</sup> Ariston SRL v Charly Records Ltd, Financial Times, March 21, 1990.

<sup>59</sup> Webster v Bosanquet [1912] A.C. 394; cf. above, p.1000 at n.46.

<sup>60</sup> See Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney-General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 Build.L.R. 41; International Leasing Corp (Vic) Ltd v Aiken (1966) 85 W.N. (Pt.1) N.S.W. 766.

<sup>61</sup> For the possible effect of Competition Act 1998, s.2 on such a price-maintenance agreement, see above, p.476.

<sup>62</sup> [1915] A.C. 79, 96; cf. Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 W.L.R. 1428. For the now discarded view that a sum payable on several different events was necessarily penal, see Astley v Weldon (1801) 2 B. & P. 346.

<sup>63</sup> Ford Motor Co (England) Ltd v Armstrong (1915) 31 T.L.R. 267.

<sup>64</sup> Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026 at 1038.

<sup>65</sup> [1933] A.C. 20.

to pay £20 per week even if the owners had lost less.<sup>66</sup> For this reason, liquidated damages clauses are probably not exemption clauses, and so not subject to the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977,<sup>67</sup> though they may in certain circumstances be subject to the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1994.<sup>68</sup>

Secondly, the clause may be a penalty even though the stipulated sum falls short of the claimant's loss.<sup>69</sup> This apparently paradoxical situation can arise either because changing conditions have made an originally extravagant sum inadequate, or because a perfectly reasonable sum is nevertheless penal on technical grounds (i.e. under the second or third rules of construction stated above).<sup>70</sup> The question then arises whether the clause is nevertheless effective to limit the defendant's liability to the amount of the penalty. According to one view, the clause is effective for this purpose; for penalty clauses are struck down to prevent oppression<sup>71</sup> and the party in breach cannot be oppressed by the clause when it actually works in his favour. But this view can cut across the general principle that the validity of contractual provisions should be determined once for all by reference to the time of contracting<sup>72</sup>; for under it a term which was originally invalid as a penalty could become valid as a limitation clause simply by reason of a change of circumstances. Hence in Wall v Rederiaktiebolaget Lugudde<sup>73</sup> it was held that a shipowner could disregard a penalty clause in a charterparty and recover his actual loss, which exceeded the amount of the penalty. In the Cellulose Acetate case<sup>74</sup> the question whether a penalty clause could always be disregarded in this way was left open as it is possible for a clause on its true construction to be both a penalty and a limitation clause. But this is an implausible construction of a clause which provides for payment of a fixed sum irrespective of proof of loss; and it seems that generally such a clause would be disregarded under the rule in Wall's case.

(3) Analogous provisions

The penalty clauses with which the foregoing discussion is concerned are all stipulations for the payment of money. It is equally possible for a clause which requires some other performance from the party in breach to be a penalty. This could, for example, be the position where the clause required that party to make a "payment in kind", or to transfer shares at an undervalue.<sup>75</sup>

A number of other commonly found contractual provisions resemble penalties in their commercial purpose of putting pressure on a party to perform, but are nevertheless valid. This is, for example, true of acceleration clauses, of discounts for punctual payment<sup>76</sup> and of express provisions for termination on breach<sup>77</sup>; it is also sometimes true of provisions as to the forfeiture of deposits and part payments to be discussed below.<sup>78</sup> Two further types of clauses, however, give rise to considerable dispute.

<sup>66</sup> See above, p.237.

<sup>67</sup> See above, p.248.

<sup>68</sup> See below, p.1006.

<sup>69</sup> Hudson, 90 I.Q.R. 30; Gordon, ibid. 296; Hudson, 91 I.Q.R. 20; Barton, 92 I.Q.R. 20.

<sup>70</sup> See above, pp.1000–1001.

<sup>71</sup> Elsley v JG Collins Insurance Agencies (1978) 3 I.L.R. (3d) 1; cf. Philips Hong Kong v Attorney-General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 Build.L.R. 41; Hudson, 101 I.Q.R. 480.

<sup>72</sup> See above, pp.258, 271, 453–454, 1000.

<sup>73</sup> [1915] 3 K.B. 66 (not cited in the Elsley case, above); cf. Dingwall v Burnett 1912 S.C. 1097; W & J Investments Ltd v Bunting [1984] 1 N.S.W.R. 331.

<sup>74</sup> See above, n.65.

<sup>75</sup> Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026, where it was conceded that such a clause was penal.

<sup>76</sup> See above, p.1001.

<sup>77</sup> See above, p.778.

<sup>78</sup> See below, pp.1008, 1010.

(a) SUMS PAYABLE OTHERWISE THAN ON BREACH. The distinction between penalties and liquidated damages normally applies to sums payable on breach of the contract in which the stipulation for payment is contained. A clause under which a sum is payable only on some other event is therefore not a penalty. In Alder v Moore<sup>79</sup> a professional footballer received £500 from an insurance company in respect of an injury which was thought to have disabled him permanently; and he undertook to repay the money in the event of his again playing professional football. This was not a penalty<sup>80</sup> since he committed no breach when he did play again, as he had made no promise not to do so. Again, a contract for the sale of goods may give the buyer the option of postponing the date on which he is to take delivery, on payment of a "carrying charge". Such a provision is not a penalty since the permitted delay is not a breach and the extra charge is simply the price which the buyer pays for exercising the option conferred on him by the contract.<sup>81</sup> Nor is a sum a penalty where the liability to pay it arises, not on the breach itself, but only on an event triggered by the breach. This is the position where a lease provides that, on a tenant's failure to perform his covenant to repair, the landlord is to be entitled to execute the repairs and to recover the cost of so doing from the tenant. A claim for that amount is not a claim for damages but one for the agreed sum,<sup>82</sup> and is not subject to the law relating to penalties.<sup>83</sup> A stipulation is, similarly, not penal if it provides for the payment of a sum of money on breach of another contract with a third party. In one case A had contracted to build a refinery for B; C had undertaken responsibilities as guarantor for the financing of the project; and A had promised C that, in the event of a breach of A's contract with B, A would pay to C sums equivalent to those which C would have to pay under the guarantee. It was held that the latter stipulation was not a penalty as it "provided for payment of money on a specified event other than a breach of a contractual duty owed by the contemplated payor to the contemplated payee".<sup>84</sup> Similar reasoning seems to apply to performance bonds by which C promises to pay a sum of money to A if B fails to perform his contract with A. Such a promise is independent of the contract between A and B<sup>85</sup> and can be enforced by A against C even if A cannot show that B's breach has caused him any loss, or if the loss which A has suffered is less than the amount payable by C.<sup>86</sup>

It is less clear whether a clause in a contract can be penal if it provides for a payment on several events one of which is a breach of that contract while another is not. The

<sup>79</sup> [1961] 2 Q.B. 57; 77 L.Q.R. 300; Goff, 24 M.L.R. 637.

<sup>80</sup> [1961] 2 Q.B. 57 at 76.

<sup>81</sup> Thus P Gonzales Corp v FR Waring (International) Pty Ltd [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 160; Toepfer v Sosimage Sp.A [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 397 at 402; Fratelli Moretti Sp.A v Nidera Handelscompagnie BV [1981] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 47; Lusograin Comercio Internacional de Cereas Ltda. v Bunge AG [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 654; The Bonde [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 145. But demurrage clauses in charterparties (above, pp.237, 238) assume that the detention of the ship is a breach and provide for the payment of liquidated damages: The Lips [1988] A.C. 395. In Interfoto Picture Library Ltd v Stiletto Visual Programmes Ltd [1988] Q.B. 433 (discussed above, p.245) the question whether the "holding fee" was a "disguised penalty clause" was left open at 445-446. cf. John George Leigh (T/A Moor Land Videos) v Customs & Excise Commissioners [1990] 2 VATTR 59 ("fines" for late return of hired videos); Jones v Society of Lloyd's, The Times, February 2, 2000 (revival of original debt on debtor's failure to perform settlement agreement).

<sup>82</sup> See below, p.1013.

<sup>83</sup> Jervis v Harris [1996] Ch. 195 at 203.

<sup>84</sup> Export Credit Guarantee Department v Universal Oil Products Co [1983] 1 W.L.R. 399 at 402.

<sup>85</sup> Edward Owen Engineering Ltd v Barclays Bank International [1978] Q.B. 159.

<sup>86</sup> If A recovers more from C than he has lost, B (who will normally have procured and paid for C's promise to A) can, in general, recover the excess from A: Cargill International SA v Bangladesh Sugar & Food Industries Corp [1998] 1 W.L.R. 461; Comdel Commodities Ltd v Siporex Trade SA [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 424 at 431.

problem has arisen under so-called minimum payment clauses in hire-purchase agreements. Such a clause commonly provides that on premature determination of the agreement the hirer shall bring his payments under it up to a specified proportion of the hire-purchase price (or the whole of it) "by way of agreed compensation for depreciation". It then specifies the events on which the agreement may be determined. The owner is usually given the right to determine if the hirer commits a breach of the agreement, and in certain other events.<sup>87</sup> The hirer also often has a right to return the goods on bringing his payments up to the specified amount.

The question whether the law as to penalties applies to such clauses has given rise to much dispute. It is said, on the one hand, that only a sum payable on breach can be a penalty; and, on the other, that the whole law as to penalties could be evaded, if it did not apply to these clauses, by simply including, among the events on which the sum was payable, one event which was not a breach. The common law does not fully adopt either of these views. If the agreement is in fact determined on the ground of the hirer's breach, the law as to penalties applies.<sup>88</sup> If the agreement is determined on some ground other than the hirer's breach, e.g. because the hirer exercises his right to return the goods, the law as to penalties does not apply.<sup>89</sup> This compromise is unsatisfactory; for under it a hirer who wishes to return the goods may be better off if he simply defaults than he would be if he exercised his lawful right to determine the agreement.<sup>90</sup>

In the case of a regulated agreement within the Consumer Credit Act 1974,<sup>91</sup> the hirer has a statutory right to determine on payment of one-half of the hire-purchase price. But if the court is satisfied that a smaller sum will adequately compensate the owner for his loss, it may make an order for the payment of such smaller sum.<sup>92</sup> Under these provisions, a hirer who terminates lawfully will no longer be worse off than one who commits a breach. But where the agreement is not a regulated one (e.g. because the amount of credit exceeds £15,000 or because the hirer is not an "individual") the unsatisfactory rules of common law still prevail.

Where the law as to penalties applies, the question whether a minimum payment clause is penal is determined in accordance with the principles already discussed. In Lamdon Trust Ltd v Hurrell<sup>93</sup> a minimum payment clause providing for payment of about three-quarters of the hire-purchase price on determination was held to be penal, inter alia, because this sum was payable whether the hirer defaulted in payment of the first or of the last instalment: the loss caused by these two breaches would clearly be very different. As this factor is present in many cases of this kind, it seems that minimum payment clauses will often be penal, unless the minimum payment is very small.<sup>94</sup>

We have seen that a clause is not presumed to be penal if the sum payable is proportioned to the seriousness of the breach.<sup>95</sup> An attempt to use this principle to

<sup>87</sup> e.g. the hirer's bankruptcy. Provisions for termination on the hirer's death used to be common but are ineffective if the agreement is a regulated agreement (above, pp.177–178) within the Consumer Credit Act 1974, ss.86, 87.

<sup>88</sup> Conden Engineering Co Ltd v Stanford [1953] 1 Q.B. 86; Lamdon Trust Ltd v Hurrell [1955] 1 W.L.R. 391.

<sup>89</sup> Associated Distributors Ltd v Hall [1938] 2 K.B. 83; Re Apex Supply Co Ltd [1942] Ch. 108; Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1961] 1 Q.B. 445; reversed on other grounds [1962] A.C. 600, where the House of Lords was equally divided on the point discussed in the text.

<sup>90</sup> cf. Law Commission Working Paper No.61, para.22.

<sup>91</sup> See above, p.178.

<sup>92</sup> s.100(1) and (3). Probably these provisions displace the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 in cases of this kind: above, p.277.

<sup>93</sup> [1955] 1 W.L.R. 391; cf. Anglo-Auto Finance Co Ltd v James [1963] 1 W.L.R. 1042; United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd v Ennis [1968] 1 Q.B. 54.

<sup>94</sup> See Lombank Ltd v Kennedy [1961] N.I. 192.

<sup>95</sup> See above, p.1001.

support a minimum payment clause was rejected in Bridge v Campbell Discount Co Ltd.<sup>96</sup> The sum payable under the clause was said to be compensation for depreciation. Yet it decreased with each payment made by the hirer, while the depreciation obviously increased the longer the hirer kept the goods. "It is a sliding scale of compensation, but a scale that slides in the wrong direction".<sup>97</sup> Hence the clause was held to be penal. If the scale slides in the right direction, the clause may be upheld<sup>98</sup>; but it will still be invalid if it may result in excessive payment for any particular breach.<sup>99</sup>

(b) WITHHOLDING PAYMENTS. Normally, a penalty clause requires the defaulting party to make a payment to the victim; but it has been suggested that a provision entitling the victim to withhold a payment can also be penal. In Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd v Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd<sup>1</sup> a building sub-contract entitled the sub-contractor to the agreed payments on the issue of architect's certificates; and it then gave the main contractor the "right to suspend or withhold payment" if the sub-contractor failed "to comply with any of the provisions" of the contract. This was said to be invalid as a penalty.<sup>2</sup> But it seems that the contract could have achieved in substance the desired result by providing that nothing was to become due until performance precisely in accordance with its terms had been completed. Effect has been given to such provisions<sup>3</sup> without any reference to the law as to penalties. Somewhat similar reasoning was used where the rules of an association which had been formed for the enforcement of legal claims by its members provided that members who defaulted in the payment of subscriptions should not share in the proceeds of such claims. Their argument that this provision was a penalty was rejected on the ground that it was "an essential part of the pooling arrangement".<sup>4</sup>

(4) Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999

Under these Regulations, certain standard terms in contracts between commercial sellers of goods or suppliers of goods or services and consumers do not bind the consumer if they are unfair.<sup>5</sup> An illustration given in the Regulations of a term which is prima facie unfair<sup>6</sup> is one requiring "any consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation".<sup>7</sup> Such a term is likely also to be invalid as a penalty at common law, so that normally the common law rules and the Regulations would lead to the same result. There are, however, significant differences between these two sets of rules. On the one hand, the scope of the common law rules is perfectly general, while that of the Regulations is limited in that they apply only to standard terms in contracts between commercial sellers or suppliers and consumers, in that even within these categories certain types of contract are excepted, and in that certain terms are

<sup>96</sup> [1962] A.C. 600.

<sup>97</sup> [1962] A.C. 600 at 623.

<sup>98</sup> Phonographic Equipment (1958) Ltd v Muslu [1961] 1 W.L.R. 1379; cf. Essenda Finance Corp Ltd v Plessnig (1989) 63 A.I.J.R. 238; Wilkin [1990] L.M.C.L.Q. 16; Carter, 2 J.C.L. 78.

<sup>99</sup> Lombank Ltd v Excell [1964] 1 Q.B. 415; the Court of Appeal felt unable to overrule Muslu's case on the ground of inconsistency with Bridge's case. See Ziegel [1964] C.I.J. 108.

<sup>1</sup> [1974] A.C. 689.

<sup>2</sup> ibid. at 698, 703, 711, 723; cf. The Vainqueur José [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 557.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. Eshelby v Federated European Bank [1932] 1 K.B. 423; above, p.786.

<sup>4</sup> Nutting v Baldwin [1995] 1 W.L.R. 201; cf. SCI (Sales Curve Interactive) v Titus SARL [2001] EWCA Civ 591; [2001] 2 All E.R. (Comm) 416, at [66].

<sup>5</sup> See above, pp.267 et seq.

<sup>6</sup> SI 1999/2083, reg.5(2).

<sup>7</sup> ibid. Sch.2, para.1(e).

excepted even in contracts within the scope of the Regulations.<sup>8</sup> On the other hand, the scope of the Regulations appears to be wider than that of the common law rules in that the Regulations may (at least in some cases) apply to sums payable otherwise than on breach. A consumer who, in the words of the illustration quoted above, “fails to fulfil his obligations” is not necessarily in breach: he may, for example, have an excuse for non-performance.<sup>9</sup> The Regulations might also apply to a term by which a sum of money became payable on an event which was not a failure in performance at all: for example where a buyer agreed to pay a “carrying charge” if he failed to take delivery on the specified day, or where a hirer agreed to pay a “holding charge” if he did not return the subject-matter at the end of the specified period.<sup>10</sup> If the rate at which these charges are fixed is disproportionately high in relation to the amount which would be payable under the contract but for the delay, the term imposing the charge might well be regarded as “unfair” within the Regulations.<sup>11</sup>

5. Deposit and Part-payment<sup>12</sup>

(1) In general

A contract may provide that one party shall make an advance payment but fail to specify what is to happen to the payment if the contract is not performed. Clearly, the money must be paid back if the payee, in breach of contract, fails to perform.<sup>13</sup> But the more difficult question (with which the following discussion is concerned) is whether the money must also be paid back where it is the payor who, in breach of contract, fails to perform and the contract is in consequence rescinded by the other party. This depends at common law on the intention with which the money was paid: it may have been paid as a deposit or as a part-payment. A deposit is a sum of money paid as “a guarantee that the contract shall be performed”.<sup>14</sup> At common law,<sup>15</sup> it is generally<sup>16</sup> irrecoverable<sup>17</sup> unless the contract otherwise provides.<sup>18</sup> A part-payment is simply a payment of part of the contract price: it is generally<sup>19</sup> recoverable<sup>20</sup> unless the contract validly provides the contrary.

<sup>8</sup> See above, pp.276–280.

<sup>9</sup> See above, p.835.

<sup>10</sup> See above, p.1004 at n.81.

<sup>11</sup> Even though such a term can be said to fix the “price” of an option, it would not seem to be saved by reg.6(2)(a) (above p.248) since it does not define “the main subject-matter of the contract.”

<sup>12</sup> Beatson, 97 L.Q.R. 389, The Use and Abuse of Unjust Enrichment Ch.3; Milner, 42 M.L.R. 508; Harpum [1984] C.L.J. 134.

<sup>13</sup> Country & Metropolitan Homes Surrey Ltd v Topclain Ltd [1997] 1 All E.R. 254.

<sup>14</sup> Home v Smith (1884) 27 Ch.D. 89, 95; cf. Public Works Commissioners v Hills [1906] A.C. 368 (so far as it relates to the retention fund); The Selene G [1981] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 180 at 185.

<sup>15</sup> For the position under Law of Property Act 1925, s.49(2) see below, p.1008; for possible effects of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, see below p.1012.

<sup>16</sup> For an exception, see the discussion of deposits and penalties, below, p.1008.

<sup>17</sup> Home v Smith, above; Ex p. Barell (1875) L.R. 10 Ch.App. 512; Harrison v Holland [1921] 3 K.B. 297; [1922] 1 K.B. 211; Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 518; Omar v El Wakil [2001] EWCA Civ 1090; The Times, November 2, 2001, at [36].

<sup>18</sup> Palmer v Temple (1839) 9 A. & E. 508. A precontract deposit is recoverable if the negotiations fail to lead to the conclusion of the contemplated contract: Chillingworth v Esche [1924] 1 Ch. 97; Guardian Ocean Cargoes Ltd v Banco do Brazil [1991] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 68; idem (No.3) [1992] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 193.

<sup>19</sup> For a suggested exception, see below, p.1012 at n.66.

<sup>20</sup> Mayson v Clouet [1924] A.C. 980; Dies v British International Mining Corp [1939] 1 K.B. 725; and see Hillel v Christoforides (1991) 63 P. & C.R. 301.

(2) Deposits and penalties

A deposit is distinguishable from a penalty on the ground that it is payable before, and not after breach.<sup>21</sup> But the function of the two devices is similar: the only difference between “a guarantee that the contract shall be performed”<sup>22</sup> and “a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party”<sup>23</sup> lies in the emotive force of the words used. The law as to penalties can therefore apply to deposits. In the Workers Trust case,<sup>24</sup> for example, a contract for the sale of land provided for the payment by the purchaser of a deposit of 25 per cent of the price and for forfeiture of that deposit in the event of the purchaser’s default. After the purchaser had paid the deposit and then failed to complete on the due day, the vendor rescinded the contract and purported to forfeit the deposit; but the Privy Council held that the deposit was not a reasonable pre-estimate of the loss which the vendor was likely to suffer in consequence of the default, that the deposit was therefore penal, and that it must be paid back to the purchaser. On the other hand, where the deposit is reasonable in relation to the loss likely to be suffered, it can be forfeited, particularly if the loss is such that it cannot be accurately assessed in advance.<sup>25</sup>

There is a well-established exception to the general rule that a penal deposit must be paid back. In contracts for the sale of land, it is the normal practice for the purchaser to pay a deposit of 10 per cent of the price and for the contract to provide for forfeiture of that deposit in the event of the purchaser’s default. It is generally agreed that such a provision is valid even though it does not, and does not purport to, bear any relation to the vendor’s loss. In the Workers Trust case, the Privy Council described the exception as anomalous<sup>26</sup> but nevertheless recognised its existence.

(3) Law of Property Act 1925, s.49(2)

This subsection gives the court power “if it thinks fit” to order the return of a deposit paid under a contract for the sale of land. Originally, the courts took the narrow view that the subsection applied only in the exceptional situation in which, though the purchaser was in breach,<sup>27</sup> the vendor could not, for some reason, have obtained specific performance.<sup>28</sup> This restriction on the scope of the subsection may have had some support in the legislative history.<sup>29</sup> But the restriction derives no support from the words of the subsection; nor does it have any other merit. It was, moreover, open to the objection that, on a rising market, the purchaser’s breach might cause the vendor no loss at all; and to allow him nevertheless to keep the deposit could be said to enrich him unjustly, while

<sup>21</sup> cf. Corpe v Overton (1833) 10 Bing. 252 at 257.

<sup>22</sup> See above, at n.14.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.999 at n.33.

<sup>24</sup> Workers Trust and Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] A.C. 573; Harpum, [1993] C.L.J. 389 cf. Public Works Commissioners v Hills [1906] A.C. 368; Starside Properties Ltd v Mustapha [1974] 1 W.L.R. 816, 819; Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026 at 1036, 1041.

<sup>25</sup> Pye v British Automobile Commercial Syndicate Ltd [1906] 1 K.B. 425; cf. Starside Properties Ltd v Mustapha [1974] 1 W.L.R. 816 at 819.

<sup>26</sup> See above n.24 at p.578; cf. ibid. at 580 (“without logic”).

<sup>27</sup> The subsection is not needed where it is the vendor (i.e. the payee of the deposit) who is in breach: see above, p.1007 at n.13.

<sup>28</sup> See James Macara v Barclays Bank Ltd [1944] 2 All E.R. 31 at 32, affirmed [1945] K.B. 148. See also Michael Richards Properties Ltd v St. Saviour’s Parish [1975] 3 All E.R. 416 (where a contractual provision excluding the statutory power was relevant, though obviously not decisive); Cole v Rose [1978] 3 All E.R. 1121; and Windsor Securities Ltd v Loreldal Ltd, The Times, September 10, 1975 (where no attempt seems to have been made to invoke the power); Zieme v Gregory [1963] V.R. 214.

<sup>29</sup> It was thought that the subsection was intended to do no more than to reverse Re Scott & Alvarez’s Contract [1895] 2 Ch. 603 (so far as it related to irrecoverability of the deposit).

causing considerable hardship to the purchaser. A number of later cases therefore take the broader view that the subsection is “designed simply to do justice between vendor and purchaser”<sup>30</sup> and that the discretion conferred by it is to be exercised “where justice requires it”.<sup>31</sup> This rejection of the original, and unsatisfactory, restriction on the scope of the subsection is certainly to be welcomed; but unfortunately the cases give no clear indication of the circumstances in which the courts will exercise their discretion under the subsection.<sup>32</sup> That discretion is no longer needed where the deposit is penal in effect, now that the Workers Trust case has held such a deposit to be recoverable at common law. This development may have reduced the need to invoke the statutory discretion and may in part account for the recently expressed view that this discretion will be exercised in favour of a defaulting purchaser only in “exceptional circumstances”.<sup>33</sup> Just when circumstances are, for this purpose, exceptional remains obscure; but the requirement is evidently not satisfied merely by the fact that the deposit substantially exceeds the normal 10 per cent of the price<sup>34</sup> or by the fact that the vendor has not established that the breach has caused him any loss.<sup>35</sup>

(4) Forfeiture of instalments

A contract of sale may provide for payment of the price in instalments and add that, on default in payment of any one instalment, those already paid shall be forfeited. In such cases equity can sometimes grant certain kinds of relief against forfeiture to the purchaser if he is able and willing to perform after the agreed time,<sup>36</sup> particularly where enforcement of the forfeiture provision would cause him some prejudice (such as the loss of the value of improvements he had made to the land) beyond merely depriving him of the benefit of his bargain<sup>37</sup>; that is, it might be able to extend the time for payment,<sup>38</sup> or order repayment of the forfeited instalments if the purchaser was able and willing to perform, but the vendor was for some reason justified in refusing to accept late performance.<sup>39</sup>

It is more doubtful whether equity could order the repayment of forfeited instalments to a purchaser who was not able and willing to perform. In Mussen v Van Diemen's Land Co<sup>40</sup> land was sold for £321,000 payable in instalments and the contract provided that the vendor was to have the right to rescind, and to forfeit any money paid, in the event

<sup>30</sup> Universal Corp v Five Ways Properties Ltd [1979] 1 All E.R. 552, 555; Oakley [1980] C.L.J. 24.

<sup>31</sup> Schindler v Pigault (1975) 30 P. & C.R. 328 at 336; for other examples of the exercise of the discretion, see Maktoum v South Lodge Flats Ltd, The Times, April 21, 1980; Wilson v Kingsgate Mining Industries Ltd [1973] 2 N.S.W.L.R. 713; Yammouni v Conditorio [1975] V.R. 479.

<sup>32</sup> Contrast the authorities cited in n.31 above with Carne v De Bono [1988] 1 W.L.R. 1107, where no attempt was made to rely on the subsection; and Safehaven Investments Inc v Springbok Ltd (1996) 71 P. & C.R. 59, where “fairness between the parties” was held not to require an order for the return of the deposit, and it was said that relief under s.49(2) would not normally be given against the exercise of a contractually reserved right to forfeit the deposit.

<sup>33</sup> Omar v El-Wakil [2001] EWCA Civ 1090 at [37]; [2002] P. & C.R. 3.

<sup>34</sup> ibid., at [36]; the deposit was about 31% of the price, but it was not argued that it was penal: ibid., at [31]. Perhaps for this reason, no reference was made to the Workers Trust case [1993] A.C. 573, above, p.1008.

<sup>35</sup> ibid., at [37].

<sup>36</sup> See Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026, where the defendant failed to comply with this requirement; and Goker v NWS Bank plc [1990] C.C.L.R. 34, where relief was denied to a persistent defaulter.

<sup>37</sup> Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 520, above, p.781.

<sup>38</sup> Re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co (1873) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 1022 and Kilmer v BC Orchard Lands Ltd [1913] A.C. 319, as explained in Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] A.C. 514 at 521; Starside Properties Ltd v Mustapha [1974] 1 W.L.R. 816; cf. Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 (time for payment of deposit extended); Lang, 100 L.Q.R. 427. For other applications of, and restrictions on, the principle of relief against forfeiture, see above, pp.779–781.

<sup>39</sup> Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 A.C. 275, as explained in Mussen v Van Diemen's Land Co, [1938] Ch. 253; but see Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 Q.B. 476.

<sup>40</sup> See n.39 above.

of the purchaser's default. Such default occurred after the purchaser had paid £40,200.<sup>41</sup> His claim for the return of the money was rejected as it was not "unconscionable on the part of the vendor, who has contracted to part with his land on agreed terms, to enforce the contract . . .".<sup>42</sup> This case left open the possibility of ordering repayment when it was unconscionable for the vendor to keep the money. In Stockloser v Johnson<sup>43</sup> quarrying machinery was sold under a contract which provided for payment in instalments, and, in the event of the buyer's default, for forfeiture of instalments paid. The buyer failed to keep up the agreed payments and the actual decision was that he was not entitled to the return of the forfeited instalments as, in the circumstances, it was not unconscionable for the seller to keep them after rescinding the contract: the buyer had speculated on the success of the quarry, and lost. But Somervell and Denning L.J.J. said that repayment could have been ordered if the mere act of keeping the money had been unconscionable.<sup>44</sup> Romer L.J., on the other hand, said that repayment could be ordered only if the vendor was guilty of fraud, sharp practice or other unconscionable conduct; and that there was "nothing inequitable per se in a vendor, whose conduct is not open to criticism in other respects, insisting on his contractual right to retain instalments of purchase-money already paid".<sup>45</sup>

Later dicta, as well as a decision at first instance,<sup>46</sup> support Romer L.J.'s view, which is based on the principle that the law should not interfere with contracts freely made. But this principle is discarded in the law as to penalties, and in particular in the law relating to penal deposits. In the Workers Trust case<sup>47</sup> the Privy Council left open the question whether relief against forfeiture of instalments should be given to a purchaser who has been let into possession. This fact may, indeed, affect the amount of the vendor's loss; but subject to this practical consideration, it is submitted that, since forfeiture provisions often resemble penalties in their purpose and effect,<sup>48</sup> their validity should depend on the tests that differentiate penalties from liquidated damages clauses. The court should accordingly have power to grant relief where, on these tests, the forfeiture provision is penal in nature.<sup>49</sup> In the cases discussed above, such relief would take the form of ordering repayment of the forfeited instalments; but Jobson v Johnson<sup>50</sup> illustrates the possible availability of other forms of relief. In that case a contract for the sale of shares to be paid for by instalments provided that, if the buyer defaulted, he should retransfer the shares for £40,000. It was admitted that this clause was penal in

<sup>41</sup> Land equal in value to other payments had been conveyed to him.

<sup>42</sup> At 262.

<sup>43</sup> [1954] 1 Q.B. 476; Diamond, 19 M.L.R. 498; Price, 20 M.L.R. 620; cf. Hodkinson, 3 O.J.L.S. 393, discussing Legione v Hately (1983) 152 C.L.R. 406.

<sup>44</sup> [1954] Q.B. 476 at 483, 485, 489–490. According to Hyundai Shipbuilding and Heavy Industries Co Ltd v Pounararas [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 502 at 508 Somervell L.J.'s views are limited to cases of "default" (sc. by the buyer), while Denning L.J. went "somewhat further"; but exactly how much further is not made clear, nor is it apparent from the report in Stockloser's case.

<sup>45</sup> [1954] 1 Q.B. 476 at 501; cf. Kazakhstan Wool Processors (Europe) Ltd v Nederlandsche Credietverzekering Madishappig NV [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 708 at 720 (retention of premium on termination of policy for breach by insured).

<sup>46</sup> Galbraith v Mitchenall Estates Ltd [1965] 2 Q.B. 473, citing dicta from Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1961] 1 Q.B. 445 (reversed on other grounds [1962] A.C. 600); Else (1982) v Parkland Holdings [1994] B.C.L.C. 130.

<sup>47</sup> Workers Trust and Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] A.C. 573 at 581–582, discussing Stockloser v Johnson, above, n.43.

<sup>48</sup> Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026 at 1041.

<sup>49</sup> cf. Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 Q.B. 476 at 491; Law Commission Working Paper No.61, paras 65, 66. For a special statutory provision giving the court a discretion to order repayment, see Consumer Credit Act 1974, s.132(1); this would now apply on the facts of Galbraith's case, above, n.46 and would in a case of this kind displace the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999: above, p.226.

<sup>50</sup> [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026; Harpum [1989] C.I.J. 370.

effect<sup>51</sup>; and, on the buyer's default, it was held that the seller was entitled to an order for either the sale of the shares and the payment out of the proceeds of sale of the unpaid instalments, or the transfer of the shares so long as their value did not exceed the unpaid instalments by more than £40,000. This amounted to putting the seller into the same position as that in which he would have been if the penal element of the clause had been struck out: in this respect it resembled the legal consequence of a penalty clause in the normal sense of that expression.<sup>52</sup>

The foregoing discussion is concerned with contracts of sale, in which, as a result of the buyer's default, the contract is rescinded and the subject-matter remains the property of, or is restored to, the seller. The position is different where the contract is one for services to be rendered over a period of time in return for payments to be made at stated intervals. If the recipient of the services fails to keep up the payments and the contract is rescinded on that ground, he will not be able to recover back payments made before rescission, at least if they "represent the agreed rate of hire [for the services] and not a penny more".<sup>53</sup> In such a case the reasoning even of the majority in Stockloser v Johnson cannot apply as the payor will have received (and be unable to restore) pro rata what he bargained for in exchange for his payments. The position might be different if those payments contained a heavy element of "front loading".

(5) Failure to pay

The preceding discussion of deposits and part-payments deals with the situation in which a payment has been made and the contract is then broken by the payor. The main issue in such cases is whether the payor can get back the payment that he has made. But the breach may also consist in failing to make the payment; and if the injured party rescinds the contract on account of this breach,<sup>54</sup> the question arises whether the payment can be sued for by the prospective payee. The view that it can be sued for is supported by the principle that rescission does not retrospectively release the party in breach from accrued obligations<sup>55</sup>; and, after some conflict of judicial opinion, this view has prevailed where the money was to have been paid as a deposit<sup>56</sup> which, if it had been duly paid, could not have been claimed back by the payor.<sup>57</sup> But acceptance of the same view in the case of a part-payment might lead to the absurdity that the prospective payee could sue for the money because it was due before breach, while the payor could then sue for its return because a part-payment can be recovered back by the payor.<sup>58</sup> Hence in cases involving contracts for the sale of land the position is that a part-payment which was due but remained unpaid at the time of rescission cannot be sued for by the prospective payee.<sup>59</sup> It is submitted that the same reasoning should apply even to a claim for an unpaid deposit where the case is one of those exceptional ones in which the deposit would, if paid, have been recoverable by the payor, either at common law<sup>60</sup> or

<sup>51</sup> See above, p.1003.

<sup>52</sup> See above, p.1002.

<sup>53</sup> The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 703; cf. above, pp.1000–1001 and below, p.1012.

<sup>54</sup> See above, pp.762–763, 774.

<sup>55</sup> See above, p.849.

<sup>56</sup> Hinton v Sparkes (1868) L.R. 3 C.P. 161; Demar v Mintoft [1912] 2 K.B. 373; Millichamp v Jones [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1422 at 1428, 1430; Carter 99 L.Q.R. 503; The Blankenstein [1985] 1 W.L.R. 435 at 451, disapproving Lowe v Hope [1970] 1 Ch. 94, where the court may have been reluctant to enforce what it regarded as in substance a penalty. For a possible way of giving effect to that reluctance, see below, n.62.

<sup>57</sup> See above, p.1007.

<sup>58</sup> See above, p.1007, at n.20.

<sup>59</sup> McDonald v Denys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 C.L.R. 457, cited with approval in Johnson v Agnew [1980] A.C. 367 at 396 and in Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129 at 1141.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.1008.

under s.49(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925<sup>61</sup>; and that a claim by the prospective payee for the payment of such a deposit should therefore be rejected.<sup>62</sup>

In the cases just considered, the outcome can be justified on the ground that the seller will, as a result of rescission, keep or get back the land, which constituted the entire consideration for the promised part-payment. Hence if liability to make the payments is discharged, each party will be left in, or restored to, his pre-contract position (though the buyer will be liable in damages). This is also true where a part-payment is to be made in advance, for work to be done in the future, i.e. after the part-payment had become due. In Rover International Ltd v Cannon Films Ltd (No.3)<sup>63</sup> it was accordingly held that a payment in respect of services to be rendered in the future under an agreement for the distribution of films on television could not be sued for by the prospective payee, even though the payment had fallen due (but none of the services had been rendered) before rescission. But the position was different where part-payments under shipbuilding contracts became due from time to time (as the work progressed) and the builder rescinded for the other party's failure to make one of the payments when due.<sup>64</sup> It was held that the builder was entitled to sue for that part-payment since the consideration, for which the part-payment was to be made, was not merely the delivery of the finished product, but also the builder's work. So far as the work which he had done was concerned, he could not be restored to his pre-contract position: hence it was proper to uphold his claim for a part-payment due before rescission. For the same reason, instalments due under a hire-purchase agreement before rescission can be sued for after rescission<sup>65</sup>: their legal character is that of payment for the hire of the subject-matter, and the benefit of possession during each period for which such a payment was due is one that cannot be restored by the hirer to the owner. It is submitted that this reasoning should also apply where the part-payment has actually been made before rescission, and that, accordingly, the prima facie rule by which part-payments can be recovered back by the payor<sup>66</sup> should be restricted to cases in which, as a result of rescission, each party can be restored to his pre-contract position.

(6) Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999

Under these Regulations, certain standard terms in contracts between commercial sellers or suppliers and consumers do not bind the consumer if they are unfair.<sup>67</sup> An illustration given in the Regulations of a term which is prima facie unfair<sup>68</sup> is one "permitting the seller or supplier to retain sums paid by the consumer where the latter decides not to conclude or perform the contract, without providing for the consumer to receive compensation of an equivalent amount from the seller or supplier where the latter is the party cancelling the contract".<sup>69</sup> This illustration is based on the civil law

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.1008.

<sup>62</sup> In a case like Lowe v Hope, above, n.56, a court could justify its refusal to allow the prospective payee's claim on the ground that it would have ordered the return of the deposit (if paid) under s.49(2) of the 1925 Act.

<sup>63</sup> [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912; Beatson, 105 L.Q.R. 179; Andrews [1990] C.L.J. 15.

<sup>64</sup> Hyundai Shipbuilding and Heavy Industries Co Ltd v Pournaras [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 502; Hyundai Heavy Industries Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1129 (Lords Russell and Keith dubitante on this point); Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574. In the first two of these cases, as in McDonald v Denys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 C.L.R. 457, the action was against a guarantor, but the judgments fully discuss the principal debtor's liability.

<sup>65</sup> See above, p.851.

<sup>66</sup> See above, p.1007 at n.20.

<sup>67</sup> See above, pp.267 et seq.

<sup>68</sup> See above, p.274.

<sup>69</sup> SI 1999/2083, Sch.2, para.1(d).

institution (which has no counterparty in the common law) by which a contract can, in effect, be dissolved on forfeiture of a deposit or on the return by the payee of double the amount.<sup>70</sup> Thus forfeiture provisions of the kind discussed above do not correspond precisely with the illustration just quoted; but this fact would not prevent the court from holding that such a provision was unfair.<sup>71</sup> It seems to follow not only that the seller or supplier could not sue for the payment, but also that he would have to return the payment, if it had been made.<sup>72</sup> It is, however, an open question whether the Regulations apply to contracts for the sale of land,<sup>73</sup> and it is with such contracts that many of the English cases on deposits and part-payments are concerned. The Regulations also apply only to contract terms<sup>74</sup> and not to rights of forfeiture conferred by law. Once a payment is classified as a deposit, it can be forfeited even in the absence of a contract term to that effect; and in such a case there would appear to be no relevant contractual term<sup>75</sup> on which the Regulations can operate. The mere description of the payment as a “deposit” would not suffice for this purpose since the question whether a payment has the legal characteristics of a deposit or of a part-payment is one of substance; the use of a particular word or phrase is clearly not decisive.<sup>76</sup>

SECTION 2. ACTION FOR AN AGREED SUM

1. Distinguished from Damages

A contract commonly provides for the payment by one party of an agreed sum in exchange for some performance by the other. Goods are sold for a fixed price; work is done for an agreed remuneration, and so forth. An action for this price or other agreed remuneration is, in its nature, quite different from an action for damages.<sup>77</sup> It is a claim for the specific enforcement of the defendant's primary obligation to perform what he has promised<sup>78</sup>; though, as it is simply an action for money, it is not subject to those

<sup>70</sup> Treitel, Remedies for Breach of Contract, §182.

<sup>71</sup> The list of illustrations in Sch.3 is “non-exhaustive.” reg.5(5).

<sup>72</sup> Reg.8(1). merely makes the term “not binding on the consumer” but the word “retain” in Sch.2, para.1(d) suggests the availability to the consumer of a remedy for the recovery of the payment.

<sup>73</sup> See above, pp.278–279.

<sup>74</sup> See reg.4(1).

<sup>75</sup> See reg.5(1); cf. reg.8(1).

<sup>76</sup> If it were, the law as to part payments could be evaded by simply calling them deposits.

<sup>77</sup> cf. Re Park Air Services [1999] 1 All E.R. 673 at 682–683. The distinction is sometimes obscured by the fact that damages may be equal to the agreed sum, as in The Blankenstein [1985] 1 W.L.R. 435, above, p.852; and sometimes by the description of the claim as one for “damages equal to” the agreed sum, when it appears to be one for the agreed sum, e.g. in UCB Leasing Ltd v Holtom [1987] R.T.R. 362 at 366.

<sup>78</sup> See above, p.850. Where A (an insurer) promises B (the insured) to pay to B any damages for which B may become liable to C, B's claim against A for the amount of such damages has been described as being itself a claim for damages: see Chandris v Argo Insurance Co Ltd [1963] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 65, cf. The Fanti and Padre Island [1991] 2 A.C. 1, 35; Hong Kong Borneo Services Ltd v Pilcher [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 593 at 597; The Italia Express [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 281 at 285; The Kyriaki [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 137 at 150. In Phoenix General Insurance Co of Greece SA v Halvounon Insurance Co Ltd [1988] Q.B. 216 at 233 (reversed on other grounds ibid. at 248 et seq.) it was said to follow from this view that the action against the insurer was not one to enforce his primary obligation. But in the case put A's only promise is to repay B the damages for which B is liable to C; hence A's primary obligation is to make that payment; and an action to recover it, it is submitted, one for the specific enforcement of A's promise. It is an action for an agreed sum, in the sense of a sum determined by reference to the agreement, rather than one calculated by reference to the consequences of breach. cf. Jervis v Harris [1996] Ch. 195, where a lease provided that, on a tenant's breach of his covenant to repair, the landlord could himself execute the repairs and recover the costs of so doing from the tenant. It was held that the landlord's claim to recover these costs “sounds in debt, not damages” (at 202). The action was one for an agreed sum even though that sum was not ascertained when the contract was made: it was enough for it to be ascertained when payment became due. This reasoning is, with respect, preferable to that of the insurance cases discussed earlier in this note.

restrictions which equity imposes on the remedies of specific performance and injunction,<sup>79</sup> on the ground that it would be undesirable actually to force the defendant to perform certain acts (e.g. to render personal service) or that it would be difficult to secure compliance with the court's order. Obviously, these factors have no weight where the claim is simply one for a sum of money. Of the reasons given for refusing specific performance, only one calls for discussion in relation to an action for the agreed sum: this is the possibility that damages may be an "adequate" remedy.<sup>80</sup>

The action for the agreed sum differs from a claim for damages not only in its nature, but also in its practical effects. The claimant in an action for the agreed sum recovers that sum—neither more nor less; no questions of quantification or remoteness can arise.<sup>81</sup> It is irrelevant in an action for the price of goods to ask how much they are worth or how much they cost the seller. The argument that the claimant should have mitigated can, however, arise in an action for the agreed sum.<sup>82</sup> If successful, it will lead to the conclusion that the action is not available at all—not to recovery of a reduced price.

Where the agreed sum is not paid and the claimant also suffers additional loss, he may be entitled to bring both the action for the agreed sum and an action for damages.<sup>83</sup>

2. Availability of the Action

The availability of the action for an agreed sum depends on three factors.

(1) Duty to pay the price

Obviously an action for the agreed sum cannot be brought if the duty to pay it has not arisen. Whether it has arisen depends primarily on the terms of the contract. Suppose that a contract of employment provides that the employee is to be paid wages after working for a month and that he is wrongfully dismissed after a week. He cannot sue for his wages but only for damages for wrongful dismissal.<sup>84</sup> On the other hand, in Mount v Oldham Corp<sup>85</sup>, a local authority wrongfully withdrew boys from a school without giving the customary one term's notice. It was held that the headmaster was entitled to bring an action for the term's fees as it was an implied term of the contract that these should be paid in advance.

So far, we have assumed that the only breach is by the party who was to make the payment. There may also be a breach by the other party, e.g. where the employee commits a breach of duty or the seller appropriates defective goods to the contract. Such breaches may prevent the duty to pay from arising or discharge it: this topic is discussed in Chapter 18.<sup>86</sup>

(2) Rules of law

The action for the price is not available merely because the duty to pay the price has arisen. The contract specifies the duties of the parties, but the law determines their

<sup>79</sup> See below, pp.1026–1038, 1040–1046.

<sup>80</sup> See below, pp.1020–1026; Attica Sea Carriers Corp v Ferrostaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH (The Puerto Buitrago) [1976] Lloyd's Rep. 250.

<sup>81</sup> Jervis v Harris [1996] Ch.195 at 202.

<sup>82</sup> The relevance of mitigation in such an action was, indeed, denied in Jervis v Harris [1996] Ch.195 at 203, but without any reference to the issues (which did not arise in that case) discussed at pp.1017–1018, below.

<sup>83</sup> Overstone Ltd v Shipway [1962] 1 W.L.R. 117; cf. The Halcyon Skies [1977] Q.B. 857; Lawlor v Gray [1984] 3 All E.R. 345; and see above, pp.994–998.

<sup>84</sup> See above, pp.762, 845.

<sup>85</sup> [1973] Q.B. 309; cf. Denman v Winstanley (1887) 4 T.L.R. 127.

<sup>86</sup> See above, pp.759 et seq.

remedies. This is generally recognised when specific performance is sought,<sup>87</sup> and it is also true of the action for the agreed sum.

The distinction<sup>88</sup> appears clearly in the Sale of Goods Act 1979. The duty to pay the price arises when the seller is ready and willing to deliver the goods (unless, of course, the sale is on credit or stipulates for an advance payment<sup>89</sup>). But s.49 of the Act provides that the action for the price is available to the seller if either the property in the goods has passed to the buyer or the price is payable “on a day certain irrespective of delivery”. In Stein Forbes & Co Ltd v County Tailoring Co Ltd<sup>90</sup> a contract for the sale of sheepskins provided for payment in cash “against documents on arrival of steamer”. This provision did not name a “day certain”; and the buyer’s wrongful refusal to pay on tender of documents prevented the property in the goods from passing to him. It was held that the seller could not claim the price, but only damages. The effect (and probable purpose) of this restriction on the seller’s action for the price is to encourage him to dispose of the goods elsewhere and so to mitigate his loss.

The Stein Forbes case should be contrasted with Workman Clark & Co v Lloyd Brasileiro<sup>91</sup> where a contract for the construction and sale of a boat provided for payments in instalments, the first of which was to become due when the keel was laid; and property was not to pass until this payment had been made. After the keel had been laid, the builder successfully sued for the first instalment. The case is hard to reconcile with the wording of s.49; but it nevertheless accurately reflects the underlying policy. At the stage which the work had reached it must have been hard for the builder to mitigate his loss by finding another customer for a boat built to the defendant’s order—much harder, probably, than it was for the seller in the Stein Forbes case to resell the sheepskins.

(3) Conduct of the injured party

On wrongful repudiation of a contract, the injured party has a choice: he can either “terminate” the contract or keep it alive.

(a) ELECTS TO TERMINATE. If the injured party elects to terminate, he cannot sue for any sum which, under the contract, was to accrue to him only after the date of termination.<sup>92</sup> He can claim damages for wrongful repudiation, and in assessing these the court may take into account any sums which he should have received under the broken contract. For example, if a hire-purchase agreement is wrongfully repudiated by the hirer and terminated by the owner, the owner cannot sue for instalments which were to accrue after the date of termination. But his damages may be based on the difference between the amount which the repudiating hirer was to have paid and the benefits obtained by the owner as a result of termination, e.g. in regaining possession of the goods.<sup>93</sup>

(b) ELECTS TO KEEP THE CONTRACT ALIVE. Where the injured party elects to keep the contract alive, he can bring the action for the agreed sum if, at the time of

<sup>87</sup> See below, p.1026.

<sup>88</sup> The distinction drawn in the text is sometimes overlooked: e.g. in Huyton S.A v Peter Cremer GmbH [1999] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 620 at 630 and 642.

<sup>89</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.27, 28.

<sup>90</sup> (1916) 115 L.T. 215; cf. Tradax Internacional SA v Goldschmidt SA [1977] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 604; Regent OHG Aisenstadt und Barig v Francesco di Jermyn Street [1981] 3 All E.R. 327.

<sup>91</sup> [1908] 1 K.B. 968; this report differs in some significant respects from those in 77 L.J.K.B. 953; 99 L.T. 481; and 11 Asp.M.L.C. 126.

<sup>92</sup> See above, pp.849–850.

<sup>93</sup> See above, p.851.

repudiation, he has already done all that is required to make the action available: for example, if he is a seller of goods and has already transferred the property in them to the buyer.<sup>94</sup>

If at the time of repudiation the injured party has not yet done all that is required to make the action available, there are some cases in which he cannot bring the action for the agreed sum. This is the position where it is impossible for him to do the required acts without the co-operation of the guilty party, who refuses to give it. For example, if a singer wrongfully repudiates his contract with his agent, the latter cannot continue performance without the co-operation of the former; and the agent's only claim is for damages<sup>95</sup>; and where work is to be done by A on the land or goods of B, who wrongfully refuses to allow A to have access to or possession of the property then, A cannot do the work without some co-operation from B and so his only remedy is an action for damages.<sup>96</sup> A could only do the work without B's co-operation if he already had possession of the goods or if he could get them without B's co-operation (e.g. from a warehouseman who had been effectively directed to deliver them to A).<sup>97</sup>

It is disputed whether the action for the agreed sum is available to the injured party where, at the time of repudiation, that party has not yet done all that was required of him to make the action available, but where he can, and does, continue performance without the co-operation of the other party. In White & Carter (Councils) Ltd v McGregor<sup>98</sup> the appellants agreed to advertise the respondents' garage business for three years on plates attached to litterbins. Payment was to be at the rate of 2s. per week per plate, plus 5s. per annum towards the cost of each plate. The respondents repudiated the contract on the very day on which it was made but the appellants nevertheless prepared the plates, displayed them, and claimed the full amount due under the contract: £187 4s. for the space and £9 in respect of the plates. A majority of the House of Lords upheld the claim. The main reason given was that repudiation did not, of itself, bring a contract to an end. It only gave the injured party an option to determine the contract; and if he chose instead to affirm, the contract remained "in full effect".<sup>99</sup> But this reasoning does not, of itself, lead to any conclusion as to the particular remedy available to the injured party. This appears from the cases in which the injured party cannot perform without the co-operation of the other party. Even here, repudiation does not of itself bring the contract to an end<sup>1</sup>; but the injured party's only remedy is an action for damages.<sup>2</sup>

That is not, however, to deny the validity of the principle of McGregor's case in appropriate circumstances. The problem in cases of this kind is whether an award of the agreed sum is, on the one hand, necessary to protect the injured party, and, on the other, likely to cause undue hardship to the party in breach. In some cases it may make no difference to the injured party whether he (1) incurs the expense of performance and recovers the agreed sum, or (2) saves that expense by not performing and recovers the

<sup>94</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.49(1); in Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App.Cas. 251 (where there was no discussion as to the remedy) property had apparently passed to the buyer, so that the action for the price would now be available under s.49(1).

<sup>95</sup> Denmark Productions Ltd v Boscobel Productions Ltd [1969] 1 Q.B. 699; cf. Roberts v Ellwells Engineering Ltd [1972] Q.B. 586; above, p.749.

<sup>96</sup> Hounslow (London Borough) v. Twickenham Garden & Builders Ltd [1971] Ch. 233 at 252-254; cf. Finelli v Dee (1968) 67 D.L.R. (2d) 393; Altica Sea Carriers Corp v Ferrostaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250 at 256.

<sup>97</sup> e.g. George Barker Transport Ltd v Eynon [1974] 1 W.L.R. 462 at 468.

<sup>98</sup> [1962] A.C. 413; Goodhart, 78 L.Q.R. 263; Nienaber [1962] C.L.J. 213.

<sup>99</sup> [1962] A.C. 413 at 427.

<sup>1</sup> See above, p.844.

<sup>2</sup> See the authorities cited in n.95, above; cf. The Alaskan Trader [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 645 at 651 (quoted above, p.846).

difference between it and the agreed sum by way of damages. If this is the position, damages are a perfectly adequate remedy. But there are other situations in which the injured party would be prejudiced by discontinuing performance and claiming damages: e.g. where this leads to injury to his reputation, for which damages (so far as recoverable at all)<sup>3</sup> could not be accurately assessed; where the injured party has entered into commitments with third parties which he must honour as a matter of business<sup>4</sup>; or where part of the loss which the injured party would actually suffer is legally irrecoverable because it is too remote.<sup>5</sup> It is only in cases of this kind that the rule in McGregor's case will be applied, for Lord Reid there said that, if the injured party has "no substantial or legitimate interest"<sup>6</sup> in completing performance, his only remedy will be in damages. "Legitimate interest" here means that "the innocent party must have reasonable grounds for keeping the contract open, bearing in mind also the interests of the wrongdoer",<sup>7</sup> and if these conditions are satisfied, it is hard to see why the injured party should not be entitled to complete his performance and claim the agreed sum. Three contrary arguments must, however, be considered.

(i) Mitigation. The first, and most important, argument is that the injured party should mitigate his loss. It has been said, in reply, that mitigation is relevant only to a claim for damages and not to a claim for an agreed sum<sup>8</sup>; and in many cases this is no doubt true. A seller of goods who claims damages for non-acceptance may be under a duty to mitigate by reselling the goods; but once he has acquired the right to sue for the price<sup>9</sup> there seems, in English law,<sup>10</sup> to be no suggestion that he must mitigate even though he can easily resell and even though he is in a much better position than the buyer to do so. But even if this rule always<sup>11</sup> applies in cases involving sale of goods, it does not follow that it must necessarily apply to cases involving other kinds of contracts. In particular, it is submitted that the policy of the mitigation rules (which is to prevent needless waste) should make those rules applicable, even in an action for the agreed sum, where at the time of repudiation the claimant has not yet done all that is required of him to make that action available. This submission is supported by the Attica Sea Carriers<sup>12</sup> case, where a demise charterparty imposed continuing obligations on both parties. The charterer undertook to execute certain repairs before redelivery of the ship and to pay

<sup>3</sup> See above, pp.991-992, cf. The Odenfeld [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357 (damages very hard to assess).

<sup>4</sup> See Anglo-African Shipping Co of New York Inc v Mortner [1962] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 81 at 94; affirmed on other grounds, ibid. 610; The Odenfeld [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357; below, p.1018.

<sup>5</sup> See above, pp.965-974.

<sup>6</sup> [1962] A.C. 413 at 431; The Alaskan Trader [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. at 651; the legitimate "interest" may be in acquiring a security in the subject-matter: George Barker Transport Ltd v Eynon [1974] 1 W.L.R. 462. The requirement of "legitimate interest" brings the English rule close to the American rule, with which it is said to conflict: under Restatement, Contracts s.338, Comment c: the innocent party must not "unreasonably" continue performance after breach; cf. Restatement 2d, Contracts §350 Comment b.

<sup>7</sup> Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 132 at 139; reversed on another ground: [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574.

<sup>8</sup> Scott [1962] C.L.J. 12.

<sup>9</sup> See above, p.1014.

<sup>10</sup> Contrast U.C.C. s.2-709(1)(b), by which the seller can sue for the price of goods identified to the contract only if he is "unable after reasonable effort to resell them at a reasonable price," or the circumstances indicate that such an effort would be unavailing.

<sup>11</sup> If the seller is "bound to do something to [specific] goods for the purpose of putting them into a deliverable state, the property does not pass until the thing is done and the buyer has notice that it has been done": Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.18, r.2. Thus before the seller does the required act the action for the price is not generally available: s.49(1). It is sometimes assumed that, if the buyer repudiates at this stage, the seller can nevertheless do the act and sue for the price, but there is no actual decision to this effect.

<sup>12</sup> [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 250; Kerr, 41 M.L.R. 1, 20-21; cf. The Alaskan Trader [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 645 where a shipowner had no legitimate interest in spending more money than the ship was worth on repairing her so as to keep her available for service; Carter and Marston [1985] C.L.J. 18.

the agreed hire till then; and for the present purpose it was assumed<sup>13</sup> that the contract did not require the owner to accept redelivery until the repairs had been done. On the charterer's refusal to do the repairs, it was nevertheless held that the owner's remedy was not an action for the agreed hire. As the cost of the repairs far exceeded the value of the ship when repaired,<sup>14</sup> the owner had no "legitimate interest" in insisting on continued performance. Hence the mitigation rules required him to accept redelivery of the unrepaired ship and to seek his remedy in damages.

It does not follow that, in cases of this kind, the mitigation rules will always require the injured party to take such a course, since they require him only to act reasonably.<sup>15</sup> In The Odenfeld<sup>16</sup> a time charterer wrongfully repudiated the charterparty by refusing to pay the agreed hire. It was held that the shipowners were not bound at once to accept the repudiation and seek their remedy in damages, but that they could sue for the agreed hire until they finally did accept the repudiation. They had acted reasonably in requiring continued performance since the ship remained available for service,<sup>17</sup> and since they had entered into an obligation to third parties (to whom they had assigned hire due under the charterparty) to keep the contract in existence.

The argument that the appellants should have mitigated by discontinuing performance was no doubt open to the respondents in McGregor's case; but it is submitted that the result in that case was consistent with the mitigation rules. There are, as will be recollected,<sup>18</sup> two such rules. The first is that the appellants should have minimised loss by reletting the advertising space. But the burden of proving that they could indeed have done this was on the respondents<sup>19</sup> and does not seem to have been discharged.<sup>20</sup> The argument required proof that the demand for space exceeded the appellants' available supply<sup>21</sup> and no evidence seems to have been directed to this issue. The second rule is that the appellants should not have augmented loss by spending money on the preparation of the plates. This has to be considered on the assumption that the space could not have been relet, or that it was doubtful whether it could have been relet. As a matter of strict law, the appellants could (on this assumption) have abandoned the contract and recovered the difference between the agreed rental and any expenses thus saved by way of damages.<sup>22</sup> Hence it could be said that the expense of preparing the plates should not have been incurred as it did not benefit anyone. But the mitigation rules do not require the injured party to act in accordance with the strict law. They only require him to act reasonably<sup>23</sup>; and if there was no possibility of reletting the space, or only a doubtful one,

<sup>13</sup> The assumption was in fact regarded as ill-founded: above, p.795.

<sup>14</sup> cf. above, pp.945-946, 978.

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.978.

<sup>16</sup> [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 357.

<sup>17</sup> ibid. at 374; the owners could perform without the charterer's co-operation by simply (in the absence of orders) laying up the ship; contrast, on this point, The Alaskan Trader [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 645 at 652.

<sup>18</sup> See above, pp.977-979.

<sup>19</sup> Roper v Johnson (1873) L.R. 8 C.P. 187 above, p.963 n.50; Regent OHG Aisenstadt und Barig v Francesco of Jermyn Street [1981] 3 All E.R. 327 at 332; The Kriti Rex [1996] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 171 at 199 (in these cases, the claims were for damages, but there is no reason to suppose that a different rule as to burden of proof would apply in an action for the agreed sum); and see Standard Chartered Bank v Pakistan National Shipping Co (No.3) [2001] EWCA Civ 55; [2001] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 822, at [58] (where the claim was in deceit).

<sup>20</sup> Lord Morton [1962] A.C. 413 at 432, says that the appellants "made no effort" to relet the space. But there is nothing to show whether efforts to relet would have succeeded; cf. Roger, 93 L.Q.R. 168.

<sup>21</sup> Unless this were so, the appellants would be under no duty to relet the space originally let to the respondents: they would be entitled to let other space to other customers, cf. above, pp.954-955, 977-978.

<sup>22</sup> cf. British and Beningtons Ltd v NW Cachar Tea Co Ltd [1923] A.C. 48; above, p.922.

<sup>23</sup> See above, p.978.

it seems that the appellants did act reasonably in incurring the expense necessary to substantiate their claim for the agreed sum.

(ii) Indirect specific performance. The second argument against McGregor's case is that the award of the agreed sum amounted to indirect specific performance<sup>24</sup> of a contract which was not specifically enforceable; but, even if this argument is doctrinally sound, it does not seem that any of the reasons for refusing direct specific performance of such a contract applied in the circumstances of the case. Possible reasons for such refusal are that enforcement of the decree would require "constant supervision"; that there was no "mutuality"; and that the contract involved "personal" service.<sup>25</sup> But the first two reasons do not apply where the contract has been fully performed by one party and the only outstanding liability of the other is to pay cash.<sup>26</sup> Nor does the third reason seem to apply (even if one makes the doubtful assumption that the services were "personal") where one party has been able to perform without any co-operation from the other.<sup>27</sup>

(iii) Hardship. A third argument against McGregor's case is that it is hard on the party in breach to have to pay for a performance which he does not want. But the injured party will not be entitled to the agreed sum if he has no "substantial or legitimate interest"<sup>28</sup> in completing performance; and even if he has such an interest, his action for the agreed sum may still fail if he ought to have mitigated by discontinuing performance. When these qualifications are borne in mind, it is submitted that the rule in McGregor's case represents a reasonable compromise between the interests of the two contracting parties.

SECTION 3. SPECIFIC RELIEF IN EQUITY<sup>29</sup>

1. Specific Performance<sup>30</sup>

The common law did not specifically enforce contractual obligations except those to pay money. Specific enforcement of other contractual obligations was available only in equity. It was (and is) subject to many restrictions. These are based partly on the drastic character of the remedy,<sup>31</sup> which leads (more readily than an award of damages or of the agreed sum) to attachment of the defendant's person.<sup>32</sup> But this is an important factor only where the contract calls for "personal" performance, i.e. for acts to be done by the defendant himself.<sup>33</sup> Where the contract is not of this kind, it can be specifically enforced without personal constraint: for example, by sequestration,<sup>34</sup> or by the execution of a formal document by an officer of the court.<sup>35</sup> Other reasons for restricting specific

<sup>24</sup> [1962] A.C. 413 at 433.

<sup>25</sup> See below, pp.1029–1034, 1037–1038.

<sup>26</sup> See below, pp.1032, 1037–1038. The contract in McGregor's case was to display the advertisements for three years from November 1957 and the action was commenced in October 1958, the claim being brought under an acceleration clause (above, pp.1000–1001). In view of this clause nothing turned on the fact that performance had not been completed when the action was brought: see [1962] A.C. 413 at 426–427.

<sup>27</sup> [1962] A.C. 413 at 429.

<sup>28</sup> ibid. at 431.

<sup>29</sup> Spry, Equitable Remedies (4th ed.); Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance.

<sup>30</sup> Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.); Jones and Goodhart, Specific Performance.

<sup>31</sup> cf. Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] A.C. 1 at 12.

<sup>32</sup> cf. Enfield LBC v Mahoney [1983] 1 W.L.R. 749, where even imprisonment failed to induce compliance with an order for specific restitution. Imprisonment for debt has been abolished (subject to exceptions not here relevant) by Debtors Act 1869, ss.4, 5, and Administration of Justice Act 1970, s.11. "Lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court" is permitted by Human Rights Act 1998 Sch.1, Pt I, Art.5(1)(b).

<sup>33</sup> Corbin, Contracts, s.1138.

<sup>34</sup> Miliangos v George Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1976] A.C. 443 at 494, 497.

<sup>35</sup> The Messianiki Tolmi [1983] 2 A.C. 787.

enforcement are that this form of relief may be unnecessary, undesirable or impracticable on various grounds to be considered in the discussion that follows. In a number of later authorities, some of these reasons are no longer regarded as entirely convincing,<sup>36</sup> so that these cases support some expansion in the scope of the remedy.<sup>37</sup> The most recent decision of the House of Lords<sup>38</sup> on the point may, however, foreshadow some degree of return to a more restrictive view, though with modern justifications.

(1) Granted where damages not "adequate"

The traditional view is that specific performance will not be ordered where damages are an "adequate" remedy.<sup>39</sup> After illustrating this requirement, we shall see that it now requires some reformulation.

(a) AVAILABILITY OF SATISFACTORY EQUIVALENT. Damages are most obviously an adequate remedy where the claimant can get a satisfactory equivalent of what he contracted for from some other source. For this reason specific performance is not generally ordered of contracts for the sale of commodities, or of shares, which are readily available in the market.<sup>40</sup> In such cases the claimant can buy in the market and is adequately compensated by recovering the difference between the contract and the market price by way of damages. Indeed, he is required to make the substitute purchase in order to mitigate his loss.<sup>41</sup> If he fails to do so, he cannot recover damages for extra loss suffered because the market has risen after the date when the substitute contract should have been made. To award him specific performance in such a case would, in substance, conflict with the principles of mitigation<sup>42</sup> as well as being oppressive to the defendant.<sup>43</sup> Similar reasoning seems to underlie the rule that a contract to lend money cannot be specifically enforced by either party<sup>44</sup>: it is assumed that damages can easily be assessed by reference to current rates of interest.

Damages will, on the other hand, not be regarded as an adequate remedy where the claimant cannot obtain a satisfactory substitute. The law takes the view that a buyer of

<sup>36</sup> e.g. below, pp.1026, 1029–1033.

<sup>37</sup> A trend forecast by Lord Justice Fry in his work on Specific Performance: see (6th ed.), p.21; cf. Burrows, 4 Legal Studies 102.

<sup>38</sup> Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores Ltd [1998] A.C. 1; below, pp.1033–1034.

<sup>39</sup> Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] A.C. 1 at 11; Bankers Trust Co v PT Jakarta International Hotels & Development [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 910 at 911.

<sup>40</sup> Cud v Rutter (1719) 1 P.Wms. 570; Re Schmabacher (1908) 98 L.T. 127 at 128; cf. Fothergill v Rowland (1873) 1 L.R. 17 Eq. 137; Garden Cottage Foods Ltd v Milk Marketing Board [1984] A.C. 130; aliter if the shares are not readily available: Duncuft v Albrecht (1841) 12 Sim. 189; Langen & Wind Ltd v Bell [1972] Ch. 685; Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1026; Grant v Gignan [1996] 2 B.C.L.C. 24; or if the contract is for the sale of shares giving a controlling interest in the company: Harvela Investments Ltd v Royal Trust C of Canada (CI) Ltd [1986] A.C. 207.

<sup>41</sup> See above, p.977.

<sup>42</sup> See Buxton v Lister (1746) 3 Atk. 383 at 384.

<sup>43</sup> See Re Schmabacher (1908) 98 L.T. 127, where shares rose in value after breach. In such a case the defendant could be given the option of transferring the shares or paying the difference between contract and market price on the day fixed for performance, as in Colt v Nettervill (1725) 2 P.Wms. 301. See also Whiteley Ltd v Hilt [1918] 2 K.B. 808; MEPC v Christian Edwards [1978] Ch. 281 at 293 (affirmed on other grounds [1981] A.C. 205); Chinn v Hochstrasser [1979] Ch. 447 (reversed on other grounds [1981] A.C. 533).

<sup>44</sup> Rogers v Challis (1859) 27 Beav. 175 (suit by lender); Sichel v Mosenthal (1862) 30 Beav. 371 (suit by borrower: decision based on lack of mutuality (below, p.1037) rather than adequacy of damages); cf. Larios v Bonmany y Gurety (1873) 1 L.R. 5 C.P. 346. By statute the court can specifically enforce a contract to take debentures in a company, that is, to make a secured loan to the company: Companies Act 1985, s.195 reversing South African Territories Ltd v Wallington [1898] A.C. 109. A contract to subscribe for shares in a company is also specifically enforceable: Odessa Tramways Co v Mendel (1878) 8 Ch.D. 235; Sri Lanka Omnibus Co v Perera [1952] A.C. 76.

land or of a house<sup>45</sup> (however ordinary) is not adequately compensated by damages, and that he can therefore get an order of specific performance.<sup>46</sup> Even a contractual licence to occupy land, though creating no interest in the land,<sup>47</sup> may be specifically enforced.<sup>48</sup> A vendor of land, too, can get specific performance, though his only claim is for money.<sup>49</sup> One reason for this rule is that it is just to allow the remedy to him as it is available against him. Another is that damages will not adequately compensate him for not getting the whole price, as he may not easily be able to find another purchaser.<sup>50</sup> And he may be anxious to rid himself of burdens attached to the land.<sup>51</sup> But the rule seems to apply though the land is readily saleable to a third party; and it has even been applied where after contract but before completion a compulsory purchase order was made in respect of the land.<sup>52</sup> Yet in such a case damages (consisting of the amount by which the contract price exceeded the compensation payable on compulsory acquisition) would normally be an adequate remedy.

(b) DAMAGES HARD TO QUANTIFY. A second factor which is relevant (though not decisive<sup>53</sup>) in considering the adequacy of damages is the difficulty of assessing and recovering them. This is one reason why specific performance has been ordered of contracts to sell (or to pay) annuities,<sup>54</sup> and of a sale of debts proved in bankruptcy,<sup>55</sup> the value of such rights being uncertain. Similarly, a contract to execute a mortgage in consideration of money lent at, or before, the time of the contract can be specifically enforced,<sup>56</sup> since the value of obtaining security for a debt cannot be precisely quantified. The same is true of the right to have a loan repaid out of specific property; and a term in a contract of loan conferring such a right is therefore specifically enforceable.<sup>57</sup> Even

<sup>45</sup> Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.), §62. Damages are, however, an adequate remedy for breach of a "lock-out" agreement relating to land (above, p.54) since such an agreement is intended merely to protect the prospective purchaser from wasting costs and does not give him any right to insist on conveyance of the land: Tye v House [1997] 2 E.G.L.R. 171.

<sup>46</sup> Unless he elects to claim damages, as in Meng Leong Developments Pte Ltd v Jip Hong Trading Co Pte Ltd [1985] A.C. 511.

<sup>47</sup> See Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1989] Ch. 1, overruled on another point in Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v London Residuary Body [1992] 2 A.C. 386.

<sup>48</sup> Verrall v Great Yarmouth BC [1981] Q.B. 202. cf. Dutton v Manchester Airport plc [1999] 2 All E.R. 675, where the licensee's claim was not against the licensor but against a trespasser.

<sup>49</sup> e.g. Walker v Eastern Counties Ry (1848) 6 Hare 594; Miliangos v George Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1976] A.C. 443 at 496; cf. Amec Properties v Planning & Research Systems [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 70. Where the purchaser has been allowed to go into possession and has then failed to complete, and the vendor has not elected between rescission and specific performance, the court may (unless the contract otherwise provides) order the purchaser either to perform or to vacate the premises: see Greenwood v Turner [1891] 2 Ch. 144; Maskell v Ivory [1970] Ch. 502; Attfield v Df Plant Hire & General Contractors [1987] Ch. 141.

<sup>50</sup> Lewis v Lord Lechmere (1722) 10 Mod. 503.

<sup>51</sup> Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.), §72.

<sup>52</sup> Hillingdon Estate Co v Stonefield Estates Ltd [1952] Ch. 627. The contract is not frustrated by the making of the order: above, p.896; but after title to the land has vested in the acquiring authority by virtue of the compulsory purchase, the vendor's remedy is in damages and not by way of specific performance: E. Johnson & Co (Barbados) v NSR Ltd [1997] A.C. 400.

<sup>53</sup> Soc des Industries Metallurgiques SA v Bronx Engineering Co Ltd [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 465.

<sup>54</sup> Ball v Cogg (1710) 1 Bro. P.C. 140; Kenney v Wexham (1822) 6 Madd. 355; Adderley v Dixon (1824) 1 C. & S. 607 at 611; Clifford v Turrell (1841) 1 Y. & C.C.C. 138; Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58; see however Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.), pp.30, 111, 112; Crampton v Varna Ry (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 562.

<sup>55</sup> Adderley v Dixon (1824) 1 C. & S. 607.

<sup>56</sup> Ashton v Corrigan (1871) L.R. 13 Eq. 76; Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1982] A.C. 584 at 595, affirmed ibid. at 610.

<sup>57</sup> Swiss Bank Corp v Lloyds Bank Ltd [1979] Ch. 548, reversed [1982] A.C. 584, but on the ground that the contract did not on its true construction contain any such term. cf. Kingscroft Insurance Co Ltd v HS Weaver (Underwriting) Agencies Ltd [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 187 at 193; Napier and Ettrick v Hunter [1993] 1 A.C. 713 at 952.

where there is no such difficulty in quantifying the loss, damages may be an inadequate remedy because the claimant's loss is difficult to prove,<sup>58</sup> or because certain items of loss<sup>59</sup> may not be legally recoverable, or quite simply because the defendant may not be "good for the money".<sup>60</sup>

(c) DAMAGES NOMINAL. In Beswick v Beswick<sup>61</sup> specific performance was ordered of a contract to pay an annuity to a third party. A majority<sup>62</sup> of the House of Lords took the view that damages were an inadequate remedy because they would be purely nominal, the promisee or his estate having suffered no loss. The point here seems to be, not that the promisee would be inadequately compensated, but that the defendant would be unjustly enriched (if damages were the sole remedy) by being allowed to retain the entire benefit of the promisee's performance while performing only a small part of his own promise.

(d) SALE OF GOODS. S.52 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 gives the court a discretion to order specific performance in an action for breach of a contract to deliver "specific or ascertained" goods.<sup>63</sup> Although the section deals only with cases in which this remedy is sought by the buyer, the court also has power to order specific performance at the suit of the seller.<sup>64</sup>

Section 52 is based on an earlier enactment, which had been passed to broaden the scope of the remedy.<sup>65</sup> This seemed to have been restricted to cases in which the buyer could not get a satisfactory substitute because the goods were "unique". Heirlooms, great works of art and rare antiques are regarded as "unique" for this purpose<sup>66</sup>; and it seems that the courts go some way towards recognising a concept of "commercial uniqueness". Thus they may order specific performance of a contract to supply a ship,<sup>67</sup>

<sup>58</sup> Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361; Hollis v Stocks [2000] UKCLR 685.

<sup>59</sup> Hill v C.A. Parsons Ltd [1972] 1 Ch. 305; Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 W.L.R. 349 (injury to employment prospects and reputation; formerly, but no longer, regarded as irrecoverable: see above, p.991).

<sup>60</sup> Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA, above, at 380; cf. The Oakworth [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 531 at 583; The Oro Chef [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 509 at 521; Lawrence David Ltd v Ashton [1989] I.C.R. 123 at 134; Themehelp Ltd v West [1996] Q.B. 84, below, p.1041; Kall-Kwik Printing (UK) v Bell [1994] F.S.R. 674.

<sup>61</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; above, p.589, below, pp.1038–1039. For the effects on such facts of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, see also above, p.654.

<sup>62</sup> For Lord Pearce's view, see below, p.1039, n.56.

<sup>63</sup> "Specific" primarily means "identified and agreed on at the time a contract of sale is made": s.61(1); for an extension of the definition, see below, p.1024 at n.78. "Ascertained" is not defined in the Act but seems to mean "identified in accordance with the agreement after the time a contract of sale is made": Re Wait [1927] 1 Ch. 606 at 630; or identified in any other way: Thames Sack & Bag Co Ltd v Knowles (1918) 88 L.J.K.B. 585 at 588.

<sup>64</sup> The Messiniaki Tolmi [1982] Q.B. 1248, affirmed without reference to this point [1983] 2 A.C. 787 (sale of ship). For earlier authorities on the availability of the remedy to the seller, contrast Shell-Mex Ltd v Elton Copy Dyeing Co (1928) 34 Com Cas. 39 at 47 with Elliott v Pierson [1948] 1 All E.R. 939 at 943. The practical effect of ordering specific performance at the suit of the seller is to enable him to get an order for the payment of the price in a case falling outside Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.49 (above, p.1015).

<sup>65</sup> s.2 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act 1856; Treitel [1966] J.B.L. 211.

<sup>66</sup> Pusey v Pusey (1684) 1 Vern. 273; Somerset v Cookson (1735) 3 P.Wms. 390; Lowther v Lowther (1806) 3 Ves. 95; Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew. 651 at 658.

<sup>67</sup> Which "in some respects the law of contract . . . treats as if she were a piece of realty:" The Laconia [1977] A.C. 850 at 874.

or machinery or other industrial plant which cannot readily be obtained elsewhere.<sup>68</sup> Another special factor which may induce the court to order specific performance of a contract for the sale of goods is that the goods form the contents of a house which is being sold by the same seller to the same buyer, either by the same contract or by a separate contemporaneous one.<sup>69</sup> The court is particularly ready to order specific performance in such a case if removal of the goods would damage the land, but the remedy is not limited to such circumstances.<sup>70</sup>

S.52 does not restrict the discretion to order specific performance to cases in which the goods are "unique"; but the courts nevertheless at one time took the view that the discretion should be sparingly exercised.<sup>71</sup> One reason for this view is that the specific enforceability of a contract for the sale of goods might give the buyer an equitable interest in the goods<sup>72</sup>; and this could adversely affect third parties who had only constructive (but no actual) notice of that interest: e.g. it could give the buyer priority over not only unsecured but also secured creditors if he had paid for the goods and the seller had then become insolvent.<sup>73</sup> But a restrictive view of the scope of specific performance has been taken even where this factor of insolvency was not present. For example, in Cohen v Roche<sup>74</sup> the court refused specific performance to a buyer of a set of Hepplewhite chairs, saying they were "ordinary articles of commerce and of no special value or interest".<sup>75</sup> It is hard to see what legitimate interest of the seller was protected by the court's refusal to grant specific performance in this case; nor is the notion that damages are necessarily an adequate remedy for breach of a contract to sell goods unless they are "unique" an easy one to defend. The buyer may not in fact be able to get a substitute; his loss may be hard to assess; and part of it may be irrecoverable (e.g. because it is too remote).

S.52 refers only to goods which are "specific or ascertained".<sup>76</sup> The section therefore does not apply where the goods are purely generic (e.g. where the sale is of "1,000 tons

<sup>68</sup> See Nutbrown v Thornton (1804) 10 Ves. 159; North v G/N Ry (1860) 2 Giff. 64; Behnke v Bede Shipping Co [1927] 1 K.B. 649; The Oro Chef [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 509 at 520–521; The Star Gazer [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 370; Bathyan v Bouch (1881) 50 L.J.Q.B. 421; cf. Lingen v Simpson (1824) 1 S. & S. 600 (pattern books). Contrast Soc des Industries Metallurgiques S.A v Bronx Engineering Co Ltd [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 465 (machinery available from another source); The Stena Nautica (No.2) [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 336; Gyllenhammar Partners International v Sour Brodogradevna [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 403 at 422.

<sup>69</sup> Record v Bell [1991] 1 W.L.R. 853 at 862.

<sup>70</sup> ibid.

<sup>71</sup> A little-noticed exception is Rawlings v General Trading Co [1921] 1 K.B. 635, where specific performance was granted without argument as to the remedy.

<sup>72</sup> For the view that specific enforceability does not necessarily give rise to an equitable interest, see Tailly v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App. Cas. 523 at 548; Re London Wine Co (Shippers) [1986] P.C.C. 121 at 149. cf. also Leigh & Sullivan Ltd v Aliakmon Shipping Co (The Aliakmon) [1986] A.C. 785, where it was said at 812–813 that equitable "ownership" or "title" did not pass under a contract for the sale of unascertained goods on "appropriation" of particular goods to the contract; but damages for breach of the contract would clearly have been an adequate remedy (above, p.1020) so that the question whether an equitable interest in goods can pass under a specifically enforceable contract for the sale of goods remains an open one.

<sup>73</sup> It was the fear of giving the buyer priority over secured creditors that was the main reason why specific performance was refused in Re Wait [1927] 1 Ch. 606: see esp. at 640. The buyer's problems in that case arose from the general rule, laid down by Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.16, that property under a contract of sale cannot pass in goods which are unascertained: see Re Goldcorp Exchange Ltd [1995] 1 A.C. 74; contrast Re Stapylton Fletcher [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1181, where the goods were segregated from the seller's own stock after sale. The buyer's interests are now in turn protected by a statutory exception to the general rule in s.16: see s.20A, discussed after n.80, below. Insolvency of the defendant is not a ground for refusing specific performance where the remedy is normally available as a matter of course: Amec Properties v Planning Research and Systems [1992] 1 E.G.L.R. 70.

<sup>74</sup> [1927] 1 K.B. 169.

<sup>75</sup> ibid. at 181. Contrast Phillips v Lamdin [1949] 2 K.B. 33 (Adam-style door).

<sup>76</sup> See n.63, above.

of wheat"). Where the goods form an undifferentiated part of an identified bulk, a distinction must, as a result of amendments to the Sale of Goods Act made in 1995,<sup>77</sup> be drawn between two types of cases. The first consists of cases in which the part sold is expressed as a fraction or percentage of the bulk: e.g. half the cotton shipped on the Peerless. Such a contract is one for the sale of specific goods so long as the bulk was identified and agreed on when the contract was made<sup>78</sup>; and the court therefore has a discretion to order specific performance of it under section 52 of the 1979 Act. The second consists of cases in which the part sold is expressed as a specified quantity of unascertained goods to be taken from an identified bulk<sup>79</sup>: e.g. 5,000 bales out of the cargo of cotton shipped or to be shipped on the Peerless, on which 10,000 bales are shipped in bulk. In such a case<sup>80</sup> the buyer can become owner in common of the goods to the extent that he had paid for them<sup>81</sup> and so he would have less need<sup>82</sup> to seek specific performance to secure priority over other creditors in the event of the seller's insolvency. He would, however, acquire such ownership, not because the goods were specific or ascertained, but in spite of the fact they remained unascertained.<sup>83</sup> Cases of this kind are therefore not covered by the words of s.52, under which the court has a discretion to order specific performance of a contract for the delivery of "specific or ascertained" goods.

It is an open question whether the court may not in appropriate circumstances have a discretion to order a seller specifically to perform his undertaking to deliver goods even in cases which fall outside s.52. The section does not in terms say that specific performance can be ordered only where the goods are "specific or ascertained"; and it is arguable that the remedy should be available, even where the goods are not of this kind, if to grant it would give effect to the general principle governing its scope. This might, for example, be the position where a contract was made to supply a manufacturer with goods urgently needed by him for the purpose of his business. Damages might be an inadequate remedy in such a case, for they "would be a poor consolation if the failure of supplies forces a trader to lay off staff and disappoint his customers (whose affections may be transferred to others) and ultimately forces him towards insolvency . . .".<sup>84</sup> The view that specific performance could be ordered on such grounds<sup>85</sup> seemed at one time to have been abandoned<sup>86</sup>; but later cases give it fresh support. During a steel strike in 1980 a manufacturer sought an order for the specific delivery of a quantity of steel belonging to him against a rail carrier who (in fear of strike action) refused to allow it to be moved. The court made the order because, during the strike, "steel [was] available

<sup>77</sup> By Sale of Goods (Amendment) Act 1995.

<sup>78</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.61(1), definition of "specific goods" as amended by s.2(a) of the 1995 Act; the bulk must (as in our example) be identified and agreed on what the contract was made.

<sup>79</sup> As in Re Wait [1927] 1 Ch. 606.

<sup>80</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.20A(1), as inserted by s.1(3) of the 1995 Act.

<sup>81</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.20A(2).

<sup>82</sup> The buyer's property acquired by virtue of s.20A(2) would not necessarily prevail against a competing interest such as that of a bank to which documents of title representing the goods had been pledged, as in Re Wait, above; and where it did not so prevail the court would be unlikely to order specific performance to disturb this state of affairs: see Benjamin's Sale of Goods (6th ed.), §§18–265, 19–198.

<sup>83</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.20A(1) refers to the goods (in a case of the present kind) as "a specified quantity of unascertained goods."

<sup>84</sup> Howard E Perry & Co v British Railways Board [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1375 at 1383.

<sup>85</sup> Taylor v Neville, unreported, cited with approval in Buxton v Lister (1746) 3 Atk. 383 and in Adderley v Dixon (1824) 1 S. & S. 607.

<sup>86</sup> See Fothergill v Roiland (1873) L.R. 17 Eq. 137; Pollard v Clayton (1885) 1 K. & J. 462; Dominion Coal Co v Dominion Iron & Steel Co [1909] A.C. 293. Contrast Donnell v Bennett (1883) 23 Ch.D. 835, taking a more liberal view.

only with great difficulty”.<sup>87</sup> It is submitted that, in such circumstances, specific performance should similarly be available to a buyer. This view is supported by a case<sup>88</sup> in which, during the “energy crisis” in 1973, an interim injunction was granted to stop an oil company from cutting off supplies of petrol to a garage, since alternative supplies were not available. As the goods were not “specific or ascertained”, the case gives some support to the view that an obligation to deliver goods may be specifically enforced in a case falling outside s.52.<sup>89</sup>

The concept of specific performance in s.52 is that of a remedy for non-delivery of goods; but there is the further possibility that specific relief may be sought in respect of defective delivery, i.e. delivery of goods which are not in conformity with the contract. This possibility is recognised by recent amendments<sup>90</sup> to the Sale of Goods Act 1979, by which a buyer who deals as a consumer and to whom goods are sold by a commercial seller may, if the goods are not in conformity with the contract, require the seller to repair or replace them.<sup>91</sup> The remedy of specific performance is made available to enforce the seller’s duty to comply with such a requirement<sup>92</sup>; and this extension of the remedy is, it is submitted, consistent with the principles governing specific relief in English law. Damages are unlikely to be the most appropriate remedy for a consumer who has bought (for example) an appliance which malfunctions; while hardship to the seller is avoided by a number of restrictions on the remedies described above. Thus repair or replacement cannot be ordered if either remedy is impossible,<sup>93</sup> or can one of these remedies be ordered “disproportionate” to the other.<sup>94</sup> Specific performance can also be refused where another of the new remedies (such as price reduction) provided by the recent amendments<sup>95</sup> is “appropriate”,<sup>96</sup> i.e., more appropriate than specific relief.

(e) APPROPRIATENESS OF THE REMEDY. The extension of specific relief (in the cases discussed above)<sup>97</sup> to situations not within s.52, as well as its recent legislative extension to certain cases of defective delivery, represented a more satisfactory approach to the scope of the remedy than that of the older authorities according to which the remedy was available to a buyer of goods which were “unique” or in a similar category.<sup>98</sup> The more liberal view of the scope of the remedy is also reflected in dicta to the effect that the availability of specific performance depends on the appropriateness of that remedy in the

<sup>87</sup> Howard E Perry & Co v British Railways Board, above, at p.1383.

<sup>88</sup> Sky Petroleum Ltd v VIP Petroleum Ltd [1974] 1 W.L.R. 576; cf. Total Oil (Great Britain) Ltd v Thompson Garage (Biggin Hill) Ltd [1972] 1 Q.B. 318 at 324; Redler Grain Silos Ltd v BICC Ltd [1982] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 435. Wake v Renault (UK) Ltd, The Times, August 1, 1996, could be explained on the same ground, though the case gives rise to difficulties discussed at pp.1043, 1046, below.

<sup>89</sup> This possibility was doubted in Re London Wine Co (Shippers) [1986] p.C.C. 121 at 149 but it was not necessary in that case to reach a final conclusion on the specific enforceability of the contract: see above, p.1023, n.72.

<sup>90</sup> Made by Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045) implementing Dir.1999/44. The Regulations provide similar remedies where goods are supplied to a consumer under a contract other than one of sale: for the sake of brevity, the following discussion is confined to cases of sale.

<sup>91</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss.48A(2)(a) and 48B, as inserted by reg.5 of the above Regulations; for dealing as consumer, see Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.61(5A).

<sup>92</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48E(2), as inserted by reg.5 of the above Regulations.

<sup>93</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48B(3)(a); cf. below p.1029 (impossibility).

<sup>94</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48B(3)(a); cf. below p.1026 (severe hardship).

<sup>95</sup> For price reduction, see the new s.48C, inserted by the Regulations referred to in n.90 above.

<sup>96</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48E(3) and (4).

<sup>97</sup> See above, at nn.81–88.

<sup>98</sup> See above, pp.1022–1024, especially at nn.66, 67, and 74.

circumstances of each case.<sup>99</sup> The question is not whether damages are an "adequate" remedy, but whether specific performance will "do more perfect and complete justice than an award of damages".<sup>1</sup> The point was well put in a case concerned with the analogous question whether an injunction should be granted: "The standard question . . . , are damages an adequate remedy? might perhaps, in the light of the authorities in recent years, be rewritten: is it just in all circumstances that the plaintiff should be confined to his remedy in damages . . . ?"<sup>2</sup>

A similar approach has been adopted to the analogous question whether specific performance can be ordered where the action for the agreed sum is also available. At one time a negative answer was given to this question, apparently because the common law remedy was an "adequate" one.<sup>3</sup> The current view, however, is that specific performance can be ordered in such a case if it is, in the circumstances, the most appropriate remedy.<sup>4</sup>

(2) Discretionary

Specific performance is a discretionary remedy: the court is not bound to grant it merely because the contract is valid at law and cannot be impeached on some specific equitable ground such as misrepresentation or undue influence.<sup>5</sup> The discretion is, however, "not an arbitrary . . . discretion, but one to be governed as far as possible by fixed rules and principles".<sup>6</sup> The court will, in particular, have regard to the grounds to be discussed below. Its discretion to refuse specific performance on such grounds cannot be excluded by the terms of the contract.<sup>7</sup>

(a) SEVERE HARDSHIP. Specific performance can be refused on the ground of severe hardship to the defendant. Thus in Denne v Light<sup>8</sup> the court refused to order specific performance against the buyer of farming land wholly surrounded by land which belonged to others and over which there was no right of way. Specific performance may similarly be refused where the cost of performance to the defendant is wholly out of proportion to the benefit which performance will confer on the claimant.<sup>9</sup> The court is also "slow" to order specific performance against a person who can put himself into a position to perform only by taking legal proceedings against a third party, especially where the outcome of such proceedings is in doubt.<sup>10</sup> Severe hardship may be a ground for refusing specific performance even though it results from circumstances which arise after the conclusion of the contract, which affect the person of the defendant rather than

<sup>99</sup> Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58 at 88, 90–91, 102; cf. Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.J.R. 385 at 412.

<sup>1</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 322; Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold [1999] Ch. 64 at 72–73.

<sup>2</sup> Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 W.L.R. 349 at 379.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. Crampton v Varna Ry (1872) L.R. 7 Ch.App. 562 at 567 ("a money contract not enforceable in this court").

<sup>4</sup> e.g. Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58. The burden is on the claimant to show that damages are not an adequate remedy: The Stena Nautica (No.2) [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 336 at 348.

<sup>5</sup> Stickney v Keeble [1915] A.C. 386 at 419.

<sup>6</sup> Lamare v Dixon (1873) L.R. 6 H.L. 414 at 423; Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] A.C. 1 at 16.

<sup>7</sup> Quadrant Visual Communications Ltd v Hutchison Telephone (UK) [1993] B.C.I.C. 442.

<sup>8</sup> (1857) 8 D.M. & G. 774; cf. Wedgwood v Adams (1843) 6 Beav. 600; Sullivan v Henderson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 333; Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269 (injunction); Insurance Co v Lloyd's Syndicate [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 273 at 276 (injunction).

<sup>9</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 326; cf. Morris v Redland Bricks Ltd [1970] A.C. 652.

<sup>10</sup> Wroth v Tyler [1974] Ch. 30, where an additional ground for refusing specific performance was that the proceedings would have to be between the defendant and his wife thus tending to split up the family. cf. Watts v Spence [1976] Ch. 165 at 173.

the subject-matter of the contract, and for which the claimant is in no way responsible. For example, in Patel v Ali<sup>11</sup> specific performance of a contract for the sale of a house was refused after a four-year delay (for which neither party was responsible), the vendor's circumstances having during this time changed disastrously as a result of her husband's bankruptcy and of an illness which had left her disabled. On the other hand, "mere pecuniary difficulties" would "afford no excuse".<sup>12</sup> Thus the purchaser of a house will not be denied specific performance merely because the vendor, on a rising market, finds it difficult to acquire alternative accommodation with the proceeds of the sale.<sup>13</sup> Nor will specific performance be refused merely because compliance with the order exposes the defendant to the risk of a strike by his employees.<sup>14</sup>

(b) UNFAIRNESS. The court may refuse specific performance of a contract which has been obtained by means that are unfair, even though they do not amount to grounds on which the contract can be invalidated. Thus in Walters v Morgan<sup>15</sup> the defendant agreed to grant the claimant a mining lease over land which the defendant had only just bought. Specific performance was refused because the defendant was "surprised and was induced to sign the agreement in ignorance of the value of his property".<sup>16</sup> But specific performance will not be refused merely because the claimant fails to disclose circumstances which affect the value of the property or the defendant's willingness to contract with him.<sup>17</sup> Something more must be shown: for example, that the claimant has taken unfair advantage of his superior knowledge: in Walters v Morgan the court relied on the fact that the claimant had produced a draft lease during the negotiations, and had hurried the defendant into signing it before he could discover the true value of the property. On the same principle specific performance may be refused if the claimant has taken advantage of the defendant's drunkenness, though it was not so extreme as to invalidate the contract at law.<sup>18</sup> The claimant failure to disclose his own breach of the contract, reducing the value of the subject-matter,<sup>19</sup> has also been held to be a ground for refusing specific performance, even though the non-disclosure was not a ground for setting the contract aside at law.<sup>20</sup>

(c) INADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION. The authorities on inadequacy of consideration as a ground for refusing specific performance are not easy to reconcile. On the one hand mere inadequacy of consideration is not a ground for refusing specific performance.<sup>21</sup> On the other hand the statement that inadequacy of consideration is not a ground for refusing specific performance unless it is "such as shocks the conscience and amounts in itself to conclusive and decisive evidence of fraud"<sup>22</sup> is probably too narrow, even when allowance is made for the possibility that fraud may have had a wider meaning in equity than at law. The best view seems to be that specific performance may be refused where inadequacy of consideration is coupled with some other factor, not necessarily amounting to fraud or other invalidating cause at law—for example, mistake that is

<sup>11</sup> [1984] Ch. 283.

<sup>12</sup> ibid. at 288; cf. Francis v Comcliff (1977) 33 P. & C.R. 368.

<sup>13</sup> Mountford v Scott [1975] Ch. 258; cf. Easton v Brown [1981] 3 All E.R. 278.

<sup>14</sup> See Howard E Perry v British Railways Board [1980] 1 W.L.R. 1375.

<sup>15</sup> (1861) 3 D.F. & J. 718.

<sup>16</sup> 3 D.F. & J. at p.723.

<sup>17</sup> cf. above, pp.390, 391, 728–730.

<sup>18</sup> Malins v Freeman (1837) 2 Keen 25 at 34; above, p.559.

<sup>19</sup> Quadrant Visual Communications v Hutchison Telephone (UK) [1993] B.C.I.L.C. 442.

<sup>20</sup> See above, p.400.

<sup>21</sup> Collier v Brown (1788) 1 Cox C.C. 428; Western v Russell (1814) 3 V. & B. 187; Haywood v Cope (1858) 25 Beav. 140.

<sup>22</sup> Coles v Trecothick (1804) 9 Ves. 234 at 246.

operative only in equity,<sup>23</sup> surprise<sup>24</sup> or unfair advantage taken by the claimant of his superior knowledge or bargaining position.<sup>25</sup> Specific performance may be refused on the ground of inadequacy of consideration even though the circumstances do not justify rescission of the contract.<sup>26</sup>

(d) CONDUCT OF CLAIMANT. "The conduct of the party applying for relief is always an important element for consideration".<sup>27</sup> Thus specific performance can be refused if the claimant fails to perform a promise which induced the defendant to enter into the contract, but which is neither binding contractually, nor (because it relates to the future) operative as a misrepresentation.<sup>28</sup> A similar view may be taken where the claimant has made a misrepresentation but the right to rescind for that misrepresentation has been lost. If the right has been lost by reason of the defendant's affirmation of the contract,<sup>29</sup> he will not be allowed to rely on the misrepresentation as a defence to specific performance since he in turn would be guilty of "unconscionable inconsistency in conduct"<sup>30</sup> in seeking, after affirmation, to invoke the misrepresentation for this purpose. But his conduct would not be open to such criticism where the right to rescind had been lost by impossibility of restitution arising otherwise than from the defendant's conduct.<sup>31</sup> Hence in a case of this kind the misrepresentation, though no longer a ground for rescission, could be relied on as a defence to the equitable remedy of specific performance.<sup>32</sup> The remedy may similarly be refused if the claimant has acted unfairly in performing the contract, though he has not broken any promise. Specific enforcement of a solus agreement<sup>33</sup> has accordingly been denied to a petrol company on the ground that it had given discounts to other garages, making it impossible for the defendant garage to trade on the terms of the agreement except at a loss.<sup>34</sup>

An action could formerly be brought on a contract for the sale of land against a party who had provided written evidence of it by one who had not.<sup>35</sup> It had, however, been held that specific performance would not be granted to a purchaser of land if he refused to perform a stipulation to which he had agreed, but which could not be enforced against him for want of written evidence.<sup>36</sup> A contract for the sale of land must now be made (and not merely evidenced) in writing, and the writing must incorporate all the terms on which the parties have expressly agreed.<sup>37</sup> Hence if the stipulation in question was such a term, but was not contained in the documents, specific performance would now be refused on the different ground that no contract had come into existence. An alternative possibility is that the stipulation might have been intended to take effect as a collateral contract.<sup>38</sup> In that event, the main contract would be valid but the reasoning of the cases

<sup>23</sup> Webster v Cecil (1861) 30 Beav. 62.

<sup>24</sup> See above at n.16; cf. Mortlock v Buller (1804) 10 Ves. 292.

<sup>25</sup> Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew. 651.

<sup>26</sup> See Mortlock v Buller, above.

<sup>27</sup> Lamare v Dixon (1873) L.R. 6 H.L. 414 at 423; cf. Chappell v The Times Newspapers Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 482; Wilton Group v Abrams [1990] BCC 310, 317 ("commercially disreputable" agreement).

<sup>28</sup> Lamare v Dixon, above; and see also above p.331.

<sup>29</sup> See above, p.383.

<sup>30</sup> Geest plc v Fyffes plc [1999] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 672 at 694.

<sup>31</sup> See above, pp.378–383, 383–384.

<sup>32</sup> Geest plc v Fyffes plc, above.

<sup>33</sup> See above, p.469.

<sup>34</sup> Shell UK Ltd v Lostock Garages Ltd [1976] 1 W.L.R. 1187.

<sup>35</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.40, replacing part of Statute of Frauds 1677, s.4, and now repealed by Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, ss.1(8) and 4 and Sch.2; and see above, p.184.

<sup>36</sup> See Martin v Pycroft (1852) 2 D.M. & G. 785 at 795; Scott v Bradley [1971] Ch. 850.

<sup>37</sup> Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989, s.2(1); above, p.178.

<sup>38</sup> See above, p.179.

referred to above might still lead the court to refuse specific performance to the purchaser if it considered that the vendor would not be adequately protected, after being ordered to perform, by his claim for damages for breach of the collateral contract.<sup>39</sup>

(e) IMPOSSIBILITY. Specific performance will not be ordered against a person who has agreed to sell land which he does not own and cannot compel the owner to convey to him,<sup>40</sup> “because the court does not compel a person to do what is impossible”.<sup>41</sup> The position is the same where a person has agreed to assign a lease and the landlord withholds his consent, without which the assignment cannot lawfully be effected.<sup>42</sup> Impossibility of enforcing an order of specific performance (e.g. because the defendant is not, and has no assets, within the jurisdiction) may also be a reason for refusing to make such an order.<sup>43</sup>

(f) OTHER FACTORS. The factors so far discussed operate negatively, as grounds for refusing specific performance. Others may operate positively, as grounds for awarding the remedy. Thus specific performance has been ordered of a contract to grant a licence to use a hall for a political meeting, and one reason for making the order was that it would promote freedom of speech and assembly.<sup>44</sup>

(3) Contracts not specifically enforceable

(a) CONTRACTS INVOLVING PERSONAL SERVICE. It has long been settled that equity will not, as a general rule, enforce a contract of personal service.<sup>45</sup> Specific enforcement against the employee was thought to interfere unduly with his personal liberty; it is this ground of policy which accounts for the rule, so that “questions of the adequacy of damages are irrelevant to this issue”.<sup>46</sup> Legislative force is given to the principle by the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s.236 of which provides that no court shall compel an employee to do any work by ordering specific performance of a contract of employment or by restraining the breach of such a contract by injunction.<sup>47</sup> Conversely, an employer could not be forced to employ: it was thought to be difficult or undesirable to enforce the continuance of a “personal” relationship between unwilling parties. This principle is reflected in the provisions of the Employment Rights Act 1996,<sup>48</sup> as to the remedies for “unfair” dismissal (which is not normally a breach of contract at all). Under the Act, a tribunal may order the reinstatement or

<sup>39</sup> i.e. on the principle of “mutuality” as now understood: below, pp.1037–1038.

<sup>40</sup> See Castle v Wilkinson (1870) L.R. 5 Ch.App. 534; Watts v Spence [1976] Ch. 165; cf. Elliot & Elliot (Builders) Ltd v Pierson [1948] Ch. 453 (where the vendor sold land owned by a company that he controlled).

<sup>41</sup> Farrer v Nash (1865) 35 Beav. 167 at 171.

<sup>42</sup> Wilmott v Barber (1880) 15 Ch.D. 96; Warmington v Miller [1973] Q.B. 877; cf. Sullivan v Henderson [1973] 1 W.L.R. 333. Contrast Rose v Stravron, The Times, June 23 (where the remedy sought was not specific performance but a declaration).

<sup>43</sup> The Sea Hawk [1986] 1 W.L.R. 657 at 665.

<sup>44</sup> Verrall v Great Yarmouth BC [1981] Q.B. 202. For the relevance of this factor, see also Human Rights Act 1998, s.12; Imutran Ltd v Uncaged Campaigns Ltd [2001] 2 All E.R. 385.

<sup>45</sup> Johnson v Shrewsbury and Birmingham Ry (1853) 3 D.M. & G. 358; Brett v East India and London Shipping Co Ltd (1864) 2 H. & M. 404; Britain v Rossiter (1883) 11 Q.B.D. 123 at 127; Rigby v Connol (1880) 14 Ch.D. 482 at 487. cf. Taylor v NUS [1967] 1 W.L.R. 532; Chappell v Times Newspapers Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 482 (injunction); The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 700–701 (below, p.1032); Wishart v National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux [1990] I.C.R. 794; Wilson v St. Hellen's BC [1998] I.C.R. 1141 at 1153.

<sup>46</sup> Young v Robson Rhodes [1999] 3 All E.R. 524 at 534.

<sup>47</sup> Injunctions in respect of industrial action may lie against the organisers of such action, e.g. under Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, ss.226 or 235A (inserted by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.22), but not against individual employees.

<sup>48</sup> Pt X.

re-engagement of the employee; but if such an order is not complied with, the employer can, in the last resort, only be made to pay compensation.<sup>49</sup> In practice, reinstatement is "effected in only a tiny proportion of . . . cases"<sup>50</sup> so that it is compensation which is the employee's "primary remedy".<sup>51</sup> The remedy for infringement of the statutory right of a person not to be excluded or expelled from a trade union is likewise by way of declaration and compensation.<sup>52</sup> Where an employee is dismissed in breach of contract, his normal remedy is a claim for damages or a declaration that the dismissal was wrongful: not specific enforcement,<sup>53</sup> or a declaration that the dismissal was invalid.<sup>54</sup> The statutory right to return to work<sup>55</sup> after maternity, parental or paternity leave appears likewise not to be specifically enforceable.<sup>56</sup>

The arguments usually advanced in support of the equitable principle are no longer wholly convincing<sup>57</sup>; and the principle is subject to a growing list of exceptions. A person who is dismissed from a public office in breach of the terms of his appointment may be entitled to reinstatement<sup>58</sup>; and the Visitor of a University has power to order the reinstatement of a wrongfully dismissed lecturer (even when such a remedy would not be available in the ordinary courts),<sup>59</sup> such a dismissal being, if it amounts to a violation <sup>49</sup> Employment Rights Act 1996, ss.113–117. Under ss.129(9) and 130 of the 1996 Act, orders may be made for the continuation of the contract, but these do not give rise to the remedy of specific performance. cf. also Sex Discrimination Act 1975, ss.65(1)(c), 65(3)(a), 71(1); Race Relations Act 1976, ss.56(1)(c), 56(4); Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act 1985, ss.10, 17 and 18; Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, ss.152–167 (as amended by s.49 and Schs 7 and 8 of Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993) (dismissal on grounds related to trade union membership or activities); Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s.8(5) and Sch.3, para.2(1).

<sup>50</sup> Johnson v Unisys Ltd [2001] UKHL 13; [2002] I.C.R. 408, at [78] per Lord Millett; Lord Steyn at [23] states the proportion to be "only about three per cent".

<sup>51</sup> ibid.

<sup>52</sup> Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, ss.174 to 177, as substituted by Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993, s.14.

<sup>53</sup> See above, p.749, n.1; below, p.1042, n.85.

<sup>54</sup> Francis v Kuala Lumpur Councillors [1962] 1 W.L.R. 1411; Vidyodaya University Council v Silva [1965] 1 W.L.R. 77; Guntton v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC [1981] Ch. 448 (declaration that dismissal was "ineffective lawfully to determine the contract"); Marsh v National Autistic Society [1993] I.C.R. 453. A declaration may also be made that a decision of a disciplinary committee leading to a dismissal is void: Stevenson v United Road Transport Union [1977] I.C.R. 893; but this does not amount to a declaration that the contract remains in operation: ibid. 906.

<sup>55</sup> Employment Rights Act 1996, Pt VIII, as substituted by Employment Relations Act 1999, ss.7, 8 and 9 and Sch.4 and amended by Employment Act 2002, s.1, and see ibid., s.7; Maternity and Parental Leave Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/3312), reg.18.

<sup>56</sup> The Regulations cited in n.55 above do not specify civil remedies for infringement of the right.

<sup>57</sup> See Clark, 32 M.L.R. 532.

<sup>58</sup> Ridge v Baldwin [1964] A.C. 40; Ganz, 30 M.L.R. 288; Malloch v Aberdeen Corp [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1578; Chief Constable of the North Wales Police v Evans [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1155; Jones v Lee (1979) 78 L.G.R. 213. The line between ordinary and public employment is by no means clear-cut: see criticisms of the Vidyodaya University case, above, in Malloch v Aberdeen Corp, above, at 1595. But the distinction is one factor which determines the availability of judicial review as a remedy for alleged wrongful dismissal of public employees: see R. v East Berkshire Health Authority, Ex p. Walsh [1985] Q.B. 152 (judicial review not available to senior nursing officer); R. v Civil Service Appeal Tribunal Ex p. Bruce [1989] I.C.R. 171 (judicial review available to Inland Revenue executive officer but refused as other, preferable remedies available); R. v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Ex p. Broom [1986] Q.B. 198; R. v Derbyshire CC, Ex p. Noble [1990] I.C.R. 808 (judicial review available to police surgeon); cf. McClaren v Home Office [1990] I.C.R. 824 (claim by prison officer raised no issue of public law); Roy v Kensington, etc., Family Practitioner Committee [1992] 1 A.C. 624 (private law remedy available to general practitioner in respect of practice allowance); R. v Crown Prosecution Service, Ex p. Hogg, The Times, April 14, 1994 (no judicial review of dismissal of employee of Crown Prosecution Service).

<sup>59</sup> Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] A.C. 795 at 824; for subsequent proceedings, see Thomas v University of Bradford [1992] 1 All E.R. 964, where it was held by the Visitor that the lecturer's removal would have been invalid for procedural irregularities if these had not been waived by the lecturer.

of the University's Statutes, not merely wrongful but also invalid.<sup>60</sup> The continuance or creation of a "personal" relationship may also be enforced where an injunction is granted against expulsion from a social club,<sup>61</sup> or against the refusal of a professional association to admit a person to membership.<sup>62</sup> The right to exclude persons from membership of certain charitable associations is also restricted; for though such bodies have the right to exclude persons whom they in good faith regard as likely to damage their objectives, they must not adopt arbitrary procedures to that end: they may, for example, be required to invite persons who are about to be excluded to give reasons why they should be admitted.<sup>63</sup> By way of contrast, it has been held that specific relief was not available against a fee-paying school to reinstate a pupil who had been excluded for alleged misconduct, since the "breakdown of trust" had made it undesirable to require the parties "to co-exist in a pastoral and educational relationship".<sup>64</sup>

More generally, the modern relationship of employer and employee is often much less personal than the old relationship of master and servant was believed to be; and there are signs that the courts are prepared to re-examine or qualify the old equitable principles in the light of this development.<sup>65</sup> Industrial conditions may in fact force an employer to retain an employee whom he would prefer to dismiss or to dismiss one whom he is perfectly willing to retain. For example, in Hill v CA Parsons Ltd<sup>66</sup> employers were forced by union pressure to dismiss an employee. The dismissal amounted to a breach of contract and the court issued an injunction to restrain the breach, thus in effect reinstating the employee. As the employers and the employee were perfectly willing to maintain their relationship, the decision does not seem to violate the spirit of the general equitable principle against the specific enforcement of employment contracts. An injunction to restrain dismissal can also be issued in respect of a period during which no services are to be rendered under the contract. Thus where an employee had been suspended on full pay while disciplinary proceedings against him were in progress, it was held that the employers could be restrained from dismissing him before the disciplinary proceedings had run their full course.<sup>67</sup>

The equitable principle applies to all contracts involving personal service even though they are not strictly contracts of service. Thus an agreement to allow an auctioneer to sell a collection of works of art cannot be specifically enforced<sup>68</sup> by either party, though specific enforcement would hardly be an undue interference with personal liberty, even in a suit against the auctioneer. Again, an agreement to enter into a partnership will not be specifically enforced as "it is impossible to make persons who will not concur carry <sup>60</sup> Pearce v University of Aston (No.2) [1991] 2 All E.R. 469. The Visitor's decision on the interpretation of the University's statutes is not subject to judicial review: R. v Hull University Visitor, Ex p. Page [1993] A.C. 682 (where the Visitor had held the dismissal to be in accordance with those statutes).

<sup>61</sup> Young v Ladies Imperial Club Ltd [1920] 2 K.B. 522.

<sup>62</sup> cf. Nagle v Feilden [1966] 2 Q.B. 633, doubted on the availability of specific relief in R. v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club, Ex p. Aga Khan [1993] 1 W.L.R. 909 at 933. See also Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s.71(1) and Race Relations Act 1976, s.62 (injunction against "persistent" discrimination).

<sup>63</sup> Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals v Attorney-General [2002] 1 W.L.R. 448.

<sup>64</sup> R. v Incorporated Froebel Educational Institute, Ex p. L [1999] E.L.R. 488 at 493. cf. R. v Fernhill Manor School [1993] F.L.R. 620 (no judicial review of expulsion from private school).

<sup>65</sup> See CH Giles & Co Ltd v Morris [1972] 1 W.L.R. 307. cf., in Scotland, Peace v Edinburgh CC [1999] I.R.L.R. 417.

<sup>66</sup> [1972] Ch. 305; Hepple [1972] C.L.J. 47; cf. Irani v Southampton, etc. Health Authority [1985] I.C.R. 590 (where the employers retained confidence in an employee but had dismissed him because of differences between him and another employee); Ponnell v Brent LBC [1988] I.C.R. 176; Hughes v Southwark LCB [1988] I.R.L.R. 55; Jones v Gwent CC [1992] I.R.L.R. 521 at 526.

<sup>67</sup> Robb v Hammersmith and Fulham BC [1991] I.C.R. 514.

<sup>68</sup> Chinnock v Sainsbury (1861) 30 L.J.Ch. 409; cf. Mortimer v Beckett [1920] 1 Ch. 571; Young v Robson Rhodes [1999] 3 All E.R. 524.

on a business jointly, for their common advantage".<sup>69</sup> The court can, however, order the execution of a formal partnership agreement, and leave the parties to their remedies on the agreement.<sup>70</sup> Similarly, the court can order the execution of a service contract even though that contract, when made, may not be specifically enforceable.<sup>71</sup>

The equitable principle here under discussion applies only where the services are of a personal nature. There is no general rule against the specific enforcement of a contract merely because one party undertakes to provide services<sup>72</sup> under it. Thus specific performance can be ordered of a contract to publish a piece of music<sup>73</sup> and sometimes of contracts to build.<sup>74</sup> It has, indeed, been suggested that a time charterparty cannot be specifically enforced against the shipowner because it is a contract for services<sup>75</sup>; but the services that the shipowner undertakes under such a contract will often be no more personal than those to be rendered by a builder under a building contract. Denial of specific performance in the case of time charters is best explained on other grounds.<sup>76</sup>

(b) CONTRACTS REQUIRING CONSTANT SUPERVISION. Specific performance will not be ordered of continuous contractual duties, the proper performance of which might require constant supervision by the court.<sup>77</sup> In Ryan v Mutual Tontine Association<sup>78</sup> the lease of a service flat gave the tenant the right to the services of a porter who was to be "constantly in attendance". Specific enforcement of this right was refused on the ground that it would have required "that constant superintendence by the court, which the court in such cases has always declined to give".<sup>79</sup> For the same reason the courts have refused specifically to enforce an undertaking to cultivate a farm in a particular manner<sup>80</sup>; a contract to keep a shop open<sup>81</sup>; a contract to keep an airfield in operation<sup>82</sup>; a contract to deliver goods in instalments<sup>83</sup>; and obligations to operate railway signals<sup>84</sup> and to

<sup>69</sup> England v Curling (1844) 8 Beav. 129 at 137. On the same principle, specific performance has been refused of a house-sharing arrangement which had been made between members of a family who later quarrelled: Burrows and Burrows v Sharp (1991) 23 H.L.R. 82, where the basis of liability was not contract but proprietary estoppel; cf. Internet Trading Clubs Ltd v Freeserve (Investments) Ltd Transcript June 19, 2001 at [3] (refusal specifically "to enforce an ongoing business relationship").

<sup>70</sup> As in England v Curling (above), where the object of obtaining such a decree was to ascertain the exact terms that had been agreed, and then to prevent one of the contracting parties from competing in business with the other.

<sup>71</sup> CH Giles & Co Ltd v Morris [1972] 1 W.L.R. 307; cf. Posner v Scott-Lewis [1987] Ch. 25.

<sup>72</sup> e.g. Regent International Hotels v Pageguide, The Times, May 13, 1985 (injunction against preventing claimant company from managing a hotel); Posner v Scott-Lewis [1987] Ch. 25 (below, p.1033 at n.90).

<sup>73</sup> Barrow v Chappell & Co (1951), now reported in [1976] R.P.C. 355, and cited in Joseph v National Magazine Co Ltd [1959] Ch. 14; contrast Malcolm v Chancellor Masters and Scholars of the University of Oxford, The Times, December 19, 1990, where specific performance of a contract to publish a book was refused on the ground that continued co-operation between author and publishers would have been required. For further related proceedings, see [2002] FWHC 10; [2002] E.L.R. 277.

<sup>74</sup> See below, p.1035.

<sup>75</sup> The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 700–701.

<sup>76</sup> See below at n.86.

<sup>77</sup> The principle does not apply to continuous obligations to pay money: thus an agreement to pay an annuity can be specifically enforced (above, p.1021).

<sup>78</sup> [1893] 1 Ch. 116.

<sup>79</sup> ibid. at 123.

<sup>80</sup> Rayner v Stone (1762) 2 Eden 128; Phipps v Jackson (1887) 56 L.J.Ch. 350.

<sup>81</sup> Braddon Timers Ltd v International Stores Ltd [1987] 1 E.G.L.R. 209 (decided in 1959); Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] A.C. 1, below at n.91.

<sup>82</sup> Domty Boulton Paul Ltd v Wolverhampton Corp [1971] 1 W.L.R. 204; for later proceedings see [1973] Ch. 94.

<sup>83</sup> Dominion Coal Co v Dominion Iron & Steel Co [1900] A.C. 293; but see above, p.1024.

<sup>84</sup> Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co v Taff Vale Ry (1874) L.R. 9 Ch. 331.

provide engine power.<sup>85</sup> And it has been held that a voyage charterparty cannot be specifically enforced against the shipowner.<sup>86</sup>

This “difficulty” of supervision should, however, not be exaggerated. In most cases the mere existence of the court’s order will suffice to deter a deliberate breach. No practical difficulty seems to have arisen in the cases in which the courts have specifically enforced contracts to do building work.<sup>87</sup> If the defendant were recalcitrant, the court could appoint an expert as its officer to supervise performance. This is no more “difficult” than appointing a person to run the business of a bankrupt or to manage the property of a mental patient. The court has appointed a receiver to run a mine in a rescission action<sup>88</sup>; the same thing could be done in an action for specific performance. Alternatively, the claimant could be empowered to appoint a person to act as agent of the defendant to supervise the enforcement of the order: this would not be radically different from the statutory power of a mortgagee to appoint a receiver to act as agent of the mortgagor.<sup>89</sup> Where the acts to be done under the contract are not to be done by the defendant personally, the court can order him simply to enter into a contract to procure those acts to be done. From this point of view, Ryan v Mutual Tontine Association may be contrasted with the later case of Posner v Scott-Lewis<sup>90</sup> where the lessor of a block of luxury flats covenanted, so far as lay in his power, to employ a resident porter to perform a number of specified tasks. It was held that the covenant was specifically enforceable in the sense that the lessor could be ordered to appoint a resident porter for the performance of the specified services.

This balancing of arguments for and against ordering specific performance in cases of this kind is well illustrated by Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd,<sup>91</sup> where a 31-year lease of premises for use as a food supermarket in a shopping centre contained a covenant by the tenant to keep the premises “open for retail trade during the usual hours of business”. Some six years after the commencement of the lease, the supermarket was running at a loss and the tenant ceased trading there. The main reason given by the House of Lords for refusing to order specific performance was the difficulty of supervising the enforcement of the order since the question whether it was being complied with might require frequent reference to the court. For this purpose, Lord Hoffmann distinguished between orders (such as that sought here) “to carry on an activity” and orders “to achieve a result”. In the latter case, “the court . . . only has to examine the finished work”<sup>92</sup> so that compliance with the order could be judged ex post facto: it was on this ground that the cases in which building contracts had been specifically enforced<sup>93</sup> were to be explained. Difficulty of supervision was, however, not the sole ground for the decision. Lord Hoffmann referred also to a number of other

<sup>85</sup> Blackett v Bates (1865) L.R. 1 Ch. 177.

<sup>86</sup> De Mattos v Gibson (1858) 4 D. & J. 276 (voyage charter). The view expressed in The Scaptrade [1983] 2 A.C. 694 at 700–701, that a time charter is not specifically enforceable, is best explained on the ground that such enforcement would require too much supervision.

<sup>87</sup> See below, p.1035; cf. Storer v GW Ry (1842) 2 Y. & C.C.C. 48 (specific performance ordered of an agreement “for ever . . . to maintain one neat archway”); Kenard v Cory Bros & Co [1922] 2 Ch. 1 (mandatory injunction ordering defendant to keep a drain open); Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold Ltd [1999] Ch. 64.

<sup>88</sup> Gibbs v David (1870) L.R. 20 Eq. 373.

<sup>89</sup> Law of Property Act 1925, s.101; cf. Insolvency Act 1986, s.44 (as amended by Insolvency Act 1994, s.2).

<sup>90</sup> [1987] Ch. 25.

<sup>91</sup> [1998] A.C. 1.

<sup>92</sup> ibid. at 13; all the other members of the House of Lords agreed with Lord Hoffmann’s speech.

<sup>93</sup> See below, p.1035.

factors, such as the "heavy-handed nature of the enforcement mechanism"<sup>94</sup> by proceedings for contempt; the injustice of compelling the tenant to carry on business at a loss which might well exceed the loss which the landlord would be likely to suffer if the covenant were broken; and the fact that it was not "in the public interest for the courts to require someone to carry on business at a loss if there is any plausible alternative by which the other party can be given compensation",<sup>95</sup> i.e. by way of damages. Reliance on such factors suggests that, if the court attaches sufficient importance to the claimant's interest in specific enforcement, it will not be deterred from granting such relief merely on the ground that it will require constant supervision. The outcome in each case will depend on the "cumulative effect"<sup>96</sup> of this factor together with any others which favour<sup>97</sup> or (as in the Co-operative Insurance case) militate against specific relief.<sup>98</sup>

(c) CONTRACTS WHICH ARE TOO VAGUE. An agreement may be so vague that it cannot be enforced at all, even by an action for damages.<sup>99</sup> But although an agreement is definite enough to be enforced in some form of legal proceeding, it may still be too vague to be enforced specifically.<sup>1</sup> Thus specific performance has been refused of a contract to publish an article as to the wording of which the parties disagreed.<sup>2</sup> In such a case the court would find it difficult or impossible to state in its order exactly what the defendant was to do; and precision is essential<sup>3</sup> since failure to comply with the court's order may lead to attachment for contempt. An agreement is not, however, too vague to be specifically enforced merely because it is expressed to be subject to such amendments as may reasonably be required by one (or by either) party.<sup>4</sup>

The difficulty of precisely formulating the court's order was at one time thought to prevent the specific enforcement of contracts for the sale of goodwill alone (without business premises): it was considered impossible for the court in its decree to state precisely what the vendor was to do.<sup>5</sup> But in Beswick v Beswick it was said that such a contract could be specifically enforced.<sup>6</sup> The older, contrary, authorities were not cited; and it seems that they have been made obsolete by the growing legal and commercial precision of the concept of goodwill.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>94</sup> [1988] A.C. 1 at 12.

<sup>95</sup> ibid. at 15.

<sup>96</sup> ibid. at 16.

<sup>97</sup> Luganda v Service Hotels [1969] 2 Ch. 209 (mandatory injunction ordering defendants to allow a protected tenant, who had been wrongfully locked out of a room in a residential hotel, to resume his residence in the hotel); cf. Films Rover International Ltd v Cannon Films Sales Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 670 at 682 (for further proceedings, see [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912); Sutton Housing Trust v Lawrence (1987) 19 H.L.R. 520.

<sup>98</sup> cf. Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] A.C. 691, 724, where difficulty of supervision is said to be no longer a bar to relief against forfeiture (as it had been in Hill v Barclay (1810) 16 Ves. Jun. 402); but the possibility is recognised that such difficulty sometimes "explains why specific performance cannot be granted . . . ." cf. also the interpretation of these remarks in Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] A.C. 1 at 14 as relating to relief against forfeiture rather than to the availability of specific performance and doubting their interpretation in Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 322.

<sup>99</sup> See above, p.49; Waring & Gillow v Thompson (1912) 29 T.L.R. 154.

<sup>1</sup> Tito v Waddell (No.2) [1977] Ch. 106 at 322–323.

<sup>2</sup> Joseph v National Magazine Co Ltd [1959] Ch. 14; cf. Slater v Ram, The Times, October 15, 1977.

<sup>3</sup> cf. Lock International plc v Beswick [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1268; Lawrence David Ltd v Ashton [1989] I.C.R. 123 at 132.

<sup>4</sup> Sweet & Maxwell Ltd v Universal News Services Ltd [1964] 2 Q.B. 699; Alpenstown Ltd v Regalian Properties plc [1985] 1 W.L.R. 721.

<sup>5</sup> Bozon v Furlow (1816) 1 Mer. 459 at 472; cf. Baxter v Connolly (1820) 1 J. & W. 576; Coslake v Till (1826) 1 Russ. 376; Thornbury v Beville (1842) 1 Y. & C.C.C. 554 at 565; Darbey v Whitaker (1857) 4 Drew. 134 at 139.

<sup>6</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 89, 97.

<sup>7</sup> Trego v Hunt [1896] A.C. 7.

(d) BUILDING CONTRACTS. The general rule is that a contract to erect a building cannot be specifically enforced.<sup>8</sup> There seem to be three reasons for this rule. First, damages may be an adequate remedy if the building owner can engage another builder to do the work. Secondly, the contract may be too vague if it fails to describe the building with sufficient certainty. Thirdly, specific enforcement of the contract may require more supervision than the court is willing to give.

But where the first two reasons do not apply, the third has not been allowed to prevail. Specific performance of a contract to erect or repair buildings can therefore be ordered if (i) the work is precisely defined with sufficient certainty; (ii) damages will not adequately compensate the claimant, and (iii) the defendant is in possession of the land on which the building is to be done,<sup>9</sup> since in that case the claimant cannot get the work done by employing another builder.

(e) CONTRACTS SPECIFICALLY ENFORCEABLE IN PART ONLY. In Ryan v Mutual Tontine Association<sup>10</sup> the court refused specifically to enforce a landlord's undertaking to have a porter "constantly in attendance"; and it seems unlikely that the court would, even now, order the landlord to enter into a contract with a porter on such terms (though it could make an order of a similar nature where the lease specified the tasks to be done by the porter<sup>11</sup>). A further claim that the landlord should be ordered simply to appoint a porter was also rejected on the ground that "when the court cannot grant specific performance of the contract as a whole, it will not interfere to compel specific performance of part of a contract".<sup>12</sup> This does not mean that the court cannot order specific performance of one individual obligation out of a number of imposed by a contract<sup>13</sup>; it means only that it will not make such an order in relation to one such obligation if it cannot so enforce the rest of the contract.<sup>14</sup> Even in this restricted sense, the rule is by no means an absolute one. Thus where a monetary adjustment can be made in respect of the unperformable part the court may order specific performance with compensation.<sup>15</sup>

(f) TERMINABLE AND CONDITIONAL CONTRACTS. If the party against whom specific performance is sought is entitled to terminate the contract, the order will be refused as the defendant could render it nugatory by exercising his power to terminate. This

<sup>8</sup> Flint v Brandon (1808) 3 Ves. 159; and see Wolverhampton Corporation v Emmons [1901] 1 Q.B. 515; cf. Gyllenhammar Partners International v Sour Brodogradevna Industrija [1989] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 403 at 422 (contract to build a ship).

<sup>9</sup> Wolverhampton Corporation v Emmons [1901] 1 Q.B. 515 at 525, as modified by Carpenters Estates Ltd v Davies [1940] Ch. 160; cf. Jeune v Queens Cross Properties Ltd [1974] Ch. 97; Calabar Properties Ltd v Stitches [1984] 1 W.L.R. 287; Price v Strange [1978] Ch. 337 at 357; Landlord and Tenant Act 1985, s.17; Gordon v Selico (1986) 278 E.G. 53; Barrett v Lounova [1990] 1 Q.B. 348; Tustian v Johnsons [1993] 2 All E.R. 675 at 681 (reversed in part on other grounds [1993] 3 All E.R. 534); Hammond v Allen [1994] 1 All E.R. 307 at 314; Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold Ltd [1999] Ch. 64 at 69, 75, and see Channel Tunnel Group Ltd v Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd [1993] A.C. 334, where the House of Lords took the view that it had jurisdiction to restrain a building contractor by injunction from stopping work, but refused such relief as a matter of discretion. For the converse question, whether a builder can, in effect, compel the owner to allow him to complete the work, contrast Hounslow (London Borough) v Tipckenham Garden & Builders Ltd [1971] Ch. 233 with Muyfield Holdings v Moana Reef [1973] 1 N.Z.L.R. 309; and cf. Finelli v Dee (1968) 76 D.L.R. (2d.) 393.

<sup>10</sup> [1893] 1 Ch. 116, above, p.1032.

<sup>11</sup> As in Posner v Scott-Lewis [1988] Ch. 25 (above, p.1033).

<sup>12</sup> [1893] 1 Ch. 116 at 123.

<sup>13</sup> See Odessa Tramways Co v Mendel (1878) 8 Ch.D. 235, where such an order was made.

<sup>14</sup> Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold Ltd [1999] Ch. 64 at 65–67; Odessa Tramways Co v Mendel (1878) 8 Ch.D. 235 (where contract is severable, specific performance of each part can be separately ordered); Internet Trading Clubs Ltd v Freeserve (Investments) Ltd, Transcript June 19, 2001 at [30], where specific performance of an unseverable part was refused.

<sup>15</sup> See above, p.771.

principle applies whether the contract is terminable under its express terms<sup>16</sup> or on account of the conduct of the party seeking specific performance.<sup>17</sup> On a somewhat similar principle, an obligation which is subject to a condition precedent not within the control of the party seeking the remedy will not be specifically enforced before the condition has occurred<sup>18</sup>; here too the making of the order could turn out to be nugatory if the condition were not satisfied. The occurrence of the condition will remove this obstacle to specific performance.<sup>19</sup>

(g) PROMISES WITHOUT CONSIDERATION. On the principle that equity will not aid a volunteer,<sup>20</sup> specific performance will not be ordered of a gratuitous promise even though it is binding at law because it is made by deed or supported by nominal consideration,<sup>21</sup> so that damages or the agreed sum can be recovered by the promisee. Where such a promise is made to a trustee for the benefit of a third party, it has been held that the trustee ought not to enforce the promise at law against the promisor,<sup>22</sup> unless the promise can be regarded as constituting a trust which is "already perfect".<sup>23</sup> Under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, promises for the benefit of a third party are (if the statutory requirements are satisfied) be enforceable not only by the promisee, but also by the third party,<sup>24</sup> who has the right of enforcement even though he has not provided any consideration for the promise.<sup>25</sup> The third party, moreover, has available to him any remedy, including specific performance, that "would have been available to him in an action for breach of the contract if he had been a party to the contract".<sup>26</sup> Nothing in the Act, however, affects the principle that equity will not aid a volunteer. Hence it is clear that if, between promisor and promisee, the contract is binding at law only because it is contained in a deed or supported by no more than nominal consideration (moving from the promisee), then equity will not order specific performance at the suit of the third party, any more than it will do so at the suit of the promisee. It is less clear what the position would be in the more usual case in which substantial consideration is provided by the promisee but none is provided by the third party. One possible view is that, since the third party is in such a case a volunteer, specific performance will not be ordered in his favour. But this would make the reference to specific performance in the Act, as one of the remedies available to the third party, largely nugatory. The courts may, therefore, prefer to take the view that the equitable principle applies only to gratuitous promises and that specific performance can be ordered at the suit of the third party, even though he has not provided any consideration for the promise, so long as substantial consideration for it has been provided by the promisee.

<sup>16</sup> e.g. Sheffield Gas Co v Harrison (1853) 17 Beav. 294; but cf. Allhusen v Borries (1867) 15 W.R. 739.

<sup>17</sup> Gregory v Wilson (1851) 9 Hare 683.

<sup>18</sup> Chattey v Farndale Holdings Inc [1997] 1 E.G.L.R. 153.

<sup>19</sup> cf. Wu Koon Tai v Wu Yau Loi [1997] A.C. 179 at 189.

<sup>20</sup> See above, p.76.

<sup>21</sup> See Re Parkin [1892] 3 Ch. 510; Cannon v Hartley [1949] Ch. 213. Contrast Gurtner v Circuit [1968] 2 Q.B. 587 at 596 where an agreement by deed between the Minister and the Motor Insurer's Bureau was said to be specifically enforceable by the Minister. The fact that no consideration moved from him was not mentioned by the court. cf. above, p.668.

<sup>22</sup> Re Pryce [1917] 1 Ch. 234; Re Kay [1939] Ch. 239; Elliot, 76 L.Q.R. 100; Hornby, 78 L.Q.R. 288; Matheson, 29 M.L.R. 397; Lee, 85 L.Q.R. 213; Barton, 91 L.Q.R. 236; Meagher and Lehane, 92 L.Q.R. 427; Macnair, 8 Legal Studies 172. The rule does not apply where a promise for the benefit of a third party volunteer is made to a promisee who has provided consideration: Beswick v Beswick [1968] A.C. 58.

<sup>23</sup> Fletcher v Fletcher (1844) 4 Hare 67, 74.

<sup>24</sup> See above pp.651 et seq.

<sup>25</sup> See above, p.657.

<sup>26</sup> s.1(5) of the 1999 Act.

The principle that equity will not aid a volunteer does not apply where an option to buy land is granted by deed but without consideration, or for only a nominal consideration. Such an option is for the present purpose regarded as an offer coupled with a legally binding promise not to revoke<sup>27</sup>; and it may therefore be exercised in spite of an attempt to revoke it. The resulting contract of sale can then be specifically enforced<sup>28</sup>—always assuming that it is supported by substantial consideration. The equitable principle likewise does not affect the validity of a completed gift: it is concerned with the enforceability of gratuitous promises.<sup>29</sup>

(4) Mutuality of remedy

The court will sometimes refuse to order specific performance at the suit of one party if it cannot order it at the suit of the other. Thus a party who undertakes to render personal services or to perform continuous duties cannot get specific performance as the remedy is not available against him<sup>30</sup>; and for the same reason a minor cannot get specific performance.<sup>31</sup> Such cases were explained on the ground that the remedy of specific performance must be mutual; and it was said that this requirement had to be satisfied at the time when the contract was made.<sup>32</sup>

There are, however, many cases in which specific performance can be obtained by a party even though it could not at the time of contracting have been ordered against him. Thus, if A agrees to grant a lease of land to B, who agrees to build on it, B cannot normally be forced to build; but if he actually does build he can get specific performance of A's promise to grant the lease.<sup>33</sup> Specific performance cannot be ordered against a person who sells land which he does not own<sup>34</sup> but if he becomes owner before the purchaser repudiates<sup>35</sup> he can get specific performance.<sup>36</sup> Conversely a vendor with defective title may be ordered to convey for a reduced price although he could not himself have obtained specific performance.<sup>37</sup> It seems that a person of full age can get specific performance of a voidable contract made during minority even though he could have elected to repudiate the contract.<sup>38</sup> And a victim of fraudulent or innocent misrepresentation can get specific performance although he may be entitled to rescind the contract so that it could not be enforced against him.<sup>39</sup>

Such cases show that the requirement of mutuality does not have to be satisfied at the time of contracting; the crucial time is that of the hearing.<sup>40</sup> The rule was reformulated by Buckley L.J. in Price v Strange: the court "will not compel a defendant to perform his obligations specifically if it cannot at the same time ensure that any unperformed

<sup>27</sup> For the nature of an option, see above, p.153, n.74.

<sup>28</sup> Mountford v Scott [1975] Ch. 258.

<sup>29</sup> T Choithram International SA v Pagarani [2001] 1 W.L.R. 1; Pennington v Waine [2002] EWCA Civ 227; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 2075.

<sup>30</sup> Ogden v Fossick (1862) D. F. & J. 426; Blackett v Bates (1865) L.R. 1 Ch.App. 117; cf. Page One Records Ltd v Britton [1968] 1 W.L.R. 157 (injunction). A dictum in Warren v Mendy [1989] 1 W.L.R. 853 at 866 rejects the requirement of mutuality even in this situation (but specific enforcement was refused for reasons discussed on p.1043, below).

<sup>31</sup> Flight v Bolland (1828) 4 Russ. 298; Lumley v Ravenscroft [1895] 1 Q.B. 683.

<sup>32</sup> Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.), pp.219, 386.

<sup>33</sup> Wilkinson v Clements (1872) L.R. 8 Ch.App. 96.

<sup>34</sup> See above, p.1029.

<sup>35</sup> Halkett v Dudley [1907] 1 Ch. 590 at 596; Salisbury v Hatcher (1842) 2 Y. & C.C.C. 54; Cleadon Trust v Davies [1940] 1 Ch. 940.

<sup>36</sup> Hoggart v Scott (1830) 1 Russ. & My. 293; Wylson v Dunn (1887) 34 Ch.D. 569.

<sup>37</sup> Mortlock v Buller (1804) 10 Ves. 292 at 315; Wilson v Wilson (1857) 3 Jur.(N.S.) 810.

<sup>38</sup> Clayton v Ashdown (1714) 9 Vin.Abr. 393 (G.4) 1.

<sup>39</sup> See above, Ch.9, Section 4.

<sup>40</sup> cf. E Johnson & Co (Barbados) Ltd v NSR Ltd [1997] A.C. 400 at 410–411.

obligations of the plaintiff will be specifically performed, unless perhaps damages would be an adequate remedy for any default on the plaintiff's part".<sup>41</sup> The defendant in that case had promised to grant an underlease to the plaintiff who had in return undertaken to execute certain internal and external repairs. It was admitted that the plaintiff's undertakings were not specifically enforceable; and it seems clear that he could not have obtained specific performance of the promise to grant the underlease before any of the repairs had been done. For in that case the only remedy available to the defendant for default on the plaintiff's part might have been in damages, and this might have been inadequate,<sup>42</sup> especially if the plaintiff was of doubtful solvency. But in fact the plaintiff had done the internal repairs and was wrongfully prevented from doing the external ones by the defendant, who later had these done at her own expense. As by the time of the hearing all the repairs had been completed, specific enforcement of the defendant's promise to grant the underlease would not expose her to the risk of having no remedy except damages in the event of the plaintiff's default; and specific performance was ordered on the terms that the plaintiff make an allowance in respect of the repairs done by the defendant. The principle that mutuality is judged by reference to the time of the hearing similarly accounts for the rule that a person who has been induced to enter into a contract by misrepresentation can specifically enforce it against the other; for by seeking this remedy he affirms the contract<sup>43</sup> and so gives the court power to hold him to it. The court has no such power when specific performance is claimed on behalf of a minor: "the act of filing the bill by his next friend cannot bind him".<sup>44</sup>

(5) Specific performance and third parties

Where A promises B to render some performance in favour of C, two problems can arise. The first is whether B can specifically enforce the promise against A; the second is whether C can do so.

(a) CLAIM BY PROMISEE. In Beswick v Beswick<sup>45</sup> A promised B to pay an annuity to C in consideration of B's transferring the goodwill of his business to A. It was held that, although the promise did not give C any right of action, it could be specifically enforced by B's personal representative<sup>46</sup> against A; with the result that A was ordered to make the promised payments to C. Under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999,<sup>47</sup> C is in many such cases entitled in his own right to enforce against A the term in the contract containing the promise in favour of C; and where C takes this course, the need for B to seek specific performance in favour of C will be much reduced. But it will not be altogether eliminated since there may still be situations in which C will not have any such right against A because the legislative requirements for its acquisition have not been <sup>42</sup> cf. National Provincial BS v British Waterways Board [1992] E.G.C.S. 149. If the claimant can be ordered to give additional, satisfactory security, he can obtain an order of specific performance even though he has not yet performed and is not ordered immediately to do so: Langen & Wind Ltd v Bell [1972] Ch. 685.

<sup>41</sup> [1978] Ch. 337 at 367–368; adopting Ames, 3 Col.L.Rev. 1. cf. Lysus v Prowse Developments Ltd [1982] 1 W.L.R. 1044, at 1053; Rainbow Estates Ltd v Tokenhold Ltd [1999] Ch. 64 at 69, 76. See also Sutton v Sutton [1984] Ch. 184 where the argument of lack of mutuality was rejected because one of the claimant's promises had been performed, even though another was not binding. Specific performance was refused on grounds of public policy, above, p.447.

<sup>43</sup> See above, p.383.

<sup>44</sup> Flight v Bolland, above, at p.301.

<sup>45</sup> [1968] A.C. 58; above, p.589.

<sup>46</sup> Who happened to be C.

<sup>47</sup> See above, pp.651 et seq.

satisfied.<sup>48</sup> The Act also expressly preserves B's right to enforce any term of the contract against A even where C has acquired a right of enforcement against A.<sup>49</sup> The scope of B's remedy by way of specific performance therefore still calls for discussion.

In holding that this remedy was available to B, the House of Lords in Beswick v Beswick stressed three points: that B's remedy at law was inadequate as the damages which he could recover would be purely nominal<sup>50</sup>; that A had received the entire consideration for his promise as the business had been transferred to him<sup>51</sup>; and that the contract could have been specifically enforced by A, if B had failed to perform his promise to transfer the business.<sup>52</sup> It is also relevant to the issue of specific enforceability that A's promise, being one to pay an annuity, was of a kind which would have been specifically enforceable if it had been made to B for his own benefit<sup>53</sup>; and that, if the promise had been in these terms, none of the grounds for refusing specific performance which have been discussed in this Chapter would have applied.

It does not, however, follow from Beswick v Beswick that specific performance in favour of a third party will be granted to the promisee only if the circumstances are such that the remedy would have been available in a two-party case. Thus it seems that specific performance could be ordered of a promise to pay a single lump sum to a third party,<sup>54</sup> though in a two-party case such an obligation would more appropriately<sup>55</sup> be enforceable by a common law action for the agreed sum. Again, it seems that specific performance in favour of a third party would not be excluded merely because substantial damages, constituting an "adequate" remedy, were available to the promisee. As Lord Pearce<sup>56</sup> said in Beswick v Beswick, such damages "would be a less appropriate remedy since the parties to the agreement were intending an annuity . . . ; and a lump sum of damages does not accord with this".<sup>57</sup> On the other hand specific performance will obviously not be ordered in favour of B where A contracts with B to render personal services to C, for the policy of the rule against the specific enforcement of service contracts applies no less where the services are to be rendered to a third party than where they are to be rendered to the promisee. Again, A may contract with B to pay C £10,000 immediately in return for B's promise to serve A for one year. If A repudiates before B has performed the service, B's claim for specific performance in favour of C should probably be refused on the ground that the grant of the remedy would offend the mutuality requirement<sup>58</sup>: A would have no security for the performance of B's promise to serve except a common law action for damages.

The above examples show that specific performance should not be granted to the promisee merely because the contract provides for performance in favour of a third party, nor refused merely because it would not have been ordered had there been no third party in the case. As a general principle, it is submitted that specific performance

<sup>48</sup> e.g. because of the requirements of subsections 1(1) and (2) are not satisfied; see above p.654 for the question whether they would be satisfied on the facts of Beswick v Beswick, above.

<sup>49</sup> s.4 of the 1998 Act.

<sup>50</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 73, 81, 83, 102. Nor did B have any other more satisfactory remedy at law, e.g. he could not have sued for the amount to be paid to C, or for the return of the goodwill (above, p.591). For the question of whether B could recover damages in respect of C's loss, see above, p.599.

<sup>51</sup> [1968] A.C. at 83, 89, 97, 102; cf. above, p.1022.

<sup>52</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 89, 97.

<sup>53</sup> See above, p.1021.

<sup>54</sup> As in Gurtner v Circuit [1968] 2 Q.B. 587 (as to which see above, p.1036, n.21).

<sup>55</sup> See above, p.955.

<sup>56</sup> Who thought that the damages in Beswick v Beswick would be substantial: [1968] A.C. 58 at 88.

<sup>57</sup> [1968] A.C. 58 at 88; cf. ibid. at 102 and the citation at 90–91 with approval of a dictum of Windeyer J. in Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd [1967] A.L.R. 385 at 412.

<sup>58</sup> See above, pp.1037–1038.

in favour of a third party should prima facie be available to the promisee when it is the most appropriate remedy for the enforcement of the contract. But it should be open to the defendant to resist specific enforcement by showing that this remedy would lead to one of the undesirable results against which the established limitations on the scope of the remedy are meant to provide protection.

(b) CLAIM BY THIRD PARTY. Under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, C is in many cases entitled in his own right to enforce against A the term in the contract between A and B containing A's promise in favour of C.<sup>59</sup> The Act expressly lists specific performance as one of the remedies available to C where it would have been available to him "if he had been a party to the contract"; and it states that the rules relating to specific performance "shall apply accordingly".<sup>60</sup> Some such rules will apply to a claim by C in the same way as they apply to one by B: e.g., if A's promise is one to render personal service to C, it will not be specifically enforceable at the suit of either B or C. Other rules will obviously apply with some modification: e.g., if A promises B to pay a lump sum to C, then the most appropriate remedy for B might be specific performance in equity, while for C it would be a common law action for the agreed sum. The application to claims by C of the limitations on the scope of specific performance will need to be worked out on a case by case basis in the light of the policies which have given rise to these limitations in two-party cases.

2. Injunction

(1) General

Where a contract is negative in nature, or contains a negative stipulation, breach of it may be restrained by injunction. In such cases, an injunction is normally granted as a matter of course; though, since it is an equitable (and thus in principle a discretionary) remedy, it may be refused on the ground that its award would cause such "particular hardship"<sup>61</sup> to the defendant as to be oppressive to him.<sup>62</sup> An injunction would not be "oppressive" merely because observance of the contract was burdensome to the defendant<sup>63</sup> or because its breach would cause little or no prejudice to the claimant<sup>64</sup>; for in deciding whether to restrain breach of a negative stipulation, the court is not normally concerned with "the balance of convenience or inconvenience".<sup>65</sup> This rule, however, applies only to a prohibitory injunction restraining a defendant from future breaches. Where the breach lies entirely in the past (e.g. where the defendant has fenced land that he had covenanted to leave open), the claimant may seek a mandatory injunction, ordering the breach to be undone. Such an order is subject to a "balance of convenience" test and may therefore be refused if the prejudice suffered by the defendant in having to restore the original position heavily outweighs the advantage that will be derived from

<sup>59</sup> See above, pp.651 et seq.

<sup>60</sup> s.1(5) of the 1999 Act.

<sup>61</sup> Insurance Co v Lloyd's Syndicate [1995] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 273 at 276 (where there was no such hardship); cf. above, p.1026.

<sup>62</sup> See below, pp.1041–1042.

<sup>63</sup> cf. above, p.1027.

<sup>64</sup> Kemp v. Sober (1851) 1 Sim. (N.S.) 517; Tipping v Eckersley (1855) 2 K. & J. 264; Marco Productions Ltd v Pagola [1945] K.B. 111; Hollier & Co v Stocks [2000] U.K.C.L.R. 685.

<sup>65</sup> Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App.Cas. 709 at 720; cf. Warner Bros Pictures Inc v Nelson [1937] 1 K.B. 209 at 217 and (in tort) Kennaway v Thompson [1981] Q.B. 88; Attorney-General v Barker [1990] 3 All E.R. 257 at 262.

such restoration by the claimant.<sup>66</sup> In applying the “balance of convenience” test, the court will also take the nature of the breach into account. Thus where the defendant in breach of a restrictive covenant erected a building so as to block the claimant’s sea view, a mandatory injunction was granted as the breach had been committed deliberately, with full knowledge of the claimant’s rights, and as damages would not be an adequate remedy.<sup>67</sup>

The “balance of convenience” test also applies to interim injunctions,<sup>68</sup> (except where there is “a plain and uncontested breach of a clear covenant not to do a particular thing”<sup>69</sup>). If, for example, the grant of an interim injunction would amount in substance to a final resolution of the dispute between the parties, the court will, in considering a claim for interim relief, take into account the likelihood of the claimant’s success at the eventual trial.<sup>70</sup> The court can also take into account the financial prejudice which would be likely to be suffered either by the claimant if the injunction were refused,<sup>71</sup> or by the defendant if it were granted,<sup>72</sup> and if at the trial the dispute were resolved in that party’s favour. An award of damages to that party might then be an “inadequate” remedy for reasons discussed earlier in this Chapter<sup>73</sup>: e.g. because there was an appreciable risk of the other party’s not being able to pay the amount of the award.

We shall see later in this Chapter that the court has power, by statute, to award damages in lieu of specific performance or injunction.<sup>74</sup> This power is likely to be exercised if the injury to the claimant is small, if it can readily be estimated in money, if compensation in money would adequately compensate the claimant, and if the grant of an injunction would be oppressive to the defendant.<sup>75</sup> These conditions were satisfied, and an injunction was refused, in Jaggard v Sawyer,<sup>76</sup> where the defendants had built a house on land which could be reached only by committing a breach of covenant and a trespass against neighbouring house-owners, including the plaintiff. An injunction

<sup>66</sup> Sharp v Harrison [1922] 1 Ch. 502; Shepherd Homes Ltd v Sandham [1971] Ch. 340; for subsequent proceedings, see [1971] 1 W.L.R. 1062; Sutton Housing Trust v Lawrence (1988) 55 P. & C.R. 320 (mandatory and prohibitory injunction); Reed v Madon [1989] Ch. 408; cf. Newport Association Football Club v Football Association of Wales [1995] 2 All E.R. 87 at 97 (injunction “mandatory in effect”).

<sup>67</sup> Wakeham v Wood (1982) 43 P. & C.R. 40; Chelsea v Muscut [1990] 2 E.G.I.R. 48.

<sup>68</sup> Texaco Ltd v Mulberry Filling Station Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 814; Evans Marshall & Co v Bertola [1973] 1 W.L.R. 439; Clifford Davis Management Ltd v WEA Records Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 61; Mike Trading & Transport Ltd v R. Pagnan & Fratelli [1980] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 546; The Sea Hawk [1986] 1 W.L.R. 657; Kerr v Morris [1987] Ch. 90 at 112; Films Rover International v Cannon Film Sales Ltd [1987] 1 W.L.R. 670 (for further proceedings, see [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912); Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 588; Provident Financial Group plc v Hayward [1989] I.C.R. 160; Lock International plc v Beswick [1989] 1 W.L.R. 1268; GFI Group Inc. v Eaglestone, [1994] I.R.L.R. 119; Series 5 Software v Clarke [1996] 1 All E.R. 853; Tate & Lyle Industries v Cia. Usina Bulhoes [1997] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 355; Channel Tunnel Group Ltd v Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd [1993] A.C. 334. For the general principles governing such injunctions, see American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon [1975] A.C. 396; Fellows v Fisher [1976] Q.B. 122; Lawrence David Ltd v Ashton [1989] I.C.R. 123.

<sup>69</sup> Hampstead and Suburban Properties Ltd v Diomedous [1969] 1 Ch. 248 at 259; cf. Attorney-General v Barker [1990] 3 All E.R. 257.

<sup>70</sup> Cambridge Nutrition Ltd v BBC [1990] 3 All E.R. 523; Lansing Linde Ltd v Kerr [1991] 1 W.L.R. 251, at 258; Imutran v Uncaged Campaigns Ltd [2001] 2 All E.R. 385.

<sup>71</sup> Themelup Ltd v West [1996] Q.B. 84, doubted on another point in Group Josi Re v Walbrook Ins Co Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 1152 at 1162.

<sup>72</sup> Cambridge Nutrition Ltd v BBC [1990] 3 All E.R. 523.

<sup>73</sup> See above, p.1022 at n.60.

<sup>74</sup> See below, p.1046.

<sup>75</sup> Sheffer v City of London Electric Lighting Co [1895] 1 Ch. 287 at 322–323 (a tort case). The requirements stated above do not apply where it is the defendant who claims that specific relief is the more appropriate remedy since in such a case the grant of the injunction cannot be oppressive to him: Marcic v Thames Water Utilities (No.2) [2001] 4 All E.R. 327.

<sup>76</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269.

restraining such access would have rendered the new house "landlocked and incapable of beneficial ownership"<sup>77</sup>; and this would have been oppressive as the defendants had acted "openly and in good faith",<sup>78</sup> and not "in blatant . . . disregard of the plaintiff's rights"<sup>79</sup> in building the house. The test is once again<sup>80</sup> one of oppression rather than one of balance of convenience: if the plaintiff had sought interlocutory relief before the house had been built, she "would almost certainly have obtained it".<sup>81</sup>

An injunction will not be granted to restrain breach of a restrictive covenant affecting land against a body which has acquired the land under statutory powers where the legislation has provided an exclusive remedy by way of statutory compensation.<sup>82</sup>

(2) No indirect specific performance

An injunction will not be granted if its effect is directly or indirectly to compel the defendant to do acts which he could not have been ordered to do by an order of specific performance. Thus an employee cannot be restrained from committing a breach of his positive obligation to work, for that would amount to specific enforcement of a contract of service.<sup>83</sup> Nor can an employer generally<sup>84</sup> be restrained from dismissing his employee in breach of contract.<sup>85</sup>

(a) EXPRESS NEGATIVE PROMISES. A contract of employment may contain negative promises which can be enforced by injunction without indirectly compelling the employee to work, or the employer to employ.<sup>86</sup> Covenants in restraint of trade contained in such contracts are commonly enforced by injunction: this does not compel the employee to work for the employer, as such covenants generally begin to operate after the period of service is over. But some negative stipulations are expressed to operate during that period. These may be enforceable by injunction if the injunction merely provides an inducement to perform the positive obligation, but not if it in effect compels the employee to do the agreed work.

Thus in Lumley v Wagner<sup>87</sup> Mlle Wagner undertook that for three months she would sing at Mr Lumley's theatre in Drury Lane on two nights a week and that during those three months she would not use her talents at any other theatre without Mr Lumley's written consent. She then agreed, for a larger payment, to sing for Mr Gye at Covent Garden, and to abandon her agreement with Mr Lumley. Lord St Leonards granted Mr Lumley an injunction to restrain her from singing for Mr Gye. Similarly, a manufacturer can be restrained from breach of a "sole distributorship" agreement, in the sense that he can be prevented from engaging a different distributor, even though the court might not order him specifically to perform the positive part of the contract to

<sup>77</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269 at 288.

<sup>78</sup> ibid. at 289.

<sup>79</sup> ibid. at 283.

<sup>80</sup> cf. above, p.1040 after n.62.

<sup>81</sup> [1995] 1 W.L.R. at 289; cf. p.283; and see the similar case of Gafford v Graham (1998) 76 P. & C.R. 118.

<sup>82</sup> Brown v Heathlands Mental Health NHS Trust [1996] 1 All E.R. 133.

<sup>83</sup> Whitwood Chemical Co v Hardman [1891] 2 Ch. 416; cf. above, p.1029.

<sup>84</sup> For an exception to the general rule, see Hill v CA Parsons & Co Ltd [1972] 1 Ch. 305; above, p.1031.

<sup>85</sup> Chappell v Times Newspapers Ltd [1975] 1 W.L.R. 482; Hepple [1975] C.L.J. 212; cf. City & Hackney Health Authority v NUPE [1985] I.R.L.R. 252; Alexander v Standard Telephone and Cables Ltd [1990] I.C.R. 291.

<sup>86</sup> cf. Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 W.L.R. 349.

<sup>87</sup> (1852) 1 D.M. & G. 604.

keep up the original distributor's supplies.<sup>88</sup> But a promise by an employee not to work in any capacity except for the employer<sup>89</sup> cannot be enforced by injunction since the effect of the injunction would be "to drive the defendant either to starvation or to specific performance of the positive covenants"<sup>90</sup> to work.

Lumley v Wagner has been much criticised,<sup>91</sup> particularly in relation to contracts of employment. An injunction may put so much economic pressure on the employee as in effect to force him to perform the positive part of the contract. In Warner Bros Pictures Inc v Nelson<sup>92</sup> a film actress agreed to act for the claimants for a period of time during which she undertook not to act for anyone else without the claimants' written consent. She was restrained by injunction from breaking this undertaking; and it was said that this would not force her to act for the claimants as she could earn a living by doing other work. But it might be quite unreasonable to expect her to do this; and more recent cases support the view that an injunction should not be granted except where it leaves the employee with some other reasonable means of earning a living. They have arisen where professional entertainers or athletes have entered into long-term exclusive contracts with managers, in whom they then lost confidence. It has been held that the managers could not obtain injunctions either against their clients,<sup>93</sup> or against third parties with whom those clients had entered into substitute management contracts,<sup>94</sup> if the effect of the injunction would "as a practical matter"<sup>95</sup> be to force the clients to make use of the services of the original manager; and this would commonly be the case since such persons cannot successfully work without a manager.

An injunction, in cases of this kind, will always put some pressure on the defendant to perform his positive obligation to render the agreed services; and the view that this factor is, of itself, a ground for refusing to grant the injunction<sup>96</sup> is, with respect, hard to reconcile with the reasoning of Lumley v Wagner.<sup>97</sup> The crucial question, in these cases, is whether the injunction would put undue pressure on an employee to perform his positive obligation to work; and this question can give rise to difficult issues of fact and degree. In one case<sup>98</sup> a newspaper reporter undertook during the term of his contract not

<sup>88</sup> Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361; Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 W.L.R. 349 (for subsequent proceedings, see [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 17). So far as contra, Wake v Renault (UK) Ltd, The Times, August 1, 1996, is, with respect, open to question; the authority of the decision is also undermined to the extent that it was based on that of the Court of Appeal in Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd, which was later reversed by the House of Lords: [1998] A.C. 1, above, pp.1033–1034. Reg.7(2) of the Commercial Agents (Council Directive) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/3053) (above p.709) entitle a "commercial agent" to commission in certain cases of breach of a sole agency agreement but the Regulations say nothing about enforceability by injunction.

<sup>89</sup> Ehrman v Bartholomew [1898] 1 Ch. 671.

<sup>90</sup> Warner Bros Pictures Inc v Nelson [1937] 1 K.B. 209 at 216.

<sup>91</sup> Stevens, 6 Cornell L.Q. 235; Ashley, 6 Col.L.Rev. 82; Clark, 17 Col.L.Rev. 687; and see below, n.94.

<sup>92</sup> [1937] 1 K.B. 209.

<sup>93</sup> Page One Records Ltd v Britton [1968] 1 W.L.R. 157.

<sup>94</sup> Warren v Mendy [1989] 1 W.L.R. 853, citing criticism of Warner Bros Inc v Nelson (above, n.90) in Nichols Advance Vehicle Systems Inc v De Angelis (1979, unrep.); McLean [1990] C.I.J. 15.

<sup>95</sup> Page One Records Ltd v Britton [1968] 1 W.L.R. 157 at 166. Lumley v Wagner was distinguished at 165 on the ground that Mr Lumley had no obligation except to pay money; but in fact he also made certain promises which were negative in substance: e.g. that certain parts were to "belong exclusively" to Mlle Wagner.

<sup>96</sup> Young v Robson Rhodes [1999] 3 All E.R. 524 at 534 ("to coerce the defendants . . .").

<sup>97</sup> (1852) 1 D.M. & G 694. Lumley v Wagner was cited by counsel, but not referred to in the judgment, in Young v Robson Rhodes, above. It seems that the defendant in the former case was not in fact "coerced" into performing her positive obligation to sing at the claimant's theatre: see Waddams, 117 L.Q.R. 431 at 440. The two cases may be distinguishable on the ground that there was no express negative covenant in Young v Robson Rhodes, above.

<sup>98</sup> Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] 1 C.R. 588.

to work for others; the contract provided for termination by twelve months' notice. The reporter gave only two months' notice of termination, and it was held that he could be restrained by injunction from breach of the negative stipulation. This was said not to subject him to undue pressure since the employers had undertaken to go on paying him, to allow him to go on working for them for the rest of the contract period, and not to claim damages if he should choose simply to draw his pay without doing such work. But the position might have been different if the employers had merely undertaken to go on paying him, without allowing him to work. In such cases, the court can balance the employee's interest in continuing to work (so as to maintain his skill and reputation) against any prejudice likely to be suffered by the employer if the employee works for a third party; and, where the remedy is discretionary,<sup>99</sup> the court may refuse to grant the injunction if it is satisfied that breach of the negative stipulation will not seriously prejudice the employer.<sup>1</sup> A fortiori, such relief will be denied to the employer where his refusal to allow the employee to work amounts to a breach of the contract of employment on the employer's part.<sup>2</sup>

(b) RESTRAINT OF TRADE. A further danger of the rule in Lumley v Wagner<sup>3</sup> is that the injunction may help to stifle competition. It is arguable that this was the purpose of the negative stipulation, and the effect of the injunction, in the leading case itself; for it might have been physically possible for Mlle Wagner to sing at Drury Lane for two nights a week and to sing elsewhere on other nights. Yet the question whether the contract was invalid for restraint of trade was not discussed at all. It used to be thought that this question arose only where the relevant contractual provisions came into effect after the period of employment. A possible reason for this view is that, where the period of employment is fairly short (as in Lumley v Wagner), the negative stipulation is reasonable (and therefore valid<sup>4</sup>) because of its limited duration.<sup>5</sup> But this reasoning loses much of its force where the employer has options to extend the term of service, sometimes for very long periods<sup>6</sup> or where long periods of notice have to be given to terminate the contract.<sup>7</sup> The present position is that stipulations which operate during employment (no less than those which operate thereafter) can sometimes have their validity tested under the restraint of trade doctrine<sup>8</sup>; but even where their validity is not subject to these tests, the remedy of injunction is likely to be granted only where these tests are satisfied.<sup>9</sup> If this were not so, the law as to restraint of trade could, to a considerable extent, be evaded by simply giving the employer options to extend the period of service or by requiring long periods of notice for the termination of the

<sup>99</sup> See above, p.1041 at n.66. cf. Delaney v Staples [1992] 1 A.C. 692–693 and William Hill Organisation Ltd v Tucker [1998] I.R.L.R. 313, discussing so-called “garden leave.”

<sup>1</sup> Provident Financial Group plc v Hayward [1989] I.C.R. 160.

<sup>2</sup> William Hill Organisation Ltd v Tucker [1998] I.R.L.R. 313; above, pp.833–834.

<sup>3</sup> (1852) 1 D.M. & G. 604.

<sup>4</sup> See above, pp.460, 464.

<sup>5</sup> Though in Lumley v Wagner it was unlimited as to area; cf. Evening Standard v Henderson [1987] I.C.R. 588.

<sup>6</sup> As in Warner Bros Pictures Inc v Nelson [1937] 1 K.B. 209; cf. the contract in Riley v Cogan [1967] 1 W.L.R. 1300, where a rugby league player agreed to serve his club “for the remainder of his football career . . . if the club should so long require.” Contrast Eastham v Newcastle United Football Club Ltd [1964] Ch. 413, where the argument that the contract gave the employers a series of options was rejected.

<sup>7</sup> e.g. in cases of “garden leave” (above, p.833).

<sup>8</sup> Esso Petroleum Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] A.C. 269 at 294, 328–329, discussing Young v Timmins (1831) 1 Cr. & J. 331; A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 W.L.R. 1308; cf. Restatement, Contracts, s.380(2), where illustration 1 reproduces Lumley v Wagner while the next illustration reproduces the Nordenfelt case (above, p.453).

<sup>9</sup> William Hill Organisation Ltd v Tucker [1998] I.R.L.R. 313; Symbian Ltd v Christensen [2001] I.R.L.R. 77 at [52].

contract.<sup>10</sup> A converse suggestion may also be made. Even where a covenant in restraint of trade takes effect after the period of service and is valid, it may be appropriate not to enforce it by injunction (but only by action for damages) if the injunction would leave the employee with no other reasonable means of making a living: the grant of an injunction in such circumstances might well be regarded as oppressive.<sup>11</sup>

(c) IMPLIED NEGATIVE PROMISES. An injunction to restrain the breach by an employee of a stipulation in a contract of employment will be issued only if the contract contains an express negative promise.<sup>12</sup> The remedy has been restricted in this way because an injunction may put so much economic pressure on the employee as in effect to force him to perform his positive obligation to work; and this is traditionally regarded as undesirable.<sup>13</sup> But where the defendant's obligation is not one to render personal services, there is less objection to an injunction which puts pressure on him to perform his positive undertaking, even though that undertaking may not be specifically enforceable; and in cases of this kind the courts have implied negative stipulations and restrained their breach by injunction. Thus an injunction can be issued to restrain a shipowner from using a ship under charter inconsistently with the charterparty<sup>14</sup>; to restrain breach of a promise to give a "first refusal" to purchase land<sup>15</sup>; and to restrain breaches of various exclusive dealing agreements,<sup>16</sup> and of agreements to submit disputes to arbitration.<sup>17</sup> Similarly, a seller of uncut timber has been restrained from interfering with the contractual right of the buyer to enter the land to cut down the timber and take it away: this was "not specific performance in the sense of compelling the vendor to do anything. It merely prevents him from breaking his contract".<sup>18</sup>

In the above cases, a negative stipulation, though not express, can readily be implied. The position would be different where the vagueness of the positive part of the contract made it impossible to say precisely what the defendant had undertaken not to do<sup>19</sup>; and also where the only negative stipulation which could be implied was one that would embrace the whole positive obligation. For example, if a contract were made for the sale of unascertained generic goods (such as "100 tons of coal") an injunction "not to break the contract" or "not to withhold delivery" would be indistinguishable from an order of <sup>10</sup> It is no answer to an attack on the validity of the clause say that the employee may get paid since (a) he will not be entitled to any payment if he refuses to work for the employer, unless the contract expressly so provides; and (b) the mere fact that he gets paid does not oust the principles of restraint of trade: cf. Wyatt v Kreglinger and Fernau [1933] 1 K.B. 793. If the covenant is valid, the fact that the employee goes on working and gets paid is relevant to the employer's remedy: above, p.1043 at n.98 and above p.1044 at n.99.

<sup>11</sup> cf. above, pp.1041–1042.

<sup>12</sup> Mortimer v Beckett [1920] 1 Ch. 571; but breaches of negative obligations imposed by law can be restrained by injunction even though there is no express negative stipulation: e.g. Hivac v Park Royal Scientific Instruments [1946] Ch. 169.

<sup>13</sup> See above, p.1029.

<sup>14</sup> Sevin v Deslandes (1860) 30 L.J. (Ch.) 457; The Oakworth [1975] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 581.

<sup>15</sup> Manchester Ship Canal v Manchester Racecourse Co [1901] 2 Ch. 37.

<sup>16</sup> Donnell v Bennett (1883) 22 Ch.D. 835; Metropolitan Electric Supply Co v Ginder [1901] 2 Ch. 799; Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 W.L.R. 361; Evans Marshall & Co v Bertola SA [1973] 1 W.L.R. 349. Fothergill v Rowland (1873) L.R. 17 Eq. 132, contra, is surprising in view of the reluctance with which Jessel M.R. decided for the defendants. As to the validity of exclusive dealing agreements, see above, pp.468–472.

<sup>17</sup> Bankers Trust Co v PT Jakarta International Development [1999] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 910 at 911 (injunction against proceedings in foreign court; in respect of English proceedings, the remedy would be by way of a stay: above, p.447).

<sup>18</sup> Jones & Sons Ltd v Tankerville [1909] 2 Ch. 400 at 443; cf. Hounslow (London Borough) v Twickenham Garden and Builders Ltd [1971] Ch. 233; above, p.1035, n.9.

<sup>19</sup> Bower v Bantam Investments Ltd [1972] 1 W.L.R. 1120.

specific performance,<sup>20</sup> and would not normally<sup>21</sup> be granted. And the implication of a narrower negative stipulation (e.g. not to sell to anyone else) would not fairly arise from the contract.

(d) SEVERANCE. A negative stipulation which is too widely expressed may be severed and enforced in part. Severance is not here governed by the rules which govern severance of promises in illegal contracts<sup>22</sup>; the question is not (as it is in the restraint of trade cases) whether severance alters the nature of the contract, but simply whether an injunction to enforce such part of the negative stipulation as the claimant specifies amounts to indirect specific performance. Thus in Warner Bros Pictures Inc v Nelson<sup>23</sup> the actress undertook, not only that she would not act for third parties, but also that she would not “engage in any other occupation” without the employers’ written consent. She could clearly not be restrained from breach of the latter undertaking as this would force her to choose between idleness and performance of her obligation to work. But as the injunction sought was only one to restrain her from acting for third parties the objection that the whole of her undertaking could not be enforced by injunction was “removed by the restricted form in which the injunction is sought”.<sup>24</sup> Of course if the negative stipulation, though operating during employment, is as a whole invalid for restraint of trade, the question of severance will be determined by the principles governing severance of illegal promises in illegal contracts.

3. Damages and Specific Performance or Injunction<sup>25</sup>

Power to award damages in addition to or “in substitution for . . . specific performance” was conferred on the Court of Chancery by s.2 of the Chancery Amendment Act 1858 (also known as Lord Cairns’ Act). That power is now vested in the High Court by s.50 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. It applies where the court has “jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction or specific performance”. So long as the court has such jurisdiction,<sup>26</sup> it can award damages in lieu even though, in its discretion, it refuses to order specific relief.<sup>27</sup> But it cannot do so where no attempt is made to seek specific relief, where any chance of obtaining such relief has been lost (e.g. by lapse of time) and where the only claim made was one for damages at common law.<sup>28</sup> Under s.49 of the Act, common law damages can also be awarded where specific performance or an injunction

<sup>20</sup> cf. Fry, Specific Performance (6th ed.), s.857; Whitwood Chemical Co v Hardman [1891] 2 Ch. 416 at 426. The Scaptrade [1983] A.C. 694 at 701. The granting in Wake v Renault (UK) Ltd, The Times, August 1, 1996 of an injunction “not to terminate” a distributorship agreement for some years is, with respect, open to question as it amounted to specific enforcement of an obligation of which specific performance would not normally be ordered since such an order would require “constant supervision” (above, p.1032); see also above, p.1043, n.88.

<sup>21</sup> For exceptions, see above, p.1024.

<sup>22</sup> See above, pp.506–510.

<sup>23</sup> [1937] 1 K.B. 209.

<sup>24</sup> ibid. at 219; see above, p.1043 for the question whether an injunction in even these limited terms should be granted, cf. William Robinson & Co Ltd v Hever [1898] 2 Ch. 451; Provident Financial Group plc v Hayward [1989] 1 C.L.R. 150 at 160; Symbian Ltd v Christensen [2001] 1 R.L.R. 77. Where the contract is illegal, e.g. for restraint of trade, the objection that an unseverable restraint is too wide cannot be met by claiming part-enforcement: contrast Warner Bros. Pictures Inc v Nelson with Gledhow Autoparts Ltd v Delaney [1965] 1 W.L.R. 1366.

<sup>25</sup> Jolowicz [1975] C.L.J. 224; Pettit [1977] C.L.J. 369; [1978] C.L.J. 51.

<sup>26</sup> Hipgrave v Case (1885) 28 Ch.D. 356; Lavery v Pursell (1888) 39 Ch.D. 508; Price v Strange [1978] Ch. 337 at 359.

<sup>27</sup> e.g. Wroth v Tyler [1974] Ch. 30; above, p.1026, n.10; Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269. cf., in tort, Marcic v Thames Water Utilities (No.2) [2001] 4 All E.R. 327.

<sup>28</sup> Surrey CC v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361. For conflicting views on the correctness of this case, see Attorney-General v Blake [2001] 1 A.C. 268 at 283, 291 and 298.

is claimed, even though the case is not one in which specific relief could have been ordered.<sup>29</sup>

Since claims for damages can now be combined with claims for specific performance or injunction,<sup>30</sup> it is normally unnecessary to resort to the special power to award damages in lieu of these remedies. But it may sometimes be to the claimant's advantage to invoke that power where he has no completed cause of action at law, and its exercise has also given rise to certain special problems with regard to the assessment of damages.

(1) No completed cause of action at law

Damages may be awarded in lieu of specific performance or injunction even though there is no completed cause of action at law. For example a court can issue an injunction in respect of a threatened tort which has not yet been committed; and damages can be awarded in lieu of such an injunction.<sup>31</sup> A similar possibility exists where an anticipatory breach of contract has been committed and not been accepted. In such a case, an order for specific performance may be made at once<sup>32</sup>; and damages can be awarded in lieu under the Act even though there was (when the proceedings were commenced) no right to damages at common law.<sup>33</sup> However, a party is not in anticipatory breach of contract merely because the other fears that he will commit a breach of it; and where there is neither a present breach nor a wrongful repudiation, an injunction is not available against the former party,<sup>34</sup> so that there can be no award of damages in lieu. Again, an injunction is sometimes available against a refusal to contract; and it may be that damages can be awarded in lieu even though the refusal gives rise to no cause of action at common law.<sup>35</sup> An injunction may also be available to a third party where a contract between two others is in restraint of trade<sup>36</sup>; and in such cases it is arguable that damages may be awarded in lieu even though the third party has no cause of action for breach of contract against the parties to the contract in question.<sup>37</sup>

(2) Assessment of damages

There was formerly some support for the view that the assessment of damages might be more favourable to the claimant under Lord Cairns' Act than at common law, particularly where the value of the subject-matter had risen between the time of breach and the time of judgment. It was assumed that, at common law, damages were necessarily

<sup>29</sup> As in Dominion Coal Co Ltd v Dominion Iron & Steel Co [1909] A.C. 293; cf. Proctor v Bayley (1889) 42 Ch.D. 390.

<sup>30</sup> This follows from Supreme Court Act 1981, s.49.

<sup>31</sup> Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd v Slack [1924] A.C. 851.

<sup>32</sup> Hasham v Zenab [1960] A.C. 316 (but the order will be for performance on the due day).

<sup>33</sup> cf. Oakacre Ltd v Claire Cleaners (Holdings) Ltd [1982] Ch. 197.

<sup>34</sup> The Veracruz I [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 356; The P [1992] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 470; cf. Zucker v Tyndall Holdings plc [1992] 1 W.L.R. 1127; and see Mercantile Group (Europe) AG v Aiyela [1994] Q.B. 366 at 375.

<sup>35</sup> See above, p.4; Garden Cottage Foods Ltd v Milk Marketing Board [1984] A.C. 130 (where the right to damages was said at 141 to be based on breach of statutory duty); where the refusal is wrongful by statute, the right to damages will often be regulated by that statute, e.g. Sex Discrimination Act 1975, ss.65, 66; Race Relations Act 1976, ss.56, 57, as amended by Race Relations (Remedies) Act, 1994; Disability Discrimination Act 1995, ss.4, 5, 12 and 19.

<sup>36</sup> See above, p.466.

<sup>37</sup> According to Nemport Association Football Club v Football Association of Wales Ltd [1995] 2 All E.R. 87, the mere availability to the third party of a declaration that the contract is in restraint of trade is a cause of action; for difficulties arising from this reasoning, see above, p.467.

based on the difference between the contract price and the value of the subject-matter at the time of breach. In Wroth v Tyler<sup>38</sup> one reason given for nevertheless assessing the damages by reference to the time of judgment<sup>39</sup> was that they were awarded, not at common law, but under the Act, “in substitution for . . . specific performance”. Such damages must, it was said, “constitute a true substitute for specific performance”,<sup>40</sup> and give “as nearly as may be what specific performance would have given”.<sup>41</sup> But even at common law the aim of damages is to put the claimant “in the same position . . . as if the contract had been performed”<sup>42</sup>; and it is hard to see any difference in principle between the two phrases “as if . . . performed” and “in substitution for . . . specific performance”. Both state the same general objective; neither is followed through to its logical conclusion. The judgment in Wroth v Tyler itself seems to recognise the possibility that part of the claimant’s loss would have been irrecoverable if it had been too remote<sup>43</sup>; and the mitigation rules can also reduce the amount recoverable as damages in lieu of specific performance.<sup>44</sup> In Johnson v Agnew<sup>45</sup> the House of Lords accordingly expressed the view that the assessment of damages was governed by the same principles whether the damages were awarded at common law or in lieu of specific performance. Even at common law, damages are not invariably assessed by reference to the date of breach. This method of assessment is adopted where it would have been reasonable for the claimant, at that date, to have mitigated his loss, e.g. by making a substitute contract; but if, for some reason, this is not the case, the damages will be assessed by reference to some other date.<sup>46</sup> In Wroth v Tyler the claimants were not at the time of breach in a position to make a substitute contract; and, so far as the assessment of damages is concerned, the decision must now be explained on that ground.<sup>47</sup>

The general principle that there is no difference between the assessment of damages at common law and damages in lieu of specific performance is based on the assumption that the damages are claimed in respect of the same breach or cause of action. The principle obviously cannot apply where there is no cause of action at common law: e.g. where equitable relief is sought in respect of threatened future breaches.<sup>48</sup>

(3) Damages and specific performance

Damages may be awarded in addition to specific performance. For example, where a vendor is in breach because his title is subject to an encumbrance, the purchaser can get specific performance ordering the vendor to convey what title he has, plus damages

<sup>38</sup> [1974] Ch. 30; above, p.961, and see Grant v Dawkins [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1406; Pettit, 90 L.Q.R. 297.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.895.

<sup>40</sup> [1974] Ch. 30 at 58.

<sup>41</sup> ibid. at 59.

<sup>42</sup> Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex. 850 at 855; above, p.937.

<sup>43</sup> See above, p.972.

<sup>44</sup> See Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 W.L.R. 1262 at 1286; Malhotra v Choudhury [1980] Ch. 52; the point was, in effect, conceded in Grant v Dawkins, above.

<sup>45</sup> [1980] A.C. 367 at 400. This decision also makes it hard to accept the suggestion that damages under the Act can, as a general rule be based on the defendant’s gain (rather than, as at common law, on the claimant’s loss): see Surrey CC v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 W.L.R. 1361; Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269. For other grounds for basing an award on the defendant’s gain and for criticism of the Bredero case, see above, p.930.

<sup>46</sup> [1980] A.C. at 401; above, pp.959–962.

<sup>47</sup> See above, p.961.

<sup>48</sup> Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 W.L.R. 269 at 291–292.

based on the cost of discharging the encumbrance.<sup>49</sup> The court may also award damages for delay in completion in addition to specific performance.<sup>50</sup>

SECTION 4. RESTITUTION<sup>51</sup>

A party who has wholly or in part performed his side of the contract and has not received the agreed counter-performance in full may sometimes be entitled to restitution in respect of his own performance. Where this consists of a payment of money, the payor will simply seek to get it back; where it consists of some other benefit he will claim recompense (or a quantum meruit) in respect of it.

1. Recovery of Money Paid

An action lies, in the cases to be discussed below, to recover back money paid under a contract or purported contract. The action is also available in a number of other cases which have nothing to do with the law of contract, being only connected with it historically in that the form of action used in them was also used to enforce claims arising out of contracts. Our sole concern in this book is with the use of the action in its contractual context.

(1) "Total failure of consideration"<sup>52</sup>

(a) DEFINITION. A contracting party can recover back money paid under a contract if there is a "total failure of consideration", i.e. if no part of the performance for which he bargained has been rendered.<sup>53</sup> In the Fibrosa<sup>54</sup> case, for example, a buyer of goods recovered back an advance payment when frustration had prevented the delivery of any part of the goods. Lord Simon explained the meaning of "consideration" in this context: "In the law relating to the formation of contract, the promise to do a thing may often be the consideration, but when one is considering the law of failure of consideration and of the quasi-contractual right to recover money on that ground it is, generally speaking, not the promise which is referred to but the performance of the promise".<sup>55</sup> This is only "generally speaking" the case<sup>56</sup> because a party may bargain for the promise itself. Thus a person who insures against the destruction of a thing by fire bargains for the insurer's promise. If the thing is then destroyed by water the insured person cannot recover back his premium: there is no total failure of consideration as he had the benefit of the insurer's promise for some time.<sup>57</sup> He could recover back his premium only if the insurer

<sup>49</sup> Grant v Dawkins [1973] 1 W.L.R. 1406.

<sup>50</sup> Ford-Hunt v Ragbhir Singh [1973] 1 W.L.R. 738; cf. Oakacre Ltd v Claire Cleaners (Holdings) Ltd [1982] Ch. 197 (damages for delay in substitution for specific performance). For damages for delay see above, pp.830–831.

<sup>51</sup> Beatson, 2 J.C.L. 65.

<sup>52</sup> Stoljar, 75 L.Q.R. 53; Birks in Consensus ad Idem, Essays in the Law of Contract in Honour of Guenter Treitel (Rose ed.), p.179.

<sup>53</sup> Stoczniia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 W.L.R. 574 at 587, 600; above p.1012 (the test is whether performance has been rendered, not whether it has been received).

<sup>54</sup> [1943] A.C. 32; above, p.911.

<sup>55</sup> ibid. at 48; cf. Rover International Ltd v Cannon Films Ltd (No.3) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912 at 923; Goss v Chilcott [1996] A.C. 788 at 797. The point seems to have been overlooked in Re Goldcorp Exchange Ltd [1995] 1 A.C. 74 at 103; see above, p.911, n.38.

<sup>56</sup> cf. Lord Goff (dissenting) in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC [1996] A.C. 669 at 683 ("need not be so narrowly confined").

<sup>57</sup> cf. Tyrie v Fletcher (1777) 2 Cowp. 666.

had never been at risk, e.g. if the thing had been destroyed the day before the policy had begun to run.<sup>58</sup>

It is also possible for A to buy the benefit of a promise made to B by C: e.g. where B contracts to assign<sup>59</sup> to A a debt owed by C to B. The actual assignment of the debt by B to A is then the performance of B's promise, even though the result of that performance is to confer on A a legal right to the performance of another promise, i.e. of that made by C to B. In such a case there would be a total failure of consideration if the contract between B and C were void in law, so that nothing was transferred from B to A; but this defect was said to have been cured where, as a result of a subsequent novation, A "got the substance of what they were paying for, a valid and enforceable contract with" C, so that "there was no failure of consideration at all".<sup>60</sup> It will be recalled that novation is a transaction involving all three parties,<sup>61</sup> so that B contributed to the end result that A became legally entitled to the benefit of C's promise. If this state of affairs had come about as a result of an independent subsequent transaction involving only A and C, then it would not have cured the defect in B's original performance or prevented the failure of consideration from being total.

(b) PARTIAL FAILURE. In the above cases, there is either a total failure of consideration or no failure at all. There is also an intermediate situation in which there has been a partial failure; and in such cases, the traditional view, or general rule, is that there is no right to recover back a proportionate part of the money paid.<sup>62</sup> If, for example, A employed B for a lump sum paid in advance to paint A's house, and B abandoned the job before it was finished, A could not recover back any part of the payment: the right to recover back money paid on account of failure of consideration is said to be restricted to cases in which the failure is "total". One reason for this requirement is that, in the example just given, A already has his remedy in damages. This is generally governed by the compensatory principle<sup>63</sup> under which A can recover no more than his loss; and to allow him to claim restitution in respect of any breach would cut across this principle, particularly where he had made a bad bargain by paying B more than B's performance was worth. If B had simply done nothing after receiving the advance payment, A's right to recover the payment could be justified on the ground that B would be unjustly enriched if he were allowed to keep money paid to him "for nothing but a broken promise".<sup>64</sup> But this reasoning loses much of its force where B has performed in part,<sup>65</sup>

<sup>58</sup> cf. Stevenson v Snow (1761) 3 Burr. 1237; and see Marine Insurance Act 1906, s.84.

<sup>59</sup> See above, Ch.16.

<sup>60</sup> Kleinwort Benson Ltd v South Tyneside MBC [1994] 4 All E.R. 972 at 989.

<sup>61</sup> See above, p.673. In the present case, all three parties were involved: see [1994] 4 All E.R. 972 at 989.

<sup>62</sup> Whincup v Hughes (1871) L.R. 6 C.P. 78; the actual decision is no longer law: above, p.911; Salvage Association v CAP v Financial Services [1995] F.S.R. 654 at 682; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 C.I.J.R. 344 (no return of part of the price paid for aborted holiday cruise; though the price may be relevant in assessing damages: Peninsular & Orient SN Co v Youell [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 136; and see below p.1057). Proposals for reform, in Law Commission Working Paper 65, Pt III were later abandoned: Law Com. 121, para.3.11. In DO Ferguson & Associates v Sohl (1992) 62 Build.L.R. 95 an advance payment was made to a builder who failed to do some of the work for which the payment was made. There was said to be a total failure of consideration with regard to the part of the work left undone so that the builder was held liable to restore the amount of the payment attributable to that part. But the notion of "total failure of part" is, with respect, quite inconsistent with the requirement of total failure; the case can perhaps be justified on the analogy of the cases discussed at n.66 below. In White Arrow Express Ltd v Lamey's Distribution Ltd [1995] N.L.J. 1504 no attempt was made to pursue what was called "a claim in quasi-contract based on partial failure of consideration," while the claim for damages failed on the ground stated on p.928, above.

<sup>63</sup> See above, pp.927-930.

<sup>64</sup> Palmer, 20 Ohio State I.J. 264, 267; above, p.927.

<sup>65</sup> For the position where only a very small part has been performed, see below, pp.1052-1053.

particularly where only a small part remains unperformed. A second reason for the general rule is that it may not be easy for the law to apportion the amount of work actually done by B to the whole in respect of which the payment was made; and where this is the case the amount of restitution that he should be required to make is correspondingly hard to assess. But there are also cases in which neither of the above justifications for the general rule applies; and in such cases recovery of money has been allowed even though the failure of consideration is only partial. Thus where apportionment of the unperformed part is in fact easy, the law will allow partial recovery: for example, a buyer to 100 tons could get back half his money if only 50 tons were delivered.<sup>66</sup>

Apportionment is also easy where the promise which is performed only in part is one by a borrower to pay money, whether by way of interest or of repayment of capital, under a contract for the loan of money. Normally the lender's action in such a case will be one for the recovery of the agreed sum, but where this is for some reason not available,<sup>67</sup> the fact that some payments have been made by the borrower will not deprive the lender of a restitutionary remedy based on failure of consideration.<sup>68</sup> Indeed, the very fact that no contractual remedy is available to the promisee will make the court anxious to allow restitution since in such cases this is the only way in which unjust enrichment of the promisor can be avoided.<sup>69</sup> This point is also reflected in the statutory provision by which money paid in advance under a contract which is later frustrated can be recovered even though the failure of consideration is only partial.<sup>70</sup> Any difficulty of making an apportionment is again outweighed by the fact that restitution is the payor's only possible remedy, since frustration provides the payee with a defence to any claim for damages. Partial failure of consideration can also give rise to a right to the return of advance payments where the contract in terms confers such a right.<sup>71</sup> The requirement that the failure must be "total" is, finally, attenuated in the cases, to be discussed below,<sup>72</sup> in which restitution of money has been allowed in spite of the fact that benefits other than those contracted for had been received by the payor; though in some of those cases the grant of the restitutionary remedy is open to criticism precisely on the ground that it has led to the payor's being overcompensated.<sup>73</sup>

The above discussion shows that the requirement of a "total" failure of consideration, though it continues to be stated in the authorities,<sup>74</sup> is now much qualified. These qualifications support the view that it should be restricted to those cases in which the reasons for it, stated above, still have force. It should, in other words, no longer apply where the payor has no remedy, or no satisfactory remedy, for breach (e.g. by way of action for damages<sup>75</sup>) in respect of the part left unperformed by the payee, or where

<sup>66</sup> Whincup v Hughes, above, at p.81; cf. Ebrahim Damood Ltd v Heath Ltd [1961] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 512; Clough Mill Ltd v Martin [1985] 1 W.L.R. 111 at 117–118.

<sup>67</sup> See nn.68 and 69 below for examples.

<sup>68</sup> Goss v Chilcott [1996] A.C. 788, where the borrowers had been discharged from their contractual liability by an alteration of the repayment dates in a mortgage made on behalf of the lender.

<sup>69</sup> Hence perhaps the reference in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow CC [1997] 4 All E.R. 641 at 652 to "failure of consideration" (omitting "total") in the context of a claim for the recovery of money paid under a void contract.

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.911.

<sup>71</sup> The Trident Beauty [1994] 1 W.L.R. 161 at 164–165.

<sup>72</sup> See below, pp.1053–1056.

<sup>73</sup> Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286 and Barber v NSW Bank Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 641, below, pp.1054–1055.

<sup>74</sup> e.g. The Trident Beauty [1994] 1 W.L.R. 161 at 164–165; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 C.L.R. 344 at 350–351, 367, 376, 384, 388.

<sup>75</sup> Or, in the case of a loan of money, by way of action for the agreed sum.

there is in fact no difficulty in apportioning that part to the whole in respect of which the payor's advance payment had been made.

(c) RETURNABLE AND NON-RETURNABLE BENEFITS. A party who has received only partial or defective performance may, on that ground, be entitled to rescind the contract.<sup>76</sup> If he does rescind, and restores what he has received under the contract, he brings about a total failure of consideration and can therefore recover any money that he has paid. For example, a buyer who has paid in advance for goods may find, on delivery, that they suffer from a defect amounting to a breach of condition, or that they are not of the agreed quantity. In that case, he can generally reject the goods and get his money back.<sup>77</sup> Normally, he must restore the goods, but this requirement does not apply where his inability to restore them is due to the very defect which has given rise to the right to reject: e.g. if the goods were so defective that they disintegrated; or if they were taken away from the buyer because the seller had no title to them.<sup>78</sup> The position seems to be the same where restoration of the subject-matter is made impossible by some external cause for which neither party was responsible.<sup>79</sup>

Where, on the other hand, the partial or defective performance is of such a nature that it cannot be returned, the mere fact that it has been rendered prevents the failure of consideration from being total: for example, where work to be done under a lump sum building contract has been paid for in advance, but is left unfinished or is done defectively. In such cases, the client's remedy is in damages: he would be entitled to the return of his payment only if the builder's breach were so serious that the work was wholly useless to the client.<sup>80</sup> Similarly, an employee may commit breaches of duty justifying his dismissal; but if he is not dismissed and is paid his salary or wages, the employer will not, on subsequently discovering the breaches of duty, be able to recover back the payments<sup>81</sup>: his remedy is in damages.

Even if the subject-matter of the contract is returned (or if its return is not required under the rules stated above) the injured party may have derived some benefit from it: e.g. by using or occupying it. Use for the sole purpose of testing is disregarded and so does not impair the right of the injured party to get his money back.<sup>82</sup> But any further use or occupation may prevent the failure of consideration from being total. In Hunt v Silk<sup>83</sup> an agreement for a lease provided that possession was to be given immediately; that certain repairs were to be done by the landlord; that the lease was to be executed within 10 days; and that, on execution of the lease, the tenant was to pay £10. The tenant went into possession and paid the £10 before the execution of the lease, but the landlord failed to do the repairs, or to execute the lease within 10 days. After a few more days, the tenant vacated the premises and claimed the return of his £10. The claim was rejected,<sup>84</sup> and (although other explanations are possible<sup>85</sup>) the case has generally been taken to lay down the strict rule that, if a party has received any part of the benefit that he contracted

<sup>76</sup> See Ch.18, Section 3.

<sup>77</sup> e.g. Brugg v Villanova (1923) 40 T.L.R. 154; Baldry v Marshall [1925] 1 Q.B. 260. Contrast Linz v Electric Wire Co of Palestine [1948] A.C. 371 (where a buyer of shares forming part of an invalid issue had sold, and was therefore unable to restore, them).

<sup>78</sup> e.g. Rowland v Divall [1923] 2 K.B. 500.

<sup>79</sup> e.g. Head v Tattersall (1871) L.R. 7 Ex. 7.

<sup>80</sup> Heywood v Wellers [1976] Q.B. 446, 458.

<sup>81</sup> Horcal v Gatland [1984] I.R.L.R. 288. For the employer's right to withhold pay, see above, pp.821-822.

<sup>82</sup> e.g. Baldry v Marshall, above.

<sup>83</sup> (1804) 5 East 449.

<sup>84</sup> Contrast Wright v Colls (1848) 8 C.B. 149, where the premium was paid specifically for execution of the lease and was held recoverable when the landlord failed to execute it.

<sup>85</sup> e.g. Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (6th ed.), pp.507-508.

for;<sup>86</sup> there is no total failure of consideration. The rule is open to the objection that it may bar a claim for the recovery of money even though the benefit received is only slight or technical.<sup>87</sup> On the other hand, the actual decision in Hunt v Silk does not seem to be unreasonable; for there is nothing in the reported facts to suggest that the tenant did not have a perfectly adequate remedy in damages.

(d) BENEFITS OTHER THAN THOSE BARGAINED FOR. It does not follow from Hunt v Silk that the receipt of any benefit by the injured party will bar his right to get his money back. If the benefit received was different in kind from that bargained for,<sup>88</sup> there may be a total failure of consideration even though the benefit cannot be returned in specie: for example, where a computer is delivered without the software needed to make it work,<sup>89</sup> or where it is made useless by the supplier's deliberately activating a disabling device.<sup>90</sup> This idea has made it possible to temper the rigidity of the rule in Hunt v Silk, but it has led to rules and distinctions which have in turn attracted criticism.

In Rowland v Divall<sup>91</sup> the plaintiff, who was a car dealer, bought a car from the defendant for £334, repainted it and resold it to a customer for £400. Subsequently the car was seized by the police as it had (unknown to any of the above parties) been stolen. The plaintiff thereupon repaid his customer the £400<sup>92</sup> and sued the defendant for the return of the £334. Meanwhile the original owner of the car had been compensated by his insurance company, who "took over the car themselves and then sold it to the plaintiff for £260".<sup>93</sup> The defendant took the position that his liability was limited to this sum and paid it into court.<sup>94</sup> But the Court of Appeal held that there had been a total failure of consideration, so that the plaintiff could recover back his payment of £334. He had not "received any portion of what he agreed to buy. . . . He did not get what he paid for—namely a car to which he would have title".<sup>95</sup> As the plaintiff was a dealer, this seems (with respect) to be a reasonable view: he did not want to use, but to resell, the car. For this purpose he needed a marketable title and not mere possession, <sup>86</sup> The same principle was applied in Thorpe v Fasey [1949] Ch. 649 to the converse situation where a vendor claimed rescission. But it is hard to see why he should be deprived of this remedy merely because the purchaser had had some benefit from the subject matter. Perhaps the case can be explained on other grounds: cf. above, p.816, n.13.

<sup>87</sup> A kind of statutory modification of the rule in Hunt v Silk, above is contained in amendments to the Sale of Goods Act 1979 made by the Sale and Supply of Goods to Consumers Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/3045, regs.5 and 6 (implementing Dir.1999/44). Under ss.48A and 48C, a buyer who deals as consumer has in certain circumstances the right to "rescind" the contract on account of non-conformity of the goods. His right to "reimbursement", consequent on the exercise of his right to "rescind", may be reduced "to take account of the use he has had of the goods since they were delivered to him", s.48E(5); but see also p.1054, n.1 below.

<sup>88</sup> For this concept, contrast Wilkinson v Lloyd (1845) 7 Q.B. 27 with Stray v Russell (1859) 1 E. & E. 889 at 916 and Knoples v Bovill (1870) 22 L.T. 70 with Taylor v Hare (1805) 1 B. & P.N.R. 260 and Laves v Purser (1856) 6 E. & E. 930; cf. also Pilbrow v Pearlless De Rougement & Co [1999] 3 All E.R. 355 (above, p.806) where the victim of the breach made no restitution claim; and the question whether such a claim might be available was left open at 361; and see below, pp.1058–1059 for the view (there doubted) that there is a "total failure of consideration" for payments made under a void contract; and Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 A.C. 548, above, p.535.

<sup>89</sup> South West Water Services Ltd v International Computers Ltd [1999] Build.L.R. 420.

<sup>90</sup> Rubicon Computer Systems Ltd v United Paints Ltd (2000) 2 T.C.L.R. 453.

<sup>91</sup> [1923] 2 K.B. 500. The new provisions of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 cited in n.87, above, would not now apply to such facts since (1) the buyer did not deal as consumer: s.48A(1)(a); and (2) the seller's breach, being one of the term implied by s.12, did not fall within ss.48A–48C; see s.48F.

<sup>92</sup> He could now reduce his liability to the customer for failure of consideration by any increase in value attributable to the repainting: Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s.6(3).

<sup>93</sup> This fact is stated in the report of the case in 129 L.T. 757.

<sup>94</sup> ibid.

<sup>95</sup> [1923] 2 K.B. 500 at 504.

which was wrongful against the owner. Moreover, the fact that he did not get title caused him serious prejudice beyond having to buy the car a second time; for it resulted in his losing a presumably profitable resale.<sup>96</sup>

The same rule has, however, also been applied in the absence of such circumstances. In Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd<sup>97</sup> a car owned by a finance company was let out on hire-purchase to a hirer who wrongfully sold it before she had paid all the instalments. It passed through a number of hands until it was sold for £1,275 by the defendant to a buyer, both of whom acted in good faith. Nearly a year later, the finance company notified the buyer that the car was theirs and asked for its return. Alternatively, they offered to allow the buyer to acquire title for £175,<sup>98</sup> this being all that remained due under the hire-purchase agreement as the hirer had kept up her payments under it. Meanwhile, however, second-hand car prices had fallen, so that the car was worth only £800. Two days after hearing from the finance company, the buyer claimed the return of the £1,275. After another eight days, the original hirer paid off the £175 and acquired a good title which could at that stage have been passed to the buyer. In these circumstances, the court rightly described the buyer's claim as "somewhat lacking in merits"<sup>99</sup>—but nevertheless allowed it in full. The decision represents a regrettable extension of Rowland v Divall. It is hardly realistic to say that the buyer did not get any part of what he bargained for: he bought the car for use and did use it for nearly a year. Moreover, any prejudice to the buyer from the defendant's lack of title was removed when the amount outstanding under the hire-purchase agreement was paid off.

The same result was again reached in Barber v NSW Bank plc,<sup>1</sup> where the buyer entered into a conditional sale agreement with the defendants relating to a car which was (unknown to either party) the subject of an earlier finance agreement and to which the defendant therefore had no title. The buyer became aware of this fact when he attempted, some 20 months after entering into the agreement to resell the car; and after a further three months he rescinded the agreement and successfully claimed the return of all the payments he had made under it. Although he had had the use of the car for nearly two years "without let or hinderance",<sup>2</sup> it was said to be "not inequitable in all the circumstances"<sup>3</sup> for him to recover his payments in full. This result was based "on the established authorities"<sup>4</sup> which appear to have included Rowland v Divall and Butterworth v Kingsway Motors, both of which were cited to the Court though neither was referred to in the judgment.<sup>5</sup> It is, with respect, unfortunate that no attempt was made by the Court of Appeal in the Barber case to distinguish the former or to evaluate

<sup>96</sup> The eventual fate of the car is not known; cf. above, p.955.

<sup>97</sup> [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286. For the second of the reasons given in n.91, above, the new provisions of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 cited in n.87, above, would not now apply on such facts.

<sup>98</sup> This was all that the finance company could recover as damages from the plaintiff: see Wickham Holdings Ltd v Brook House Motors Ltd [1967] 1 W.L.R. 295. If the value of the car had been less than the amount outstanding under the agreement, the company could not have recovered more than that value: Chubb Cash Ltd v John Crilley & Son [1983] 1 W.L.R. 599.

<sup>99</sup> [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1286 at 1291.

<sup>1</sup> [1996] 1 W.L.R. 641. It seems that the buyer dealt as consumer; and, as the seller's breach was of an express term as to title, the new provisions of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 could now apply on such facts: see the reference in s.48F to an "express term". But the buyer could avoid reduction of his restitution claim under s.48E(5) by basing that claim, not on the new "additional rights" conferred on him by Pt 5A of the Act, but on his right to reject for breach of condition under s.11; this right is not affected by s.48E(5), above n.87.

<sup>2</sup> [1996] 1 W.L.R. 641 at 647.

<sup>3</sup> ibid.

<sup>4</sup> ibid.

<sup>5</sup> The court relied principally on the authorities cited in n.9, below, though it accepted, at p.646, that it was not bound by these cases.

the latter decision. The car had been bought for use (though the breach came to light when the buyer attempted to resell it); and as the buyer had used the car for some 23 months it is hard to accept that he received no part of the benefit for which he had bargained. The court may have attached some weight to the fact that the defendants had become aware of the earlier finance agreement some six months before the buyer rescinded<sup>6</sup> and they had made no attempt to settle the third party's claim during that interval.<sup>7</sup> It is, however, not easy to see how even this fact could be said to have deprived the buyer of the whole of what he had bargained for, particularly as he had used the car for more than 16 months before the defendants had acquired any knowledge of the earlier agreement<sup>8</sup> and so had any opportunity of settling the true owner's claim.

A line of hire-purchase cases is open to similar criticisms. According to these, there is a total failure of consideration if the person letting a car out has no title, so that he cannot give the hirer a valid option to purchase.<sup>9</sup> But once a valid option has been conferred, there is no total failure because the hirer is for some reason prevented from exercising it<sup>10</sup>; or because the car suffers from defects which are so serious that it cannot, for practical purposes, be used at all.<sup>11</sup> It seems unrealistic to say that a hirer who actually uses the car for a substantial period is wholly deprived of what he bargained for merely because there was no valid option, while one who cannot use the car at all because of a physical defect is not so deprived.

The view that the buyer in Rowland v Divall itself did not get the benefit for which he bargained is (as has been suggested above) a perfectly reasonable one. But the decision has nevertheless been criticised on the ground that the buyer recovered the whole of the price even though he and his sub-buyer had had the use of the car for some months. One way of meeting this criticism would be to reduce the buyer's claim for the return of the price by giving the seller the right to an allowance in respect of the benefit obtained by the buyer from his use of the subject-matter.<sup>12</sup> But this suggestion in turn gives rise to the problem of valuing that benefit. It would clearly be unfair to the buyer to assess it at a "reasonable rental value" since a person who is buying or hire-purchasing a car would not want to incur the cost of hiring one. An alternative possibility would be to value the buyer's benefit, in general,<sup>13</sup> at the amount by which the cost of replacing the goods when the buyer was deprived of them was less than the contract price.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>6</sup> The defendants became aware of the third party's claim on February 12, 1991; the buyer rescinded on August 16, 1991.

<sup>7</sup> They settled it on September 2, 1991.

<sup>8</sup> i.e. from October 10, 1989, when the car was supplied to the buyer, till February 12, 1991.

<sup>9</sup> See Karflex Ltd v Poole [1933] 2 K.B. 251; Warman v Southern Counties Car Finance Corp Ltd [1959] 2 K.B. 576 (where the point arose on a counter-claim against the hirer).

<sup>10</sup> Kelly v Lombard Banking Co [1959] 1 W.L.R. 41; cf. CCC Films (London) Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films [1985] Q.B. 16 at 28.

<sup>11</sup> Yeoman Credit Ltd v Apps [1962] 2 Q.B. 508.

<sup>12</sup> Law Commission Working Paper 65, paras 56–57; for an earlier proposal for reform, see Law Reform Committee, Cmnd. 2958 (1966) para.56, discussed by Treitel, 30 M.L.R. 139, 147–149; Law Commission Working Paper 85, paras 6.11 to 6.13 lists various possible reforms without deciding between them. The Law Commissions (Law Com. No.160, Scot. Law Com. No.104, para.6.5) have concluded that the subject is too complex for legislative reform. Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.48E(5), which empowers the court to reduce the reimbursement to which a consumer becomes entitled on rescinding the contract under s.48C (above, p.1053, n.87) does not apply where the seller's only breach is of terms implied by s.12 of the Act: see s.48F; and see above nn.91 and 1.

<sup>13</sup> For a suggested exception where the buyer has made a bad bargain, see Law Commission Working Paper 65, paras 74–75; quaere, whether a special provision for this situation is desirable where (ex hypothesi) buyer and seller have both acted in good faith.

<sup>14</sup> ibid. para.73.

A further problem arises in cases of this kind because the true owner may have a claim in tort against either the buyer<sup>15</sup> or the seller<sup>16</sup> or both; he may be entitled not only to the return of the property or its value, but also its reasonable rental value.<sup>17</sup> If the owner has already claimed the rental value from the buyer, it seems clear that the seller should restore the whole price<sup>18</sup>; for if the buyer also had to give credit to the seller for the use of the goods, he would be required to pay twice over for the same benefit. Similar considerations apply where the true owner has not yet made his claim: if the buyer had to give credit to the seller he could later be sued for a similar sum by the owner. He might be able to claim that second payment back from the seller as damages; but by then the seller may have disappeared or the right to sue him may be barred by lapse of time. Of course the true owner may choose not to assert his claim for rental value; and in that case the buyer would no doubt be enriched by having had the use of the subject-matter and nevertheless being allowed to get back the whole price from the seller. But the enrichment would be at the expense of the owner and not at the expense of the seller, who accordingly should not have a claim in respect of it.<sup>19</sup> In view of the buyer's possible liability to the true owner, the buyer should only have to make an allowance to the seller for the benefit of the use of the goods if the claim of the true owner has first been satisfied.<sup>20</sup>

A final criticism of the rule in Rowland v Divall is based on the following example<sup>21</sup>: B in good faith buys whisky from a thief and sells it to A, who drinks it. Can A recover back the whole price? It seems clear that he cannot,<sup>22</sup> because he is unable to restore the whisky, and this is entirely due to his voluntary act in drinking it.<sup>23</sup> But then it is said to be unjust to A that he cannot recover back his money: the true owner may sue him in conversion so that he will (in effect) have to pay for the whisky twice over. But B has also converted the whisky and is also liable to the true owner in respect of that damage. Hence A can recover contribution from him (which may amount to a complete indemnity<sup>24</sup>) under the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978.<sup>25</sup> The result is perfectly fair. A has paid for the whisky; the true owner has its value. B has admittedly lost the amount he paid the thief for the whisky, but that is a risk to which everyone who deals, even innocently, with a thief is exposed.

(e) RELATION TO DAMAGES.<sup>26</sup> In a number of cases it has been held or said that a claimant may be able to get back money paid under a contract as damages for the

<sup>15</sup> Hilberry v Hatton (1864) 2 H. & C. 822.

<sup>16</sup> Martindale v Smith (1841) 1 Q.B. 389.

<sup>17</sup> Strand Electric & Engineering Co Ltd v Brisford Entertainments Ltd [1952] 2 K.B. 246; Hillesden Securities Ltd v Ryjack Ltd [1983] 1 W.L.R. 959.

<sup>18</sup> As in Nemsome v Graham (1829) 10 B. & C. 234 (where the subject matter was an interest in land). cf. Hizzett v Hargreaves [1987] C.I.Y. 1164.

<sup>19</sup> See Warman v Southern Counties Car Finance Corp Ltd [1959] 2 K.B. 576 at 582–583; Argens v Whitcomb 147 P. 2d 501 at 504 (1944).

<sup>20</sup> Law Commission Working Paper No.65, paras 68–70.

<sup>21</sup> Atiyah, Sale of Goods (10th ed.), p.107.

<sup>22</sup> This seems to be admitted by Atiyah, above.

<sup>23</sup> cf. above, p.1052.

<sup>24</sup> Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, s.2(2).

<sup>25</sup> ibid. s.1. The damage for which A and B are liable is the “same damage;” cf., as to the meaning of this phrase, Jameson v CEBG [2002] 1 A.C. 455; Royal Brompton Hospital NHS Trust v Hammond [2002] UKHL 14; [2002] W.L.R. 1379; Co-operative Retail Services Ltd v Taylor Young Partnerships Ltd [2002] UKHL 17; [2002] 1 W.L.R. 1419. Thus, in the case put, the difficulty discussed in Brise Construction Ltd v Plastic Ltd [1996] 1 W.L.R. 675 (where the two wrongdoers were liable to different claimants) would not arise.

<sup>26</sup> A claim for the return of money paid on a total failure of consideration is not one for damages even though (as was held in Friends' Provident Life Office v Hillier Parker May & Rowden [1997] Q.B. 85) one “in respect of . . . damage” for the purpose of Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978, ss.1(1) and 6.

defendant's breach. For example, in one case a cow had been sold warranted healthy, but in fact she suffered from a disease from which she died; and the buyer recovered the price as one item of damages for breach of warranty.<sup>27</sup> Payments made under hire purchase agreements by hirers have likewise been recovered by them as damages where the goods were so defective that they were completely useless or rightfully rejected by the hirers.<sup>28</sup> Similar relief has been given to buyers and hire purchasers of stolen goods who elected to claim damages<sup>29</sup>; and to tenants who left premises which had been leased to them in consequence of abusive conduct on the part of their landlord, amounting to breach of his covenant for quiet enjoyment.<sup>30</sup> Strictly speaking, the injured party's damages in such cases should be the value of the subject-matter at the relevant date,<sup>31</sup> and not the price as such. The cases can perhaps be explained on the ground that in them the price was the best, and indeed the only, evidence of value. It is also possible for the price paid under one contract to be recoverable as reliance loss by way of damages for breach of a second contract between the same parties.<sup>32</sup>

In an action for damages the injured party can often recover more than the money he has paid to the defendant. For example, if in consequence of a breach he is deprived of goods, he may be able to recover, not only what he has paid for them, but also money spent on them<sup>33</sup> or loss of profits (subject to the normal limitations on damages, such as remoteness and mitigation). On the other hand, when the injured party claims damages, benefits obtained by him under the contract are, in principle, taken into account; and he will also recover less than the price if he has paid more for the subject-matter than it was worth, or than it would cost to replace. A claim for damages is also subject to practical difficulties, such as quantification and remoteness, which do not arise on a claim for the recovery of money. The question which action should be brought, where both are available,<sup>34</sup> requires a careful weighing of all these factors. It should certainly not be assumed that the action for the recovery of money is necessarily the better remedy.

(2) Money paid under a void contract

(a) IN GENERAL. The law starts with the assumption that money paid under a void contract can be recovered back.<sup>35</sup> Thus in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd<sup>36</sup> it was clearly assumed that the money paid by the claimants under the compensation agreements could have been recovered back, had those agreements been void for mistake. Where a hire-

<sup>27</sup> Harling v Eddy [1951] 2 K.B. 739; cf. George Wills & Sons Ltd v Thomas Brown & Sons (1922) 12 L.L.R. 292, where no discussion as to damages is reported.

<sup>28</sup> Charterhouse Credit Co Ltd v Tolly [1963] 2 Q.B. 683; Farnworth Finance Facilities Ltd v Attridge [1970] 1 W.L.R. 1053; Doobay v Mohabeer [1967] 2 A.C. 278.

<sup>29</sup> Mason v Burningham [1949] 2 K.B. 545; Warman v Southern Counties Car Finance Corp Ltd [1949] 2 K.B. 576.

<sup>30</sup> Sampson v Floyd [1989] 2 E.G.L.R. 49, doubted on another point in Branchett v Beany [1992] 3 All E.R. 910 at 916.

<sup>31</sup> See above, pp.937, 948 et seq.; Greenmond v Bennett [1973] Q.B. 195 at 201 ("the value of the car as he sold it to them"); The Rio Sun [1985] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 351 at 368 ("the value of the oil . . . on the date when [the buyers] received it."); cf., in case of failure to render services Miles v Wakefield MDC [1987] A.C. 539 at 568, above, p.785, n.93; White Arrow Express Ltd v Lamey's Distribution Ltd [1995] N.L.J. 1504, above, p.928; Peninsular & Orient S.N. Co v Youell [1997] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 136 at 141).

<sup>32</sup> CCC Films (London) Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films Ltd [1985] Q.B. 16.

<sup>33</sup> See the authorities cited in nn.27 and 29 above.

<sup>34</sup> See above, p.941.

<sup>35</sup> e.g. Re London County Commercial Reinsurance Office [1922] 2 Ch. 67. cf. Colesworthy v Collmain Services [1993] C.C.L.R. 4; aliter if the contract or relevant term is only unenforceable: Boddington v Lawton [1994] I.C.R. 478. And see Arrowsmith, 9 Legal Studies 121 and 307.

<sup>36</sup> [1932] A.C. (above, p.289); Landon, 51 L.Q.R. 650; Taylor, 52 L.Q.R. 27; Landon, ibid. 478; Hamson, 53 L.Q.R. 118.

purchase agreement was wholly void for mistake it was accordingly held that the hirer could recover back his deposit<sup>37</sup>; and it does not seem that he was under any liability to pay for the use of the subject-matter of the agreement, which had been in his possession for over three months.<sup>38</sup> Where a contract was void because one of the parties was a company not yet in existence when the contract was made,<sup>39</sup> it was similarly held that instalments paid under it could be recovered back by the payor.<sup>40</sup> The same rule has been applied where money was paid under an ultra vires contract<sup>41</sup> and where money was paid under a contract which was void by statute.<sup>42</sup>

(b) BASIS OF THE RULE. The general rule that money paid under a void contract can be recovered back is clearly established; but there has been some difference of opinion as to its legal basis. This has arisen in cases<sup>43</sup> involving "interest rate swap" contracts under which A (a bank) had made lump sum payments to B (a local authority) which had in turn made some or all of the payments to A which were expressed under the contracts to be due from B to A. The contracts were found to be ultra vires and void<sup>44</sup> because B had no legal power to enter into them and it was argued that A's claim for the recovery of the balance of its payments<sup>45</sup> was barred either on the ground that B had made some of the stipulated counter-payments, so that the failure of consideration for A's payments was no more than partial or on the ground that the contracts had been fully performed on both sides, so that there had been no failure of consideration at all. For the reasons to be discussed below, however, these arguments were rejected, so that A's claim was upheld in spite of partial performance by B or even full performance by both parties of the void promises.

(i) Lack or failure of consideration. One reason for allowing A's claim was that the principle on which money paid under a void contract is recoverable differs from that of recovery for "total failure of consideration" under a valid contract. Where the contract is void, the right to recover money paid under it is based, not on failure to perform a contractual obligation (since under a void contract there can be no duty to perform<sup>46</sup>), but on the ground that there is "no legal justification"<sup>47</sup> or "no consideration"<sup>48</sup> for the payment. A second, alternative, reason for upholding A's claim was that there had (in the interest rate swap cases) been a total failure of consideration. There are, in turn, two versions of this view. One is that all payments made in pursuance of a void contract are

<sup>37</sup> Branwhite v Worcester Works Finance Ltd [1969] 1 A.C. 552.

<sup>38</sup> No claim of this kind was made by the finance company in Branwhite's case.

<sup>39</sup> See above, p.736.

<sup>40</sup> Rover International Ltd v Cannon Films Ltd (No.3) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912; Birks, 2 J.C.L. 227.

<sup>41</sup> Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 938.

<sup>42</sup> See the discussion in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington B.C. at first instance and in the Court of Appeal [1994] 4 All E.R. 890 at 921-924; [1994] 1 W.L.R. 938 at 946, 952 of the cases on contracts made void by the Grants of Life Annuities Act 1777 (17 Geo. 3 c.26), s.1. This is presumably the "annuity bill" to which Sir Peter Teazle refers in Sheridan's The School for Scandal, III.1 (first produced in 1777).

<sup>43</sup> See especially Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington B.C. [1994] 4 All E.R. 890; [1994] 1 W.L.R. 938; [1996] A.C. 669 (reversing the decision below on the issue of compound interest only); Birks, 32 C.W.A.J.L.R. 195; Burrows [1995] R.L.R. 15.

<sup>44</sup> See Hazell v Hammersmith & Fulham BC [1992] A.C. 1.

<sup>45</sup> i.e. the amount by which A's payments exceeded B's.

<sup>46</sup> cf. Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd v Kensington & Chelsea Royal BC [1999] Q.B. 215 at 236.

<sup>47</sup> Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC [1994] 1 W.L.R. 938 at 953; cf. [1994] 4 All E.R. 890 at 929 ("not contractual payments at all"); Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Birmingham CC [1997] Q.B. 380 at 394 ("no justification for the retention of the money").

<sup>48</sup> South Tyneside MBC v Svenska International plc [1995] 1 All E.R. 545 at 577; cf. Westdeutsche case above, n.43 [1994] 4 All E.R. 890 at 924 ("absence of consideration"); Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Birmingham C.C. [1997] Q.B. 380 at 386-387.

"necessarily made for a consideration which has totally failed".<sup>49</sup> But if there is necessarily such a total failure of consideration whenever the contract is void, then there is no separate requirement of total failure of consideration: recovery is allowed simply because the contract is void. The other version is that there is a total failure of consideration because A had bargained for B's "obligation . . . to make counter-payments"<sup>50</sup> and the benefit of B's having in fact made such payments was different in kind from the benefit for which A had bargained.<sup>51</sup> Again this will be true in all cases in which payments are made under void contracts, so that on this view, too, there is no separate requirement of total failure of consideration.

(ii) Mistake. Where money is paid under a void contract, the payment will often (though not always<sup>52</sup>) be made in the mistaken belief that the contract was valid. Such a mistake was not formerly a ground on which the payor was entitled to the return of his money since the mistake was one of law and it had been held that there was no right to recover back money paid under a mistake of law (as opposed to one of fact). The authorities which had supported this view<sup>53</sup> were, however, overruled by the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln CC,<sup>54</sup> where moneys had been paid by a bank to local authorities under interest rate swap contracts which were believed to be valid but which were actually void.<sup>55</sup> It was held that the bank was entitled to recover the moneys on the ground that they had been paid under a mistake of law.<sup>56</sup> It was further held that this right was not barred by the fact that the contract had been fully performed by both parties. The cases which supported the latter proposition where the claim was based, not on mistake, but simply on the fact that the contract was void<sup>57</sup> were referred to with approval, thus further supporting the view that money paid under a void contract is recoverable by the payor even though the circumstances are not such as would have given rise, if the contract had been valid, to a total failure of consideration. The reason for this conclusion was that the policy of the rule making the contract void might be defeated if full or partial performance of the contract were a bar to recovery: e.g. if a local authority were precluded by such a bar from recovering ultra vires payments made in the mistaken belief that they were intra vires and hence legally due.<sup>58</sup>

(iii) Practical considerations. There are also practical grounds for not applying the "total failure of consideration" requirement to claims for the recovery of payments under void contracts. Where the contract is valid, a party who is denied the right to recover back payments because he has received partial performance will normally have a claim for damages in respect of the part left unperformed. Where, on the other hand,

<sup>49</sup> Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd v Kensington & Chelsea Royal BC [1999] Q.B. 215 at 230.

<sup>50</sup> Westdeutsche case, above, n.43 [1996] A.C. 669 at 711 (italics supplied) approving the reasoning of the Court of Appeal [1994] 1 W.L.R. 938 at 943 per Dillon L.J.; Legatt L.J., ibid. at 951–953 is more equivocal as to the basis of recovery; cf. Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Glasgow CC [1999] 1 A.C. 153 at 167, 171.

<sup>51</sup> In this respect these cases can be said to resemble Rowland v Divall [1923] 2 K.B. 500, above p.1053.

<sup>52</sup> e.g. not where payment is made under a wager.

<sup>53</sup> Billbie v Lumley 1802) 2 East 469; Brisbane v Dacres (1813) 5 Taunt. 143; Kelly v Solari (1841) 9 M. & W. 54.

<sup>54</sup> [1999] 2 A.C. 349; Nurdin & Peacock plc v DB Ramsden & Co Ltd [1999] 1 All E.R. 941. For proposals for legislative reform, see Law Com. No.227 (1994); for the need for further legislation, see below, n.56.

<sup>55</sup> See above, at n.44.

<sup>56</sup> The bank's reason for relying on mistake was to enable it to take advantage of Limitation Act 1980, s.31(1) under which, in an action "for relief from the consequences of a mistake" the period of limitation did not begin to run until the plaintiff had, or with reasonable diligence could have, discovered the mistake. The result may be to extend the period indefinitely and it was recognised in the Kleinwort Benson case [1999] 2 A.C. 349 at 389, 401, 418 that legislation may be needed to deal with this point.

<sup>57</sup> e.g. Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington BC, above, n.43; Guinness Mahon & Co v Kensington & Chelsea Royal BC, above, n.46.

<sup>58</sup> Kleinwort Benson case (above n.54) [1999] 2 A.C. 349 at 387, 415–416; cf. above, p.567.

the contract is void, denial of restitution of money paid on the ground that the payee has partly performed his void promise, would leave the payor without any remedy in respect of the unperformed part.<sup>59</sup> In the interest rate swap cases, there is the further point that there was no difficulty in apportioning the partial performance by B to the total performance for which A had bargained, so that one rationale of the requirement that the failure must be total did not exist and the cases could be brought within the exception to that requirement which exists in cases of such apportionability.<sup>60</sup> Moreover, where the partial or total performance which has taken place consists simply of payments and counter-payments of money under a void contract, there is no difficulty in restoring each party to its pre-contract position and hence no injustice is likely to result from allowing recovery of the balance. It follows from this reasoning that the right to recover might be barred where supervening events do make such mutual restoration impossible.<sup>61</sup> The interest rate swap cases also do not directly touch the problem which would arise where the performance rendered by one party to a void contract is of such a nature that it cannot literally be restored: e.g. where A had paid a sum of money in advance to B in return for B's promise to render services and after some of the services had been rendered it was discovered that B had no power to enter into the contract so that it was ultra vires and void. It is submitted that in such a case A should be entitled to recover its payment on the ground that the contract was void; but that this right should be subject to B's right to retain so much of that payment as B could have recovered by way of quantum meruit for work done under a void contract.<sup>62</sup>

(c) SPECIAL CASES. The rule that money paid under a void contract is recoverable is no more than a general one,<sup>63</sup> which may be displaced by the policy considerations underlying the rule of law which makes the contract void. It may, for example, be displaced under the rules (discussed earlier in this book) relating to illegal contracts, gaming and wagering contracts and minors' contracts.<sup>64</sup> An as yet unresolved question would arise where the contract was void for more than one reason. It may, for example, be both an ultra vires contract and a wager<sup>65</sup> or it may be both ultra vires and illegal; and in each of these situations money paid under the contract is prima facie recoverable on the first but irrecoverable on the second ground. The solution in such cases would appear to depend on the reason why the money is thus either recoverable or irrecoverable. For example, if A makes a wager with B who has no legal power to enter into it and pays money lost under it to B, then the argument that the money is irrecoverable because A intended to make a gift<sup>66</sup> of it to B might well prevail; but if the payment were made by B to A, then the policy of the ultra vires rule (which is to protect the assets of B against ultra vires ventures<sup>67</sup>) might well require that policy to prevail. Hence in the first case the money should be irrecoverable and in the second recoverable. Where the contract was both ultra vires and illegal, the policy of the rule making it illegal would normally prevail, so that (for example) a payment made by a local authority for the supply of prostitutes to its members would appear to be irrecoverable. But this can be no more than a general rule: illegality can vary widely in its seriousness so that the answer to the present question would depend in

<sup>59</sup> cf. above, p.1051.

<sup>60</sup> See above, p.1051.

<sup>61</sup> See Kleinwort Benson Ltd v South Tyneside MBC [1994] 4 All E.R. 972.

<sup>62</sup> See below, p.1063.

<sup>63</sup> Guinness Mahon & Co Ltd v Kensington & Chelsea Royal BC [1999] Q.B. 215 at 231.

<sup>64</sup> See above, pp.491–503, 522–523, 535–538, 550, 551–554, 556–557.

<sup>65</sup> See Morgan Grenfell & Co Ltd v Welwyn Hatfield DC [1995] 1 All E.R. 1 at 15 where this point was left open.

<sup>66</sup> See above, p.523.

<sup>67</sup> Usually to safeguard those interested in B's assets: e.g. taxpayers where B is a local authority.

each case on the factors more fully discussed in Chapter 11: i.e. on the nature of the illegality and on the states of mind of the parties.

2. Quantum Meruit

Here we are concerned with cases in which a party claims a reasonable recompense for some benefit (other than a payment of money) conferred, or for work done, by him under contract or purported contract. Many such cases have already been discussed and are mentioned here only for the sake of completeness.

(1) Where there is no express provision for remuneration<sup>68</sup>

Two situations must be distinguished.

(a) CONTRACTS NOT PROVIDING FOR REMUNERATION. A party can claim a quantum meruit for work done or goods delivered under a contract which does not expressly provide how much he is to be paid. This will be the case where the whole agreement is implied from conduct,<sup>69</sup> or where it is simply silent as to the rate of payment. Sometimes it may be clear from the terms of the agreement, or from the circumstances in which it was made, that the claimant was not intended to have any legal right to be paid at all.<sup>70</sup> But if he was intended to have such a right the court will award a reasonable sum. Thus if a contract for the sale of goods does not fix the price, the buyer must pay a reasonable price<sup>71</sup>; and if a contract for services does not fix the remuneration, a reasonable sum must be paid.<sup>72</sup>

A similar situation arises where the contract makes some, but not a full, provision for payment. In Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co Ltd v Commissioners of Works<sup>73</sup> contractors agreed to erect works for a payment consisting of the cost of the works plus £300,000. It was thought that the works would cost about £5 million, but the Commissioners exercised their right under the contract to ask for additional works worth £1.5 million. It was held that the express provision as to payment only applied to works worth about £5 million and that the contractors were entitled to a quantum meruit in respect of the additional works.

(b) NO CONCLUDED CONTRACT. Work may be done where the parties believe that there is a contract but this is not the case because there was never a clear acceptance of an offer. In one such case a quantum meruit was awarded to the party who had done the work.<sup>74</sup> Such an award may also be made where work is done, under an agreement which lacks contractual force for want of contractual intention,<sup>75</sup> in anticipation of a formal contract which fails to materialise for want of execution of the requisite formal document<sup>76</sup>; and where one party does work at the request of the other during negotiations

<sup>68</sup> Birks, (1974) C.L.P. 13; Jones, (1977) 93 L.Q.R. 273.

<sup>69</sup> See above, pp.9, 18; Paynter v Williams (1833) 1 C. & M. 810; cf. The Batis [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 345; Fairvale v Sabhramwall [1992] 2 E.G.L.R. 27; The Kurnia Dewi [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 553.

<sup>70</sup> See above, p.167, 740.

<sup>71</sup> Sale of Goods Act 1979, s.8(2).

<sup>72</sup> Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, s.15(1); cf. at common law Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All E.R. 759; and see above, p.741.

<sup>73</sup> [1949] 2 K.B. 632; cf. Steven v Bromley & Son [1919] 2 K.B. 722; The Gregos [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 347; The Saronikos [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 277; Adams Holden & Pearson v Trent Regional Health Authority (1989) 47 Build.L.R. 34.

<sup>74</sup> Peter Lind & Co Ltd v Mersey Docks & Harbour Board [1972] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 234; above, p.17; Arrowsmith, above, p.1057, n.35.

<sup>75</sup> Galliard Homes Ltd v Jarvis Interiors Ltd [2000] C.L.C. 411.

<sup>76</sup> This was accepted by both parties (though doubted by Evans L.J.); cf. above, p.157.

which are expected to lead to a contract between them but are broken off before its conclusion.<sup>77</sup> But no such award will be made where the party doing the work takes the risk that the negotiations may fail. This was held to be the position where one party to an agreement “subject to contract”<sup>78</sup> incurred expenses without any request from, and without benefiting, the other but solely for the purpose of securing (and then of performing) the contract.<sup>79</sup>

(2) Where there is an express provision for remuneration

The general rule is that where a contract expressly provides for a fixed remuneration on specified events, the court cannot award any other remuneration on those events, nor can it award any remuneration if they do not occur.<sup>80</sup> To allow quantum meruit claims in such cases would contradict the agreement reached by the parties, and the courts will do this only if there are special circumstances justifying such interference. Such circumstances exist in the following cases.

(a) INCAPACITY. Where necessities are sold and delivered to a minor, he need only pay a reasonable price for them, although he may have agreed to pay more.<sup>81</sup> There are obvious reasons of policy for interfering with the agreement in such a case. There would be no such reasons where the minor had agreed to pay less than a reasonable price.

(b) WRONGFUL PREVENTION OF PERFORMANCE. If one party starts to perform a contract but is prevented from completing by the other party's breach, he can claim a quantum meruit at the contract rate<sup>82</sup> for work done, even though the unperformed obligation is entire.<sup>83</sup> The party in breach here cannot complain of having to pay in circumstances other than those provided for by the contract.

(c) OTHER PARTIAL PERFORMANCE. In Chapter 18 we saw that, in general, a person who failed to complete performance of an entire obligation could not recover anything<sup>84</sup>; but that this rule was subject to a number of exceptions.<sup>85</sup> Under some of these, there is a right to payment of the contract price or at the contract rate. Under others, there is a right to a quantum meruit (or reasonable remuneration): for example, where a benefit conferred by partial performance of services is “voluntarily” accepted by the other party.

<sup>77</sup> William Lacey (Hounslow) Ltd v Davis [1954] 1 Q.B. 428; BSC v Cleveland Bridge & Engineering Co Ltd [1984] 1 All E.R. 504; Ball, 99 L.Q.R. 572; Marston Construction Co v Kigass (1990) 15 Con.L.R. 116; Key, 111 L.Q.R. 576; Countrywide Communications Ltd v ICL Pathways Ltd [2000] C.L.C. 324.

<sup>78</sup> See above, p.52.

<sup>79</sup> Regalian Properties plc v London Dockland Development Corp [1995] 1 W.L.R. 212, where the Marston Construction case, above n.77 was at 229 described as a “surprising decision”.

<sup>80</sup> Britain v Rossiter (1879) 11 Q.B.D. 123; Gilbert & Partners v Knight (1968) 112 S.J. 155; Wiluszynski v Tower Hamlets LBC [1989] 1 C.R. 493.

<sup>81</sup> See above, p.542; the same is also sometimes true where necessities are sold and delivered to a person incapacitated by other factors, such as mental illness, drink or drugs.: above, pp.557–559.

<sup>82</sup> Lodder v Stoney (1901) 20 N.Z.L.R. 321 at 356, affirmed [1904] A.C. 442; Lusty v Finsbury Securities (1991) 58 Build.L.R. 66; Kehoe v Borough of Rutherford, 27 A 912 (1893). According to Boomer v Muir, 24 P. 2d. 570 (1933) he can recover a reasonable sum even though it greatly exceeds the contract price; but it is submitted that this would not be followed in England, for it seems absurd that the injured party should recover more for partial, than he could recover for full, performance. Where one party, after the other's breach, does extra work, the reasonable sum recoverable for the work may exceed the damages recoverable for the breach: The Batis [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 345.

<sup>83</sup> See above, p.822.

<sup>84</sup> See above, pp.782–784.

<sup>85</sup> See above, pp.819–822.

This rule can be explained on the ground that the parties have agreed to abandon the original contract, and that a new one is made when the benefit is accepted.<sup>86</sup>

In a number of further exceptional cases, a reasonable sum is, or may be, payable for services rendered by the party in breach even though the services differ from, or fall short of, those bargained for, even though there has been no "voluntary" acceptance of them by the injured party, and even though the contract remains in force. For example, it has been said that a carrier by sea who deviates but carries the goods to the agreed destination can recover a reasonable freight<sup>87</sup>; and conflicting views have been expressed on the question whether an employer who "of necessity" accepts services falling short of those bargained for is liable to his employee for a quantum meruit.<sup>88</sup> Such exceptional cases are controversial precisely because they reveal a conflict between two policies. One is that the court should not unjustifiably contradict a subsisting contract by awarding a reasonable sum for services falling short of those promised; the other is that the court should not allow the injured party to have the benefit of those services for nothing, since this would lead to his being unjustly enriched. The exact scope and rationale of the present group of exceptional cases must therefore remain very much in doubt.

(d) CONTRACT VOID. In Craven-Ellis v Canons Ltd<sup>89</sup> the claimant worked for the defendant company as managing director. His service agreement with the company was void as neither he nor those who appointed him held the necessary qualification shares. Thus he could not recover his agreed pay.<sup>90</sup> But the Court of Appeal held that he was entitled to a quantum meruit. The position is the same where a contract with a company is void because the company was not yet in existence or had been dissolved<sup>91</sup> when the contract was made.<sup>92</sup> A similar principle may apply where goods have been supplied under a contract of sale which is void for a mistake as to the identity of the buyer.<sup>93</sup>

Where the express contract is a nullity, the argument that the court must not interfere with the bargain between the parties loses much of its force. It does not seem that liability in these cases is based on an agreement which can be implied from voluntary acceptance by the defendant of the claimant's services,<sup>94</sup> for the parties usually think that they are acting under an existing valid contract. In Craven-Ellis v Canons Ltd Greer L.J. said that the liability to pay a quantum meruit "is an inference which a rule of law imposes on the parties where work has been done or goods have been delivered under what purports to be a binding contract but is not so in fact".<sup>95</sup>

The principle just stated may, however, be displaced by countervailing policy considerations. In Guinness plc v Saunders<sup>96</sup> a company director did work for the company in the course of negotiations for a take-over bid which was being made by the company. The

<sup>86</sup> Similar reasoning may explain an analogous suggestion in The Ballenita [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 455 at 466 that the market price must be paid for goods, delivery of which is taken by the buyer after his acceptance of the seller's repudiation by delay.

<sup>87</sup> Hain SS Co Ltd v Tate & Lyle Ltd (1936) 41 Com. Cas. 350 at 358, 367; above, p.821, n.55.

<sup>88</sup> Miles v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [1987] A.C. 539 at 552–553, 561; above p.822.

<sup>89</sup> [1936] 2 K.B. 403; Denning, (1939) 55 L.Q.R. 54.

<sup>90</sup> cf. Re Bodega Co [1904] 1 Ch. 276: if he is paid his contractual remuneration he must pay it back.

<sup>91</sup> See above, pp.735–736.

<sup>92</sup> Rover International Ltd v Cannon Films Ltd (No.3) [1989] 1 W.L.R. 912; Cotronic (UK) Ltd v Dezonie [1991] B.C.L.C. 721, above, p.736. For pre-incorporation contracts with limited liability partnerships, see Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000, s.5(2), above, p.732.

<sup>93</sup> e.g. on the facts of Boulton v Jones (1857) 27 L.J. Ex. 117, for the exact nature of the appropriate remedy in such a situation, see above, p.305.

<sup>94</sup> Contra, Denning, above, n.89.

<sup>95</sup> At 410. cf. Lamford v Billericay RDC [1903] 1 K.B. 772 (the actual decision has been made obsolete by the Corporate Bodies Contracts Act 1960; above, p.566, n.70).

<sup>96</sup> [1990] 2 A.C. 663; Beaton and Prentice, 106 L.Q.R. 365.

agreement under which the work was done was void because those who purported to make it on behalf of the company had no authority to do so. It was held that the director was not entitled to quantum meruit since the terms of the agreement (by which his remuneration increased with the amount paid by the company) gave rise to a conflict between his own financial interest and his fiduciary duty to the company as one of its directors.

(e) CONTRACT FRUSTRATED. Work done under a contract before it is frustrated does not give rise to any quantum meruit claim at common law, though a claim in respect of a valuable benefit conferred by such work can be made under the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943.<sup>97</sup> But if work is done under the contract after frustration, it may be possible to claim a quantum meruit on the principle of Craven-Ellis v Canons Ltd. The argument that the court must not interfere with the express contract is here met by the fact that the contract has no longer any legal force. A contract for the carriage of goods may be frustrated because the method of performance becomes impossible. The carrier may nonetheless get the goods to their destination in some other way. So long as he acts reasonably in doing so, he can claim a quantum meruit. It is irrelevant that a new contract cannot be implied from the mere fact that the cargo-owner accepts the cargo at its destination.<sup>98</sup>

---

<sup>97</sup> s.1(3), above, p.913. cf. also the rights of "commercial agents" under the legislation discussed at pp.919–920, above.

<sup>98</sup> The Massalia [1961] 2 Q.B. 278; overruled in The Eugenia [1964] 2 Q.B. 226, but not on this point.

INDEX

- ABOLITION BY STATUTE
frustration, and, 880
- ABSOLUTE CONTRACT; DOCTRINE OF
frustration, and, 866
- ACCEPTANCE
anticipatory breach, and
effects, 859–864
generally, 858–859 “battle of forms”, and, 20–21 communication of conduct of offeror, by, 23
exceptional cases, 23–30
general rule, 22–23
offeror’s agent, to, 23
post, by, 24–30
terms, 23–24
conduct, and
generally, 18–19
offeror’s conduct, 23
silence, 35
continuing negotiations, and, 17–18 cross-offers, and, 36–37
definition “battle of forms”, 20–21
conduct, 18–19
continuing negotiations, 17–18
introduction, 16–17
tenders, 21–22
unqualified, 19–20
electronic communications, and cancellation of distance contracts, 30
garbled messages, 28
generally, 26
garbled messages, 28
ignorance of offer, in cross-offers, 36–37
generally, 36
motive, 37
methods
generally, 30–31
silence, 31–35
misdirection, 27–28
offeror’s agent, to, 23
part performance, by bankers’ irrevocable credits, 40
continuing guarantees, 39–40
estate agents’ contracts, 40–41
extent of recovery, 41
generally, 38–39
introduction, 38
posting rule, and
application of rule, 26
cancellation of distance contracts, 30
generally, 24
international sales, 29–30
- ACCEPTANCE—cont.
posting rule, and—cont.
introduction, 24
misdirection of post, 27–28
purpose, 24–25
reasonable to use post, 25–26
revocation, 28–29
terms of offer, 26
prescribed method, 30–31
silence
conduct, and, 35
generally, 31–34
telephone communications, and
garbled messages, 28
generally, 26
tender, by, 22
tenders, of, 21–22
unilateral contracts, in classification, 37–38
general rules, 38
part performance, 38–41
- ACCEPTANCE OF ANTICIPATORY BREACH
effects, 859–864
generally, 858–859
- ACCURATE RECORDING OF PRIOR AGREEMENT
rectification, and, 324–325
- ACKNOWLEDGMENT
acceptance, and, 17
assignment, and, 673–674
past consideration, and, 80–81
- ACTUAL AND MARKET VALUES
defective delivery, 950–952
failure to accept and pay, 954
failure to deliver, 953–954
introduction, 948
late delivery, 949–950
non-delivery, 948–949
other loss, 954–955
refusal to accept and pay, 952–953
- ACTUAL CONFIDENCE
presumed undue influence, and, 413–414
- ACTUAL PRESSURE
generally, 408–409
presumed undue influence, and, 418
- ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION equity, and, 76–77
introduction, 73–74
nominal consideration
generally, 74–75
inadequate consideration, and, 75–76
- ADMINISTRATIVE CONTROL
standard form contracts, and, 283–285
- ADVANCE PAYMENT
gaming and wagering contracts, and, 525–526

ADVERTISEMENT

invitation to treat, and, 13–14

AFFIRMATION

damages for misrepresentation, and, 352
 rescission for misrepresentation, and, 383–384
 seriousness of breach of contract, and, 238–240
 unconscionable bargains, and, 423–424

AGENCY

agreement, by customary authority, 711–712
   express authority, 710–711
   implied authority, 711–712
   incidental authority, 711
   introduction, 705
 apparent authority, by
   effects, 748
   forgeries by agent, and, 715–716
   generally, 712
   introduction, 706
   reliance by third party, 714–715
   representation, 712–714
   subsequent conduct of principal, 716
   termination, 750–751
 banker/customer, and, 707
 bankruptcy, and, 750
 buyer/seller, and, 706–707
 capacity
   acting as agent, 709–710
   acting as principal, 710
 commercial agents, and
   generally, 709
   termination, 750
 commission, 740–744
 creation agreement, by, 710–712
   apparent authority, by, 712–716
   introduction, 710
   necessity, by, 718–722
   ratification, by, 722–726
   usual authority, by, 716–718 customary authority, by, 711–712 death, and, 750
 definition agreement, 705
   generally, 705
 duties of agent to principal act with due care and skill, 745 carry out instructions, 745 fiduciary, 745–747
   indemnity, 748
   personal performance, 747–748
 effects between agent and third party, 732–740 between principal and agent, 740–748 between principal and third party, 727–732
   introduction, 727
   non-consensual agency, 748
 estate agents, 708
 EU law, and, 709
 express authority, by, 710–711 fiduciary duties of agent to principal bribes, 746–747

AGENCY—cont.

fiduciary duties of agent to principal—cont.
   conflict of interest, and, 745–746
   secret profits, 746–747
 gaming and wagering contracts, and
   advance payment, 525–526
   agent's indemnity, 524
   agent's liability to account, 525
   excepted transactions, 526
   failure to obey instruction, 524
 hire-purchase, and, 707
 implied authority, by, 711–712 incidental authority, by, 711 inconsistent conduct, and, 749
 indemnity
   duties of agent to principal, 748 rights of agent against principal, 744 intention to act, 706–709
 insanity, and, 749
 irrevocable agency, and, 751–752
 liability of principal to third party, 731–732 lien, 744–745 necessity, and acceptance of bill of exchange, 718
   effects, 748
   improvement of another's property, 720
   introduction, 718
   preservation of another's property, 719–721
   preservation of life or health, 721 sale of another's property, 719
   salvage, 719
   scope, 721–722
   shipmasters, 718–719
   termination, 750–751
 non-consensual apparent authority, 712–716
   effects, 748
   necessity, 718–722
   termination, and, 750–751
   usual authority, 716–718
 non-existent principal rights of agent against third party, 735–736 rights of principal against third party, 730–731
 notice, and commercial agents, 750
   generally, 749
 operation of law, by, 705
 privity of contract, and burden of contract, and, 639–640
   exceptions, and, 645–646
   parties to agreement, and, 584–585
 professional advisers, and, 708
 ratification, by conditions, 723–725
   effect, 726
   introduction, 722
   nature, 722–723
 retailers, and, 706–707
 rights of agent against principal commission, 740–744
   indemnity, 744

AGENCY—cont.

- rights of agent against principal—cont.
  - lien, 744–745
- rights of principal against third party
  - disclosed principal, 727
  - introduction, 727
  - non-existent principal, 730–731
  - undisclosed principal, 727–730
- services, and, 707–708
- subsequent conduct of principal, by, 716
- termination
  - bankruptcy, by, 750
  - commercial agents, and, 750
  - death, by, 750
  - inconsistent conduct, by, 749
  - insanity, by, 749
  - introduction, 748
  - irrevocable agency, and, 751–752
  - non-consensual agency, and, 750–751
  - notice, by, 749
- undisclosed principal
  - rights of agent against third party, 734
  - rights of principal against third party, 727–730
- usual authority, by
  - effects, 748
  - introduction, 706
  - meaning, 716–717
  - scope, 717–718
  - termination, 750–751

AGREED SUM, ACTION FOR
basis

- conduct of injured party, 1015–1019
  - duty to pay price, 1014
  - introduction, 1014
  - rules of law, 1014–1015
- conduct of injured party
  - election to keep contract alive, 1015–101
  - election to terminate, 1015
  - introduction, 1015
- distinction from damages, 1013–1014
- introduction, 843
- privity of contract, and, 591

AGREEMENT

- acceptance
  - and see* Acceptance
  - communication of, 22–30
  - definition, 16–22
  - ignorance of offer, in, 36–37
  - prescribed method, 30–35
  - unilateral contracts, in, 37–41
- agency by
  - customary authority, 711–712
  - express authority, 710–711
  - implied authority, 711–712
  - incidental authority, 711
  - introduction, 705
- certainty
  - and see* Certainty
  - incompleteness, 51–62
  - introduction, 49
  - vagueness, 49–51

AGREEMENT—cont.

- conditional agreements
  - classification, 62
  - degrees of obligation, 62–66
- introduction, 8
- multipartite agreements, 47–48
- offer
  - and see* Offer
  - acceptance of, 16–41
  - definition, 8–10
  - invitation to treat, and, 10–16
  - place and time of taking effect, 16
  - termination of, 41–47
- reference to third party, 48
- sale of land, 48–49
- special cases
  - introduction, 47
  - multipartite agreements, 47–48
  - reference to third party, 48
  - sale of land, 48–49
- termination of offer
  - and see* Termination of offer
  - death, 44–45
  - lapse of time, 43–44
  - occurrence of condition, 44
  - rejection, 43
  - supervening incapacity, 45–47
  - withdrawal, 41–42

AGREEMENT TO EXECUTE CONTRACT incompleteness, and, 59AGREEMENT TO NEGOTIATE incompleteness, and, 59–62AID TO CONSTRUCTION parol evidence rule, and, 197–198ALLOCATION OF RISK standard form contracts, and, 215ALTERNATIVE OBLIGATIONS
frustration, and, 892–893
misrepresentation, and, 335–336
mistake negating consent, and, 307AMBIGUOUS WORDS exemption clauses, and, 221ANGER intention to create legal relations, and, 171ANTECEDENT DEBT bills of exchange, and, 80
general rule, 79ANTECEDENT PROHIBITION frustration, and, 888–890ANTICIPATORY BREACH acceptance

- effects, 859–864
- generally, 858–859

 damages, 859–860

- generally, 857–858

 rescission, 860–864
 ANTI-COMPETITIVE AGREEMENTS
price-maintenance, and, 474 restraint of trade, and, 475–477ANXIETY
damages, and, 992–993

APPARENT AUTHORITY

- effects, 748
- forges by agent, and, 715–716
- generally, 712
- introduction, 706
- reliance by third party, 714–715
- representations
  - authorisation to act, of, 713
  - authority, of, 712–713
  - fact, of, 713
  - made by principal, 713–714
  - made to third party, 714
- subsequent conduct of principal, 716
- termination, 750–751

ARBITRATION CLAUSES

- exemption clauses, and, 237
- ousting jurisdiction of court, and, 447

ARCHITECTS

- agency, and, 708

ARM'S LENGTH TRANSACTIONS

- standard form contracts, and, 215

ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES

- actual and market values
  - defective delivery, 950–952
  - failure to accept and pay, 954
  - failure to deliver, 953–954
  - introduction, 948
  - late delivery, 949–950
  - non-delivery, 948–949
  - other loss, 954–955
  - refusal to accept and pay, 952–953
- alternatives, 958–959
- bases
  - loss of bargain, 944–948
  - reliance, 944
  - restitution, 944
- introduction, 944
- misrepresentation, and, 359–362
- speculative damages, 955–957
- taxation, 957–958
- time for
  - anticipatory breach, and, 962–964
  - breach, at, 959–960
  - discovery of breach, at, 960–961
  - introduction, 959
  - late performance, at, 962
  - possibility of acting on knowledge of breach, at, 961
  - reasonableness, 961–962

ASSIGNMENT

- acknowledgment, and, 673–674
- bankruptcy, and, 699–701
- charge, by, 676–677
- claim by debtor against assignor
  - amount of claim, 691
  - generally, 689–691
- common law, at
  - acknowledgment, 673–674
  - introduction, 672
  - novation, 673
  - power of attorney, 674
- communication to assignee, 680

ASSIGNMENT—cont.

- conditional assignment, and, 677–678
- consideration
  - equitable assignments, 683–688
  - future property assignments, 683
  - generally, 682–683
  - negotiability, and, 692–693
  - statutory assignments, 683
- death, and, 699
- debt, and, 678
- defects of title
  - generally, 689
  - negotiability, and, 692
- equitable choses, and, 675
- equity, in
  - consideration, 683–688
  - equitable choses, 675
  - introduction, 674
  - legal choses, 674–675
- formalities, 678–679
- future property, and, 683
- general requirements
  - communication to assignee, 680
  - formalities, 678–679
  - intention, 679–680
  - notice to debtor, 680–682
- intention, 679–680
- introduction, 672
- legal choses, and, 674–675
- liquidated claims, 696
- mere rights of action
  - liquidated claims, 696
  - introduction, 695
  - public policy, 698
  - tort claims, 696
  - unliquidated claims, 696–698
- negotiable instruments, and
  - consideration, 692–693
  - defects of title, 692
  - introduction, 691–692
  - transfer, 692
- non-assignable rights
  - expressly worded contracts, 693
  - liquidated claims, 696
  - mere rights of action, 695–698
  - personal contracts, 693–695
  - tort claims, 696
  - unliquidated claims, 696–698
- notice to debtor
  - effects, 681–682
  - method, 680–681
- novation, and, 673
- operation of law, by
  - bankruptcy, 699–701
  - death, 699
- part of debt, and, 677
- performance of contract, and, 758
- personal contracts, 693–695
- power of attorney, and, 674
- privity of contract, and, 646
- public policy, 698
- rectification, and, 326

ASSIGNMENT—cont.

- statute, under
  - absolute assignment, 676–678
  - consideration, 683
  - debt, 678
  - introduction, 675–676
  - legal thing in action, 678
- subject to equities
  - amount of claim, 691
  - claim by debtor against assignor, 689–691
  - defects of title, 689
  - introduction, 689
- thing in action, and, 678
- transfer of liabilities, and
  - bankruptcy, 704
  - benefit and burden, 702–704
  - death, 704
  - insolvency, 704
  - introduction, 701
  - legislative provision, 704
  - novation, 701–702
- unliquidated claims, 696–698
- vicarious performance of contract, and, 758

ASSUMPTION OF RESPONSIBILITY

- misrepresentation, and, 347–348

ATTORNEY, POWER OF

- assignment, and, 674
- irrevocable agency, and, 751–752

AUCTIONS SALES WITHOUT RESERVE

- consideration, and, 155

AUCTION SALES

- invitation to treat, and, 11–12
- restraint of trade, and, 474

BAILMENT ON TERMS

- privity of contract, and, 640–642

BALANCE OF CONVENIENCE

- injunctions, and, 1040–1041

BALANCE OF DEBT

- assignment, and, 675

BANKER/CUSTOMER RELATIONSHIP

- agency, and, 707

BANKERS' IRREVOCABLE CREDITS

- consideration, and, 152–153
- part performance, and, 40

BANKING

- standard form contracts, and, 215

BANKRUPTCY

- agency, and, 750
- assignment, and, 699–701
- plurality of debtors, and, 574
- transfer of liabilities, and, 704

BARGAIN, LOSS OF

- basis of assessment, 944–948
- generally, 937–940

“BATTLE OF FORMS”

- acceptance, and, 20–21

BENEFIT AND DETRIMENT

- consideration, and, 68–69

BENEFIT OF CONTRACT

- assignment, and
- and see* Assignment

BENEFIT OF CONTRACT—cont.

- assignment, and—cont.
  - generally, 672
- privity of contract, and
  - clauses defining duties, 637–638
  - Himalaya clauses, 631–636
  - introduction, 627–631
  - other drafting devices, 637
- transfer of liabilities, and, 702–704

BILLS OF EXCHANGE

- agency of necessity, and, 718
- antecedent debt, and, 80
- assignment, and
  - consideration, 692–693
  - defects of title, 692
  - generally, 691–692
  - introduction, 672
  - transfer, 692
- form of contract, and, 177

BILLS OF LADING

- assignment, and, 675

BILLS OF SALE

- form of contract, and
- effect of non-compliance, 179
- generally, 177

“BLUE PENCIL” TEST

- severance of promises, and, 507

BREACH OF CONDITION

- substantial failure to perform, and, 800–804

BREACH OF CONTRACT

- acceptance of breach
  - effects, 859–864
  - generally, 858–859
- affirmation
  - effects, 855–856
  - introduction, 844
  - option, 844–849
- agreed sum, action for
  - availability, 1014–1019
  - distinction from damages, 1013–1014
  - introduction, 843
- anticipatory breach
  - damages, 859–860
  - generally, 857–858
  - rescission, 860–864
- conditional contracts, 842
- damages
  - contract, under, 999–1007
  - generally, 926–927
  - introduction, 843
  - part payment, 1007–1013
  - principles, 927–944
  - quantification, 944–964
  - restrictions, 964–999
  - specific performance, and, 1046–1049
- defective performance, 834
- effects of
  - introduction, 843–844
  - option to rescind or affirm, 844–857
- effects of affirmation, 855–856
- effects of rescission
  - change of course, and, 856–857

BREACH OF CONTRACT—*cont.effects of rescission—cont.

introduction, 849

obligations of party of breach, on, 850–855

obligations of victim, on, 849–850

failure to perform

and see Failure to perform

generally, 832–834

introduction, 759

rescission, 759–826

fault-based liability, 840–841

incapacitating oneself, 834–835

injunction

generally, 1040–1042

introduction, 843

specific performance, and, 1042–1046

introduction, 832

lawful excuse, and

examples, 835–836

introduction, 835

statement of excuse, 836–838

option to rescind or affirm

employment contracts, 845–846

exercise of, 848–849

generally, 844–845

insurance contracts, 846–847

restriction on choice, 847–848

refusal to perform, 832–834

remedies

agreed sum action, 1013–1019 combination of, 1046–1049

damages, 926–1013

injunction, 1040–1046

introduction, 926

restitution, 1049–1064

specific performance, 1019–1040

repudiation before performance due

acceptance of breach, 858–859

anticipatory breach doctrine, 857–858

non-acceptance of breach, 864–865

rescission

and see Rescission

effects, 849–855

generally, 759–826

introduction, 844

option, 844–849

rescission for misrepresentation, and, 370

restitution

introduction, 1049

quantum meruit, 1061–1064

recovery of money paid, 1049–1061

specific performance

basis, 1020–1026

discretion, 1026–1029

generally, 1019–1020

introduction, 843

mutuality, 1037–1038

third parties, and, 1038–1040

unenforceable contracts, 1029–1037

standard of duty

conditional contracts, 842

fault-based liability, 840–841

BREACH OF CONTRACT—*cont.standard of duty—cont.

introduction, 838

strict liability, 838–840

supervening events, 842

strict liability, 838–840

supervening events, 842

termination by notice, and, 842–843

BREACH OF FIDUCIARY DUTIES

exemption clauses, and, 243

BREACH OF FUNDAMENTAL TERM

substantial failure to perform, and, 805–807

BREACH OF WARRANTY

substantial failure to perform, and, 804–805

BRIBESfiduciary duties of agent to principal, and,
746–747BUILDING CONTRACTS

specific performance, and, 1035

third party's loss, and, 594–598

BURDEN OF CONTRACT

privity of contract, and

agency, 639–640

bailment on terms, 640–642

clauses defining duties, 642–643

derivative rights, 643–645

exceptions, 639–645

general rule, 638–639

implied contract, 639–640

transfer of liabilities, and, 702–704

BURDEN OF PROOF

presumed undue influence, and, 418

seriousness of breach of contract, and, 240–241

BUSINESS EFFICACY TEST

implied terms, and, 201–203

BUSINESS LIABILITY

exemption clauses, and, 247–248

BUYER/SELLER RELATIONSHIP

agency, and, 706–707

CANCELLATION

distance contracts, and, 30

form of contract, and, 176–177

CAPACITY

agency, and

acting as agent, 709–710

acting as principal, 710

corporations

common law, at, 560

Companies Act, under, 560–563

limited liability partnerships, 563

special statute, under, 563–567

statute, under, 560–567

drink and drugs, 559

mental patients

generally, 557–558

introduction, 557

necessaries, 558–559

minors

and see below

introduction, 539

liability in restitution, 551–557

CAPACITY—*cont.*minors—cont.

- liability in tort, 551
- other contracts, 549–550
- valid contracts, 539–545
- voidable contracts, 545–549
- non est factum*, and, 329
- principal, and, 710

CAPACITY OF MINORS

fraud

- common law, at, 554
  - equity, in, 554–556
- introduction, 539
- liability in restitution
- common law, at, 556–557
  - court's discretion, 553–554
  - fraud, 554–556
  - generally, 551
  - scope, 551–553

liability in tort, 551

necessaries, contracts for

- executory contracts, 541–543
- introduction, 539
- loans, 543
- maintenance legislation, 543
- necessary goods, 540–541
- services rendered, 541

other contracts

- binding other party, 549
- executed contracts, 549–550
- introduction, 549
- passing of property, 550
- ratification, 549

recovery of money paid, 548

repudiation

- effects, 547–548
- time, 547

restitution, 548

service contracts, 543–545

valid contracts

- necessaries, 539–543
- services, 543–545

voidable contracts

- introduction, 545
- land, 545–546
- loans, 547
- marriage settlements, 547
- partnership, 546
- reasons, 548–549
- repudiation, and, 547–548
- shares in companies, 546

CARE AND SKILL

- duties of agent to principal, and, 745

CARELESSNESS

- non est factum*, and, 329

CARRIAGE OF GOODS/PASSENGERS

- exemption clauses, and
  - generally, 265
  - international rules, 266
- standard form contracts, and, 215

CARRY OUT INSTRUCTIONS

- duties of agent to principal, and, 745

CAUSATION

- concurrent causes, 975
- generally, 974–975
- intervening acts, 9767

CERTAINTY

incompleteness

- agreement in principle only, 51–52
- contract to make a contract, 5962
- execution of formal document, 54–55
- facts to be ascertained, 59
- “subject to contract” agreement, 52–54
- terms left open, 55–59

introduction, 49

vagueness

- custom, 49–50
- duty to resolve, 50
- introduction, 49
- meaningless phrases, 50–51
- reasonableness, 50
- self-contradictory phrases, 50–51
- trade usage, 49–50

CHAMPERTY

- assignment, and, 672, 695
- illegality, and, 430–431

CHANGE OF POSITION

- gambling stolen money, and, 538

CHANGES IN LAW

- commission of legal wrong, and, 438–439

CHANGES MADE TO SUBJECT-MATTER

- misrepresentation, and
  - by misrepresentee, 378
  - by misrepresenter, 379

CHARGE

- assignment, and, 676–677

CHARTER CORPORATIONS

- supervening incapacity, and, 46–47

CHARTERPARTIES

- exemption clauses, and, 265
- frustration, and, 917

CHATTELS

- privity of contract, and
  - general principle, 620–621
- introduction, 619–620
- possessory rights, 624–625
- remedy, 621–622
- special cases, 620
- third party liability, 622–624

CHEQUES

- assignment, and
  - consideration, 692–693
  - defects of title, 692
  - generally, 691–692
  - introduction, 672
  - transfer, 692
- performance of contract, and, 754–755

CHILDREN

- intention to create legal relations, and, 165

CHIPS FOR GAMING

- enforcement, 520
- stolen money, and, 536–538

CHOICE OF LAW

- exemption clauses, and, 263–264, 266–267

CHOICE OF LAW—cont.

- unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 283

CHOICES IN ACTION, ASSIGNMENT OF

- common law, at, 672
- equitable, 675
- equity, in, 674
- legal, 674–675

CITATION OF AUTHORITIES

- implied terms, and, 207

CIVIL LIABILITY, INDEMNITY AGAINST

- arising out of criminal acts, 436–437
- generally, 435–436

CIVIL WRONG, CONTRACT FOR COMMISSION OF

- both parties innocent, 433
- introduction, 432
- one party innocent, 432–433

CLARIFICATION OF LEGAL RELATIONSHIP

- non-disclosure, and, 399

CLASS-PROTECTING STATUTES

- restitution (illegality), and, 491–493

CLAUSES DEFINING DUTIES

- benefit of contract, and, 637–638
- burden of contract, and, 642–643

COERCION

- duress, and, 405–406

COLLATERAL CONTRACTS

- agency, and, 738
- damages for misrepresentation, and, 356–357
- parol evidence rule, and, 199–200
- part payment of debt, and, 130
- privity of contract, and
  - consideration, 584
  - contractual intention, 584
  - illustrations, 582–583
- rights of agent against third party, and, 738
- “subject to contract” agreement, and, 54

COLLATERAL TRANSACTIONS

- illegality, and, 510–511

COLLATERAL UNDERSTANDING

- intention to create legal relations, and, 164

COLLECTIVE AGREEMENTS

- implied terms, and, 213–214
- intention to create legal relations, and, 168–169

COMFORT LETTERS

- intention to create legal relations, and, 167–168

COMMERCIAL AGENTS

- frustration, and, 919–920
- generally, 709
- termination, 750

COMMERCIAL PRESSURE

- duress, and, 406

COMMERCIAL RELATIONSHIPS

- negligent misrepresentation, and, 349

COMMISSION

- rights of agent against principal, and, 740–744

COMMISSION OF LEGAL WRONG, CONTRACTS

INVOLVING

- amounting to legal wrong, 430–432
- change in law, and, 438–439
- commission of civil wrong
  - both parties innocent, 433
  - introduction, 432

COMMISSION OF LEGAL WRONG, CONTRACTS

INVOLVING—*cont.*commission of civil wrong—cont.

- one party innocent, 432–433
- commission of crime, 432
- indemnity against civil liability
  - arising out of criminal acts, 436–437
  - generally, 435–436
- indemnity against criminal liability, 435
- introduction, 430
- method of performance unlawful, 433–435
- promise to pay on commission of unlawful act, 437–438
- subject-matter used for unlawful purpose, 433

COMMON JUSTICE

- duress, and, 408

COMMON LAW CORPORATIONS

- capacity, and, 560

COMMUNICATION OF ACCEPTANCE

- conduct of offeror, by, 23
- exceptional cases, 23–30
- general rule, 22–23
- offeror's agent, to, 23
- posting rule, and
  - application of rule, 26
- cancellation of distance contracts, 30
- generally, 24
- international sales, 29–30
- introduction, 24
- misdirection of post, 27–28
- purpose, 24–25
- reasonable to use post, 25–26
- revocation, 28–29
- terms of offer, 26
- terms, 23–24

COMPANIES

capacity

- common law, at, 560
- Companies Act, under, 560–563
- limited liability partnerships, 563
- special statute, under, 563–567
- statute, under, 560–567
- collateral contracts, and, 586
- supervening incapacity, and, 46–47

COMPANY'S POWERS

- misrepresentation, and, 333–334

COMPANY-RELATED CONTRACTS

- exemption clauses, and, 265
- unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 278

COMPENSATION ORDERS IN CRIMINAL CASES

- damages for misrepresentation, and, 369

COMPETITION

- restraint of trade, and, 475–477

COMPOSITION AGREEMENTS

- part payment of debt, and, 129–130

COMPROMISE

- consideration, and
  - doubtful claims, 89
- executed compromises, 90
- introduction, 87
- invalid claims, 88–90
- valid claims, 87–88

- COMPROMISE—cont.
 non-disclosure, and, 398
- COMPULSION OR COERCION
 duress, and, 405–406
- CONCURRENT CONDITION
 distinction between conditions and promises criteria, 764–765
   effects, 765–766
 generally, 763
 wrongful refusal to accept performance, and,
   766–769
- CONDITION
 consideration, and, 72–73
- CONDITION PRECEDENT
 distinction between conditions and promises criteria, 764–765
   effects, 765–766
 generally, 762–763
 wrongful refusal to accept performance, and,
   766–769
- CONDITIONAL ASSIGNMENT
 assignment, and, 677–678
- CONDITIONAL CONTRACTS
 breach of contract, and, 842
 classification, 62
 degrees of obligation, 62–66
 specific performance, and, 1035–1036
- CONDITIONAL FEE AGREEMENTS
 champerty, and, 431
- CONDITIONS, WARRANTIES AND INTERMEDIATE TERMS
 bases of distinction, 790–791
 breach of condition, and, 800–804 breach of warranty, and, 804–805 express classification, 791–792
 generally, 788
 innominate terms, 795–800
 intermediate terms, 795–800
 nature of distinction, 788–789
 statutory classification, 792–793 technical application of distinction, 793–795
- CONDUCT
 acceptance, and
   generally, 18–19
   offeror's conduct, 23
   silence, 35
 mistake, and, 297–298
 non-disclosure, and, 390
 offer, and, 9–10
- CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION
 restraint of trade, and, 455
- CONFLICT OF INTEREST
 fiduciary duties of agent to principal, and, 745–746
- CONSENT
 mistake, and
   and see Mistake negating consent
   effect, 306–309
   inducement to contract, 304–306
   introduction, 298
   person, as to, 298–303
   subject-matter, as to, 303–304
- CONSENT—cont.
 mistake, and—cont.
   terms of contract, as to, 304
   theoretical basis, 309–310
- CONSEQUENTIAL LOSS
 damages, and, 944
- CONSIDERATION
 acknowledgment of debt, 80–81 adequacy equity, and, 76–77
   introduction, 73–74
   nominal consideration, 74–76
 antecedent debt
   bills of exchange, and, 80
   general rule, 79
 assignment, and
   equitable assignments, 683–688
   future property assignments, 683
   generally, 682–683
   negotiability, and, 692–693
   statutory assignments, 683
 auctions sales without reserve, 155
 bankers' irrevocable credits, 152–153
 benefit and detriment, and, 68–69 collateral contracts, and, 583
 compromise
   doubtful claims, 89
   executed compromises, 90
   introduction, 87
   invalid claims, 88–90
   valid claims, 87–88
 condition, and, 72–73
 defective promises
   introduction, 149
   performance of, 150
   policy considerations, 149–150
   statute, under, 150–151
 definitions
   benefit and detriment, 68–69
   condition, 72–73
   invented consideration, 71 limited effects of promises, 73
   motive, 72
   mutual promises, 70–71
   other, 69–70
 doubtful claims, 89
 duty imposed by contract with promisor factual benefit to promisor, 95–96
   introduction, 94
   no consideration cases, 94–95
   other, 96–97
 duty imposed by contract with third party
   introduction, 97
   performance, 97–98
   promise to perform, 98
 duty imposed by law
   additional consideration, 93
   introduction, 92
   public policy, 92
   rewards for information leading to arrest, 92–93

CONSIDERATION—cont.

- economic value
  - compromise, 87–91
  - forbearance to sue, 87–91
  - illusory consideration, 83–85
  - introduction, 83
  - onerous property, 87
  - performance of existing duty, 92–98
  - trivial acts or objects, 85–86
- equitable assignment, and
  - after Judicature Act 1873, 687–688
  - before Judicature Act 1873, 684–687
  - introduction, 683
- executed compromises, 90
- firm offers, 153–155
- forbearance to sue
  - actual, 90–91
  - doubtful claims, 89
  - executed compromises, 90
  - introduction, 87
  - invalid claims, 88–90
  - valid claims, 87–88
- future property assignments, and, 683
  - generally, 67–68
- gift of onerous property, 87
- gratuitous bailments, 156
- gratuitous services, 156–158
- guarantee, and, 183
- illegality, and, 67
- illusory consideration, 83–85
- inadequate consideration, 75–76
- intention to create legal relations, and, 173–175
- introduction
  - definitions, 68–73
  - general, 67–68
- invalid claims, 88–90
- invented consideration, 71
- moral obligation, 79–80
- motive, and, 72
- “move from the promisee” rule
  - benefit to promisor, 82–83
  - introduction, 81
  - movement to promisor, and, 81
  - third party rights, 83
- mutual promises, and, 70–71
- negotiable instruments, and, 692–693
- nominal consideration
  - generally, 74–75
  - inadequate consideration, and, 75–76
- novation of partnership debts, 155–156
- onerous property, 87
- parol evidence rule, and, 201
- part payment of debt, and
  - common law limitations, 126–130
- equitable evasion, 130–134
- general rule, 125–126
- past consideration
  - antecedent debt, 79
  - general rule, 77–78
  - moral obligation, 79–80
  - past act or promise, 78–79
  - statutory exceptions, 80–81

CONSIDERATION—cont.

- performance of existing duty
    - imposed by contract with promisor, 94–97
    - imposed by contract with third party, 97–98
    - imposed by law, 92–93
    - introduction, 92
  - privity of contract, and
    - generally, 587
    - introduction, 83
  - promises
    - generally, 68–70
    - limited effects, 73
    - mutuality, 70–71
  - promises in deeds, 158–160
  - proprietary estoppel, and
    - effects of doctrine, 142–149
    - introduction, 134–135
    - scope of doctrine, 135–142
  - reform proposals, 160–161
  - rescission, and, 99–101
  - severance, and
    - apportionment to legal part, 506
    - extent of illegality, 504–505
  - special cases
    - auctions sales without reserve, 155
    - bankers’ irrevocable credits, 152–153
    - defective promises, 149–151
    - firm offers, 153–155
    - gratuitous bailments, 156
    - gratuitous services, 156–158
    - novation of partnership debts, 155–156
    - unilateral contracts, 151–152
  - statutory assignments, and, 683
  - trivial acts or objects, 85–86
  - unilateral contracts, 151–152
  - valid claims, 87–88
  - variation, and, 101–102
  - waiver, and
    - common law, at, 102–105
    - equity, in, 105–125
- CONSPIRACY TO COMMIT CRIME
- illegality, and, 432
- CONSTANT SUPERVISION, CONTRACTS REQUIRING
- specific performance, and, 1032–1034
- CONSTRUCTION
- mistake of law, and, 315
- CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT
- mistake, and, 294–297
- CONSTRUCTION OF EXEMPTION CLAUSES
- contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
  - introduction, 221
  - negligence
    - introduction, 222–223
    - party liable irrespective, 223–224
    - party liable only for negligence, 224–225
  - seriousness of breach
    - affirmation, and, 238–240
    - applicable clauses, 237–238
    - burden of proof, 240–241
    - deviation cases, 228–231
    - general rule, 225–226
    - general statements, 233–234

CONSTRUCTION OF EXEMPTION CLAUSES—cont.

- seriousness of breach—cont.
  - illustrations, 234–236
  - manner of breach, 231–233
  - nature of rule, 233–237
  - nature of term broken, 226–228
  - rescission, 238–240
  - scope of rule, 226–233
  - total breach, 236–237

CONSTRUCTION OF RULES OF ASSOCIATION ousting jurisdiction of court, and, 450CONSTRUCTION OF WORDS parol evidence rule, and, 197–198CONSUMER
unfair terms in consumer contracts, and,
269–270CONSUMER CONTRACTS
exemption clauses, and, 253–254
unfair terms, and*and see* Unfair Terms in Consumer

- Contracts Regulations
  - definitions, 268–276
  - drafting terms, 280–281
  - effects of unfairness, 281–282
  - excluded contracts, 277–280
  - excluded terms, 276–277
  - generally, 267
  - interpretation of terms, 280–281
  - relation with UCTA, 267–268
  - restrictions on evasion, 283

CONSUMER CREDIT AGREEMENT
form of contract, and effect of non-compliance, 179
generally, 178
introduction, 176–177
prescribed forms, and, 285CONSUMER PROTECTION substantial failure to perform, and, 781CONSUMER TRADE PRACTICES generally, 428CONTEMPLATION OF DIVORCE contracts contrary to public policy, and, 441CONTENTS OF CONTRACT custom, by, 213–214
express terms

- introduction, 191
- joinder of documents, 191–192
- parol evidence rule, 192–201

 implied terms

- fact, in, 201–206
- introduction, 201
- law, in, 206–213

 introduction, 191
usage, by, 213–214CONTINGENCY FEE AGREEMENTS champerty, and, 431CONTINUING GUARANTEES part performance, and, 39–40CONTINUING NEGOTIATIONS acceptance, and, 17–18*CONTRA PROFERENTEM* RULE introduction, 221–222*CONTRA PROFERENTEM* RULE—cont.

- negligence, and
  - introduction, 222–223
  - party liable irrespective, 223–224
  - party liable only for negligence, 224–225
- seriousness of breach, and
  - affirmation, 238–240
  - applicable clauses, 237–238
  - burden of proof, 240–241
  - deviation cases, 228–231
  - general rule, 225–226
  - general statements, 233–234
  - illustrations, 234–236
  - manner of breach, 231–233
  - nature of rule, 233–237
  - nature of term broken, 226–228
  - rescission, 238–240
  - scope of rule, 226–233
  - total breach, 236–237
- unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 280

CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT

- implied terms, and, 206

CONTRACT TO MAKE A CONTRACT

- incompleteness, and, 59–62

CONTRACTS (RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTIES) ACT 1999

- effect, 662–664
- enforcement rights
  - consideration, 657
  - express provision, 651–653
  - identification of third party, 655–656
  - introduction, 651
  - remedies, 656–657
  - term conferring benefits, 653–655
- exceptions, 661–662
- insurance, 666–669
- nature of rights, 664
- promisee's rights, 665–666
- promisor's defences, 660–661
- property, 669–671
- rescission of contract
  - assent to term, 657–658
  - consent, and, 657–658
  - contrary provision in contract, 659
  - introduction, 657
  - judicial discretion, 659–660
  - promisee's choices, 659
  - reliance, 658
- UCTA, and, 664–665

CONTRACTUAL DAMAGES

- analogous provisions, 1003–1006
- introduction, 999
- liquidated damages, 999–1003
- penalty clauses, 999–1003
- UTCCR 1999, 1006–1007

CONTRACTUAL PROVISION FOR FRUSTRATING EVENT

- generally, 898–899
- non-frustrating events, 900–901
- qualifications, 899–900

CONTRACTUAL STATEMENTS, DAMAGES FOR
collateral contract, 356–357

- CONTRACTUAL STATEMENTS, DAMAGES FOR—cont.
 introduction, 352–353
 term of main contract, 353–354
- CONTRARY AGREEMENT
 implied terms, and, 207–208
- CONTRARY TO PUBLIC POLICY, CONTRACTS
 contemplation of divorce, 441
 deception of local authorities, 450–451
 future separation by spouses, 441
 generally, 439
 illegal act in friendly foreign country, 452
 inconsistent with parental responsibility, 441–442 interference with course of justice, 445–446
 introduction, 430
 marriage brokerage contracts, 442–443
 married persons agreeing to marry, 439–441
 ousting jurisdiction of court
   arbitration clauses, 447
   construction of rules of association, 450
   general rule, 446–447
   maintenance agreements, 447
   scope of rule, 450
 promotion of sexual immorality
   introduction, 443
   meretricious purposes, 443–444
   stable relationships, 444–445
 restraint of marriage, 442
 restraint of trade, contracts in
   and see Restraint of trade competition law, and, 475–477 employers' associations, 467–468
   employment, 454–465
   EU law, and, 477
   exclusive dealing, 468–472
   generally, 453–454
   introduction, 430
   land use covenants, 472–473
   other, 474–475
   restrictive trading, 465–467
   sale of business, 454–465
   trade unions, 467–468
 restriction of personal liberty, 452–453
 sale of offices and honours, 451
 scope of doctrine, 477–480
 sexual immorality
   introduction, 443
   meretricious purposes, 443–444
   stable relationships, 444–445
 trading with enemy, 452
- CONTRIBUTION
 plurality of debtors, and, 574
- CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE
 damages, and, 982–987
- CONVENTION, ESTOPPEL BY
 assumption of law, 121–122
 creation of new rights, 123–124
 effect, 122–123
 introduction, 119–120
 invalidity of assumed term, 124
 mistake of law, and, 315
 requirements, 120–121
- CORE PROVISIONS
 unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 271–273
- CORPORATIONS
 capacity
   common law, at, 560
   Companies Act, under, 560–563
   limited liability partnerships, 563
   special statute, under, 563–567
   statute, under, 560–567
 privity of contract, and, 586
 supervening incapacity, and, 46–47
- COURSE OF DEALING
 exemption clauses, and, 220–221
- COVENANT'S CONCERNING LAND
 privity of contract, and, 645
 restraint of trade, and, 472–473
- CREDIT CARD, PAYMENT BY
 performance of contract, and, 754–755
- CREDITORS, PLURALITY OF
 consideration moving from one joint debtor, 578–579 defence against one joint creditor, 576–577
 definitions, 575–576
 parties to action, 576
 payment to one joint creditor, 577–578 release by one joint creditor, 577
 survivorship, 576
- CRIME, CONTRACT FOR COMMISSION OF
 illegality, and, 432
- CRIMINAL LIABILITY, INDEMNITY AGAINST
 illegality, and, 435
- CROSS-CLAIMS
 part payment of debt, and, 128
- CROSS-OFFERS
 acceptance in ignorance of offer, and, 36–37
- CROWN APPOINTMENTS
 intention to create legal relations, and, 170
- CROWN, DEBTS DUE TO
 assignment, and, 672
- CURRENCY FLUCTUATIONS
 frustration, and, 885
- CUSTOM
 agency, and, 734
 exemption clauses, and, 221
 implied terms, and, 213–214
 non-disclosure, and, 394
 parol evidence rule, and, 198
 terms of contract, and, 213–214
 vagueness, and, 49–50
- CUSTOMARY AUTHORITY
 agency, and, 711–712
- CUSTOMARY TERMS
 rectification, and, 323
- DAMAGES
 action for agreed sum, and, 1013–1014
 actual and market values
   defective delivery, 950–952
   failure to accept and pay, 954
   failure to deliver, 953–954
   introduction, 948

DAMAGES—*cont.

actual and market values—cont.

late delivery, 949–950

non-delivery, 948–949

other loss, 954–955

refusal to accept and pay, 952–953

alternative remedies, and, 958–959

anticipatory breach, and, 859–860

anxiety, 992–993

assessment

actual and market values, 948–955

alternatives, 958–959

bases, 944–948

introduction, 944

speculative damages, 955–957

taxation, 957–958

time for, 959–964

bargain, loss of

basis of assessment, 944–948

generally, 937–940

bases of assessment

loss of bargain, 944–948

reliance, 944

restitution, 944

basis

effect of breach, 934–935

introduction, 927

loss to claimant, 927–932

nature of loss, 932–934

punitive sums, 935–936

causation

concurrent causes, 975

generally, 974–975

intervening acts, 9767

consequential loss, 944

contract, under

analogous provisions, 1003–1006

introduction, 999

liquidated damages, 999–1003

penalty clauses, 999–1003

UTCCR 1999, 1006–1007

contributory negligence, 982–987

deposits

generally, 1008

introduction, 1007

penalties, 1008

return of, 1008

disappointment, 993–994

failure to make title to land, 999

forfeiture of instalments, 1009–1011

generally, 926–927

incidental loss, 943

injunctions, and, 1046–1048

introduction, 843

injury to feelings

exceptions, 989–991

general principle, 987–989

introduction, 987

injury to reputation, 991–992

loss to claimant

borderline cases, 928–930

discretionary account of profits, 930–932

DAMAGES—*cont.

loss to claimant—cont.

examples of rule, 927–928

exceptions, 928

general rule, 927

misrepresentation, and

and see below

assessment basis, 359–362

contractual statements, 352–357

fluctuations in value, 364–366

fraud, 343–344

in lieu of rescission, 357–359

introduction, 343

limit of right, 366–369

negligence at common law, 344–350

negligence under statute, 350–352

remoteness, 362–364

mitigation

duty, 977–979

fact, in, 980–982

generally, 976–977

non-payment of money

cost of delay, 996–998

discretionary interest, 995–996

introduction, 994

late payment of damages, 998

statutory interest, 994–995

non-pecuniary loss, 993–994

part payment

deposits, 1008–1009

failure to pay, 1011–1012

forfeiture of instalments, 1009–1011

introduction, 1007

UTCCR 1999, 1012–1013

principles

basis, 927–936

types of recoverable loss, 936–944

privity of contract, and promisee's loss, 591

third party's loss, 592

promisee's loss, and, 591

punitive sums, 935–936

quantification

actual and market values, 948–955

alternatives, 958–959

bases of assessment, 944–948

introduction, 944

speculative damages, 955–957

taxation, 957–958

time for assessment, 959–964

reasonable contemplation test

generally, 965–968

scope, 973–974

reliance loss

basis of assessment, 944

generally, 940

remoteness

contemplation, 972–973

introduction, 965

knowledge of special circumstances, 969–972

ordinary course of things, 968–969

reasonable contemplation test, 965–968

DAMAGES—*cont.

- rescission, and
  - basis of assessment, 366
  - introduction, 357
  - scope of s.2(2) MA 1967, 358–359
- restitution
  - basis of assessment, 944
  - generally, 941
- restrictions
  - anxiety, 992–993
  - causation, 974–976
  - contributory negligence, 982–987
  - failure to make title to land, 999
  - injury to feelings, 987–991
  - injury to reputation, 991–992
  - introduction, 964
  - mitigation, 976–982
  - non-payment of money, 994–998
  - non-pecuniary loss, 993–994
  - remoteness, 965–974
- specific performance, and, 1046–1049
- speculative damages, 955–957
- substantial failure to perform, and
  - general principle, 771
  - specific performance, 771–773
- taxation, 957–958
- third party's loss, and
  - building contract exception, 594–598
  - general exceptions, 593–594
  - general rule, 592–593
  - other problems, 598–602
- time for assessment
  - anticipatory breach, and, 962–964
  - breach, at, 959–960
  - discovery of breach, at, 960–961
  - introduction, 959
  - late performance, at, 962
  - possibility of acting on knowledge of breach, at, 961
  - reasonableness, 961–962
- types of recoverable loss
  - consequential loss, 944
  - incidental loss, 943
  - introduction, 936–937
  - loss of bargain, 937–940
  - relationship between losses, 941–943
  - reliance loss, 940
  - restitution, 941

DAMAGES FOR MISREPRESENTATION

- basis of assessment, 359–362
- compensation orders in criminal cases, 369
- contractual statements, and
  - collateral contract, 356–357
  - introduction, 352–353
  - term of main contract, 353–354
- fluctuations in value, 364–366
- fraud, 343–344
- in lieu of rescission
  - basis of assessment, 366
  - introduction, 357
  - scope of s.2(2) MA 1967, 358–359
- introduction, 343

DAMAGES FOR MISREPRESENTATION—*cont.

- limit of right
  - excluded cases, 366–367
  - indemnity, 367–368
- negligence at common law
  - assumption of responsibility, 347–348
  - commercial relationships, 349
  - duty of care, 344–345
  - effects on other rules, 349–350
  - professional skill, 348–349
  - special relationships, 345–349
- negligence under MA 1967
  - affirmation, 352
  - “fiction of fraud”, 351–352
  - introduction, 350
  - scope of s.2(1), 350–351
  - remoteness, and, 362–364

DAMAGES IN LIEU OF RESCISSION

- basis of assessment, 366
- introduction, 357
- scope of s.2(2) MA 1967, 358–359

DANGEROUS GOODS

- exemption clauses, and, 252
- “DATE OF TRANSACTION” RULE
  - damages for misrepresentation, and, 364–366

DEALING AS CONSUMER

- exemption clauses, and, 247–248

DEATH

- agency, and, 750
- assignment, and, 699
- exemption clauses, and, 249–250
- impossibility, and, 872
- power of attorney, and, 674
- termination of offer, and
  - introduction, 44
  - offeree, of, 45
  - offeror, of, 44–45
- transfer of liabilities, and, 704

DEBT

- assignment, and, 678

DEBTORS, PLURALITY OF

- bankruptcy, 574
- contribution, 574
- defence of one joint debtor, 571–572
- definitions, 568–569
- judgment, 569–570
- parties to action, 569
- release of one joint debtor, 572–574
- survivorship, 570–571
- terms of contract, 574

DECEPTION OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 450–451

DECLINE IN VALUE

- misrepresentation, and, 378–379

DEED, CONTRACT MADE BY

- generally, 177

DEFECTIVE PERFORMANCE

- breach of contract, and, 834

DEFECTIVE PROMISES

- introduction, 149
- performance of, 150

- DEFECTIVE PROMISES—cont.
  - policy considerations, 149–150
  - statute, under, 150–151
- DEFECTS OF TITLE
  - assignment, and
    - generally, 689
    - negotiable instruments, 692
- DEFENCES
  - misrepresentation, and, 373–374
- DELAY
  - rectification, and, 325–326
  - rescission for misrepresentation, and, 384–385
  - termination of offer, and, 43–44
  - unconscionable bargains, and, 424
- DELIBERATE BREACH
  - substantial failure to perform, and
    - fraud, 807
    - introduction, 807
    - repudiation, 807–809
    - substantial breach, 809–810
- DEMAND
  - performance of contract, and, 753
- DEPOSITS
  - generally, 1008
  - introduction, 1007
  - penalties, 1008
  - return of, 1008
- DERIVATIVE RIGHTS
  - privity of contract, and, 643–645
- DESTRUCTION OF PARTICULAR THING
  - examples, 870–871
  - risk, 871
- DETERIORATION
  - misrepresentation, and, 379
- DEVIATION CASES
  - seriousness of breach of contract, and, 228–231
- “DISAPPOINTED BENEFICIARY” CASES
  - privity of contract, and, 617–619
- DISAPPOINTMENT
  - damages, and, 993–994
- DISCRETION
  - injunctions, and, 1040
  - specific performance, and
    - conduct of claimant, 1028–1029
    - impossibility, 1029
    - inadequacy of consideration, 1027–1028
    - introduction, 1026
    - other factors, 1029
    - severe hardship, 1026–1027
    - unfairness, 1027
- DISCRETION TO ONE PARTY, AGREEMENTS GIVING
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 167
- DISPLAY OF GOODS FOR SALE
  - invitation to treat, and, 12–13
- DISPUTED CLAIMS
  - part payment of debt, and, 126
- DISTANCE SELLING
  - cancellation, and, 30
  - exemption clauses, and, 252
  - gaming and wagering contracts, and, 522
- DIVERGENT VIEWS
  - implied terms, and, 204–205
- DIVORCE
  - contracts contrary to public policy, and, 440
- DOCUMENTS
  - misrepresentation, and, 334
- DOCUMENTS MISTAKENLY SIGNED
  - capacity, 329
  - carelessness, 329
  - identity, 328–329
  - ignorance, 329
  - introduction, 326–327
  - persons to whom plea available, 327–328
  - seriousness of mistake, 328
- DOMESTIC ARRANGEMENTS
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 164–167
- DOUBTFUL CLAIMS
  - forbearance to sue, and, 89
- DRINK AND DRUGS
  - capacity, and, 559
- DURESS
  - and see* Undue influence
  - consideration, and, 67
  - generally, 405–408
  - introduction, 405
- DUTY OF CARE
  - misrepresentation, and, 344–345
  - third parties, and, 607–609
- ECONOMIC LOSS
  - third parties, and, 611–613
- ECONOMIC VALUE
  - compromise
    - doubtful claims, 89
    - executed compromises, 90
    - introduction, 87
    - invalid claims, 88–90
    - valid claims, 87–88
  - doubtful claims, 89
  - duty imposed by contract with promisor
    - factual benefit to promisor, 95–96
    - introduction, 94
    - no consideration cases, 94–95
    - other, 96–97
  - duty imposed by contract with third party
    - introduction, 97
    - performance, 97–98
    - promise to perform, 98
  - duty imposed by law
    - additional consideration, 93
    - introduction, 92
    - public policy, 92
    - rewards for information leading to arrest, 92–93
  - executed compromises, 90
  - forbearance to sue
    - actual, 90–91
    - doubtful claims, 89
    - executed compromises, 90
    - introduction, 87
    - invalid claims, 88–90
    - valid claims, 87–88
  - illusory consideration, 83–85
  - invalid claims, 88–90

ECONOMIC VALUE—cont.

- introduction, 83
- onerous property, 87
- performance of existing duty
  - imposed by contract with promisor, 94–97
  - imposed by contract with third party, 97–98
  - imposed by law, 92–93
- introduction, 92
- trivial acts or objects, 85–86
- valid claims, 87–88

EFFECT OF A DOCUMENT OR STATUTE

- misrepresentation, and, 334

ELECTION

- action for agreed sum, and
  - to keep contract alive, 1015–101
  - to terminate, 1015
- frustration, and, 909
- rescission for failure to perform, and
  - generally, 811–813
  - knowledge, and, 815–816
  - reliance, and, 814–815
  - representation, 813–814
- rights of agent against third party, and, 737

ELECTRONIC COMMUNICATIONS

- acceptance, and
  - cancellation of distance contracts, 30
  - garbled messages, 28
  - generally, 26
- form of contract, and, 186–187

ELECTRONIC DOCUMENTS

- form of contract, and, 186–187

ELECTRONIC SIGNATURES

- form of contract, and, 186

EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

- intention to create legal relations, and, 171

EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATIONS

- restraint of trade, and, 467–468

EMPLOYMENT CONTRACTS

- exemption clauses, and, 265–266
- implied terms, and, 206
- impossibility, and, 872
- injunctions, and
  - express negative promises, 1042–1044
  - implied negative promises, 1045–1046
  - restraint of trade, 1044–1045
- minors, and, 543–545
- refusal to perform, and, 834
- rescission, and, 845–846
- restraint of trade, and
  - area of restraint, 458–460
  - drafting issues, 460–461
  - duration of restraint, 460
  - during term of contract, 464
  - fairness, 461–462
  - interest, 455–458
  - introduction, 454
  - no covenant against competition existing, 463–464
  - public interest, 462–463
  - reasonableness, 458–462
  - scope of restraint, 460
  - validity of restraint, 464–465

EMPLOYMENT CONTRACTS—cont.

- unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 278

ENEMY, TRADING WITH

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 452

ENFORCEMENT

- gaming contracts, and
  - common law, at, 519
  - statute, under, 520–521
- illegality, and
  - de facto, 490
  - guilty party, and, 481–484
  - innocent party, and, 484–490
- introduction, 480–481
- wagering contracts, and
  - common law, at, 519
  - statute, under, 520–521

ENFORCEMENT OF ILLEGAL CONTRACTS

- de facto, 490
- guilty party, by, 481–484
- innocent party, by
  - ignorance of fact, 485–490
  - ignorance of law, 484–485
  - mistake of fact, 485–490
  - mistake of law, 484–485
- introduction, 480–481

ENTIRE OBLIGATIONS

- substantial failure to perform, and
  - distinction from severable obligations, 785–787
- generally, 782–784

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENTS

- consideration
  - after Judicature Act 1873, 687–688
  - before Judicature Act 1873, 684–687
- introduction, 683
- equitable choses, 675
- introduction, 674
- legal choses, 674–675

EQUITABLE CHOSSES

- assignment, and, 675

EQUITABLE TITLE

- non reliance on illegal transaction, and, 499–501

EQUITY

- mistake, and
  - and see* Mistake in equity
  - forms of relief, 316–326
  - introduction, 310–312
  - types, 312–316

ESTATE AGENTS

- agency, and, 708

ESTATE AGENTS' CONTRACTS

- exemption clauses, and, 244
- part performance, and, 40–41

ESTOPPEL

- and see* Promissory estoppel
- and see* Proprietary estoppel
- convention, by, 119–124
- misrepresentation, and, 403–404
- representation, by, 115–117

ESTOPPEL BY CONVENTION

- assumption of law, 121–122

ESTOPPEL BY CONVENTION—*cont.

- creation of new rights, 123–124
- effect, 122–123
- introduction, 119–120
- invalidity of assumed term, 124
- mistake of law, and, 315
- requirements, 120–121

ESTOPPEL BY REPRESENTATION

- misrepresentation, and, 403–404
- mistake negating consent, and, 306
- waiver, and, 115–117

EU LAW

- agency, and, 709
- restraint of trade, and, 477

EVIDENCED IN WRITING, DOCUMENT

- contracts of guarantee
  - consideration, 183
  - effect of non-compliance, 185–186
  - indemnity, 181–182
  - introduction, 181
  - joinder, and, 184–185
  - memorandum, 184
  - part of larger transaction, 182
  - parties, 183
  - promise to debtor, 181
  - protection of property, 182–183
  - signature, 183–184
  - terms, 183
- generally, 180

EX GRATIA

- intention to create legal relations, and, 164

EXCHANGE OF GOODS

- exemption clauses, and, 251–252

EXCLUSION OF LIABILITY FOR MISREPRESENTATION

- “by reason of any representation made”, 387–388
- common law, at, 241–242
- consumer contracts, and, 389
- “exclude or restrict . . . any liability . . . or . . . remedy”, 385–386
- generally, 385
- introduction, 256
- “party to a contract”, 386
- reasonableness test, 388–389

EXCLUSIVE DEALING AGREEMENTS

- fairness, 470–471
- generally, 468–470
- interest, 470
- public interest, 471–472
- reasonableness, 470–471

EXECUTED COMPROMISES

- forbearance to sue, and, 90

EXECUTED CONTRACTS

- capacity of minors, and, 549–550
- rectification, and, 325
- rescission for misrepresentation, and, 377

EXECUTION OF FORMAL DOCUMENT

- incompleteness, and, 54–55

EXEMPTION CLAUSES

- breach of fiduciary duties, and, 243

EXEMPTION CLAUSES—*cont.common law limitations

- contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
- exclusion of liability for breach of fiduciary duties, 243
- exclusion of liability for fraud, 242–243
- exclusion of natural justice, 243
- incorporation, 216–221
- introduction, 241
- misrepresentation as to contents, 241–242
- negligence, 222–225
- overriding undertaking, 242
- seriousness of breach, 225–241
- third parties, 244
- unreasonableness, 243–244

construction

- contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
- introduction, 221
- negligence, 222–225
- seriousness of breach, 225–241

contra proferentem* rule, 221–222

- course of dealing, and, 220–221
- fraud, and, 242–243

incorporation by notice

- degree of notice, 217–218
- introduction, 217
- nature of document, 217
- steps taken to give notice, 218–219
- time of notice, 219–220

incorporation in contract

- course of dealing, by, 220–221
- introduction, 216
- notice, by, 217–220
- signature, by, 216–217
- introduction, 216

legislative limitations

- introduction, 246
- UCTA 1977, 246–267
- UTCCR 1999, 267–283

misrepresentation, and

- “by reason of any representation made”, 387–388
- common law, at, 241–242
- consumer contracts, and, 389
- “exclude or restrict . . . any liability . . . or . . . remedy”, 385–386

generally, 385

- introduction, 256
- “party to a contract”, 386
- reasonableness test, 388–389

natural justice, and, 243*negligence

- introduction, 222–223
- party liable irrespective, 223–224
- party liable only for negligence, 224–225
- non-disclosure, and, 398

notice, and

- degree of notice, 217–218
- introduction, 217
- nature of document, 217
- steps taken to give notice, 218–219
- time of notice, 219–220

EXEMPTION CLAUSES—cont.

- overriding undertaking, and, 242
- privity of contract, and
  - benefit, 627–638
  - burden, 638–645
  - generally, 626–627
  - introduction, 244
- reasonableness, and, 243–244
- seriousness of breach
  - affirmation, and, 238–240
  - applicable clauses, 237–238
  - burden of proof, 240–241
  - deviation cases, 228–231
  - general rule, 225–226
  - general statements, 233–234
  - illustrations, 234–236
  - manner of breach, 231–233
  - nature of rule, 233–237
  - nature of term broken, 226–228
  - rescission, 238–240
  - scope of rule, 226–233
  - total breach, 236–237
- signature of contract, and, 216–217
- third parties, and, 244
- UCTA 1977, and

and see Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977

- excluded cases, 264–267
- ineffective terms, 249–252
- introduction, 246
- partly effective terms, 257–258
- preliminary definitions, 247–249
- reasonableness rules, 258–261
- relation with UTCCR, 267–268
- restrictions on evasion, 261–264
- terms subject to reasonableness requirements, 252–256

UTCCR 1999, and

- and see* Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations
- definitions, 268–276
- drafting terms, 280–281
- effects of unfairness, 281–282
- excluded contracts, 277–280
- excluded terms, 276–277
- generally, 267
- interpretation of terms, 280–281
- relation with UCTA, 267–268
- restrictions on evasion, 283

EXISTENCE OF SUBJECT-MATTER

- mistake, and, 286–287

EXPECTATION

- mistake of fact, and, 313

EXPRESS AUTHORITY

- agency, and, 710–711

EXPRESS TERMS

- contra proferentem* rule, and, 221
- introduction, 191
- joinder of documents
  - incorporation by reference, 191–192
  - no express reference, 192
- parol evidence rule
  - collateral agreements, 199–200

EXPRESS TERMS—cont.

- parol evidence rule—cont.
  - consideration, 201
  - construction of words, 197–198
  - custom, 198
  - general statement, 192–193
  - implied terms, 195
  - operation of contract, 195–196
  - oral warranties, 195
  - parties, 196
  - rectification, 199
  - specific performance, and, 196–197
  - subject-matter, 199
  - validity of contract, 195
  - written agreement not whole agreement, 193–195

EXPRESSLY NEGATIVE EXPRESSIONS

- intention to create legal relations, and, 163–164

EXTORTIONATE CREDIT BARGAINS

- generally, 427–428

EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE OF TERMS

- collateral agreements, 199–200
- consideration, 201
- construction of words, 197–198
- custom, 198
- express terms, 195
- general statement, 192–193
- implied terms, 195
- operation of contract, 195–196
- oral warranties, 195
- parties, 196
- rectification, 199
- specific performance, and, 196–197
- subject-matter, 199
- validity of contract, 195
- written agreement not whole agreement, 193–195

FACT, MISREPRESENTATION AS TO

- applicability of a rule of law, 334
- effect of a document, 334
- introduction, 333
- mixed statements, 335
- powers of companies, 333–334
- private right, 334–335
- representation of foreign law, 335

FACT, MISTAKE OF

- expectation, as to, 313
- nature, 312
- misrepresentation, and, 333
- value, as to, 312–313

FACT, TERMS IMPLIED BY

- business efficacy test, 201–203
- negating factors
  - divergent views, 204–205
  - ignorance of one party, 204
  - introduction, 204
  - unilateral contracts, 205–206
- officious bystander test, 201
- reasonableness, 203
- terms implied in law, and, 207–208

- FACTS TO BE ASCERTAINED
  - incompleteness, and, 59
- FAILURE OF PARTICULAR SOURCE
  - express reference to source, 875–876
  - intended use by both parties, 876–877
  - intended use by one party, 876
  - introduction, 875
  - partial, 877–879
- FAILURE TO MAKE TITLE TO LAND
  - damages, and, 999
- FAILURE TO PERFORM
  - generally, 832–834
  - introduction, 759
  - rescission, and
    - and see* Rescission for failure to perform
    - criticism, 825–826
    - election, 811–816
    - introduction, 759–761
    - limitations on right, 811–825
    - order of performance, 761–769
    - part performance of contract, 816–819
    - policy considerations, 760–761
    - substantial failure, 769–811
    - terminology, 759–760
    - voluntary acceptance of benefit, 819–822
    - waiver, 811–816
    - wrongful prevention of performance, 822
    - wrongful refusal to accept, and, 766–769
  - specific performance, 759
- FAIRNESS
  - consumer contracts, and
    - comparison with UCTA 1977, 282
    - core provisions, 271–273
    - effects, 281–282
    - examples, 274–276
    - generally, 271–276
    - good faith, 273
    - significant imbalance, 271
  - restraint of trade, and
    - employment contracts, 461–462
    - exclusive dealing, 470–471
- FALSIFICATION BY LATER EVENTS
  - non-disclosure, and, 393–394
- FAMILY LAW RIGHTS, CONTRACTS RELATING TO
  - unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 278
- FAULT-BASED LIABILITY
  - breach of contract, and, 840–841
- “FICTION OF FRAUD”
  - damages for misrepresentation, and, 351–352
- FIDUCIARY DUTIES
  - duties of agent to principal, and
    - bribes, 746–747
    - conflict of interest, and, 745–746
    - secret profits, 746–747
  - exemption clauses, and, 243
- FIDUCIARY RELATIONSHIP
  - non-disclosure, and, 399
- FINANCING ANOTHER’S LITIGATION
  - illegality, and, 430–431
- FIRE INSURANCE
  - privity of contract, and, 667
- FIRM OFFERS
  - consideration, and, 153–155
- FITNESS FOR PURPOSE
  - implied terms, and, 207
- FIXING DAMAGES IN ADVANCE
  - exemption clauses, and, 237
- FLUCTUATIONS IN VALUE
  - damages for misrepresentation, and, 364–366
- FORBEARANCE TO SUE
  - actual, 90–91
  - doubtful claims, 89
  - executed compromises, 90
  - introduction, 87
  - invalid claims, 88–90
  - part payment of debt, and
    - common law limitations, 128
    - equitable evasion, 131–134
  - valid claims, 87–88
  - waiver, and
    - common law, at, 103–105
    - equity, in, 115–117
- FORCE MAJEURE*
  - strict liability, and, 838
  - vagueness, and, 49
- FOREIGN LAW, REPRESENTATION OF
  - misrepresentation, and, 335
- FORFEITURE OF INSTALMENTS
  - damages, and, 1009–1011
- FORM OF CONTRACT
  - deed, by, 177
  - electronic documents, 186–187
  - evidenced in writing
    - contracts of guarantee, 181–186
    - generally, 180
  - general rule, 176–177
  - guarantee, of
    - consideration, 183
    - effect of non-compliance, 185–186
    - indemnity, 181–182
    - introduction, 181
    - joinder, and, 184–185
    - memorandum, 184
    - part of larger transaction, 182
    - parties, 183
    - promise to debtor, 181
    - protection of property, 182–183
    - signature, 183–184
    - terms, 183
  - rescission, and, 188–189
  - statutory exceptions
    - contracts evidenced in writing, 180–186
    - contracts made by deed, 177
    - contracts in writing, 177–180
    - electronic documents, 186–187
    - introduction, 177
    - variation, and, 189–190
    - writing, in
      - effect of non-compliance, 179–180
      - examples, 177–178
- FORMAL DOCUMENT, EXECUTION OF
  - incompleteness, and, 54–55

FORESEEN AND FORESEEABLE EVENTS

- generally, 901–902
- qualifications, 902–904
- trading with enemy, 902

FRAUD

- capacity of minors, and
  - common law, at, 554
  - equity, in, 554–556
- damages for misrepresentation, and, 343–344
- exemption clauses, and, 242–243
- form of contract, and, 181
- rescission for misrepresentation, and, 369
- substantial failure to perform, and, 807

FREE MOVEMENT OF GOODS AND WORKERS

- restraint of trade, and, 477

FREEDOM OF ESTABLISHMENT

- restraint of trade, and, 477

FREEDOM TO PROVIDE SERVICES

- restraint of trade, and, 477

FRUSTRATION

- abolition by statute, 880
- adjustment of positions
  - casus omissus*, 916
  - commercial agents, 919–920
  - contrary agreement, 917
  - excluded contracts, 917–919
  - introduction, 910
  - rights accrued before frustration, 910–912
  - rights not accrued, 912–916
  - severability, 916–917
- alternative obligations, and, 892–893
- commercial agents, and, 919–920
- contractual provision for event
  - generally, 898–899
  - non-frustrating events, 900–901
  - qualifications, 899–900
- currency fluctuations, 885
- death, 872
- destruction of particular thing
  - examples, 870–871
  - risk, 871
- effects
  - casus omissus*, 916
  - commercial agents, 919–920
  - contrary agreement, 917
  - excluded contracts, 917–919
  - generally, 909–910
  - problems of adjustment, 910–920
  - rights accrued before frustration, 910–912
  - rights not yet accrued, 912–916
  - severability, 916–917
- events affecting one party, 893–894
- fact or law, 897–898
- failure of particular source
  - express reference to source, 875–876
  - intended use by both parties, 876–877
  - intended use by one party, 876
  - introduction, 875
  - partial, 877–879
- foreseen and foreseeable events
  - generally, 901–902
  - qualifications, 902–904

FRUSTRATION—cont.

- foreseen and foreseeable events—cont.
  - trading with enemy, 902
- historical development, 866–869
- illegality

- antecedent prohibition, 888–890
- examples, 887–888
- introduction, 887
- partial, 890
- supervening prohibition, 888–890
- temporary, 890

impossibility

- abolition by statute, 880
- currency fluctuations, 885
- death, 872
- destruction of particular thing, 870–871
- failure of particular source, 875–879
- impracticability, and, 880–885
- incapacity, 872
- inflation, 884–885
- introduction, 869–870
- method of performance, 879–880
- unavailability, 872–875

incapacity, 872

inflation, 884–885

insurance, and, 917–918

juristic basis

- mistake, 924–925
- practical importance, 923
- theories of frustration, 920–923

land, and

- leases, 894–895
- sale, 895–897

lease of land, 894–895

limitations

- contractual provision for event, 898–901
- foreseen and foreseeable events, 901–904
- introduction, 898
- self-induced frustration, 905–908
- method of performance impossible
  - generally, 879
  - Suez cases, 879–880

mistake, 924–925

prospective, 890–892

purpose, of, 885–887

quantum meruit, and, 1064

rights accrued before frustration

- common law, at, 910–911
- expenses, 911–912
- statute, under, 911–912
- sums paid, 911
- sums payable, 911

rights not accrued

- common law, at, 912–913
- destruction of benefit, 914–916
- measure of recovery, 913–914
- statute, under, 913–916
- valuable benefits, 914

risk, and

- building contracts, 871
- introduction, 871
- sale of goods, 871

FRUSTRATION—*cont.

- sale of goods, and, 918–919
- sale of land, 895–897
- self-induced frustration
  - burden of proof, 908
  - choice between several contracts, 906–908
  - negligence, 906
  - one party's conduct, 905–906
- severability, and, 916–917
- trading with enemy, 902
- unavailability
  - generally, 872
  - temporary, 872–875
- voyage charterparties, and, 917

FUNDAMENTAL BREACH

- exemption clauses, and, 225–226

FUNDAMENTAL MISTAKE

- conduct of parties, and, 297–298
- construction of contract, and, 294–297
- existence of subject-matter, as to, 286–287
- identity of subject-matter, as to, 287
- introduction, 286
- person, as to, 298–300
- possibility of performance of contract, as to
  - commercial impossibility, 288
  - introduction, 287
  - legal impossibility, 287–288
  - physical impossibility, 287
- quality, as to, 288–294
- quantity, as to, 294

FUTURE CONDUCT

- misrepresentation, and, 331–332

FUTURE PROPERTY

- assignment, and, 683

FUTURE SEPARATION BY SPOUSES

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 441

FUTURE UNCERTAIN EVENT

- wagering contracts, and, 514–515

GAMING CONTRACTS

- advance payment, 525–526
- agents
  - advance payment, 525–526
  - agent's indemnity, 524
  - agent's liability to account, 525
  - excepted transactions, 526
  - failure to obey instruction, 524
- definitions, 518–519
- distance selling, and, 522
- effects, 519–538
- enforcement
  - common law, at, 519
  - statute, under, 520–521
- gambling stolen money
  - change of position, 538
  - illegal wagers, 535
  - introduction, 535
  - lawful wagers, 535–538
  - partial defence, 538
  - supply of gaming chips, 536–537
- lawful gaming, 518–519

GAMING CONTRACTS—*cont.loans

- future betting, for, 531–534
- gaming on licensed premises, for, 534–535
- generally, 530
- pay lost bets, to, 530–531
- overpayments, 523
- principal and agent
  - advance payment, 525–526
  - agent's indemnity, 524
  - agent's liability to account, 525
  - excepted transactions, 526
  - failure to obey instruction, 524
- prizes, 527
- recovery of money deposited
  - illegal wagers, 523
  - lawful wagers, 523–524
- recovery of money paid
  - common law, at, 522
  - statute, under, 522–523
- securities
  - introduction, 527
  - non-gaming wagers, 527
  - wagers on games, 527–530
- stakeholders, 526
- unlawful gaming, 518–519

GARBLED MESSAGES

- electronic communications, and, 28

GIFT OF ONEROUS PROPERTY

- consideration, and, 87

GOOD FAITH

- unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 273

GOOD MANNERS

- illegality, and, 429

GOODS, SALE/SUPPLY OF

- implied terms, and, 206–207

GOODWILL

- intention to create legal relations, and, 169

GRATUITOUS BAILMENTS

- consideration, and, 156

GRATUITOUS SERVICES

- consideration, and, 156–158

GUARANTEE, CONTRACTS OF

- exemption clauses, and, 250
- form, and
  - consideration, 183
  - effect of non-compliance, 185–186
  - indemnity, 181–182
  - introduction, 181
  - joinder, and, 184–185
  - memorandum, 184
  - part of larger transaction, 182
  - parties, 183
  - promise to debtor, 181
  - protection of property, 182–183
  - signature, 183–184
  - terms, 183
- non-disclosure, and, 398
- part performance, and, 39–40
- past consideration, and, 77–78

HARDSHIP

restrictive trading, and, 466

HIMALAYA CLAUSES

defect in main contract, 635–636

effect, 631–634

introduction, 631

nature, 631–634

scope, 634–635

HIRE CONTRACTS

exemption clauses, and, 251–252

HIRE-PURCHASE CONTRACTS

agency, and, 707

collateral contracts, and, 583

exemption clauses, and, 251

HONOUR CLAUSES

intention to create legal relations, and, 163–164

HORIZONTAL AGREEMENTS

competition law, and, 476

HOUSE-SHARING AGREEMENTS

intention to create legal relations, and, 166–167

IDENTITY

non est factum, and, 328–329

IDENTITY OF SUBJECT-MATTER

mistake, and, 287

IGNORANCE

enforcement of illegal contracts, and fact, 485–490

law, 484–485

non est factum, and, 329

IGNORANCE OF FACT

enforcement of illegal contracts, and, 485–490

IGNORANCE OF LAW

enforcement of illegal contracts, and, 484–485

IGNORANCE OF OFFER, ACCEPTANCE IN

cross-offers, 36–37

generally, 36

motive, 37

IGNORANCE OF ONE PARTY

implied terms, and, 204

unconscionable bargains, and, 420–421

ILLEGAL ACT IN FRIENDLY FOREIGN COUNTRY

contracts contrary to public policy, and, 452

ILLEGAL LEASES

non reliance on illegal transaction, and, 498

ILLEGALITY

classification problem, 429–430

collateral transactions, 510–511

commission of legal wrong, contracts involving amounting to legal wrong, 430–432

change in law, and, 438–439

commit civil wrong, 432–433

commit crime, 432

indemnity against liability for unlawful acts, 435–437

introduction, 430

method of performance unlawful, 433–435

promise to pay on commission of unlawful act, 437–438

subject-matter used for unlawful purpose, 433

consideration, and, 67

ILLEGALITY—cont.

contrary to public policy, contracts

contemplation of divorce, 441

deception of local authorities, 450–451

future separation by spouses, 441

generally, 439

illegal act in friendly foreign country, 452

inconsistent with parental responsibility, 441–442

interference with course of justice, 445–446

introduction, 430

marriage brokerage contracts, 442–443

married persons agreeing to marry, 439–441

ousting jurisdiction of court, 446–44

promotion of sexual immorality, 443–445

restraint of marriage, 442

restraint of trade, 453–477

restriction of personal liberty, 452–453

sale of offices and honours, 451

scope of doctrine, 477–480

sexual immorality, 443–445

trading with enemy, 452

effects of

collateral transactions, 510–511

criticisms, 511–512

enforcement, 480–490

restitution, 490–504

severance, 504–510

employment, and

during term of contract, 464

interest, 455–458

introduction, 454

no covenant against competition existing, 463–464

public interest, 462–463

reasonableness, 458–462

validity of restraint, 464–465

enforcement

de facto, 490

guilty party, and, 481–484

innocent party, and, 484–490

introduction, 480–481

exclusive dealing, and

generally, 468–470

interest, 470

public interest, 471–472

reasonableness, 470–471

frustration, and

antecedent prohibition, 888–890

examples, 887–888

introduction, 887

partial, 890

supervening prohibition, 888–890

temporary, 890

good manners, and, 429

introduction, 429

legal consequences, and, 430 morals, and, 429

nugatory contracts, and, 430

restitution

exceptional cases, 491–503

general rule, 491

ILLEGALITY—*cont.*restitution—cont.

- introduction, 490
- scope of general rule, 503
- services, and, 503–504

restraint of trade, contracts in

- competition law, and, 475–477
- employers' associations, 467–468
- employment, 454–465
- EU law, and, 477
- exclusive dealing, 468–472
- generally, 453–454
- introduction, 430
- land use covenants, 472–473
- other, 474–475
- restrictive trading, 465–467
- sale of business, 454–465
- trade unions, 467–468

restrictive trading, and

- conditions of validity, 465
- hardship, 466
- interest, 465
- introduction, 465
- third party remedies, 466–467

sale of business, and

- interest, 454–455
- introduction, 454
- no covenant against competition existing, 463–464
- public interest, 462–463
- reasonableness, 458–462
- validity of restraint, 464–465

severance

- consideration, of, 504–506
- introduction, 504
- promises, of, 506–510
- statutory, 510

types

- commission of legal wrong, 430–439
- contrary to public policy, 439–453
- restraint of trade, 453–477
- violation of statute, and, 429
- void contracts, and, 430

ILLUSORY CONSIDERATION

- economic value, and, 83–85

IMMORALITY, CONTRACTS FOR PROMOTION OF

- introduction, 443
- meretricious purposes, 443–444
- stable relationships, 444–445

IMPLIED AUTHORITY

- agency, and, 711–712

IMPLIED TERMS

- collective agreements, and, 213
- contra proferentem* rule, and, 221
- custom, by, 213–214
- fact, in
  - business efficacy test, 201–203
  - divergent views, 204–205
  - ignorance of one party, 204
  - negating factors, 204–206
  - officious bystander test, 201
  - reasonableness, 203

IMPLIED TERMS—*cont.*fact, in—cont.

- terms implied in law, and, 207–208
- unilateral contracts, 205–206
- intention, and, 201
- introduction, 201
- law, in
  - doubtful cases, 211–213
  - imputed intention, 212–213
  - introduction, 206–207
  - legal duties, as to, 208–211
  - terms implied in fact, and, 207–208
- operation of law, and, 201
- parol evidence rule, and, 195
- trade usage, by, 214

IMPLIED WARRANTY OF AUTHORITY

- nature of liability, 738–739
- restrictions on liability, 739–740

IMPOSSIBILITY

- abolition by statute, 880
- currency fluctuations, 885
- death, 872
- destruction of particular thing
  - examples, 870–871
  - risk, 871
- failure of particular source
  - express reference to source, 875–876
  - intended use by both parties, 876–877
  - intended use by one party, 876
  - introduction, 875
  - partial, 877–879
- frustration, and
  - abolition by statute, 880
  - currency fluctuations, 885
  - death, 872
  - destruction of particular thing, 870–871
  - failure of particular source, 875–879
  - impracticability, and, 880–885
  - incapacity, 872
  - inflation, 884–885
  - introduction, 869–870
  - method of performance, 879–880
  - unavailability, 872–875
- impracticability, and, 880–885
- incapacity, 872
- inflation, 884–885
- method of performance
  - generally, 879
  - Suez cases, 879–880
- misrepresentation, and
  - benefit to misrepresentee, 379–380
  - changes made by misrepresentee, 378
  - changes made by misrepresentor, 379
  - decline in value, 378–379
  - deterioration, 379
  - improvements by misrepresentee, 381–382
  - improvements by misrepresentor, 382
  - introduction, 378
  - nature of subject-matter, 381
  - precision, and, 380–381
- unavailability
  - generally, 872

- IMPOSSIBILITY—cont.
  - unavailability—cont.
    - temporary, 872–875
  - unconscionable bargains, and, 423
- IMPROVEMENT OF ANOTHER'S PROPERTY
  - agency of necessity, and
  - conditions, 719–720
  - generally, 720
- IMPROVEMENT TO SUBJECT-MATTER
  - misrepresentation, and
    - by misrepresentee, 381–382
    - by misrepresentor, 382
- IMPUTED INTENTION
  - implied terms, and, 212–213
- IN PRINCIPLE AGREEMENT
  - incompleteness, and, 51–52
- INACTIVITY
  - offer, and, 10
- INADEQUATE CONSIDERATION
  - nominal consideration, and, 75–76
- INCAPACITY
  - impossibility, and, 872
  - quantum meruit, and, 1062
- INCIDENTAL AUTHORITY
  - agency, and, 711
- INCIDENTAL LOSS
  - damages, and, 943
- INCOMPLETENESS
  - agreement in principle only, 51–52
  - contract to make a contract, 59–62
  - execution of formal document, 54–55
  - facts to be ascertained, 59
  - “subject to contract” agreement, 52–54
  - terms left open, 55–59
- INCONSISTENT CONDUCT
  - agency, and, 749
- INCONSISTENT WITH PARENTAL RESPONSIBILITY
  - contracts contrary to public policy, and, 441–442
- INCORPORATED MISREPRESENTATION
  - s.1(a) MA 1967, 375–376
  - s.2(2) MA 1967, 376–377
- INCORPORATION OF EXEMPTION CLAUSES
  - course of dealing, by, 220–221
  - introduction, 216
  - notice, by
    - degree of notice, 217–218
    - introduction, 217
    - nature of document, 217
    - steps taken to give notice, 218–219
    - time of notice, 219–220
  - signature, by, 216–217
- INCORPORATION BY REFERENCE
  - joinder of documents, and, 191–192
- INDEMNITY
  - agency, and
    - duties of agent to principal, 748
    - rights of agent against principal, 744
  - civil liability, against
    - arising out of criminal acts, 436–437
    - generally, 435–436
    - criminal liability, against, 435
- INDEMNITY—cont.
  - duties of agent to principal, and, 748
  - damages for misrepresentation, and, 367–368
  - guarantee, and, 181–182
  - rights of agent against principal, and, 744
- INDEMNITY AGAINST LIABILITY FOR UNLAWFUL ACTS
  - civil liability
    - arising out of criminal acts, 436–437
    - generally, 435–436
    - criminal liability, 435
- INDEMNITY CLAUSES
  - exemption clauses, and, 255–256
- INDEPENDENT PROMISES
  - distinction between conditions and promises
    - criteria, 764–765
    - effects, 765–766
  - generally, 763–764
  - wrongful refusal to accept performance, and, 766–769
- INDIVIDUALLY NEGOTIATED
  - unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 270–271
- INDUCEMENT TO CONTRACT
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 162–163
  - mistake negating consent, and, 304–306
- INEQUALITY OF BARGAINING POWER
  - unconscionable bargains, and, 421–423
- INFANTS
  - capacity, and
    - and see* Capacity of minors
  - introduction, 539
  - liability in restitution, 551–557
  - liability in tort, 551
  - other contracts, 549–550
  - valid contracts, 539–545
  - voidable contracts, 545–549
- INFLATION
  - frustration, and, 884–885
- INJUNCTIONS
  - balance of convenience test, 1040–1041
  - damages, and, 1046–1048
  - discretion, 1040
  - employment contracts, and
    - express negative promises, 1042–1044
    - implied negative promises, 1045–1046
    - restraint of trade, 1044–1045
  - generally, 1040–1042
  - introduction, 843
  - negative promises
    - express, 1042–1044
    - implied, 1045–1046
  - privity of contract, and, 603–604
  - restraint of trade, 1044–1045
  - severance, 1046
  - specific performance, and, 1042
- INJURY TO FEELINGS
  - exceptions, 989–991
  - general principle, 987–989
  - introduction, 987
- INJURY TO REPUTATION
  - damages, and, 991–992

- INNOCENT MISREPRESENTATION
 rescission, and
   introduction, 369
   limits to right, 377
- INNOMINATE TERMS
 substantial failure to perform, and, 795–800
- INSANITY
 agency, and, 749
- INSOLVENCY
and see Bankruptcy transfer of liabilities, and, 704
- INSURANCE
 assignment, and, 675
 exemption clauses, and, 264–265
 frustration, and, 917–918
 gaming and wagering contracts, and, 513
 illegality, and, 437
 misrepresentation, and, 373
 misstatements, and, 244
 non-disclosure, and basis of contract clauses, 396
   disclosure of material facts, 395–396 facts not requiring disclosure, 396
   introduction, 395
   source of duty of disclosure, 397
   suretyship distinguished, 396–397
 privity of contract, and fire, 667
   introduction, 666
   life, 666–667
   motor, 667
   persons with limited interests, 667
   solicitors' indemnity, 667–668
   third parties' rights, 668–669
 rescission, and, 846–847
 standard form contracts, and, 215
- INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY CONTRACTS
 exemption clauses, and, 265
 unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 278–279
- INTENTION TO ACT
 agency, and, 706–709
- INTENTION TO CREATE LEGAL RELATIONS anger, and, 171
 assignment, and, 679–680
 collateral contracts, and, 583
 collective agreements, 168–169
 comfort letters, 167–168
 consideration, and, 173–175
 Crown appointments, 170
 discretion to one party, agreements giving, 167
 domestic arrangements, 164–167
 employee benefits, and, 171
 expressly negative expressions
   ex gratia, 164
   honour clauses, 163–164
   introduction, 163
   subject to contract agreements, 164 goodwill, and, 169
 implied terms, and, 201
 introduction, 162
 jests, and, 170–171
- INTENTION TO CREATE LEGAL RELATIONS—cont.
 letters of intent, 167–168
 mere puffs, 162
 pre-existing rights, and, 169
 proof of, 171–173
 social arrangements, 164–167
 statements inducing contract, 162–163
 vagueness, and, 170–171
- INTER PRAESENTES*
 mistake negating consent, and, 300–301
- INTEREST ON DAMAGES
 discretionary, 995–996
 introduction, 994
 late payment of damages, 998
 statutory, 994–995
- INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACTUAL RIGHTS
 general, 619
 property, affecting, 619–625
- INTERFERENCE WITH COURSE OF JUSTICE
 contracts contrary to public policy, and, 445–446
- INTERMEDDLING IN LITIGATION and see Champerty
 assignment, and, 672
- INTERMEDIATE TERMS, CONDITIONS AND WARRANTIES bases of distinction, 790–791
 breach of condition, and, 800–804
 breach of warranty, and, 804–805
 express classification, 791–792
 generally, 788
 innominate terms, 795–800
 intermediate terms, 795–800
 nature of distinction, 788–789
 statutory classification, 792–793
 technical application of distinction, 793–795
- INTERNATIONAL CARRIAGE
 exemption clauses, and, 266
- INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS
 unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 277
- INTERNATIONAL SALES
 posted acceptance, and, 29–30
- INTERNATIONAL SUPPLY OF GOODS
 exemption clauses, and, 266
- INTIMIDATION
 privity of contract, and, 625
- INVALID CLAIMS
 forbearance to sue, and, 88–90
- INVALIDITY, STATUTORY criminal acts, and, 513 formalities, and, 514
 gaming contracts
   and see Gaming contracts
   definitions, 518–519
   effects, 519–538
   enforcement, 519–522
   gambling stolen money, 535–538
   loans, 530–535
   principal and agent, 524–526
   prizes, 527
   recovery of money deposited, 523–524
   recovery of money paid, 522–523

INVALIDITY, STATUTORY—*cont.*gaming contracts—cont.

securities, 527–530
stakeholders, 526

generally, 513

unspecified consequences of breach, 514 void contracts held illegal, 513

wagering contracts

and see Wagering contracts

definitions, 514–518

effects, 519–538

enforcement, 519–522

gambling stolen money, 535–538

loans, 530–535

principal and agent, 524–526

prizes, 527

recovery of money deposited, 523–524

recovery of money paid, 522–523

securities, 527–530

stakeholders, 526

INVENTED CONSIDERATION

consideration, and, 71

INVITATION FOR TENDER

acceptance, and, 22

INVITATION TO TREAT

advertisements, 13–14

auction sales, 11–12

display of goods for sale, 12–13

introduction, 10–11

passenger tickets, 14–15

share sales, 16

tenders, 15

timetables, 14–15

IRREVOCABLE AGENCY

agency, and, 751–752

IRREVOCABLE CREDITS

consideration, and, 152–153

part performance, and, 40

JESTS

intention to create legal relations, and, 170–171

JOINDER OF DOCUMENTS

express terms, and incorporation by reference, 191–192

no express reference, 192

guarantee, and, 184–185

JOINT VENTURE AGREEMENTS

restraint of trade, and, 474

KNOWLEDGE OF ONE PARTY

mistake negating consent, and, 307–309

LAND

capacity of minors, and, 545–546

frustration, and

leases, 894–895

sale, 895–897

LAND AGREEMENTS

competition law, and, 476

LAND, COVENANTS FOR USE OF

restraint of trade, and, 472–473

LAND-RELATED CONTRACTS

capacity of minors, and, 545–546

LAND-RELATED CONTRACTS—cont.

exemption clauses, and, 265

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and,
278–279

LAPSE OF TIME

rectification, and, 325–326

rescission for misrepresentation, and, 384–385

termination of offer, and, 43–44

unconscionable bargains, and, 424

LATENT DEFECTS

non-disclosure, and, 390–391

LAW, MISREPRESENTATION OF

applicability of a rule of law, 334

effect of a document, 334

effect of a statute, 334

introduction, 333

mixed statements, 335

powers of companies, 333–334

LAW, MISTAKE OF

construction, as to, 315

inferences from physical circumstance, as to, 315–316

introduction, 313–314

misrepresentation, and, 333

private right, as to, 314

pure mistake, as to, 314–315

LAW OF PROPERTY ACT 1925

privity of contract, and, 669–671

LAW, TERMS IMPLIED IN

doubtful cases

classification issues, 211–212

imputed intention, 212–213

introduction, 206–207

legal duties, as to, 208–211

terms implied in fact, and, 207–208

LEASE

form of contract, and, 177

frustration, and, 894–895

LEGAL CHOSES

assignment, and, 674–675

LEGAL DUTIES

implied terms, and, 208–211

LEGAL IMPOSSIBILITY

mistake as to possibility of performance of contract, and, 287–288

LEGAL WRONG, CONTRACTS INVOLVING COMMISSION OF

amounting to legal wrong, 430–432

change in law, and, 438–439

commission of civil wrong

both parties innocent, 433

introduction, 432

one party innocent, 432–433

commission of crime, 432

indemnity against civil liability arising out of criminal acts, 436–437

generally, 435–436

indemnity against criminal liability, 435

introduction, 430

method of performance unlawful, 433–435

promise to pay on commission of unlawful act, 437–438

- LEGAL WRONG, CONTRACTS INVOLVING
  - COMMISSION OF—cont.
    - subject-matter used for unlawful purpose, 433
- LEGISLATIVE REQUIREMENTS
  - non-disclosure, and, 399
- LETTERS OF INTENT
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 167–168
- LICENSING
  - illegality, and, 434–435
- LIEN
  - rights of agent against principal, and, 744–745
- LIFE INSURANCE
  - assignment, and, 675
  - gaming and wagering contracts, and, 513
  - illegality, and, 438
  - privity of contract, and, 666–667
- LIMITATION OF LIABILITY
  - breach of fiduciary duties, and, 243
  - common law, at
    - contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
    - exclusion of liability for breach of fiduciary duties, 243
    - exclusion of liability for fraud, 242–243
    - exclusion of natural justice, 243
    - incorporation, 216–221
    - introduction, 241
    - misrepresentation as to contents, 241–242
    - negligence, 222–225
    - overriding undertaking, 242
    - seriousness of breach, 225–241
    - third parties, 244
    - unreasonableness, 243–244
  - construction
    - contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
    - introduction, 221
    - negligence, 222–225
    - seriousness of breach, 225–241
  - contra proferentem* rule, 221–222
  - course of dealing, and, 220–221
  - fraud, and, 242–243
  - incorporation by notice
    - degree of notice, 217–218
    - introduction, 217
    - nature of document, 217
    - steps taken to give notice, 218–219
    - time of notice, 219–220
  - incorporation in contract
    - course of dealing, by, 220–221
    - introduction, 216
    - notice, by, 217–220
    - signature, by, 216–217
  - introduction, 216
  - legislation, under
    - introduction, 246
    - UCTA 1977, 246–267
    - UTCCR 1999, 267–283
  - misrepresentation as to contents, and, 241–242
  - natural justice, and, 243
  - negligence
    - introduction, 222–223
    - party liable irrespective, 223–224
    - party liable only for negligence, 224–225
- LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—cont.
  - notice, and
    - degree of notice, 217–218
    - introduction, 217
    - nature of document, 217
    - steps taken to give notice, 218–219
    - time of notice, 219–220
  - overriding undertaking, and, 242
  - privity of contract, and
    - benefit, 627–638
    - burden, 638–645
    - generally, 626–627
    - introduction, 244
  - reasonableness, and, 243–244
  - seriousness of breach
    - affirmation, and, 238–240
    - applicable clauses, 237–238
    - burden of proof, 240–241
    - deviation cases, 228–231
    - general rule, 225–226
    - general statements, 233–234
    - illustrations, 234–236
    - manner of breach, 231–233
    - nature of rule, 233–237
    - nature of term broken, 226–228
    - rescission, 238–240
    - scope of rule, 226–233
    - total breach, 236–237
  - signature of contract, and, 216–217
  - third parties, and, 244
  - UCTA 1977, and
    - and see* Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977
  - excluded cases, 264–267
  - ineffective terms, 249–252
  - introduction, 246
  - partly effective terms, 257–258
  - preliminary definitions, 247–249
  - reasonableness rules, 258–261
  - relation with UTCCR, 267–268
  - restrictions on evasion, 261–264
  - terms subject to reasonableness requirements, 252–256
- UTCCR 1999, and
  - and see* Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations
  - definitions, 268–276
  - drafting terms, 280–281
  - effects of unfairness, 281–282
  - excluded contracts, 277–280
  - excluded terms, 276–277
  - generally, 267
  - interpretation of terms, 280–281
  - relation with UCTA, 267–268
  - restrictions on evasion, 283
- LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS
  - capacity, and, 563
  - supervening incapacity, and, 47
- LIQUIDATED CLAIMS
  - assignment, and, 696
- LOANS
  - capacity of minors, and
  - generally, 547

LOANS—cont.

- capacity of minors, and—cont.
  - necessaries, 543
- gaming and wagering contracts, and
  - future betting, for, 531–534
  - gaming on licensed premises, for, 534–535
  - generally, 530
  - pay lost bets, to, 530–531
- minors, and
  - generally, 547
  - necessaries, 543

LOBBYING FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 451

LOSS TO CLAIMANT

- borderline cases, 928–930
- discretionary account of profits, 930–932
- examples of rule, 927–928
- exceptions, 928
- general rule, 927

MAINTENANCE

- assignment, and, 672

MAINTENANCE AGREEMENTS

- ousting jurisdiction of court, and, 447

MANIFEST DISADVANTAGE

- undue influence, and, 410

MARINE INSURANCE

- assignment, and, 675
- form of contract, and, 181
- privity of contract, and, 666–667

MARRIAGE BROKAGE CONTRACTS

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 442–443

MARRIAGE, RESTRAINT OF

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 442

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS

- capacity of minors, and, 547
- privity of contract, and, 651

MARRY, AGREEMENTS TO

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 439–441

MATERIALITY OF MISREPRESENTATION

- generally, 336–338
- reliance, and, 342–343

MEANINGLESS PHRASES

- vagueness, and, 50–51

MEMORANDUM

- guarantee, and, 184

MENTAL PATIENTS

- capacity
  - disability known to other party, 557
  - generally, 557–558
  - introduction, 557
  - necessaries, 558–559
  - property subject to control, 558
  - supervening incapacity, and, 45

MERE PUFFS

- intention to create legal relations, and, 162
- misrepresentation, and, 330

MERE RIGHTS OF ACTION

- liquidated claims, 696
- introduction, 695

MERE RIGHTS OF ACTION—cont.

- public policy, 698
- tort claims, 696
- unliquidated claims, 696–698

METHOD OF PERFORMANCE IMPOSSIBLE

- generally, 879
- Suez cases, 879–880

METHOD OF PERFORMANCE, UNLAWFUL

- illegality, and, 433–435

MINORS

- capacity, and
  - and see* Capacity of minors
- introduction, 539
- liability in restitution, 551–557
- liability in tort, 551
- other contracts, 549–550
- valid contracts, 539–545
- voidable contracts, 545–549

MISDIRECTION

- acceptance, and, 27–28

MISLEADING STATEMENT

- non-disclosure, and, 394

MISREPRESENTATION

- addressed to another, 340–341
- agency, and, 740
- applicability of a rule of law, as to, 334
- assumption of responsibility, and, 347–348
- company's powers, as to, 333–334
- conditions of liability
  - introduction, 335
- material, 336–338
- reliance, 338–343
- unambiguous, 335–336

damages for

- and see below*
- assessment basis, 359–362
- contractual statements, 352–357
- fluctuations in value, 364–366
- fraud, 343–344
- in lieu of rescission, 357–359
- introduction, 343
- limit of right, 366–369
- negligence at common law, 344–350
- negligence under statute, 350–352
- remoteness, 362–364

effect of a document, as to, 334

effect of a statute, as to, 334

estoppel, and, 403–404

excluded statements

- future conduct, 331–332
- introduction, 330
- mere puffs, 330
- opinion and belief, 330–331

exclusion of liability for

- “by reason of any representation made”, 387–388
- common law, at, 241–242
- consumer contracts, and, 389
- “exclude or restrict . . . any liability . . . or . . . remedy”, 385–386
- generally, 385
- introduction, 256

MISREPRESENTATION—*cont.

exclusion of liability for—cont.

“party to a contract”, 386

reasonableness test, 388–389

fact, as to applicability of a rule of law, 334

effect of a document, 334

introduction, 333

mixed statements, 335

powers of companies, 333–334

private right, 334–335

representation of foreign law, 335

future conduct, and, 331–332

illegality, and, 492–493

introduction, 330

law, as to applicability of a rule of law, 334

effect of a document, 334

effect of a statute, 334

introduction, 333

mixed statements, 335

powers of companies, 333–334

materiality, and

generally, 336–338

reliance, and, 342–343

mere puffs, and, 330

mistakes of law, and, 333

non-disclosure

and see Non-disclosure

effects, 401–403

exceptions, 392–400

general rule, 390–391

opinion and belief, and, 330–331

opportunity to find truth, 339–340

private right, as to, 334–335

reliance, and

burden of proof, 343

introduction, 338

materiality, and, 342–343

opportunity to find truth, 339–340

other inducements, 341–342

representation addressed to another, 340–341

testing accuracy, 339

truth known to agent, 338–339

remedies

damages, 343–369

rescission, 369–385

representation of foreign law, as to, 335

rescission for

and see below

contract voidable, 371–372

defence, as, 373–374

incorporated misrepresentation, 375–377

introduction, 369–371

limits to right, 377–385

mode, 372–373

sale of goods, 374–375

restitution (illegality), and, 492–493

rights of agent against third party, and, 740

truth known to agent, 338–339

unambiguous, and, 335–336

MISREPRESENTATION, DAMAGES FOR

basis of assessment, 359–362

compensation orders in criminal cases, 369

contractual statements, and

collateral contract, 356–357

introduction, 352–353

term of main contract, 353–354

fluctuations in value, 364–366

fraud, 343–344

in lieu of rescission

basis of assessment, 366

introduction, 357

scope of s.2(2) MA 1967, 358–359

introduction, 343

limit of right

excluded cases, 366–367

indemnity, 367–368

negligence at common law

assumption of responsibility, 347–348

commercial relationships, 349

duty of care, 344–345

effects on other rules, 349–350

professional skill, 348–349

special relationships, 345–349

negligence under MA 1967

affirmation, 352

“fiction of fraud”, 351–352

introduction, 350

scope of s.2(1), 350–351

remoteness, and, 362–364

MISREPRESENTATION, RESCISSION FOR

affirmation, and, 383–384

bars to

affirmation, 383–384

impossibility of restitution, 378–379

lapse of time, 384–385

third party rights, 382–383

breach of contract, and, 370

common law, at, 369

contract voidable, 371–372

defence, as

generally, 373–374

introduction, 370–371

effect, 371–372

equity, in, 369–370

executed contracts, and, 377

fraud, and, 369

impossibility of restitution, and

benefit to misrepresentee, 379–380

changes made by misrepresentee, 378

changes made by misrepresentor, 379

decline in value, 378–379

deterioration, 379

improvements by misrepresentee, 381–382

improvements by misrepresentor, 382

introduction, 378

nature of subject-matter, 381

precision, and, 380–381

incorporated misrepresentation

s.1(a) MA 1967, 375–376

s.2(2) MA 1967, 376–377

MISREPRESENTATION, RESCISSION FOR—cont.

- innocent misrepresentation, and
  - introduction, 369
  - limits to right, 377
- introduction, 369–371
- lapse of time, and, 384–385
- limits to right
  - affirmation, 383–384
  - impossibility of restitution, 378–379
  - introduction, 377
  - lapse of time, 384–385
  - third party rights, 382–383
- meaning, 370–371
- mode, 372–373
- negligent misrepresentation, and, 369
- sale of goods, and, 374–375
- third party rights, and, 382–383

MISSTATEMENTS

- exemption clauses, and, 244

MISTAKE

- conduct of parties, and, 297–298
- consideration, and, 67
- construction of contract, and, 294–297
- documents mistakenly signed
  - capacity, 329
  - carelessness, 329
  - identity, 328–329
  - ignorance, 329
  - introduction, 326–327
  - persons to whom plea available, 327–328
  - seriousness of mistake, 328

equity, in

- and see* Mistake in equity
- forms of relief, 316–326
- introduction, 310–312
- types, 312–316

existence of subject-matter, as to, 286–287

frustration, and, 924–925

fundamental

- and see* Mistake negating consent
- existence of subject-matter, 286–287
- identity of subject-matter, 287
- introduction, 286
- possibility of performance of contract, 287–288
- quality, 288–294
- quantity, 294

identity of subject-matter, as to, 287

illegality, and, 493

introduction, 286

negating consent

- and see* Mistake negating consent
- effect, 306–309
- inducement to contract, 304–306
- introduction, 298
- person, as to, 298–303
- subject-matter, as to, 303–304
- terms of contract, as to, 304
- theoretical basis, 309–310

non est factum

- capacity, /329
- carelessness, 329

MISTAKE—cont.non est factum—cont.

- identity, 328–329
- ignorance, 329
- introduction, 326–327
- persons to whom plea available, 327–328
- seriousness of mistake, 328

nullifying consent

- and see* Mistake nullifying consent
- conduct of parties, 297–298
- construction of contract, 294–297
- existence of subject-matter, 286–287
- identity of subject-matter, 287
- introduction, 286
- possibility of performance of contract, 287–288
- quality, 288–294
- quantity, 294

payment under void contract, and, 1059

person, as to, 298–303

possibility of performance of contract, as to, 287–288

proprietary estoppel, and, 135

quality, as to, 288–294

quantity, as to, 294

restitution (illegality), and, 493

specific performance, and

- absolute refusal, 316–317
- terms, on, 317

subject-matter, as to, 303–304

terms of contract, as to, 304

MISTAKE IN EQUITY

fact, of

- and see* Mistake of fact
- generally, 312–313

forms of relief

- rectification, 321–326
- rescission, 317–321
- specific performance, 316–317

introduction, 310–312

law, of

- and see* Mistake of law
- generally, 313–316

rectification

- accurate recording of prior agreement, 324–325
- assignment, 326
- clear evidence, 325
- customary terms, 323
- executed contracts, 325
- introduction, 321–322
- judgment, 326
- lapse of time, 325–326
- mistake of one party, 322
- one party indifferent, 322–323
- prior contract, 324
- restitutio in integrum*, 325
- third party rights, 326
- types of mistake, 323–324

rescission

- introduction, 317
- validity at law, 317–320

- MISTAKE IN EQUITY—*cont.
 rescission—cont.
   void at law, 320–321
 specific performance
   absolute refusal, 316–317
   terms, on, 317
- MISTAKE NEGATING CONSENT
 ambiguity, and, 307
 effect ambiguity, 307
   general rule, 306–307
   knowledge of other party, 307–309 negligently induced mistake, 309
   operation against one party only, 309
 estoppel by representation, and, 306
 inducement to contract, and, 304–306
 introduction, 298
 knowledge of other party, and, 307–309 negligently induced mistake, and, 309 objective principle, and exceptional cases, 307–309
   general rule, 306–307
   operation against one party only, 309
 person, as to attribute, 301–302
   existing person, 303
   fundamental mistake, 298–300
   identity, 301–302
   inter praesentes mistake, 300–301
   undisclosed principals, 303
 subject-matter, as to, 303–304
 terms of contract, as to, 304
 theoretical basis, 309–310
- MISTAKE NULLIFYING CONSENT
 conduct of parties, and, 297–298
 construction of contract, and, 294–297
 existence of subject-matter, as to, 286–287
 identity of subject-matter, as to, 287
 introduction, 286
 possibility of performance of contract, as to commercial impossibility, 288
   introduction, 287
   legal impossibility, 287–288
   physical impossibility, 287
 quality, as to, 288–294
 quantity, as to, 294
- MISTAKE OF FACT
 enforcement of illegal contracts, and, 485–490
 expectation, as to, 313
 nature, 312
 misrepresentation, and, 333
 value, as to, 312–313
- MISTAKE OF LAW
 construction, as to, 315
 enforcement of illegal contracts, and, 484–485
 inferences from physical circumstance, as to, 315–316
 introduction, 313–314
 misrepresentation, and, 333
 private right, as to, 314
 pure mistake, as to, 314–315
- MITIGATION
 duty, 977–979
 fact, in, 980–982
 generally, 976–977
 “subject to contract” agreement, and, 53–54
- MORAL OBLIGATION
 past consideration, and, 79–80
- MORALS
 illegality, and, 429
- MORTGAGE VALUATIONS
 privity of contract, and, 586–587
- MOTOR INSURANCE
 illegality, and, 437
 privity of contract, and, 667
- MOTIVE
 consideration, and, 72
- MULTILATERAL CONTRACTS
 privity of contract, and, 585
- MULTIPARTITE AGREEMENTS
 generally, 47–48
- MUTUAL PROMISES
 consideration, and, 70–71
- NATURAL JUSTICE
 exemption clauses, and, 243
- NECESSARIES, CONTRACTS FOR
 mental patients, and, 558–559
 minors, and executory contracts, 541–543
   introduction, 539
   loans, 543
   maintenance legislation, 543 necessary goods, 540–541
   services rendered, 541
- NECESSITY
 agency, and acceptance of bill of exchange, 718
   effects, 748
   improvement of another’s property, 720
   introduction, 718
   preservation of another’s property, 719–721
   preservation of life or health, 721
   sale of another’s property, 719
   salvage, 719
   scope, 721–722
   shipmasters, 718–719
   termination, 750–751
   implied terms, and, 202
- NEGATIVE PROMISES
 injunctions, and express, 1042–1044
   implied, 1045–1046
 privity of contract, and, 603–604
- NEGATING CONSENT
 mistake, and
   and see Mistake negating consent
   effect, 306–309
   inducement to contract, 304–306
   introduction, 298
   person, as to, 298–303
   subject-matter, as to, 303–304
   terms of contract, as to, 304

NEGATIVING CONSENT—*cont.*mistake, and—cont.

theoretical basis, 309–310

NEGLECT

common law, at

and see below

damages for misrepresentation, 344–350

exemption clauses, 222–225

self-induced frustration, and, 906

statute, under

and see below

damages for misrepresentation, 350–352

exemption clauses, 249–253

third parties, and contrast with contractual damages, 614–619

defects in goods supplied, 613

duty of care, 607–609

economic loss, 611–613

general restrictions, 610–611

lack of title to damaged goods, 613–614

physical harm, 611–613

NEGLECT AT COMMON LAW

damages for misrepresentation, and

assumption of responsibility, 347–348

commercial relationships, 349

duty of care, 344–345

effects on other rules, 349–350

professional skill, 348–349

special relationships, 345–349

exemption clauses, and

introduction, 222–223

party liable irrespective, 223–224

party liable only for negligence, 224–225

NEGLECT UNDER STATUTE

damages for misrepresentation, and

affirmation, 352

“fiction of fraud”, 351–352

introduction, 350

scope of s.2(1), 350–351

exemption clauses, and

death, 249–250

other harm, 252–253

personal injury, 249–250

NEGLECT MISREPRESENTATION

damages at common law

assumption of responsibility, 347–348

commercial relationships, 349

duty of care, 344–345

effects on other rules, 349–350

professional skill, 348–349

special relationships, 345–349

damages under statute

affirmation, 352

“fiction of fraud”, 351–352

introduction, 350

scope of s.2(1), 350–351

rescission, and, 369

NEGLECTFULLY INDUCED MISTAKE

mistake negating consent, and, 309

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS

assignment, and

consideration, 692–693

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—*cont.*assignment, and—cont.

defects of title, 692

generally, 691–692

introduction, 672

transfer, 692

“NO-WIN NO-FEE” AGREEMENTS

champerty, and, 431

NOMINAL CONSIDERATION

generally, 74–75

inadequate consideration, and, 75–76

NON-CONSENSUAL AGENCY

apparent authority

forgeries by agent, and, 715–716

generally, 712

introduction, 706

reliance by third party, 714–715

representation, 712–714

subsequent conduct of principal, 716

effects, 748

necessity

acceptance of bill of exchange, 718

improvement of another's property, 720

introduction, 718

preservation of another's property, 719–721

preservation of life or health, 721

sale of another's property, 719

salvage, 719

scope, 721–722

shipmasters, 718–719

termination, and, 750–751

usual authority

effects, 748

introduction, 706

meaning, 716–717

scope, 717–718

termination, 750–751

NON-DISCLOSURE

clarifying legal relationship, and, 399

compromises, and, 398

custom, and, 394

effects

generally, 401–402

statute, under, 401–402

exceptions

clarifying legal relationship, 399 contracts with limited duty of disclosure, 398

custom, 394

falsification by later events, 393–394

fiduciary relationship, 399

introduction, 392

legislative requirements, 399

misleading statement, 394

performance of contract, 400 utmost good faith contracts, 394–395

exemption clauses, 398

falsification by later events, and, 393–394 fiduciary relationship, and, 399

general rule, 390–391

guarantees, and, 398

NON-DISCLOSURE—cont.

- insurance, and
  - basis of contract clauses, 396
  - disclosure of material facts, 395–396
  - facts not requiring disclosure, 396
  - introduction, 395
  - source of duty of disclosure, 397
  - suretyship distinguished, 396–397
- latent defects, and, 390–391
- legislative requirements, and, 399
- misleading statement, and, 394
- performance of contract, and, 400
- representation by conduct, and, 390
- sale of land, and, 390
- suretyship, and, 398
- utmost good faith contracts, and
  - family arrangements, 397–398
  - insurance, 396–397
  - introduction, 394

NON EST FACTUM

- capacity, 329
- carelessness, 329
- identity, 328–329
- ignorance, 329
- introduction, 326–327
- persons to whom plea available, 327–328
- seriousness of mistake, 328

NON-EXISTENT PRINCIPAL

- rights of agent against third party, 735–736
- rights of principal against third party, 730–731

NON-PAYMENT OF MONEY

- cost of delay, 996–998
- discretionary interest, 995–996
- introduction, 994
- late payment of damages, 998
- statutory interest, 994–995

NON-PECUNIARY LOSS

- damages, and, 993–994

NON-RELIANCE ON ILLEGAL TRANSACTION

- equitable title, 499–501
- illegal leases, 498
- introduction, 495–496
- recovery of money obtained, 501–503
- recovery of money paid, 498
- recovery of transferred goods, 496–498

NON-PAYMENT OF MONEY

- cost of delay, 996–998
- discretionary interest, 995–996
- introduction, 994
- late payment of damages, 998
- statutory interest, 994–995

NOTICE OF EXEMPTION CLAUSES

- degree of, 217–218
- introduction, 217
- nature of document, 217
- steps taken to give, 218–219
- time of, 219–220

NOVATION

- assignment, and, 673
- transfer of liabilities, and, 701–702

NOVATION OF PARTNERSHIP DEBTS

- consideration, and, 155–156

NUGATORY CONTRACTS

- illegality, and, 430

NULLIFICATION OF CONSENT

- mistake, and
  - and see* Mistake nullifying consent
  - conduct of parties, 297–298
  - construction of contract, 294–297
  - existence of subject-matter, 286–287
  - identity of subject-matter, 287
  - introduction, 286
  - possibility of performance of contract, 287–288
  - quality, 288–294
  - quantity, 294

OBJECTIVE PRINCIPLE

- introduction, 1
- mistake in equity, and, 311
- mistake negating consent, and
  - exceptional cases, 307–309
  - general rule, 306–307
  - operation against one party only, 309
- offer, and, 8–9

OCCURRENCE OF CONDITION

- termination of offer, and, 44

OFFER

- acceptance
  - and see* Acceptance
  - communication of, 22–30
  - definition, 16–22
  - ignorance of offer, in, 36–37
  - prescribed method, 30–35
  - unilateral contracts, in, 37–41
- advertisements, 13–14
- auction sales, 11–12
- conduct, and, 9–10
- definition
  - conduct, 9–10
  - objective test, 8–9
- display of goods for sale, 12–13
- invitation to treat, and
  - advertisements, 13–14
  - auction sales, 11–12
  - display of goods for sale, 12–13
  - introduction, 10–11
  - passenger tickets, 14–15
  - share sales, 16
  - tenders, 15
  - timetables, 14–15
- passenger tickets, 14–15
- place of taking effect, 16
- share sales, 16
- tenders, 15
- termination of
  - and see* Termination of offer
  - death, 44–45
  - lapse of time, 43–44
  - occurrence of condition, 44
  - rejection, 43
  - supervening incapacity, 45–47
  - withdrawal, 41–42
- time of taking effect, 16

- OFFER—cont.
  - timetables, 14–15
- OFFEROR'S AGENT
  - confirmation of acceptance, and, 23
- OFFICE OF FAIR TRADING (OFT)
  - administrative control, and, 283–285
- OFFICIOUS BYSTANDER TEST
  - implied terms, and, 201
- ONEROUS PROPERTY, GIFT OF
  - consideration, and, 87
- OPERATION OF CONTRACT
  - parol evidence rule, and, 195–196
- OPERATION OF LAW
  - agency, and, 705
  - assignment, and
    - bankruptcy, 699–701
    - death, 699
  - implied terms, and, 201
  - terms of contract, and, 191
- OPINION AND BELIEF
  - misrepresentation, and, 330–331
- OPPRESSION
  - restitution (illegality), and, 492
- OPTIONS
  - terms left open, and, 57–58
- ORAL WARRANTIES
  - parol evidence rule, and, 195
  - performance of contract, and
- ORDER OF PERFORMANCE
  - concurrent condition, 763
  - condition precedent, 762–763
  - distinction between conditions and promises
    - criteria, 764–765
    - effects, 765–766
  - generally, 761–762
  - independent promises, 763–764
  - wrongful refusal to accept performance, and, 766–769
- OUTSTANDING JURISDICTION OF COURT, CONTRACTS
  - arbitration clauses, 447
  - construction of rules of association, 450
  - general rule, 446–447
  - maintenance agreements 447
  - scope of rule, 450
- OVERPAYMENTS
  - gaming and wagering contracts, and, 523
- OVERRIDING UNDERTAKING
  - exemption clauses, and, 242
- PARENTAL RESPONSIBILITY
  - contracts contrary to public policy, and, 441–442
- PAROL EVIDENCE RULE
  - collateral agreements, 199–200
  - consideration, 201
  - construction of words, 197–198
  - custom, 198
  - express terms, 195
  - general statement, 192–193
  - implied terms, 195
  - operation of contract, 195–196
  - oral warranties, 195
- PAROL EVIDENCE RULE—cont.
  - parties, 196
  - rectification, 199
  - specific performance, and, 196–197
  - subject-matter, 199
  - validity of contract, 195
  - written agreement not whole agreement, 193–195
- PART OF DEBT
  - assignment, and, 677
- PART PAYMENT OF DEBT
  - common law limitations
    - collateral contracts, 130
    - composition agreements, 129–130
    - disputed claims, 126
    - forbearance to enforce cross-claim, 128
    - other benefit to creditor, 128
    - third party payment, 128–129
    - unliquidated claims, 126–127
    - variations in debtor's performance, 127
  - damages, and
    - deposits, 1008–1009
    - failure to pay, 1011–1012
    - forfeiture of instalments, 1009–1011
    - introduction, 1007
    - UTCCR 1999, 1012–1013
  - equitable evasion
    - forbearance, 131–134
    - introduction, 130
    - release, 130
  - general rule, 125–126
- PART PERFORMANCE
  - acceptance, and
    - bankers' irrevocable credits, 40
    - continuing guarantees, 39–40
    - estate agents' contracts, 40–41
    - extent of recovery, 41
    - generally, 38–39
    - introduction, 38
  - guarantees, and, 186
  - quantum meruit, and, 1062–1063
  - rescission for failure to perform, and
    - acceptance, and, 816–819
    - consumer sales, 818–819
    - generally, 816
    - incorporated misrepresentation, 817
    - part payment, and, 819
    - partial rejection, 817
    - serious breach, 817–818
- PARTIAL FAILURE
  - frustration, and, 890
- PARTIAL ILLEGALITY
  - frustration, and, 890
- PARTIES
  - guarantees, and, 183
  - parol evidence rule, and, 196
  - plurality, and
    - and see* Plurality of parties
  - creditors, 575–579
  - debtors, 568–574
  - introduction, 568

PARTIES—*cont.

- privity of contract, and
  - agency, 584–585
  - collateral contracts, 582–584
  - corporations, 586
  - introduction, 582
  - mortgage valuations, 586–587
  - multilateral contracts, 585

PARTNERSHIP

- capacity of minors, and, 546

PASSENGER TICKETS

- invitation to treat, and, 14–15

PASSING OF PROPERTY

- capacity of minors, and, 550

PAST CONSIDERATION

- antecedent debt, 79
- general rule, 77–78
- moral obligation, 79–80
- past act or promise, 78–79
- statutory exceptions, 80–81

PAYMENT ON COMMISSION OF UNLAWFUL ACT

- illegality, and, 437–438

PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT

- cheque payment, by, 754–755

introduction, 753*method

- alternatives, 755
- cheque payment, 754–755
- general rule, 753–754
- tender, 754

mistake, and

- commercial impossibility, 288
- introduction, 287
- legal impossibility, 287–288
- physical impossibility, 287

non-disclosure, and, 400*order of

- concurrent condition, 763
- condition precedent, 762–763
- criteria for distinction, 764–765
- effects of distinction, 765–766
- generally, 761–762
- independent promises, 763–764

payment, by, 754–755*rescission for failure to perform

and see Rescission

- criticism, 825–826
- election, 811–816
- introduction, 759–761
- limitations on right, 811–825
- order of performance, 761–769
- part performance of contract, 816–819
- policy considerations, 760–761
- substantial failure, 769–811
- terminology, 759–760
- voluntary acceptance of benefit, 819–822
- waiver, 811–816
- wrongful prevention of performance, 822
- wrongful refusal to accept, and, 766–769

substantial failure to perform

and see Substantial failure to perform
adequacy of damages, 771–773

PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—*cont.substantial failure to perform—*cont.

- breach of fundamental term, 805–807
- conditions, warranties and intermediate terms, 788–805
- deliberate breach, 807–810
- entire obligations, 782–784
- exceptions, 778–811
- express provision for determination, 778–782
- historical background, 770
- introduction, 769–770
- meaning, 770–778
- other factors, 777–778
- ratio of failure to performance, 773–774
- severable obligations, 784–788
- specific performance, 771–773
- ulterior motives, 776–777
- uncertainty as to future performance, 774–776
- unilateral contracts, 810–811
- unjust enrichment, 771

tender, by, 754*time stipulations, and

- general, 826–827
- LPA 1925, under, 830–831
- notice, 829–830
- sale of land, 827–829

vicarious

- assignment, and, 758
- introduction, 755
- with creditor's consent, 755–756
- without creditor's consent, 756–757
- wrongful refusal to accept, 766–769

PERFORMANCE OF EXISTING DUTY*imposed by contract with promisor

- factual benefit to promisor, 95–96
- introduction, 94
- no consideration cases, 94–95
- other, 96–97

imposed by contract with third party

- introduction, 97
- performance, 97–98
- promise to perform, 98

imposed by law

- additional consideration, 93
- introduction, 92
- public policy, 92
- rewards for information leading to arrest, 92–93
- introduction, 92

PERSON, MISTAKE AS TO

- attribute, 301–302
- existing person, 303
- fundamental mistake, 298–300
- identity, 301–302
- inter praesentes* mistake, 300–301
- undisclosed principals, 303

PERSONAL CONTRACTS

- assignment, and, 693–695

PERSONAL INJURY

- exemption clauses, and, 249–250

- PERSONAL LIBERTY, RESTRICTION OF
  - contracts contrary to public policy, and, 452–453
- PERSONAL SERVICES, CONTRACTS FOR
  - specific performance, and, 1029–1032
- PHYSICAL CIRCUMSTANCE
  - mistake of law, and, 315–316
- PHYSICAL IMPOSSIBILITY
  - mistake as to possibility of performance of contract, and, 287
- PLEDGE
  - exemption clauses, and, 251–252
- PLURALITY OF PARTIES
  - creditors
    - consideration moving from one joint debtor, 578–579
    - defence against one joint creditor, 576–577
    - definitions, 575–576
    - parties to action, 576
    - payment to one joint creditor, 577–578
    - release by one joint creditor, 577
    - survivorship, 576
  - debtors
    - bankruptcy, 574
    - contribution, 574
    - defence of one joint debtor, 571–572
    - definitions, 568–569
    - judgment, 569–570
    - parties to action, 569
    - release of one joint debtor, 572–574
    - survivorship, 570–571
    - terms of contract, 574
  - introduction, 568
- PNEUMOCONIOSIS COMPENSATION AWARDS
  - exemption clauses, and, 266
- POOR PERSONS, DEALINGS WITH
  - unconscionable bargains, and, 420–421
- POSSESSORY RIGHTS
  - third parties, and, 624–625
- POSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT,
  - MISTAKE AS TO
    - commercial impossibility, 288
    - introduction, 287
    - legal impossibility, 287–288
    - physical impossibility, 287
- POST-CONTRACT NON-DISCLOSURE
  - generally, 401–402
- POSTING RULE
  - application of rule, 26
  - cancellation of distance contracts, 30
  - generally, 24
  - international sales, 29–30
  - introduction, 24
  - misdirection of post, 27–28
  - purpose, 24–25
  - reasonable to use post, 25–26
  - revocation, 28–29
  - terms of offer, 26
- POWER OF ATTORNEY
  - assignment, and, 674
  - irrevocable agency, and, 751–752
- PRE-CONTRACT NON-DISCLOSURE
  - generally, 401–402
- PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS
  - terms left open, and, 57–58
- PRE-EXISTING RIGHTS
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 169
- PRESCRIBED CONTENTS
  - standard form contracts, and, 285
- PRESERVATION OF ANOTHER'S PROPERTY
  - agency of necessity, and
    - conditions, 719–720
    - generally, 719–720
- PRESERVATION OF LIFE OR HEALTH
  - agency of necessity, and, 721
- PRESSURE
  - and see* Undue influence
  - generally, 408–409
- PRESUMED UNDUE INFLUENCE
  - actual pressure, and, 418
  - burden of proof, 418
  - categories of relationship
    - actual confidence, 413–414
    - effect of Etridge decision, 414–418
    - introduction, 411
    - trust and confidence, 411–413
  - effect, 411
  - introduction, 409
  - nature, 411
  - rebuttal, 419–420
  - remedy, 419
  - requirements, 410–411
  - scope, 419
  - types, 409–410
- PREVIOUS DEALINGS
  - exemption clauses, and, 220–221
- PRICE-MAINTENANCE AGREEMENTS
  - restraint of trade, and, 474
- PRICE-MARKED GOODS
  - invitation to treat, and, 12
- PRINCIPAL AND AGENT
  - gaming and wagering contracts, and
    - advance payment, 525–526
    - agent's indemnity, 524
    - agent's liability to account, 525
    - excepted transactions, 526
    - failure to obey instruction, 524
- PRIOR CONTRACT
  - rectification, and, 324
- PRIVATE RIGHT
  - misrepresentation, and, 334–335
  - mistake of law, and, 314
- PRIVITY OF CONTRACT, DOCTRINE OF
  - agency
    - burden of contract, and, 639–640
    - exceptions, and, 645–646
    - parties to agreement, and, 584–585
  - assignment, 646
  - bailment on terms, 640–642
  - benefit of contract, and
    - clauses defining duties, 637–638
    - Himalaya clauses, 631–636
    - introduction, 627–631

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT, DOCTRINE OF—*cont.

- benefit of contract, and—cont.
  - other drafting devices, 637
- burden of contract
  - agency, 639–640
  - bailment on terms, 640–642
  - clauses defining duties, 642–643
  - derivative rights, 643–645
  - exceptions, 639–645
  - general rule, 638–639
  - implied contract, 639–640
- chattels, and
  - general principle, 620–621
  - introduction, 619–620
  - possessory rights, 624–625
  - remedy, 621–622
  - special cases, 620
  - third party liability, 622–624
- clauses defining duties
  - benefit of contract, and, 637–638
  - burden of contract, and, 642–643
- collateral contracts
  - consideration, 584
  - contractual intention, 584
  - illustrations, 582–583
- consideration, and
  - generally, 587
  - introduction, 83
- Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, and
  - effect, 662–664
  - enforcement rights, 651–657
  - exceptions, 661–662
  - insurance, 666–669
  - nature of rights, 664
  - promisee's rights, 665–666
  - promisor's defences, 660–661
  - property, 669–671
  - rescission of contract, 657–660
  - UCTA, and, 664–665
- corporations, 586
- covenants concerning land, 645
- derivative rights, 643–645
- development, 588–590
- exceptions
  - agency, 645–646
  - assignment, 646
  - covenants concerning land, 645
  - introduction, 645
  - marriage settlements, 651
  - statute, under, 651–671
  - trusts of promises, 646–651
- exceptions under statute
  - Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, 651–669
  - insurance, 666–669
  - Law of Property Act 1925, 669–671
- exemption clauses, and
  - benefit, 627–638
  - burden, 638–645
  - generally, 626–627
  - introduction, 244

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT, DOCTRINE OF—*cont.

- Himalaya clauses
  - defect in main contract, 635–636
  - effect, 631–634
  - introduction, 631
  - nature, 631–634
  - scope, 634–635
- insurance
  - fire, 667
  - introduction, 666
  - life, 666–667
  - motor, 667
  - persons with limited interests, 667
  - solicitors' indemnity, 667–668
  - third parties' rights, 668–669
- interference with contractual rights
  - general, 619
  - property, affecting, 619–625
- intimidation, 625
- introduction, 580–582
- Law of Property Act 1925, 669–671
- marriage settlements, 651
- mortgage valuations, 586–587
- multilateral contracts, 585
- negligence to third parties
  - contrast with contractual damages, 614–619
  - defects in goods supplied, 613
  - duty of care, 607–609
  - economic loss, 611–613
  - general restrictions, 610–611
  - lack of title to damaged goods, 613–614
  - physical harm, 611–613
- operation
  - introduction, 590
  - position between promisee and third party, 604–606
  - promisee's remedies, 590–604
- parties to agreement
  - agency, 584–585
  - collateral contracts, 582–584
  - corporations, 586
  - introduction, 582
  - mortgage valuations, 586–587
  - multilateral contracts, 585
- parties to consideration, 587
- promisee's remedies
  - agreed sum payment, 591
  - damages for promisee's loss, 591
  - damages for third party's loss, 592–603
  - negative promise, 603–604
  - restitution, 590
  - specific performance, 590
- property, and
  - general principle, 620–621
  - introduction, 619–620
  - possessory rights, 624–625
  - remedy, 621–622
  - special cases, 620
  - third party liability, 622–624
- purpose, 588
- restitution, 625–626

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT; DOCTRINE OF—cont.

scope

- general, 606–607
- interference with contractual rights, 619–625
- intimidation, 625
- negligence, 607–619
- restitution, 625–626

statutory exceptions

- Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, 651–669
- insurance, 666–669
- Law of Property Act 1925, 669–671

trusts of promises

- effects of trust, 649–650
- intention to create trust, 647–649
- introduction, 646
- relation between trust device and privity, 650–651
- relevant promises, 650

PRIZES

- gaming and wagering contracts, and, 527

PRODUCT LIABILITY

- exemption clauses, and, 252

PROFESSIONAL ADVISORS

- agency, and, 708

PROFESSIONAL CODES

- restraint of trade, and, 474

PROFESSIONAL SKILL

- negligent misrepresentation, and, 348–349

PROMISE TO MARRY

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 440

PROMISE TO PAY ON COMMISSION OF UNLAWFUL

ACT

- illegality, and, 437–438

PROMISES

and see Consideration

- deeds, in, 158–160
- generally, 68–70
- guarantee, and, 181
- introduction, 67
- limited effects, 73
- mutuality, 70–71
- past consideration, and, 78–79
- severance, and
  - “blue pencil” test, 507
  - effect on nature of contract, 507–509
  - effect on other promises, 509–510
  - need for separate consideration, 509
  - severable type, 506–507
- waiver, and, 118

PROMISES WITHOUT CONSIDERATION

- specific performance, and, 1036–1037

PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL

- form of contract, and, 180
- mistake, and, 135
- proprietary estoppel, and, 146–148
- waiver, and, 107

PROMISSORY NOTES

- assignment, and
  - consideration, 692–693
  - defects of title, 692
  - generally, 691–692

PROMISSORY NOTES—*cont.*assignment, and—cont.

- introduction, 672
- transfer, 692
- form of contract, and, 177

PROMOTION OF SEXUAL IMMORALITY, CONTRACTS FOR

- introduction, 443
- meretricious purposes, 443–444
- stable relationships, 444–445

PROOF

- intention to create legal relations, and, 171–173

PROPERTY

privity of contract, and

- general principle, 620–621
- introduction, 619–620
- possessory rights, 624–625
- remedy, 621–622
- special cases, 620
- third party liability, 622–624

PROPRIETARY ESTOPPEL

- acquiescence, and, 135

bases of liability

- alternative explanation, 137–138
- expenditure on another's land, 135–136
- other acts done, 136–137

conditions of liability

- detrimental reliance, 140–141
- relation to specific property, 141–142
- subject-matter of promise, 140
- types of promise, 138–140

contract, and, 148–149

equity on promisee, 142–146

introduction, 134–135

mistake, and, 135

promissory estoppel, and, 146–148

revocability, 142

scope of doctrine

- bases of liability, 135–138
- conditions of liability, 138–142
- introduction, 135

PUBLIC INTEREST

restraint of trade, and

- employment, 462–463
- exclusive dealing, 471–472

PUBLIC POLICY

assignment, and, 698

performance of existing duty, and, 92

PUBLIC POLICY, CONTRACTS CONTRARY TO

contemplation of divorce, 441

deception of local authorities, 450–451

future separation by spouses, 441

generally, 439

illegal act in friendly foreign country, 452

inconsistent with parental responsibility, 441–442

interference with course of justice, 445–446

introduction, 430

marriage brokerage contracts, 442–443

married persons agreeing to marry, 439–441

ousting jurisdiction of court

arbitration clauses, 447

PUBLIC POLICY, CONTRACTS CONTRARY TO—cont.

- ousting jurisdiction of court—cont.
  - construction of rules of association, 450
  - general rule, 446–447
  - maintenance agreements 447
  - scope of rule, 450
- promotion of sexual immorality
  - introduction, 443
  - meretricious purposes, 443–444
  - stable relationships, 444–445
- restraint of marriage, 442
- restraint of trade, contracts in
  - and see* Restraint of trade
  - competition law, and, 475–477
  - employers' associations, 467–468
  - employment, 454–465
  - EU law, and, 477
  - exclusive dealing, 468–472
  - generally, 453–454
  - introduction, 430
  - land use covenants, 472–473
  - other, 474–475
  - restrictive trading, 465–467
  - sale of business, 454–465
  - trade unions, 467–468
- restriction of personal liberty, 452–453
- sale of offices and honours, 451
- scope of doctrine, 477–480
- sexual immorality
  - introduction, 443
  - meretricious purposes, 443–444
  - stable relationships, 444–445
- trading with enemy, 452

PUFFS

- intention to create legal relations, and, 162

PUNITIVE SUMS

- damages, and, 935–936

“PURE” MISTAKE OF LAW

- generally, 314–315

“PURE” NON-DISCLOSURE

- generally, 401
- Misrepresentation Act 1967, and, 402–403

QUALITY

- mistake, and, 288–294

QUANTITY

- mistake, and, 294

QUANTUM MERUIT

- frustrated contract, 1064
- incapacity, 1062
- introduction, 1061
- no concluded contract, 1061–1062
- no express provision for remuneration, 1061
- partial performance, 1062–1063
- void contract, 1063–1064
- wrongful prevention of performance, 1062

RATIFICATION

- agency, and
  - conditions, 723–725
  - effect, 726
  - introduction, 722
  - nature, 722–723

RATIFICATION—cont.

- capacity of minors, and, 549

REASONABLE CONTEMPLATION TEST

- generally, 965–968
- scope, 973–974

REASONABLENESS

- exemption clauses (common law), and, 243–244
- exemption clauses (UCTA 1977), and
  - affirmation, and, 261
  - guidelines, 258–260
  - introduction, 258
  - nature of decision, 260–261
  - rescission, and, 261
  - seriousness of breach, and, 261
  - time for determination, 258
- misrepresentation, and, 388–389
- restraint of trade, and
  - employment, 458–462
  - exclusive dealing, 470–471

RECIPROCITY

- consideration, and, 67

RECOVERY OF MONEY DEPOSITED

- gaming and wagering contracts, and
- illegal wagers, 523
- lawful wagers, 523–524

RECOVERY OF MONEY OBTAINED

- non reliance on illegal transaction, and, 501–503

RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID

- capacity of minors, and, 548
- gaming and wagering contracts, and
  - common law, at, 522
  - statute, under, 522–523
- introduction, 1049
- minors, and, 548
- non reliance on illegal transaction, and, 498
- payment under void contract
  - bases of rule, 1058–1060
  - failure of consideration, 1058–1059
  - general rule, 1057–1058
  - lack of consideration, 1058–1059
  - mistake, 1059
  - practical considerations, 1059–1060
  - special cases, 1060–1061
- total failure of consideration
  - damages, as, 1056–1057
  - definition, 1049–1050
  - non-returnable benefits, 1052–1053
  - partial failure, 1050–1052
  - returnable benefits, 1052–1053
  - unbargained for benefits, 1053–1056

RECOVERY OF TRANSFERRED GOODS

- non reliance on illegal transaction, and, 496–498

RECTIFICATION

- assignment, and, 326
- mistake, and
  - accurate recording of prior agreement, 324–325
  - assignment, 326
  - clear evidence, 325
  - customary terms, 323

RECTIFICATION—*cont.*mistake, and—cont.

- executed contracts, 325
- introduction, 321–322
- judgment, 326
- lapse of time, 325–326
- mistake of one party, 322
- one party indifferent, 322–323
- prior contract, 324
- restitutio in integrum*, 325
- third party rights, 326
- types of mistake, 323–324
- parol evidence rule, and, 199

REFERENCE TO THIRD PARTY

generally, 48

REFUSAL TO PERFORM

- breach of contract, and, 832–834

REJECTION

- termination of offer, and, 43

RELEASE

- joint creditor, by, 577
- joint debtor, of, 572–574
- part payment of debt, and, 130

RELIANCE

- apparent authority, and, 714–715
- misrepresentation, and
  - burden of proof, 343
  - introduction, 338
  - materiality, and, 342–343
  - opportunity to find truth, 339–340
  - other inducements, 341–342
  - representation addressed to another, 340–341
  - testing accuracy, 339
  - truth known to agent, 338–339
- waiver, and, 109–110

RELIANCE LOSS

- basis of assessment, 944
- generally, 940

REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT

- agreed sum, action for
  - availability, 1014–1019
  - distinction from damages, 1013–1014
  - introduction, 843
- damages
  - contract, under, 999–1007
  - generally, 926–927
  - introduction, 843
  - part payment, 1007–1013
  - principles, 927–944
  - quantification, 944–964
  - restrictions, 964–999
  - specific performance, and, 1046–1049
- injunction
  - generally, 1040–1042
  - introduction, 843
  - specific performance, and, 1042–1046
- introduction, 926
- restitution
  - introduction, 1049
  - quantum meruit, 1061–1064
  - recovery of money paid, 1049–1061

REMEDIES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—cont.

specific performance

- basis, 1020–1026
- discretion, 1026–1029
- generally, 1019–1020
- introduction, 843
- mutuality, 1037–1038
- third parties, and, 1038–1040
- unenforceable contracts, 1029–1037

REMOTENESS

- contemplation, 972–973
- introduction, 965
- knowledge of special circumstances, 969–972
- misrepresentation, and, 362–364
- ordinary course of things, 968–969
- reasonable contemplation test, 965–968

REPRESENTATION BY CONDUCT

- non-disclosure, and, 390

REPRESENTATION, ESTOPPEL BY

- misrepresentation, and, 403–404
- mistake negating consent, and, 306
- waiver, and, 115–117

REPRESENTATION OF FOREIGN LAW

- misrepresentation, and, 335

REPRESENTATIONS

and see Misrepresentation

- apparent authority, and
  - authorisation to act, of, 713
  - authority, of, 712–713
  - fact, of, 713
  - made by principal, 713–714
  - made to third party, 714
- future conduct, and, 331–332
- introduction, 330
- mere puffs, and, 330
- opinion and belief, and, 330–331

REPUDIATION

- anticipatory breach, and
  - and see* Anticipatory breach
- acceptance, 858–864
- damages, 859–860
- generally, 857–858
- rescission, 860–864
- before performance due
  - anticipatory breach doctrine, 857–864
  - non-acceptance of breach, 864–865
- capacity of minors, and
  - effects, 547–548
  - time, 547
- wrongful refusal to accept performance, and
  - inducing failure, 766–767
  - not inducing inability, 767–768

REPUDIATION OF ILLEGAL PURPOSE

- in time, 494–495
- introduction, 493–494
- voluntary, 495

RESCISSIION

- breach of contract, and
  - effects, 849–855
  - generally, 759–826
- introduction, 844
- option, 844–849

RESCISSION—*cont.

- consideration, and, 99–101
- damages for misrepresentation, and
  - basis of assessment, 366
  - introduction, 357
  - scope of s.2(2) MA 1967, 358–359
- effects
  - change of course, and, 856–857
  - introduction, 849
  - obligations of party of breach, on, 850–855
  - obligations of victim, on, 849–850
- breach of contract, and
  - effects, 849–855
  - generally, 759–826
  - introduction, 844
  - option, 844–849
- form of contract, and, 188–189
- misrepresentation, and
  - and see below*
  - contract voidable, 371–372
  - defence, as, 373–374
  - incorporated misrepresentation, 375–377
  - introduction, 369–371
  - limits to right, 377–385
  - mode, 372–373
  - sale of goods, 374–375
- mistake, and
  - introduction, 317
  - validity at law, 317–320
  - void at law, 320–321
- option for
  - employment contracts, 845–846
  - exercise of, 848–849
  - generally, 844–845
  - insurance contracts, 846–847
  - restriction on choice, 847–848
- performance of contract, and
  - and see below*
  - criticism, 825–826
  - election, 811–816
  - introduction, 759–761
  - limitations on right, 811–825
  - order of performance, 761–769
  - part performance of contract, 816–819
  - policy considerations, 760–761
  - substantial failure, 769–811
  - terminology, 759–760
  - voluntary acceptance of benefit, 819–822
  - waiver, 811–816
  - wrongful prevention of performance, 822
  - wrongful refusal to accept, and, 766–769
- seriousness of breach of contract, and, 238–240
- unconscionable bargains, and, 423
- waiver, and, 103

RESCISSION FOR FAILURE TO PERFORM*criticism, 825–826*effects

- change of course, and, 856–857
- introduction, 849
- obligations of party of breach, on, 850–855
- obligations of victim, on, 849–850

RESCISSION FOR FAILURE TO PERFORM—*cont.

- breach of contract, and
  - effects, 849–855
  - generally, 759–826
  - introduction, 844
  - option, 844–849
- election, and
  - generally, 811–813
  - knowledge, and, 815–816
  - reliance, and, 814–815
  - representation, 813–814
- introduction, 759–761
- limitations on right
  - apportionment, 823–825
  - both parties in breach, 823
- election, 811–816
- introduction, 811
- part performance of contract, 816–819
- voluntary acceptance of benefit, 819–822
- waiver, 811–816
- wrongful prevention of performance, 822
- option for
  - employment contracts, 845–846
  - exercise of, 848–849
  - generally, 844–845
  - insurance contracts, 846–847
  - restriction on choice, 847–848
- order of performance, and
  - condition precedent, 762–763
  - criteria for distinction, 764–765
  - effects of distinction, 765–766
  - generally, 761–762
  - independent promises, 763–764
- part performance of contract
  - acceptance, and, 816–819
  - consumer sales, 818–819
  - generally, 816
  - incorporated misrepresentation, 817
  - part payment, and, 819
  - partial rejection, 817
  - serious breach, 817–818
- policy considerations, 760–761
- sale of land
  - commercial contracts, 828–829
  - common law, at, 827
  - conditional contracts, 829
  - equity, in, 827–829
  - nature of property, 828
  - term of contract, 828
  - waiver, 829
- substantial failure to perform
  - and see* Substantial failure to perform
  - adequacy of damages, 771–773
  - breach of fundamental term, 805–807
  - conditions, warranties and intermediate terms, 788–805
  - deliberate breach, 807–810
  - entire obligations, 782–784
  - exceptions, 778–811
  - express provision for determination, 778–782
  - historical background, 770
  - introduction, 769–770

RESCISSON FOR FAILURE TO PERFORM—*cont.

- substantial failure to perform—cont.
  - meaning, 770–778
  - other factors, 777–778
  - ratio of failure to performance, 773–774
  - severable obligations, 784–788
  - specific performance, 771–773
  - ulterior motives, 776–777
  - uncertainty as to future performance, 774–776
  - unilateral contracts, 810–811
  - unjust enrichment, 771
- time stipulations, and
  - general, 826–827
  - I.P.A. 1925, under, 830–831
  - notice, 829–830
  - sale of land, 827–829
- terminology, 759–760
- voluntary acceptance of benefit, 819–822
- waiver, and
  - generally, 811–813
  - knowledge, and, 815–816
  - reliance, and, 814–815
  - representation, 813–814
- wrongful prevention of performance, 822
- wrongful refusal to accept, and, 766–769

RESCISSON FOR MISREPRESENTATION

- affirmation, and, 383–384
- bars to
  - affirmation, 383–384
  - impossibility of restitution, 378–379
  - lapse of time, 384–385
  - third party rights, 382–383
- breach of contract, and, 370
- common law, at, 369
- contract voidable, 371–372
- defence, as
  - generally, 373–374
  - introduction, 370–371
- effect, 371–372
- equity, in, 369–370
- executed contracts, and, 377
- fraud, and, 369
- impossibility of restitution, and
  - benefit to misrepresentee, 379–380
  - changes made by misrepresentee, 378
  - changes made by misrepresentor, 379
  - decline in value, 378–379
  - deterioration, 379
  - improvements by misrepresentee, 381–382
  - improvements by misrepresentor, 382
  - introduction, 378
  - nature of subject-matter, 381
  - precision, and, 380–381
- incorporated misrepresentation
  - s.1(a) MA 1967, 375–376
  - s.2(2) MA 1967, 376–377
- innocent misrepresentation, and
  - introduction, 369
  - limits to right, 377
- introduction, 369–371
- lapse of time, and, 384–385

RESCISSON FOR MISREPRESENTATION—*cont.

- limits to right
  - affirmation, 383–384
  - impossibility of restitution, 378–379
  - introduction, 377
  - lapse of time, 384–385
  - third party rights, 382–383
- meaning, 370–371
- mode, 372–373
- negligent misrepresentation, and, 369
- sale of goods, and, 374–375
- third party rights, and, 382–383

RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM

- rectification, and, 325

RESTITUTION

- capacity of minors, and
  - common law, at, 556–557
  - court's discretion, 553–554
  - fraud, 554–556
  - generally, 551
  - repudiation, and, 548
  - scope, 551–553
- damages, and
  - basis of assessment, 944
  - generally, 941
- generally, 1049
- illegality, and
  - and see below*
  - exceptional cases, 491–503
  - general rule, 491
  - introduction, 490
  - scope of general rule, 503
  - services, and, 503–504
- introduction, 1049
- minors, and
  - common law, at, 556–557
  - court's discretion, 553–554
  - fraud, 554–556
  - generally, 551
  - repudiation, and, 548
  - scope, 551–553
- misrepresentation, and
  - benefit to misrepresentee, 379–380
  - changes made by misrepresentee, 378
  - changes made by misrepresentor, 379
  - decline in value, 378–379
  - deterioration, 379
  - improvements by misrepresentee, 381–382
  - improvements by misrepresentor, 382
  - introduction, 378
  - nature of subject-matter, 381
  - precision, and, 380–381
- payment under void contract
  - bases of rule, 1058–1060
  - failure of consideration, 1058–1059
  - general rule, 1057–1058
  - lack of consideration, 1058–1059
  - mistake, 1059
  - practical considerations, 1059–1060
  - special cases, 1060–1061
- privity of contract, and
  - generally, 625–626

RESTITUTION—*cont.

- privity of contract, and—cont.
  - promisee's remedies, 590
- quantum meruit
  - frustrated contract, 1064
  - incapacity, 1062
  - introduction, 1061
  - no concluded contract, 1061–1062
  - no express provision for remuneration, 1061
  - partial performance, 1062–1063
  - void contract, 1063–1064
  - wrongful prevention of performance, 1062
- recovery of money paid
  - introduction, 1049
  - payment under void contract, 1057–1061
  - total failure of consideration, 1049–1057
- total failure of consideration
  - damages, as, 1056–1057
  - definition, 1049–1050
  - non-returnable benefits, 1052–1053
  - partial failure, 1050–1052
  - returnable benefits, 1052–1053
  - unbargained for benefits, 1053–1056
- unconscionable bargains, and, 423

RESTITUTION (ILLEGALITY)

- class-protecting statutes, 491–493
- exceptional cases
  - class-protecting statutes, 491–493
  - misrepresentation, 492–493
  - mistake, 493
  - non reliance on illegal transaction, 495–503
  - oppression, 492
  - repudiation of illegal purpose, 493–495
- general rule
  - exceptions, 491–503
  - generally, 491
  - scope, 503
- introduction, 490
- misrepresentation, 492–493
- mistake, 493
- non reliance on illegal transaction
  - equitable title, 499–501
  - illegal leases, 498
  - introduction, 495–496
  - recovery of money obtained, 501–503
  - recovery of money paid, 498
  - recovery of transferred goods, 496–498
- oppression, 492
- repudiation of illegal purpose
  - in time, 494–495
  - introduction, 493–494
  - voluntary, 495
- scope of general rule, 503
- services, and, 503–504

RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 442

RESTRAINT OF TRADE, CONTRACTS IN

- competition law, and, 475–477
- employers' associations, 467–468
- employment, and
  - area of restraint, 458–460
  - drafting issues, 460–461

RESTRAINT OF TRADE, CONTRACTS IN—*cont.

- employment, and—cont.
  - duration of restraint, 460
  - during term of contract, 464
  - fairness, 461–462
  - interest, 455–458
  - introduction, 454
  - no covenant against competition existing, 463–464
  - public interest, 462–463
  - reasonableness, 458–462
  - scope of restraint, 460
  - validity of restraint, 464–465
- EU law, and, 477
- exclusive dealing, and
  - fairness, 470–471
  - generally, 468–470
  - interest, 470
  - public interest, 471–472
  - reasonableness, 470–471
- generally, 453–454
- injunctions, and, 1044–1045
- introduction, 430
- land use covenants, 472–473
- other, 474–475
- restrictive trading, and
  - conditions of validity, 465
  - hardship, 466
  - interest, 465
  - introduction, 465
  - third party remedies, 466–467
- sale of business, and
  - area of restraint, 458–460
  - drafting issues, 460–461
  - duration of restraint, 460
  - fairness, 461–462
  - interest, 454–455
  - introduction, 454
  - no covenant against competition existing, 463–464
  - public interest, 462–463
  - reasonableness, 458–462
  - scope of restraint, 460
  - validity of restraint, 464–465
- trade unions, 467–468

RESTRICTION OF PERSONAL LIBERTY

- contracts contrary to public policy, and, 452–453

RESTRICTIVE TRADING

- conditions of validity, 465
- hardship, 466
- interest, 465
- introduction, 465
- third party remedies, 466–467

RETAILERS

- agency, and, 706–707

“RETAIN AND TRANSFER” SYSTEM

- restraint of trade, and, 457

RETURN OF POST

- termination of offer, and, 43

REVENUE, PROTECTION OF

- illegality, and, 433–435

REVOCATION

posted acceptance, and, 28–29

RIGGING THE MARKET

illegality, and, 430

RISK

frustration, and

building contracts, 871

introduction, 871

sale of goods, 871

RISK ALLOCATION

standard form contracts, and, 215

RULE OF LAW

misrepresentation, and, 334

RULES OF ASSOCIATION, CONSTRUCTION OF

ousting jurisdiction of court, and, 447

SALE OF ANOTHER'S PROPERTY

agency of necessity, and

conditions, 719–720

generally, 719

SALE OF BUSINESS

interest, 454–455

introduction, 454

no covenant against competition existing, 463–464

public interest, 462–463

reasonableness, 458–462

restraint of trade, and

area of restraint, 458–460

drafting issues, 460–461

duration of restraint, 460

fairness, 461–462

interest, 454–455

introduction, 454

no covenant against competition existing, 463–464

public interest, 462–463

reasonableness, 458–462

scope of restraint, 460

validity of restraint, 464–465

validity of restraint, 464–465

SALE OF GOODS

exemption clauses, and, 251

frustration, and, 918–919

implied terms, and, 206–207

necessaries, and mental patients, 558

minors, 542

rescission for misrepresentation, and, 374–375

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and,
268–269, 279–280

SALE OF HONOURS

contracts contrary to public policy, and, 451

SALE OF LAND

exemption clauses, and, 265

form of contract, and

effect of non-compliance, 179–180

generally, 178

frustration, and, 895–897

generally, 48–49

non-disclosure, and, 390

SALE OF LAND—cont.

rescission for failure to perform, and commercial contracts, 828–829

common law, at, 827

conditional contracts, 829

equity, in, 827–829

nature of property, 828

term of contract, 828

waiver, 829

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and,
278–279

SALE OF OFFICES

contracts contrary to public policy, and, 451

SALE OF SHARES AND SECURITIES

exemption clauses, and, 265

invitation to treat, and, 16

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 280

SALVAGE

agency of necessity, and, 719

SALVAGE CONTRACTS

exemption clauses, and, 265

SCOTT V AVERY CLAUSES

ousting jurisdiction of court, and, 447

SECONDARY CONTRACTS

exemption clauses, and, 261–263

SECRET PROFITS

fiduciary duties of agent to principal, and,
746–747

SECURITIES

gaming and wagering contracts, and

introduction, 527

non-gaming wagers, 527

wagers on games, 527–530

SECURITIES-RELATED CONTRACTS

exemption clauses, and, 265

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 280

SELF-CONTRADICTORY PHRASES

vagueness, and, 50–51

SELF-INDUCED FRUSTRATION

burden of proof, 908

choice between several contracts, 906–908

negligence, 906

one party's conduct, 905–906

SELLER

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 268–269

SEPARATION OF SPOUSES

contracts contrary to public policy, and, 441

SERIOUSNESS OF BREACH

affirmation, and, 238–240

applicable clauses, 237–238

burden of proof, 240–241

deviation cases, 228–231

general rule, 225–226

general statements, 233–234

illustrations, 234–236

manner of breach, 231–233

nature of rule, 233–237

nature of term broken, 226–228

rescission, 238–240

scope of rule, 226–233

total breach, 236–237

- SERIOUSNESS OF MISTAKE
  - non est factum*, and, 328
- SERVICE CONTRACTS
  - capacity of minors, and, 543–545
- SERVICES
  - agency, and, 707–708
  - restitution (illegality), and, 503–504
- SEVERABILITY
  - frustration, and, 916–917
- SEVERABLE OBLIGATIONS
  - distinction from entire obligations, 785–787
  - generally, 784–785
- SEVERANCE
  - consideration, of
    - apportionment to legal part, 506
    - extent of illegality, 504–505
    - special cases
  - injunctions, and, 1046
  - introduction, 504
  - promises, of
    - “blue pencil” test, 507
    - effect on nature of contract, 507–509
    - effect on other promises, 509–510
    - need for separate consideration, 509
    - severable type, 506–507
  - statutory, 510
- SEXUAL IMMORALITY, CONTRACTS FOR
  - PROMOTION OF
    - introduction, 443
    - meretricious purposes, 443–444
    - stable relationships, 444–445
- SHARE SALES
  - capacity of minors, and, 546
  - exemption clauses, and, 265
  - invitation to treat, and, 16
  - unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 280
- SHIPMASTERS
  - agency of necessity, and, 718–719
- SIGNATURE
  - electronic documents, and, 186–187
  - exemption clauses, and, 216–217
  - guarantee, and, 183–184
- SIGNIFICANT IMBALANCE
  - unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 271
- SILENCE
  - acceptance, and
    - conduct, and, 35
    - generally, 31–34
- SOCIAL ARRANGEMENTS
  - intention to create legal relations, and, 164–167
- SOLICITATION COVENANTS
  - restraint of trade, and, 459
- SOLICITORS
  - agency, and, 708
- SOLICITORS’ INDEMNITY INSURANCE
  - privity of contract, and, 667–668
- SOLUS AGREEMENTS
  - fairness, 470–471
  - generally, 468–470
  - interest, 470
  - public interest, 471–472
  - reasonableness, 470–471
- SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE
  - adequacy of damages, and
    - appropriateness of remedy, 1025–1026
    - difficulty of quantification, 1021–1022
    - introduction, 1020
    - nominal sums, 1022
    - sale of goods, 1022–1025
    - satisfactory equivalent from other source, 1020–1021
  - building contracts, and, 1035
  - conditional contracts, and, 1035–1036
  - constant supervision contracts, and, 1032–1034
  - damages, and, 1046–1049
  - discretion
    - conduct of claimant, 1028–1029
    - impossibility, 1029
    - inadequacy of consideration, 1027–1028
    - introduction, 1026
    - other factors, 1029
    - severe hardship, 1026–1027
    - unfairness, 1027
  - generally, 1019–1020
  - injunctions, and, 1042
  - introduction, 843
  - mistake, and
    - absolute refusal, 316–317
    - terms, on, 317
  - mutuality, 1037–1038
  - parol evidence rule, and, 196–197
  - personal service contracts, and, 1029–1032
  - privity of contract, and, 590
  - promises without consideration, and, 1036–1037
  - substantial failure to perform, and, 771–773
  - terminable contracts, and, 1035–1036
  - third party claims
    - introduction, 1038
    - promisee, by, 1038–1039
    - third parties, by, 1040
  - unenforceable contracts
    - building contracts, 1035
    - conditional contracts, 1035–1036
    - constant supervision contracts, 1032–1034
    - partially enforceable contracts, 1035
    - personal service contracts, 1029–1032
    - promises without consideration, 1036–1037
    - terminable contracts, 1035–1036
    - vague contracts, 1034
- SPECULATIVE DAMAGES
  - damages, and, 955–957
- STAKEHOLDERS
  - gaming and wagering contracts, and, 526
- STANDARD FORM CONTRACTS
  - consumer transactions, for
    - and see* Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations
  - definitions, 268–276
  - drafting terms, 280–281
  - effects of unfairness, 281–282
  - excluded contracts, 277–280
  - excluded terms, 276–277
  - generally, 267

STANDARD FORM CONTRACTS—cont.

- consumer transactions, for—cont.
  - interpretation of terms, 280–281
  - relation with UCTA, 267–268
  - restrictions on evasion, 283
- exemption clauses
  - and see* Exemption clauses
  - common law limitations, 241–244
  - construction, 221–241
  - incorporation in contract, 216–221
  - introduction, 216
  - legislative limitations, 246–283
- introduction, 215–216
- legislative limitations
  - administrative control, 283–285
  - exemption clauses, 246–283
  - introduction, 246
  - prescribed contents, 285
  - supervised bargaining, 283
- other terms, 244–246

STATUTORY ASSIGNMENTS

- and see* Assignment
- absolute assignment
  - charge, 676–677
  - conditional assignment, 677–678
  - introduction, 676
  - part of debt, 677
- consideration, 683
- debt, 678
- formalities, 678
- introduction, 675–676
- legal thing in action, 678

STATUTORY CORPORATIONS

- Companies Act, under
  - capacity, 561–562
  - director's powers, 562–563
  - introduction, 560–561
  - statutory reforms, 561
- introduction, 560
- limited liability partnerships, 563
- special statute, under
  - alternative remedies, 565–566
  - enforcement, 566–567
  - introduction, 563
  - ultra vires doctrine, 563–565

STIPULING PROSECUTION FOR TREASON

- illegality, and, 432

STOLEN MONEY, GAMBLING OF

- change of position, 538
- illegal wagers, 535
- introduction, 535
- lawful wagers, 535–538
- partial defence, 538
- supply of gaming chips, 536–537

STRICT LIABILITY

- breach of condition, and, 838–840

STRIKE AND LOCKOUT CLAUSE

- vagueness, and, 49

SUBJECT-MATTER OF CONTRACT

- illegality, and, 433
- mistake, and, 303–304
- parol evidence rule, and, 199

“SUBJECT TO CONTRACT” AGREEMENT

- incompleteness, and, 52–54
- intention to create legal relations, and, 164

SUBJECT TO EQUITIES

- amount of claim, 691
- claims against assignor
  - arising out of contract assigned, 689–690
  - arising out of other transaction, 690
  - introduction, 689
- claims intermediate assignee, 691
- defects of title, 689
- introduction, 689

SUBSEQUENT CONDUCT OF PRINCIPAL

- agency, and, 716

SUBSTANTIAL FAILURE TO PERFORM

- adequacy of damages
  - general principle, 771
  - specific performance, 771–773
- breach of fundamental term, 805–807
- conditions, warranties and intermediate terms
  - bases of distinction, 790–791
  - breach of condition, and, 800–804
  - breach of warranty, and, 804–805
  - express classification, 791–792
  - generally, 788
  - innominate terms, 795–800
  - intermediate terms, 795–800
  - nature of distinction, 788–789
  - statutory classification, 792–793
  - technical application of distinction, 793–795
- deliberate breach
  - fraud, 807
  - introduction, 807
  - repudiation, 807–809
  - substantial breach, 809–810
- entire obligations
  - distinction from severable obligations, 785–787
  - generally, 782–784
- exceptions
  - breach of fundamental term, 805–807
  - conditions, warranties and intermediate terms, 788–805
  - deliberate breach, 807–810
  - entire obligations, 782–784
  - express provision for determination, 778–782
  - introduction, 778
  - severable obligations, 784–788
  - unilateral contracts, 810–811
- express provision for determination
  - consumer protection, 781
  - general, 778–779
  - invalidity, 781–782
  - relief against forfeiture, 779–781
- historical background, 770
- introduction, 769–770
- meaning
  - adequacy of damages, 771–773
  - introduction, 770–771
  - other factors, 777–778
  - ratio of failure to performance, 773–774
  - ulterior motives, 776–777

- SUBSTANTIAL FAILURE TO PERFORM—*cont.
     meaning—cont.
         uncertainty as to future performance, 774–776
         unjust enrichment, 771
     other factors, 777–778
     ratio of failure to performance, 773–774
     severable obligations
         distinction from entire obligations, 785–787
         generally, 784–785
     specific performance, 771–773
     ulterior motives, 776–777
     uncertainty as to future performance, 774–776
     unilateral contracts, 810–811
     unjust enrichment, 771
- SUCCESSION RIGHTS, CONTRACTS RELATING TO
     unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 278
- SUPERVENING EVENTS
     breach of condition, and, 842
     frustration, and
         and see Frustration
         generally, 866
- SUPERVENING INCAPACITY
     corporations, 46–47
     mental patients, 45
- SUPERVENING PROHIBITION
     frustration, and, 888–890
- SUPERVISED BARGAINING
     standard form contracts, and, 283
- SUPPLIER
     unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 268–269
- SUPPLY OF GOODS AND SERVICES
     exemption clauses, and, 254–255
     implied terms, and, 206–207
     unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 268–269
- SURETYSHIP
     non-disclosure, and, 398
- SURVIVORSHIP
     plurality of parties, and creditors, 576
         debtors, 570–571
- TAXATION
     damages, and, 957–958
- TELEPHONE COMMUNICATIONS
     acceptance, and
         garbled messages, 28
         generally, 26
- TEMPORARY ILLEGALITY
     frustration, and, 890
- TENDER
     acceptance, and, 22
     performance of contract, and, 754
- TENDERS
     acceptance, and, 21–22
     invitation to treat, and, 15
- TERMINABLE CONTRACTS
     specific performance, and, 1035–1036
- TERMINATION OF AGENCY—*cont.
     commercial agents, and, 750
     death, by, 750
     inconsistent conduct, by, 749
     insanity, by, 749
     introduction, 748
     irrevocable agency, and, 751–752
     non-consensual agency, and, 750–751
     notice, by, 749
- TERMINATION OF CONTRACT
     breach of condition, and, 842–843 breach, by and see Breach of contract anticipatory breach, 857–864
         effects, 843–857
         defective performance, 834
         incapacitating oneself, 834–835
         introduction, 832
         lawful excuse, and, 835–838
         refusal to perform, 832–834
         standard of duty, 838–842 failure to perform, by
         and see Failure to perform
         generally, 832–834
         introduction, 759
         rescission, 759–826
     frustration, by
         and see Frustration
         alternatives, 892–893
         effects, 909–920
         events affecting one party, 893–894
         fact or law, 897–898
         historical development, 866–869
         illegality, 887–890
         impossibility, 869–885
         juristic basis, 920–925
         land, and, 894–897
         limitations, 898–908 prospective, 890–892
         purpose, of, 885–887
     notice, by, 842–843
     rescission, by
         and see Rescission
         effects, 849–855
         generally, 759–826
         introduction, 844
         option, 844–849
- TERMINATION OF OFFER corporations, and, 46–47
     death
         introduction, 44
         offeree, of, 45
         offeror, of, 44–45
     lapse of time, 43–44
     mental patients, and, 45
     occurrence of condition, 44
     rejection, 43
     supervening incapacity
         corporations, 46–47
         mental patients, 45
     withdrawal
         exceptions to rule, 42

TERMINATION OF OFFER—*cont.*withdrawal—cont.

general rule, 41–42

TERMS OF CONTRACT

custom, by, 213–214

damages for misrepresentation, and, 353–354

express terms

introduction, 191

joinder of documents, 191–192

parol evidence rule, 192–201

guarantees, and, 183

implied terms

fact, in, 201–206

introduction, 201

law, in, 206–213

introduction, 191

mistake negating consent, and, 304

standard forms, and and see Standard form contracts

exemption clauses, 216–244

introduction, 215–216

legislative limitations, 246–285

other terms, 244–246

trade usage, by, 214

TERMS LEFT OPEN

incompleteness, and, 55–59

THING IN ACTION

assignment, and, 678

THIRD PARTIES, RIGHTS OF

common law, at

and see Privy of contract

development, 588–590

exceptions, 645–651

exemption clauses, 626–645

introduction, 580–582

operation, 590–606

preliminary issues, 582–587

purpose, 588

scope, 606–626

consideration, and, 83

Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999, under

effect, 662–664

enforcement rights, 651–657

exceptions, 661–662

insurance, 666–669

nature of rights, 664

promisee's rights, 665–666

promisor's defences, 660–661

property, 669–671

rescission of contract, 657–660

UCTA, and, 664–665

insurance, and

fire, 667

introduction, 666

life, 666–667

motor, 667

persons with limited interests, 667

solicitors' indemnity, 667–668

third parties' rights, 668–669

Law of Property Act 1925, under, 669–671

rectification, and, 326

THIRD PARTIES, RIGHTS OF—cont.

rescission for misrepresentation, and, 382–383

specific performance, and, 1038–1040

unconscionable bargains, and, 424–427

THIRD PARTY, PAYMENT BY

part payment of debt, and, 128–129

TICKETS

exemption clauses, and, 218–219

invitation to treat, and, 14–15

TIME FOR PERFORMANCE, STIPULATIONS OF

general, 826–827

LPA 1925, under, 830–831

notice, 829–830

sale of land, 827–829

TIMETABLES

invitation to treat, and, 14–15

TORT, LIABILITY IN

minors, and, 551

third parties, and, 622–624

TOTAL FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION

damages, as, 1056–1057

definition, 1049–1050

non-returnable benefits, 1052–1053

partial failure, 1050–1052

returnable benefits, 1052–1053

unbargained for benefits, 1053–1056

TOWAGE CONTRACTS

exemption clauses, and, 265

TRADE SECRETS

restraint of trade, and, 455

TRADE UNIONS

restraint of trade, and, 467–468

TRADE USAGE

agency, and, 734

exemption clauses, and, 221

implied terms, and, 214

vagueness, and, 49–50

TRADING WITH ENEMY

contracts contrary to public policy, and, 452

frustration, and

contractual provision for event, 899

foreseen and foreseeable events, 902

TRANSFER OF LIABILITIES

bankruptcy, 704

benefit and burden, 702–704

death, 704

insolvency, 704

introduction, 701

legislative provision, 704

novation, 701–702

TRANSFERRED LOSS

derivative rights, and, 643–645

TREASON, STIFLING PROSECUTION FOR

illegality, and, 432

TRIVIAL ACTS OR OBJECTS

consideration, and, 85–86

TRUST AND CONFIDENCE

presumed undue influence, and, 411–413

TRUSTS OF PROMISES

effects of trust, 649–650

intention to create trust, 647–649

introduction, 646

- TRUSTS OF PROMISES—cont.
 relation between trust device and privacy, 650–651
 relevant promises, 650
- TYING COVENANTS
 exclusive dealing, and, 469
- UBERRIMAE FIDEI, CONTRACTS OF
 non-disclosure, and family arrangements, 397–398
 insurance, 396–397
 introduction, 394
- ULTRA VIRES DOCTRINE Companies Act corporations
 capacity, 561–562
 director's powers, 562–563
 introduction, 560–561
 statutory reforms, 561
 limited liability partnerships, 563
 special statute, under alternative remedies, 565–566
 enforcement, 566–567
 introduction, 563
 ultra vires doctrine, 563–565
- UNAVAILABILITY
 generally, 872
 temporary, 872–875
- UNCONSCIONABLE BARGAINS
 bars to relief
 affirmation, 423–424
 delay, 424
 impossibility of restitution, 423
 introduction, 423
 third party rights, 424–427
 dealings with poor and ignorant persons, 420–421
 extortionate credit bargains, and, 427
 generally, 420
 inequality of bargaining power, 421–423
 introduction, 420
 rescission, and, 423
- UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPALS
 mistake negating consent, and, 303
 rights of agent against third party, 734
 rights of principal against third party, 727–730
- UNDUE INFLUENCE
 actual pressure, 408–409
 generally, 408
 introduction, 405
 presumed undue influence categories of relationship, 411–419
 effect, 411
 introduction, 409
 nature, 411
 rebuttal, 419–420
 requirements, 410–411
 types, 409–410
 unconscionable bargains
and see above
 bars to relief, 423–427
 dealings with poor and ignorant persons, 420–421
- UNDUE INFLUENCE—cont.
 unconscionable bargains—cont.
 generally, 420
 inequality of bargaining power, 421–423
 introduction, 420
- UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS
 breach of fiduciary duties, and, 243
 common law limitations
contra proferentem rule, 221–222 exclusion of liability for breach of fiduciary duties, 243
 exclusion of liability for fraud, 242–243
 exclusion of natural justice, 243
 incorporation, 216–221
 introduction, 241
 misrepresentation as to contents, 241–242
 negligence, 222–225
 overriding undertaking, 242
 seriousness of breach, 225–241
 third parties, 244
 unreasonableness, 243–244
 construction
contra proferentem rule, 221–222
 introduction, 221
 negligence, 222–225
 seriousness of breach, 225–241
contra proferentem rule, 221–222
 course of dealing, and, 220–221
 fraud, and, 242–243
 incorporation by notice
 degree of notice, 217–218
 introduction, 217
 nature of document, 217
 steps taken to give notice, 218–219
 time of notice, 219–220
 incorporation in contract
 course of dealing, by, 220–221
 introduction, 216
 notice, by, 217–220
 signature, by, 216–217
 introduction, 216
 legislative limitations
 introduction, 246
 UCTA 1977, 246–267
 UTCCR 1999, 267–283
 misrepresentation as to contents, and, 241–242 natural justice, and, 243
 negligence
 introduction, 222–223
 party liable irrespective, 223–224
 party liable only for negligence, 224–225
 notice, and
 degree of notice, 217–218
 introduction, 217
 nature of document, 217
 steps taken to give notice, 218–219
 time of notice, 219–220
 overriding undertaking, and, 242
 privity of contract, and
 benefit, 627–638
 burden, 638–645
 generally, 626–627

UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS—cont.

privity of contract, and—cont.

introduction, 244

reasonableness, and, 243–244

seriousness of breach

affirmation, and, 238–240

applicable clauses, 237–238

burden of proof, 240–241

deviation cases, 228–231

general rule, 225–226

general statements, 233–234

illustrations, 234–236

manner of breach, 231–233

nature of rule, 233–237

nature of term broken, 226–228

rescission, 238–240

scope of rule, 226–233

total breach, 236–237

signature of contract, and, 216–217

third parties, and, 244

UCTA 1977, and

and see Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977

excluded cases, 264–267

ineffective terms, 249–252

introduction, 246

partly effective terms, 257–258

preliminary definitions, 247–249

reasonableness rules, 258–261

relation with UTCCR, 267–268

restrictions on evasion, 261–264

terms subject to reasonableness requirements, 252–256

UTCCR 1999, and

and see Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations

definitions, 268–276

drafting terms, 280–281

effects of unfairness, 281–282

excluded contracts, 277–280

excluded terms, 276–277

generally, 267

interpretation of terms, 280–281

relation with UCTA, 267–268

restrictions on evasion, 283

UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS ACT 1977

choice of law clauses, 263–264

consumer contracts, 253–254

dangerous goods, 252

death, 249–250

definitions

business liability, 247–248

dealing as consumer, 247–248

exclude or restrict, 248–249

distance selling, 252

exchange of goods, 251–252

excluded cases

carriage of goods, 265

charterparties, 265

choice of law clauses, 266–267

company-related issues, 265

employment, 265–266

insurance, 264–265

UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS ACT 1977—cont.

excluded cases—cont.

intellectual property, 265

international carriage, 266

international supply of goods, 266

land-related issues, 265 outside scope of Act, 264

pneumoconiosis awards, 266

salvage, 265

Schedule 1 contracts, 264–266 securities-related issues, 265

towage, 265

guarantee of consumer goods, 250

hire, 251–252

hire-purchase, 251

indemnity clauses, 255–256

ineffective terms

dangerous goods, 252

death, 249–250

distance selling, 252

exchange of goods, 251–252

guarantee of consumer goods, 250

hire, 251–252

hire-purchase, 251

personal injury, 249–250

pledge of goods, 251–252

product liability, 252

sale of goods, 251

introduction, 246

misrepresentation:

generally, 388–389

introduction, 256

negligence

death, 249–250

other harm, 252–253

personal injury, 249–250

partly effective terms, 257–258

personal injury, 249–250

pledge of goods, 251–252

product liability, 252

reasonableness requirements, terms subject to

consumer contracts, 253–254

indemnity clauses, 255–256

introduction, 252

misrepresentation, 256

negligence, 252–253

standard form contracts, 253–254

supply of goods, 254–255

reasonableness rules

affirmation, and, 261

guidelines, 258–260

introduction, 258

nature of decision, 260–261

rescission, and, 261

seriousness of breach, and, 261

time for determination, 258

relation with UTCCR, 267–268

restrictions on evasion

choice of law clauses, 263–264

secondary contract, 261–263

sale of goods, 251

secondary contract, 261–263

UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS ACT 1977—cont.
 standard form contracts, 253–254
 supply of goods, 254–255

UNFAIR TERMS IN CONSUMER CONTRACTS REGULATIONS 1999

choice of law clause, and, 283

definitions

consumer, 269–270

core provisions, 271–273

good faith, 273

not having been individually negotiated, 270–271

seller, 268–269

significant imbalance, 271

supplier, 268–269

unfair term, 271–276

drafting terms, 280–281

effects of unfairness

comparison with UCTA 1977, 282

generally, 281–282

examples, 274–276

excluded contracts

not covered by inclusive provisions, 278–280 specific exclusion, 277–278

excluded terms

international conventions, 277

regulatory provisions, 276–277 statutory provisions, 276–277

generally, 267

interpretation of terms, 280–281

misrepresentation, 389

relation with UCTA, 267–268

restrictions on evasion, 283

UNFAIRNESS IN CONSUMER CONTRACTS

comparison with UCTA 1977, 282

core provisions, 271–273

effects, 281–282

examples, 274–276

generally, 271–276

good faith, 273

significant imbalance, 271

UNILATERAL CONTRACTS

acceptance, and

classification, 37–38

general rules, 38

part performance, 38–41

consideration, and, 151–152

implied terms, and, 205–206

part performance, and

bankers' irrevocable credits, 40

continuing guarantees, 39–40

estate agents' contracts, 40–41

extent of recovery, 41

generally, 38–39

introduction, 38

substantial failure to perform, and, 810–811

UNJUST ENRICHMENT

substantial failure to perform, and, 771

UNLIQUIDATED CLAIMS

assignment, and, 696–698

part payment of debt, and, 126–127

USAGE

exemption clauses, and, 221

implied terms, and, 214

vagueness, and, 49–50

USE OF SUBJECT-MATTER FOR UNLAWFUL

PURPOSE

illegality, and, 433

USUAL AUTHORITY

effects, 748

introduction, 706

meaning, 716–717

scope, 717–718

termination, 750–751

UTMOST GOOD FAITH, CONTRACTS OF

non-disclosure, and family arrangements, 397–398

insurance, 396–397

introduction, 394

VAGUENESS

custom, 49–50

duty to resolve, 50

intention to create legal relations, and, 170–171

introduction, 49

meaningless phrases, 50–51

reasonableness, 50

self-contradictory phrases, 50–51

specific performance, and, 1034

trade usage, 49–50

VALID CLAIMS

consideration, and, 87–88

VALIDITY OF CONTRACT

parol evidence rule, and, 195

VALUE

mistake of fact, and, 312–313

VARIATION

consideration, and, 101–102

form of contract, and, 189–190

waiver, and, 103

VARIATIONS IN DEBTOR'S PERFORMANCE

part payment of debt, and, 127

VERTICAL AGREEMENTS

competition law, and, 476

VICARIOUS PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT

assignment, and, 758

introduction, 755

with creditor's consent, 755–756

without creditor's consent

introduction, 756

nature of contract, 756–757

terms of contract, 757

VIENNA CONVENTION

unfair terms in consumer contracts, and, 277

VIOLATION OF STATUTE

illegality, and, 429

VOID CONTRACTS

gaming and wagering contracts, and, 513

illegality, and, 430

quantum meruit, and, 1063–1064

VOIDABLE CONTRACTS

duress, and, 405

VOIDABLE CONTRACTS—cont.

- minors, and
  - introduction, 545
  - land, 545–546
  - loans, 547
  - marriage settlements, 547
  - partnership, 546
  - reasons, 548–549
  - repudiation, and, 547–548
  - shares in companies, 546
- rescission for misrepresentation, and, 371–372

VOLUNTARY ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFIT

- rescission for failure to perform, and, 819–822

VOLUNTEER

- adequacy of consideration, and, 76

VOYAGE CHARTERPARTIES

- frustration, and, 917

WAGERING CONTRACTS

- advance payment, 525–526
- agents
  - advance payment, 525–526
  - agent's indemnity, 524
  - agent's liability to account, 525
  - excepted transactions, 526
  - failure to obey instruction, 524
- definitions
  - future uncertain event, 514–515
  - introduction, 514
  - no other interest, 515–516
  - not other real consideration, 516–518
  - two parties, 515
  - winner and loser, 515
- distance selling, and, 522
- effects, 519–538
- enforcement
  - common law, at, 519
  - statute, under, 520–521
- gambling stolen money
  - change of position, 538
  - illegal wagers, 535
  - introduction, 535
  - lawful wagers, 535–538
  - partial defence, 538
  - supply of gaming chips, 536–537
- lawful gaming, 518–519
- loans
  - future betting, for, 531–534
  - gaming on licensed premises, for, 534–535
  - generally, 530
  - pay lost bets, to, 530–531
- overpayments, 523
- principal and agent
  - advance payment, 525–526
  - agent's indemnity, 524
  - agent's liability to account, 525
  - excepted transactions, 526
  - failure to obey instruction, 524
- prizes, 527
- recovery of money deposited
  - illegal wagers, 523
  - lawful wagers, 523–524

WAGERING CONTRACTS—cont.

- recovery of money paid
  - common law, at, 522
  - statute, under, 522–523
- securities
  - introduction, 527
  - non-gaming wagers, 527
  - wagers on games, 527–530
- stakeholders, 526
- unlawful gaming, 518–519

WAIVER

- applicability of doctrine, 107–111
- case law, 105–106
- common law, at
  - forbearance, 103–105
- introduction, 102–103
- rescission, 103
- variation, 103
- creation of no new rights, 112–115
- estoppel by convention, and
  - assumption of law, 121–122
  - creation of new rights, 123–124
  - effect, 122–123
  - introduction, 119–120
  - invalidity of assumed term, 124
  - requirements, 120–121
- estoppel by representation, and, 115–117
- forbearance, and
  - common law, at, 103–105
  - equity, in, 115–117
- introduction, 105
- other jurisdictions, and, 118–119
- promises, and, 118
- relationships within the doctrine, 106–107
- rescission, and, 103
- rescission for failure to perform, and
  - generally, 811–813
  - knowledge, and, 815–816
  - reliance, and, 814–815
  - representation, 813–814
- suspensory effect, 111–112
- variation, and, 103

WANT OF CONSIDERATION

- generally, 67

WAR CLAUSE

- vagueness, and, 49

WARRANTIES, CONDITIONS AND INTERMEDIATE TERMS

- bases of distinction, 790–791
- breach of condition, and, 800–804
- breach of warranty, and, 804–805
- express classification, 791–792
- generally, 788
- innominate terms, 795–800
- intermediate terms, 795–800
- nature of distinction, 788–789
- statutory classification, 792–793
- technical application of distinction, 793–795

WEBSITE TRADING

- acceptance, and, 17

- WITHDRAWAL OF OFFER
  - exceptions to rule, 42
  - general rule, 41–42
- WORKING TO RULE
  - refusal to perform, and, 834
- WRITING, CONTRACT IN
  - effect of non-compliance, 179–180
  - examples, 177–178
- WRITTEN AGREEMENT NOT WHOLE AGREEMENT
  - parol evidence rule, and, 193–195
- WRONGFUL PREVENTION OF PERFORMANCE
  - quantum meruit, and, 1062
  - rescission for failure to perform, and, 822
- WRONGFUL REFUSAL TO ACCEPT PERFORMANCE
  - evaluation of rule, 769
  - generally, 766
  - injured party fails to rescind, 768–769
  - pre-rescission non-repudiatory breach, 768
  - repudiation inducing failure, 766–767
  - repudiation not inducing inability, 767–768